"This is the simple thing it claims to be,
A course we took for life and honor's sake,
Very strange, very justifiable."
She says, "God put it in my head to fly,
As when the mariners migrate: autumn claps
Her hands, cries 'Winter's coming, will be here,
Off with you are the white teeth overtake!
Flee! So I fled: this friend was the warm day,
The south wind and whatever favors flight;
I took the favor, had the help, how else?
And so did fly rapidly all night,
All day, all night — a longer night — again,
And then another day, longest of days,
And all the while, whether we fled or stopped,
I scarce know how or why, one thought filled both,
'Fly and arrive!' So long as I found strength
I talked with my companion, told him much,
Knowing that he knew more, knew me, knew God
And God's disposal of me, — but the sense
O' the blessed flight absorbed me in the main,
And speech became mere talking through a sleep.
Till at the end of that last longest night
In a red daybreak, when we reached an inn
And my companion whispered 'Next stage — Rome!'

Sudden the weak flesh fall like piled-up cards,
All the frail fabric at a finger's touch,
And prostrate the poor soul too, and I said,
'But though Count Guido were a furlong off,
Just on me, I must stop and rest awhile!'
Then something like a huge wave o' the sea
Broked over my brain and buried me in sleep
Blessedly, till it ebbed and left me loose,
And where was I found but on a strange bed
In a strange room like hell, roaring with noise,
Ruddy with flame, and filled with men, in front
Who but the man you call my husband? ay —
Count Guido once more between heaven and me,
For there my heaven stood, my salvation, yes —
That Caponsacchi all my heaven of help,
Helpless himself, held prisoner in the hands
Of men who looked up in my husband's face to take the fate thence he should signify,
Just as the way was at Arezzo. Then,
Not for my sake but his who had helped me —
I sprang up, reached him with one bound, and seized
The sword o' the felon, trembling at his side,
Fit creature of a coward, unheathed the thing
And would have pinned him through the poison-bag.
To the wall and left him there to palpitate,
As you serve scorpions, but men interposed —
Disarmed me, gave his life to him again
That he might take mine and the other lives;
And he has done so. I submit myself!"

The priest says — oh, and in the main result
The facts seseverate, he truly says,
As to the very set and deed of him,
However you mistrust the mind o' the man —
The flight was just for flight's sake, no pretext
For aught except to set Pompilia free.
He says, "I cite the husband's self's worst charge
In proof of my best word for both of us.
Be it conceded that so many times
We took our pleasure in his palace: then,
What need to fly at all? — or flying no less,
What need to outrage the lips sick and white
Of a woman, and bring ruin down beside,
By halting when Rome lay one stage beyond?"
So does he vindicate Pompilia's fame,
Confirm her story in all points but one —
This; that, so fleeing and so breathing forth
Her last strength in the prayer to halt a while,
She makes confusion of the reddening white
Which was the sunset when her strength gave way,
And the next sunrise and its whitening red
Which she revived in when her husband came:
She mixes both times, more and ever in one.
Having lived through a blanket of night 'twixt each
Though dead-sleep, unaware as a corpse,
She on the bed above; her friend below
Watched in the doorway of the inn the while,
Stood i' the red o' the morn, that she mistakes,
In act to rouse and quicken the tardy crew
And hurry out the horses, have the stage
Over, the last league, reach Rome and be safe:
When up came Guido.

Guido's tale begins —
How he and his whole household, drunk to death
By some enchanted potion, poppied drugs
Piled by the wife, lay powerless in gross sleep
And left the spoilers unimpeded way,
Could not shake off their poison and pursue,
Till noontide, then made shift to get on horse
And did pursue: which means he took his time,
Pressed on no more than lingered after, step
By step, just making sure o' the fugitives,
Till at the nick of time, he saw his chance,
Seized it, came up with and surprised the pair.
How he must needs have gnawn lip and gnashed teeth,
Taking successively at tower and town,
Village and roadside, still the same report:
"Yes, such a pair arrived an hour ago,
Sat in the carriage just where now you stand,
While we got horses ready, — turned deaf ear
To all entreaty they would even alight;
Counted the minutes and resumed their course."

Would they indeed escape, arrive at Rome,
Leave no least loophole to let murder through,
But foil him of his captured infamy,
Prize of guilt proved and perfect? So it seemed:
Till, oh the happy chance, at last stage, Rome
But two short hours off, Castelnuovo reached,
The guardian angel gave reluctant place,
Satan stepped forward with alacrity,
Pompilia's flesh and blood succumbed, perforse
A halt was, and her husband had his will.
Perdue he coached, counted out hour by hour
THE RING AND THE BOOK

Till he should spy in the east a signal-streak —
Night had been, morrow was, triumph would be.
Do you see the plan deliciously complete?
The rush upon the unsuspecting sleep,
The easy execution, the outcry
Over the deed. "Take notice all the world!
These two dead bodies, locked still in embrace. —
The man is Caponsacchi and a priest,
The woman is my wife: they fled me late,
Thus have I found and you behold them thus,
And may judge me: do you approve or no?"

Success did seem not so improbable,
But that already Satan’s languish was heard,
His black back turned on Guido — left to his
Or rather, balked of suit and service now,
Left to improve on both by one deed more,
Burn up the better at no distant day,
Body and soul one holocaust to hell.
Anyhow, of this natural consequence
Did just the last link of the long chain snap:
For an eruption was o’ the priest, alive
And alert, calm, resolute and formidable,
Not the least look of fear in that broad brow
One not to be disposed of by surprise,
And armed moreover — who had guessed as much?
Yes, there stood he in secular costume
Complete from head to heel, with sword at side,
He seemed to know the trick of perfectly.
There was no prompt suppression of the man
As he said calmly, "I have saved your wife
From death; there was no other way but this;
Of what do I defraud you except death?
Charge any wrong beyond, I answer it."
Guido, the valorous, had met his match,
Was forced to demand help instead of flight,
Bid the authorities o’ the place lend aid
And make the best of a broken matter so.
They soon obeyed the summons — I suppose,
Apprized and ready, or not far to seek —
Laid hands on Caponsacchi, found in fault,
A priest yet flagrantly accounted thus, —
Then, to make good Count Guido’s further charge,
Proceeded, prisoner made lead the way,
In a crowd, upstairs to the chamber-door,
Where wax-white, dead asleep, deep beyond dream,
As the priest laid her, lay Pomplilia yet.

And as he mounted step and step with the crowd
How I see Guido taking heart again! —
He knew his wife so well and the way of her —
How at the outbreak she would abhor her shame
In hell’s heart, would it mercifully yawn —
How, failing that, her forehead to his foot,
She would crouch silent till the great doom fell,
Leave him triumphant with the crowd to see
Guilt motionless or writhing like a worm! —
No! Second misadventure, this worm turned,

I told you: would have slain him on the spot
With his own weapon, but they seized her
hands:
Leaving her tongue free, as it tolled the knell
Of Guido’s hope so lively late. The past Took quite another shape now. She who shrieked,
"At least and forever I am mine and God’s,
Thanks to his liberating angel Death —
Never again degraded to be yours
The ignoble noble, the unmanly man,
The beast below the beast in brutishness! —
This was the froward child, " the restit lamb Used to be cherished in his breast," he groaned —
"Eat from his hand and drink from out his cup.
The while his fingers pushed their loving way
Throughout a curl on curl of that soft coat —
as,
And she all silverly basied gratitude
While meditating mischief! — and so forth.
He must invent another story now! —
The ins and outs o’ the rooms were searched: he found
Or showed for found the abominable prize
Love-letters from his wife who cannot write,
Love-letters in reply o’ the priest — thank God,
Who can write and confront his character
With this, and prove the false thing forged throughout:
Spitting whereat, he needs must speak him
But Guido’s self? — that forged and falsified
One letter called Pomplilia’s, past dispute:
Then why not these to make sure still more sure?

So was the case concluded then and there:
Guido preferred his charges in due form,
Called on the law to adjudicate, consigned
The accused ones to the Prefect of the place.
(Oh mouse-birth of that mountain-like revenge!)
And so to his own place betook himself
After the spring that failed, — the wildcat’s way.
The captured parties were conveyed to Rome;
Investigation followed here i’ the court —
Soon to review the fruit of its own work,
From then to now being eight months and so
more.
Guido kept out of sight and safe at home:
The Abate, brother Pablo, helped most
At words when deeds were out of question, pushed Nearest the purple, best played deputy,
So, pleaded, Guido’s representative
At the court shall soon try Guido’s self — what’s more,
The court that also took — I told you, Sir —
That statement of that couple, how a cheat
Had been i’ the birth of the babe, no child of this
That was the prelude; this, the play’s first act:
Whereof we wait what comes, crown, close of all.
THE OTHER HALF-ROME

Well, the result was something of a shade
On the parties thus accused, — how otherwise?
Shade, but with shine as unmistakable.
Each had a prompt defence: Pomplia first —
"Earth was made hall to me who did no harm:
I only could emerge one way from hall.
By catching at the one hand held me, so
I caught at it and thereby stepped to heaven:
If that be wrong, do with me what you will!"
Then Caponnsachi with a grave grand sweep
O' the arm as though his soul warned baseness off —
"If as a man, then much more as a priest
I hold me bound to help weak innocence:
If so my worldly reputation burst,
Being the bubble it is, why, burst it may:
Blame I can bear though not blameworthiness.
But use your sense first, see if the miscreant proved,
The man who tortured thus the woman, thus
Have not both laid the trap and fixed the lure
Over the pit should bury body and soul!
His facts are lies: his letters are the fact —
An infiltration flavored with himself!
As for the fancies — whether... what is it you say?
The body loves me, whether I love her
In the forbidden sense of your surprise, —
If, with the midday blaze of truth above,
The uninled eye of God awake, aware,
You needs must pry about and trace the birth
Of each stray beam of light may traverse night,
To the night's sun that 's Lucifer himself,
Do so, at other time, in other place,
Not now nor here! Enough that first to last
I never touched her lip nor she my hand,
Nor either of us thought a thought, much less
Spoke a word which the Virgin might not Be such your question, thus I answer it:"

Then the court had to make its mind up, spoke
"It is a thorny question, yes, a tale
Hard to believe, but not improbable.
Who can be absolute for either side?
A middle course is happily open yet.
Here has a lot surprised the social blank, —
Whether through favor, feebleness or fault,
No matter, leprous has touched our robe
And we unclean must needs be purified.
Here is a wife makes holiday from home,
A priest caught playing truant to his church,
In masquerade moreover: both allege
Enough excuse to stop our lifted scourge
Which else would heavily fall. On the other hand,
Here is a husband, ay and man of mark,
Who comes complaining here, demands redress
As if he were the pattern of desert —
The while those plaguy allegations frown,
Forbid we grant him the redress he seeks.
To all men be our moderation known!
Rewarding none while compensating each,
Hurting all round though harming nobody,
Husband, wife, priest, scot-free not one shall escape,
Yet priest, wife, husband, boast the unbroken head

From application of our excellent oil:
So that, whatever be the fact, in fine,
We make no miss of justice in a sort.
First, let the husband stomach as he may,
His wife shall neither be returned him, no —
Nor branded, whipped and caged, but just consigned
To a convent and the quietude she craves;
So is he rid of his domestic plague:
What better thing can happen to a man?
Next, let the priest retire — unshent, unshamed,
Unpunished as for perpetrating crime,
But relegate (not imprisoned, Sirs!)
Sent for three years to clarify his youth
At Civita, a rest by the way to Rome:
There let his life skim off its last of lees
Nor keep this dubious color. Judged the cause:
All parties may retire, content, we hope."
That 's Rome's way, the traditional road of law;
Whither it leads is what remains to tell.

The priest went to his relegation-place,
The wife to her convent, brother Paolo
To the arms of brother Guido with the news
And this beside — his charge was counter-charged:
The Comparini, his old brace of hats,
Were breathed and vigilant and venomous
now —
Had shot a second bolt where the first stuck,
And followed up the pending dowry-suit
By a procedure should release the wife
From so much of the marriage-bond as barred
Escape when Guido turned the screw too much
On his wife's flesh and blood, as husband may.
No more defence, she turned and made attack,
Claimed now divorce from bed and board, in short:
Pleased such subtle strokes of cruelty,
Such slow sure siege laid to her body and soul.
As, proved, — and proofs seemed coming thick
And fast.
Would gain both freedom and the dowry back Even should the first suit leave them in his grip:
So urged the Comparini for the wife.
Guido had gained not one of the good things
He grasped at by his creditable plan
Of the flight and following and the rest: the suit
That smouldered late was fanned to fury new,
This adjunct came to help with fiercer fire,
While he had got himself a quite new plague —
Found the world's face an universal grin
At this last best of the Hundred Merry Tales
Of how a young and spritely clerk devised
To carry off a spouse that moped too much,
And cured her of the vapors in a trice:
And how the husband, playing Vulcan's part,
Told by the Sun, started in hot pursuit
To catch the lovers, and came halting up,
Cast his net, and then called the Gods to see
The convicts in their rosy impudence — Whereat said Mercury, "Would that I were Mars!"
Oh it was rare, and naughty all the same!
Brief, the wife's courage and cunning, — the priest's show
THE RING AND THE BOOK

Of chivalry and adroitness,—last not least,
The husband—how he ne'er showed teeth at all,
Whose bark had promised biting; but just sneaked
Back to his kennel, tail 'twixt legs, as 'twere,—

All this was hard to gulp down and digest.
So pays the devil his liegeman, brass for gold.
But this was at Arezzo: here in Rome,
Brave Paolo bore up against it all—
Battled it out, nor wanting to himself
Nor Guido nor the House whose weight he bore
Pillar-like, by no force of arm but brain.
He knew his Rome, what wheels to set to work;
Plied influential folk, pressed to the ear
Of the efficacious purple, pushed his way
To the old Pope's self,—past decency indeed,— Praying him take the matter in his hands
Out of the regular court's incompetence.
But times are changed and nephews out of date
And favoritism unfashionable: the Pope
Said, "Render Caesar what is Caesar's due!"
As for the Comparini's counter-plea,
He met that by a counter-plea again,
Made Guido claim divorce—with help so far
By the trial's issue: for, why punishment
However slight unless for guiltiness
However slender? — and a molehill serves
Much as a mountain of offence this way:
So was he gathering strength on every side
And growing more and more to menace — when
All of a terrible moment came the blow
That beat down Paolo's fence, ended the play
O' the foil and brought Mannais on the stage.

Five months had passed now since Pompilia's flight,
Months spent in peace among the Convent nunns:
This,—being, as it seemed, for Guido's sake
Soely, what pride might call imprisonment
And quite as something gained, to friends at home,—
This naturally was at Guido's charge:
Grudge it he might, but penitential fare,
Prayers, preachings, whom but he defrayed the cost?
So, Paolo dropped, as proxy, doth by doth
Like heart's blood, till —what's here? What notice comes?
The convent's self makes application bland
That, since Pompilia's health is fast o' the wane,
She may have leave to go combine her cure
Of soul with cure of body, mend her mind
Together with her thin arms and sunk eyes
That want fresh air outside the convent-wall,
Stay in a friendly house,—and which so fit
As a certain villa in the Pauline way,
That happens to hold Pietro and his wife.
The natural guardians? "Oh, and shift the care
You shift the cost, too: Pietro pays in turn,
And lighten Guido of a load! And then
Villa or convent, two names for one thing,
Always the sojourn means imprisonment,

Domus pro carceris—nowise we relax.
Nothing abate: how answers Paolo?"—
You, What would you answer? All so smooth and fair,
Even Paul's astuteness sniffed no harm i' the world
He authorized the transfer, saw it made
And, two months after, reap'd the fruit of the same.
Having to sit down, rack his brain and find
What phrase should serve him best to notify
Our Guido that by happy providence
A son and heir, a babe was born to him
I think, I, —go tell sympathizing friends!—
Yes, such had been Pompilia's privilege:
She, when she fled, was one month gone with child,
Known to herself or unknown, either way
Avaling to explain (say men of art)
The strange and passionate precipitance
Of maiden startled into motherhood
Which changes body and soul by nature's law.
So when the she-dove breeds, strange yearnings come
For the unknown shelter by undreamed-of shores.
And there is born a blood-pulse in her heart
To fight if needs be, though with flap of wing.
For the wool-flock or the fur-tuft, though a hawk
Contest the prize,—wherefore, she knows not yet
Anyhow, thus to Guido came the news:
"I shall have quitted Rome ere you arrive
To take the one step left,"—wrote Paolo.
This did the winch o' the winepress of all hate.
Vanity, disappointment, grudge and greed,
Take the last turn that screws out pure revenge
With a bright bubble at the brim beside—
By his hearth's birth he was assessed at once
O' the main prize, all the money in dispute:
Pompilia's dowry might revert to her
Or stay with him as law's caprice should point,—
But now—now—what was Pietro's shall be hers,
What was hers shall remain her own,—if hers.
Why then,—oh, not her husband's, but—her heir's!
That heir being his too, all grew his at last
By this road or by that road, since they join.
Before, why, push he Pietro out o' the world,—
The current of the money stopped, you see,
Pompilia being proved no Pietro's child:
Or let it be Pompilia's life he quenched.
Again the current of the money stopped,—
Guido debared his rights as husband soon,
So the new process threatened;—now, the chance,
Now, the resplendent minute! Clear the earth,
Cleane the house, let the three but disappear.
A child remains, depository of all,
That Guido may enjoy his own again,
Reap all losses by a master-stroke,
Wipe out the past, all done all left undone.
Swell the good present to all evermore,
Die into new life, which let blood baptize!
THE OTHER HALF-ROME

So, 't the blue of a sudden sulphur-blaze,
Both why there was one step to take at Rome,
And why he should not meet with Paolo there,
He saw—the ins and outs to the heart of hell—
And took the straight line thither swift and sure.
He rushed to Vittiano, found four sons o' the soil,
Brutes of his breeding, with one spark i' the clod.

That served for a soul, the looking up to him
Or ought called Francescochini as life, death,
Heaven, hell,—lord paramount, assembled these,
Harangued, equipped, instructed, pressed each clod.
With his will's imprint; then took horse, pled spurs,
And so arrived, all five of them, at Rome
On Christmas-Eve, and forthwith found themselves
Installed i' the vacancy and solitude
Left them by Paolo, the considerate man
Who, good as his word, had disappeared at once
As if to leave the stage free. A whole week
Did Guido spend in study of his part
Then played it fearless of a failure. One,
Struck the year's clock whereof the hours are days,
And off was rung o' the little wheels the chime
"Good will on earth and peace to man:" but, two Proceeded the same bell, and, evening come,
The dreadful five felt finger-wise their way
Across the town by blind outs and black turns
To the little lone suburban villa; knocked—
"Who may be outside?" called a well-known voice.

A friend of Caponsacchi's bringing friends
A letter.

That's a test, the excusers say:
Ay, and a test conclusive, I return.

What? Had that name brought touch of guilt or taint?
Of fear with it, sought to dash the present joy
With memory of the sorrow just at end,—
She, happy in her parents' arms at length,
With the new blessing of the two-weeks' babe,—
How had that name's announcement moved the wife?
Or, as the other slanderers circulate,
Were Caponsacchi no rare visitant
On nights and days whither safe harbor lured,
What haft had been i' the name to ope the door?
The promise of a letter? Stealthy guests
Have secret watchwords, private entrances:
The man's own self might have been found inside
And all the scheme made frustrate by a word.
No; but since Guido knew, none knew so well,
The man had never since returned to Rome
Nor seen the wife's face more than villa's front,
So, could not be at hand to warn or save,—
For that, he took this sure way to the end.

"Come in," bade poor Violante cheerfully,
Drawing the door-bolt: that death was the first,
Stabbed through and through. Pietro, close on her heels,
Set up a cry—"Let me confess myself!
Grant but confession!" Cold steel was the grant.

Then came Pomplia's turn.
Then they escaped.
The noise o' the laughter roused the neighborhood.
They had forgotten just the one thing more
Which saves i' the circumstance, the ticket, to wit,
Which puts post-horses at a traveller's use:
So, all on foot, desperate through the dark
Rested they like drunkards along open road,
Accomplished a prodigious twenty miles
Homeward, and gained Baccano very near,
Stumbled at last, deaf, dumb, blind through the feast,
Into a grange and, one dead heap, slept there
Till the pursuers hard upon their trace
Reached them and took them, red from head to heal,
And brought them to the prison where they lie.
The couple were laid i' the church two days ago,
And the wife lives yet by miracle.

All is told.
You hardly need ask what Count Guido says,
Since something he must say. "I own the deed—"
(He cannot choose, — but —) "I declare the same
Just and inevitable,—since no way else
Was left me, but by this of taking life,
To save my honor which is more than life,
I exercised a husband's rights." To which
The answer is as prompt—"There was no fault
In any one o' the three to punish thus:
Neither i' the wife, who kept all faith to you,
Nor in the parents, whom yourself first duped,
Robbed and maltreated, then turned out of doors.
You wronged and they endured wrong; yours the fault.
Next, had endurance overpassed the mark
And turned resentment needing remedy,—
Nay, put the absurd impossible case, for once—
You were all blameless of the blame alleged
And they blameworthy where you fix all blame,
Still, why this violation of the law?
Yourself elected law should take its course,
Avenge wrong, or show vengeance not your right;
Why, only when the balance in law's hand
Trembles against you and inclines the way
O' the other party, do you make protest,
Renounce arbitration, flying out of court,
And crying 'Honor's hurt, the sword must cure?'
Aha, and so i' the middle of each suit
Trying i' the courts,—and you had three in play
With an appeal to the Pope's self beside,—
What, you may chop and change and right your wrongs.
Leaving the law to lag as she thinks fit?"
THE RING AND THE BOOK

That were too temptingly commodious, Count! One would have still a remedy in reserve. Should reach the safest oldest sinner, you see! One’s honor forsooth? Does that take hurt alone From the extreme outrage? I who have no wife, Being yet sensitive in my degree As Gido,—must discover hurt elsewhere Which, half compounded for in days gone by, May profitably break out now afresh. Need cure from my own expeditious hands. The lie that was, as it were, imputed me When you objected to my contract’s clause,— The theft as good as, one may say, alleged, When you, co-heir in a will, excepted, Sir, To my administration of affects, — Aha, do you think law disposed of these? My honor’s touched and shall deal death around! Count, that were too commodious, I repeat! If any law be imperative on us all, Of all are you the enemy: out with you From the common light and air and life of man!

TERTIUM QUID

True, Excellency — as his Highness says, Though she’s not dead yet, she’s as good as stretched Symmetrical beside the other two; Though he’s not judged yet, he’s the same as judged
So do the facts abound and superabound: And nothing binders that we lift the case Out of the shade into the shine, allow Qualified persons to pronounce at last, Nay, edge in an authoritative word Between this rabble’s-brabble of dolts and fools Who make up reasonless unreasoning Rome. "Now for the Trial!" they roar: "the Trial to test The truth, weigh husband and weigh wife alike I’ the scales of law, make one scale kick the beam!"
Law’s a machine from which, to please the mob,
Truth the divinity must needs descend And clear things at the play’s fifth act — aha! Hammer into their nodules who was who And what was what. I tell the simpletons, "Could law be competent to such a feat 'T were done already: what begins next week Is end o' the Trial, last link of a chain Whereof the first was forged three years ago When law addressed herself to set wrong right, And proved so slow in taking the first step That ever some new grievance, — tort, retort, On one or the other side, — o’ertook i’ the same,
Retarded sentence, till this deed of death Is thrown in, as it were, last bale to boat Crammed to the edge with cargo — or passengers?'

Hic appelle! — passengers, the word must be.
Long since, the boat was loaded to my eyes. To hear the rabble and brabble, you’d call the case
Fused and confused past human finding out. One calls the square round, t’other the round square —
And perversely in that first surprise
O’ the blood that fell and splashed the diagram:
But now we’ve used our eyes to the violet hue
Can’t you look through the crimson and trace lines?
It makes a man despair of history,
Eusebius and the established fact — fig’s end:
Oh, give the fools their Trial, rattle away
With the lash of lawyers, two on either side— One banks, one bites, — Masters Arcangeli And Spretti, — that’s the husband’s ultimate hope
Against the Fisc and the other kind of Fisc: Bound to do bargaining for the wife: bow — wow:
Why, Excellency, we and his Highness here Would settle the matter as sufficiently As ever will Advocate This and Fiscal That
And Judge the Other, with even — a word and a wink —
We well know who for ultimate arbiter. Let us beware o’ the basset-table — lost We jog the elbow of Her Eminence, Jostle his cards, — he’ll rap you out a... at!
By the window-seat! And here’s the Marquis too!
Indulge me but a moment: if I fail
— Forward with such an audience, understand! —
To set things right, why, call me with the mob
As understander of the mind of man!
The mob, — now, that’s just how the row comes!
Bethink you that you have to deal with plebs,
The commonality; this is an episode
In burgess-life, — why seek to aggrandize, Idealize, dematerialize the class?
People talk just as if they had to do
With a noble pair that... Excellency, your ear!
Stoop to me, Highness, — listen and look yourselves!

This Pietro, this Violante, live their life
At Rome in the easy way that’s far from worst
Even for their betters, — themselves love themselves,
Spend their own oil in feeding their own lamp
That their own faces may grow bright thereby.
They get to fifty and over: how’s the lamp?
Fall to the depth o’ the wick, — moneys so much:
And also with a remnant, — so much more
Of moneys, — which there’s no consuming now.
But, when the wick shall moulder out some day,
Failing fresh twist of tow to use up drops,
Will lie a prize for the passer-by, — to wit,
Any one that can prove himself the heir,
Seizing, the couple are wanting in a child:
Meantime their wick swims in the safe broad bowl
O' the middle rank,—not raised a beacon's height
For wind to ravage, nor dropped till lamp graze ground
Like a restant, mudlarks poke now here now there,
Going their rounds to probe the ruts i' the road
Or fish the luck o' the puddle. Pietro's soul
Was satisfied when crony smirked, "No wine
Like Pietro's, and he drinks it every day!"
His wife's heart swelled her bosom, joyed its fill
When neighbors turned heads wistfully at church,
Sighed at the load of lace that came to pray.
Well, having got through fifty years of flaire,
They burn out so, indulge so their dear selves,
That Pietro finds himself in debt at last,
As he were any lordling of us all:
And, now that dark begins to creep on day,
Creditors grow uneasy, talk aside.
Take counsel, then importune all at once.
For if the good fat rosy careless man,
Who has not laid a ducat by, decease—
Let the lamp fall, no heir at hand to catch—
Why, being childless, there's a splith i' the street
O' the remnant, there's a scramble for the drags
By the stranger: so, they grant him no long day,
But come in a body, clamor to be paid.
What's his resource? He asks and straight obtains
The customary largess, dole dealt out
To, what we call our 'poor dear shamefaced ones,"
In secret once a month to spare the shame
O' the slothful and the spendthrift,—paupersaints.
The Pope puts meat i' the mouth of, ravens they,
And providence he—just what the mob admires!
That is, instead of putting a prompt foot
On selfish worthless human slugs whose alime
Has failed to lubricate their path in life,
Why, the Pope picks the first ripe fruit that falls
And gracious puts it in the vermin's way.
Pietro could never save a dollar? Straight
He must be subsidized at our expense:
And for his wife,—the harmless household sheep
One ought not to see harassed in her age—
Judge, by the way she bore adversity,
O' the patient nature you ask pity for!
How long, now, would the roughest marketman,
Handling the creatures bullpen'd to the knife,
Heres a mostor ere she made a month
Or menacing biting? Yet the poor sheep here,
Violante, the old innocent bourgeois-wife,
In her first difficulty showed great teeth
Fit to crunch up and swallow a good round crime.
She meditates the tenure of the Trust,
Fidei comissum is the lawyer-phrase,
These funds that only want an heir to take—
Goes o'er the gamut o' the creditor's cry
By semitones from whine to snarl high up
And growl down low, one scale in sardy keys—
Pauses with a little compassion for the face
Of Pietro frustrate of its ancient cheer,—
Never a bottle now for friend at need,—
Comes to a stop on her own fruttered lace
And neighborly condolences thereat,
Then makes her mind up, sees the thing to do:
And so, deliberate, snaps house-book clasp,
Posts off to vespers, missal beneath arm,
Passes the proper San Lorenzo by,
Dives down a little lane to the left, is lost
In a labyrinth of dwellings best unnam'd,
Selects a certain blind one, black at base,
Blinking at top,—the sign of we know what,—
One candle in a casement set to wink
Streetward, do pictes to go shrines inside,—
Mounts that iser by the filthy flight of stairs,
Holding the cord by the wall, to the tip-top,
Gropes for the door i' the dark, ajar of course,
Raps, opens, enters in: up starts a thing
Naked as needs be—"What, you rogue, 't is you?"
Back,—how can I have taken a farthing yet?—
Mercy on me, poor sinner that I am!
Here's . . . why, I took you for Madonna's self
With all that sudden swirl of silk i' the place!
What may your pleasure be, my bonny dame?"
Your Excellency supplies ought left obscure?
One of those women that abound in Rome,
Whose needs oblige them eke out one poor trade
By another vile one: her estimable work
Was washing clothes, out in the open air
At the cistern by Citerio; her true trade—
Whispering to idlers, when they stopped and praised
The ankles she let liberally shine
In kneeling at the slab by the fountain-side,
That there was plenty more to criticise
At home, that eve, i' the house where candle blinked
Decorously above, and all was done
I' the holy fear of God and cheap beside.
Violante, now, had seen this woman wash,
Noticed and envied her propitious shape,
Tracked her home to her house-top, noted too,
And now was come to tempt her and propose
A bargain far more shameful than the first
Which trafficked her virginity away
For a melon and three palms at twelve years old.
Five minutes' talk with this poor child of Eve,
Struck was the bargain, business at an end—
"Then, six months hence, that person whom you trust,
Comes, fetches whatsoever babe it be;
I keep the price and secret, you the babe,
Paying beside for mass to make all straight:
Meantime, I pouch the earnest-money-piece."
THE RING AND THE BOOK

Down-stairs again goes fumbling by the rope
Violante, triumphing in a flourish of fire
From her own brain, self-betrayed by such success, —
Gains church in time for the Magnificat,
And gives forth "My reproof is taken away,
And blessed shall mankind proclaim me now,"
So that the officiating priest turns round
To see who proffers the obstreperous praise
Then home to Pietro, the enraptured-much
But puzzled—more when told the wondrous news —

How crimes and works of charity,
(Besides that pair of pinners and a coif, Birthday surprise last Wednesday was five weeks)
Had borne fruit in the autumn of his life, —
They, or the Orvieto in a double dose.

Anyhow, she must keep house next six months,
Lie on the settle, avoid the three-legged stool,
And, chiefly, not be crossed in wish or whim,
And the result was like to be an heir.

Accordingly, when time was come about,
He found himself the sire indeed of this
Francesca Vittoria Pomplilia and the rest
O’ the names whereby she sealed her nascent day.

A crime complete in its way is here, I hope?
Lies to God, lies to man, every way lies
To nature and civility and the mode:
Flat robbery of the proper heirs thus foiled
O’ the due succession, — and, what followed thence -

Robbery of God, through the confessor’s ear
Debasing the most noteworthy incident
When all else done and undone twelvemonth through
Was put in evidence at Easter-time.
All other pecadillos! — but this one
To the priest who comes next day to dine with ‘T were inexpedient; decency forbade.

Is so far clear? You know Violante now,
Compute her capability of crime
By this authentic instance? Black hard cold
Crime like a stone you kick up with your foot
I’ the middle of a field?

I thought as much.
But now, a question, — how long does it lie,
The bad and barren bit of stuff you kick,
Before encroached on and encompassed round
With minute moss, weed, wild-flowers — made alive
By worm, and fly, and foot of the free bird?
Your Highness, — healthy minds let bygones be.

Leave old crimes to grow young and virtuous-like
I’ the sun and air; so time treats ugly deeds:
They take the natural blessing of all change.
There was the joy o’ the husband silly-soothed,
The softening of the wife’s old winking heart,
Virtues to right and left, profusely paid
If so they might compensate the saved sin.
And then the sudden existence, dewy-dear.
O’ the rose above the dungheap, the pure child

As good as new created, since withdrawn
From the horror of the pre-appointed lot
With the unknown father and the mother known
Too well,— some fourteen years of squall youth.
And the hoardings, disease, the grave —
Hall in life here, hereafter life in hall:
Look at that horror and this soft repose!
Why, moralist, the sin has saved a soul!
Then, even the palpable grievance to the ‘Faith, this was no frank setting hand to theft

And robbing a man, but . .. Excellency, by your leave,

How did you get that marvel of a gem
The sapphire with the Graces grand and Greek?
The story is, stooping to pick a stone
From the pathway through a vineyard — man’s —
To pelt a Sparrow with, you chanced on this:
Why now, do those five clowns o’ the family
O’ the vine-dresser digest their porridge wise
That not one keeps it in his gostakin’ pouch
To do flint’s service with the tinder-box?
Don’t cheat me, don’t cheat you, don’t cheat a friend!

But are you so hard on who jests just
A stranger with no natural sort of claim
To the havings and the holdings (here’s the point)
Unless by misadventure, and defect
Of that which ought to be — nay, which there’s none
Would dare so much as wish to profit by — Since who dares put in just so many words
"May Pietro fail to have a child, please God!
So shall his house and goods belong to me,
The sooner that his heart will pine betimes."
Well then, God does not please, nor heart shall be

Because he has a child at last, you see,
Or selfsame thing as though a child it were.
He thinks, whose sole concern it is to think:
If he accepts it why should you demur?

Moreover, say that certain sin there seems
The proper process of unseeing sin
Is to begin well-doing somehow else.
Pietro, — remember, with no sin at all
I’ the substitution, — why, this gift of God
Plunging in his lap from over Paradise
Steadied him in a moment, set him straight
On the good path he had been straying from.
Henceforward no more wilfulness and waste,
Cuppings, carousings, — these a sponge wiped out.

All sort of self-denial was easy now
For the child’s sake, the chaste to be,
Who must want much and might want who knows what?

And so, the debts were paid, habits reformed,
Expense curtailed, the dowry set to grow.
As for the wife, — I said, hers the whole sin:
So, hers the exemplary penance. ‘T was a text
Whereon folk preached and praised, the district through:

"Oh, make us happy and you make us good!"
TERTIUM QUID

It all comes of God giving her a child;
Such graces follow God's best earthly gift!"

Here you put by my guard, pass to my heart
By the home-thrust — "There's a lie at base of all!"

Why, then, most Prince, is it a pear or no,
You gaze upon the Princess's neck?
That great round glory of pellucid stuff,
A fish secreted round a grain of grit!
Do you call it worthless for the worthless core?
(Shes does n't, who well knows what she changed for it.)

So, to our brace of burgesses again!
You see so far i' the story, who was right,
Who wrong, who neither, don't you? 'What,
you don't?

Eh? Well, admit there's somewhat dark i'

Let 's on — the rest shall clear, I promise you.
Leap over a dozen years: you find, these passed,
An old good easy creditable sire,
A careful housewife's beaming bustling face.
'Both wrapped up in the love of their one child,
The strange tall pale beautiful creature grown.
Lily-like out o' the cleft i' the sun-bright rock
To bow its white miraculous birth of buds
I the way of wandering Joseph and his spouse;
So painted fancy: here it was a fact.
And this their lily, — could they but transplant
And set in vase to stand by Solomon's porch.
'Twixt lion and lion! — this Pompilia of theirs,
Could they see worthily married, well bestowed,
In house and home! And why despair of this
With Rome to choose from, save the topmost rank?

Themselves would help the choice with heart
and soul,
Throw their late savings in a common heap.
To go with the dowry, and be followed in time
By the hearse.

And when such paragon was found and fixed,
Why, they might chant their "Nunc

Indeed the prize was simply full to a fault,
Exorbitant for the suitor they should seek,
And social class should choose among, these

Yet there's a latitude: exceptional white
Amid the general brown o' the species, lurks
A burgess nearly an aristocrat,
Legitimately in reach: look out for him!
What banker, merchant, has seen better days,
What second rate painter a-pushing up,
Poet a-slippping down, shall bide the best
For this young beauty with the thumping purse?
Alack, were it but one of such as these
So like the real thing that they pass for it,
All had gone well! Unluckily, poor souls,
It proved to be the impossible thing itself;
Truth and not sham: hence ruin to them all.

For, Guido Franceschini was the head
Of an old family in Arezzo, old
To that degree they could afford to be poor
Better than most: the case is common too.

Out of the vast door 'scutcheoned overhead,
Creeps out a serving-man on Saturdays
To cater for the week, — turns up anon
I the market, shafferine for the lamb's least leg,
Or the quarter-fowl, less entrails, claws and comb:
Then back again with prize, — a liver begged
Into the bargain, gizzard overlooked.
He's mincing these to give the beans a taste,
When, at your knock, he leaves the simmering soup.
Waits on the curious stranger-visitant.
Napkin in half-wiped hand, to show the rooms.
Point pictures out have hung their hundred years.
"Priceless," he tells you, — puts in his place at once
The man of money: yes, you 're banker-king
Or merchant-kaiser, wallow in your wealth
While patron, the house-master, can't afford
To stop our ceiling-hole that rain so rots:
But he's the man of mark, and there's his shield.
And yonder's the famed Rafael, first in kind.
The painter painted for his grandfather,
And you have paid to see: "Good morning, Sir!"

Such is the law of compensation. Still
The poverty was getting high again:
There gaped so many noble mouths to feed,
Beans must suffice unflavored of the fowl.
The mother, — hers would be a spin-out life
I the nature of things; the sisters had done
well
And married men of reasonable rank:
But that sort of illumination stops,
Throws back no heat upon the parent-hearth.
The family instinct felt out for its fire
To the Church, — the Church traditionally helps
A second son: and such was Paolo,
Reestablished here at Rome these thirty years,
Who played the regular game, — priest and Abate,
Made friends, owned house and land, became of use
To a personage: his course lay clear enough.
The youngest caught the sympathetic flame.
And, though unshedded wings kept him still i' the cage,
Yet he shot up to be a Canon, so
Clung to the higher perch and crowed in hope.
Even our Guido, eldest brother, went
As far i' the way o' the Church as safety seemed,
He being Head o' the House, ordained to write, —
So, could but daily with an Order or two
And testify good-will i' the cause: he clipt
His top-hair and thus far affected Christ.
But main promotion must fall otherwise.
Though still from the side o' the Church: and here was he
At Rome, since first youth, worn threadbare of soul
By forty-six years' rubbing on hard life, Getting fast tired o' the game whose word is —
"Wait!"
When one day, — he too having his Cardinal
To serve in some ambiguous sort, as serve
To draw the coach the plumes o’ the horses’ heads, —
The Cardinal saw fit to dispense with him,
Ride with one plume the less; and off it dropped.

Guido thus left, — with a youth spent in vain
And not a penny in purse to show for it, —
Advised with Paolo, bent no doubt in chace
The black brows somewhat formidably, growled
"Where is the good I came to get at Rome?
Where the repayment of the servitude
To a puppin o’ the papal, whose feet I kiss,
Knowing his father wiped the shoes of mine?"

"Patience," puts Paolo the recalcitrant —
"You have not had, so far, the proper luck,
Nor do my gains suffice to keep us both:
A modest competency is mine, no more.
You are the Count however, yours the style,
Heirdom and state, — you can’t expect all good.
Had I, now, held your hand of cards... well, —

What’s yet unplayed, I’ll look at, by your leave,
Over your shoulder, — I who made my game,
Let’s see, if I can’t help to handle yours.
Fie on you, all the Honors in your list,
Countship, House-ship, — how have you which you left!
Why, in the first place, these will marry a man!
Notum tesoribus? To the Torsor then!
Come, clear your looks, and choose your freshest suit,
And, after function’s done with, down we go
To the jeweller-dealer in pernese, a wench
And some others settled in the shop
At Place Colonna: she’s an oracle. Hmm!
Dear, ’tis my brother: brother, ’tis my dear.
Dear, give us counsel! Whom do you suggest
As properest party in the quarter round.
For the Count here? — he is minded to take wife,
And further tells me he intends to slip
Twenty zucchinis under the bottom-scalp
Of his old wig when he sends it to revive
For the wedding: and I add a trifle too.
You know what personage I’m potent with,
And so plunged out Pompilia’s name the first.
She told them of the household and its ways,
The easy husband and the shrewder wife
In Via Vittoria, — how the tall young girl,
With hair black as you patch and eyes as big
As you promander to make freckles fly,
Would have so much for certain, and so much more
In likelihood, — why, it suited, alipt as smooth
As the Pope’s pantoufle does on the Pope’s foot:
"I’ll to the husband!" Guido ups and cries.
"Ay, so you’d play your last-court-card, no doubt!"

Puts Paolo in with a groan — "Only, you see,
’Tis I, this time, that supervise your lead.
Priests play with women, maids, wives, mothers
— why?
These play with men and take them off our hands.
Did I come, counsel with some out-beard gruff
Or rather this sleek young-old barberess?
Go, brother, stand you rapt in the anti-room
Of Her Efficacy my Cardinal
For an hour, — he likes to have lord-suits lounge,
While I betake myself to the gray mare,
The better horse, — how wise the people’s word —
And wait on Madam Violante."

Said and done.
He was at Via Vittoria in three skips;
Proposed at once to fill up the one want
O’ the burgess-family which, wealthy enough,
And comfortable to heart’s desire, yet crosseted
Outside a gate to heaven, — locked, bolted, barred,
Whereas Count Guido had a key he kept
Under his pillow, but Pompilia’s hand
Might slide behind his neck and pilfer theses.
The key was fairy; its mere mention made
Violante feel the thing shoot one sharp ray
That reached the womanly heart: so — "I see it at last!
You’re be Pomplia, here and ours that key
To all the glories of the greater life!
There’s Pietro to convince: leave that to me!"

Then was the matter broached to Pietro; then
Did Pietro make demand and get responses
That in the Countship was a truth, but in
The counting up of the Count’s cash, a lie.
He thereupon stroked grave his chin, looked great,
Declined the honor. Then the wife wiped test,
Winked with the other eye turned Paulo-ward,
Whispered Pompilia, stole to church at eve,
Found Guido there and got the marriage done,
And finally begged pardon at the feet
Of her dear lord and master. Whereupon Quoth Pietro — "Let us make the best of this up!
I knew your love would license us," quoth she:
Quoth Paolo once more, "Mothers, wives and maids,
These be the tools wherewith priests manage men."

Now, here take breath and ask, — which bird
o’ the brace
Decoyed the other into clappnet? Who Was foole, who knave? Neither and both, per chance.
There was a bargain mentally proposed
On each side, straight and plain and fair enough;
Mind knew its own mind: but when mind must speak.
The bargain have expression in plain terms,
There came the blunder incident to words,
And in the clumsy process, fair turned foul.
The straight backboned-thought of the crooked speech
Were just — "I Guido truck my name and reak
For so much money and youth and female charms.
We Pietro and Violante give our child
TERTIUM QUID

And wealth to you for a rise i’ the world thereby,
Such naked truth while chambered in the brain
Shocks nowise: walk it forth by way of song:
Out on the cynical unseemliness!
Hence was the need, on either side, of a lie
To serve as decent wrappage: so, Guido gives
Money for money, — and they, bride for groom,
Having, he, not a doit, they, not a child
Honestly theirs, but this poor wail and stray.
According to the words, each cheated each;
But in the inexpressive barter of thoughts,
Each did give and did take the thing designed,
The rank on this side and the cash on that —
Attained the object of the traffic, so.
The way of the world, the daily bargain struck
In the first market! Why sells Jack his ware?
"For the sake of serving an old customer."
Why does Jill buy it? "Simply not to break
A custom, pass the old stall the first time."
Why, you know where the gist of the exchange:
Each sees a profit, throws the fine words in.
Don’t be too hard o’ the pair! Had each prentice
Been simultaneously discovered, strait
Dress off the body o’ the transaction, just
As when a cook (will Excellence forgive?)
Strips away those long rough superfluous legs
From either side the crayfish, leaving folk
A meal all meat henceforth, no garnishery,
(With your respect, Prince!) — balance had
No party blamed the other, — so, starting fair,
All subsequent fence of wrong returned by wrong
I’ the matrimonial thrust and parry, at least
Had followed on equal terms. But, as it changed
One party had the advantage, saw the cheat
Of the other first and kept its own concealed:
And the luck o’ the first discovery fell, beside,
To the least adroit and self-possessed o’ the pair.
"I was foolish, Pietro and his wife saw first
The nobleman was penniless, and screamed
"We are cheated!"

Such unprofitable noise
Angers at all times: but when those who plague;
Do it from inside your own house and home,
Guests which yourself have closed the curtain round.
Noise goes too near the brain and makes you mad.
The guest say, Guido used the candle-flame
Unfairly, — worsened that first bad of his,
By practising all kinds of cruelty
To outst them and suppress the wail and whine,—
That speedily he so scared and bullied them,
Fain were they, long before five months had passed,
To beg him on, from what was once their wealth,
Just so much as would help them back to Rome,
Where, when they finished paying the last doit
O’ the dowry, they might beg from door to door.
So say the Comparini — as if it came
Of pure resentment for this worse than bad,
That then Violante, feeling conscience pricked,
Confessed her substitution of the child
Whence all the harm fell, — and that Pietro
first
Bethought him of advantage to himself
I’ the deed, as part revenge, part remedy
For all miscalculation in the pact.

On the other hand, "Not so!" Guido retorts —
"I am the wronged, solely, from first to last,
Who gave the dignity I engaged to give,
Which was, is, cannot but continue gain.
My being poor was a by-circumstance,
Miscalculated piece of untowardness,
Might end to-morrow did heaven’s windows open
Or uncle die and leave me his estate.
You should have put up with the minor flaw,
Getting the main prize of the jewel. If wealth,
Not rank, had been prime object in your thoughts,
Why not have taken the butcher’s son, the boy
O’ the baker or candlestick-maker? In all the rest,
It was yourselves broke compact and played false,
And made a life in common impossible.
Show me the stipulation of our bond
That you should make your profit of being in-side
My house, to hustle and edge me out o’ the same,
First make a laughing-stock of mine and me,
Then round us in the ears from morn to night
(Because we show wry faces at your mirth)
That you are robbed, starved, beaten and what not!
You fled a bell of your own lighting-up,
Pay for your own miscalculation too :
You thought nobility, gained at any price,
Would suit and satisfy, — find the mistake,
And now retaliate, not on yourselves, but me.
And how? By telling me, i’ the face of the world,
I it is have been cheated all this while,
Abinominably and irreparably, — my name
Given to a cur-cast mongrel, a drab’s brat,
A beggar’s by-blow, — thus depriving me
Of what yourselves allege the whole and sole
Aim on my part i’ the marriage, — money, to wit.
This thrust I have to parry by a guard
Which leaves me open to a counter-thrust
On the other side, — no way but there’s a pass Clean through me. If I prove, as I hope to do,
There’s not one truth in this your odious tale
O’ the buying, selling, substituting — prove
Your daughter was and is your daughter, —
well,
And her dowry hers therefore mine, — what then?
Why, where’s the appropriate punishment for this Enormous lie hatched for mere malice’s sake
To ruin me? Is that a wrong or no?
And if I try revenge for remedy,
Can I well make it strong and bitter enough?"
I anticipate however—only ask,
Which of the two here sinned most? A nice point!
Which brownness is least black,—decide who can.
Wager-by-battle-of-cheating! What do you say,
Highness? Suppose, your Excellency, we leave
The question at this stage, proceed to the next,
Both parties step out, fight their prize upon,
In the eye o' the world?

They brandish law 'gainst law;
The grinding of such blades, each parry of each,
Throws terrible sparks off, over and above the thrusts,
And makes more sinister the fight, to the eye,
Than the very wounds that follow. Beside the tale
Which the Compani have to re-assert,
They need only write, print, publish all abroad
The strainnesses of Guido's household life—
The petty nothing we bear privately.
But break down under when fools flock to jeer.
What is it all to the facts o' the couple's case,
How helps it prove Pompilia not their child,
If Guido's mother, brother, kith and kin Fare ill? He lies hard, lack clothes, lack fire, lack food?
That's one more wrong than needs.

On the other hand,
Guido,—whose one is to dispute the truth
O' the tale, reject the shame it throws on him,—
He may retaliate, fight his foe in turn
And welcome, we allow. Ay, but he can't!
He's at home, only acts by proxy here;
Law may meet law,—but all the gibes and jeers.
The superfluity of naughtiness,
Those libels on his House,—how reach at them?
Two hateful faces, grinning all aglow,
Not only make parade of sport they flinged.
But foul him from the height of a tower, you
see.
Unluckily temptation is at hand—
To take revenge on a trifle overlooked,
A pet lamb they have left in reach outside,
Whose first bleat, when he plucks the wool
away,
Will strike the grinner grave: his wife re mains,
Who, four months earlier, some thirteen years
old,
Never a mile away from mother's house
And petted to the height of her desire,
Was told one morning that her fate had come,
She must be married—just as, a month before,
Her mother told her she must comb her hair
And twist her curls into one knot behind.
These fools forgot their pet lamb, fed with flowers,
Then 'tied as usual by the bit of cake,
Out of the bower into the butchery.
Plague her, he plagues them threefold: but how plagued?

The world may have its word to say to that:

You can't do some things with impunity.
What remains... well, it is an ugly thought...
But that he drive herself to plague herself—
Herself disgrace herself and so disgrace
Who seek to disgrace Guido?

There's the clue
To what else seems gratuitously vile,
If, as is said, from this time forth the rack
Was tried upon Pompilia: 't was to wrench
Her limbs into exposure that brings shame.
The aim o' the cruelty being so crueler still.
That cruelty almost grows compassion's self
Could one attribute it to mere return
O' the parents' outrage, wrong avenging wrong.
They see in this a deeper deadlier aim,
Not to vex just a body they held dear,
But blacken too a soul they boasted white,
And show the world their saint in a lover's arms,
No matter how driven thither,—so they say.

On the other hand, so much is easily said,
And Guido lacks not an apologist.
The pair had nobly but themselves to blame.
Being selfish beasts throughout no less, so
much:
—Cared for themselves, their supposed good, nought else,
And brought about the marriage; good proved bad,
As little they cared for her its victim—nay,
Meant she should stay behind and take the
chance,
If haply they might wriggle themselves free.
They baited their own hook to catch a fish
With this poor worm, failed o' the prize, and then
Sought how to unbait tackle, let worm float
Or sink, amuse the monster while they escaped.
Under the best stars Hymen brings above,
Had all been honesty on either side,
A common sincere effort to good end,
Still, this would prove a difficult problem Prince!
—Given, a fair wife, aged thirteen years,
A husband poor, care-bitten, sorrow-sunk,
Little, long-nosed, bush-bearded, lanter jayed.
Forty-six years old,—place the two grown one.
She, cut off sheer from every natural aid,
In a strange town with no familiar face—
He, in his own parade-ground or retreat
If need were, free from challenge, much less check
To an irritated, disappointed will—
How evolve happiness from such a match?
'T were hard to serve up a congenial dish
Out of these ill-agreeing morsels, Duke,
By the best exercise of the cook's craft,
Best intermixture of spice, salt and sweet.
But let two ghastly scullions concoct mess
With brimstone, pitch, vitriol and devil's dung—
Throw in abuse o' the man, his body and soul,
Kith, kin and generation, shake all slab
At Rome, Azzo, for the world to nose,
Then end by publishing, for Bened's arch-prank.
TERTIUM QUID

That, over and above sauce to the meat’s self,
Why, even the meat, bedecked thus in dish,
Was never a pheasant but a carrion-crow—
Prince, what will then the natural loathing
be?
What wonder if this? — the compound plague
of the pair
Pricked Guido, — not to take the course they hoped,
That is, submit him to their statement’s truth,
Accept its obvious promise of relief,
And thrust them out of doors the girl again
Since the girl’s dowry would not enter there,
— Quit of the one if balked of the other: no!
Rather did rage and hate so work in him,
Their product proved the horrible conceit
That he should plot and plan and bring to pass
His wife might, of her own free will and deed,
Relieve him of her presence, get her gone,
And yet leave all the dowry safe behind,
Confirmed his own henceforward past dispute,
While blotting out, as by a belch of hell,
Their triumph in her misery and death.

You see, the man was Areteus, had touch
O’ the subtle air that breeds the subtle wit;
Was noble too, of old blood thrice-refined
That shrinks from clownish coarseness in disgust.
Allow that such an one may take revenge,
You don’t expect he’ll catch up stone and fling,
Or try cross-bottom, or whirr quarter-staff instead
Of the honest drubbing clowns bestow,
When out of temper at the dinner-splint,
On meddling mother - in- law and tiresome fees.
Substitute for the clown a nobleman,
And you have Guido, practising, ’tis said,
Immutably from the very first,
The finer vengeance: this, they say, the fact
O’ the famous letter shows — the writing exceeds
At Guido’s instance by the timid wife
Over the pencilled words himself writ first:
Wherein she, who could neither write nor read,
Was made unblushingly declare a tale
To the brother, the Abate then in Rome,
How her putative parents had impressed
On their departure, their enjoyment; bade
“ ’We being safely arrived here, follow, you!
Poison your husband, rob, set fire to all,
And then by means o’ the gallant you procure
With ease, by helpful eye and ready tongue,
Some brave youth ready to dare, do and die,
You shall run off and merrily reach Rome
Where we may live like flies in honey-pot:” —
Such being exact the programme of the course
Impicted her as carried to effect.

They also say, — to keep her straight therein,
All sort of torture was piled, pain on pain,
On either side Pomphilia’s path of life,
Built round about and over against by fear,
Cumulatively month by month and week
By week, and day by day, and hour by hour,
Close, closer and yet closer still with pain,
No outlet from the encroaching pain save just Where stood one savior like a piece of heaven,

Hell’s arms would strain round but for this blue gap.
She, they say further, first tried every chink,
Every imaginable break i’ the fire,
As way of escape: ran to the Commissary,
Who bade her not malign his friend her spouse;
Fling herself thrice at the Archbishop’s feet,
Where three times the Archbishop let her lie,
Spend her whole sorrow and sob full heart
forth,
And then took up the slight load from the ground
And bore it back for husband to chastise, —
Mildly of course, — but natural right is right.
So went she slipping ever yet catching at help,
Missing the high till come to lowest and last,
To wit, a certain friar of mean degree,
Who heard her story in confession, wept,
Crossed himself, showed the man within the monk.

“Then, will you save me, you the one i’ the world?
I cannot even write my woes, nor put My prayer for help in words a friend may read, —
I no more own a coin than have an hour
Free of observance, — I was watched to church,
Am watched now, shall be watched back presently.

How buy the skill of scribe i’ the marketplace?
Pray you, write down and send whatever I say
O’ the need I have my parents take me hence! ”
The good man rubbed his eyes and could not choose
Let her dictate her letter in such a sense
That parents, to save breaking down a wall, Might lift her over: she went back, heaven in heart.

Then the good man took counsel of his couch,
Woke and thought twice, the second thought the best:

“Here am I, foolish body that I be,
Caught all but pushing, teaching, who but I,
My betters their plain duty, — what, I dare
Help a case the Archbishop would not help,
Mend matters, peradventure, God loves me?
What hath the married life but strife and plagues
For proper dispensation? So a fool
Once touched the ark, — poor Uzah that I am! —
Oh married ones, much rather should I bid,
In patience all of ye possess your souls!
This life is brief and troubles die with it:
Where were the pricks to soothe up homeward else?”

So saying, he burnt the letter he had writ,
Said due for her intention, in its place,
Took snuff and comfort, and had done with
all.
Then the grim arms stretched yet a little more
And each touched each, all but one streak i’
the mid Whereat stood Caponeach, who cried, “This way,
Out by me! Hesitate one moment more
And the fire shuts out me and shuts in you!
Here my hand holds you life out!" Whereupon
She clasped the hand, which closed on hers and drew
Pompilia out o' the circle now complete.
Whose fault or shame but Guido's? — ask her
friends.

But then this is the wife's — Pompilia's tale —
Eve's . . . no, not Eve's, since Eve, to speak their truth,
Was hardly fallen (our candor might pron-nounce)
When simply saying in her own defence
"The serpent tempted me and I did eat."
So much of paradisal nature, Eve's!
Her daughters ever since prefer to urge
"Adam so starved me I was fain accept
The apple any serpent pushed my way."
What an elaborate theory have we here,
Ingeniously nursed up, pretentiously
Brought forth, pushed forward amid trumpet-blast.
To account for the thawing of an icle,
Show us there needed Ætna vomit flame
Ere run the crystal into dewdrops! Else,
How, unless hell broke loose to cause the step,
How could a married lady go astray?
Bless the fools! And 'tis just this way they are blessed,
And the world wags still, — because fools are sure
— Oh, not of my wife nor your daughter! No!
But of their own: the case is altered quite.
Look now, — last week, the lady we all love, —
Daughter o' the couple we all venerate,
Wife of the husband we all cap before,
Mother o' the babes we all breathe blessings
on, —
Was caught in converse with a negro page.
Hell thawed that icle, else "Why was it — Why?" asked and echoed the fools. "Because, you fools, —"
So did the dame's self answer, she who could,
With that fine candor only forthcoming
When 'tis no odds whether withheld or no —
"Because my husband was the saint you say,
And, — with that childish goodness, absurd
faith,
Stupid self-satisfaction, you so praise, —
Saint to you, inapplicable to me.
Had he, — instead of calling me fine names,
Lucretia and Susanna and so forth,
And curtaining Correggio carefully
Lest I be taught that Leda had two legs, —
— But once never so little tweaked my nose
For peeping through my fan at Carnival,
Confessing thereby, 'I have no easy task —
I need use all my powers to hold you mine,
And then, — why 'tis so doubtful if they serve,
That — take this, as an earnest of despair!"
Why, we were quits: I had wiped the harm
away,
Thought, "The man fears me!" and foregone revenge."
We must not want all this elaborate work
To solve the problem why young Fancy-and-flush
Slips from the dull side of a spouse in years,
Betracts it to the breast of Brisk-and-bold Whose love-scrapes furnish talk for all the town!

Accordingly, one word on the other side
Tips over the piled-up fabric of a tale.
Guido says — that is, always, his friends say —
It is unlikely, from the wickedness,
That any man treat any woman so.
The letter in question was her very own,
Unprompted and unaided: she could write —
As able to write as ready to sin, or free,
When there was danger, to deny both facts.
He bids you mark, herself from first to last Attributes all the so-styled torture just
To jealousy — jealousy of whom but just
This very Caponsacchi! How suits here
This with the other alleged motive, Prince?
Would Guido make a terror of the man
He meant should tempt the woman, as they chase?
Do you, right your hare that you may catch your hare?
Consider too, the charge was made and met
At the proper time and place where proofs were plain
Heard hastily and disposed of thoroughly
By the highest powers, possessors of most light,
The Governor for the law and the Archbishop
For the gospel: which acknowledged primacies,
'Tis impudently pleaded, he could warp
Into a tacit partnership with crime —
He better in the while, believe their own account,
Impotent, penniless and miserable!
He further asks — Duke, note the knotty
point! —
How he — concede him skill to play such part
And drive his wife into a gallant's arms —
Could bring the gallant to play his part too
And stand with arms so opportunistically wide?
How bring this Caponsacchi, — with whom,
friends
And foes alike agree, throughout his life
He never interchanged a civil word.
Nor lifted courteous cap to — him, how bend
To such observancy of beck and call, —
To undertake this strange and perilous feat
For the good of Guido, using, as the hare,
Pompilia whom, himself and she avouch,
He had nor spoken with nor seen, indeed,
Beyond sight in a public theatre,
When she wrote letters (she that could not write!)
The importunate shamelessly-protested love
Which brought him, though reluctant, to her feet.
And forced on him the plunge which, howsoever
She might swim up i' the whirl, must bury him
Under eternal black: a priest contrive
No better, no amor to be hushed up,
But open flight and noonday infamy?
Try and concoct defence for such revolt!
Take the wife's tale as true, say she was wronged, —
Pray, in what rubric of the breviary
Do you find it registered — the part of a priest
Is — that to right wrongs from the church he skip.
Go journeying with a woman that’s a wife,
And be purged, o’er taken and captured . . .
how?
In a lay-dress, playing the kind sentinel Where the wife sleeps (says he who best should know)
And sleeping, sleepless, both have spent the night!
Could no one else be found to serve at need —
No woman — or if man, no safer sort
Than this not well-reputed turbulence?
Then, look into his own account o’ the case!
He, being the stranger and astonished one,
Yet received protestations of her love
From lady neither known nor cared about:
Love, so protested, bred in him disgust
After the wonder, or incredulity,
Such impudence seeming impossible.
But, soon assured such impudence might be,
When he had seen with his own eyes at last
Letters thrown down to him i’ the very street
From behind lattice where the lady lurked,
And read their passionate summons to her
side —
Why then, a thousand thoughts swarmed up and in —
How he had seen her once, a moment’s space,
Observed she was both young and beautiful,
Heard everywhere report she suffered much
From a jealous husband thrice her age, — in short,
There flashed the propriety, expediency
Of treating, trying might they come to terms —
— At all events, granting the interview
Prayed for, one so adapted to assist
Decision as to whether he advance,
Stand or retire, in his benevolent mood!
Therefore the interview befall at length;
And at this one and only interview,
He saw the tale and single course to take —
Bade her dispose of him, head, heart and hand,
Did her behest and braved the consequence,
Not for the natural end, the love of man
For woman whether love be virtue or vice,
But, please you, altogether for pity’s sake —
Pity of innocence and helplessness!
And how did he assure himself of both?
Had he been the house-inmate, visitor,
Eye-witness of the described martyrdom,
So, competent to pronounce its remedy
Ere rush on such extreme and desperate course
Involving such enormity of harm,
Moreover, to the husband judged thus, doomed
And damned without a word in his defence?
Not he! the truth was felt by instinct here,
— Reasons which saves a world of trouble and
time.
There’s the priest’s story: what do you say to it.
Trying its truth by your own instinct too,
Surely this to be the expeditious mode?
“And now, do hear my version,” Guido cries:
“I accept argument and inference both.
It would indeed have been miraculous
Had such a confidency sprung to birth
With no more fanning from acquaintance-whisper
Than here avowed by my wife and this priest.
Only, it did not: you must substitute
The old stale unromantic way of fault,
The commonplace adventure, mere intrigue
In prose form with the unpoeitic tricks,
Cheatings and lies: they used the hackney chair
Satan jaunts forth with, shabby and serviceable,
No gilded joker novelty from below,
To bowl you along thiser, swift and sure.
That same officious go-between, the wench
Who gave and took the letters of the two,
Now offers self and service back to me:
Bears testimony to visits night by night
When all was safe, the husband far and away —
To many a timely slipping out at large
By light o’ the morning-star, ere he should wake.
And when the fugitives were found at last,
Why, with them were found also, to belie
What protest they might make of innocence,
All documents yet wanting, if need were,
To establish guilt in them, disgrace in me —
The chronicle o’ the converse from its rise
To culmination in this outrage: read!
Letters from wife to priest, from priest to
wife —
Here they are, read and say where they chime
in
With the other tale, superlative purity
O’ the pair of saints! I stand or fall by these.”
But then on the other side again, — how say
The pair of saints? That not one word is theirs —
No syllable o’ the batch or writ or sent
Or yet received by either of the two.
“Found,” says the priest, “because he needed
them,
Failing all other proofs, to prove our fault:
So, here they are, just as is natural.
Oh yes — we had our misses, each of us!
Not these, but to the full as vile, no doubt:
Here as from me, — she could not read, so burnt —
Mine as from her, — I burnt because I read.
Who forged and found them? Cui profite-rint?
(I take the phrase out of your Highness’ month)
“He who would gain by her fault and my fall,
The trickster, schemer and pretendor — he
Whose whole career was lie entailing lie
Sought to be sealed truth by the worst lie last!”
Guido rejoins — “Did the other end o’ the tale
Match this beginning! ’Tis alleged I prove
A murderer at the end, a man of force
Prompt, indiscriminate, effectual: good!
Then what need all this trifling woman's-work,
Letters and embasures and weak intrigue.
When will and power were mine to end at once
Safely and surely? Murder had come first
Not last with such a man, assure yourselves!
The silent acquiesce, stilling at command—
A drop a day 'tis wine or soup, the dose,—
The shattering beam that breaks above the bed
And beats out brains, with nobody to blame
Except the wormy age which eats even oak,—
Nay, the stanch steel or trusty cord,—who cares
I'm the blind old palace, a pitfall at each step,
With none to see, much more to interpose
O' the two, three, creeping-house-dog-servant-things
Born mine and bred mine? Had I will'd gross death,
I had found wider paths to thrust him prey
Than this that goes meandering here and there
Through half the world and calls down in its course
Notice and noise,—hate, vengeance, should it fail,
Deserion and contempt though it swooned!
Moreover, what o' the future son and heir?
The unborn babe about to be called mine,—
What end in heaping all this shame on him,
Were I indifferent to my own black share?
Would I have tried these crookednesses, say,
Willing and able to effect the straight?"

"Ay, would you!"—one may hear the priest retort,
"Being as you are, i' the stock, a man of guile,
And ruffianism but an added graft.
You, a born coward, try a coward's arms,
Trick and chicané,—and only when these fail
Does violence follow, and like fox you bite
Caught out in stealing. Also, the disgrace
You hardly shrank at, wholly shrivelled her:
You plunged her thin white delicate hand i' the flame
Along with your coarse hornty brutish fist,
Held them a second there, then drew out both —Yours roughed a little, hers ruined through and through.
Your heart would heal forthwith at ointment's touch—
Namely, succession to the inheritance
Which bolder crime had lost you: let things change,
The birth o' the boy warrant the bolder crime,
Why, murder was determined, dared and done,
For me," the priest proceeds with his reply,
"The look o' the thing, the chances of mistake,
All were against me,—that, I knew the first:
But, knowing also what my duty was,
I did it: I must look to men more skilled
In reading hearts than ever was the world."

Highness, decide! Pronounce, Her Excellency! Or... even leave this argument in doubt,
Account of a fit matter, taken up
With all its faces, manifold enough,
To ponder on—what fronts us, the next stage,
Next legal process? Guido, in pursuit,
Coming up with the fugitives at the inn,
Caused both to be arrested then and there
And sent to Rome for judgment on the case—
Thither, with all his armory of proofs,
Betrook himself: 'tis there we 'll meet him now,
Waiting the further issue.
Here you smile:
"And never let him henceforth dare to plead—
Of all pleas and excuses in the world
For any deed hereafter to be done—
His irrepressible wrath at honor's wound!
Passion and madness irrepressible?
Why, Count and cavalier, the husband comes
And catches foe i' the very act of shame!
There's man to man,—nature must have her way,—
We look he should have cleared things on the spot.
Yes, then, indeed—even though it prove he erred—
Though the ambiguous first appearance, not so
Of solid injury, melt soon to mist,
Still,—had he slain the lover and the wife—
Or, since she was a woman and his wife,
Slain him, but strip her naked to the skin,
Or at least left no more of an attire
Than patch sufficient to pin paper to,
Some one love-letter, infamy and all,
As passport to the Paphos fit for such,
Safe-conduct to her natural home the stews,—
Good! One had recognized the power o' the pulse.
But when he stands, the stock-fish,—sticks to law—
Offers the hole in his heart, all fresh and warm.
For scrivener's pen to poke and play about—
Can stand, can stare, can tell his beads perhaps,
Oh, let us hear no syllable o' the rage!
Such rage were a convenient afterthought
For one who would have shown his teeth best Exhibited unbridled rage enough.
Had but the priest been found, as was to hope,
In serge, not silk, with crucifix, not sword:
Whereas the gray innocuous grab, of yore,
Had hatched a hornet, tickle to the touch,
The priest was metamorphosed into knight.
And even the timid wife, whose cue was shriek,
Bury her brow beneath his trampling foot,—
She too sprang at him like a pythoness:
So, gulp down rage, passion must be postponed.
Calm be the word! Well, our word is—we brand
This part o' the business, howsoever the rest befall."
"Nay," interpose as prompt his friends—
"This is the world's way! So you adjudge reward
To the forbearance and legality
Yourself begin by inciting—ay,
Exacting from us all with knife at throat!
This one wrong more you add to wrong's score,
You publish all, with the kind comment here,
'Its victim was too cowardly for revenge.'"
Make it your own case,—you who stand apart!
The husband wakes one morn from heavy sleep,
With a taste of poppy in his mouth, — rube eyes,
Finds his wife flown, his strong-box ransacked
Follows as he best can, overtakes i’ the end,
You bid him use his privilege: well, it seems
He’s scarce cool-blooded enough for the right move —
Does not shoot when the game were sure, but Bewildered at the critical minute, — since
He has the first flash of the fact alone
To judge from, set with, not the steady lights
Of after-knowledge, — yours who stand at ease
To try conclusions: he’s in another and smoke,
You outside, with explosion at an end:
The sulphur may be lightning or a squib —
He’ll know in a minute, but till then, he doubts
Back from what you know to what he knew not!
Hear the priest’s lofty "I am innocent,"
The wife’s as resolute "You are guilty!"
Come!
Are you not staggered? — pause, and you lose
the move!
Naught left you but a low appeal to law,
"Coward!" tied to your tail for compliment!
Another consideration: have it your way!
Admit the worst: his courage failed the Count,
He’s cowardly like the best o’ the burgesses
He’s grown incorporate with, — a very cur,
Kick him from out your circles by all means!
Why, trampled down this reputable stair,
Still, the church-door lies wide to take him in,
And the court-porch also: in he sneaks to each —
"Yes, I have lost my honor and my wife,
And, being moreover an ignoble hound,
I dare not jeopardize my life for them!"
Religion and Law lean forward from their chairs,
"Well done, thou good and faithful servant!"
Aye,
Not only applaud him that he scorned the world,
But punish should be dare do otherwise.
If the case be clear or turbid, — you must say!
Thus, anyhow, it mounted to the stage
In the law-courts, — let’s see clearly from this point! —
Where the priest tells his story true or false,
And the wife her story, and the husband his,
All with result as happy as safe.
The courts would nor condemn nor yet acquit
This, that or the other, in so distinct a sense
As end the strife to either’s absolute loss:
Pronounced, in place of something definite,
"Each of the parties, whether goat or sheep
I’ the main, has wool to show and hair to hide.
Each has brought somehow trouble, is somehow cause.
Of pains enough, — even though no worse were proved.
Here is a husband, cannot rule his wife
Without provoking her to scream and scratch
And scorn the fields, — causelessly, it may be:
Here is that wife, — who makes her sex our plague.
Wedlock, our bugbear, — perhaps with cause enough:
And here is the truant priest o’ the trio, worst
Or best — each quality being conceivable.
Let us impose a little mulct on each.
We punish youth in state of pupillage
Who talk at hours when youth is bound to sleep,
Whether the prattle turn upon Saint Rose
Or Donna Olimpia of the Vatican:
"It is talk, talked wisely or unwisely talked,
I’ the dormitory where to talk at all
Transgresses, and is mulct: as here we mean.
For the wife, — let her betake herself, for rest,
After her run, to a House of Convertites —
Keep there, as good as real imprisonment:
Being sick and tired, she will recover so.
For the priest, spritely strayer out of bounds,
Who made Arezzo hot to hold him, — Rome
Profits by his withdrawal from the scene.
Let him be relegated to Civita.
Circumscribed by its bounds till matters mend:
There he at least lies opt o’ the way of harm
From foes — perhaps from the too friendly fair.
And finally for the husband, whose rash rule
Has but itself to blame for this ado, —
If he be vexed that, in our judgments dealt,
He fails obtain what he accounts his right,
Let him go comforted with the thought, no less,
That, turn each sentence howsoever he may,
There’s satisfaction to extract therefrom.
For, does he wish his wife proved innocent?
Well, she’s not guilty, he may safely urge,
Has missed the stripes dishonest wives endure —
This being a fatherly pat o’ the cheek, no more.
Does he wish her guilty? Were she otherwise
Would she be locked up, set to say her prayers,
Prevented intercourse with the outside world,
And that suspected priest in banishment,
Whose portion is a further help i’ the case?
Oh, ay, you all of you want the other thing,
The extreme of law, some verdict neat, complete. —
Either, the whole o’ the dowry in your poke
With full release from the false wife, to boot,
And heading, hanging for the priest, beside —
Or, contrary, claim freedom for the wife,
Repayment of each penny paid her spouse,
Amends for the past, release for the future!
Such
Is wisdom to the children of this world;
But we’ve no mind, we children of the light,
To miss the advantage of the golden mean,
And push things to the steel point." Thus the courts.
Is it settled so far? Settled or disturbed,
Console yourselves: 't is like . . . an instance, now!
You’ve seen the puppets, of Place Navona, play, —
Punch and his mate, — how threats pass, blows are dealt,
And a crisis comes: the crowd or clap or hiss
Accordingly as disposed for man or wife —
Whom down the actors deck awhile perdure,
Donning what novel rag and feather trim
Best suits the next adventure, new effect:
And,—by the time the mob is on the move,
With something like a judgment pro and con,—
There's a whistle, up again the octary pop
In t'other tatter with fresh-tinselled slaves,
To re-engage in one last worst fight more
Shall show, what you thought tragedy was farce.
Note, that the climax and the crown of things
Invariably is, the devil appears himself,
Armies accoutred, horses and hoofs and tail.
Just so, nor otherwise it proved—you'll see:
Move to the murder, never mind the rest!

Guido, at such a general dack-down,
I' the breathing-space,—of wife to convert here,
Priest to his relegation, and himself
To Arezzo,—had resigned his part performe
To brother Abate, who bustled, did his best,
Retrieved things somewhat, managed the three suits.
Since, it should seem, there were three suits at law
Behoved him look to, still, lest bad grow worse:
First civil suit,—the one the parents brought, Impugning the legitimacy of his wife,
Affirming thence the nullity of her rights:
This was before the Roti,—Molina,
That's judge there, made that notorious decree
Which partly leaned to Guido, as I said,—
But Pietro had appealed against the same
To the xury court will judge what we judge now.

Tommati and his fellows,—Suit the first.
Next civil suit,—demand on the wife's part
Of separation from the husband's bed
On plea of cruelty and risk to life—
Claims restitution of the dowry paid,
Immunity from paying any more:
This second, the Vicegerent has to judge.
Third and last suit,—this time, a criminal one.

Answer to, and protection from, both these,— Guido's complaint of guilt against his wife
In the Tribunal of the Governor,
Venturini, also judge of the present cause.
Three suits of all importance plaguing him Beside a little private enterprise
Of Guido's,—essay at a short cut.
For Paolo, knowing the right way at Rome,
Had, even while superintending these three suits
'I' the regular way, each at its proper court,
Ingeniously made interest with the Pope
To set such tedious regular forms aside,
And, acting the supreme and ultimate judge,
Declare for the husband and against the wife.
Well, at such crisis and extreme of straits,—
The man at bay, buffeted in this wise,—
Happened the strangest accident of all.
"Then," sigh friends, "the last feather broke his back,
Made him forget all possible remedies
Save one—he rushed to, as the sole relief
From horror and the abominable thing:"
"Or rather," laugh foes, "then did there befall

The luckiest of conceivable events,
Most pregnant with impunity for him,
Which henceforth turned the flank of all at

And bade him do his wickedest and worst."—
The wife's withdrawal from the Convertita,
Visit to the villa where her parents lived,
And birth there of his babe. Divergence here!
I simply take the facts, ask what they show.

First comes this thunderclap of a surprise:
Then follow all the signs and silences.
Premonitory of earthquake. Paolo first
Vanished, was swept off somewhere, lost to Rome:
(Wells dry up, while the sky is sunny and blue.)
Then Guido girds himself for enterprise,
Hies to Vittiano, consults with his steward,
Comes to terms with four peasants young and bold.
And stays for Rome the Holy, reaches her
At very holiest, for 'tis Christmas Eve,
And makes straight for the Abate's dried-up font,
The lodge where Paolo ceased to work the pipes.
And the most taken, observation made
And plan completed, all in a grim week.
The five proceed in a body, reach the place,
Pietro's, at the Paolina, silent, lone,
And stupified by the propitious snow.
'T is one i' the evening: knock; a voice,
"Who's there?"
"Friends with a letter from the priest your friend."
At the door, straight smiles old Violante's self.
She falls,—her son-in-law stabs through and through,
Reaches through her at Pietro—"With your son
This is the way to settle suits, good sire!"
"He bellows, "Mercy for heaven, not for earth!"
Leave to confess and save my sinful soul.
Then do your pleasure on the body of me!"
"Nay, father, soul with body must take its chance!"
He presently got his portion and lay still.
And last, Pompilia rushes here and there
Like a dove among the lightnings in her brake.
Falls also: Guido's, this last husband's act.
He lifts her by the long dishevelled hair,
Holds her away at arm's length with one hand.
While the other tries if life come from the mouth.
Looks out his whole heart's hate on the shut eyes.
Draws a deep satisfied breath, "So—dead at last!"
Throws down the burden on dead Pietro's knees.
And ends all with "Let us away, my boys!"
And, as they left by one door, in at the other
Tumbled the neighbors—for the shrieks had pierced
To the mind and the grange, this cottage and that shed.
Soon followed the Public Force; pursuit began
TERTIUM QUID

Though Guido had the start and chose the road:
So, that same night was he, with the other four,
Overtaken near Bacano,—where they sank
By the wayside, in some shelter meant for beasts,
And now lay heaped together, nuzzling swine,
Each wrapped in bloody cloak, each grasping steel
Still His unwiped weapon, sleeping all the same
The sleep 'o' the just,—a journey of twenty miles
Brought just and unjust to a level, you see.
The only one 't the world that suffered aught
By the whole night's toil and trouble, flight and chase,
Was just the officer who took them, Head
O' the Public Forces,—Patriot, zealous soul,
Who, having but duty to sustain weak flesh,
Got heated, caught a fever and so died:
A sign of the over-vigilant,—Virtue in a chaste should change her linen quick,
Last pleasure get start of providence.
(That 's for the Cardinal, and told, I think!)

Well, they bring back the company to Rome.
Says Guido, "By your leave, I fain would ask
How you found out 't was I who did the deed?
What put you on my trace, a foreigner,
Supposed in Arezzo,—and assuredly safe
Except for an oversight: who told you, pray?"
"Why, naturally your wife!" Down Guido drops
O' the horse he rode,—they have to steady
At either side the brute that bore him bound,
So strangely seemed his wife should live and speak!
She had prayed,—at least so people tell you now—
For but one thing to the Virgin for herself,
Not simply, as did Pietro 'mid the stabs,—
Time to confess and get her own soul saved,
But time to make the truth apparent, truth
For God's sake, lest men should believe a lie:
Which seems to have been about the single prayer
She ever put up, that was granted her.
With this hope in her head, of telling truth,—
Being familiarized with pain, beside,—
She bore the stabbing to a certain pitch
Without a useless cry, was flung for dead
On Pietro's lap, and so attained her point.
Her friends subjoin this,—have I done with them?—
And cite the miracle of continued life
(She was not dead when I arrived just now)
As attestation to her probity.

Does it strike your Excellency? Why, your Highness,
The self-command and even the final prayer,
Our candor must acknowledge, explicable
As easily by the consciousness of guilt.
So, when they add that her confession runs
She was of wifehood one white innocence

In thought, word, act, from first of her short life
To last of it; praying, 't the face of death,
That God forgive her other sins—not this,
She is charged with and must die for, that she failed
Anyway to her husband,—while thereon
Comments the old Religious—'So much good,
Patience beneath enormity of ill,
I hear to my confusion, woe is me,
Sinner that I stand, shamed in the walk and gait
I have practised and grown old in, by a child!"—

Guido's friends shrug the shoulder, "Just the same
Prodigious absolute calm in the last hour
Confirms us,—being the natural result
Of a life which proves consistent to the close.
Having braved heaven and deceived earth throughout,
She braves still and deceives still, gains thereby
Two ends, she prizes beyond earth or heaven:
First sets her lover free, impelled sore
By the new turn things take: he answers yet
For the part he played: they have summoned him in deed
The past ripped up, he may be punished still:
What better way of saving him than this?
Then,—thus she dies revenged to the uttermost
On Guido, drags him with her in the dark,
The lower still the better, do you doubt?
Thus, two ways, does she love her love to the end,
And hate her hate,—death, hell is no such price
To pay for these,—lovers and haters hold.'

But there's another parry for the thrust.
"Confession," cry folks —"a confession, think!"
Confession of the moribund is true!"
Which of them, my wise friends? This public one
Or the private other we shall never know?
The private may contain,—your casuists teach—
The acknowledgment of, and the penitence for,
That other public one, so people say.
However it be,—we trench on delicate ground,
Her Emudence is peeping o'er the cards,—
Can one find nothing in behalf of this Catastrophe? Deaf folks accuse the dumb!
You criticise the drunken reel, fool's speech.
Maniacal gesture of the man,—we grant!
But who poured poison in his cup, we ask?
Recall the list of his excessive wrongs,
First cheated in his wife, robbed by her kin,
Rendered anon the laughing-stock o' the world
By the story, true or false, of his wife's birth,—
The last seal publicly apposed to shame
By the open flight of wife and priest,—why,
Sirs,
Step out of Rome a furlong, would you know
What another guessed tribunal be ours here.
Here worldy Court without the help of grace,
Thinks of just that one incident o' the flight?
THE RING AND THE BOOK

Guidero preferred the same complaint before
The court at Arezzo, bar of the Granduke,—
In virtue of its being Tuscan,
Where the offence had rise and flight began,— Selfsame complaint he made in the sequel here
Where the offence grew to the full, the flight
Ended : offence and flight, one fact judged twice
By two distinct tribunals.—what result?
There was a sentence passed at the same time
By Arezzo and confirmed by the Granduke,
Which nothing balks of swift and sure effect
But absence of the guilty, (flight to Rome Frees them from Tuscan jurisdiction now)
—Condemns the wife to the opprobrious doom
Of all whom law just lets escape from death.
The Stinche, House of Punishment, for life,—
That's what the wife deserves in Tuscany:
Here, she deserves—remitting with a smile
To her father’s house, main object of the flight!
The thief presented with the thing he steals!

At this discrepancy of judgments —mad,
The man took on himself the office, judged;
And the only argument against the use
Of the law he thus took into his own hands
Is...what, I ask you?—that, revenging wrong,
He did not revenge sooner, kill at first
Whom he killed last! That is the final charge.
Sooner? What's soon or late? the case?—
ask we.

A wound! the flesh no doubt, wants prompt redress;
It smarted a little—day, week in a week,
Forgotten in a month; or never, or now, reappeared.
But a wound, to the soul? That rankles worse and worse.

Shall I comfort you, explaining—"Not this once
But now it may be some five hundred times
I call you a ruffian, pandar, liar and rogue:
The injury must be less by lapse of time."
The wrong is a wrong, one, immortal too,
And that you bore it those five hundred times,
Let it rankle unrevenged five hundred years,
Is just five hundred wrongs the more and more Waved about;
Men, plagued this fashion, get to explode this way,
If left no other.

"But we left this man
Many another way, and there's his fault,"
'T is answered—"He himself preferred our arm
' O the law to fight his battle with. No doubt
We did not open him an armory
To pick and choose from, use, and then reject.
He tries one weapon and fails,—he tries the next
And next: he flourishes wit and common sense,
They fail him,—he plies logic doughtily,
It fails him too,—thereon, discovers last
He has been blind to the combustibles—
That all the while he is aglow with ire,
Boiling with irrepressible rage, and so
May try explosives and discard cold steel,—
So hires assassins, plots, plans, executes!
Is this the honest self-forgetful rage
We are called to pardon? Does the furious bull
Pick out four help-mates from the grazing herd
And journey with them over hill and dale
Till he find his enemy?"

What rejoinder? save
That friends accept our bull-similitude.
Bull-like,—the indiscriminate slaughter, rude
And rockless aggravation of revenge,
Were all! the way o' the brute who never once
Ceases, amid all provocation more,
To bear in mind the first tormentor, first
Giver o' the wound that goaded him to fight:
And, though a dozen follow and reinforce
The aggressor, wound in front and wound in flank,
Continues undisturbedly pursuit,
And only after prostrating his prize
Turns on the pettier, makes a general prey.
So Guido rushed against Violante, first
Author of all his wrongs, fons et origo
Malorum—drops first, deluge since,—which done,
He finished with the rest. Do you blame a bull?

In truth you look as puzzled as ere I preached! How is that? There are difficulties perhaps
On any supposition, and either side.
Each party wants too much, claims sympathy
For its object of compassion, more than just.
Cry the wife's friends, "Oh, the enormous crime Caused by no provocation in the world!"
"Was not the wife a little weak?" inquir—
"Punished extravagantly, if you please,
But meriting a little punishment?"
One treated inconsiderately, say
Rather than one deserving not at all Treatment and discipline o' the harsher sort?"
"No, they must here her purity itself,
Quite angel,—and her parents angels too
Of an aged sort, immaculate, word and deed:
At all events, so seeming, till he found
Even Guido, by his folly, forced from them
The untoward avowal of the trick o' the birth,
Which otherwise were safe and secret now.
Why, here you have the awfulest of crimes
For nothing! Hell broke loose on a butterfly!
A dragon born of rose-dew and the moon!
Yet here is the monster! Why he's a mere man—
Born, bred and brought up in the usual way,
His mother loves him, still his brothers stick
To the good fellow of the boyish games;
The Governor of his town knows and approves.
The Archbishop of the place knows and assists:
Here he has Cardinal This to vouch for the peace, Cardinal.
That to trust for the future,—match
And marriage were a Cardinal's making.—in short,
What if a tragedy be acted here
COUNT GUIDO FRANCESCHINI

Impossible for malice to improve,
And innocent Guido with his innocent four
Be added, all five, to the guilty three.
That we of these last days be edified
With one full taste o' the justice of the world?

The long and the short is, truth seems what I show: —
Undoubtedly no pains ought to be spared
To give the mob an inkling of our lights.
It seems unduly harsh to put the man
To the torture, as I hear the court intends,
Though readiest way of twisting out the truth;
He is noble, and he may be innocent.
On the other hand, if they exempt the man
(As it is also said they hesitate
On the fair ground, presumptive guilt is weak
I’ the case of nobility and privilege), —
What crime that ever was, ever will be,
Deserves the torture? Then abolish it!
You see the reduction ad absurdum, Sirs?

Her Excellency must pronounce, in fine!
What she prefers going and joining play?
Her Highness finds it late, intands retire?
I am of their mind: only, all this talk talked,
’T was not for nothing that we talked, I hope?
Both know as much about it, now, at least.
As all Rome: no particular thanks, I beg!
(You’ll see, I have not so advanced myself,
After my teaching the two idiots here!)

COUNT GUIDO FRANCESCHINI

Thanks, Sir, but, should it please the reverend Court,
I feel I can stand somehow, half sit down
Without help, make shift to even speak, you
Fortified by the sip of . . . why, ’tis wine,
Velletri, — and not vinegar and gall,
So changed and good the times grow! Thanks, kind Sir!
Oh, but one sip enough! I want my head
To save my neck, there’s work awaits me still.
How cautious and considerate . . . aie, aie, aie,
Nor your fault, sweet Sir! Come, you take to heart
An ordinary matter. Law is law.
Noblemen were exempt, the vulgar thought.
From racking: but, since law thinks otherwise,
I have been put to the rack: all’s over now,
And neither wrist — what men style, out of joint:
If any harm be, ’tis the shoulder-blade,
The left one, that seems wrong i’ the socket, —
Sirs,
Much could not happen, I was quick to faint,
Being past my prime of life, and out of health.
In short, I thank you, — yes, and mean the word.
Needs must the Court be slow to understand
How this quite novel form of taking pain,
This getting tortured merely in the flesh,
Amounts to almost an agreeable change
In my case, me fastidious, pild too much
With opposite treatment, with (forget the joke)
To the rasp-tooth toying with this brain of mine,
And, in and out my heart, the play o’ the probe.
Four years have I been operated on
I’ the soul, do you see — its tense or tremulous part
My self-respect, my care for a good name,
Pride in an old one, love of kindred — just
A mother, brothers, sisters, and the like,
That looked up to my face when days were dim,
And fancied they found light there — no one spot,
Foppishly sensitive, but has paid its pang.
That, and not this you now oblige me with.
That was the Vigil-torment, if you please!
The poor old noble House that drew the rags
O’ the Franceschini’s once superb array Close round her, hoped to sink unchallenged by
Pluck off these! Turn the drapery inside out
And teach the tittering town how scarlet wears!
Show men the lucklessness, the improvidence
Of the easy-natured Count before this Count,
The father I have some slight feeling for,
Who let the world slide, nor foresaw that friends
Then proud to cap and kiss their patron’s shoe,
Would, when the purse he left held spider-webs,
Properly push his child to wall one day!
Mimic the tetchy humor, furtive glance,
And brow where half was furious, half fatigued,
O’ the same son got to be of middle age,
Sour, saturnine, — your humble servant here, —
When things grew cross and the young wife, he finds
Take to the window at a whistle’s bid,
And yet demurs thereon, preposterous fool! —
Whoreset the worthies judge he wants advice
And beg to civilly ask what’s evil here,
Perhaps remonstrate on the habit they deem He’s given unduly to, of beating her:
. . . Oh, sure he beats her — why says John so
else,
Who is cousin to George who is sib to Tecla’s self
Who cooks the meal and combs the lady’s hair?
What! ’T is my wrist you merely dialocate
For the future when you mean me martyrdom? —
— Let the old mother’s economy alone,
How the brocade-strips saved o’ the seamy side
O’ the wedding-gown buy raiment for a year?
— How she can dress and dress up — lordly dish
Fit for a duke, lamb’s head and purtenance —
With her proud hands, feast household so a week?
No word o’ the wine rejoicing God and man,
The less when three-parts water? Then, I say,
THE RING AND THE BOOK

A trifle of torture to the flesh, like yours,
While soul is spared such foretaste of hell-fire,
Is naught. But I curtail the catalogue
Through policy,—a rhetorician's trick,—
Because I would reserve some choicer points
Of the practice, more exactly parallel
(Having an eye to climax) with what gift,
Eventual grace the Court may have in store
I' the way of plague,—what crown of punishments,
When I am hanged or beheaded, time enough
To prove the tenderness of only that,
Mere hanging, — not their counterpart,
Not demonstration public and precise
That I, having married the mongrel of a drab,
Am bound to grant that mongrel-brat, my wife,
Her mother's birthright-license as is just,—
Let her sleep undisturbed, I, the family style,
Her sleep out in the embraces of a priest,
Yet disburden this bastard with her with pity.
Your sole mistake — dare I submit so much
To the reverend Court? — has been in all this pain
To make a stone roll down hill, — rack and
And rend a man to pieces, all for what?
Why — make him ope mouth in his own defence,
Show cause for what he has done, the irregular
 deed.
(Since he did it, scarce dispute can be)
And clear his fame a little, beside the luck
Of stopping even yet, if possible,
Discomfort to his flesh from noose or axe—
For that, out come the implements of law!
May it content my lords the gracious Court
To listen only half so patient long,
As I, till in that sense profusely speak,
And — fie, they shall not call in screws to help!
I killed Pompilia Franceschini, Sira;
Killed too the Compani, husband, wife,
Who called themselves, by a notorious lie,
Her father and her mother to ruin me.
There's the irregular deed: you want no more
Than right interpretation of the same,
And truth so far — am I to understand?
To that then, with convenient speed, — because
Now I consider, — yes, despite my boast,
There is an ailing in this omoplate
May slip my speech all too abruptly short,
Whatever the good-will in me.
Now for truth!

I' the name of the indivisible Trinity!
Will my lords, in the plenitude of their light,
Weigh well that all this trouble has come on
me
Through my persistent treading in the paths
Where I was trained to go, — wearing that
My shoulder was predestined to receive,
Born to the hereditary stoop and grace?
Noble, I recognized my nobler still,
The Church, my suzerain; no mock-mistress,
she,
The secular owned the spiritual: mates of mine

Have thrown their careless hoofs up at her call
"Forsake the clover and come drag my wain!"
There they go cropping: I protruded nose
To halter, bent my back of doole boaste,
And now am whealed, one wide wound all of me,
For being found at the eleventh hour o' the day
Paddling the mill-track, not neek-deep in grass:
—My one fault, I am stiffened by my work,
—My one reward, I help the Court to smile!
I am representative of a great line,
One of the first of the old families
In Arezzo, ancientest of Tuscan towns.
When my worst foe is fain to challenge this,
His worst exception runs — not first in rank
But second, noble in the next degree
Only; not malice' self maligns me more.
So, my lord opposite has composed, we know,
A marvel of a book, sustains the point
That Francis boasts the primary mid saints;
Yet not inaptly hath his argument
Obtained response from you my other lord
In thesis published with the world's applause
Rather 't is Dominic such post belfs:
Why, at the worst, Francis stays Francis still.
Second in rank to Dominic it may be,
Still, very saintly, very like our Lord;
And I at least descend from Guido once
Homager to the Empire, naught below —
Of which account as proof that, none o' the line
Having a single gift beyond brave blood,
Or able to do aught but give, give, give
In blood and brain, in house and land and cash,
Not get and garner as the vulgar may,
We became poor as Francis or our Lord.
Be that as it likes you, Sira, — whenever it chance
Myself grew capable anyway of remark,
(Which was soon — penny makes wit premature)
This struck me, I was poor who should be rich
Or pay that fault to the world which trifles not
When lineage lacks the flag yet holds the pole:
On, there must move in concert with, transfer
My stranded self, born fish with gill and fin
Fit for the deep sea, now left flap bare-backed
In slush and sand, a show to crawlers vile
Reared of the low-tide and aught therein.
The enviable youth with the old name,
Wide chest, stout arms, sound brow and pricking veins,
A heartful of desire, man's natural load,
A brainful of belief, the noble's lot.
All this life, cramped and gasping, high and dry
'P the wave's retreat, — the misery, good my lords.
Which made you merriment at Bome of late, —
It made me reason, rather — muse, demand
Why our bare drooping palace, in the street
Where such one whose grandfather sold tripes
Was adding to his purchased pile a fourth
Tall tower, could hardly show a turret sound?
Why Countess Beatrice, whose son I am, Covered in the winter-time as she spun flax,
Blew on the earthen basket of live ash
Instead of jamming forth in torch and six
Like such another widow who never was wed?
I asked my fellows, how came this about?
"Why, Jack, the sutler's child, perhaps the camp's,
Went to the wars, fought sternly, took a town
And got rewarded as was natural.
She of the coach and six — excuse me there!
Why, don't you know the story of her friend?
A claren chanced vines on somebody's estate,
His boy recoiled from musk, liked Latin more,
Stuck to his pen and got to be a priest,
Till one day... don't you mind that telling tract
Against Molino, the old Cardinal wrote?
He penned and dropped it in the patron's desk,
Who, deep in thought and absent much of mind,
Licensed the thing, allowed it for his own;
Quick came promotion, — sum cuique, Count!
Oh, he can pay for coach and six, be sure!"
"— Well, let me go, do likewise: war's the word.
That way the Franceschini worked at first,
I'll take my turn, try soldier'ship." — "What, you?
The eldest son and heir and prop o' the house,
So do you see your duty? Here's your post,
Hard by the hearth and altar. (Room from roof,
This younger, play the gypsy out of doors,
And who keeps kith and kin that fall on us?)
Stand fast, stick tight, conserve your gods at home!"
"— Well then, the quiet course, the contrary trade!
We had a cousin amongst us once was Pope,
And minor glories manifold. Try the Church,
The tonsure, and,— since heresy's but half- slain
Even now the Cardinal's tract he thought he wrote,—
Have at Molino!" — "Have at a fool's head!
You a priest? How were marriage possible?
There must be Franceschini till time ends —
That's your vocation. Make your brothers Paul shall be porporate, and Girolamo step Red-stocking in the presence when you choose,
But save one Franceschini for the age!
Be not the vine but dig and dung its root,
Be not a priest but guid up priesthood's loins,
With one foot in Arezzo stride to Rome,
Spend yourself there and bring the purchase back!
Go hence to Rome, be guided!"

So I was.

I turned alike from the hillside zigzag thread
Of way to the table-land a soldier takes,
Alike from the low-lying pasture-place
Where churchmen graze, recline and ruminate,
— Ventured to mount no platform like my lords
Who judge of the world, bear brain I dare not brag—
But stationed me, might thus the expression serve,
As who should fetch and carry, come and go,
Meditate and make! the cause my lords love most—
The public weal, which hangs to the law, which holds

By the Church, which happens to be through God himself.
Humbly I helped the Church till here I stand,—
Or would stand but for the omoplate, you see!
Bidden qualify for Rome, I, having a field,
Went, sold it, laid the sum at Peter's foot:
Which means — I settled home-accounts with speed.

Set apart just a modicum should suffice
To hold the villa's head above the waves
Of weed inundating its oil and wine,
And prop roof, stanchion wall o' the palace so
As to keep breath i' the body, out of heart
Amid the advance of neighboring loftiness —
(People like building where they used to beg) —
Till succored one day, — shared the residue
Between my mother and brothers and sisters
— there.

Black-eyed babe Donna This and Donna That,
As near to starring as might decently be,
— Left myself journey-charges, change of suit,
A purse to put i' the pocket of the Groom
O' the Chamber of the patron, and a glove
With a ring to it for the digits of the niece
Sure to be helpful in his household, — then Started for Rome, and led the life prescribed.
Close to the Church, though clean of it, I assumed
Three or four orders of no consequence,
— They cast out evil spirits and exorcise,
For example; bind a man to nothing more,
Give clerical favor to his layman's salt,
Facilitate his claim to loaf and fish
Should miracle leave, beyond what feeds the flock,
Fragment, to brim the basket of a friend —
While, for the world's sake, I rode, danced and gained,
Quitted me like a courtier, measured mine
With whatsoever blade had fame in fence,
— Ready to let the basket go its round
Even though my turn was come to help myself,
Should Dives count on me at dinner-time
As just the understarer of a joke
And not immoderate in repartee,
Utique sic paratus, Sire, I said,
"Here," (in the fortitude of years fifteen,
So good a pedagogue is punny)
"Here wait, do service,— serving and to serve!
And, in due time, I nowise doubt at all,
The recognition of my service comes.
Next year I'm only sixteen. I can wait."

I waited thirty years, may it please the Court:
Saw meanwhile many a denizen o' the dung
Hop, skip, jump o'er my shoulder, make him wings
And fly aloft, — succeed, in the usual phrase.
Every one soon or late comes round by Rome:
Stand still here, you'll see all in turn succeed.
Why, look you, so and so, the physician here,
My father's laquey's son we sent to school,
Doctored and dosed this Eminence and that,
Salved the last Pope his certain obstinate sore
Soon bought land as because him it noes it now:
I grasp bell at his griffin-guardsed gate,
Traverse the half-mile avenue, — a term,
A cypress, and a statue, three and three,
Deliver message from my Monsignor,
With variegry at lounge! the vestibule
I'm barred from, who bear mud upon my shoe.
My father's chaplain's nephew, Chamberlain, —
Nothing less, please you! — courtesy all the same,
— He does not see me though I wait an hour
At his stair-case-landing 'twixt the brace of busts,
A noseless Sylla. Marius maimed to match,
My father gave him for a heraychist
Made on my birthday, — but he sends me down,
To make amends, that relic I prize most —
The unburnt end o' the very candle, Sis,
Purled with paint so prettily round and round,
He carried in such state last Peter's-day, —
In token I, his gentleman and squire,
Had held the bridle, walked his managed mule
Without a titter the procession through.
Nay, the official, — one you know, sweet lords! —
Who drew the warrant for my transfer late
To the New Prisons from Tordinass, — he Graciously had remembrance — " Francesco ...
His sire, now — how a thing shall come about! —
Paid me a dozen florins above the fee,
For drawing deckly up a deed of sale
When troubles fell so thick on him, good heart.
And I, steprompt and pushing! By all means!
At the New Prisons be it his son shall lie, —
Anything for an old friend!" and thereat
Signed name with triple flourish underneath.
These were my fellows, such their fortunes now,
While I — kept facts and feasts innumerable,
Marine and venal, functions to no end,
I' the train of Monsignor and Eminence,
As gentleman-squire, and for my zeal's reward
Have rarely missed a place at the table-foot
Except when some Ambassador, or such like,
Brought his own people. Brief, one day I felt
The time inside me, turning-point
And slight sense there was now enough of this:
That I was near my seventh climacteric,
Hard upon, if not over, the middle life,
And, although fed by the east-wind, fulsome-fine
With foretaste of the Land of Promise, still
My gorge gave symptom it might play me false;
Better not press it further, — be content
With living and dying only a nobleman,
Who merely had a father great and rich,
Who simply had one greater and richer yet,
And so on back and back till first and best
Began i' the night: I finish in the day.
" The mother must be getting old," I said;
" The sisters are well wedded away, our name
Cannot manage to pass a sister off, in need.
And do for dowry: both my brothers thrive —
Regular priests they are, nor, bat-like, 'bide
'Twixt flesh and fowl with neither privilege.
My spare revenue must keep me and mine.
I am tired: Arezzo's air is good to breathe;
Withiano, — one times flocks of thrushes there;
A leathern coat costs little and lasts long
Let me bid hope good-by, content at home!"
Thus, one day, I dissoberomed and bowed.

Whereas began the little buzz and thrill
O' the gazers round me; each face brightened up
As when at your Casino, deep in dawn,
A gamester says at last, "I play no more,
Forego gain, acquiesce in loss, withdraw.
Anyhow: and the watchers of his ways,
A trifle a buck conspicuous at the words,
Yet sensible of relief, breathe free once more.
Break up the ring, venture polite advice —
"How, Sir? So scant of heart and hope indeed?
Retire with neither cross nor pile from play? —
So incurious, so short-casting? — give your chance
To a younger, stronger, bolder spirit belike,
Just when luck turns and the fine throw sweeps all?"
Such was the chorus: and its goodwill meant —
"See that the loser leave door handsomely!
There's an ill look, — it's sinister, spoils sport.
When an old bruised and battered year-by-year
Fighter with fortune, not a penny in poke,
Reels down the steps of our establishment
And staggered on broad daylight and the world,
In theagry beard and doleful doubt, drops
And breaks his heart on the outside: people prate
"Such is the profit of a trip upstairs!
Contrive he sadle forth, balked of the blow
Best dealt by way of moral, bidding down
No curse but blessings rather on our heads
For some poor prize he bears at tattered breast.
Some palpable sort of kind of good to set
Over and against the grievance: give him quick!"
Whereon protested Paul. "Go hang yourselves!
Leave him to me. Count Guido and brother of mine,
A word in your ear! Take courage, since Faint heart
Ne'er won ... aha, fair lady, don't men say?
There's a star, there's a right Virgilian dip!
Do you see the happiness o' the hint?
At worst,
If the Church want no more of you, the Court
No more, and the Camp as little, the ingrates, come.
Count you are counted: still you've coat to back
Not cloth of gold and tissue, as we hoped.
But cloth with sparks and spangles on its frieze.
From Camp, Court, Church, enough to make a shine,
Entitle you to carry home a wife
With the proper dowry, let the worst betide!
Why, it was just a wife you meant to take!"

Now, Paul's advice was weighty: priests should know:
And Paul appraised me, ere the week was out,
That Pietro and Violante, the easy pair,
The sits enough, with stomach to be more,
Had just the daughter and exact the sum
To truck for the quality of myself: "She's young,
Pretty and rich: you're able, classic, choice.
Is it to be a match?" "A match," said I. Done! He proposed all. I accepted all.
And we performed all. So I said and did Simply. As simply followed, not at first.
COUNT GUIDO FRANCESCHINI

But with the outbreak of misfortune, still
One comment on the saying and doing—
What? No blush at the avowal you dared buy
A girl of age besees your granddaughter,
Like ox or ass? Are flesh and blood a ware?
Are heart and soul a chattel?

Softly, Sirs!

Will the Court of its charity teach poore me,
Anxious to learn, of any way i' the world,
Allowed by custom and convenience, save
This same which, taught from my youth up, I

Take me along with you; where was the wrong
step?

If what I gave in barter, style and state
And all that hangs to Franceschinihood,
Worse werest, — why, society goes to ground,
Its rules are idiot's-rambling. Honor of birth,

If that thing has no value, cannot buy
Something with value of another sort,
You 've no reward nor punishment to give
The giving or the taking honor; straight
Your social fabric, pinnae to base,
Comes down a-clatter like a house of cards.
Get honor, and keep honor free from flaw,
Am at still higher honor,—gabble o' the

Go bid a second blockhead like myself
Spend fifty years in guarding bubbles of breath,
Soapsuds with air i' the belly, gilded brave,
Guarded and guided, all to break at touch
O' the first young girl's hand and first old fool's

Purse!

All my privation and endurance, all
Love, loyalty and labor dared and did,
Fiddle-de-dee! — why, doer and darer both,—
Count Guido Franceschini had hit the mark
Far better, spent his life with more effect,
As a dancer or a prizer, trades that pay!
But on the other hand, bid this buffoonery cease,
Admit that honor is a privilege.
The question follows, privilege worth what?

Why, worth the market-price,—now up, now

Just so with this as with all other ware:
Therefore essay the market, sell your name,
Style and condition to who buys them best

"Does my name purchase," had I dared inquir;
"Your niece, my lord?" there would have been rebuff

Though courtesy, your Lordship cannot else—
"Not altogether! Rank for rank may stand:
But I have wealth beside, you — poverty;
Your scale flies up there: bid a second bid,
Rank too and wealth too!" Reasoned like yourself!

But was it to you I went with goods to sell?
This time 't was my scale quietly kissed the
ground,
Mere rank against mere wealth — some youth beside,
Some beauty too, thrown into the bargain, just
As the hungry like or lets alone. I thought
To deal o' the square: others find fault, it seems:

The thing is, those my offer most concerned,
Pietro, Violante, cried they fair or foul?
What did they make o' the terms? Preposterous terms?

Why then accede so promptly, close with such
Nor take a minute to chaffer? Bargain

They straight grew bilious, wished their money back.

Repented them, no doubt: why, so did I,
So did your Lordship, if town-talk be true,
Of paying a full farm's worth for that piece
By Pietro of Cortona — probably
His scholar Ciro Ferri may have retouched —
You caring more for color than design —
Getting a little tired of cupid's too.
That's incident to all the folk who buy:
I am charged, I know, with gilding fact by

I falsified and fabricated, wrote
Myself down roughly richer than I prove,
Rendered a wrong revenue, — grant it all!
Mere grace, mere coquetry such fraud, I say:
A flourish round the figures of a sum
For fashion's sake, that deceives nobody.
The veritable back-bone, understood
Essence of this same bargain, blank and bare,
Being the exchange of quality for wealth, —
What may such fancy-flights be? Flecks of Flirted by champagne where plain dealing grates.

I may have dripped a drop — 'My name I sell;
Not but that I too boast my wealth" — as they,
"- We bring you riches; still our ancestor
Was hardly the rapscallion, folk saw flogged.
But heir to we know who, were rights of force!"

They knew and I knew where the back-bone
lurked

I' the writhings of the bargain, lords, believe!
I paid down all engaged for, to a doit,
Delivered them just that which, their life long,
They hungered in the hearts of them to gain —
Incorporation with nobility thus

In word and deed: for that they gave me

But when they came to try their gain, my gift,
Quit Home and qualify for Arezzo, take
The tone o' the new sphere that absorbed the

old,
Put away gossip Jack and goody Joan
And go become familiar with the Great,
Greatness to touch and taste and handle
now, —

Why, then, — they found that all was vanity,
Vexation, and what Solomon describes!
The old abundant city-fare was best,
The kindly warmth o' the commons, the glad clap

Of the equal on the shoulder, the frank grin
Of the underling at all so many spoons
Fire-new at neighborly treat, — best, best and best

Beyond compare! — down to the lol itself
O' the pot-house settle, — better such a bench
Than the stiff crucifixion by my dis

THE RING AND THE BOOK

With the courtesied coat-of-arms a-top!
Poverty and privation for pride’s sake,
All they engaged to easily brave and bear,—
With the fit upon them and their brains a-work,—
Proved unendurable to the sobered sorts.
A banked shrug, now, will exude a juice
And salamander-like support the flame:
He dines on chestnuts, chucks the husks to help
The broul o’ the brazier, pays the due baioc,
Goes off light-hearted: his grimace begins
At the funny humors of the christening-feast
Of friend the money-lender,—then he’s touched
By the flame and frizzles at the babe to kiss!
Here was the converse trial, opposite mind:
Here did a petty nature split on rock
Of vulgar wants predestinate for such
One dish at supper and weak wine to boot!
The prince had grinned and borne: the citizen
Shrieked,
Summoned the neighborhood to attest the wrong.
Made noisy protest he was murdered,—stopt
And burned and drowned and hanged,—then broke away,
He and his wife, to tell their Rome the rest.
And this you admire, you men o’ the world,
My life!
This moves compassion, makes you doubt my faith?
Why, I appeal to . . . sun and moon! Not I!
Rather to Plautus, Terence, Boccaccio’s Book,
My townsmen, frank Ser Franco’s merry Tales,—
To all who strip a wizard from a face,
A body from its padding, and a soul
From froth and ignorance it styles itself,—
If this be other than the daily hap
Of purblind greed that dog-like still drops bone,
Grasps shadow, and then howls the case is hard!
So much for them so far: now for myself,
My profit or loss I the matter: married am I:
Tell whereon friendly sensors burst to preach.
Ay, at Rome even, long ere I was left
To regulate her life for my young bride
Alone at Arezzo, friendliness outbroke
(Sitting my future to predict its fault)
"Purchase and sale being thus so plain a point,
How of a certain soul bound up, maybe,
I’th barter with the body and money-bags?
From the bride’s soul what is it you expect?"
Why, loyalty and obedience,—wish and will
To settle and suit her fresh and plastic mind
To the novel, not disadvantageous moule!
Father and mother shall the woman leave,
Cleave to the husband, be it for weal or woe:
There is the law: what sets this law aside
In my particular case? My friends submit
"Give her, good master, benefaction—see,
Faw, faw, fum,
The fact is, you are forty-five years old,
Nor very comely even for that age:
Girls must have boys." Why, let girls say so then,
Nor call the boys and men, who say the same,
Brute this and beat the other as they do! Come, cards on table! When you chant a next Epitaphium full to overflow
With praise and glory of white womanhood,
The chaste and pure—troll no such lies o’ the lip!
Put in their stead a crudity or two,
Such short and simple statement of the case
As youth chalks on our walls at spring of year
No! No! I must still think nobler of the sex,
Believe a woman still may take a man
For the short period that his soul wears flesh.
And, for the soul’s sake, understand the fact
Of armory frayed by fighting. Tush, it tempts One’s tongue too much! I’ll say — the law!
The law:
With a wife I look to find all wifeliness,
As when I buy, timber and twig, a tree—
I buy the song o’ the nightingale inside.
Such was the pact: Pomphilia from the first
Broke it, refused from the beginning day
Either in body or soul to cleave to mine,
And published it forthwith to all the world.
No rupture,—you must join ere you can break,—
Before we had cohabited a month.
She found I was a devil and no man,—
Made common cause with those who found us much,
Her parents, Pietro and Violante,—moved
Heaven and earth to the rescue of all three.
In four months’ time, the time o’ the parents’ stay.
Arezzo was a-ringing, bells in a blaze,
With the unimaginable story rife
I’ the mouth of man, woman and child—wet
My misdemeanor. First the lighter side,
Ludicrous face of things,—how very poor
The Franceschini had become at last,
The meanness and the misery of each shift
To save a soldo, stretch and make ends meet.
Next, the more hateful aspect,—how myself
With cruelty beyond Caligula’s
Had stripped and beaten, robbed and murdered them.
The good old couple, I decoyed, abused,
Plundered and then cast out, and happily so.
Sineo,—in due course the abominable comest.
Woe worth the poor young wife left lonely here!
Repugnant in my person as my mind,
I sought,—was ever heard of such revenge?
—To lure and bind her to so cursed a couch,
Such co-embrace with sulphur, snake and toad.
That she was fain to rush forth, call the stones
O’ the common street to save her, not from hate
Of mine merely, but . . . must I burn my lips
With the blister of the lie? . . . the satyr-love
Of who but my own brother, the young priest.
Too long enforced to lenient fate alike.
Now tempted by the morsel tossed him tall
I’ the trencher where lay bread and herbs at best.
Mark, this yourselves say! — this, none dislows,
COUNT GUIDO FRANCESCHINI

Was charged to me by the universal voice
At the instigation of my four-months' wife! —
And then you ask, "Such charges so preferred,
(Truly or falsely, here concern us not)
Pricked you to punish now if not before? —
Did not the harshness double itself, the hate Harden?" I answer, "Have it your way and will!

Say my resentment grew apace: what then?
Do you not know it on the marble?
When I find
That pure smooth egg which, laid within my nest,
Could not but hatch a comfort to us all,
Issues a cockatrice for me and mine,
Do you stare to see me stamp on it? Swans are soft:
Is it not clear that she you call my wife,
That any wife of any husband, caught
Whetting a sting like this against his breast, —
Speckled with fragments of the fresh-broke shell?

Married a month and making outcry thus, —
Proves a plague-prodigy to God and man?
She married: what was it she married for?
Counted upon and meant to meet thereby?
"Love," suggests some one, "love, a little word Whereas I have not heard one syllable." So,
The Pomplia, child, girl, wife, in one,
Wanted the beating pulse, the rolling eye,
The frantic gesture, the devotion due
From Thyras to Nosera! Guido's love —
Why not be genuine in his shoe,
Pin the toy's cap, and trio of guitars At seclusion, with a bravo close beside?
Good things all these are, clearly claimable
When the fit price is paid the proper way.
Had it been some friend's wife, now, threw her fan
At my foot, with just this pretty scrap attached.
"Shame, death, damnation — fall these as they may,
So I find you, for a minute! Come this eve!"
— Why, at such sweet self-sacrifice, — who knows?
I might have fired up, found me at my post,
Ardent from head to heel, nor feared catch cough.
Nay, had some other friend's . . . say, daughter, tripped
Upstairs and tumbled flat and frank on me,
Bareheaded and barefooted, with loose hair
And garments all at large, — cried "Take me thus!
Duke So-and-So, the greatest man in Rome —
To escape his hand and heart have I broke bounds,
Traversed the town and reached you!" — Then, indeed,
The lady had not reached a man of ice!
I would have rummaged, ransacked at the word
Those old odd corners of an empty heart
For remnants of dim love the long disused,
And dusty crumblings of romance! But here,
We talk of just a marriage, if you please —
The every-day conditions and no more;
What do these bind us to bestow one drop
Of blood shall dye my wife's true-love-knot pink?

Pomplia was no pigeon, Venus' pet,
That shuffled from between her pressing paps
To sit on my rough shoulder, — but a hawk,
I bought at a hawk's price and carried home.
To do hawk's service — at the Rotunda, say,
Where, six o'clock the callows nestling in a row,
You pick and choose and pay the price for such.
I have paid my pound, await my penny's worth,
So, hood wink, starve and properly train my bird,
And, should she prove a haggard, — twist her neck!

Did I not pay my name and style, my hope
And trust, my all? Through spending these amiss
I am huri! 'Tis scarce the gravity of the Court
Will blame me that I never piped a tune,
Treated my falcon-gentle like my finch.
The obligation I incurred was just
To practise mastery, prove my mastership: —
Pomplia's duty was — submit herself.
Affect me pleasure, perhaps our bile.
Am I to teach my lords what marriage means,
What God ordains thereby and man fulfils
Who, docile to the dictate, treads the house?
My lords have chosen the happier part with Paul
And neither marry nor burn, — yet priesthood
Can find a parallel to the marriage bond
In its own blessed special ordinance
Whereof indeed was marriage made the type:
The Church may show her inordinate,
As marriage her refractory. How of the Monk
Who finds the clausal regimen too
After the first month's essay? What's the mode
With the Deacon who supports indifferently
The rod o' the Bishop when he tastes its smart
Full four weeks? Do you straightway slacken hold
Of the innocents, the all-unworthy ones
Who, eager to profess, mistook their mind? —
Remit a fast-day's rigor to the Monk
Who fancied Francis' manna meant roast quails,
Concede the Deacon sweet society.
He never thought the Levite-rule renounced,
Or rather prescribe short chain and sharp scourge Corrective of such peccant humors? This —
I take to be the Church's mode, and mine.
If I was over-hard, — the worse; the wife
Who did not win from harshness as she ought,
Wanted the patience and persuasion, lore
Of love, should censure me and console herself.
Put ease that I mishandle, flurry and fright
My hawk through clumsiness in sportsmanship,
Twitch out five pens where pinching one would serve
What, shall she bite and claw to mend the case?
And, if you find I pluck five more for that,
Shall you weep "How roughs the turtle there?"

Such was the starting; now of the further step.
In lieu of taking penance in good part,
The Monk, with hue and cry, summons a mob
To make a bonfire of the convent say —
And the Deacon's pretty piece of virtus (save
The ears o' the Court! I try to save my head)
Instructed by the ingenious postulant,
Taxes the Bishop with adultery, (mad)
Needs must pair off with mud, and filth with filth) —

Such being my next experience. Who knows not —
The uncle, father and mother of my wife, Returned to Rome, published before my lords, Put into print, made circulate far and wide That they had cheated me who cheated them? Pompilia, I supposed their daughter, drew Breath first mid Rome’s worst rankness, through the deed Of a drab and a rogue, was by-blow bastard-babe Of a nameless strumpet, passed off, palmed on me As the daughter with the dowry. Daughter? Dirt. O’ the kennel! Dewry? Dust o’ the street! Naught more Naught less, naught else but — oh — ah — assuredly A Franceschini and my very wife! Now take this charge as you will, for false or true — This charge, preferred before your very selves Who judge me now, — I pray you, adjudge again, Clasping it with the cheats or with the lies, By which category I suffer most! But of their reckoning, theirs who dealt with me In either fashion, — I reserve my word, Justify that in its place; I am now to say, Whichever point o’ the charge might poison most, Pompilia’s duty was no doubtful one. You put the protestation in her mouth, "Henceforward and for evermore, avaunt Ye fiends, who drop disguise and glare revealed In your own shape, no longer father mine Nor mother mine! Too nakedly you hate Me whom you looked as if you loved once, — me Whom, whether true or false, your tale now damns, Divulged thus to my public infamy, Private perdition, absolute overthrow. For, hate my husband to your hearts’ content, I, spoil and prey of you from first to last, I who have done you the blind service, lured The lion to your pitfall, — I, thus left To answer for my ignorant blustering there, I should have been remembered and withdrawn From the first o’ the natural fury, not flung loose A proverb and a byword men will mouth At the cross-way, in the corner, up and down Rome and Arezzo, — there, full in my face, If my lord, missing them and finding me, Content himself with casting his reproach To drop i’ the street where such impostors die. Ah, but — that husband, what the wonder were! —

If, far from casting thus away the rag Smeared with the plague, his hand had chanced true,
Sewn to his pillow by Locusta’s wife, — Far from abolishing, root, stem and branch, The misgroveth of infections mistletoe Foisted into his stock for honest graft, —

If he repudiate not, renounce nowise, But, guarding, guiding me, maintain my cause By making it his own, (what other way?) — To keep my name for me, he call it him, Claim it of who would take it by their lie, — To save my wealth for me — or babe of mine Their lie was framed to beggar at the birth — He bid them loose grasp, give our gold again: If he become no partner with the pair Even in a game which, played adroitly, gives its winner life’s great wonderful new chance, — Of marrying, to wit, a second time, — Ah, if he did thus, what a friend were he! Anger he might show, — who can stamp out flame Yedt spread no black o’ the brand? — yet, rough albeit In the acts as whose bare feet feel embers score What grace were his, what gratitude were mine!"

Such protestation should have been my wife’s. Looking for this, do I exact too much? Why, here’s the — word for word so much, so more —

Averred she made, her pure spontaneous speech To my brother the Abate at first blush, Ere the good impulse had begun to fade: So did she make confession for the pair, So pour forth the praise in her own behalf: "Ay, the false letter," interpose my lords — "The simulated writing, — ’t was a trick: You traced the signs, she merely marked the same, The product was not hers but yours." — Alack. I want no more impulsion to tell truth From the other trick, the torture inside there! I confess all — let it be understood — And deny nothing! If I baffle you so, Can so fence, in the plentitude of right, That my poor lathen dagger puts aside Each post o’ the Bilibus, beats you all the same, —

What matters inefficiency of blade? Mine and not hers the letter, — conceded, lords! Impute to me that practice! — take as proved I taught my wife her duty, made her see What it behoved her see and say and do, Feel in her heart and with her tongue declare. And, whether sluggish or recalcitrant, Forced her to take the right step, I myself Was marching in marital rectitude! Why, who finds fault here, say the tale be true? Would not my lords commend the priest whose zeal Seized on the sick, morose or moribund, By the pale-smitten finger, made it cross His brow correctly at the critical time? — Or answered for the inarticulate babe At baptism, in its stead declared the faith, And saved what else would perish unprofessed? True, the inexcusable hand may rally yet, Renounce the sign with renovated strength, — The babe may grow up man and Melanist, — And so Pompilia, set in the good path And left to go alone there, soon might see That too frank-forward, all too simple-straight Her step was, and decline to tread the rough,
COUNT GUIDO FRANCESCINI

When here lay, tempting foot, the meadow-side,
And then the coppice rang with singing-birds!
Soon she discovered she was young and fair,
That many in Arezzo knew as much, —
Yes, this next cup of bitterness, my lords,
Had to begin go filling, drop by drop,
Its measure up of full disgust for me,
Fitterd into by every notch, one drain —
Society's sink toward which all moisture runs.
Would not you prophesy — "She on whose brow is stamped
The note of the imputation that we know, —
Rightly or wrongly mothered with a whore, —
Such an one, to disprove the frightful charge,
What will she but exaggerate chastity,
Err in excess of wifehood, as it were,
Renounce even levities permitted youth,
Though not youth struck to age by a thunderbolt?
Cry ' wolf !' 'tis the sheepfold, where's the sheep
dares bleat,
Knowing the shepherd listens for a growl?"
So you expect. How did the devil decree?
Why, my lords, just the contrary of course!
It was the house from the window, at the church
From the hassock, — where the theatre lent its lodge,
Or staging for the public show left space, —
That still Pomplia needs must find herself
Sometimes forth, letting looks reply
As arrows to a challenge; on all sides
Ever new contribution to her lap,
Till one day, what is it knocks at my clenched teeth
But the cup full, curse-collected all for me?
And I must needs drink, drink this gallant's praise,
That minion's prayer, the other fop's reproach,
And come at the dregs to — Caponsacchi!
Sir, I —
Yet deep in a marsh of misery,
Struggling to extricate my name and fame
And fortune from the marsh would drown them all,
My face the sole unstrangled part of me, —
I must have this new gad-fly in that face,
Must free me from the attacking lover too!
Men say I battled ungraciously enough —
Was harsh, uncouth and ludicrous beyond
The proper part o' the husband: have it so! Your lordships are considerate at least —
You order me to speak in my defence
Plainly, expect no quavering tuneful trills
As when you bid a singer solace you, —
Nor look that I shall give it, for a grace,
Stans pede in uno: — you remember well
In the one case, 'tis a plainsong too severe,
This story of my wrongs, — and that I ache
And need a chair, in the other. Ask you me
Why, when I felt this trouble flap my face,
Already pricked with every shame could perch,
When, with her parents, my wife plagued me too, —
Why I enforced not exhortation mild
To leave whore's-tricks and let my brows alone,
With muslct of comfits, promise of perfume ?

"Far from that! No, you took the opposite course, Breathed threatenings, rage and slaughter!"
What you will!
And the end has come, the doom is verily here,
Unhindered by the threatening. See fate's flare
Full on each face of the dead guilty three!
Look at them well, and now, lords, look at this!
Tell me: if on that day when I found first
That Caponsacchi thought in the nearest way
To his church was some half-mile round by my door,
And that he so admired, shall I suppose,
The manner of the swallows' come-and-go.
Between the props o' the window overhead, —
That window happening to be my wife's, —
As to stand gazing by the hour on high,
Of May-eves, while she sat and let him smile, —
If I, — instead of threatening, talking big,
Showing hair-powder, a prodigious pinch,
For poison in a bottle, — making believe
At desperate doings with a harmless-sword,
And other bugaboos-and-baby-work, —
Had, with the voluptuous household implement,
Calmly and quietly cut off, clean through bone,
But one joint of one finger of my wife,
Saying, "For listening to the serenade,
Here's your ring-finger shorter a full third:"
Be certain I will slice away next joint,
Next time that anybody underneath
Seems somehow to be samantering as he hoped
A flower would eddy out of your hand to his,
While you please fidget with the branch above
O' the rose-tree in the terrace!" — had I done so,
Why, there had followed a quick sharp scream,
some pain,
Much calling for plaster, damage to the dress,
A somewhat sulky countenance next day,
Perhaps reproaches, — but reflections too!
I don't hear much of harm that Malchus did
After the incident of the ear, my lords!
Saint Peter took the efficacious way;
Malchus was sore but silenced for his life:
He did not hang himself! the Potter's Field
Like Judas, who was trusted with the bag
And treated to sops after he proved a thief.
So, by this time, my true and obedient wife
Might have been telling beads with a gloved hand:
Awkward a little at pricking hearts and darts
On sampler possibly, but well otherwise:
Not where Rome shudders now to see her lie.
I give that for the course a wise man takes; —
I took the other however, tried the fool's,
The lighter remedy, brandished rapier dread
With cork-ball at the tip, boxed Malchus' ear
Instead of severing the cartilage,
Called her a terrible nickname and the like,
And there an end: and what was the end of that?
What was the good effect o' the gentle course?
Why, one night I went drowsily to bed,
Dropped asleep suddenly, not suddenly woke,
But did wake with rough rousing and loud cry,
To find noon in my face, a crowd in my room,
Fumes in my brain, fire in my throat, my wife
Gone God knows whither, — rifed vesture-chest,
And ransacked money-offer. "What does it mean?"
The servants had been drugged too, starved and yawned,
"It must be that our lady has eloped!"
— "Whither and with whom?" — "With whom but the Canon's self?
One recognizes Caponsacchi there!" —
(By this time the admiring neighborhood Joined chorus round me while I rubbed my eyes)
"Tis months since their intelligence began,—
A comedy the town was privy to,—
He wrote and she wrote, she spoke, he replied,
And going in and out your house last night
Was easy work for one . . . to be plain with you . . .
Accustomed to do both, at dusk and dawn
When you were absent, — at the villa, you
know.
Where husbandry required the master-mind.
Did not you know? Why, we all knew, you
see!"
And presently, bit by bit, the full and true
Particulars of the tale were volunteered
With all the breathless zeal of friendship—
"Thus
Matters were managed: at the seventh hour of
night . . .
— "last, at last break" . . . "Caponsacchi came" . . .
— "While you and all your household slept like
death,
Drugged as your supper was with drowsy stuff!" . . .
— "And your own cousin Guillichiini too —
Either or both entered your dwelling-place,
Plundered it at their pleasure, made prize of
all,
Including your wife" . . . — "Oh, your wife
led the way,
Out of doors, on to the gate" . . . — "But gates are shut,
In a decent town, to darkness and such deeds:
They climbed the wall — your lady must be lithe—
At the gap, the broken bit" . . . — "Torrione,
true!
To escape the questioning guard at the proper
gate,
Clemente, where at the inn, hard by, 'the Horse,'
Just outside, a clash in readiness
Took the two principals, all alone at last,
To gate San Spirito, which o'erlooks the road,
Leads to Perugia, Rome and liberty."
Bit by bit thus made-up mosaic-wise,
Flat lay my fortune, — tessellated floor.
Impervious to the tracey devils should foot
And frolic it on, around my broken gods,
Over my desecrated hearth.
So much
For the terrible effect of threatening, Sire!

Well, this way I was shaken wide awake,
Doctored and drenched, somewhat unpoisoned
so.
Then, set on horseback and bid seek the lost,
I started alone, head of me, heart of me
Fire, and each limb as languid . . . ah, sweet lorde,
Bethink you! — poison-torture, try persuade
The next refractory Molinist with that! . . .
Floundered through day and night, another day
And yet another night, and so at last,
As Lucifer kept falling to find hell,
Tumbled into the court-yard of an inn
At the end, and fall on whom I thought to find,
Even Caponsacchi, — what part once was priest.
Cast to the winds now with the cassock-rags:
In cape and sword a cavalier confessed,
There stood he chiding dilatory grooms,
Chafing that only horseshell and no team
Of eagles would supply the last relay,
Whirl him along the league, the one post more
Between the couple and Rome and liberty.
"T was done, the couple were rested in a cart.
And though the lady, tired,— the tender sex, —
Still lingered in her chamber, — to adjust
The limp hair, look for any blush astray,
She would descend in a twinkling, — Have you out
The horses therefore!

So did I find my wit:
Is the case complete? Do your eyes here see with mine?
Even the parties dared deny no one
Point out of all these points.

What follows next?
"Why, that then was the time," you interpose.
"Or then or never, while the fact was fresh.
To take the natural vengeance: there and the
They and you, — somebody had to get a sword Beside you while he pushed you on your horse,—
"I was requisite to slay the couple, Count!"
Just so my friends say — "Kill!" they cry in a breath,
Who presently, when matters grow to a head
And I do kill the offending ones indeed,—
When crime of theirs, only surmised before.
In patent, proved indisputably now, —
When remedy for wrong, untried at the time.
Which law professes shall not fail a friend.
Is thrice tried now, found threefold worse than null,—
When what might turn to transient shade, who
knows?
Solidifies into a blot which breaks
Hell's black off in pale flakes for fear of mine,—
Then, when I claim and take revenge — "So rash?"
They cry — "so little reverence for the law?"

Listen, my masters, and distinguish here!
At first, I called in law to act and help:
Seeing I did so, "Why, 'tis clear," they cry.
"You shrank from gallant readiness and risk,
Were coward: the thing's inexplicable also.

COUNT GUIDO FRANCESCHINI

Sweet my lords, let the thing be! I fall flat,
Play the rood, not the oak, to breath of man.
Only, inform my ignorance! Say I stand
Convicted of the having been afraid.
Proved a poltroon, no lion but a lamb,—
Does that deprive me of my right of lamb?
And give my fleece and flesh to the first wolf?
Are cunning, women, children, shieldless quite
Against attack their own timidity tempts?
Cowardice were misfortune and no crime!
—Take it that way, since I am fallen so low
I scarce dare brush the fly that blows my face,
And thank the man who simply spits not there.

Unless the Court be generous, comprehend
How one brought up at the very feet of law
As I await the grave Gambier's nod —
Ere he clench fist at outrage,— much less, much
—how ready enough to rise at the right time,
I still could recognize no time mature
Unsanctioned by a move o' the judgment-seat,
So mute in misery, eyed my masters here
Motionless till the authoritative word
Pronounced amercement. There's the riddle solved:
This is just why I slew nor her nor him,
But called in law, law's delegate in the place,
And bade arrest the guilty couple, Sira!
We had some trouble to do so—you have heard

They braved me,—he with arrogance and scorn,
She, with a volubility of course,
A conversancy in the skill of tooth
And claw to make suspicion seem absurd,
Nay, an alacrity to put to proof
At my own throat my own sword, teach me so
To try conclusions better the next time,—
Which did the proper service with the mob.
They never tried to put on mask at all:
Two avowed lovers forcibly torn apart,
Upbraid the tyrant as in a playhouse scene,
Ay, and with proper clapping and applause
From the audience that enjoys the bold and free.
I kept still, said to myself, "There's law!"

We searched the chamber where they passed the night,
Found what confirmed the worst was feared before,
However needless confirmation now—
The witches' circle intact, charms undisturbed
That raised the spirit, and succubus,—letters, to wit, Breaks in let her again
Love-laden, each the bag o' the bee that bore.
Honey from lily and rose to Cupid's hive,—
Now, poetry in some rank blossom-burst,
Now, prose,— "Come here, go there, wait such a while,
He's at the villa, now he's back again:
We are saved, we are lost, we are lovers all the same!

All in order, all complete,—even to a clue
To the drossiness that happed so opportunely
No mystery, when I read, "Of all things, find
What wine Sir Jealousy decides to drink—

Red wine? Because a sleeping-potion, dust Dropped into white, discolors wine and shows."
—"Oh, but we did not write a single word!
Somebody forged the letters in our name! —"
Both in a breath protested presently.
Ah, Sacchetti again!—"Dame,—quoth the Duke,
"What meaneth this epistle, counsel me,
I pick from out thy placet and purse,
Wherein my page averreth thou art white
And warm and wonderful "twixt pap and pop?"
"Sir," laughed the Lady, "'tis a counterfei!
The page did never stroke but Dian's breast,
The pretty hound I nurture for thy sake:
To lie were losel, —by my say, no more!"
And no more say I too, and spare the Court.

Ah, the Court! yes, I come to the Court's self;
Such the case, so complete in fact and proof,
I laid at the feet of law,—there sat my lords,
Here sit they now, so may they ever sit
In easier attitude than suits my haunch!
In this same chamber did I bare my soul
O' the soul and not the body,—abun no shame,
Shrink from no probing of the ulterior part,
Since confident in Nature,—which is God,—
That she who, for wise ends, concocts a plague,
Curbs, at the right time, the plague's virulence too:

Law renovates even Lazarus,—cures me!
Cesar thou seekst? To Caesar thou shalt go!
Cesar's at Rome: to Rome accordingly!

The case was soon decided: both weights cast
I' the balance, vibrate, neither kicks the beam,
Here away, there away, this now and now that.
To every o' my grievances law gave
Redress, could purlbind eye but see the point.
The wife stood a convicted runagate
From house and husband,—driven to such a course
By what she somehow took for cruelty,
Oppression and impertinence of life
Not that such things were, but that so they seemed:
Therefore, the end conceded lawful, (since
To save life there's no risk should stay our leap)
It follows that all means to the lawful end
Are lawful likewise,—poison, theft and flight.
As for the priest's part, did he meddle or make,
Enough that he too thought life jeopardised;
Concede him then the color charity
Casts on a doubtful course,—if blackish white
Or whitish black, will charity hesitate?
What did he else but act the precept out,
Leave, like a provident shepherd, his safe flock
To follow the single lamb and stray away?
Best hope so and think so,—that the ticklish time
I' the carriage, the tempting privacy, the last
Somewhat ambiguous accident at the inn,
—All may bear explanation: may? then, must!
The letters,—do they so incriminate?
But what if the whole prove a prank o' the pen,
THE RING AND THE BOOK

Flight of the fancy, none of theirs at all,
Bred of the vapors of my brain belike,
Or at worst mere exercise of scholar's-wit
In the courtly Caponsacchi: verse, convict?
Did not Catullus write less seemly once?
Yet doctus et emblematibus he abides.
Wherefore so ready to infer the worst?
Still, I did righteousness in bringing doubts
For the law to solve, — take the solution now!
"Seeing that the said associates, wife and priest, Bears themselves not without some touch of blame,"
— Else why the pother, scandal and outcry
Which trouble our peace and require chastisement?
We, for complicity in Pomphilia's flight
And deviation, and carnal intercourse
With the same, do set aside and relegate
The Canon Caponsacchi for three years
At Civita in the neighborhood of Rome:
And we consign Pomphilia to the care
Of a certain Sisterhood of penitents.
I' the city's self, expert to deal with such."
Word for word, there's your judgment! Read it, lords,
Re-utter your deliberate penalty
For the crime yourselves establish! Your award —
Who chop a man's right-hand off at the wrist
For treason with forefinger words in wine
O' the table of a drinking-booth that bear
Interpretation as they mocked the Church!
— Who brand a woman black between the breasts.
For sinning by connection with a Jew:
While for the Jew's self — pudency be dumb! —
You mete out punishment such and such, yet so
Punish the adultery of wife and priest!
Take note of that, before the Molinists do,
And read me right the riddle, since right must be!
While I stood rapt away with wonderment,
Voices broke in upon my mood and muse.
"Do you sleep?" began the friends at either ear,
"The case is settled, — you willed it should be
None of our counsel, always recollect!
With law's award, budge! Back into your place!
Your betters shall arrange the rest for you.
We'll enter a new action, claim divorce:
Your marriage was a cheat themselves allow:
You erred? i' the person, — might have married thus
Your sister or your daughter unaware.
We'll gain you, that way, liberty at least.
Sure of so much by law's own showing.
Up and off with you and your unluckiness —
Leave us to bury the blunder, sweep things smooth!"
I was in humble frame of mind, be sure!
I bowed, betook me to my place again.
Stationed at the station I retraced the road.
Touched at this hostel, passed this post-house by,
Where, fresh-remembered yet, the fugitives
Had risen to the heroic stature: still —

"That was the bench they sat on, — there's the board.
They took the meal at, — yonder garden-grove
They leaned across the gate of, — ever a word
O' the Helen and the Paris, with "Ha! you're he,
The much-commissierated husband!"
Step
By step, across the pelting, did I reach
Arezzo, underwent the archway's grin,
Traversed the length of sarcasm in the street.
Found myself in my horrible house once more,
And after a colloquy... no word assists!
With the mother and the brothers, stiffened me
Straight out from head to foot as dead man does,
And, thus prepared for life as he for hell,
Marched to the public Square and met the world.

Ply me with such toy-trifles, I entreat!
Trust who has tried both sulphur and sopiswine!

I played the man as I best might, bade friends
Put non-essentials by and face the fact.
"What need to hang myself as you advise?
The paramour is banished, — the ocean's width.
Or the suburb's length, — to Ultima Thule, say.
Or Proxima Civitas, what's the odds of name
And place? He's banished, and the fact's the thing.
Why should law banish innocence an inch?
Here's guilt then, what else do I care to know?
The adulteress lies imprisoned, — whether in
With bricks above and a mako for company,

Or tied by a garter to a bedpost, — much
I mind what's little, — least's enough and too

The little fillip on the coward's cheek
Serves be, though crab-tree cudgel breaks his pate.

The case is settled, — you willed it should be
None of our counsel, always recollect!
With law's award, budge! Back into your place!
Your betters shall arrange the rest for you.
We'll enter a new action, claim divorce:
Your marriage was a cheat themselves allow:
You erred? i' the person, — might have married thus
Your sister or your daughter unaware.
We'll gain you, that way, liberty at least.
Sure of so much by law's own showing.
Up and off with you and your unluckiness —
Leave us to bury the blunder, sweep things smooth!"
I was in humble frame of mind, be sure!
I bowed, betook me to my place again.
Stationed at the station I retraced the road.
Touched at this hostel, passed this post-house by,
Where, fresh-remembered yet, the fugitives
Had risen to the heroic stature: still —

Law has pronounced there's punishment, less or more:
And I take note o' the fact and use it thus —
For the first flaw in the original bond,
I claim release. My contract was to wed
The daughter of Pietro and Violante. Both Protest they never had a child at all.
Then I have never made a contract: good!
Cancel me quick the thing pretended one.
I shall be free. What matter if hurried over
The harbor-boom by a great favoring tide,
Or the last of a spent ripple that lifts and leaves?
The Abate is about it. Laugh who wins!
You shall not laugh me out of faith in law!
I listen, through all your noise, to Rome!"

Rome spoke.
In three months letters thence admonished me,
"Your plan for the divorce is all mistake.
It would hold, now, had you, taking thought to word'

Rachel of the blue eye and golden hair.
Found swarthy-skinned Leah cumber couch
next day:
But Rachel, blue-eyed golden-haired aight.
Proving to be only Laban’s child, not Lot’s,
Remains yours all the same for evermore.
No whit to the purpose is your plea: you err
I the person and the quality — nowise.
In the individual, that’s the case in point!
You go to the ground, — are met by a cross-suit.
For separation, of the Rachel here,
From bed and board, — she is the injured one,
You did the wrong and have to answer it.
As for the circumstance of imprisonment
And color it lends to this your new attack,
Never fear, that point is considered too!
The durance is already at an end;
The convent-quiet preyed upon her health,
She is transferred now to her parents’ house
— No-parents, when that ‘cheats and plunders
you,
But parentage again confessed in full,
When such confession pricks and plagues you
more —
As now — for this their house is not the house
In Via Vittoria wherein neighbours’ watch
Might incommode the freedom of your wife,
But a certain villa smothered up in vines
At the town’s edge by the gate ‘t the Pauline
way,
Out of eye-reach, out of ear-shot, little and lone,
Whither a friend, — at Civita, we hope,
A good half-dozen-hours’ ride off, — might,
some eye,
Betak’d to itself, and whence ride back, some morn,
Nobody the wiser: but be that as it may,
Do not affright your brains with trifles now.
You have still three suits to manage, all and each
Ruinos truly should the event play false.
It is indeed the likelier so to do,
That brother Paul, your single prop and stay,
After a vain attempt to bring the Pope to set aside procedures, sit himself
And summarily use prerogative,
Afford us the infallible finger’s tact
to dissuine your tangle of affairs,
Paul, — finding it moreover past his strength
To stem the irruption, bear Rome’s ridicule
Of... since friends must speak... to be round with you...
Of the old outwitted husband, wronged and wroth,
Pitied against a brace of juveniles —
A brisk priest who is versed in Ovid’s art
More than his ‘Summa,’ and a gamewife some
Able to act Corinna without book,
Beside the wagish parents who played dupes to dupe the duper — (and truly divers scenes
Of the Arazzo palace, tickle rib
And tease eye till the tears come, so we laugh;
Nor wants the shock at the inn its comic force,
And then the letters and poetry — merum sol)
— Paul, finally, in such a state of things,
After a brief temptation to go jump
And join the fishes in the Tiber, drows
Sorrow another and a wiser way:
House and goods, he has sold all off, is gone,
Leaves Rome — whether for France or Spain,
Who knows?
Or Britain almost divided from our orb.

You have lost him anyhow.”
Shift in their seat, — would I could do the same!
They probably please expect my bile was moved.
To purpose, nor much blame me: now, they judge.
The fiery vitillation urged my flesh
Break through the bonds. By your pardon, no, sweet Sirs!
I got such missives in the public place;
When I sought home, — with such news, mounted state,
And sat at last in the sombre gallery.
’T was Autumn, the old mother in bed betimes,
Having to bear that cold, the finer frame
Of her daughter-in-law had found intolerable.
The brother, walking misery away
O’ the mountain-side with dog and gun belike.
As I supposed, ate the coarse bread, drank the wine
Weak once, now acid with the toad’s-head squeeze.
My wife’s bestowment, — I broke silence thus:
“Let me, a man, manfully meet the fact
Confront the worst o’ the truth, end, and have peace!
I am irretrievably beaten here,
The gross illiterate vulgar couple, — bah!
Why, they have measured forces, mastered mine,
Made me their spoil and prey from first to last.
They have got my name, — ’t is nailed now fast to theirs.
The child or changeling is anyway my wife;
Point by point as they plan they execute,
They gain all, and I lose all — even to the lure
That led to loss, — they have the wealth again
They hazarded awhile to hook me with,
Have caught the fish and find the bait entire:
They even have their child or changeling back
To trade with, turn to account a second time.
The brother, presumably might tell a tale
Or give a warning, — he, too, flies the field,
And with him vanish help and hope of help.
They have caught me in the cavern where I fell,
Covered my loudest cry for human aid
With this enormous paving-stone of shame.
Well, are we demigods or merely clay?
Is success still attendant on desert?
In this, we live on, heaven’s and the final state,
Or earth which means probation to the end?
Why claim escape from man’s predestined lot
Of being eaten and baffled? — God’s decree,
In which I, bowing bruised head, acquiesce.
One of us Franceschini fell long since
I’ the Holy Land, betrayed, tradition runs,
To Paynims by the feigning of a girl
He rushed to free from ravisher, and found
Lay safe enough with friends in ambuscade
Who flayed him while she clapped her hands
And laughed.
Let me end, falling by a like device.
It will not be so hard. I am the last
O’ my line which will not suffer any more.
I have attained to my full fifty years,
(About the average of us all, 'tis said,
Though it seems longer to the unlucky man)
— Lived through my share of life; let all end
here,
Me and the house and grief and shame at once.
Friends my informants,— I can bear your blow!"

And I believe 't was in no unmeet match
For the stoic's mood, with something like a smile,
That, when morose December roused me next,
I took into my hand, broke seal to read
The new epistle from Rome. "All to no use!
Whate'er the turn next injury take," smiled I,
"Here's one has chosen his part and knows his one."

I am done with, dead now; strike away, good
friends!

Are the three suits decided in a trice?
Against me,— there 's no question! How does it go?

Is the parental of my wife demonstrated
Infamous to her wish? Paradise she now
Loosed of the circlet that so irked the loan?
Is the last penny extracted from my purse
To mulet me for demanding the first pound
Was promised in return for valne paid?
Has the priest, with nobody to court beside,
Courted the Muse in exile, hitched my hap
Into a rattling ballad-rhyme which, bawled
At tavern-doors, wakes rapture everywhere,
And helps cheap wine down throat this Christmas time,

Beating the bagpipes? Any or all of these!
As well, good friends, you cursed my palace
here
To its old cold stone face,— stuck your cap for great.

Over the shield that's extant in the Square,—
Or spat on the statue's cheek, the impatient
world

Sees ember tomb-top in our family church:
Let him creep under covert as I shall do,
Half below-ground already indeed. Good-by!
My brethren are priests, and childless so; that's
well—

And, thank God most for this, no child leave
I—

None after me to bear till his heart break
The being a Francescochini and my son!"

"Nay," said the letter, "but you have just
that!
A babe, your veritable son and heir—
Lawful,— 't is only eight months since your
wife

Left you,— so, son and heir, your babe was born

Last Wednesday in the villa, — you see the caisé

For quitting Convent without beat of drum,
Stealing a hurried march to this retreat
That 's not so savage as the Sisterhood
To slips and stumbles: Pietro's heart is soft,
Violante leans to pity's side, — the pair
Unshored you into life a bouncing boy:
And he's already hidden away and safe
From any claim on him you mean to make——

They need him for themselves, — don't fear,
they know
The use o' the bantling, — the nerve thus laid bare
To nip at, new and nice, with finger-nail!"

Then I rose up like fire, and fire-like roared.
What, all is only beginning not ending now?
The worm which wormed its way from skis
through flesh

To the bone and there lay biting, did its best.
— What, it goes on to scrape at the bone's self.
Will wind in inmost marrow and madden me?
There 's to be yet my representative,
Another of the name shall keep displayed
The flag with the ordure on it, brandish still
The broken sword has served to stir a jakes?
Who will he be, how will you call the man?
A Francescochini, — when who cut my purse.
Filched my name, hemmed me round, hustled me hard

As rogues at a fair some fool they strip i' the midst,
When these count gains, vaunt pillage presently: —

But a Caponsacchi, oh, be very sure!
When what demands its tribute of applause
Is the pomposity and impudence o' the pair of cheats.

The lies and lust o' the mother, and the braw
Bold carriage of the priest, worthily crowned
By a witness to his feat i' the following age. —

And how this threefold cord could hook and fetch

And land leviathan that king of pride!
Or say, by some mad miracle of chance,
Is he indeed my flesh and blood, this babe?
Was it because fate forged a link at last
Betwixt my wife and me, and both alike Found we had henceforth some one thing to
love,

Was it when she could damn my soul indeed
She unlatched door, let all the devils o' the dark
Dance in on me to cover her escape?
Why then, the surplintage of disgrace, the splith

Over and above the measure of infamy,
Falling to take effect on my coarse flesh
Seasoned with scorn now, saturete with abuse,—

Is saved to instil on and corrode the brow,
The baby-softness of my first-born child—
The child I had died to see though in a dream,
The child I was bid strike out for, beat the wave

And baffle the tide of troubles where I swam.
So I might touch shore, lay down life at last
At the feet so dim and distant and divine
Of the apparition, as 't were Mary's babe
Had held, through night and storm, the torch afloat.
Born now in very deed to bear this brand
On forehead and curse me who could not save!
Rather be the town-talk true, Square's jest
street's jeer

True, my own inmost heart's confession true,
And he, the priest's bastard and none of mine!
COUNT GUIDO FRANCESCHINI

Ay, there was cause for flight, swift flight and sore !
The husband gets unruly, breaks all bounds
When he encounters some familiar face,
Fashion of feature, brow and eyes and lips
Where he least looked to find them, — time to fly !
This cowardly then, a nest for him is made,
As the manner is of vermin, in my flesh —
Shall I let the filthy pest buzz, flap and sting,
Busy at my vitals and, nor hand nor foot
Lift, but let be, lie still and rot resigned ?
No, I appeal to God, — what says himself,
How lessen Nature when I look to learn ?
Why, that I am alive, am still a man
With brain and heart and tongue and right-hand too —
Nay, even with friends, in such a cause as this,
To right me if I fail to take my right.
No more of law; a voice beyond the law
Enters my heart, _Quis est pro Domino ?_

Myself, in my own Vittiano, told the tale,
To my own serving-people summoned there:
Told that my conduct of it I heard to end
By judges who got done with judgment quick
And clamored to go execute her hest —
Who cried, "Not one of us that dig your soil
And dress your vineyard, prune your olive-trees.
But would have brained the man debouched our
wife,
And staked the wife whose last allured the man,
And paneched the Duke, had it been possible,
Who ruled the land, yet barred us such revengan ce !" I
I fixed on the first whose eyes caught mine, some four
Resolute youngsters with the heart still fresh,
Filled my purse with the residue o’ the coin Uncaught-up by my wife whom haste made blind,
Dennis the first rough and rural garb I found,
Took whatsoever weapon came to hand,
And out we flung and on we ran or reeled
Remeward. I have no memory of our way,
Only that, when at intervals the cloud
Of terror over me opened to let in life,
I listened to some song in the ear, some snatch
Of a legend, relic of religion, story
Fragment of record very strong and old
Of the first conscience, the anterior right,
The God’s-gift to mankind, impulse to quench
The antagonistic spark of hell and tread
Satan and all his malice into dust,
Declare to the world the one law, right is right.
Then the cloud re-encompassed me, and so
I found myself, as on the wings of wind,
Arrived : I was at Rome on Christmas Eve,

Festive bells — everywhere the Feast o’ the Babe,
Joy upon earth, peace and good will to man !
I am baptized. Started and let drop
The burden. "Where is it, his promised peace ?"
Nine days o’ the Birth-Feast did I pause and pray
To enter into no temptation more,
I bore the hateful house, my brother’s once,
Deserted, — let the ghost of social joy
Mock and make mouths at me from empty room
And idle door that missed the master’s step, —
Bore the frank wonder of incredulous eyes,
As my own people watched without a word.
Waited, from where they huddled round the hearth
Black like all else, that nod so slow to come.
I stopped my ears even to the inner call
Of the dread duty, only heard the song
"Peace upon earth," saw nothing but the face
O’ the Holy Infant and the halo there
Able to cover yet another face
Behind it, Satan’s which I else should see.
But, day by day, joy waned and withered off:
The Babe’s face, premature with peak and pine,
Sank into wrinkled ruinous old age,
Suffering and death, then mist-like disapppeared,
And showed only the Cross at end of all
Left nothing more to interpose ‘twixt me
And the dread duty, — for the angels’ song,
"Peace upon earth," louder and louder pealed,
"O Lord, how long, how long be avenged ?"
On the ninth day, this grew too much for man.
I started up — "Some end must be !" At once,
Silence: then, scratching like a death-watch-
tick,
Slowly within my brain was syllabled,
"One more concession, one decisive way
And but one, to determine the truth, —
This way, I whisper in thy ear—
Now doubt, anon decide, thereupon act !

"That is a way, thou whisperest in my ear !
I doubt, I will decide, then act," said I — Then beckoned my companions: "Time is come !"

And so, all yet uncertain save the will
To do right, and the daring aught save leave
Right undone, I did find myself at last
I’ the dark before the villa with my friends,
And made the experiment, the final test,
Ultimate chance that ever was to be
For the wretchedness inside. I knocked — pronounced
The name, the predetermined touch for truth,
"What welcome for the wanderer? Open straight —
To the friend, physician, friar upon his rounds,
Traveller belated, beggar lame and blind?
No, but — "to Caponscach !" And the door Opened.

And then, — why, even then, I think,
I’ the minute that confirmed my worst of fears.
Surely, — I pray God that I think aright ! —
Had but Pompeila’s self, the tender thing
Who once was good and pure, was once my lamb
And lay in my bosom, had the well-known shape

THE RING AND THE BOOK

Fronted me in the doorway, — stood there faint
With the recent pang, perhaps, of giving birth
To what might, though by miracle, seem my child.
Nay more, I will say, had even the aged fool
Pietro, the dotard, in whom folly and age
Wrought, more than enmity or malevolence,
To practise and conspire against my peace,—
Had either of these but opened, I had paused.
But it was she the hag, she that brought hell
For a dowry with her to her husband's house,
She the mock-mother, she that made the match
And married me to perdition, spring and source
O' the fire inside me that boiled up from heart
To brain and nailed the Fury gave it birth,—
Violante Comparini, she it was,
With the old grin amid the wrinkles yet,
Opened: as if in turning from the Cross,
With trust to keep the night and save my soul,
I had stumbled, first thing, on the serpent's head
Coiled with a leer at foot of it.
There was the end!
Then was I rapt away by the impulse, one
Immeasurable everlasting wave of a need
To abolish that detected life. "It was done:
You know the rest and how the folds o' the thing,
Twisting for help, involved the other two
More or less serpent-like: how I was mad,
Blind, stamped on all, the earth-worms with hemp
And ended so.
You came on me that night,
Your officers of justice, — caught the crime
In the first natural frenzy of remorse?
Twenty miles off, sound sleeping as a child
On a cloud! the straw which promised shelter first.
With the bloody arms beside me, — was it not so?
Wherefore not? Why, how else should I be found
I was my own self, had my sense again,
My soul safe from the serpents. I could sleep:
Indeed and, dear my lords, I shall sleep now,
Spite of my shoulder, in five minutes' space,
When you dismiss me, having truth enough!
It is but a few days are passed, I find,
Since this adventure. Do you tell me, four?
Then the dead are scarce quiet where they lie,
Old Pietro, old Violante, side by side
At the church Lorenzo, — oh, they know it well!
So do I. But my wife is still alive,
Has breath enough to tell her story yet,
Her way, which is not mine, no doubt at all.
And Caponassachi, you have summoned him,
Was he so far to send for? Not at hand?
I thought some few o' the stabs were in his heart,
Or had not been so lavish: less had served.
Well, he too tells his story,—florid prose
As smooth as mine is rough. You see, my lords,
There will be a lying intoxicating smoke

Born of the blood, — confusion probably,—
For lies breed lies — but all that rests with you!
The trial is no concern of mine; with me
The mask of the care is over: I at least
Recognize who took that huge burden off,
Let me begin to live again. I did
God's bidding and man's duty, so, breathe free;
Look you to the rest! I heard Himself present
That great Physician, and dared lance the core
Of the bad ulcer; and the rage abates,
I am myself and whole now: I proved cured
By the eyes that see, the ears that hear again.
The limbs that have relearned their youthful play,
The healthy taste of food and feel of clothes
And taking to our common life once more,
All that now urge my defence from death.
The willingness to live, what means it else?
Before,— but let the very action speak!
Judge for yourselves, what life seemed worth to me
Who, not by proxy but in person, pitched
Head foremost into danger as a fool
That never cares if he can swim or no —
So he but find the bottom, braves the brook.
No man omits precaution, quite neglects
Secrets, safety, schemes not how retreat,
Having schemed he might advance. Did I so scheme?
Why, with a warrant which 'tis ask and have,
With horn thereby made mine without a word,
I had gained the frontier and slept safe that night.
Then, my companions,—call them what you please,
Slave or stipendary,—what need of one
To me whose right-hand did its owner's work?
Hire an assassin yet expose yourself?
As well buy glove and then thrust naked hand
I' the thorn-bush. No, the wise man stays at home,
Sends his agents out, with pay to earn:
At home, when they come back, — he straight discards
Or else disowns. Why use such tools at all
When a man's foes are of his house, like mine,
Sit at his board, sleep in his bed? Why noise,
When there's the acquett and the silent way?
Clearly my life was valueless.

But now
Health is returned, and sanity of soul
Nowise indifferent to the body's harm.
I find the instinct bids me save my life;
My wits, too, rally round me; I pick up
And use the arms that strove the ground before,
Unnoticed or spurned aside: I take my stand,
Make my defence. God shall not lose a life
May do him further service, while I speak
And you hear, you my judges and last hope!
You are the law: 'tis to the law I look.
I began life by hanging to the law,
To the law it is I hang till life shall end.
My brother made appeal to the Pope, 'tis true.
To stay proceedings, judge my cause himself
Nor trouble law,—some fondness of conest
That rectitude, sagacity sufficed
The investigator in a case like mine,
Dispensed with the machine of law. The Pope
Knew better, set aside his brother’s plea
And put me back to law,—referred the cause
Ad judices meos,—doubtlessly did well.
Here, then, I clutch my judges,—I claim law—
Cry, by the higher law whereof your law
O’ the land is humbly representative,—
Cry, on what point is it, where either accuse,
I fail to furnish you defense? I stand Acquitted, actually or virtually,
By every intermediate kind of court
That takes account of right or wrong in man,
Each unit in the series that begins
With God’s throne, ends with the tribunal here.
God breathes, not speaks, his verdicts, felt not heard,
Passed on successively to each court I call Man’s conscience, custom, manners, all that make
More need more effort to promulgate, mark
God’s verdict in determinable words,
Till last come human juris—solidify
Final result,—what’s fixable lies forg’d,
Statute,—the residue escapes in fume,
Yet hangs aloft, a cloud, as palpable
To the finer sense as word the legist welds.
Justinian’s Pandects only make precise
What simply sparkled in men’s eyes before,
Twitched in their brow or quivered on their lip.
Waited the speech they called but would not come.
These courts then, whose decree your own confirma,
Take my whole life, not this last act alone,
Look on it by the light reflected thence! I
What has the world to charge me with? I Come, unrestrained,—favor none nor fear,—
I am Guido Franceschini, am I not?
You know the course I was free to take?
I took just that which let me serve the Church,
I gave it all my labor in body and soul
All these broke down I the service. “Specify?”
Well, my last patron was a Cardinal.
Left him unconvicted of a fault —
Was ever helped, by way of gratitude,
Into the new life that I left him for,
This very misery of the marriage,—he Made it, kind soul, so far as in him lay—
Signed the deed where you yet may see his name.
He is gone to his reward,—dead, being my friend
Who could have helped here also,—that, of course!
So far, there’s my acquittal, I suppose.
Then comes the marriage itself—no question, lords,
Of the entire invalidity of that!
In the extremity of distress, ’tis true,
For after-reasons, furnished abundantly,
I wished the thing invalid, went to you
Only some months since, set you duly forth
My wrong and prayed your remedy, that a cheat
Should not have force to cheat my whole life long.
“Annul a marriage? ’Tis impossible!
Though ring about your neck be brass not gold,
Needs must it cheap, gangrene you all the same!”
Well, let me have the benefit, just so far,
O’ the fact announced,—my wife then is my wife,
I have allowance for a husband’s right.
I am charged with passing right’s due bound,
—such acts
As I thought just, my wife called cruelty,
Complained of in due form,—convoked no court
Of common gossipry, but took her wrongs —
And not alone, but so long as patience served —
To the town’s top, jurisdiction’s pride of place,
To the Archbishop and the Governor.
These heard her charge with my reply, and found
That futile, this sufficient: they dismissed
The hysteric querulous rebel, and confirmed
Authority in its wholesome exercise.
They, with direst access to the facts,
“—Ay, for it was their friendship favored you,
Hereditary alliance against a breach
I’ the social order: prejudice for the name
Of Franceschini!” — So I hear it said:
But not here. You, lords, never will you say “Such is the nullity of grace and truth,
Such the corruption of the faith, such lapse
Of law, such warrant have the Molinists
For daring reprehend us as they do,—
That we pronounce it just a common case,
Two dignitaries, each in his degree
First, foremost, this the spiritual head, and that
The secular arm o’ the body politic,
Should, for mere wrongs’ love and injustice make,
Side with, aid and abet in cruelty
This broken beggarly noble, — bribed perhaps
By his watered wine and mouldy crust of bread—
Rather than that sweet tremulous flower-like wife
Who kissed their hands and curled about their feet
Looking the irresistible loveliness
In tears that takes man captive, turns”... enough!
Do you blast your predecessors? What forbids posterity to trebly blast yourselves
Who set the example and instruct their tongue?
You dreaded the crowd, succumbed to the popular cry,
Or else, would wisecracks seem deor thereto
And yield to public clamor though i’ the right?
You rided your eye of my unseemliness,
The noble whose misfortune wearied you,—
Or, what’s more probable, made common cause
With the clerical section, punished in myself
Maladroit uncomplaisant laity,
Defective in behavior to a priest
Who claimed the customary partnership
I’ the house and the wife. Lords, any lie will serve!
Look to it,—or allow me freed so far!
Then I proceed a step, come with clean hands
Thus far, re-tell the tale told eight months since.
The wife, you allow so far, I have not wronged,
Has fled my roof, plundered me and decamped
In company with the priest her paramour:
And I gave chase, came up with, caught the two
At the wayside inn where both had spent the night,
Found at last in flagrant fault, and found as well,
By documents with name and plan and date,
The fault was fertile then that's flagrant now,
Their intercourse a long established crime.
I did not take the license law's self gives
To slay both criminals o' the spot at the time,
But, by a chance, — preferred play prodigy
Of patience which the world calls cowardice,
Rather than seem anticipate the law
And cast discredit on its organs, — you.
So, to your bar I brought both criminals,
And made my statement: heard their counter-charge,
Nay, — their corroboration of my tale,
Nowise disputing its allegements, not
I' the main, not more than nature's decency
Compels men to keep silence in this kind, —
Only by warning that the deeds avowed
Would take another color and bear excuse.
You were to judge between us; so you did.
You disregard the excuse, you breathe away
The color of innocence and leave guilt black;
"Guilty" is the decision of the court,
And that I stand in consequence uncharged,
One white integrity from head to heel.
Not guilty? Why then did you punish them?
True, punishment has been inadequate —
"I'is not I only, not my friends that joke,
My foes that jeer, who echo "inadequate" —
For my own sufferings I crave to have relief,
The same case simultaneously was judged
At Arezzo, in the province of the Court
Where the crime had its beginning but not end.
They then, deciding on but half o' the crime,
The effraction, robbery, — features of the fault
I never cared to dwell upon at Rome,
What was it they adjudged as penalty
To Pompilia, — the one criminal o' the pair
Amenable to their judgment, not the priest
Who is Rome's? Why, just imprisonmen for life
I' the Stinche. There was Tuscany's award
To a wife that robs her husband: you at Rome

Having to deal with adultery in a wife
And, in a priest, breach of the priestly vow —
Give gentle sequestration for a month
In a manageable Convent, then release,
You call imprisonment, in the very house
O' the very couple, which the aim and end
Of the culprits' crime was — just to reach and test
And there take solace and defy me: well, —
This difference 'twixt their penalty and yours
Is immaterial: make your penalty less
Merely that she should henceforth wear black
And white fan, she who wore the opposite —
Why, all the same the fact o' the thing subsists.

Reconcile to your conscience as you may,
Be it on your own heads, you pronounced but ha
O' the penalty for heinousness like hers
And his, that pays a fault at Carnival
Of commit-pelting past discretion's law,
Or accident to handkerchief in Lent
Which falls perversely as a lady kneels
Abruptly, and but half conceals her neck!
I acquiesce for my part: punished, though
By a pin-point scratch, means guilty: guilty means
— What have I been but innocent hitherto?
Anyhow, here the offence, being punished, ends.

Ends? — for you deemed so, did you not, sweet lords?
That was throughout the veritable aim
O' the sentence light or heavy to redress
Recognised wrong? You righted me, I think?
Well then, — what if I, at this last of all,
Demonstrate you, as my whole pleading proves,
No particle of wrong received thereby
One atom of right? — that sure grew worse dis-

That in the process you call "justice done"
All along you have nipped away just inch
By inch the creeping climbing length of plague
Breaking my tree of life from root to branch.
And left me, after all and every act
Of your undisguised, — light as drop of what load?
At liberty wherein? Mere words and wind!
"Now I was saved, now I should feel no more
The hot breath, find a respite from fixed eye
And vibrant tongue!" Why, source your back was turned,
There was the reptile, that feigned death at first Renewing its detested spire and spire
Around me, rising to such heights of hate
That, so far from mere purpose now to crush
And coil itself on the remains of me,
Body and mind, and there flesh fang contest,
Its aim is now to evoke life from death
Make me anew, satisfy in my son
The hunger I may feed but never sate,
Tormented on to perpetuity
My son, whom dead, I shall know, understand,
Feel, hear, see, never more escape the sight
In heaven that's turned to hell, or hell re-

(So rather say) to this same earth again,
Moulded into the image and made one,
Fashioned of soul as featured like in face,
First taught to laugh and lip and stand and go
By that thief, poisoner and adulteress
I call Pompilia, he calls ... sacred name,
Be unpronounced, be unpolluted here!
And last led up to the glory and prize of hate
By his ... foster-father, Caponassachi's self.
The perjured priest, pink of conspirators,
Tricksters and knaves, yet polished, superfine,
Manhood to model adolescence by!
Lords, look on me, declare, — when, what I show,
Is nothing more nor less than what you deemed
And doled me out for justice,—what did you say?
For reparation, restitution and more,—
Will you not thank, praise, bid me to your breasts
For having done the thing you thought to do,
And thoroughly trampled out sin's life at last?
I have heightened phrase to make your soft speech serve,
Doubled the blow you but essayed to strike,
Carried into effect your mandate here
That else had fallen to ground: mere duty done,
Overact of the master just supplied
By zeal;‘tis the servant. I, being used to serve,
Have simply... what is it they charge me with?
Blackened again, made legible once more
Your own decree, not permanently writ,
Rightly conceived but all too faintly traced.
It reads efficient, now, commendatory,
A terror to the wicked, answers so
The mood o' the magistrate, the mind of law.
Absolve, then, me, law's more exequant!
Protect your own defender,—save me, Sirs!
It gives me life, give me my liberty,
My good name and my civic rights again!
It would be too fond, too complacent play
Into the hands o' the devil, should we lose
The game here, I for God: a soldier-bee
That yields his life, exonerate with the stroke
O' the torture-irons in their search for truth,— Hardly misfortune, and no fault at all."

VI

Answer you, Sirs? Do I understand aright?
Have patience! In this sudden smoke from hell,—
So things disguise themselves,—I cannot see
My own hand held thus broad before my face
And know it again. Answer you? Then that means Tell over twice what I, the first time, told
Six months ago:’t was here, I do believe;
Fronting you same three in this very room,
I stood and told you: yet now no one laughs,
Who then... nay, dear my lords, but laugh you did,
As good as laugh, what in a judge we style
Laughter—no levity, nothing indecorous, lords! Only,—I think I apprehend the mood:
There was the blameless shrug, permissible smirk,
The pen's pretense at play with the pursed mouth.
The titter stifled in the hollow palm
Which rubbed the eyebrow and caressed the nose,
When I first told my tale: they meant, you know.

"The dly one, all this we are bound believe!
Well, he can say no other than what he says.
We have been young, too,—come, there's greater guilt!
Let him but decently disembroil himself,
Scramble from out the scrape nor move the mud,—
We solid ones may risk a finger-stretch!"
And now you sit as grave, stare as aghast
As if I were a phantom: now 'tis—"Friend, Collect yourself!"—no laughing matter more—
"Counsel the Court in this extremity Tell us again!"—tell that, for telling which,
I got the jocular piece of punishment,
Was sent to lounge a little in the place
Whence now of a sudden here you summon me
To take the intelligence from just — your lips! —
You, Judge Tommati, who then tittered most, —
That she I helped eight months since to escape
Her husband, was retaken by the same,
Three days ago, if I have seized your sense, —
(I being disallowed to interfere,
Meddle or make in a matter none of mine,
For you and law were guardians quite enough
O' the innocent, without a pert priest's help) —
And that he has butchered her accordingly,
As she foretold and as myself believed, —
And, so foretelling and believing so,
We were punished, both of us, the merry way:
Therefore, tell once again the tale! For what?
Pompilia is only dying while I speak!
Why does the mirth hang fire and miss the smile?
My masters, there's an old book, you should con
For strange adventures, applicable yet,
'Tis stuffed with. Do you know that there was one
This thing: a multitude of worthy folk
Took recreation, watched a certain group
Of soldiery intent upon a game, —
How first they wrangled, but soon fell to play,
Threw dice, — the best diversions in the world.
A word in your ear, — they are now casting lots,
Ay, with that gesture quaint and cry unco,th,
For the cost of One murdered an hour ago!
I am a priest, — talk of what I have learned.
Pompilia is bleeding out her life belike,
Gasping away the latest breath of all,
This very while, while I talk — not while you laugh.

Yet, being sobered now, what is it you ask
By way of explanation? There's the fact!
It seems to fill the universe with sight
And sound — from the four corners of this earth
Tells itself over, to my sense at least.
But you may want it lower set i' the scale, —
Too vast, too close it clings in the ear, perhaps;
You 'd stand back just to comprehend it more.
Well then, let me, the hollow rock, condense
The voice o' the sea and wind, interpret you
The mystery of this murder. God above!
It is too paltry, such a transference
O' the storm's roar to the canny of the stone!

This deed, you saw begin — why does its end
Surprise you? Why should the event enforce
The lesson, we ourselves learned, she and I,
From the first o' the fact, and taught you, all in vain?
This Guide from whose throat you took my grasp,
Was this man to be favored, now, or feared,
Let do his will, or have his will restrained,
In the relation with Pompilia? — say I!
Did any other man need interpose
— Oh, though first comer, though as strange at the work
As friable must be, coxcomb, fool that's near
To knave as, say, a priest who fears the world —
Was he bound brave the peril, save the doomed,
Go on, sing his snatch and pluck his flower,

Keep the straight path and let the victim die?
I held so; you decided otherwise,
Saw no such peril, therefore no such need
To stop song, loosen flower, and leave path
law.
Law was aware and watching, would suffice,
Wanted no priest's intrusion, palpable,
Pretext, too manifest an appearance! —
Whereupon I, priest, coxcomb, trifle and feel
Ensnared me in my corner, thus rebuked,
A kidnap culprit, over-gaulous bound
Kinked for his pain to kenpel; I gave place
To you, and let the law reign paramount;
I left Pompilia to your watch and ward.
And now you point me — there and thus do lies! — — —

Men, for the last time, what do you want with me?
Is it, — you acknowledge, as it were, a use,
A profit in employing me? — at length
I may conceivably help the august law?
I am free to break the blow, next hawk the swoops
On next dove, nor miss much of good repute?
Or what if this your summons, after all,
Be but the form of mere release, no more,
Which takes the boy and lets the thief go? I have paid enough in person at Civita,
Am free, — what more need I concern me with?
Thank you! I am rehabilitated then,
A very reputable priest. But she —
The glory of life, the beauty of the world,
The splendor of heaven — well, Sirs, does no one move?
Do I speak ambiguously? The glory, I say,
And the beauty, I say, and splendor, still say I.
Who, priest and trained to live my whole life long
On beauty and splendor, solely at their source.
God, — have thus recognized my food in her.
You tell me, that 's fast dying while we talk,
Pompilia! How does lenity to me
Remit one death-bed pang to her? Come, say that!
The proper wink at the hot-headed youth
Who lets his soul show, through transparent words,
The mundane love that 's sin and scandal too!
You are all struck acquiescent now, it seems:
It seems the oldest, gravest signor here,
Even the redoubtable Tommati, sits Chopfallen, — understands how law might take
Service like mine, of brain and heart and hand,
In good part. Better late than never, law!
You understand of a sudden, gospel too
Has a claim here, may possibly pronounce
Consistent with my priesthood, worthy Christ,
That I endeavored to save Pompilia?

Then,
You were wrong, you see: that's well to see,
though late:
That 's all we may expect of man, this side
The grave: his good is — knowing he is bad:
Thus will it be with us when the books ope
And we stand at the bar on judgement-day.
Well then, I have a mind to speak, see cause
GIUSEPPE CAPONSACCHI

To resume the quenched flax by this dreadful light,
Burn my soul out in showing you the truth.
I heard, last time I stood here to be judged,
What is priest’s duty,— labor to pluck tares
And weed the corn of Molinism; let me
Make you hear, this time, how, in such a case,
Man, be he in the priesthood or at plough,
Might as well harvest or destroy:
With... what’s his style, the other potestate
Who bids have courage and keep honor safe,
Nor let minute admonition tease? —
How he is bound, better or worse, to act.
Earth will not end through this misjudgment, no!

For you and the others like you sure to come,
Fresh work is sure to follow,— wickedness
That wants withstanding. Many a man of blood,
Many a man of guile will clamor yet.
Bid you redress his grievance,— as he clutched
The prey, forsooth a stranger stepped between,
And there’s the good gripe in pure waste! My part
Is done: I the doing it, I pass away.

Out of the world: I want no more with earth.
Let me, in heaven’s name, use the very stuff
O’ the taper in one last spark shall show truth
For a moment, show Pomplia who was true!
Not for her sake, but yours: if she is dead,
Oh, Sire, she can be loved by none of you
Most or least priestly! Saints, to do us good,
Must be in heaven, or we must not be there.
We never find them saints before, at least.
Be her first prayer then presently for you—
She has done the good to me.

There, I was born, have lived, shall die, a fool!
This is a foolish outseat:— might with cause
Give color to the very lie o’ the man,
The murderer, — make as if I loved his wife
In the way he called love. He is the fool there!
Why, had there been in me the touch of taint,
I had picked up so much of knaves’—policy
As hide it, keep one hand pressed on the place
Suspected of a spot would damn us both. Or no, not her! — not even if any of you
Dares think that I, in the face of death, her death
That’s in my eyes and ears and brain and heart,
Lie,— if he does, let him! I mean to say,
So he stop there, stay thought from smirching her
The snow-white soul that angels fear to take Untenderly. But, all the same, I know
I too am tarnished, and I bare my breast.
You can’t think, men as you are, all of you,
But that, to hear thus suddenly such an end
Of such a wonderful white soul, that comes
Of a man and murderer calling the white black,
Must shake me, trouble and disadvantage.

Sire,
Only seventeen!

Why, good and wise you are!
You might at the beginning stop my mouth:
So once would be to speak for her, that knew.
I talk impertinently, and you bear,

All the same. This it is to have to do
With honest hearts: they easily may err,
But in the main they wish well to the truth.
You are Christians; somehow, no one ever plucked
A rag, even, from the body of the Lord,
To wear and mock with, but, despite himself,
He looked the greater and was the better.
Yes, I shall go on now. Does she need or not
I keep calm? Calm I’ll keep as monk that croons
Transcribing battle, earthquake, famine, plague,
From parchment to his cloister’s chronicle.
Not one word more from the point now!

I begin.

Yes, I am one of your body and a priest.
Also I am a younger son o’ the House
Oldest now, greatest one, in my birth-town
Arezzo, I recognize no equal there—
(1 want all arguments, all sorts of arms
That seem to serve,— use this for a reason, wait!)
Not therefore thrust into the Church, because O’ the piece of bread one gets there. We were first
Of Fiesole, that rings still with the fame
Of Capo-in-Sacco our progenitor:—
When Florence ruined Fiesole, our folk
Migrated to the victor-city, and there
Flourished,— our palace and our tower attest,
In the Old Mercato,— this was years ago,
Four hundred, full,— no, it wants fourteen just.
Our arms are those of Fiesole itself,
The shield quartered with white and red: a branch
Are the Salviati of us, nothing more.
That were good help to the Church? But better still—
Not simply for the advantage of my birth
I’ the way of the world, was I proposed for priest;
But because there’s an illustration, late
I’ the day, that’s loved and looked to as a saint Still in Arezzo, he was bishop of,
Sixty years since: he spent to the last doit
His bishop’s-revenue among the poor,
And used to tend the needy and the sick,
Barefoot, because of his humility.
He it was,— when the Granduke Ferdinand
Swore he would raze our city, plough the place
And sow it with salt, because we Aretines
Had tied a rope about the neck, to hale
The statue of his father from its base
For hate’s sake,— he availed by prayers and tears.
To pacify the Duke and save the town.
This was my father’s father’s brother. You see,
For his sake, how it was I had a right
To the selfsame office, bishop in the egg;
So, grew I’ the garb and prattled in the school,
Was made expect, from infancy almost,
The proper mood o’ the priest; till time ran by
And brought the day when I must read the vows,
The Ring and the Book

Declare the world renounced, and undertake
To become priest and leave probation,—leap
Over the ledge into the other life,
Having gone trippingly hitherto up to the height
O'er the wan water. Just a vow to read!

I stopped short awe-struck. "How shall holiest flash
Engage to keep such vow inviolate,
How much less mine? I know myself too
weak,
Unworthy! Choose a worthier stronger man!"
And the very Bishop smiled and stopped my mouth
In its mid-protestation. "Incapable?
Qualmish of conscience? Thou ingenuous boy!
Clear up the clouds and cast thy scruples far!
I satisfy thee there's an easier sense
Wherein to take such vow than suits the first Rough rigid reading. Mark what makes all smooth,
Nay, has been even a solace to myself!
The Jews who needs must, in their synagogue,
Use sometimes the holy name of God;
A thing their superstition boggles at,
Pronounce aloud the ineffable sacrosanct,— How does their shrewdness help them? In this wise;
Another set of sounds they substitute,
Jumble so consonants and vowels — how Should I know? — that there grows from out the old
Quite a new word that means the very same—
And o'er the hard place slide they with a smile.
Giuseppe Maria Caponacchi mine,
Nobody wants you in these latter days
To prop the Church by breaking your backbone,—
As the necessary way was once, we know,
When Diocletian flourished and his like.
That building of Je's butane-work was done:
By martyrs and confessors: let it hide,
Add not a brick, but, where you see a chink,
Stick in a sprig of ivy or root a rose
Shall make amends and beautify the pile!
We profit as you were the painfulllest
O'er the martyrs, and you prove yourself a match
For the cruellest confessors ever was;
If you march boldly up and take your stand
Where their blood soaks, their bones yet strew
the soil,
And cry 'Take notice, I the young and free
And well-to-do' the world, thus leave the world,
Cast in my lot thus with no gay young world
But the grand old Church: she tempts me of the two!
Renounce the world? Nay, keep and give it us!
Let us have you, and boast of what you bring.
We want the pick o' the earth to practise with,
Not its offscouring, half and deaf and blind
In soul and body. There's a rubble-stone
Used for the front o' the building, stuff to stow
In a gap behind and keep us weather-tight;
There's porphyry for the prominent place;
Good lack!
Saint Paul has had enough and to spare, I trow,
Of ragged runaway Onesimus

He wants the right-hand with the signet-ring
Of King Agrippa, now, to shake and use.
I have a heavy scholar cloistered up,
Close under lock and key, kept at his task
Of letting Fénélon know the fool he is,
In a book I promise Christendom next Spring.
Why, if he cheats so much, methinks, the clown,
As a lack's wing next Friday, or, any day.
Diversion beyond catching his own fias.
He shall be properly swung, I promise him.
But you, who are so quite another paste
Of a man, do you obey me? Cultivate Avidious that superior gift you have
Of making madrigals — (who told me? Ah!)
Get done a Marissque Adoniad straight
With a pulse o' the blood a-pricking, here and
there,
That I may tell the lady, 'And he's ours!'

So I became a priest: those terms changed all,
I was good enough for that, nor cheated so;
I could live thus and still hold head erect.
Now you see why I may have been before
A frighted coxcomb, yet, as priest, break
word
Nowise, to make you disbelieve me now.
I need that you should know my truth. Well, then,
According to prescription did I live,
— Conformed myself, both read the breviary
And wrote the rhymes, was punctual to my place
I' the Pieve, and as diligent at my post.
Wheat's beauty and fashion rules. I throw space.
Sub-deacon, Canon, the authority
For delicate play at tarocchi and arbiter
O' the magnitude of far-mounts: all the while,
Wanting no whith the advantage of a hint
Benignant to the promising pupil, — thus:
"Enough attention to the Countess now,
The young one; 'tis her mother rules the roost.
We know where, and puts in a word: go pay
Devoir to-morrow morning after mass!
Break that rash promise to preach, Passion-week!
Has it escaped you the Archbishop grants
And allows when one grieves to tell his Grace
No soul dares treat the subject of the day
Since his own masterly handling it (ha, ha!)
Five years ago,—when somebody could help
And touch up an odd phrase in time of need.
(He, he!) — and somebody helps you, my son.
Therefore, don't prove so indispensable
At the Pieve, sit more loose i' the seat nor grow
A figure by attendance morn and eve!
Arezzo's a haven midway—Rome
—Rome 's the eventual harbor,— make for port.
Crowd sail, crack cording! And your cargo be polished presence, a genteel manner, wit
It will, and tact at every pore of you!
I sent our lamp of learning, Brother Cleant,
And Father Slouch, our piece of pisty,
To see Rome and try suit the Cardinal.
Thither they clump-clumped, beads and book
in hand,
And ever since 'tis meat for man and maid
How both flapped down, prayed blessing on the best at ease
Bald many an inch beyond the tonsure's need,
Never once dreaming, the two moony dolts,
There's nothing moves his Eminence so much
As—far from all this awe at sanctitude—
Heads that wag, eyes that twinkle, modified mirth.

At the closet-lectures on the Latin tongue
A lady learns so much by, we know where.
Why, body o' Beaucoup, you should crave his rule
For passion in the elegaic couplet, charms
Permissable only to Catullus! There!
Now go to duty: brisk, break Friscian's head
By reading the day's office—there's no help.
You've Ovid in your poke to plaster that;
Amen's at the end of all: then sup with me!"

Well, after three or four years of this life,
In prosecution of my calling, I
Found myself at the theatre one night
With a brother Know on, in a mood and mind
Proper enough for the place, amused or no:
When I saw enter, stand, and seat herself
A lady young, tall, beautiful, strange and sad.
It was as when, in our cathedral once,
As I got yawningly through matin-song,
I saw fagilli bear a burden up,
Base it on the high-altar, break away
A board or two, and leave the thing inside
Lofty and lone: and lo, when next I looked,
There was the Rafael! I was still one stare.
When—"Nay, I'll make her give you back your gaze!"
Said Cossex Conti; and at the word he tossed
A paper-tvist of confits to her lap,
And dodged and in a trice was at my back
Nodding from over my shoulder. Then she turned,
Looked our way, smiled the beautiful—and strange smile.
"Is not she fair? 'Tis my new cousin," said he:
"The fellow lurking there! the black o' the box.
Is Guido, the old scapograce: she's his wife,
Married three years since: how his Countship
He has brought little back from Rome beside,
After the bragging, bullying. A fair face,
And—thero they say—a pocketful of gold
When he can worry both her parents dead.
I don't go much there, for the chamber's cold
And the coffee pale. I got a turn at first Paying my duty: I observed they crouched
—The two old frightened family spectres—
Close
In a corner, each on each like mouse on mouse
I! the cat's cage: ever since, I stay at home.
Halloo, there's Guido, the black, mean and small,
Bends his brows on us—please to bend your own:
On the shapely nether limbs of Light-s kilts there
By way of a diversion! I was a fool
To fling the sweetmeats. Prudence, for God's love!
To-morrow I'll make my peace, e'en tell some fib,
Try if I can't find means to take you there."

That night and next day did the gaza endure,
Burnt to my brain, as sunbeam through shut eyes,
And not once changed the beautiful sad strange smile.
At vespers Conti leaned beside my seat
I the choir,—part said, part sung—"In ex-cel-sis—
All's to no purpose; I have louted low,
But he saw you staring—qua sub—don't incl ine
To know you nearer; him we would not hold.
For Hercules,—the man would lick your shoe
If you and certain efficacious friends
Managed him warily,—but there's the wife:
Spare her, because he beats her, as it is.
She's breaking her heart quite fast enough—
jam tu—"
So, be you rational and make amends.
With little Light-s kilts yonder—in secula Seculo-o-o-o-o-rom. Ah, you rogue! Every one knows
What great dame she makes jealous: one against one,
Play, and win both!"

Sirs, ere the week was out,
I saw and said to myself, "Light-skirts hides teeth.
Would make a dog sick,—the great dame shows spite.
Should drive a cat mad: 'tis but poor work this—
Counting one's fingers till the sonnet's crowned.
I doubt much if Marino really be
A better bard than Dante after all.
'Tis more amusing to go pace at eve
'P the Daemo,—watch the day's last gleam outside
Turn, as into a skirt of God's own robe,
Those lancet-windows' jewelled miracle,—
Than go eat the Archbishop's ortolans,
Digest his jokes. Luckily Lent is near:
Who cares to look will find me in my stall
At the Pieve, constant to this faith at least—
Never to write a canzonet any more."

So, next week, 't was my patron spoke abrupt,
In altered guise, "Young man, can it be true
That after all your promise of sound fruit,
You have kept away from Countess young or old
And gone play trustant in church all day long?
Are you turning Molinist?" I answered quiek:
"Sir, what if I turned Christian? It might be.
The fact is, I am troubled in my mind,
Beset and pressed hard by some novel thoughts.
This your Arezzo is a limited world:
There's a strange Pope,—'t is said, a priest who thinks.
Rome is the port, you say: to Rome I go.
I will live alone, one does so in a crowd,
THE RING AND THE BOOK

And look into my heart a little." "Let Eased," — I told friends, — "I shall go to Rome."

One evening I was sitting in a maus
Over the open "Summa," darkened round
By the mid-March twilight, thinking how my life
Had shaken under me, — broke short indeed
And showed the gap 'twixt what is, what should be, —
And into what abyss the soul may slip,
Leave aspiration here, achievement there,
Lacking omnipotence to connect extremes —
Thinking moreover... oh, thinking, if you like.

How utterly dissociated was I
A priest and celibate, from the sad strange
wife
Of Guido, — just as an instance to the point, Naught more, — how I had a whole store of strengths.
Eating into my heart, which craved employ,
And she, perhaps, need of a finger’s help, —
And yet there was no way in the wide world
To stretch out mine and so relieve myself,
— How when the page o’ the "Summa," praised its best,
Her smile kept glowing out of it, as to mock
The silence we could break by no one word, —
There came a tap without the chamber-door,
And a whisper, when I bade who tapped speak
out,
And, in obedience to my summons, last
Is glide a masked muffled mystery,
Laid lightly a letter on the opened book,
Then stood with folded arms and foot demure,
Pointing as if to mark the minutes’ flight.

I took the letter, read to the effect
That she, I lately flung the confrets to,
Had a warm heart to give me in exchange,
And gave it, — loved me and confessed it thus,
And bade me render thanks by word of mouth,
Going that night to such a side o’ the house
Where the small terrace overhangs a street,
Blind and deserted, not the street in front:
Her husband being away, the sultry patch,
At his villa of Vittiano.

"And you?" — I asked:
"What may you be?" "Count Guido’s kind of maid —
Most of us have two functions in his house.
We all hate him, the lady suffers much,
’Tis just we show compassion, furnish help,
Specially since her choice is fixed so well.
What answer may I bring to cheer the sweet
Pompilia?"

Then I took a pen and wrote:
"No more of this! That you are fair, I know;
But other thoughts now occupy my mind.
I should not thus have played the insensible
Once on a time. What made you — may one ask —
Marry your hideous husband? 'Twas a fault,
And now you taste the fruit of it. Farewell!"

"There!" smiled I as she smacked it and was gone —
"There, let the jealous miscreant, — Guido’s
self,
Whose mean soul grins through this transparent trick,—
Be balked so far, defrauded of his aim!
What fund of satisfaction to the knave,
Had I kicked this his messenger down stairs,
Trusted to the middle of her impudence,
And set her heart at ease so! No, indeed!
There’s the reply which he shall turn and twist
At pleasure, snuff at till his brain grow drunk.
As the bear does when he finds a scented grove
That puzzles him, — a hand and yet no hand,
Of other perfume than his own foul paw!
Last month, I had doubtless chosen to play the dupe.
Accepted the mock-invitation, kept
The sham appointment, cudgel beneath cloak,
Prepared myself to pull the appointer’s self
Out of the window from his hiding-place
Behind the gown of this part-messenger
Part-mistress who would persuade the wife.
Such had seemed once a jest permissible:
Now, I am not i’ the mood."

Back next morn brought
The messenger, a second letter in hand.
"You are cruel, Thyrsis, and Myrtila means
Neglected but adores you, makes request
For mercy: why is it you dare not come?
Such virtue is scarce natural to your age:
You must love some one else; I hear you do.
The Barba’s daughter or the Advocate’s wife.
Or both, — all’s one, would you make me the third —
I take the crumbs from table gratefully
Nor grudge who feeds there. ‘Faith, I blush and blaze!"
Yet if I break all bounds, there’s reason sure.
Are you determinedly bent on Rome?
I am wretched here, a monster tortures me:
Carry me with you! Come and say you will!
Concert this very evening! Do not write!
I am ever at the window of my room
Over the terrace, at the Ape. Come!"

I questioned — lifting half the woman’s mask
To let her smile loose. "So, you gave my line
To the merry lady?" "She kissed off the wax,
And put what paper was not kissed away
In her bosom to go burn: but merry, no!
She went all night when evening brought no
friend,
Alone, the unkind missive at her breast;
Thus Philomel, the thorn at her breast too,
Sings..." "... Writes this second letter?"
"Even so!
Then she may peep at vespers forth? —
"What risk
Do we run o’ the husband?" — "Ah, — no risk at all!
He is more stupid even than jealous. Ah —
That was the reason? Why, the man’s away!"
Beside, his bugbear is that friend of yours,
Fat little Canon Conti. He fears him.
GIUSEPPE CAPONSACCHI

How should he dream of you? I told you truth:
He goes to the villa at Vittiano —’t is true
The time when Spring-sap rises in the vine — Spends the night there. And then his wife’s a child:
Does he think a child outwits him? A mere child:
Yet break-grown, a dish for any duke.
Don’t quarrel longer with such oates, but come
I wrote, “In vain do you solicit me,
I am a priest: and you are wedded wife,
Whatever kind of brute your husband prove,
I have scruples, in short. Yet should you really show
Sign at the window... but... nay, best be good!
My thoughts are elsewhere.” — “Take her that!”
— “Again
Let the incarnate meanness, cheat and spy,
Mean to the marrow of him, make his heart
His food, anticipate hell’s worm once more!
Let his huge body shivering at the window — ay,
And let this hybrid, this his light-of-love
And lackey-of-lies, — a sage economy,
Paid with embracings for the rank brass coin,
Let her report and make him chuckle o’er
The downfall of my resolution now,
And lour at disappointment in good time!
— So tantalize and so enrage by turns,
Until the two fall each on the other like
Two famished spiders, as the coveted fly,
That toys long, leaves their net and them at last!

And so the missives followed thick and fast
For a month, say, — I still came at every turn
On the soft sly adder, endong ’neath my tread.
I was met in the street, made sign to in the church
A slip was found in the door-sill, scribbled word ‘Twixt page and page o’ the prayer-book in my place.
A crumpled thing dropped even before my feet,
Punched through the blind, above the terrace-wall.
As I passed, by day, the very window once.
And ever from corners would be peering up
The messenger, with the selfsame demand,
“Obdurate still, no flesh but adamant?
Nothing to cure the wound, asseume the three
O’ the sweetest lamb that ever loved a bear?”
And ever my one answer in one tone —
“Go your ways, tempessaa! Let a priest read, pray,
Unplagued of vain talk, visions not for him!
In the end, you’ll have your will and ruin me!”

One day, a variation: thus I read:
“You have gained little by timidity.
My husband is a formidable foe,
Will stick at nothing to destroy you. Stand
Prepared, or better, run till you reach Rome!
I bade you visit me, when the last place
My tyrant would have turned suspicions at,
Or cared to seek you in, was... why say, where?
But now all’s changed: beside, the season’s past.
At the villa, — wants the master’s eye no more.
Anyhow, I beseech you, stay away
From the window! He might well be posted there.”

I wrote — “You raise my courage, or call up
My curiosity, who am but man.
Tell him he owns the palace, not the street
Under — that’s his and yours and mine alike.
If it should please me pad the path this eve,
Guido will have two troubles, first to get
Into a rage and then get out again.
Be cautious, though: at the Ape!”

When I stood question here and reached this point
O’ the narrative, — search notes and see and say
If some one did not interpose with smile
And sneer, “And prithee why so confident
That the husband must, of all needs, not the wife,
Fabricate thus, — what if the lady loved?
What if she wrote the letters?”

Learned Sir,
I told you there’s a picture in our church.
Well, if a low-browed verger sidled up
Bringing me, like a blotch, on his prod’s point,
A transfigured scorpion, let the reptile writhe,
And then said, “See a thing that Rafael made —
This venom issued from Madonna’s mouth!”
I should reply, “Rather, the soul of you
Has issued from your body, like from like,
By way of the ordinance!”

But no less,
I tired of the same long black teasing lie
Obtruded thus at every turn; the pest
Was far too near the picture, anyhow:
One does Madonna service, making clowns
Remove their dung-heap from the sacristy.
“I will to the window, as he tempts,” said I:
“Yes, whom the easy love has failed allure,
This new bait of adventure tempts, — thinks he.
Though the imprisoned lady keeps ajar,
There will they lie in ambush, heads alert,
Kith, kin, and Count mustered to bite my heel.
No mother nor brother viper of the brood
Shall scuttle off without the instructive bruise!”

So I went: crossed street and street: “The next street’s turn,
I stand beneath the terrace, see, above,
The black of the ambush-window. Then, in
I had place
Of hand’s throw of soft prelude over lute,
And cough that clears way for the ditty last.”

THE RING AND THE BOOK

I began to laugh already — "he will have
Out of the hole you hide in, on to the front,
Count Guido Franceschini, show yourself!
Hear what a man thinks of a thing like you,
And after, take this founliness in your face!"

The words lay living on my lip, I made
The one turn more — and there at the window stood,
Framed in its black square length, with lamp
in hand,
Pomplia; the same great, grave, griefed air
As stands i’ the dusk, on altar that I know,
Left alone with one moonbeam in her call,
Our Lady of all the Sorrows. Ere I knelt—
Assured myself that she was flesh and blood
She had looked one look and vanished.
I thought — "Just so:
It was herself, they have set her there to watch —
Stationed to see some wedding-band go by,
On fair pretense that she must bless the bride,
Or wait some funeral with friends wind past,
And crave peace for the corpse that claims its due.
She never dreams they used her for a snare,
And now withdraw the bait has served its turn.
Well done, the husband, who shall fare the worse!"
And on my lip again was — "Out with thee,
Guido!" When all at once she reappeared;
But, this time, on the terrace overhead,
So close above me, she could almost touch
My head if she bent down; and she did bend,
While I stood still as stone, all eye, all ear.

She began — "You have sent me letters, Sir:
I have read none, I can neither read nor write;
But she you gave them to, a woman here,
One of the people in whose power I am,
Partly explained their sense, I think, to me
Obliged to listen while she inc滔ulates
That you, a priest, can dare love me, a wife,
Desire to live or die as I shall bid,
(She makes me listen if I will or no)
Because you saw my face a single time,
It cannot be she says the thing you mean;
Such wickedness were deadly to us both:
But good true love would help me now so
much —"
I tell myself, you may mean good and true.
You offer me, I seem to understand,
Because I am in poverty and starve,
Much money, where one piece would save my
life.
The silver cup upon the altar-cloth
Is neither yours to give nor miss to take;
But I might take one bit of bread therefrom.
Since I am starving, and return the rest,
Yet do no harm: this is my very case.
I am in that strait, I may not dare abstain
From so much of assistance as would bring
The risk of theft on neither you nor me;
But no superfluous particle of aid.
I think, if you will let me state my case,
Even had you been so fancy-fevered here,
Not your sound self, you must grow healthy
now —

Care only to bestow what I can take.
That it is only you in the wide world,
Knowing me nor in thought nor word nor do
Who, all unprompted save by your own heat
Come proffering assistance now, — were men
But try my whole life is so strange, — as such
It is, my husband whom I have not wronged Should hate and harm me. For his own son sake,
Hinder the harm! But there is something
And that the strangest: it has got to be
Somehow for my sake too, and yet not mine,—
This is a riddle — for some kind of sake
Not any clearer to myself than you,
And yet as certain as that I draw breath,—
I would fain live, not die — oh no, not die!
My case is, I was dwelling happily
At Rome with those dear Companari, called
Father and mother to me; when at once
I found I had become Count Guido’s wife:
Who then, not waiting for a moment, charged
Into a very bed once he was here.
Merely a man; his face threw fire at mine,
He laid a hand on me that burned all peace.
All joy, all hope, and last all fear away,
Dipping the bough of life, so pleasant once,
In fire which shivered leaf and bud alike,
 Burning not only present life but past,
Which you might think was safe beyond reach.
He reached it, though, since that beloved pair.
My father once, my mother all those years,
That loved me so, now say I dreamed a dream
And bid me wake, henceforth no child of them,
Never in all the time their child at all.
Do you understand? I cannot: yet so it is Just so I say of you that proffer help:
I cannot understand what prompts your soul.
To meet with you here, that guides your heart,
Most from the heart than heaven on earth,
No law that reigns in this fall house of hate.
By using — letting have effect so much
Of hate as hides me from that whole of hate
Would take my life which I want and must have —
Just as I take from your excess of love
Enough to save my life with, all I need.
The Archbishop said to murder me were sin:
My leaving Guido were a kind of death
With no sin, — more death, he must answer for Hear now what death to him and life to you
I wish to pay and owe. 'Take me to Rome!' You go to Rome, the servant makes me hear.
Take me as you would take a dog, I think,
Masterless left for strangers to maltreat;
Take me home like that leave me in th
Where the father and the mother are; and soon
They'll come to know and call me by my name,
Their child once more, since child I am, for They now forget me, which is the worst o' the dream—
And the way to end dreams is to break them,
stand,
Walk, go; then help me to stand, walk, and go !
The Governor said the strong should help the
weak:
You know how weak the strongest women are.
How could I find my way there by myself?
I cannot even call out, make them hear—
Just as in dreams: I have tried and proved the fact.
I have told this story and more to good great
men,
The Archbishop and the Governor: they smiled.
'Stop your mouth, fair one!—presently they frowned.
'Get you gone, disengage you from our feet!
I want in my despair to an old priest,
Only a friar, no great man like these two,
But good, the Augustinian, people name
Romano,—he confessed me two months since:
He fears God, why then needs he fear the
world?
And when he questioned how it came about
That I was found in danger of a sin—
'Despair of any help from providence,—
'Since, though your husband outrage you,' said the
'That is a case too common, the wives die
Or live, but do not sin so deep as this—'
Then I told—what I never will tell you—
How, worse than husband's hate, I had to bear
The love—soliciting to shame called love—
Of his brother,—the young idle priest 't he
house
With only the devil to meet there. 'This is grave—
Yes, we must interfere: I counsel,—write
To those who used to be your parents once,
Of dangers here, bid them convey you hence!'
'But,' said I, 'when neither read nor write,
Then he took pity and promised 'I will write.'
If he did so, —why, they are dumb or dead:
Either they give no credit to the tale,
Or else, wrapped wholly up in their own joy
Of such escape, they care not who cries, still
'I the clutches. Anyhow, no word arrives.
All such extravagance and dreadfulness
Seems incident to dreaming, cured one way,—
Wake me! The letter I received this morn, said — if the woman spoke your very sense —
'You would die for me: ' I can believe it now:
For now the dream gets to involve yourself.
First of all, you seemed wicked and not good,
In writing me these letters: you came in
Like a thief upon me. I this morning said
In my extremity, entreat the thief!
Try if he have in him no honest touch!
A thief might save me from a murderer.
T was a thief said the last kind word to Christ:
Christ took the kindness and forgave the thief:
And so did I prepare what I now say.
But now, that you stand and I see your face,
Though you have never uttered word yet,—
well, I know,
Here too has been dream-work, delusion too,
And that at no time, you with the eyes here,
Ever intended to do wrong by me
Nor wrote such letters therefore. 'It is false,
And you are true, have been true, will be true.
To Rome then,—when is it you take me there?
Each minute lost is mortal. 'When? —I ask.'
I answered, 'It shall be when it can be.
I will go hence and do your pleasure, find
The sure and speedy means of travel, then Come back and take you to your friends in Rome.
There wants a carriage, money and the rest,—
A day's work by to-morrow at this time.
How shall I see you and assure escape?''
She replied, 'Pass, to-morrow at this hour.
If I am at the open window —
If I am absent, drop a handkerchief
And walk by! I shall see from where I watch,
And know that all is done. Return next eve,
And next, and so till we can meet and speak!'
'To-morrow at this hour I pass,' said I.
She was withdrawn.

Here is another point
I bid you pause at. When I told thus far,
Some one said, subtly, 'Here at least was found
Your confidence in error,—you perceived
The spirit of the letters, in a sort,
Had been the lady's, if the body should be Supplied by Guido: say, he forged them all!
Here was the unforgett act —she sent for you,
Spontaneously elected you to help,
—What men call, loved you: Guido read her
mind,
Gave it expression to assure the world
The case was just as he foresaw: he wrote,
She spoke.'

Sirs, that first simile serves still,—
That falsehood of a scorpion hatched, I say,
Nowhere! the world but in Madonna's mouth.
Go on! Suppose, that falsehood foiled, next eve
Pictured Madonna raised her painted hand,
Fixed the face Rafael bent above the Babe,
On my face as I flung me at her feet:
Such miracle vouche safed and manifest,
Would that prove the first lying tale was true?
Pompilia spoke, and I at once received,
Accepted my own fact, my miracle
Self-authorized and self-explained,—she chose
To summon me and signify her choice.
Afterward,—oh! I gave a passing glance
To a certain ugly cloud-shape, goblin-shred
Of hell-smoke hurrying past the splendid moon
Out now to tolerate no darkness more,
And saw right through the thing that tried to pass
For truth and solid, not an empty lie:
'So, he not only forged the words for her
But words for me, made letters he called mine:
What I sent, he retained, gave these in place,
All by the mistress-messenger! As I
Recognition her, at potency of truth,
So she, by the crystalline soul, knew me,
Never mistook the signs. Enough of this —
Let the wrath go to nothingness again,
Here is the orb, have only thought for her!"

"Thought?" nay, Sirs, what shall follow was not thought:
I have thought sometimes, and thought long and hard.
I have stood before, gone round a serious thing,
Tasked my whole mind to touch and clasp it
close,
As I stretch forth my arm to touch this bar.
God and man, and what duty I owe both, —
I dare to say I have confronted these
In thought; but no such faculty helped here,
I put forth no thought, — powerless, all that
night
I paced the city; it was the first Spring.
By the invasion I lay passive to,
In rushed new things, the old were rapt away;
All abashed — the imprisonments
Of the outside air, the inside weight o' the
world
That pulled me down. Death meant, to spurn
the ground,
Scour to the sky, — die well and you do that.
The very immolation made the blues;
Death was the heart of life, and all the harm
My folly had crouched to avoid, now proved a veil
Hiding all gain my wisdom strove to grasp:
As if the intense centre of the flame
Should turn a heaven to that devoted fly
Which hitherto, sophist alike and sage,
Saint Thomas with his sober gray goose-quill,
And sinner Plato by Cephasian reed,
Would fail, pretending just the insect's good,
Whisk off, drive back, consign to shade again.
Into another state, under new rule
I knew myself was passing swift and sure;
Whereof the initiatory pang approached,
Felicitons annoy, as bitter-sweet
As when the virgin-band, the victors chaste,
Fed at the end the earthy garments drop,
And rise with something of a rosy shame
Into immortal nakedness: so I
Lay, and let come the proper three would thrill
Into the ecstasy and outthrob pain.

I' th' gray of dawn it was I found myself
Facing the pillar'd front o' the Pieve — mine,
My church: it seemed to say for the first time,
"But am not I the Bride, the mystic love
O' the Lamb, who took thy plighted truth, my priest,
To fold thy warm heart on my heart of stone
And freeze thee nor unfasten any more?
This is a fleshly woman, — let the free
Bestow their life-blood, thou art pulseless
now!"

See! Day by day I had risen and left this church
At the signal waved me by some foolish fan,
With half a curse and half a pitiful smile
For the monk I stumbled over in my haste,
Prostrate and corpse-like at the altar-foot
Intent on his corona: then the church
Was ready with her quip, if word conduced,
To quicken my pace nor stop for prating—
There!
Be thankful you are no such ninny, go
Rather to teach a black-eyed novice cards
Than gabble Latin and protrude that nose
Smooth to a sheep's through no brains and much faith!"

That sort of incentive! Now the church changed tone
Now, when I found out first that life and
death
Are means to an end, that passion uses both,
Indisputably mistress of the man
Whose form of worship is self-sacrifice:
Now, from the stone lungs sighed the scarce
voice,
"Leave that live passion, come be dead with
me!"
As if, 't the fabled garden, I had gone
On great adventure, plucked in ignorance
Hedge-fruit, and feasted to satiety,
Laughing at such high fame for hips and haws.
And scorned the achievement: then came all at once
O' the prize o' the place, the thing of perfect
gold.
The apple's self: and, scarce my eye on that
Was 'ware as well o' the seven-fold drage-
watch.

Sirs, I obeyed. Obedience was too strange,—
This new thing that had been struck into me
By the look o' the lady, — to dare disobey
The first authoritative word. 'T was God's
I had been lifted to the level of her;
Could take such sounds into my sense. I said,
"We two are cognizant o' the Master now;
She it is bids me bow the head: how true;
I am a priest! I see the function here;
I thought the other way self-sacrifices:
This is the true, seals up the perfect sum.
I pay it, sit down, silently obey."

So, I went home. Dawn broke, noon broached
I
I sat stone-still, let time run over me
The sun slanted into my room, had reached
The west. I opened book, — Aquinas blazed
With one black name only on the white page.
I looked up, saw the sunset: vesper rang:
"She counts the minutes till I keep my word
And come say all is ready. I am a priest,
Duty to God is duty to her: I think
God, who created her, will save her too
Some new way, by one miracle the more.
Without me. Then, prayer may avail perhaps
I went to my own place! the Pieve, read
The office: I was back at home again
Sitting i' the dark. "Could she but know
—but know
That, were there good in this distinct free
God's,
Really good as it reached her, though proceed
By a sin of mine, — I should sin: God forgives.
She knows it is no fear withholds me: fear?
Of what? Suspense here is the terrible thing.
If she should, as she counts the minutes, come
On the fantastic notion that I fear
GIUSEPPE CAPONSACCI

The world now, fear the Archbishop, fear perhaps Count Guido, he who, having forged the lies, May wait the work, attend the effect,—I fear The sword of Guido! Let God see to that— Hating lies, let not her believe a lie!

Again the morning found me. "I will work, Tie down my foolish thoughts. Thank God so far! I have saved her from a scandal, stopped the tongues Had broken else into a cackle and hiss Around the noble name. Duty is still Wisdom: I have been wise." So the day wore.

At evening — "But, achieving victory, I must not blink the priest's peculiar part, Nor shrink to counsel, comfort: priest and friend — How do we discontinue to be friends? I will go minister, advise her seek Help at the source, — above all, not despair: There may be other happier help at hand. I hope it, — wherefore then neglect to say?"

There she stood — leaned there, for the second time, Over the terrace, looked at me, then spoke: "Why is it you have suffered me to stay Breaking my heart two days more than was need? Why delay help, your own heart yearns to give? You are again here, in the selvesame mind, I see here, steadfast in the face of you, — You grudge to do no one thing that I ask. Why then is nothing done? You know my need. Still, through God's pity on me, there is time And one day more: shall I be saved or no?" I answered: "Lady, waste no thought, no word Even to forgive me! Care for what I care — Only! Now follow me as I were fate! Leave this house in the dark to-morrow night, Just before daybreak: — there's new moon this eye — It sets, and then begins the solid black. Descend, proceed to the Torrione, step Over the low dilapidated wall, Take San Clemente, there's no other gate Unguarded at the hour: some paces thence An inn stands; cross to it; I shall be there."

She answered, "If I can but find the way. But I shall find it. Go now!"

I did go,

Took rapidly the route myself prescribed,
Stopped at Torrione, climbed the ruined place, Proved that the gate was practicable, reached The inn, no eye, despite the dark, could miss, Knocked there and entered, made the host see: "With Caponsacchi it is ask and have; I know my betters. Are you bound for Rome? I get swift horse and trusty man," said he.

Then I retraced my steps, was found once more In my own house for the last time; there lay The broad pale opened "Summa;" "Sign his book, There's other showing! 'Twas a Thomas too Obtained — more favored than his nameake here — A gift, tied faith fast, foiled the tug of doubt, — Our Lady's girdle; down he saw it drop As she ascended into heaven, they say: He kept that safe and bade all doubt adieu. I too have seen a lady and hold a grace."

I know not how the night passed: morning broke, Presently came my servant. "Sir, this eve — Do you forget?" I started. "How forget? What is it you know?" "With due submission. Sir, This being last Monday in the month but one, And a vigil, since to-morrow is Saint George, And feast-day, and moreover day for copes, And Canon Cinti now away a month, And Canon Crispin sour came because, forsooth, You let him sulk in stall and bear the brunt Of the octave... Well, Sir, 'tis important!"

"True! Harken, I have to start for Rome this night. No word, lest Crispin overboil and burst! Provide me with a laced dress! Throw dust 't the Canon's eye, stop his tongue's scandal so! See there's a sword in case of accident." I knew the knife, the knife knew me.

Through each familiar hindrance of the day Did I make steadily for its hour and end, — Felt time's old barrier-growth of right and fit Give way through all its twines, and let me go. Use and wont recognized the excepted man, Let speed the special service, — and I sped Till, at the dead between midnight and morn, There was I at the goal, before the gate, With a tune in the ears, low leading up to loud, A light in the eyes, faint that would soon be flare, Ever some spiritual witness new and new In faster frequency, crowding solitude To watch the way o' the warfare, — till, at last, When the ecstatic minute must bring birth, Began a whiteness in the distance, waxed Whiter and whiter, near grew and more near, Till it was she: there did Pomphilia come: The white I saw shine through her was her soul's, Certainly, for the body was one black, Black from head down to foot. She did not speak, Glimed into the carriage, — so a cloud Gathers the moon up. "By San Spirito, To Rome, as if the road burned underneath! Reach Rome, then hold my head in pledge, I pay The run and the risk to heart's content!" Just that, I said, — then, in another tick of time, Sprang, was beside her, she and I alone.
THE RING AND THE BOOK

So it began, our flight through dusk to clear,
Through day and night and day again to night
Once more, and to last dreadful dawn of all.
Sirs, how should I lie quiet in my grave
Unless you suffer me wring, drop by drop,
My brain dry, make a riddance of the drench
Of minutes with a memory in each,
Recorded motion, breath or look of hers,
Which poured forth would present you one pure glass,
Mirs be awash as God's sea, glassed in gold,
His saints — the perfect soul Pompeii? Man,
You must know that a man gets drunk with truth
Stagnant inside him! Oh, they've killed her,
Sirs!
Can I be calm?

Calmly! Each incident
Proves, I maintain, that action of the flight
For the true thing it was. The first faint scratch
O' the stone will test its nature, teach its worth
To idiots who name Parnian — poprolite.
After all, I shall give no glare — at best
Only display you certain scattered lights
Lamping the rash and roll of the abyss:
Nothing but here and there a fire-point pricks
Wavelet from wavelet: well!

For the first hour
We both were silent in the night, I know:
Blackness engulfed me, — partial stupor, say —
Then I would break way, breathe through the surprise,
And be aware again, and see who sat
In the dark vest with the white face and hands,
I said to myself — "I have caught it, I conceive
The mind o' the mystery: 't is the way they wake
And wait, two martyrs somewhere in a tomb
Each by each as their blessing was to die;
Some signal they are promised and expect,
When to arise before the trumpet screeches:
So, through the whole course of the world they wait
The last day, but so fearless and so safe!
No otherwise, in safety and not fear,
I lie, because she lies too by my side."
You know this is not love, Sirs, — it is faith,
The feeling that there's God, he reigns and rules
Out of this low world: that is all; no harm
At times she drew a soft sigh — music seemed Always to hover just above her lips,
Not settle, — break a silence music too.

In the determined morning, I first found
Her head erect, her face turned full to me,
Her soul intent on mine through two wide eyes.
I answered them. "You are saved hitherto.
We have passed Perugia, — gone round by the
Not through, I seem to think, — and opposite
I know Assisi; thus is holy ground."
Then she resumed. "How long since we both left Arezzo?"
"Years — and certain hours beside."

It was at . . . ah, but I forget the names!
"T is a mere post-house and a hoard or two;
I left the carriage and got bread and wine
And brought it her. — "Does it detain you?"
"— They stay perfrosse, change horses, — there No horse at!"
We lose no minute: we arrive, be sure!"
This was — I know not where — there's a great hill
Close over, and the stream has lost its bridge.
One ford it. She began: "I have heard:
Of some sick body that my mother knew.
"T was no good sign when in a limb diseased
All the pain suddenly departs, — as if
The guardian angel discontinued pain
Because the hope of cure was gone at last:
The limb will not again exert itself,
It needs be pained no longer: so with me,
— My soul whence all the pain is past at once:
All pain must be to work some good in the end.
True, this I feel now, this may be that good,
Pain was because of, — otherwise, I fear!

She said, — a long while later in the day,
When I had let the silence be, — abrupt —
"Have you a mother?" "She died, I was born."
"A sister then?" "No sister." "Who was it—"
What woman were you used to serve this way,
Be kind to, till I called you and you came?"
I did not like that word. Soon afterward—
"Tell me, are men unhappy, in some kind
Of men unhappiness at being men,
As women suffer, being womanish?
Have you, now, some unhappiness, I mean,
Born of what may be man's strength overmuch
To match the undue susceptibility,
The sense at every pore when hate is close?
It hurts us if a baby hides its face.
Or child strikes us at us punitil, calls names
Or makes a mouth, — much more if stranger men
Laugh or frown, — just as that were much to hear!
Yet rocks split, — and the blow-ball doses more,
Quivers to fathery nothing at a touch;
And strength may have its drawback, weakness escapes."

Once she asked, "What is it that made you smile,
At the great gate with the eagles and the snakes,
Where the company entered, 't is a long time since?"
"— Forgive — I think you would not understand:
Ah, but you ask me, — therefore, it was this:
That was a certain bishop's villa-gate,
I knew it by the eagles, — and at once
Remember this same bishop was just he
People of old were wont to bid me please
If I would catch preferment: so, I smiled
Because an impulse came to me, a whim—
What if I prayed the prolate leave to speak.
Began upon him in his presence-hall
GIUSEPPE CAPONSACCHI

- 'What, still at work so gray and obsolete?
Still robed and mitred more or less?
Don't you feel all that out of fashion now?
I find out when the day of things is done!'"

At eve we heard the angelus: she turned —
"I told you I can neither read nor write,
My life stopped with the play-time; I will learn,
If I begin to live again: but you —
Who are a priest — wherefore do you not read
The service at this hour? Read Gabriel's song,
The lesson, and then read the little prayer
To Raphael, proper for us travellers!"
I did not like that, neither, but I read.

When we stopped at Foligno it was dark.
The people of the post came out with lights:
The driver said, "This time to-morrow, may Saints only help, relays continue good,
Nor robbers hinder, we arrive at Rome.
I argue — Why tax your strength a second night?
Trust me, alight here and take brief repose!
We are out of harm's reach, past pursuit: go sleep.
If but an hour! I keep watch, guard the while Here in the doorway." But her whole face changed,
The misery grew again about her mouth,
The eyes burned up from faintnesses, like the fawn's
Tired to death in the thicket, when she feels
The probing spear o' the huntsman. "Oh, no stay!"
She cried, in the fawn's cry, "On to Rome, on,
on —
Unless 'tis you who fear, — which cannot be!"

We did go on all night; but at its close
She was troubled, restless, moaned low, talked at whistles
To herself, her brow on quiver with the dream:
Once, wide awake, she menaced, at arms' length
Waved away something — "Never again with you!
My soul is mine, my body is my soul's:
You and I are divided ever more.
In soul and body: get you gone!" Then I —
"Why, in my whole life I have never prayed!
Oh, if the God, that only can, would help!
Am I his priest with power to cast out fiends?
Let God arise and all his enemies
Be scattered!" By morn, there was peace, no sigh
Out of the deep sleep.

When she woke at last,
I answered the first look — "Scarcely twelve hours more.
Then, Rome! There probably was no pursuit,
There cannot now be peril: bear up brave!
Just some twelve hours to press through to the prize:
Then, no more of the terrible journey!"

No more o' the journey: if it might but last!
Always, my life long, thus to journey still!
It is the interruption that I dread, —
With no dread, ever to be here and thus!
Never to see a face nor hear a voice!
Yours is no voice; you speak when you are dumb;
Nor face, I see it in the dark. I want
No face nor voice that change and grow unkind."
That I liked, that was the best thing she said.

In the broad day, I dared entreat, "Descond!"
I told a woman, at the garden-gate
By the post-house, white and pleasant in the sun,
"It is my sister, — talk with her apart!
She is married and unhappy, you perceive;
I take her home because her head is hurt;
Comfort her as you women understand!"
So, there I left them by the garden-wall,
Faced the road, then bade put the horses to,
Came back, and there she sat: close to her knee,
A black-eyed child still hold the bowl of milk,
Wondered to see how little she could drink,
And in her arms the woman's infant lay.
She smiled at me, "How much good this has done!
This is a whole night's rest and how much more!"
I can proceed now, though I wish to stay,
How do you call that tree with the thick top
That holds in all its leafy green and gold
The sun now like an immense egg of fire?" (It was a million-leaved mimosa.) "Take
The babe away from me and let me go!"
And in the carriage, "Still a day, my friend!
And perhaps half a night, the woman fears.
I pray it finish since it cannot last.
There may be more misfortune at the close,
And where will you be? God suffice me then!"
And presently — for there was a roadside-shrine —
"When I was taken first to my own church
Lorenzo in Lucina, being a girl,
And bid confess my faults, I interposed
'But teach me what fault to confess and know!'"
So, the priest said — 'You should bethink yourself:
Each human being needs must have done wrong!'"

Now, be you candid and no priest but friend —
Were I surprised and killed here on the spot,
A runaway from husband and his home,
Do you account it were in sin I died?
My husband used to seem to harm me, not . . .
Not on pretence he punished sin of mine,
Nor for sin's sake and lust of cruelty,
But as I heard him bid a farming-man
At the villa take a lamb once to the wood
And there ill-treat it, meaning that the wolf
Should hear its cries, and so come, quick be caught.
Enticed to the trap: he practised thus with me
That so, whatever were his gain thereby,
Others than I might become prey and spoil.
Had it been only between our two selves,—
His pleasure and my pain,—why, pleasure him
By dying, nor such need to make a coil!
But this was worth an effort, that my pain
Should not become a snare, prove pain three-fold
To other people—strangers—or unborn—
How should I know? I sought release from that—I think, or else from,—dare I say, some cause
Such as is put into a tree, which turns
Away from the north wind with what nest it holds.
The woman said that trees so turn: now, friend,
Tell me, because I cannot trust myself!
You are a man: what have I done amiss?"
You must conceive my answer,—I forget—
Taken up wholly with the thought, perhaps,
This time she might have said,—might, did not say—
"You are a priest." She said, "my friend."
Day wore,
We passed the places, somehow the calm went,
Again the restless eyes began to rove
In new fear of the foe mine could not see.
She wandered in her mind,—addressed me once
"Gaetano!"—that is not my name: whose name?
I grew alarmed, my head seemed turning too.
I quickened pace with promise now, now threat:
Bade drive and drive, nor any stopping more.
"Too deep i' the thick of the struggle, struggle through!
Then drench her in repose though death's self pour
The plenitude of quiet,—help us, God,
Whom the winds carry!"

Suddenly I saw
The old tower, and the little white-walled clump
Of buildings and the cypress tree or two,— "Already Castelnuovo—Rome!" I cried,
"As good as Rome,—Rome is the next stage, think!
This is where travellers' hearts are wont to beat.
Say you are saved, sweet lady!" Up she woke.
The sky was fierce with color from the sun setting. She screamed out, "No, I must not die!
Take me no farther, I should die: stay here!
I have more life to save than mine!"
She swooned.
We seemed safe: what was it foreboded so? Out of the cooch into the inn I bore
The motionless and breathless pure and pale Pomphila,— bore her through a pitying group
And laid her on a couch, still calm and cured
By deep sleep of all woes at once. The host was urgent, "Let her stay an hour or two!
Leave her to us, all will be right by morn!"
Oh, my foreboding! But I could not choose.

I paced the passage, kept watch all night long.
I listened,—not one movement, not one sigh.
"Fear not: she sleeps so sound!" they said: but I Feared, all the same, kept fearing more and more,
Found myself thrub with fear from head to foot,
Filled with a sense of such impending woe,
That, at first sense of night, pretense of gray,
I made my mind up it was morn.—"Read Rome,
Lest hell reach her! A dozen miles to make,
Another long breath, and we emerge!" I stood
I the courtyard, roused the sleepy grooms
"Have out
Carriage and horse, give hastes, take gold!"
said I.
While they made ready in the doubtful morn,—
"I was the last minute,—needs must I ascend
And break her sleep; I turned to go.
And there
Faced me Count Guido, there posed the mess man
As master,—took the field, encamped his rights.
Challenged of the world: there leered new triumph, there
Scowled the old malice in the visage bad
And black o' the scamp. Soon triumph supplied the tongue.
A little, malice glued to his dry throat,
And he part howled, part hissed...
oh, how he kept
Well out o' the way, at arm's length and to spare!—
"My salutation to your priesthood! What?
Matrimonial buxom with book so soon
Of an April day that's damp as tears that now
Deluge Arezzo at its darling's flight?—
'T is unfair, wrongs feminity at large,
To let a single dame monopolize
A heart the whole sex claims, should share alike:
Therefore I overtake you, Canon! Come!
The lady,—could you leave her side so soon?
You have not yet experienced at her hands
My treatment, you lay down undrugged, I see!
Hence this alertness,—hence no death-in-life
Like what held arms fast when she stole from me.
To be sure, you took the solace and repose
That first night at Foligno! —news abound
O' the road by this time,—men regaled me
much,
As past them I came halting after you,
Vulcan pursuing Mars, as poets sing,—
Still at the last here pant I, but arrive,
Vulcan—and not without my Cyclops too,
The Commissary and the unpoisoned arm
O' the Civil Force, should Mars turn mutineer.
Enough of fooling: capture the culprit, friend! Here is the lover in the smart disguise
With the sword,—he is a priest, so mine rapier still.
There upstairs hides my wife the runaway,
His letter: the two plotted, poisoned first,
Plundered me after, and eloped thus far
Where now you find them. Do your duty quick!
Arrest and hold him! That's done: now catch her!
During this speech of that man,—well, I stood away, as he managed,—still, I stood as near the throat of him,—with these two hands, my own,—
As near as lend near yours, Sir,—one quick spring,
One great good satisfying gripe, and lo!
There had he lain abolished with his lie,
Creation purged o' the miscreate, man redeemed.
A spittle wiped off from the face of God!
I, in some measure, seek a poor excuse
For what I left undone, in just this fact
That my first feeling at the speech I quote
Was,—not of what a blasphemy was dared,
Not what a bag of venomed pureulence
Was split and noisome,—but how splendidly
Mirthful, how ludicrous a lie was launched!
Would Molière's self wish more than hear such man
Call, claim such woman for his own, his wife,
Even though, in due amazement at the beast
He had stammered, she moreover was divine?
She to be his,—were hardly less absurd
Than that he took her name into his mouth,
Licked, and then let it go again, the beast,
Signed with his slaver. Oh, she poisoned him,
Smirdered him, and the rest! Well, what I wished
Was, that he would but go on, say once more
So to the world, and get his medd of men,
The fist's reply to the fitch. And while I mused
The minute, oh the misery, was gone!
On either idle hand of me there stood
Really an officer, nor laughed i' the least:
Nay, rendered justice to his reason, laid
Logic to heart, as 'twere submitted them
"Twice two makes four."
"And now, catch her!" he cried.
That sobered me. "Let myself lead the way—
Ere you arrest me, who am somebody,
Being, as you hear, a priest and privileged,—
To the lady's chamber! I presume you,—men
Expert, instructed how to find out truth,
Familiar with the guise of guilt. Detect
Guilt on her face when it meets mine, then judge
Between us and the mad dog howling there;"
Up we all went together, in they broke
O' the chamber late my chapel. There she lay,
Composed as when I laid her, that last eve,
O' the couch, still breathless, motionless, sleep's self,
Wax-white, seraphic, saturate with the sun
O' the morning that now flooded from the front
And filled the window with light like blood.
"Behold the poisoner, the adulteress—
And feigning sleep too! Seize, bind!" Guido hissed.

She started up, stood erect, face to face
With the husband: back he fell, was buttersessed there.

By the window all aflame with morning-red,
He the black figure, the opprobrious blur
Against all peace and joy and light and life.
"Away from between me and hell!" she cried:

"Hell for me, no embracing any more!
I am God's, I love God, God—whose knees I clasp.
Whose utterly most just award I take,
But bear no more love-making devils: hence I!"
I may have made an effort to reach her side
From where I stood i' the doorway,—anyhow
I found the arms, I wanted, pinned fast,
Was powerless in the clutch to left and right
O' the rabble pouring in, racosity
Enlisted, rampant on the side of earth
Home and the husband,—pay in prospect too!
They heaped themselves upon me. "Ha!—
and him
Also you outrage? Him, too, my sole friend, Guardian and savior? That I talk you of,
Since—see how God can help at last and worst!"

She sprang at the sword that hung beside him,
Seized.
Drew, brandished it, the sunrise burned for joy.
O' the blade. "Die," cried she, "devil in God's name!"
Ah, but they all closed round her, twelve to one—
The unmanly men, no woman-mother made,
Spawned somehow! Dead-white and disarmed she lay.
No matter for the sword, her word sufficed
To strike the coward through and through: he shook Could only spit between the teeth—"You see you? You hear? Bear witness, then! Write down... but no—
Carry these criminals to the prison-house,
For first thing! I begin my search meanwhile
After the stolen effects, gold, jewels, plate,
Money and clothes, they robbed me of and fled,
With no few amorous pieces, verse and prose,
I have much reason to expect to find."

When I saw that,—no more than the first mad speech,
Made out the speaker mad and a laughing-stock,
So neither did this next device explode
One listener's indignation,—that a scribe
Did sit down; set himself to write indeed,
While sundry knaves began to peer and pry
In corner and hole,—that Guido, wiping brow
And getting him a countenance, was fast
Losing his fear, beginning to strut free
O' the stage of his exploit, snuff here, sniff there,—
Then I took truth in, guessed sufficiently
The service for the moment. "What I say,
Slight at your peril! We are aliens here,
My adversary and I, called noble both;
I am the nobler, and a name men know.
I could refer our cause to our own court
In our own country, but prefer appeal
To the nearer jurisdiction. Being a priest,
Though in a secular garb,—for reasons good
I shall adduce in due time to my peers,—
I demand that the Church I serve, decide
Between us, right the slandered lady there.
A Tuscan noble, I might claim the Duke:
A priest, I rather choose the Church,—bid
Cover the wronged with her inviolate shield."
There was no refusing this: they bore me off, Rome: It seems I simply sent her to her death, You tell me she is dying now, or dead; I cannot bring myself to quite believe On a man at unawares? 'T were worthy you. No, Sirs, I cannot have the lady dead! That erect form, flashing brow, fulgurant eye, That vision immortal (oh, that voice of hers!) That vision in the blood-red daybreak — that Leaps to life of the pale electric sword Angels go armed with, — that was not the last O' the lady! Come, I see through it, you find — Know the manoeuvre! Also herself said I had saved her: do you dare say she spoke false? Let me see for myself if it be so! Though she were dying, a Priest might be of use, The more when he's a friend too, — she called me Far beyond "friend." Come, let me see her — indeed It is my duty, being a priest: I hope I stand confessed, established, proved a priest? My punishment had motive that, a priest I, in a lino garb, a mundane mode, Did what were harmless done otherwise. I never touched her with my finger-tip Except to carry her to the couch, that eve, Against my heart, beneath my head, bowed low, As we priests carry the patron: that is why — To get leave and go see her of your grace - I have told you this whole story over again. Do I deserve grace? For I might lock lips, Laugh at your jurisdiction: what have you To do with me in the matter? I suppose You hardly think I donned a bravo's dress To have a hand in the new crime; on the old, Judgment's delivered, penalty imposed, I was chained fast at Civita hand and foot — She had only you to trust to, you and Rome, Rome and the Church, and no pert meddling priest Two days ago, when Guido, with the right, Hacked her to pieces. One might well be wroth; I have been patient, done my best to help: I come from Civita and punishment As friend of the court — and for pure friendship's sake Have told my tale to the end, — nay, not the end — For, wait — I'll end — not leave you that excuse! When we were parted, — shall I go on there? I was presently brought to Rome — yes, here I stood Opposite yonder very crucifix — And there sat you and you, Sirs, quite the same. I heard charge, and bare question, and told tale Noted down in the book there, — turn and see If, by one jot or tittle, I vary now! I' the color the tale takes, there's change per- haps; 'T is natural, since the sky is different, Eclipse in the air now; still, the outline stays. I showed you how it came to be my part To save the lady. Then your clerk produced Papers, a pack of stupid and impure Banalities called letters about love — Love, indeed, — I could teach who styled them so, Better, I think, though priest and loveless both! " — How was it that a wife, young, innocent, And stranger to your person, wrote this page? " — " — She wrote it when the Holy Father wrote The bestiality that posts through Rome, Put in his mouth by Pasquin." "Nor perhaps Did you return these answers, verse and prose, Signed, sealed and sent the lady? There's your hand!" " — This precious piece of verse, I really judge, Is meant to copy my own character, A clumsy mimic; and this other prose, Not so much even; both rank forgery: Verse, Seneca? Hamlet's verse? When Saint John wrote The tract 'De Tribus,' I wrote this to match." " — How came it, then, the documents were found At the time of your departure? " — "I opinia. Because there were no documents to find In my presence, — you must hide before you find. Who forged them hardly practised in my view; Who found them waited till I turned my back. " — And what of the clandestine visits paid, Nocturnal passage in and out the house With its lord absent? 'T is alleged you climbed . . . . " — Flew on a broomstick to the man? the man! Who witnessed or will testify this trash? " — The trusty servant, Margherita's self, Even she who brought you letters, you con- fess, And, you confess, took letters in reply: Forget not we have knowledge of the facts! " — "Sirs, who have knowledge of the facts, de- fray The expenditure of wit I waste in vain, Trying to find out just one fact of all! She who brought letters from who could not write, And took back letters to who could not read, — Who was that messenger, of your charity? " — Well, so far favors you the circumstance That the same messenger . . . how shall we say? . . . Sub imputations meretricia Laborat. — which makes accusation null:
GIUSEPPE CAPONSACCHI

We waive this woman's:— naught makes void the next.

Borsi, called Venerino, he who drove,
O' the first night when you fled away, at length
Deposes to your kissings in the coach, — Frequently, frantic " . . . When deposed he so?
" After some weeks of sharp imprison-

" " Granted by friend the Governor, I engage"—
" For his participation in your flight!
At length his obduracy melting made
The avowal mentioned " . . . " Was dismissed forthwith
To liberty, poor knave, for recompense,
Sirs, give what credit to the lie you can!
For me, no word in my defense I speak,
And God shall argue for the lady!"

So

Did I stand question, and make answer, still
With the same result of smiling disbelief,
Polite impossibility of faith
In such affected virtue in a priest;
But a showing fair play, an indulgence, even,
To none one worse than others after all—
Who had not brought disgrace to the order, played
Discreetly, ruffled gown nor ripped the cloth
In a bungling game at romps: I have told you, Sirs—

If I pretended simply to be pure
Honest and Christian in the case, — absurd!
As well go boast myself above the needs
O' nature, careless how meat smells,
Wine tastes, — a saint above the smack! But Once

Abate my crest, own flaws! the flesh, agree
To go with the herd, be hog no more nor less,
Why, hogs in common herd have common rights:
I must not be unduly borne upon,
Who just romanced a little, sowed wild oats,
But 'scapeed without a scandal, flagrant fault.
My name helped to a mirthful circumstance:
"Joseph!" would do well that see!
Undoubtedly — some toying with the wife,
But as for ruffian violence and rape,
Potipher pressed too much on the other side!
The intrigue, the eloquence, the disguise,—
Well charged!
The letters and verse looked hardly like the truth.
Your apprehension was — of guilt enough
To be compatible with innocence,
So, punished best a little and not too much.
Had I struck Guido Franceschini's face,
You had counselled me to withdraw for my own sake,
Balk him of brav-o hiring. Friends came round.

Congratulated, " Nobody mistakes!!!
The pecadillo once the forfeiture defines
The pecadillo: Guido gives his share,
His wife is free of husband and hook-nose,
The mouldy viands and the mother-in-law.
To Civitas with you and amuse the time,
Traveesty us ' De Raptu Helena!
A funny figure must the husband cut

When the wife makes him skip, — too ticklish, eh?

Do it in Latin, not the Vulgar, then!
Seasons — we'll copy and send his Eminence.
Mind — one iambus in the final foot!
He'll rectify it, be your friend for life!"

Oh, Sirs, depend on me for much new light
Thrown on the justice and religion here
By this proceeding, much fresh food for thought!

And I was just set down to study these
In relegation, two short days ago,
Admiring how you read the rules, when, clap,
A thunder comes into my solitude —
I am caught up in a whirlwind and cast here,
Told of a sudden, in this room where so late
You dealt out law artfully, that those scales,
I meekly bowed to, took my allotment from,
Guido has snatched at, broken in your hands,
Metes to himself the murder of his wife,
Full measure, pressed down, running over now!
Can I assist to an explanation? — Yes,
I rise in your esteem, sagacious Sirs,
Stand up a renderer of reasons, not
The officious priest would personate Saint George

For a mock Princess in undragedons days,
What, the blood startles you? What, after all
The priest who needs must carry sword on May find imperative use for it? Then, there was A Princess, was a dragon belching flame,

And should have been a Saint George also?

Then,

There might be worse schemes than to break the bonds
At Arezzo, lead her by the little hand,
Till she reached Rome, and let her try to live? But
You were law and gospel, — would one please

Stand back, allow your faculty elbow-room?
You blind guides who must needs lead eyes
Fools, alike ignorant of man and God!
What was there here should have perplexed your wit
For a wink of the owl-eyes of you? How miss, then,

What's now forced on you by this flare of fact—
As if Saint Peter failed to recognize Nero as no apostle, John or James,
Till some one burned a martyr, made a torch
O' the blood and fat to show his features by!
Could you fail read this cartulary aught
On head and front of Franceschini there,—

Large - lettered like hell's masterpiece of print,

That he, from the beginning pricked at heart
By some lust, leech of hate against his wife,
Plotted to plague her into overt sin
And shame, would slay Pompilia body and soul,

And save his mean self — miserably caught
I' the quagmire of his own tricks, cheats and lies?
— That himself wrote those papers,— from himself.
To himself,— which, i' the name of me and her,
His mistress-messenger gave her and me,
Touching us with such pastules of the soul
That she and I might take the taint, be shown
To the world and shuddered over, speckled so?
— That the agent put her sense into my words,
Made substitution of the thing she hoped,
For the thing she had and held, its opposite,
While the husband in the background bit his lips
At each fresh failure of his precious plot?
— That when at the last we did rush each on each,
By no chance but because God willed it so,—
The spark of truth was struck from out our souls—
Made all of me, descried in the first glance,
Seem false and honest and permissible love
O' the good and true — as the first glance told me
There was no duty patent in the world
Like daring try to be good and true myself,
Leaving the shows of things to the Lord of our souls—
And Prince o' the Power of the Air. Our very flight,
Even to its most ambiguous circumstance,
Irrefragably proved how futile, false . . .
Why, men — men and not boys — boys and not babes—
Babes and not beasts — beasts and not stocks and stones! —
Had the liar's lie been true one pin-point speck,
Were 't the accepted suitor, free o' the place,
Disposer of the time, to come at a call
And go at a wink as who should say me nay,—
What need of flight, what were the gain therefrom
But just damnation, failure or success?
Damnation pure and simple to her the wife
And me the priest — who bartered private bliss
For public reprobation, the safe shade
For the sunshine which men seek to pelt me by:
What other advantage — we who led the days
And nights alone i' the house — was flight to find?
In our whole journey did we stop an hour,
Diverge a foot from strait road till we reached
Or would have reached — but for that fate of ours—
The father and mother, in the eye of Rome,
The eye of yourselves we made aware of us
At the first fall of misfortune? And indeed
You did so far give sanction to our flight,
Confirm its purpose, as lend helping hand,
Deliver up Pomppilia not to him
She fled, but those the flight was ventured for,
Why then could you, who stopped short, not go on
One poor step more, and justify the means,
Having allowed the end? — not see and say,
"Here is the exceptional conduct that should claim
To be exceptionally judged on rules
Which, understood, make no exception here
— Why play instead into the devil's hands
By dealing so ambiguously as gave
Guido the power to intervene like me,
Prove one exception more? I saved his wife
Against law: against law he slays her now;
Deal with him!

I have done with being judged.
I stand here guiltless in thought, word and deed,
To the point that I apprise you,— in contest
For all misapprehending ignorance
O' the human heart, much more the mind of Christ,—
That I assuredly did bow, was blessed
By the revelation of Pomppilia. There!
Such is the final fact I fling you, Sirs,
To mouth and mumble and misinterpret:
there!
"The wast'rs in love," have it the vulgar way!
Unpriest me, rend the rags o' the vestments do—
Degrade deep, disenfranchise all you dare—
Remove me from the midst, no longer priest
And fit companion for the like of you—
Your gay Abati with the well-turned leg
And rose i' the hat-rim, Canones, cross at neck
And silk-mask in the pocket of the gown,
Biski bishop with the world's mask still unabashed
From the rocket; I'll no more of these good things:
There's a crack somewhere, something that's unsound
I' the rattle!

For Pomppilia — be advised,
Build churches, go pray! You will find me there,
I know, if you come,— and you will come,
Know—
Why, the wast'rs a Judge weeping! Did not say
You were good and true at bottom? You see the truth—
I am glad I helped you: she helped me just so
But for Count Guido,— you must counsel there!
I bow my head, bend to the very dust,
Break myself up in shame of faultiness,
I had him one whole moment, as I said—
As I remember, as will never out
O' the thoughts of me,— I had him in arm's reach
There, — as you stand, Sir, now you cease to sit,—
I could have killed him ere he killed his wife,
And did not: he went off alive and well
And then effected this last feat — through me!
Me — not through you — dismiss that fear!
"Twas you
Hindered me staying here to save her,— not
From leaving you and going back to him
And doing service in Arno? Come,
Instruct me in procedure! I conceive—
GIUSEPPE CAPONSACCHI

In all due self-abasement might I speak—
How I will deal with Guido: oh, not death!
Death, if it let her life be: otherwise
Not death,—your lights will teach you clearer!
Certainly have an instinct of my own
I' the matter: bear with me and weigh its worth!
Let us go away—leave Guido all alone
Back on the world again that knows him now!
I think he will be found (indulge so far!)
Not to die so much as slide out of life,
Pushed by the general horror and common hate
Low, lower,—left o' the veryledge of things,
I seem to see him catch convulsively
One by one at all honest forms of life,
At reason, order, decency and use—
To cramp him and get foothold by at least:
And still they disengage them from his clutch.
"What, you are he, then, had Pompilia once
And so forwent her? Take not up with us!"
And thus I see him slowly and surely edged
Off all the table-land whence life upsprings
Aspiring to be immortal.

As the snake, hatched on hill-top by mischance,
Despite his wriggling, slip, slides, slithers down
Hillsides, lies low and prostrates on the smooth
Level of the outer place, lapsed in the vale:
So I lose Guido in the loneliness,
Silence and dank, till at the dolorous end,
At the horizontal line, creation's verge,
From what just is to absolute nothingness—
Whom is it, straining onward still, he meets?
What other man deep further in the fate,
Who, turning at the prize of a footfall?
To flatter him and promise friendship?
Aspiring to be immortal.
Discoverers in the act a frightful face—
Judases, made monstrous by much solitude!
The two are at one now! Let them love their love
That twists and claws like hate, or hate their hate
That mops and mows and makes as it were love!
There, let them each tear each in devil's fun,
Or fondle this the other while malice ache—
Both teach, both learn detestability!
Kiss him the kiss, lascario! Pay that debt,
That snatch o' the slaver blistering on your lip,
By the better trick, the insult he spared
Christ—
Lure him the lure o' the letters, Ar GST!
Lick him o'er slimy-smooth with jelly-filth
O' the verse-and-prose pollution in love's guise
The cockatrice is with the basilisk!
There let them grapple, denizens o' the dark,
Foes or friends, but indissolubly bound
In their one spot out of the ken of God
Or care of man, forever and moreover!

Why, Sirs, what's this? Why, this is sorry and strange!

Futility, divagation: this from me
Bound to be rational, justify an act
Of sober man!—whereas, being moved so much,

I give you cause to doubt the lady's mind:
A pretty sarcasm for the world! I fear
You do her wit unjustly,—all through me!
Like my fate all through,—ineffective help!
A poor rash advocate I prove myself.
You might be angry with good cause: but sure
At the advocate,—only at the undue zeal
That spoils the force of his own plea, I think?
My part was just to tell you how things stand,
State facts and not be fustered at their fume,
But then 'tis a priest speaks: as for love,—no!

If you let buzz a vulgar fly like that
About your brains, as if I loved, forswoon
Indeed, Sirs, you do wrong! We had no thought
Of such infatuation, she and I:
There are many points that prove it: do be just!
I told you,—at one little roadside-place
I spent a good half-hour, paced to and fro
The garden; just to leave her free awhile,
I plucked a handful of Spring herb and bloom:
I might have sat beside her on the bench
Where the children were: I wish the thing had been,
Indeed: the event could not be worse, you know:
One more half-hour of her saved! She's dead now, Sirs!
While I was running on at such a rate,
Friends should have plucked me by the sleeve:
I went
Too much o' the trivial outside of her face
And the purity that shone there—plain to me,
Not to you, what more natural? Nor am I
Infatuated,—oh, I saw, be sure!
Her brow had not the right line, leaned too much,
Painters would say; they like the straight-up Greek:
This seemed bent somewhat with an invisible crown
Of martyr and saint, not such as art approves.
And how the dark orbs dwelt deep underneath,
Looked out of such a sad sweet heaven on me!
The lips, compressed a little, came forward too,
Careful for a whole world of sin and pain.
That was the face, her husband makes his plea.
He sought just to disfigure,—no offence
Beyond that! Sirs, let us be rational!
He needs must vindicate his honor,—ay,
Yet shirks, the coward, in a clown's disguise,
Away from the scene, endeavors to escape.
Now, had he done so, alain and left no trace
O' the slayer,—what were vindicated, pray?
You had found his wife disfigured or a corpse,
For what and by whom? It is too palpable!
Then, here's another point involving law:
I use this argument to show you meant
No calumny against us by that title
O' the sentence,—liars try to twist it so:
What penalty it bore, I had to pay
Till further proof should follow of innocence—
Probations of defectum,—proof?
How could you get proof without trying us?
You went through the preliminary form,
Stopped there, contrived this sentence to amuse
THE RING AND THE BOOK

The adversary. If the title ran
For more than fault imputed and not proved,
That was a simple penman's error, else
A slip i' the phrase, — as when we say of you
"Charged with injustice" — which may either be
Or not be, — 'tis a name that sticks mean-

Another relevant matter: fool that I am!
Not what I wish true, yet a point friends urge:
It is not true, — yet, since friends think it helps,
She only tried me when some others failed —
Began with Conti, whom I told you of,
And Guicchini, Guido's kinsfolk both,
And when abandoned by them, not before,
Turned to me. That's conclusive why she turned.

Much good they got by the happy cowardice!
Conti is dead, poisoned a month ago:
Does that much strike you as a sin? Not much,
After the present murder, — one mark more
On the traitor's skin, — what is blacker by blacker still?
Conti had come here and told truth. And so
With Guicchini; he's condemned of course
To the galleys, as a friend in this affair,
Tried and condemned for no one thing i' the world.
A fortnight since by who but the Governor? —
The just judge, who refused Pompilia help
At first blush, being her husband's friend, you know.
There are two tales to suit the separate courts,
Arezzo and Rome: he tells you here, we fled
Alone, unhelped, — lays stress on the main fault
The spiritual sin, Rome looks to: but elsewhere
He likes best we should break in, steal bear off,
Be fit to hang and pillory and flog —
That's the charge goes to the heart of the Governor:
If these unpriest me, you and I may yet
Converse, Vincenzo Marzi-Medici!
Oh, Sira, there are worse men than you, I say!
More easily duped, I mean; this stupid lie,
Its liar never dared propound in Rome,
He gets Arezzo to receive, — nay more,
Gets Florence and the Duke to authorize!
This is their Rota's sentence, their Granduke Signs and seals! Rome for me henceforward —
Rome, Rome,
Where better men are, — most of all, that man
The Augustinian of the Hospital,
Who writes the letter, — he confessed, he says,
Many a dying person, never one
So sweet and pure and beautiful.
A good man! Will you make him Pope one day?
Not that he is not good too, this we have —
But old, — else he would have his word to speak.
His truth to teach the world: I thirst for truth,
But shall not drink it till I reach the source.

Sirs, I am quiet again. You see, we are
So very pitiable, she and I,

Who had conceivably been otherwise.
Forget distemperature and idle heat!
Apart from truth's sake, what's to move so much?
Pompilia will be presently with God;
I am, on earth, as good as out of it.
A relegated priest; when exile ends,
I mean to do my duty and live long.
And she and I are mere strangers now: but priests
Should study passion; how else save mankind?
Who come for help in passionate extremes?
I do but play with an imagined life
Of who, unfettered by a vow, unblessed
By the higher call, — since you will have it so,

Leads it companioned by the woman there.
To live, and see her learn, and learn by her.
Out of the low obscure and petty world —
Or only see one purpose and one will Evolve themselves i' the world, change wrong to right:
To have to do with nothing but the true,
The good, the eternal — and these, not alone
In the main current of the general life,
But small experiences of every day,
Concerns of the particular hearth and home:
To learn not only by a comet's rush
But a rose's birth, — not by the grandeur,
But the comfort, Christ. All this, how far away!
Mere dejection, meet for a minute's dream! —
Just as a drudging student trims his lamp,
Opens his Plutarch, puts him in the place
Of Rome's Grecian; draws the patched gown close,
Dreams, "Thus should I fight, save or rule the world!" —
Then smilingly, contentedly, awakes
To the old solitary nothingness.
So I, from such communion, pass content .

O great, just, good God! Miserable me!

POMPILIA

I am just seventeen years and five months old.
And, if I lived one day more, three full weeks;
'Tis writ so in the church's register,
Lorenzo in Lucina, all my names
At length, so many names for one poor child,
— Francesca Camilla Vittoria Angela
Pompilia Comparini, — laughable!
Also 't is writ that I was married there
Four years ago: and they will add, I hope,
When they insert my death, a word or two, —
Omitting all about the mode of death, —
This, in its place, which this one cares to know,
That I had been a mother of a son
Exactly two weeks. It will be through grace
'O the Comune, not through any whim I have;
Because the boy was born at, so baptized
Close to, the Villa, in the proper church;
A pretty church, I say no word against,
Yet stranger-like, — while this Lorenzo seems
My own particular place, I always say,
I used to wonder, when I stood scarce high
As the bed here, what the marble life meant,
With half his body rushing from the wall,
Eating the figure of a prostrate man —
(To the right, it is, of entry by the door) —
An ominous sign to one baptized like me,
Married, and to be buried there, I hope.
And they should add, to have my life complete,
He is a boy and Gaetan by name —
Gaetano, for a reason, — if the friar
Don Celestino will ask this grace for me
Of Curate Ottoboni: he it was Baptized me: he remembers my whole life
As I do his grey hair.

All these few things
I know are true, — will you remember them?
Because time flies. The surgeon cared for me,
To count my wounds, — twenty-two dagger-wounds,
Five deadly, but I do not suffer much —
Or too much pain, — and am to die to-night.
Oh how good God is that my babe was born,
Better than born, baptized and bid away
Before this happened, safe from being hurt!
That had been sin God could not well forgive:
He was too young to smile and save himself.
When they took, two days after he was born,
My babe away from me to be baptized
And the hand in awe, for fear his foot should find,
The country-woman, used to nursing babes,
Said, “Why take on so? where is the great loss?
These next three weeks he will but sleep and feed,
Only begin to smile at the month’s end;
He would not know you, if you kept him here,
Sooner than that; so, spend three merry weeks
Saw in the Villa, getting strong and stout,
And then I bring him back to be your own,
And both of you may steal to — we know where!

The month — there wants of it two weeks this day!
Still, I half fancied when I heard the knock
At the Villa in the dusk, it might prove she —
Come to say, “Since he smiles before the time,
Why should I cheat you out of one good hour?
Back I have brought him; speak to him and judge!”

Now I shall never see him; what is worse,
When he grows up and gets to be my age,
He will seem hardly more than a great boy;
And if he says, “What was my mother like?”
People may answer, “Like girls of seventeen” —
And by how can he but think of this and that,
Lecia, Marisa, Sofia, who sitter or blush
When he regards them as such boys may do?
Therefore I wish some one will please to say
I looked already old though I was young;
Do I not say, if you are by to speak
Look nearer twenty! No more like, at least,
Girls who look arch or red when boys laugh,
Than the poor Virgin that I used to know
At our street-corner in a lonely niche, —

The babe, that sat upon her knees, broke off,—
Thin white glazed clay, you pitied her the more:
She, not the gay ones, always got my rose.

How happy those are who know how to write!
Such could write what their son should read in time.
Had they a whole day to live out like me.
Also my name is not a common name,
“Pompilia,” and may help to keep apart
A little the thing I am from what girls are.
But then how far away, how hard to find
Will anything about me have become,
Even if the boy bethe him himself and ask!
No father that ever knew at all,
Nor ever had — no, never had, I say!
That is the truth, — nor any mother left.
Out of the little two weeks that she lived.
Fit for such memory as might assist:
As good too as no family, no name,
Not even poor old Pietro’s name, nor hers,
Poor kind unwise Violante, since it seems
They must not be my parents any more.
That is why something put it in my head
To call the boy “Gaetano” — no old name
For sorrow’s sake; I looked up to the sky
And took a new saint to begin anew.
One who has only been made saint — how long?
Twenty-five years: so, carrefuller, perhaps,
To guard a namesake than those old saints grew
Tired out by this time, — see my own five saints!

On second thoughts, I hope he will regard
The history of me as what some one dreamed,
And got to disbelieve it at the last:
Since to myself it dwindles fast to that,
Sheer dreaming and impossibility, —
Just in four days too! All the seventeen years,
Not once did a suspicion visit me
How very different a lot is mine
From any other woman’s in the world.
The reason must be, ’t was by step and step
It got to grow so terrible and strange.
These strange woes stole on tiptoe, as it were,
Into my neighborhood and privacy,
Sat down where I sat, laid them where I lay;
And I was found familiarized with fear.
When friends broke in, held up a torch and cried,

“Why, you Pompilia in the cavern thus,
How comes that arm of yours about a wolf?
And the soft length, — lies in and out your feet
And laps you round the knee, — a snake it is!”
And so on.

Well, and they are right enough,
By the torch they hold up now: for first,
observe,
I never had a father, — no, nor yet
A mother: my own boy can say at least,
“I had a mother whom I kept two weeks!”
Not I, who little used to doubt... I doubt
Good Pietro, kind Violante, gave me birth?
They loved me always as I love my babe (Nearly so, that is — quite so could not be —)
THE RING AND THE BOOK

Flourishing out of your five finger-ends,
And all the rest of you so brown and rough:
Why is it you are turned a sort of tree?
You know the figures never were ourselves
Though we nicknamed them so. Thus, all my
As well what was, as what, like this, was
Looks old, fantastic and impossible:
I touch a fairy thing that fades and fades:
Even to my babe! I thought, when he was Sometime began for ones that would not end.
Nor change into a laugh at me, but stay
Forevermore, eternally quite mine.
Well, so he is,—but yet they bore him off.
The third day, lest my husband should be traps
And catch him, and by means of him catch me.
Since they have saved him so, it was well done:
Yet thence comes much confusion of what was
With what will be,—that late seems long ago,
And, what years should bring round, already
Come.
Till even he withdraws into a dream
As the rest do: I fancy him grown great,
Strong, stern, a tall young man who tutors us
Frowns with the others. "Poor imprudent child!
Why do you venture out of the safe street?
Why go so far from help to that lone house?
Why open at the whisper and the knock?"

Six days ago when it was New Year's day,
We bent above the fire and talked of him,
What he should do when he was grown and great.
Violante, Pietro, each had given the arm
I leant on, to walk by, from couch to chair
And fireside,—laughed, as I lay safe at last,
"Pomphila's march from bed to board is made,
Pomphila back again and with a babe.
Shall one day lead his arm and help her walk!"
Then we all wished each other more New Years.
Pietro began to scheme—"Our cause is gained;
The law is stronger than a wicked man:
Let him henceforth go his way, leave us ours!
We will avoid the city, tempt no more
The greedy ones by feasting and parade,—
Live at the other villa, we know where,
Still farther off, and we can watch the babe
Grow fast in the good air; and wood is cheap
And wine sincere outside the city gate.
I still have two or three old friends will grope
Their way along the mere half-mile of road,
With staff and lantern on a moonless night.
When one needs talk: they'll find me, never fear,
And I'll find them a flask of the old sort yet!
"Violante said, "You chatter like a crow:
Pomphila tires o' the tattle, and shall to bed:
Do not too much the first day,—somewhat more
To-morrow, and, the next, begin the cape

Did for me all I meant to do for him.
Till one surprising day, three years ago,
They both declared, at Rome, before some judge
In some court where the people flocked to hear,
That really I had never been their child,
Was a mere castaway, the careless crime
Of an unknown man, the crime and care too much

Of a woman known too well,—little to these,
Therefore, of whom I was the flesh and blood :
What them to Pietro and Violante, both
No more my relatives than you or you?
Nothing to them? You know what they declared.

So with my husband,—just such a surprise,
Such a mistake, in that relationship!
Every one says that husbands love their wives,
Guard them and guide them, give them happiness;
'Tis duty, law, pleasure, religion: well,
You see how much of this comes true in mine!
People indeed would fail have somehow proved
He was no husband: but he did not hear.
Or would not wait, and so has killed us all.
Then there is,—only let me name one more!
There is the friend,—men will not ask about,
But tell nitraths of, and give nicknames to,
And think my lover, most surprise of all!
Do only hear, is it the priest they mean,
Giuseppe Caponsacchi: a priest—love,
And love me! Well, yet people think he did.
I am married, he has taken priestly vows,
They know that, and yet go on, say, the name,
"Yes, how he loves you!?" "That was love"—
— they say,
When anything is answered that they ask:
Or else "No wonder you love him"—they say.
Then they shake heads, pity much, scarcely blame—
As if we of neither of us lacked excuse,
And anyhow are punished to the full,
And downright love stones for everything!
Nay, I heard read out in the public court
Before the judge, in presence of my friends,
Let's not was said the priest had sent to me,
And other letters sent him by myself,
We being lovers!

Listen what this is like!
When I was a mere child, my mother—
that's Violante, you must let me call her so,
Nor waste time, trying to unlearn the word,
She brought a neighbor's child of my own age
To play with me of rainy afternoons:
And, since there hung a tapestry on the wall,
We two agreed to find each other out
Among the figures. "Tisbe, that is you,
With half-moon on your hair-knot, spear in hand,
Flying, but no wings, only the great scarf
Blown up a blush rainbow at your back:
Call off your bower and 'leave the stag alone!"

—And there are you, Pomphila, such green

And hood and coat! I have spun wool enough.
Oh what a friendly eve was that!
And, next day, about noon, out Pietro went —
He was so happy and would talk so much,
Until Violante pushed and laughed him forth
Said weaning, how the cold, — "So much to see
I' the churches! Swathe your throat three times!" she cried,
"And, above all, beware the slippery ways,
And bring us all the news by supper-time!"
He came back late, laid by cloak, staff and hat,
Powdered so thick with snow it made us laugh,
Rolled a great log upon the ash o' the hearth,
And bade Violante treat us to a flask,
Because he had obeyed her faithfully,
Gone sight-see through the seven, and found no church.
To his mind like San Giovanni — "There's the fold,
And all the sheep together, big as cats!
And such a shepherd, half the size of life,
Starts up and hears the angel" — when, at the door,
A tap: we started up: you know the rest.

Pietro at least had done no harm, I know;
Nor even Violante, so much harm as makes
Such revenge lawful. Certainly she erred —
Did wrong, how shall I dare say otherwise? —
In telling that first falsehood, buying me
From my poor fainty mother at a price,
To pass off upon Pietro as his child.
If one should take my babe, give him a name,
Say he was not Gaetano and my own,
But that a sonmother had won me in his mouth
And hands and feet, — how very false were that! —
No good could come of that; and all harm did.
Yet if a stranger were to represent "Needs must you either give your babe to me
And let me call him mine for evermore,
Or let your husband get him" — ah, my God,
That were a trial I refuse to face! —
Well, just so here: it proved wrong but seemed right.
To poor Violante — for there lay, she said,
My poor real dying mother in her rage,
Who put me from her with the life and all,
Poverty, pain, shame and disease at once,
To die the easier by what price I fetched —
Also (I hope) because I should be spared
Sorrow and sin, — why may not that have helped?

My father, — he was no one, any one,
The worse, the likelier, — call him, — he who came.
Was wicked for his pleasure, went his way,
And left no trace to track by; there remained
Nothing but me, the unnecessary life,
To catch up or let fall, — and yet a thing
She could make happy, be made happy with,
This poor Violante, — who would frown thereat?

Well, God, you see! God plants us where we grow.
It is not that, because a bud is born
At a wild brier's end, full i' the wild beast's way.
We ought to pluck and put it out of reach.
On the oak-tree top, — say, "There the bud belongs!"
She thought, moreover, real lies were lies told
For harm's sake; whereas this had good at heart,
Good for my mother, good for me, and good
For Pietro who was meant to love a babe,
And needed one to make his life of use,
Receive his house and land when he should die.
Wrong, wrong, and always wrong! how plainly wrong!
For see, this fault kept pricking, as faults do,
All the same at her heart: this falsehood hatched,
She could not let it go nor keep it fast.
She told me so, — the first time I was found
Locked in her arms once more after the pain,
When the nuns let me leave them and go home,
And both of us cried all the cases away, —
This it was set her on to make amends;
This brought about the marriage — simply this!
Do let me speak for her you blame so much!
When Paoli, my husband's brother, found me out,
Heard there was wealth for who should marry me,
So, came and made a speech to ask my hand
For Guido, — she, instead of piercing straight
Through the pretense to the ignoble truth,
Fancied she saw God's very finger point,
Designate just the time for planting me
(The wild-brier slip she plucked to love and wear)
In soil where I could strike real root, and grow,
And get to be the thing I called myself:
For, wife and husband are one flesh, God says,
And I, whose parents seemed such and were none,
Should in a husband have a husband now,
Find nothing, this time, but what it seemed,
— All truth and no confusion any more,
I know she meant all good to me, all pain
To herself, — since how could it be aught but pain
To give me up, so, from her very breast,
The wilding flower-tree-branch that, all those years,
She had got used to feel for and find fixed?
She meant well: it has been so ill! i' the main?
That is but fair to ask: one cannot judge
Of what has been the ill or well of life,
The day that one is dying, — sorrows change
Into not altogether sorrow-like: I do see strangeness but scarce misery,
Now it is over, and no danger more.
My child is safe; there seems not so much pain.
It comes, most like, that I am just absolved,
Purged of the past, the foul in me, washed fair,
One cannot both have and not have, you know, —
Being right now, I am happy and color things.
Yes, everybody that leaves life sees all
Softened and bettered: so with other sights:
To me at least was never evening yet
But seemed far beautifuller than its day,
For past is past.

There was a fancy came,
When somewhere, in the journey with my friend,
We stepped into a hotel to get food;
And there began a yelp here, a bark there,—
Misunderstanding creatures that were wrong
And vexed themselves and us till we retired.
The hotel's life: no matter what dogs bit
Or cat scratched in the hotel I break from,
All outside is lone field, moon and such peace—
Flowing in, filling up as with a sea.
Whereon comes Someone, walks fast on the white,
Jesus Christ's self, Don Celestine declares,
To meet me and calm all things back again.

Beside, up to my marriage, thirteen years
Were, each day, happy as the day was long:
This may have made the change too terrible.
I know that when Violante told me first
The cavalier—she meant to bring next morn,
Whom I cannot also let take, kiss my hand—
Would be at San Lorenzo the same eve
And marry me,—which over, we should go
Home both of us without him as before,
And, till she bade speak, I must hold my tongue.

Such being the correct way with girl-brides,
From whom one word would make a father blush,—
I know, I say, that when she told me this,
—Well, I no more saw sense in what she said
That which I did not understand in
What I gave away in people clipping wool;
Only lay down and let myself be clipped.
And when next day the cavalier who came—(Beth had told me that the slim young man
With wings at head, and wings at feet, and sword
Threatening a monster, in our tapestry,
Would eat a girl else,—was a cavalier)—
When he proved Guido Franceschina,—old
And nothing like so tall as I myself,
Hook-nosed and yellow in a bush of beard,
Much like a thing I saw on a boy's wrist,
He called an owl and used for catching birds,—
And when he took my hand and made a smile—
Why, the uncomfortableness of it all
Seemed hardly more important in the case
Than—when one gives you, say, a coin to spend—

Its newness or its oldness; if the piece
Weigh properly and buy you what you wish,
No matter whether you get grime or glare!
Men take the coin, return you grapes and figs.
Here, marriage was the coin, a dirty piece
Would purchase me the praise of those I loved:
About what else should I concern myself?

So, hardly knowing what a husband meant,
I supposed this or any man would serve,
No whit the worse for being so uncouth:

For I was ill once and a doctor came
With a great ugly hat, no plume thereto,
Black jerkin and black buckles and black sword,
And white sharp beard over the ruff in frost.
And to lean so sour-faced and anserc!
—Who felt my pulse, made me put out my tongue,
Then oped a phial, dripped a drop or two
Of a black bitter something,—I was cured!
What mattered the fierce beard or the sour face?
It was the physic beautified the man,—
Master Malpichi, never met his matches!
In Rome, they said, —so ugly all the same!

However, I was hurried through a storm,
Next day was the eve of December's deadliest day—
How it rained!—through our street and the Lion's mouth
And the bit of Corso, —cloaked round, covered close,
I was like something strange or contraband,—
Into black San Lorenzo, up the aisle,
My mother keeping hold of me so tight,
I fancied we were come to see a corpse.
Before the altar which she pulled me toward,
There we found waiting an unpleasant priest
Who proved the brother, not our parish priest.
But one with his beast-making mouth and eye,
Paul, whom I know since to my cost.
And I heard the heavy church-door lock out help
Behind us: for the customary warmth,
Two tapers shivered on the altar. "Quick—Lose no time!" cried the priest. And straight down
From ... what's behind the altar where he hid—
Hawk-nose and yellowness and bush and all
Stepped Guido, caught—say, his hand, and there
O! the chancel, and the priest had opened lock.
Read here and there, made me say that said this,
And after, told me I was now a wife,
Honest indeed, since Christ thus wed the Church,
And therefore turned he water into wine,
To show I should obey my spouse like Christ.
Then the two slipped aside and talked apart.
And I, silent and scared, got down again
And joined my mother, who was weeping now.
Nobody seemed to mind us any more.
And both of us on tip-toe found our way
To the door which was unlocked by this, and wide.
When we were in the street, the rain had stopped,
All things looked better. At our own hearth,
Violante whispered, "No one syllable
To Pietro! Girl-brides never breathe a word!"
"—Well treated to a wetting, draggle-tails!"
Laughed Pietro as the door was open—"Very near
You made me brave the gutter's roaring sea,
To carry off from roost old dove and young.
Trussed up in church, the cote, by me, the kiss!
What do these priests mean, praying folk to death

THE RING AND THE BOOK
Os stormy afternoons, with Christmas close
To wash our sins off nor require the rain?
Viola gave my hand a timely squeeze,
Madonna saved me from immodest speech,
I kissed him and was quiet, being a bride.

When I saw nothing more, the next three weeks,
Of Guido — "Nor the Church sees Christ"
I thought I:
"Nothing is changed however, wine is wine
And water only water in our house.
Nor did I see that ugly doctor since
That cure of the illness: just as I was cured,
I am married, — neither scarecrow will return."

Three weeks, I chuckled — "How would Giulia stare,
And Tecla smile and Tisbe laugh outright,
Were it not impudent for brides to talk?" —
Until one morning, as I sat and sang
At the broderie-frame alone 'i' the chamber, —

Voices, two, three together, sobbings too,
And my name, "Guido," "Paolo," flung like stones
From each to the other! In I ran to see,
There stood the very Guido and the priest
With sly face, — formal but nowise afraid, —
While Pietro seemed all red and angry, scarce
Able to stutter out his wrath in words;
And this it was that made my mother sob,
As he reproached her — "You have murdered us,
Me and yourself and this our child beside!" —
Then Guido interposed, "Murdered or not,
Be it enough your child is now my wife!
I claim and come to take her," Paul put in,
"Consider — kinsman, dare I term you so? —
What is the good of your sagacity
Except to counsel in a strait like this?
I guarantee the parties man and wife
Whether you like or lose the lit, bless or ban.
Milk milk be put back within the bowl —
The done thing, undone? You, it is, we look
For counsel to, you fittest will advise!
Since milk, though split and spoilt, doves marble good.

Better we down on knees and scrub the floor,
Than sigh, 'the waste would make a syllabub!' —
Help us so turn disaster to account,
So predispose the groom, he needs shall grace
The bride with favor from the very first
Not begin marriage an embittered man!" —
He smiled, — the game so wholly in his hands!
While fast and faster sobbed Violante — "Ay,
All of us murdered, past averting now!
O my sin, O my secret!" and much like.

Then I began to half surmise the truth
Something had happened, low, mean, underhand.

False, and my mother was to blame, and I
To pity, whom all spoke of, none addressed:
I was the chattel that had caused a crime.
A good mute, — those who tangled must untie
The embroilment. Pietro cried, "Withdraw,
my child!
She is not helpful to the sacrifice

At this stage, — do you want the victim by
While you discuss the value of her blood?
For her sake, I consent to hear you talk:
Go, child, and pray God help the innocent!"

I did go and was praying God, when came
Violante, with eyes swollen and red enough,
But movement on her mouth for make-believe
Matters were somehow getting right again.
She bade me sit down by her side and hear.
"You are too young and cannot understand,
Nor did your father understand at first.
I wished to benefit all three of us,
And when he failed to take my meaning, —
why,
I tried to have my way at unawares —

As if I put before him wholesome food
Instead of broken virtue, — he finds change
I' the viands, never cares to reason why,
But falls to blaming me, would fling the plate
From window, scandalize the neighborhood,
Even while he smacks his lips, — men's way,
my child!
But either you have prayed him unperverse
Or I have talked him back into his wits:
And Paulo was a help in time of need, —
Guido, not much — my child, the way of men!
A priest is more a woman than a man,
And Paulo did wonders to persuade. In short,
Yes, he was wrong, your father sees and says;
My scheme was worth attempting: and bears fruit,

Gives you a husband and a noble name,
A palace and no end of pleasant things.
What do you care about a handsome youth?
They are so volatile, and tease their wives!
This is the kind of man to keep the house.
We lose no daughter, — gain a son, that's all:
For 't is arranged we never separate,
Nor miss, in our gray time of life, the tints
Of you that color eye to match with morn.
In good or ill, we share and dear each other,
And cast our lots into a common lap,
And all three die together as we lived!
Only, at Arezzo, — that's a Tuscan town,
Not so large as this noisy Rome, no doubt,
But older far and finer much, say folk, —
In a great palace where you will be queen,
Know the Archbishop and the Governor,
And we see homage done you ere we die.
Therefore, be good and pardon!" — "Pardon
what?

You know things, I am very ignorant:
All is right if you only will not cry!"

And so an end! Because a blank begins
From when, at the word, she kissed me hard and hot,
And took me back to where my father leaned
Opposite Guido — who stood eying him,
As eyes the butcher the cast panting ox
That feals his fate is come, nor struggles more.
While Paul looked archly on, pricked brow at whiles
With the pen-point as to punish triumph there,
And said, "Count Guido, take your lawful wife Until death part you!"

All since is one blank,
Over and ended: a terrific dream.
Is the grave of dreams—of what they go!
Wake in a horror of heart-beats, you may—
Cry, "The dread thing will never from my thoughts!

Still, a few daylight doses of plain life,
Cock-crow and sparrow-chirp, or bleat and bell
Of goats that trot by, tinkling, to be milked;
And when you rub your eyes awake and wide,
Where is the harm o' the horror? Gone! So here.
I know I wake,—but from what? Blank, I say!

This is the note of evil: for good lasts.
Even when Don Celestine bade "Search and find!"
For your soul's sake, remember what is past,
The better to forgive it."—all in vain!
What was fast getting indistinct before,
Vanished outright. By special grace perhaps,
Between that first calm and this last, four years
Vanish,—one quarter of my life, you know.
I am held up, amid the nothingness,
By one or two truths only—thence I hang,
And there I live,—the rest is death or dream,
All but those points of my support. I think
Of what I saw at Rome once in the Square
O' the Spaniards, opposite the Spanish House:
There was a foreigner had trained a goat,
A predecessor: and there was a dog,
To climb up, stand straight on a pile of sticks
Put close, which gave the creature room enough:
When she was settled there, he, one by one,
Took away all the sticks, left just the four
Whereon the little heifer did really rest,
There she kept firm, all underneath was air.
So, what I hold by, are my prayer to God,
My hope, that came in answer to the prayer.
Some hand would interpose and save me—hand
Which proved to be my friend's hand: and,— Blest bliss,—

That fancy which began so faint at first,
That thrill of dawn's suffusion through my dark,
Which I perceive was promise of my child,
The light his unborn face sent long before,—
God's way of breaking the good news to flesh.
That is all left now of those four bad years,
Don Celestine urged, 'But remember more!'
Other men's faults may help me find your own.
I need the cruelty exposed, explained,
Of how can I advise you to forgive?"
He thought I could not properly forgive
Unless I ceased forgetting,—which is true:
For, bringing back reluctantly to mind
My husband's treatment of me,—by a light
That's later than my lifetime, I review
And comprehend much and imagine more,
And have but little to forgive at last.
For now,—be far and say,—is it not true

He was ill-used and cheated of his hope
To get enriched by marriage? Marriage gave Me and no money, broke the compact so:
He had a right to ask me on those terms,
As Pietro and Violante to declare
They would not give me: so the bargain stood:
They broke it, and he felt himself aggrieved,
Became unkind with me to punish them.
They said 't was he began deception first,
Nor, in one point whereto he pledged himself,
Kept promise: what of that, suppose it were?
Echoes die off, scarcely reverberate
You cannot find should all keep end and sing ill,
And never let our ears have done with noise?
Then my poor parents took the violent way
To thwart him,—he must needs retaliate,—
Wrong, Wrong, and all wrong,—better say, all blind!
As I myself was, that is sure, who else
Had understood the mystery: for his wife
Was bound in some sort to help somehow there.
It seems as if I might have interposed,
Blunted the edge of their resentment so,
Since he was urged me because they first vexed him;
"I will entreat them to desist, submit,
Give him the money and be poor in peace,—
Certainly not go tell the world: perhaps
He will grow quiet with his gains."

Yes, say
Something to this effect and you do well!
But then you have to see first: I was blind.
That is the fruit of all such wormy ways,
The indirect, the unapproved of God:
The direct, the unapproved of men,
Those faults not only all one's self.
Not even to substitute your good for bad,
Your straight for the irregular; zom steal!
Stupefied, profiteers, as cow or sheep
That miss a man's mind; anger him just twice.
By trial at repairing the first fault,
Thus, when he blamed me, "You are a coquet,
A lure-owl posturing to attract birds,
You look love-lures at theatre and church,
In walk, at window!"—that, I knew, was false:
But why he charged me falsely, whither sought
To drive me by such charge,—how could I know?
So, unaware, I only made things worse.
I tried to soothe him by abjuring walk,
Window, church, theatre, for good and all,
As if he had been in earnest: that, you know,
Was nothing like the object of his charge.
Yes, when I got my maid to supplicate
The priest, whose name she read when she could read
Those four false letters I was forced to bear
Though I could read no word of,—he should cease
Writing,—say, if he minded prayer of mine,
Cease from so much as even pass the street
Whereon our house looked,—in my ignorance
I was just thwarting Guido's true intent;
Which was, to bring about a wicked change
Of sport to earnest, tempt a thoughtless man
To write indeed, and pass the house, and more,
POMPILIA

Till both of us were taken in a crime,
He ought not to have wished me thus to act, lies,
Simulate folly: but—wrong or right, the wish—
I failed to apprehend its drift. How plain
It follows, — if I fell into such fault,
He also may have overstepped the mark,
Made mistake, by pertinacity of brain,
I, the whole sad strange plot, the grotesque intrigue
To make me and my friend unself ourselves,
Be other man and woman than we were?
Think it not, you who have the time! for
me,—
I cannot say less; more I will not say.
Leave it to God to cover and undo
Only, my dulness should not prove too much!
—Not prove that in a certain other point
Wherein my husband blamed me,—and you blame,
If I interpret smiles and shakes of head,—
I was dull too. Oh, if I dared but speak!
Must I speak? I am blamed that I forwent
A way to show, in my husband’s idiom,
That I was: I was firm, withstood, refused
—Women as you are, how can I find the words?
I felt there was just one thing Guido claimed
I had no right to give nor he to take;
We being in estrangement, soul from soul:
Till, when sought help, the Archbishop smiled,
Inquiring into privacies of life,
—Said I was blamable — (he stands for God)
Nowise entitled to exemption there.
Then I obeyed,—as surely had obeyed...
Were the injunction "Since your husband bids,
Swallow the burning coal he proffers you?"
But I did wrong, and he gave wrong advice
Though he were thrice Archbishop,—that, I know not!
Now I have got to die and see things clear.
Remember I was barely twelve years old
A child at marriage: I was let alone
For weeks, I told you, lived my child-life still Even at Arezzo, when I woke and found
First,... but I need not think of that again—
Over and ended! Try and take the sense
Of what I signify, if it must be so.
After the first, my husband, for hate’s sake,
Said one eve, when the simpler cruelty
Seemed somewhat dull at edge and fit to bear,
"We have been man and wife six months almost:
How long is this your comedy to last?
To this night to my chamber, not your own!"
At which word, I did rush—most the true
charge—
And gain the Archbishop’s house — he stands for God—
And fall upon my knees and clasp his feet,
Praying him hinder what my estranged soul
Refused to bear, though patient of the rest:
"Place me within a convent," I implored—
"Let me henceforward lead the virgin life
You praise in her you bid me imitate!"
What did he answer? — "Folly of ignorance!
Know, daughter, circumstances make or mar
Virginity, — ‘tis virtue or ‘tis vice.

That which was glory in the Mother of God
Had been, for instance, damnable in Eve
Created to be mother of mankind.
Had Eve, in answer to her Maker’s speech
‘Be fruitful, multiply, replenish earth’—
"Pursed ‘But I choose rather to remain
Single’—why, she had spared herself forthwith
Further probation by the apple and snake, Been pushed straight out of Paradise! For
see—
If motherhood be qualified impure,
I catch you making God command Eve sin!
—A blasphemy so like these Molinists’,
I must suspect you dip into their books;"
Then he pursued "‘I was in your covenant!’

No! There my husband never used deceit.
He never did by speech nor act imply
"Because of our souls’ yearning that we meet
And mix in soul through flesh, which yours and
mine
Wear and impress, and make their visible
selves,
—All which means, for the love of you and me,
Let us become one flesh, being one soul!”
He only stipulated for the wealth;
Honest so far. But when he spoke as plain—
Dreadfully honest also — "Since our souls
Stand each from each, a whole world’s width
Give me the fleshly resture I can reach
And rend and leave just fit for hell to burn!"
—Why, in God’s name, for Guido’s soul’s own sake
Imperilled by polluting mine,—I say,
I did resist; would I had overcome!

My heart died out at the Archbishop’s smile;
—It seemed so stale and worn a way o’ the
world,
As though ’t were nature frowning—"Here is Spring,
The sun shines as he alone at Adam’s fall,
The earth requires that warmth reach everywhere:
What, must your patch of snow be saved forsooth
Because you rather fancy snow than flowers?"
Something in this style he began with me.
Last he said, savagely for a good man,
"This explains why you call your husband harsh,
Harsh to you, harsh to whom you love. God’s Bread!
The poor Count has to manage a mere child
Whose parents leave untaught the simplest things
Their duty was and privilege to teach,—
Goodwives’ instruction, gossips’ lore: they laugh
And leave the Count the task,—or leave it
me!"
Then I resolved to tell a frightful thing—
"I am not ignorant,—know what I say,
Declaring this is sought for hate, not love.
Sir, you may hear things like almighty God.
I tell you that my housemate, yes, the priest
My husband’s brother, Canon Gisolamo—
Has taught me what depraved and misnamed
love
Means, and what outward signs denote the sin,
For he solicits me and says he loves.
The idle young priest, he knows this, and lets be.
Is it your counsel I bear this beside?"
"— More scandal, and against a priest this time!
What, 'tis the Canon now?" — less snapishly —
"Rip up, my child, for such a child you are,
The rod were too advanced a punishment!
Let's try the honeyed cake. A parable!
'Without a parable spake he not to them,'
There was a ripe round long black toothsome fruit,
Even a flower-fig, the prime boast of May;
And, to the tree, said... either the spirit o' the fig.
Or, if we bring in men, the gardener,
Archbishop of the orchard — had I time
To try o' the two which fits in best: indeed
It might be the Creator's will, but then
The tree should bear an apple, I suppose, —
Well, anyhow, one with authority said,
'Ripe fig, burst skin, regale the fig-pecker —
The bird wheresof thou art a quirkistle!'
'Nay,' with a flounce, replied the restful fig,
'I much prefer to keep my pulpy myself:
He may go breakfastless and dinnerless,
Supperless of one crimson seed, for me!'
So, back she flopped into her bunch of leaves.
He flew off, left her, — did the natural lord,—
And lo, three hundred thousand bees and wasps
Found her out, feasted on her to the shock: —
Such gain the fig's that gave its bird no bite!
The moral, — fools elude their proper lot,
Tempt other fools, get ruined all alike.
Therefore go home, embrace your husband quick!
Which if his Canon brother chance to see,
He will the sooner back to book again."

So, home I did go; so, the worst befell:
So, I had proof the Archbishop was just man,
And hardily that, and certainly no more.
For, miserable consequence to me,
My husband's hatred waxed nor waned at all,
His brother's boldness grew effrontery soon,
And my last stay and comfort in myself
Was forced from me: henceforth I looked to God.
Only, nor cared my desecrated soul
Should have fair walls, gay windows for the world.
God's glimmer, that came through the ruin-top,
Was witness why all lights were quenched inside:
Henceforth I asked God counsel, not mankind.

So, when I made the effort, freed myself,
They said — No care to save appearance here!
How sake, — when, how wanton, were enough!"
— Adding, it all came of my mother's life
— My own real mother, whom I never knew,
Who did wrong (if she needs must have done wrong)
Through being all her life, not my four years,
At mercy of the hateful: every beast
O' the field was wout to break that fountain's fence,
Trample the silver into mud so mirk
Heaven could not find itself reflected there.
Now they cry, "Out on her, who, splashy pool,
Besmeared turbidity and bitterness
To the daughter-stream where Guido dipt and drank!"

Well, since she had to bear this brand — let me!
The rather do I understand her now, —
From my experience of what hate calls love,—
Much love might be in what their love called hate.
If she said... what they call, said... as her child —
I shall believe she hoped in her poor heart
That I at least might try be good and pure,
Begin to live untempted, not go doomed.
And done with ere once found in snares, as she.
Oh and, my mother, is it all came to this?
Why should I trust those that speak ill of you.
When I mistrust who speaks even well of them?
Why, since all bound to do me good, did harm,
May not you, seeming as you harmed me most,
Have meant to do most good — and feed you a
From bramble-bush, whom not one orchard-tree
But drew bough back from, nor let one fruit fall?
This it was for you sacrificed your babe?
Gained just this, giving your heart's hope away
As I might give mine, loving it as you.
If... but that never could be asked of me!

There, enough! I have my support again,
Again the knowledge that my babe was, is,
Will be mine only. Him, by death, I give Outright to God, without a further care,—
But not to any parent in the world,—
So to be safe: why is it we repine?
What guardianship were safer could we choose?
All human plans and projects come to naught;
My life, and what I know of other lives,
Prove that: no plan nor project! God shall care!

And now you are not tired? How patient the All of you, — oh yes, patient this long while Listening, and understanding, I am sure!
Four days ago, when I was sound and well
And like to live, no one would understand.
People were kind, but smiled, "And what of him,
Your friend, whose tensive the rich dark-brown hides?"
There, there! — your lover, do we dream he was?
A priest too — never were such naughtiness!
Still, he thinks many a long think, never fear,
After that shy pale lady, — lay so light
For a moment in his arms, the lucky one!"
And so on: wherefore should I blame you much?
So we are made, such difference in minds,
Such difference too in eyes that see the minds!
That man, you misinterpret and misprise —
The glory of his nature, I had thought,
Shot itself out in white light, blazed the truth
Through every atom of his act with me:
Yet where I point you, through the crystal shrine,
Purity in quintessence, one dew-drop,
You all descry a spider in the midst.
One says, "The head of it is plain to see;"
And one, "They are the feet by which I judge;"
All say, "Those films were spun by nothing else."
Then, I must lay my babe away with God,
Not think of him again for gratitude.
Yes, my last breath shall wholly spend itself
In one attempt more to disperse the stain.
The mist from other breath fond mouths have made,
About a lustrous and pellucid soul:
So that, when I am gone but sorrow stays,
And people need assurance in their doubt.
If God set haza a servant, man a friend,
The yank a servile, and the vile a foe,—
Let him be present, by the name invoked,
Giuseppe Maria Caponsacchi!
There, Strength comes already with the utterance!
I will remember once more for his sake
The sorrow: for he lives and is belied.
Could he be here, how he would speak for me!
I had been miserable three drear years
In that dread palace and lay passive now,
When I first learned there could be such a man.
Thus it fell: I was at a public play,
In the last days of Carnival last March,
Brought there I knew not why, but now know well.
My husband put me where I sat, in front;
Then crouched down, breathed cold through me from behind,
Stationed I the shadow,—none in front could see.
I it was, faced the stranger-throng beneath,
The crowd with upturned faces, eyes one stare,
Voices one buzz. I looked but to the stage,
Whereon two lovers sang and interchanged
"True life is only love, love only bliss;
I love thee—thine I love!" then they embraced.
I looked thence to the ceiling and the walls,—
Over the crowd, those voices and those eyes,—
My thoughts went through the roof and out, to Rome.
On wings of music, waft of measured words,—
Set me down there, a happy child again,
Sure that to-morrow would be festa-day,
Hearing my parents praise past festas more,
And seeing they were old if I was young,
Yet wondering why they still would end discourse.
With "We must soon go, you abide your time,
And,—might we haply see the proper friend
Throw his arm over you and make you safe!"
Sudden I saw him; into my lap there fell
A foolish twist of comfits, broke my dream
And brought me from the air and laid me low,
As ruined as the soaring bee that’s reached
(Se Pietro told me at the Villa once)
By the dust-handful. There the comfits lay:
I looked to see who flung them, and I faced
This Caponsacchi, looking up in turn.
Ere I could reason out why, I felt sure,
Whoever flung them, his was not the hand,—
Up rose the round face and good-natured grin
Of one who, in effect, had played the prank,
From covert close beside the earnest face,—
Fat waggish Conti, friend of all the world.
He was my husband’s cousin, privileged
To throw the thing: the other, silent, grave,
Solemn almost, saw me, as I saw him.
There is a psalm Don Celestine recites,
"Had I a dove’s wings, how I fain would flee!"
The psalm runs not "I hope, I pray for wings."
Not "If wings fall from heaven, I fix them fast."
Simply "How good it were to fly and rest,
Have hope now, and one day expect content!" How well to do what I shall never do!
So I said, "Had there been a man like that,
To lift me with his strength out of all strife
Into the calm, how I could fly and rest!
I have a keeper in the garden here
Whose sole employment is to strike me low
If ever I, for solace, seek the sun.
Life means with me, a successful feigning death,
Lying stone-like, eluding notice so,
Foregoing here the turf and there the sky.
Suppose that man had been instead of this!"
Presently Conti laughed into my ear,
—Had tripped up to the raised place where I sat—
"Cousin, I flung them brazenly and hard!
Because you must be hurt, to look austere
As Caponsacchi yonder, my tall friend
A-grazing now.—Ah, Guido, you so close?
Keep on your knees, do! Beg her to forgive!
My corset battered like a cannon-ball.
Good-by, I’m gone!" —nor waited the reply.
That night at supper, out my husband broke,
"Why was that throwing, that buffoonery?
Do you think I am your dupe? What man would dare Throw comfits in a stranger lady’s lap?
’T was knowledge of you bred such insolence
In Caponsacchi: he dared shoot the bolt,
Using that Conti for his stalking-horse.
How could you see him this once and no more,
When he is always haunting hereabout
At the street-corner or the palace-side,
Publishing my shame and your impudence?
You are a wanton,—I a dupe, you think?
O Christ, what hinders that I kill her quick?"
Whereat he drew his sword and feigned a thrust.
All this, now,—being not so strange to me,
Used to such misconception day by day.
And broken-in to bear,—I bore, this time,
More quietly than woman should perhaps;
Repeated the mere truth and held my tongue.

Then he said, "Since you play the ignorant,
I shall instruct you. This amour, — commended
Or finished or midway in act, all 's one,—
'Tis the town-talk; so my revenge shall be.
Does he presume because he is a priest?
I warn him that the sword I wear shall pink
His lily-scented cassock through and through,
Next time I catch him underneath your caves!"
But he had threatened with the sword so oft
And, after all, not kept his promise. All
I said was, "Let God save the innocent!
Moreover, death is far from a bad fate.
I shall go pray for you and me, not him;
And then I look to sleep, some death or, worse,
Life."
So, I slept.

There may have elapsed a week,
When Margherita, — called my waiting-maid,
Whom it is said my husband found too fair —
Who stood and heard the charges and the reply,
Whence, as from her, went the matter rest.
From that night forward, but rang changes still
On this the thrust and that the shame, and how Good cause for jealousy cures jealous fools,
And what a paragon was this same priest
She talked about until I stopped my ears, —
She said, "A week is gone; you comb your hair,
Then go mope in a corner, cheek on palm,
Till night comes round again, — so, waste a weak
As if your husband menaced you in sport.
Have not I some acquaintance with his tricks?
Oh no, he did not stab the serving-man
Who made and sang the rhymes about me once!
For why? They sent him to the wars next day.
Nor poisoned he the foreigner, my friend,
Who wagered on the whiteness of my breast, —
The swarth skins of our city in dispute:
For, though he paid me proper compliment,
The Count well knew he was besotted with Somebody else, a skin as black as ink,
(As all the town knew save my foreigner) —
He found and wedded presently,— 'Why need Better revenge? — the Count asked. But what's here?
A priest that does not fight, and cannot wed,
Yet must be dealt with! If the Count took fire
For the poor pastime of a minute, — me —
What were the confabulations for yourself,
Countess and lady-wife and all the rest?
The priest will perish; you will grieve too late;
So shall the city-ladies' handsomest
Frankest and liberalest gentleman
Die for you, to appease a scurvy dog
Hanging's too good for. Is there no escape?
Were it not simple Christian charity
To warn the priest be on his guard, — save him
Assured death, save yourself from causing it?
I meet him in the street. Give me a glove,
A ring to show for token! Mum's the word!"

I answered, "If you were, as styled, my maid,
I would command you: as you are, you say,
My husband's intimate, — assist his wife
Who can do nothing but entreat 'Be still!'
Even if you speak truth and a crime is planned,
Leave help to God as I am forced to do!
There is no other help, or we should crave,
Seeing such evil with no human cure.
Reflect that God, who makes the storm desist
Can make an angry violent heart subside.
Why should we venture teach him governance?
Never address me on this subject more!"

Next night she said, "But I went, all the same,
— Ay, saw your Caponsacchi in his house,
And come back stuffed with news I must out-pour.
I told him, "Sir, my mistress is a stone:
Why should you harm her for no good you get?
For you do harm her — prowl about our place
With the Count never distant half the street,
Lurking at every corner, would you look!
'Tis certain she has witched you with a spell.
Are there not other beauties at your beck?
We all know, Donna This and Donna That
Die for a glance of yours, yet here you gase!
Go make them grateful, leave the stone its cold!
And he — oh, he turned first white and then red,
And then — 'To her behest I bow myself,
Whom I love with my body and my soul:
Only a word i' the bowing! See, I write
One little word, no harm to see or hear!
Then, fear no further!' This is what he wrote.
I know you cannot read, — therefore, let me!
'My idol!'

But I took it from her hand
And tore it into shreds. "Why, join the rest
Who harm me? Have I ever done you wrong?
People have told me 'tis you wrong myself:
Let it suffice! I either feel no wrong
Or else forgive it, — yet you turn my foe!
The others hunt me and you throw a noose!"

She muttered, "Have your wilful way!" I slept.

Whereupon... no, I leave my husband out!
It is not to do him more hurt, I speak.
Let it suffice, when misery was most,
One day, I swooned and got a respite so.
She stopped as I was slowly coming to,
This Margherita, ever on my trace,
And whispered — "Caponsacchi!"

If I drowned,
But woke afloat i' the wave with upturned eyes,
And found their first sight was a star! I turned —
For the first time, I let her have her will,
Heard passively, — "The imposthume at such head,

If I drowned,
But woke afloat i' the wave with upturned eyes,
And found their first sight was a star! I turned —
For the first time, I let her have her will,
Heard passively, — "The imposthume at such head,
One touch, one lancet - puncture would relieve,

And still no glance the good physician’s way
Who rids you of the torment in a trice!
Still he writes letters you refuse to hear.
He may prevent your husband, kill himself,
So desperate and all fordone is he!
Just hear the pretty verse he made to-day!
A sonnet from Mirtillo. ‘Peerless fair...’
All poetry is difficult to read.
— The sense of it is, anyhow, he seeks
Leave to contrive you an escape from hall,
And for that purpose asks an interview.
I can write, I can grant it in your name,
Or, what is better, lead you to his house.
Your husband dashes you against the stones;
This man would place each fragment in a shrine:
You hate him, love your husband!”

I returned,
“It is not true I love your husband,—no,
Nor hate this man. I listen while you speak,
— Assured that what you say is false, the same;
Much as when once, to me a little child,
A rough gaunt man in rags, with eyes on fire,
A crowd of boys and idlers at his heels,
Rushed as I crossed the Square, and held my head
In his two hands, ‘Here’s she will let me in.’
You little girl, whose eyes do good to mine,
I am the Pope, am Sextus, now the Sixth;
And that Twelfth Innocent, proclaimed to-day,
Is Lucifer disguised in human flesh!
The angels, met in conclave, crowned me!”

He gibbered and I listened; but I knew
All was delusion, ere folk interposed,
‘Unfasten him, the maniac!’ Thus I know
All your report of Caponsacchi false,
Folly or dreaming: I have seen so much
By that adventure at the spectacle,
The face I frontal that one first, last time:
He would belie it by such words and thoughts.
Therefore while you profess to show him me,
I ever see his own face. Get you gone!”

“— That will I, nor once open mouth again,—
No, by Saint Joseph and the Holy Ghost!
On your head be the damage, so adieu!”

And so many days, more deeds I must forget,
Till... what a strange thing now is to declare!

Since I say anything, say all if true!
And how my life seems lengthened as to serve!
It may be idle or inopportune,
But, true? — why, what was all I said but
truth,
Even when I found that such are untrue
Could only take the truth in through a lie?
Now — I am speaking truth to the Truth’s self:
God will lend credit to my words this time.

It had got half through April. I arose
One vivid daybreak,—who had gone to bed
In the old way my wont those last three years,
Careless until, the cup drained, I should die.
The last sound in my ear, the over-night,
Had been a something let drop on the sky.
In prattle by Margherita, “Soon enough
Gayeties end, now Easter’s past; a week,
And the Archbishop gets him back to Rome.
Every one leaves the town for Rome, this Spring,—
Even Caponsacchi, out of heart and hope,
Resign himself and follows with the flock.”
I heard this drop and drop like rain outside
Fast-falling through the darkness while she spoke:
So had I heard with like indifference,
“And Michael’s pair of wings will arrive first
At Rome, to introduce the company,
And bear him from our picture where he fights
Satan,—expect to have that dragon loose
And never a defender!” — my sole thought
Being still, as night came, “Done, another day!”

How good to sleep and so get nearer death!” —
When, what, first thing at daybreak, pierced the sleep
With a summons to me? Up I sprang alive,
Light in me, light without me, everywhere.
Change! A broad yellow sunbeam was let fall
From heaven to earth,—a sudden drawbridge lay,
Along which marched a myriad merry motes,
Mocking the flies that crossed them and rec-crossed
In rival dance, companions new-born too,
On the house-scares, a dripping ring of weed
Shook diamonds on each dull gray lattice-
square,
As first one, then another bird leapt by,
As light was off, and lo was back again,
Always with one voice,—where are two such joys? —
The blessed building—sparrow! I stepped forth, Stood on the terrace, — o’er the roofs, such sky!
My heart sang, “I too am to go away,
I too have something I must care about,
Carry away with me to Rome, to Rome!
The bird brings hither sticks and hairs and wool,
And nowhere else i’ the world; what fly breaks rank.
Falls out of the procession that befits,
From window here to window there, with all
The world to choose,—so well he knows his course?

I have my purpose and my motive too.
My march to Rome, like any bird or fly!
Had I been dead! How right to be alive!
Last night I almost prayed for leave to die,
Wished Guido all his pleasure with the sword
Or the poison, — poison, sword, was but a trick,
Harmless, may God forgive him the poor jest!
My life is charmed, will last till I reach Rome!
Yesterday, but for the sin,—ah, nameless be
The deed I could have dared against myself!”

POMPILIA 519
Now—see if I will touch an unripe fruit,
And risk the health I want to have and use!
Not to live, now, would be the wickedness,—
For life means to make haste and go to Rome
And leave Arezzo, leave all woes at once!"

Now, understand here, by no means mistake!
Long ago had I tried to leave that house
When it seemed such procedure would stop sin;
And till I failed more the more I tried—at first
The Archbishop, as I told you,—next, our lord
The Governor,—indeed I found my way,
I went to the great palace where he rules,
Though I knew well ’twas he who,—when I gave
A jewel or two, themselves had given me,
Back to my parents,—since they wanted bread,
They who had never let me want a nosegay,— he Spoke of the jail for felons, if they kept
What was first theirs, then mine, so doubly theirs,
Though all the while my husband’s most of all!
I knew well who had spoke the word wrote
Yet, being in extremity, I fled
To the Governor, as I say,—scarce opened lip
When,—the cold cruel snicker close behind—
Guido was on my trace, already there,
Exchanging nod and wink for shrug and smile,
And I—pushed back to him and, for my pains,
Paid with...but why remember what is past?
I sought out a poor friar the people call
The Roman, and confessed my sin which came
Of their sin,—that fact could not be repressed,—
The frightfulness of my despair in God:
And feeling, through the grate, his horror shake,
Implored him, "Write for me who cannot write,
Apprise my parents, make them rescue me!
You bid me be courageous and trust God:
Do you in turn dare somewhat, trust and write,
‘Dear friends, who used to be my parents once,
And now declare you have no part in me,
This is some riddle I want wit to solve,
Since you must love me with no difference,
Even suppose you altered,—there’s your hate,
To ask for hate of you two dearest ones
I shall find like love than love found here,
If husbands love their wives. Take me away
And hate me as you do the gnats and fleas,
Even the scorpions! How I shall rejoice!
Write that and save me!” And he promised me—

Or did not write; things never changed at all:
He was not like the Augustinian here!
Last, in a desperation I appealed
To friends, whoever wished me better days,
To Guillelchini, that’s of kin,—“What, I—
Travel to Rome with you? A flying gout
Bids me deny my heart and mind my leg!”

Then I tried Conti, used to brave — laugh best
The louring thunder when his cousin scowled
At me protected by his presence: — You —
Who well know what you cannot save me from. —
Carry me off! What frightens you, a priest?
He shook his head, looked grave — “Above my strength!
Guido has claws that scratch, shows fangs
A formidable foe than I dare fret:
Give me a dog to deal with, twice the size!
Of course I am a priest and Canon too,
But...by the bye ... though both, as quite so bold
As he, my fellow-Canon, brother-priest,
The personage in such ill odour here
Because of the reports — pure birth o’ the brain!
Our Caposassachi, he’s your true Saint George
To slay the monster, set the Princess free,
And have the whole High-Altar to himself:
I always think so when I see that piece
’Twixt the Pieve, that’s his church and mine, you know:
Though you drop eyes at mention of his name!”

Thou hast had go to take a half-grotesque
Half-ominous, wholly enigmatic sense,
Like any by-word, broken bit of song
Born with a meaning, changed by mouth and mouth
That mix in a sneer or smile, as chance
Bids, till it now means naught but ugliness
And perhaps shame. —

— All this intends to say,
That, over-night, the notion of escape
Had seemed distemper, dreaming; and the name,—
Not the man, but the name of him, thus made
Into a mockery and disgrace,—why, she
Who uttered it persistently, had laughed,
“I name his name, and there you start saw
As criminal from the red tongs’ touch!” — yet now,
Now, as I stood letting morn bathe me bright,
Choosing which butterfly should bear my news,—
The white, the brown one, or that tinier blue,—
The Margherita, I detested so,
In she came — “The fine day, the good Spring time!
What, up and out at window? That is best.
No thought of Caposassachi? — who stood there
All night on one leg, like the sentry crane,
Under the pelting of your water-spout—
Looked last look at your lattice ere he leave
Our city, bury his dead hope at Rome.
Ay, go to looking-glass and make you fine,
While he may die ere touch one least loose hair
You drag at with the comb in such a rage!”

I turned — “Tell Caposassachi he may come!”

520 THE RING AND THE BOOK
Tell him to come? Ah, but, for charity,
A truce to fooling! Come? What,—come this eye?

Peter and Paul! But I see through the trick!
Yes, come, and take a flower-pot on his head.
Hung from your terrace! No joke, sincere truth?

How plainly I perceived hell flash and fade
O’ the face of her,—the doubt that first paied joy.

Then, final reassurance I indeed
Was caught now, never to be free again!
What did I care?—who felt myself of force
To play with silk, and spurn the horsehair springs.

But—do you know that I have bade him come,
And in your own name? I presumed so much,
Knowing the thing you needed in your heart.
But somehow,—what had I to show in proof?
He would not come: half-promised, that was all,
And wrote the letters you refused to read.

What is the message that shall move him now?

"After the Ave Maria, at first dark,
I will be standing on the terrace, say!"

"I would I had a good long lock of hair Should prove I was not lying! Never mind!"

Off she went—"May he not refuse, that’s all—Fearing a trick!"

I answered, "He will come.
And, all day, I sent prayer like incense up
To God the strong, God the beneficent,
God ever mindful in all strife and strait,
Who, for our own good, makes the need extreme,
Till at the last he puts forth might and saves.

An old rhyme came into my head and rang
Of how a virgin, for the faith of God,
Hid herself, from the Pagans that pursued,
In a cave’s heart; until a thunderstone,
Wrapped in a flame, revealed the couch and pray:
And they laughed—"Thanks to lightning, ours at last!"
And she cried, "Wrath of God, assert his love!
Servant of God, thou fire, befriend his child!"
And lo, the fire she grasped at, fixed its flash,
Lay in her hand a calm cold dreadful sword
She brandished till pursuers strewed the ground,
So did the souls within them die away,
As o’er the prostrate bodies sworded, safe,
She walked forth to the solitude and Christ:
So should I grasp the lightning and be saved!

And still, as the day wore, the trouble grew (Whereby I guessed there would be born a star
Until at an intense throe of the dusk,

I started up, was pushed, I dare to say,
Out on the terrace, leaned and looked at last
Where the deliverer waited: the same
Silent and solemn face, I first descried
At the spectacle, confronted mine once more.

So was that minute twice vouchsafed me, so
The manhood, wasted then, was still at watch
To save me yet a second time: no change
Here, though all else changed in the changing world!

I spoke on the instant, as my duty bade,
In some such sense as this, whatever the phrase.

"Friend, foolish words were borne from you to me;
Your soul behind them is the pure strong wind,
Not dust and feathers which its breath may bear:
These to the witless seem the wind itself,
Since proving thus the first of it they feel.
If by mischance you blew offense my way,
The straws are dropped, the wind desists no whit,
And how such straws were caught up in the street
And took a motion from you, why inquiring
I speak to the strong soul, no weak disguise.
If it be truth,—why should I doubt it truth?
You serve God specially, as priests are bound,
And care about me, stranger as I am,
So far as wish my good, that—miracle
I take to imitate he wills you serve
By saving me,—what else can he direct?
Here is the service. Since a long while now,
I am in course of being put to death:
While death concerned nothing but me, I bowed
The head and bade, in heart, my husband strike.

Now I imperil something more, it seems Something that’s truer than this myself,
Something I trust in God and you to save.
You go to Rome, they tell me; take me there,
Put me back with my people!"

He replied—
The first word I heard ever from his lips,
All himself in it,—an eternity
Of speech, to match the immeasurable depth
O’ the soul that then broke silence—"I am yours."

So did the star rise, soon to lead my step,
Lead on, no pause before it should stand still Above the House o’ the Babe,—my babe to be,
That knew me first and thus made me know him,
That had his right of life and claim on mine,
And would not let me die till he was born,
But pricked me at the heart to save us both,
Saying, "Have you the will? Leave God the way!"
And the way was Caponsacchi—"mine," thank God!
He was mine, he is mine, he will be mine.

No pause! the leading and the light! I know,
Next night there was a cloud came, and not he:
But I prayed through the darkness till it broke
And let him shine." The second night, he came.

"The plan is rash; the project desperate:
In such a flight needs must I risk your life,
Give food for falsehood, folly or mistake,
Ground for your husband's rancor and revenge"—

So he began again, with the same face.
I felt that, the same loyalty — one star
Turning now red that was so white before —
One service apprehended newly: just
A word of mine and there the white was back.

"No, friend, for you will take me! 'Tis yourself
Risk all, not I, — who let you, for I trust
In the compensating great God: enough!
I know you: when is it that you will come?"

"To-morrow at the day's dawn." Then I heard
What I should do: how to prepare for flight
And where to fly.

That night my husband bade
— You, whom I loathe, beware you break my sleep
This whole night! Couch beside me like the corpse
I would you were!" The rest you know, I think —
How I found Capanosecchi and escaped.

And this man, men call sinner? Jesus Christ!
Of whom men said, with mouths Thyself
mad' st once,
"He hath a devil!" — say he was Thy saint,
My Capanosecchi! Shield and show — unshroud
In Thine own time the glory of the soul
If aught obscure — if inkspot, from vile pens Scribbling a charge against him — (I was glad Then, for the first time, that I could not write) — Flirted his way, have flecked the blaze!

'Tis otherwise: let men take, sift my thoughts
— Thoughts I throw like the flax for sun to blest
I did pray, do pray, in the prayer shall die,
"Oh, to have Capanosecchi for my guide!"

Ever the face upturned to mine, the hand
Holding my hand across the world, — a sense
That reads, as only such can read, the mark
God sets on woman, signifying so
She should — shall peradventure — be divine;
Yet 'ware, the while, how weakness mars the print
And makes confusion, leaves the thing men see,
— Not this man sees, — who from his soul, rewrites
The obliterated charter, — love and strength
Mending what's marred. "So kneels a votarist,
Weeds some poor waste traditionary plot
Where shrine once was, where temple yet may be,

Purging the place but worshipping the whis
By faith and not by sight, sight closest so —
Such way the saints work," — says Des Celestine,
But I, not privileged to see a saint
Of old when such walked earth with crown of

If I call "saint" what saints call something else —
The saints must bear with me, impute the fact
To a soul! the bud, so starred by ignorance,
Stinted of warmth, it will not blow this year
Nor recognize the orb which Spring-flows know.

But if meanwhile some insect with a heart
Worth floods of lazy music, spendthrift joy —
Some fire-fly renounced Spring for my dwarf cup,
Crept close to me, brought lustre for the dark Comfort against the cold, — what though access
Of comfort should miscall the creature — me?
What did the sun to hinder while harsh hash
Petal by petal, crude and colorless,
Tore away? This one heart gave me all t's Spring!

Is all told? There's the journey: and when's the time
To tell you how that heart burst out in shine!
Yet certain points do press on me too hard.
Each place must have a name, though I forget:
How strange it was — there where the plain begins
And the small river mitigates its flow —
When face was fading fast, and my soul sunk,
And he divined what surge of bitterness,
In overtaking me, would float me back
Whence I was carried by the striding day —
So, — "This gray place was famous once," aid he —
And he began that legend of the place
As in answer to the unspoken fear,
And told me all about a brave man dead,
Which lifted me and let my soul go on!

How did he know too — at that town's approach
By the rock-side — that in coming near the signs
Of life, the house-roofs and the church and tower,
I saw the old boundary and wall o' the world
Hse plain as ever round me, hard and cold.
As if the broken circlet joined again,
Tightened itself about me with no break, —
As if the town would turn Arezzo's self, —
The husband there, — the friends my enemies.
All ranged against me, not an avenue
To try, but would be blocked and drive me back
On him, — this other, ... oh the heart in that!
Did not he find, bring, put into my arms
A new-born babe? — and I saw faces beam
Of the young mother proud to teach me joy,
And genuine round expecting my surprise
At the sudden hole through earth that lets heaven.
I could believe myself by his strong will
Had woven around me what I thought the world
We went along in, every circumstance,
Towns, flowers and faces, all things helped so well!
For through the journey, was it natural
Such comfort should arise from first to last?
As I look back, all is one milky way;
Still bettered more, the more remembered, so
Do new stars bud while I but search for old,
And fill all gaps' the glory, and grow him —
Him I now see make the shine everywhere.
Even at the last when the bewildered flesh,
The cloud of weariness about my soul
Clogging too heavily, sucked down all sense —
Still its last voice was, "He will watch and care;"
Let the strength go, I am content: he stays!"
I doubt not he did stay and care for all —
From that sick minute when the head swam round,
And the eyes looked their last and died on him.
As in his arms he caught me, and, you say,
Carried me in, that tragical red eve,
And laid me where I next returned to life
In the other red of morning, two red plates
That clashed together, crushed the time between,
And are since then a solid fire to me, —
When in, my dreadful husband and the world
Broke, — and I saw him, master, by hell's right,
And saw my angel helplessly held back
By guards that helped the malice — the lamb
The serpent towering and triumphant — then Came all the strength back in a sudden swell,
I did for once see right, do right, give tongue
The adequate protest: for a worm must turn
If it would have its wrong observed by God.
I did spring up, attempt to thrust aside
That ice-block 'twixt the sun and me, lay low
The neutralizer of all good and truth.
If I sinned so, — never obey voice more
Of the just and Terrible, who bids us — "bear!"
Not — "Stand by, bear to see my angels bear!"
I am clear it was on impulse to serve God
Not save myself, — no — nor my child unborn!
Held I also waited patiently till now? —
Who saw my old kind parents, silly-sooth
And too much trustful, for their worst of faults,
Cheated, brow beaaten, stripped and starred, cast out
Into the kennel: I demonstred,
Then sank to silence, for, — their woes at end,
Themselves gone, — only I was left to plague,
If only I was threatened and belied,
What matter? I could bear it and did bear;
It was a comfort, still one last for all:
They were not persecuted for my sake
And I, estranged, the single happy one.
But when at last, all by myself I stood
Obeying the clear voice which bade me rise,
Not for my own sake but my babe unborn,
And take the angel's hand was sent to help —
And found the old adversary aghast the path —
Not my hand simply struck from the angel's, but
The very angel's self made foul i' the face
By the fiend who struck there, — that I would not bear,
That only I resisted! So, my first
And last resistance was invincible.
Prayers move God; threats, and nothing else, move men!
I must have prayed a man as he were God
When I implored the Governor to right
My parents' wrongs: the answer was a smile.
The Archbishop, — did I clasp his feet enough,
Hide my face hotly on them, while I told
More than I dared make my own mother know?
The profit was — compassion and a jest.
This time, the foolish prayers were done with, right
Used might, and solemnized the sport at once.
All was against the combat: vantage, mine?
The runaway avowed, the accomplice-wife,
In company with the plan-on-contriving priest?
Yet, shame thus rank and patent, I struck, bare,
At foe from head to foot in magic mail,
And off it withered, cobweb-armory
Against the lightning! 'T was truth sang the lies
And saved me, not the vain sword nor weak speech!
You see, I will not have the service fail!
I say, the angel saved me: I am safe!
Others may want and wish, I wish nor want
One point o' the circle plainer, where I stand
Traced round about with white to front the world.
What of the calumny I came across,
What o' the way to the end? — the end crowns all.
The judges judged right? i' the main, gave me
The uttermost of my heart's desire, a truce
From torture and Arezzo, balm for hurt,
With the quiet nuns. — God recompenses the good!
Who said and sang away the ugly past.
And, when my final fortune was revealed,
What safety, while, amid my parents' arms,
My babe was given me! Yes, he saved my babe:
It would not have peeped forth, the bird-like thing.
Through that Arezzo noise and trouble: back
Had it returned nor ever let me see!
But the sweet peace cured all, and let me live
And give my bird the life among the leaves
God meant him! Weeks and months of quiescence.
I could lie in such peace and learn so much —
Begin the task, I see how needful now,
Of understanding somewhat of my past, —
Know life a little, I should leave so soon.
Therefore, because this man restored my soul,
All has been right; I have gained my gain, enjoyed
As well as suffered, — nay, got foretaste too
Of better life beginning where this ends —
All through the breathing-while allowed me thus,
Which let good premonitions reach my soul
Unthwarted, and benignant influence flow
And interpenetrate and change my heart,
Uncrossed by what was wicked, — nay, unkind.
For, as the weakness of my time drew nigh,
Nobody did me one disservice more,
Spoke coldly or looked strangely, broke the love
I lay in the arms of, till my boy was born,
Born all in love, with naught to spoil the bliss
A whole long fortnight: in a life like mine
A fortnight filled with bliss is long and much.
All women are not mothers of a boy,
Though they live twice the length of my whole
And, as they fancy, happily all the same.
There I lay, then, all my great fortnight long,
As if it would continue, brooded out
Happily more and more, and lead to heaven:
Christmas before me, — was not that a chance?
I never realized God's birth before
How he grew likest God in being born,
This time I felt like Mary, had my babe
Lying a little on my breast like hers.
So all went on till, just four days ago —
The night and the tap.

Oh, it shall be success
To the whole of our poor family! My friends
... Nay, father and mother, — give me back my word!
They have been rudely stripped of life, disgraced
Like children who must needs go clothed too fine,
Carry the garb of Carnival in Lent.
If they too much affected frivolity,
They have been punished and submit themselves.
Say no word: all is over, they see God
Who will not be extreme to mark their fault
Or he had granted reprieve: they are safe.

For that most woeful man my husband once,
Who, needing reprieve, still draws vital breath,
I love him, as far as lies in me,
I give him for his good the life he takes,
If this life is light, but in his shadow healing too:
Let Guido touch the shadow and be healed!
And as my presence was importunate.
My earthly good, temptation and a snare,—
Nothing about me but drew somehow down
His hate upon me, — somewhat so excused
Therefore, since hate was thus the truth of him,
May my avowal forevermore
Help further to relieve the heart that cast
Such object of its natural loathing forth!
So he was made; he nowise made himself:
I could not love him, but his mother did.
His soul has never lain beside my soul;
But for the unresisting body, — thanks! He Burned that garment spotted by the flesh.
Whatever he touched is rightly ruined: pigs
It caught, and disinfection it had craved
Still but for Guido; I am saved through his
So as by fire; to him — thanks and farewell!

Even for my babe, my boy, there’s safety thence:
From the sudden death of me, I mean; we Wrote about, how, born of love to be strong!
I was already using up my life, —
This portion, now, should do him such a god,
This other go to keep off such an ill
The great life; see, a breath and it is gone!
So is detached, so left all by itself.
The little life, the fact which means so much.
Shall not God stoop the kindlier to his work.
His marvel of creation, foot would crush,
Now that the hand he trusted to receive
And hold it, lets the treasure fall perforce?
The better; he shall have in orphanage
His own way all the clearer: if my babe
Outlived the hour — and he has lived its weeks —
It is through God who knows I am not by.
Who is it makes the soft gold hair turn back.
And sets the tongue, might lie so long at rest.
Trying to talk? Let us leave God alone!
Why should I doubt he will explain in time.
What I feel now, but fail to find the words?
My babe not was, nor is, nor yet shall be Count Guido Franceschini's child at all —
Only his mother, born of love to be such!
So shall I have my rights in after-time.
It seems absurd, impossible to-day;
So seems so much else, not explained but known!

Ah! Friends, I thank and bless you every one!
No more now: I withdraw from earthly man
to my own soul, compose myself for God.

Well, and there is more! Yes, my last breath
Shall bear away my soul in being true!
He is still here, not outside with the world.
Here, here, I have him in his rightful place.
'Tis now, when I am most upon the move.
I feel for what I verily find — again
The face, again the eyes, again, through all.
The heart and its immeasurable love
Of my one friend, my only, all my own.
Who put his breast between the spears and
me.

Ever with Caponosacco! Otherwise
Hare alone would be failure, loss to me —
How much more loss to him, with life debased.
From giving life, love looked from love's display.
The holy star stopped its task that makes night
more!
O lover of my life, O soldier-saint.
No work begun shall ever pause for death!
Love will be helpful to me more and more
I the coming course, the new path I must tread—
My weak hand in thy strong hand, strong for that!
Tell him that if I seem without him now,
That 's the world’s insight! Oh, he understands!
He is at Civita—do I once doubt
The world again is holding us apart?
He had been here, opposed in my behalf
The broad brow that reverberates the truth,
And flashed the word God gave him, back to man!
I know where the free soul is flown! My fate
Will have been hard for even him to bear:
Let it confirm him in the trust of God,
Showing how holily he dared the deed!
And, for the rest,—say, from the deed, no touch
Of harm came, but all good, all happiness,
Not one faint flick of failure! Why explain?
What I see, oh, he sees and how much more!
Tell him,—I know not wherefore the true word
Should fade and fall unuttered at the last—
It was the name of him I sprang to meet
When came the knock, the summons and the end.
“His great heart, my strong hand are back again!”
I would have sprung to these, beckoning across Murder and hell gigantic and distinct
O’ the threshold, posted to eschew me heaven:
He is ordained to call and I to come!
Do not the dead wear flowers when dressed for God?
Say,—I am all in flowers from head to foot!
Say, not one flower of all he said and did,
Might seem to flit unnoticed, fade unknown,
But dropped a seed, has grown a balsam-tree
Whereof the blossoming perfumes the place
At this supreme of moments! He is a priest;
He cannot marry therefore, which is right:
I think he would not marry if he could.
Marriage on earth seems such a counterfeit,
Mere imitation of the inimitable:
In heaven we have the real and true and sure.
’Tis there they neither marry nor are given
In marriage but are as the angels: right,
Oh how right that is, how like Jesus Christ
To say that! Marriage-making for the earth,
With gold so much,—birth, power, repute so much,
Or beauty, youth so much, in lack of these!
Be as the angels rather, who, apart,
Know themselves into one, are found at length
Married, but marry never, no, nor give
In marriage; they are man and wife at once
When the true time is: here we have to wait
Not so long neither! Could we by a wish
Have what we will and get the future now,
Would we wish aught done undone in the past?
So, let him wait God’s instant men call years;
Meantime hold hard by truth and his great soul,
Do on the duty! Through such is He alone
God stooping shows sufficient of his light
For us ’tis the dark to rise by. And I rise.

VIII

DOMINUS HYACINTHUS DE ARCH-ANGELIS,
PAUPERUM PROCURATOR

Ah, my Giacinto, he’s no ruddy rogue,
Is not Cinese? What, to-day we’re eight?
Seven and one is eight, I hope, old rye-pate!
—Branches me out his verb-tree on the slate,
Amo—as–avi—as–tum–are–ans,
Up to–aturs, person, tense, and mood,
Quies me cum subjunctivo (I could cry)
And chews Corderius with his morning crust!
Look eight years onward, and he’s perched, he’s perched
Dapper and delf on stool beside this chair,
Cinocco, Cinocello, who but he?
—Trying his milk-teeth on some crusty case
Like this, papa shall trite him full soon
To smooth Papinian pul!
It trots
Already through my head, though noon be now,
Does supper-time and what belongs to eve.
Dispose, O Don, the day, first work then play!
—The proverb bids. And “then” means,
won’t we hold
Our little yearly lovevome frolic feast,
Cinulo’s birth-night, Cinicello’s own,
That makes graft January grin perf orce!
For too contagious grows the mirth, the warmth
Escaping from so many hearts at once—
When the good wife, buxom and bonny yet,
Jokes the hale grandare, — such are just the sort
To go off suddenly,—he who hides the key
O’ the box beneath his pillow every night,—
Which box may hold a parchment (some one thinks)
Will show a scribbled something like a name
“Cinino, Ciniccino,” near the end,
“To whom I give all and I bequeath my lands,
Estates, tenements, hereditaments,
When I decease as honest grandare ought.”
Wherefore — yet this one time again perhaps—
Sha’n’t my Orvieto fudder his old nose!
Then, uncles, one or the other, well I’ the world,
May — drop in, merely? — trudge through rain and wind,
Rather! The smell-feasts rouzes them at the hint
There’s cockery in a certain dwelling-place!
Gossip, too, each with keepee in his poke,
Will pick the way, thrid lane by lantern-light,
And so find door, put gaijigaskin off
At entry of a decent domicile
Cornered in snug Condotti,— all for love,
All to crush cup with Cinnciato! Well,
Let others climb the heights o’ the court, the camp!
How vain are chambering and wantonness,
Revel and rout and pleasures that make mad!
Command me to home-joy, the family board,
Altar and hearth! These, with a brisk career,
A source of honest profit and good fame,
Just so much work as keeps the brain from rust,
Just so much play as lets the heart expand,
Honoring God and serving man,—I say,
These are reality, and all else,—fluff.
Nutshell and naught,—thank Flaccus for the phrase!
Suppose I had been Fice, yet bachelor!

Why, work with a will, then! Wherefore lazy now?
Turn up the hour-glass, whence no sand-grain slips
But should have done its duty to the saint
O' the day, the son and heir that's eight years old!
Let law some dimple Cinoneino's cheek,
And Latin dumple Cinarello's chin,
The while we spread him fine and toss him flat
This pulp that makes the pancake, trim our mass.

Of matter into Argument the First,
Prime Pleading in defence of our accused,
Which, once a-waft on paper wing, shall soar,
Shall signalize before applauseco Rome
What study, and mayhap some mother-wit,
Can do toward making Master Fic and Fice
Old bachelor Bottinian bite his thumb,
Now, how good God is! How falls plumb to point
This murder, gives me Guido to defend
Now, of all days! I the year, just when the boy Verges on Virgil, reaches the right age
For some such illustration from his sire,
Stimulus to himself! One might wait years
And never find the chance which now finds me!
The fact is, there's a blessing on the hearth,
A special providence for fatherhood!
Here's a man, and what's more, a noble, kills
—Not sneakingly but almost with parade —
Wife's father and wife's mother and wife's self That's mother's self of son and heir (like mine!)
—And here stand I, the favored advocate,
Who pluck this flower o' the field, no Solomon
Was ever clothed in glorious gold to match,
And set the same in Cinoneino's cap!
I defend Guido and his comrades — I!
Pray God, I keep me humble: not to me —
Non nobis, Domine, sed tibi laus!
How the pop chucked when they made him Fice!

We'll beat you, my Bottinias, all for love,
All for our tribute to Cinotto's day!
Why, 'abuddikins, old Innocent himself
May rub his eyes at the bustle,—ask "What's this Rolling from out the rostrum, as a gust
O' the Pro Milone had been imprisoned there,
And rattled Rome awake?" Awaken Rome,
How can the Pope doze on in decency?
He needs must wake up also, speak his word,
Have his opinion like the rest of Rome,
About this huge, this hurly-burly case:
He wants who can exorcitate the truth,

Give the result in speech, plain black sat white,
To mumble in the mouth and make his own
—A little changed, good man, a little changed!
No matter, so his gratitude be moved,
By when my Guido is a gentle age.
Mindful of who thus helped him at a pinch,
Archangelus Procurator Pauperum
And proved Hortensius Redivivus!

Whew!

To earn the Est-cut, merit the minced herb
That mollifies the liver's leathery alove,
With here a goose-foot, there a cock's comb stuck,
Cemented in an element of cheese!
I doubt if dainties do the grandsire good:
Last time he had a sort of strangling . . . ha!
He's his own master, and his will is made.
So, liver fett, law flit and Latin fly
As we run hands o'er dish by way of grace!
May I lose cause if I vent one word more
Except — with fresh-cut quill we ink the white
P-r-o-ро Guidon et Sociis. There!

Count Guido married — or, in Latin due,
What? Duxit in uxorem? — commonplace!
Tedes: jugates init, subbit, — ha!
He underwrote the matrimony and torch?
Consobini stabili sibi junxit, — hum!
In stable bond of marriage bound his own?
That's clear of any modern taint: and yet . . .

Virgil is little help to who writes prose.
He shall attack me Terence with the daws,
Shall Cinocino! Mum, mind business, Sir!
Thus circumstantially evolve we facts,
Ita se habet ideo series facti:
He wedded, — ah, with owls for angry!
Nupererat, haec sinistris aureas,
One of the blood Arezzo boosta her best,
Dominus Guido, nobili genere ortus,
Pompilia . . .

But the version afterward!
Curb we this ardor! Notes alone, to-day,
The speech to-morrow, and the Latin last:
Such was the role in Farinacchi's time.
Indeed I hitched it into verse and good.
Unluckily, law quite absorb a man,
Or else I think I too had poetized.
"Law is the pork substratum of the fry,
Goose-foot and cock's comb are Latinity."
And in this case, if circumstance assist,
We'll garnish law with idiom, never fear!
Out-of-the-way events extend our scope:
For instance, when Bottini brings his charge:
"That letter which you say Pompilia wrote,
To criminate her parents and herself
And disengage her husband from the coil—
That, Guido Franceschini wrote, say we:
Because Pompilia could nor read nor write.
Therefore he pencilled her such letter first,
Then made her trace in ink the same again.
—Ha, my Bottini, have I thee on hip?
How will he turn this and break Tully's pate?
"Exstingandum" (don't I hear the dog!) "
Quod Guido designaverit elementa
DOMINUS HYACINTHUS DE ARCHEANGELIS

Dicta epistolae qua fuerint (Superinducto ab ea calamo) Nodata atromento" — there's a style! —
"Quia ipsa scribere nesciebat."  — Boh!
Now, my turn!  Either, Insulse! (I outburst)
Stupidly put!  Inane is the response,
Inanes est responsio, or the like;
To win, that each of all those characters,
Quad singula elementa epistola,
Had first of all been traced for her by him,
Puerant per eum prius designata,
And then, the ink applied a-top of that,
Et deinde, superinducto calamo,
The piece, she says, became her handiwork,
Per eam, efformata, ut ipsa assertit.
Inane were such response! (a second time):
Her husband outlined her the whole, forsooth?
Vir ejus lineabat epistolam?
What, she confesstes she wrote the thing,
Patetur eam scripsisse, (scorn that seathes)!
That she might pay obedience to her lord?
Ut sive ostemperaret, apices
(here repeat charge with proper varied phrase)
Sed designante, ipsaque calamus
Super inuenit?  By such argument,
Ina pariter, she seeks to show the same,
(Ay, by Saint Joseph and what saints you please)
Epistolam ostendit, medius fidius,
No voluntary deed but fruit of force!
Temporarium, posse scriptam?
That's the way to write Latin, friend my Fisc!
Bottini is a beast, one barbarous:
Look out for him when he attempts to say
"Armed with a pistol, Guido followed her!" Will not 1, as before bend with my Fisc, Cut away phrase by phrase from underfoot!
Guido Pompliulam — Guido thus his wife
Following with igneous engine, shall I have?
Arnis munitionis ignis persequens
Arums, suspurche gestas, no shury arms,
Or, might one style a pistol — popping-piece?
Arma breviori sculpulo?
We'll let him have been armed so, though it make Something against us: I had thought to own —
Provided with a simple travelling-sword,
Ens solvemmodo viatorio
Instructus: but we'll grant the pistol here:
Better we lost the cause than lacked the girl
At the Fisc's Latin, lost the Judge's laugh! It's Venturini that decides for style.
Tommati rather goes upon the law.
So, as to law, —

Ah, but with law ne'er hope
To level the fellow — don't I know his trick!
How he draws up, ducks under, twists aside! He's a lean-gutted hestic rascal, fine
As pale-haired red-eyed ferret which pretends
It's ermine, pure soft snow from tall to snout.
He eludes law by piteous looks aloft.
Let Latin glance off as he makes appeal
To suit that's somewhere in the setting-top:
Do you suppose I don't conceive the beast?
Plague of the ermine-vermin!  For it takes, It takes, and here's the fellow Fisc, you see, And Judge, you'll not be long in seeing next! Confound the top — he's now at work like me: Enter his study, as I seem to do.
Hear him read out his writing to himself!
I know he writes as if he spoke: I hear
The hoarse shrill throat, see shut eyes, neck — shot-forth,
— I see him strain on tiptoe, soar and pour Eloquence out, nor stay nor stint at all— Perorate in the air, then quick to press
With the product!  What abuse of type and sheet!
He'll keep clear of my cast, my logic-throw,
Let argument alide, and then deliver swift
Some bowl from quite an guessed point of stand —
Having the luck o' the last word, the reply!
A plaguy cast, a mortifying stroke:
You face a fellow — cries, "So, there you stand? But I discomfite jump clean o'er your head! You take ship-carpentry for pilotage, Stop rat-holes, while a sea sweeps through the breach,
— Hammer and fortify at puny points? Do, clump and tenon, make all tight and safe! "T is here and here and here you ship a sea,
No good of your stopped leaks and littleness!"

Yet what do I name "little and a leak"?
The main defence o' the murder's used to death,
By this time, dry bare bones, no scrap we pick:
Safier I worked the new, the unforeseen,
The nice by-stroke, the fine and improvised Point that can titillate the brain o' the Bench Torpid with over-teaching, long ago!
As if Tommati (that has heard, reheard
And heard again, first this side and then that — Guido and Pietro, Pietro and Guido, din
And dea... an, full three years, at each long ear)
Don't want amusement for instruction now, Won't rather feel a flea run o'er his ribs,
Than a daw settle heavily on his head! Oh, I was young and had the trick of fence, Knew subtle pass and push with careless right—
My left arm ever quiet behind back,
With dagger ready: not both hands to blade! Puff and blow, put the strength out, Blunder-bore!
There's my subordinate, young Spreti, now,
Pedant and prig, — he'll pant away at proof, That's his way!

Now for mine — to rub some life
Into one's choppy fingers this wild day! I trust Cinuzzo to it on tipset, guarida
The precious throat on which so much depends! Guido must be all goose-flesh in his hole, Despite the prison-straw: bad Carnival For captives! no sliced fry for him, poor Count!
Carnival-time, — another providence!
The town a-swarm with strangers to amuse,
To edify, to give one's name and fame
In charge of, till they find, some future day,
Cintino ome and claim it, his name too,
Pledge of the pleasantness they owe papa—
Who else was it cured Rome of her great
... claims.
When she must needs have her own judgment?
— ay.
When all her topping wits had set to work,
Prorounced already on the case: mere boys,
Twice Cimerugio's age with half his sense,
As good as telling me, when I cross the court,
" Master Arcangeli!" (plucking at my gown)
" We can predict, we comprehend your play, We'll help you save your client." Tra-la-la! I've travelled ground, from childhood to this hour,
To have the town anticipate my track?
The old fox takes the plain and velvet path,
The young hound's prodigality — prints the
dew,
Don't he, to suit their pulpy pads of paw?
No! Burying nose deep down in' the briery bush,
Thus I defend Count Guido.

Where are we weak?
First, which is foremost in advantage too,
Our murder — we call, killing, — is a fact
Confessed, extenuated, made a boast of: good!
To think the Fisco claimed use of torture here,
And got thereby avowal plump and plain
That gives me just the chance I wanted, — scope
Not for brute-force but ingenuity,
Explain matters, not denying them!
One may dispute. — as I am bound to do,
And shall, — validity of process here:
Inasmuch as a noble is exempt.
From torture which plebeians undergo
In such a case: for law is lenient, lax,
Remit the torture to a nobleman
Unless suspicion be of twice the strength
Attaches to a man born vulgarly:
We don't card silk with comb that dresses wool.
Moreover, 'twas severity undue
In this case, even had the lord been lout.
What utter, on this head, our oracle,
Our Farinacci, my Gamiali erst,
In those immortal "Questions"? This I quote:
"Of all the tools at Law's disposal, sure
That named Vigilantius is the best —
That is, the worst — to whose needs must bear:
Lasting, as it may do, from some seven hours
To ten; (beyond ten, we 're no precedent;
Certain have touched their ten but, bah, they died!)
It does so efficaciously convince,
That — speaking by much observation here —
Out of each hundred cases, by my count,
Never I knew of patients beyond four Withstand its taste, or less than ninety-six
End by murdering: only martyrs four,
Of obstinate silence, guilty or no, — against Ninety-six full confessors, innocent
Or otherwise, — so shrewd a tool have we!
" No marvel either: in unwary hands,

Death on the spot is no rare consequence:
As indeed all but happened in this case
To one of ourselves, our young tough peasant-
friend
The accomplice called Baldischi: they were
Dosed him with torture as you drench a horse,
Not modify your treatment to a man:
So, two successive days he fainted dead,
And only on the third essay, gave up,
Confessed like flesh and blood. We could reclaim.
Blockhead Bottini giving cause enough!
But no, — we'll take it as spontaneously
Confessed: we'll have the murder beyond doubt.
Ah, fortunate (the poet's word reversed)
Inasmuch as we know our happiness:
Had the antagonist left dubity,
Here were we proving murder a mere myth,
And Guido innocent, ignorant, absent, — ay,
Absent! He was — why, where should Christian be? —
Engaged in visiting his proper church,
The duty of us all at Christmas-time,
When Caponsacchi, the seducer, sung
To madness by his relegation, cast
About him and contrived a remedy
In murder: since opprobrium broke afresh,
By birth o' the babe, on him the imputed sire.
He it was quietly sought to smother up
His shame and theirs together, — killed the three,
And fled — (go seek him where you please to reclaim.
Just at the time when Guido, touched by
grace,
Devotions ended, hastened to the spot,
meaning to pardon his convicted wife,
" Neither do I condemn thee, go in peace! " —
And thus arrived I' the nick of time to catch
The charge o' the killing, though great-heartedly
He came but to forgive and bring to life.
Doubt ye the force of Christmas on the soul?
" Is thine eye evil because mine is good? "
So, doubtless, had I needed argue here
But for the full confession round and sound!
Thus might you wrong some kingly alchem-ist,
Whose concern should not be with showing brass
Transmuted into gold, but triumphing.
Rather, about his gold changed out of brass,
Not vulgarly to the mere sight and touch,
But in the idea, the spiritual display,
The apparition buoyed by winged words
Hovering above its birthplace in the brain, —
Thus would you wrong this excellent personage
Forced, by the gross need, to gird apron round.
Plant forge, light fire, ply bellows, — in a
word.
Demonstrate: when a faulty pipkin's crack
May damn your guilt, his presumptive truth!
Here were I hanging to the testimony
Of one of these poor rustic — four, ye gods!
Whom the first taste of friend the Fiscal's cord
May drive into undoing my whole speech,
DOMINUS HYACINTHUS DE ARCHANGELIS

Undone, on his birthday, — what is worse, — My son and heir!
I wonder, all the same,
Not so much at those peasants' lack of heart;
But at Drogon Francesco, nobleman,
Bear pain no longer! Everybody knows
It used once, when my father was a boy,
To form a proper, nay, important point
To the education of our well-born youth,
That they took torture handsomely at need,
Without being in this clownish guise,
Each noble had his rack for private use,
And would, for the diversion of a guest,
Bid it be set up in the yard of arms,
And thereon his hour of exercise,
Command the variety stretch, strain their best.
While friends looked on, admired my lord could smile
"Mid tugging which had caused an ox to roar.
Men are no longer men!"

And advocates
No longer Farinacci, let us add,
If I one more time fly from point proposed!
So, Vindicatio,— here begins the speech!
Honoris causa; thus we make our stand:
Honor in us had injury, we prove,
Or if we fail to prove such injury
More than misprision of the fact, — what then?
It is enough, authorities declare,
If the result, the deed in question now,
Be caused by confidence that injury
Is without or no signment: so, too,
What, though proved fancy afterward, seemed fact
At the time, they argue shall excuse result.
That which we do, persuaded of good cause
For what we do, hold justifiable! —
So casuists bid: man, bound to do his best,
They would not have him leave that best undone
And mean to do his worst, — though fuller light
Show best was worst and worst would have been best.
Act by the present light! — they ask of man.
Ultra quod hic non agitur, besides
It is not anyway our business here,
De probatione adulterii,
To prove what we thought crime was crime indeed,
Ad irrepandum penam, and require
Its punishment: such nowise do we seek:
Sed ad effeetum, but 'tis our concern,
Excusandii, here to simply find excuse,
Occisorum, for who did the killing-work,
Et ad illius defensionem, (mark
The difference) and defend the man, just that!
Quo casu levior probation
Exmiserat, to which end far lighter proof
Suffices than the prior case would claim:
It should be always harder to convict,
In short, than to establish innocence.
Therefore we shall demonstrate first of all
That Honor is a gift of God to man
Precious beyond compare: which natural sense
Of human rectitude and purity, —
Which white, man's soul is born with, — brooks no touch:
Therefore, the sensitivest spot of all,
Wounded by any wafure breathed from black,
Is — honor within honor, like the eye
Centred i' the ball — the honor of our wife.
Touch us o' the pupil of our honor, then,
Not actually, — since so you say outright, —
But by a gesture simulating touch,
Presumable mere menace of such taint, —
This were our warrant for eruptive ire
"To whose dominion I impose no end."

(Virgil, now, should not be too difficult
To Cincinnio, — say, the early books.
Pen, truce to further gambols! Poscimus libris!)

Nor can revenge of injury done here
To the honor proved the life and soul of us,
Be too excessive, too extravagant:
Such wrong seeks and must have complete revenge.
Show we this, first, on the mere natural ground:
Begin at the beginning, and proceed
Incontrovertibly, Theodore.
In an apt sentence Cassiodorus cites,
Propounded for basis of all household law —
I hardly recollect it, but it ends,
"Bird mates with bird, beast genders with his like,
And brooks no interference." Bird and beast?
The very insects . . . if they wife or no,
How dare I say when Aristotle doubts?
But the presumption is they likewise wife,
At least the nobler sorts; for take the bee
As instance, — copying King Solomon, —
Why that displeasure of the bee to aught
Which savors of incontinency, makes
The unchaste a very horror to the hive?
Whence comes it bees obtain their epithet
Of custa apes, notably "the chaste"?
Because, ingeniously saith Scaliger,
The young sage, — see his book of table-talk
"Such is their hatred of immodest act,
They fall upon the offender, sting to death."
I mind a passage much confirmative
I the ideolist (though I read him Latinized) —
"Why," asks a shepherd, "is this bank unfruitful
For celebration of our vernal loves?"

"Oh swain," returns the instructed shepherdess,
"Bees swarm here, and would quick resent our warmth!

Only cold-blooded fish lack instinct here,
Nor gain nor guard commissibility:
But beasts, quadrupedal, mammiferous,
Do credit to their beasthood: witness him
That Aelian cites, the noble elephant,
(Or if not Aelian, somebody as sage)
Who seeing, much offence beneath his nose,
His master's friend exceed in courtesy
The due allowance to his master's wife,
Taught them good manners and killed both at once,
Making his master and the world admire.
Indubitably, then, that master's self,
Favored by circumstance, had done the same
Or else stood clear rebuked by his own beast.
Adeo, ut qui honorem spernit, thus,
Who values his own honor not a straw, —
Et non recuperare curat, nor
THE RING AND THE BOOK

Labors by might and main to salve its wound,
Se uliscendo, by revenging him,
Nil differat a bellus, is a brute,
Quinimo irrationalior
Loismet bellius, nay, contrariwise,
Much more irrational than brutes themselves,
Should be considered, reputatur! How?
If a poor animal feel honor smart,
Taught by blind instinct nature plants in him,
Shall man, — confessed creation's master stroke,
Nay, divinest glory, nay, a god,
Nay, of the nature of my Judges here,
— Shall man prove the insensible, the block,
The blot o' the earth he crawls on to disgrace?
Come, that's both solid and poetic! Man
Degrade, live for the low tastes alone,
Mean creeping cares about the animal life?
Abeit such homage to vile flesh and blood!

(May Gigia have remembered, nothing stings
Fried liver out of its monotony
Of richness, like a root of fennel, chopped
Fennel with parsley: parsley-sprigs, I said —
Wast there need I should say "and fennel too"?
But no, she cannot have been so obtuse!
To our argument! The fennel will be chopped.)

From beast to man next mount we — ay, but,
mind,
Still mere man, not yet Christian, — that, in time!
Not too fast, mark you! 'Tis on Heathen grounds
We must descend our act: then, fairly urge —
If this were done of old, in a green tree,
Allowed in the Spring rawness of our kind,
What may be licensed in the Autumn dry
And ripe, the latter harvest-tide of man?
If, with his poor and primitive half-lights,
The pagan, whom we bitterly served for gods,
Could stigmatize the breach of marriage-vow
As that which blood, blood only might efface, —
Absolve the husband, outraged, whose revenge
Anticipated law, plied sword himself, —
How with the Christian in full blaze of noon?
Shall not he rather double penalty,
Multiply vengeance, than, degenerate,
Let privilege be ministered, droop, decay?
Therefore set forth at large the ancient law!
Superabundant the examples be
To pick and choose from. 'The Athenian Code,
Solon's, the name is serviceable, — then,
The Laws of the Twelve Tables, that fifteenthe, —
"Romulus" likewise rolls out round and large.
The Julian; the Cornelian: Gracchus' Law:
So old a chimne, the bells ring of themselves!
Spreti can set that going if he please,
I point you, for my part, the belfry plain,
Intent to rise from dusky, diluculum,
Into the Christian day shall broaden next.

First, the fit compliment to His Holiness
Happily reigning: then sustain the point —
All that was long ago declared as law
By the natural revelation, stands confirmed
By Apostle and Evangelist and Saint, —

To wit — that Honor is man's supreme good.
Why should I balk Saint Jerome of his phrase?
Ubi honor non est, where no honor is,
Ubi contemptus est; and where contempt,
Ubi injuria frequens; and where that,
The frequent injury, ubi et indignatio;
And where the indignation, ubi gutes
Nulla: and where there is no quietude.
Why, ubi, there, the mind is often cast
Down from the heights where it proposed to dwell,
Mens reposito saxc dejectur.
And naturally the mind is so cast down,
Since harder 't is, quum difficultius sit,
Iram cohiber, to cooeze one's wrench.
Quam miracula facere, than work miracles. —
So Gregory smiles in his First Dialogue.
Whence we infer, the ingonnous soul, the man
Who makes esteem of honor and repute.
Whenever honor and repute are touched,
Arrives at term of fury and despair,
Loose all guidance from the reason-check:
As in dolrium or a frenzy-fit,
Not by fiery or despair he seizes, — no,
Not even if he attain the impossible,
O'erturn the hinges of the universe
To annihilate — not whose caused the smart
Solely, the author simply of his pain,
But the place, the memory, pituercpt,
Of the shame and scorn: quia, — says Solon.
The Holy Spirit speaking by his mouth
In Proverbs, the sixth chapter near the end
— Because, the zeal and fury of a man,
Zelus et furor viri, will not spare,
Non perper; in the day of his revenge.
In die vindictae, nor will acquiesce,
Nec acquiescent, through a person's prayers.
Cujusdam precibus, — nec suscipiet,
Nor yet take, pro redemptione, for Redemption, bona plura, gifts of friends.
More money should be the compound, for she.
Who recognizes not my client's case?
Wherefore, as strangely consensusaneous here.
Adduce Saint Bernard in the Epistle writ
To Robertus, his nephew: "Too much grief.
Dolor quippe nimius non deliberat,
Does not excitate propriety,
Non verecundatur, nor knows shame at all.
Non consult rationem, nor consults
Reason, non dignitatis metuit
Damnnum, nor dreads the loss of dignity;
Modum et ordinem, order and the mode,
Ignorat, it ignores:
'Why, trait for trait.
Was ever portrait linned so like the life?
(By Cavalier Maratta, shall I say?)
I hear he's first in reputation now.)
Yes, that of Samson in the Sacred Text;
That's not so much the portrait as the mas!
Samson in Gaza was the antetype
Of Guido at Rome: observe the Nazarete!
Blinded he was, — an easy thing to bear:
Intrepidly he took imprisonment.
Gyven, stripes, and daily labors at the mill:
But when he found himself, 't the public place.
Destined to make the common people sport.
Disdain burned up with such an impetus
'1 the breast of him, that, all the man one fire.
Morituri, roared he, let my soul's self die,
Anima mea, with the Philistines!
So, pulled down pillar, roof, and death and all,
Multoque plures interficet, ay,
And many more he killed thus, moriens,
Dying, quam vixus, than in his whole life,
Occidit, he ever killed before.
Are these things ever done except by us, Sirs?
One instance more, and let me see who doubts us!
Our Lord himself, made all of manna, and fed,
Sealing the sum of sufficiency up, received
Opprobrium, contumely and buffeting
Without complaint: but when he found himself
Touched in his honor never so little for once,
Then outbroke indignation pent before —
"Honorem meum nemini dabo!" "No, my honor I to nobody will give!"
And certainly the example so hath wrought,
That whosoever, at the proper worth,
Apprises worldly honor and repute,
Esteems it nobler to die honored man
Beneath Mannaia, than live centuries
Disgraced in the eye of the world. We find Saint Paul.
No repentant to this faith delivered once:
"Far worthier, were it that I died," cries he,
"Expiet mihi magis mori," "Than
That any one should make my glory void,
Quam ut gloriarn mean quas evascer!
See, ad Corinthienses: wheresoever
Saint Ambrose makes a comment with much fruit,
Doubtless my Judges long since laid to heart,
So I desist from bringing forward here.
(I can't quite recollect it.)

Have I proved
Satis superque, both enough and to spare,
That Revelation old and new admits
The natural man may effervesce in ire,
O'erflow earth, o'erflow heaven with foamy Anch.
At the first puncture to his self-respect?
Then, Sirs, this Christian dogma, this law-bad
Full-blown now, soon to bask the absolute flower
Of Papal doctrine in our blaze of day,
Be think you, shall we miss one promise-streak,
One doubtful birth of dawn crepuscular,
One dew-drop comfort to humanity,
Now that the chalice teems with noontide wine?
Yes, argue Molinists who bar revenge —
Referring just to what makes out our case!
Under old dispensation, argue they,
The doom of the adulterous wife was death,
Stoning by Moses' law. "Nay, stone her not,
Put her away," next legislate our Lord;
And last of all, "Nor yet divorce a wife!"
Ordains the Church, "She typifies ourself,
The Bride no fault shall cause to fall from Christ."
Then, as no jot nor tittle of the Law
Has passed away — which who pretends to doubt?
As not, God's word of Christ is rendered vain —
Which, could it be though heaven and earth
Should pass?
Where do I find my proper punishment
For my adulterous wife, I humbly ask

Of my infallible Pope, — who now remits
Even the divorce allowed by Christ in lieu
Of lapidation Moses licensed me?
The Gospel checks the Law which throws the
stone,
The Church tears the divorce-bill Gospel grants:
Shall wives sin and enjoy impunity race,
What profits me the fulness of the days,
The final dispensation, I demand,
Unless Law, Gospel, and the Church subjoin,
"But who hath barred thee primitive revenge,
Which, like fire damped and dammed up, burns
more fiercely?"
Use thou thy natural privilege of man,
Else wert thou found like those old ingrate
Jews,
Despite the manna-banquet on the board,
A-longing after melons, cucumbers,
And such like trash of Egypt left behind!"

There was one melon had improved our soup:
But did not Cioncino need the rind
To make a boat with? So I seem to think.)

Law, Gospel, and the Church — from these we leap
To the very last revelation, easy rule
Befitting the well-born and thorough-bred
O' the happy day we live in, not the dark
O' the early rude and accursed race.
"Behold," quoth James, "we bridle in a horse
And turn his body as we would whereby!"
Yea, but we change the bit to suit the growth,
And rasp our colt's jaw with a rugged spike,
We hasten to remit our managed steed
Who wheels round? at persuasion of a touch.
Civilization bows to decency,
The acknowledged use and wont: 'tis manners
— mild
But yet imperative law — which make the man.
Thus do we pay the proper compliment
To rank, and that society of Rome.
Hath so obliged us by its interest,
Taken our client's part instinctively,
As unaware defending its own cause.
What dictum doth Society lay down
I' the case of one who hath a faithless wife?...
Wherewithal should the husband cleanse his way?
Be patient and forgive? Oh, language fails, —
Shrinks from depicting his turpitude!
For if wronged husband raise not hue and cry,
Quod si martius de adulterio non
Conqueretur, he's presumed a — foh!
Presumitur leno: so, complain he must.
But how complain? At your tribunal, lords?
Far weightier challenge suits your sense, I wot!
You sit not to have gentlemen propose
Questions gentility can itself discuss.
Did not you prove that to our brother Paul?

Strong-sensed, sound-hearted, nay, the very Court,
Ipsestis in judicibus, I might add,
Non iamen dicam. In a cause like this,
So multiplied were reasons pro and con,
Delaicate, intertwisted and obscure,
That Law refused loan of a finger-tip.
To unravel, readjust the hopeless twine,
Since, half-a-dozen steps outside Law’s seat,
There stood a foolish trifler with a tool.
A-dangle to no purpose by his side,
Had clearly out the embroilment in a trice.
Assurant enim unanimiter
Doctors, for the Doctors all assert,
That husbands, quod marit, must be held
Viles, cornu repetantur, vile,
Fronts branching forth a florid infancy,
Si propriis manibus, if with their own hands,
Non sumpserit, they fail straight to take revenge,
Vindicatam, but expect the deed be done
By the Court — expectant ilam fieri
For justice, qui summunpsit idem, which Gives an enormous suffragio for reply,
Et cachinnans. For he ran away,
Deliquit enim, just that he might escape
The censure of both counsellors and crowd,
Ut vigilat Doctorum evitaret
Censuram, and lest so he superadd
To loss of honor ignominio too,
Et sic ne istam quaque ignominiam
Amisso honori superaddet.
My lords, my lords, the incon siderate step
Was — we referred ourselves to Law at all!
Twit me not with, “Law else had punished you!”
Each punishment of the extra-legal step,
To which the high-born preferably revert,
Is ever for some oversight, some slip
’T the taking vengeance, not for vengeance’ self,
A good thing, done unheaudomely, turns ill;
And never yet lacked ill the law’s rebuke.
For pregnant instance, let us contemplate
The luck of Leonardus, — see at large,
Of Sicily’s Decisions sixty-first.
This Leonard finds his wife is false: what then?
He makes her own son snare her, and entice
Out of the town walls to a private walk,
Wherein he slays her with commodity.
They find her body half-devoured by dogs:
Leonard is tried, convicted, punished, sent
To labor in the galleys seven years long:
Why? For the murder? Nay, but for the mode!
Malus modus occidenti, ruled the Court.
An ugly mode of killing, nothing more!
Another fructuous sample, — see “De Re Criminali,” in Matthaeus’ divine piece.
Another husband, in no better plight,
Simulates absence, thereby tempts his wife;
On whom he falls, out of al yambusacae,
Backed by a brother of his, and both of them
Armed to the teeth with arms that law had blamed.
Nimis dolose, overwilly,
Puissa operatum, did they work,
Pronounced the law: had it been fairly done
Law had not found him worthy, as she did,
Of four years’ exile. Why cite more? Enough
Is good as a feast — (unless a birthday-feast
For one’s Cunuccio) so, we finish here.
My lords, we rather need defend ourselves
Inasmuch as, for a twinkling of an eye,
We hesitatingly appealed to law, —
Than need deny that, on mature advice,
We blushingly bethought us, bade revenge
Back to its simple proper private way.
Of decent self-dealt gentlemanly death.
Judges, here is the law, and here beside,
The testimony! Look to it!
Pause and breathe!
So far is only too plain: we must watch:
Bottini will scarce hazard an attack.
Here: best anticipate the fellow’s play,
And guard the weaker places — warily ask.
What if considerations of a sort,
Reasons of a kind, arise from out the strange
Peculiar unforeseen new circumstance
Of this our (candor owns) abnormal act,
To bar the right of us revenging so?
“Impunity were otherwise your need:
Go slay your wife and welcome,” — may be urged,

“But why the innocent old couple slay,
Pietro, Violante? You may do enough,
Not too much, not exceed the golden mean:
Neither brute-beast nor Pagan, Gentile, Jew,
Nor Christian, no nor votarist of the mode,
Is justified to push revenge so far!”

No, indeed? Why, thou very sciolist! The actual wrong, Pompilia seemed to do,
Was virtual wrong done by the parents here —
Imposing her upon us as their child —
Themselves allow: then, her fault was their fault,
Her punishment be theirs accordingly!
But wait a little, sneak not off so soon!
Was this cheat solely harm to Guido, pray?
The precious couple you call innocent, —
Why, they were felons that Law failed to clinch.
Qui ut fraudarent, who that they might rob.
Legitime vocatos, folk law called,
Ad fides commissum, true heirs to the Trust.
Partum supposuerunt, feigned this birth,
Immemores reos factos esse, blind
To the fact that, guilty, they incurred thereby,
Ultimi supplicii, hanging or that’s worse.
Do you blame us that we turn Law’s instruments,
Not mere self-seekers, — mind the public weal,
Nor make the private good our sole concern?
That having — shall I say — secured a thief,
Not simply we recover from his pouch
The stolen article our property,
But also pounce upon our neighbor’s purse
We opportunely find reposining there,
And do him justice while we right ourselves?
He owes us, for our part, a dubbing say,
But owes our neighbor just a dance i’ the air
Under the gallows: so, we throttle him.
That neighbor’s Law, that couple are the Thief.
We are the over-ready to help Law —
Zoil of her house hath eaten us up: for which,
Can it be, Law intends to eat up us,
In with the ablative, the accusative!
I had hoped to have hitched the villain into verse
For a gift, this very day, a complete list
O' the prepositions each with proper case,
Telling a story, long was in my head.
What prepositions take the accusative?
Ad, to or at — who saw the cat? — down to
Ob, for, because of, keep her claws off! — Tush!
Law in a man takes the whole liberty:
The muse is fettered: just as Ovid found it!

And now, sea widens and the coast is clear;
What of the dubious act you bade excuse?
Surely things broaden, brighter, till at length
Remains — so far from act that needs defense —

Apology to make for act delayed
One minute, let alone eight mortal months.
Of hesitation! "Why procrastinate?"
(Out with it, my Botinimas, ease thyself!)
"Right, promptly done, is twice right: right delayed Turns wrong. We grant you should have
But killed o' the moment, at the meeting her
In company with the priest: then did the tongue
O' the Brazen Head give license, 'Time is now!'
Wait to make mind up? 'Time is past' it peals.
Friend, you are competent to mastery
O' the passions that confessedly explain
An outbreak: you allow an interval,
And then break out as if time's clock still clanged,
You have forfeited your chance, and flat you fall
Into the commonplace category
Of men bound to go softly all their days, Obeying law."

Now, which way make response?
What was the answer Guido gave, himself?
— That so to argue came of ignorance
How honor bears a wound: "For, wound," said he,
"My body, and the smart soon mends and ends:
While, wound my soul where honor sits and rules,
Longer the sufferance, stronger grows the pain,
Being ex incontinent, fresh as first."
But try another tack, urge common sense
By way of contrast: say — Too true, my lords!
We did demur, awhile did hesitate:
Since husband sure should let a scruple speak
 Erie he slay wife, — for his own safety, lords!
Carpers abound in this misjudging world:
Moreover, there's a nicety in law
That seems to justify them should they carp.
Suppose the source of injury a son —
Father may slay such son yet run no risk:
Why graced with such a privilege? Because
A father so incensed with his own child,
Or must have reason, or believe he has:
Quia semper, seeing that in such events,
Presumitur, the law is bound suppose,
Quod caput patris, that the sire must take,
THE RING AND THE BOOK

Bosum consilium pro filio,
The best course as to what befits his boy,
Through instinct, ex instinctu, of mere love,
Amoris, and, paterni, fatherhood;
Quam confidentiam, which confidence,
Non habet, law declines to entertain.
De ipso, of the husband: where finds he
An instinct that compels him love his wife?
Rather is he presumably her foe.
So, let him ponder long in this bad world
Ere do the simplest act of justice.

But

Again — and here we brush Bottini's breast —
Object you, "See the danger of delay,
Suppose a man murdered my friend last month:
Had I come up and killed him for his pains
In rage, I had done right, allows the law:
I meet him now and kill him in cold blood,
I do wrong, equally allows the law:
Wherein do actions differ, yours and mine?"
In plenitudine intellectus es?
Hast thi wits, Fise? To take such slayer's life,
Returns it life to thy slain friend at all?
Had he stolen ring instead of stabbing friend, —
To-day, to-morrow, or next century,
Meeting the thief, thy ring upon his thumb,
Thou justifiably hast wrung it thence:
So, coldest thou wrench thy friend's life back again.
Though prisoned in the bosom of his foe,
Why, law would look complacent on thy wrath.
Our case is, that the thing we lost, we found:
The honor, we were robbed of eight months since,
Being recoverable at any day
By death of the delinquent. Go thy ways!
Ere thou hast learned law, will be much to do,
As said the gable while he shod the goose.

Nay, if you urge me, interval was none!
From the inn to the villa — blank or else a bar
Of adverse and contrary incident
Solid between us and our just revenge!
What with the priest who flourishes his blade,
The wife who like a fury flings at us,
The crowd — and then the capture, the appeal
To Rome, the journey there, the jaunting thence
To shelter at the House of Convertites,
The visits to the Villa, and so forth,
Where was one minute left us all this while
To put in execution that revenge
We planned o' the instant? — as it were,
plumbed down
O' the spot, some eight months since, which round sound agg.
Rome, more propitious than our nest, should hatch!
Object not, "You reached Rome on Christmas Eve,
And, despite liberty to sit at once,
Waited a whole and indecorous week!"
Hath so the Malinois, the canker, lords,
Eaten to our bone? In no religion left?
No care for aught held holy by the Church?

What, would you have us skip and miss those Feasts
O' the Natal Time, must we go prosecute
Secular business on a sacred day?
Should not the merest charity expect,
Setting our poor concerns aside for once,
We hurried to the song matinal
P' the Sistine, and pressed forward for the Mass
The Cardinal that's Camerlengo chants,
Then rushed on to the blessing of the Hat
And Rapier, which the Pope sends to what priests
Has done most detriment to the Infall
And thereby whetted courage if 't were blunt!
Meantime, allow we kept the house a week.
Suppose not we were idle in our maw?
Picture us raging here and raving there —
"'Money?' I need none. 'Friends?' The word is null.
Restore the white was on that shield of mine
Borne at... wherever might be shield to bear.
"I see no grandair, he who fought so well
At... here find out and put in time and place,
Or else invent the fight his grandair fought:
"I see this! I see that!"

(See nothing else.
Or I shall scarce see lamb's fry in an hour!
What to the uncle, as I bid advance
The smoking dish? "Fry suits a tender tooth!
Behooves we care a little for our kin —
You, Sir, — who care so much for cousinship
As came to your poor loving nephew's feast?"
He has the reversion of a long lease yet —
Land to bequeath! He loves lamb's fry, I know!

Here fall to be considered those same six
Qualities; what Bottini needs must call
So many aggravations of our crime,
Parasite-growth upon mere murder's back.
We summarily might dispose of such
By some off-hand and jaunty fling, some skit —
So, since there's proved no crime to aggrava,
A faco for your aggravations, Fise!"
No, — handle mischief rather, — play with spells
Were meant to raise a spirit, and laugh the while
We show that did he rise we stand his match!
Therefore, first aggravation: we made up —
Over and above our simple murderous selves —
A regular assemblage of armed men,
Caudato armatorum, — ay,
Unluckily it was the very judge
That sits in judgment on our cause to-day
Who passed the law as Governor of Rome:
"Four men armed" — though for lawful purpose, mark!
Much more for an acknowledged crime —
"shall die."
We five were armed to the teeth, meant murder too?
Why, that's the very point that saves us, Fise!
DOMINUS HYACINTHUS DE ARCHANGELIS

Let me instruct you. Crime nor done nor meant, —
You punish still, who arm and congregate:
For wherefore use bad means to a good end?
Crime being meant not done,—you punish still
The means to crime, whereon you haply pounce,
Though accident have balked them of effect.
But crime not only compassed but complete,
Meant and done too? Why, since you have the end.
Be that your sole concern, nor mind those means
No longer to the purpose! Murdered we?
(—Which, that our luck was in the present case,
Quod contigisse in presenti casu,
Is palpable, manus palpatum est —)
Make murder out against us, nothing else!
Of many crimes committed with a view
To one main crime, Law overlooks the less,
Intent upon the large. Suppose a man
Having in view commission of a theft,
Climbs the town-wall: 'tis for the theft he hangs,
In case he stands convicted of such theft:
Law remits whipping, due to who clomb wall
Though they may hang a man in wanton mood,
Just to dislodge a daw's nest, plant a flag.
So I interpret you the manly mind
Of him about to judge both you and me,—
Our Governor, who, being no Fisc, my Fisc,
Cannot have blundered on iniquity!
Next aggravation,—that the arms themselves
Were specially of such forbidden sort
Through shape or length or breadth, as, prompt;
Law plucks
From single hand of solitary man,
Making him pay the carriage with his life:
Delatio armorum, arms against the rule,
Costa formam constitutionis, of Pope Alexander's blessed memory.
Such are the poniards with the double prong,
Horn-like, when times make bold the antlered
Each prong of brittle glass — wherewith to stab
And break off short and so let fragment stick
Fast in the flesh to baffle surgery:
Such being the Genoese blade with hooked edge
That did us service at the villa here.
Sed parcat uti tam eximius vir,
But,—let so rare a personage forgive,—
Fisc, thy objection is a folly!
Thy charge runs that we killed three innocents:
Killed, dost see? Then, if killed, what matter how?
—By stick or stone, by sword or dagger, tool
Long or tool short, round or triangular —
Poor slain folk find small comfort in the choice!
Means to an end, means to an end, my Fisc!
Nature comes out, 'Take the first arms you find!' —
Per memoriae arma: where's a stone then?
Unde mi lapidem, where darts for me?
Unde sagittas? But subdue the bard
And wenchers, a little. Eight months since, since,
Had we, or had we not, incurred your blame.
For letting 'scape unpunished this bad pair?

I think I proved that in last paragraph!
Why did we so? Because our courage failed.
Wherefore? Through lack of arms to fight the foe:
We had no arms or merely lawful ones,
An unimportant sword and blunderbuss,
Against a foe, pollen in potency,
The amasius, and our vixen of a wife.
Well then, how culpably done and strict
And once more undertake the high emprise,
Unless we load ourselves this second time
With handsome superfluity of arms,
Since better is 'too much' than 'not enough,'
And 'plus non vitiis,' too much does no harm,
Except in mathematics, sages say.
Gather instruction from the parable!
At first we are advised — 'A lad hath here
Seven barley loaves and two small fishes: what
Is that among so many?' Aptly asked:
But put that question twice and, quite as apt,
The answer is, 'Fragmenta, twelve baskets full!'

And, while we speak of superabundance, fling
We word by the way to fools who cast their float
On Guido — 'Punishment was pardoned him,
But here the punishment exceeds offence:
He might be just, but he was cruel too!'
Why, grant there seems a kind of cruelty
In downright stabbing people he could maim,
(If so you stigmatize the stern and strict)
Still, Guido meant no cruelty — may plead
Transgression of his mandate, over-zeal
O' the part of his companions: all he craved
Was, they should fray the faces of the folk,
Merely disfigure, nowise make them die.
Solummodo faveat, he owns no more,
Dedisse mandatum, than that he desired,
Ad afrisiandum, dicam, that they hack
And hew, i' the customary phrase, his wife,
Uxor tanta, and no harm beside.
If his instructions then be misconceived,
Nay, disobeyed, impute you blame to him?
Cite me no Panicleus to the point,
As adverse! Oh, I quite expect his case —
How certain noble youths of Sicily
Having good reason to mistrust their wives,
Killed them and were absolved in consequence:
While others who had gone beyond the need
By mutilation of each paramour —
As Galba in the Horatian satire grieved
—These were condemned to the galleries, cast for guilt
Exceeding simple murder of a wife.
But why? Because of ugliness, and not cruelty, in the said revenge, I trow!
Ex causa abscessionis partium;
Qui nempe id facientes reputantur
Nature inimici, man revolts
Against them as the natural enemy.
Pray, grant to one who meant to slit the nose
And slash the cheek and slur the mouth, at moest,
A somewhat more humane award than these
Obtained, these natural enemies of man:
Objectum munditiae corruit, flat you fall,
My Fisc! I waste no kick on you, but pass.
Third aggravation: that our act was done—Not in the public street, where safety lies, Not in the by-place, caution may avoid, Wood, cavern, desert, spots contrived for crime,—But in the very house, home, nook and nest. O' the victims, murdered in their dwelling-place, In domo ac habitatio propra, Where all presumably is peace and joy. The spider, crime, pronounce we twice a pest When, creeping from congenial cottage, she Takes hold with her hand to interrump His household more, i.e. the palace of the king. All three were housed and safe and confident. Moreover, the permission that our wife Should have at length domum pro carcerre, Her own abode in place of prison—why, We ourselves granted, by our other self And proxy Paolo: did we make such grant, Meaning a lure?—elude the vigilance O' the jailer, lead her to commodious death, While we ostensibly relented?—Ay, Just so did we, nor otherwise, my Fisc! Is vengeance lawful? We demand our right, But find it will be questioned or refused By jailer, turnkey, hangdog, —what know we? Pray, how is it we should conduct ourselves? To gain our point right—break public peace, Do you bid us?—trouble order with our broils? Endanger...shall I shrink to own...ourselves?—Who want no broken head nor bloody nose (While bungled slitting noses, breaking heads) Egothythrid, multiplex, how are we to interfere! Nam quisquid sit, for howsoever it be, An de consensus nostro, if with leave Or not, a monasterio, from the nuns. Educat esset, she had been led forth, Potiusmus id dissimulare, we May well have granted leave in pure pretence, Ut adimum habere, that thereby An entry we might compass, a free move Potuissemus, to her easy death, Ad eam occidentem. Privasio, O' the hearth, and sanctitude of home, say you? Shall we give man's abode more privilege Than God's?—for in the churches where he dwells, In quibus assistit Regum Rex, by means Of his essence, per essentiam, all the same, Et ab hiloconius, therein, in eis, Ez justa via delinquens, whose dares To take a liberty on ground enough, Is pardoned, excusat: that's our case— Delinquent through befitting cause. You hold, To punish a false wife in her own house Is graver than, what happens every day, To hale a debtor from his hiding-place In church protected by the Sacrament? To this conclusion have I brought my Fisc? Foxes have holes, and fowls o' the air their nests; Praise you the impuity that follows, Fisc? Shall false wife yet have where to lay her head? "Contra Fiscum definitum est!" He's done! "Surpe et scriba," make a note of it! —If I may daily with Aquinas' word. Or in the death-three does he matter still, Fourth aggravation, that we changed our gaz, And rusticated ourselves with uncouth hat, Rough vest and goatakin wrappage; murdered thus Mutilationestium, in disguise, Whereby mere murder got complexed with wuk. Turned homicidium ex insidiis? Fisc, How often must I round thee in the ears— All means are lawful to a lawful end? Concede he had the right to kill his wife: The Compromise in a tavern house; why? De illa ut vindicatum sumeret. That on her he might lawful vengeance take Commodius, with more ease, et tutius, And safelier: wants he warrant for the step? Read to thy profit how the Apostle once For ease and safety, when Damascus raged, Was let down in a basket by the wall, To 'escape the malice of the governor (Another sort of Governor boasts Rome!)—Many are of opinion,—covered close, Concealed with—what except that very cloak He left behind at Trosa afterward? I shall not add a syllable: Molinists may! Well, have we more to manage? Ay, indeed! Fifth aggravation, that our wife repose Sub potestate judicis, beneath Protection of the judge,—her house was styled A prison, and his power became its guard In lieu of wall and gate and bolt and bar. This is a tough point, shrewd, recondite: Because we have to supplicate that judge Shall overlook wrong done the judgment-sea. Now, I might safer may be pulled, As man: but then as father...if the Fisc Touched one hair of my boy who held my hand In confidence he could not come to harm Crossing the Corso, at my own desire. Going to see those bodies in the church— What would you say to that, Don Hyacinth? This is the sole and single knotty point: For, bid Tommati blink his interest, You land his magnanimity the while: But balk Tommati's office,—he talks big! "My predecessors in the place,—those men O' the prophets that may hope succeed me here,— Shall I diminish their prerogative? Count Guido Francesco's honor!—well. Has the Governor of Rome none?"

You perceive.
The cards are all against us. Make a push, Kick over table, as shrewd gamblers do! We, do you say, encroach upon the rights. Deny the omnipotence o' the judge forestalled? We, who have only been from first to last Intending that his purpose should prevail, Nay more, at times, anticipating it At risk of his rebuke?

But wait awhile!

Cannot we lump this— with the sixth and last Of the aggravations—that the Majesty O' the Sovereign here received a wound? In wit, Lanza Majestas, since our violence
Wes out of envy to the course of law,
In other cities? Wes out short thereby
Three pending suits, promoted by ourselves
I the main, — which worsens crime, accedit ad
Exasperationem crimina!

Yes, here the eruptive wrath with full effect!
How, did not indignation chain my tongue,
Could I repel this last, worst charge of all?
(There is a porcupine to barbecue;
Gigia can jug a rabbit well enough,
With sour-sweet sauce and pine-pips; but, good Lord,
Suppose the devil instigate the wench to stew, nor roast him? Stew my porcupine?
If she does, I know where his quills shall stick!
Come, I must myself go and see to things:
I cannot stay much longer stowing here.)
Our stall, such... I mean, our soul is stirred within,
And we want words. We wounded Majesty?
Fall under such a censure, we? — who yearned
So much that Majesty dispel the cloud,
And shine on us with healing on her wings,
That we prayed Pope Majestas very self
To anticipate a little the tardy pack.
Bell us forth deep the authoritative bay
Should start the beagles into sudden yelp
Uniosons, — and, Gospel leading Law;
Grant there assembly in our own behoof
A Congregation, a particular Court,
A few picked friends of quality and place,
To hear the several matters in dispute,
Causes big, little, and indifferent,
Bred of our marriage like a mushroom-growth,
All at once (can one brush off such too soon?)
And are with landable dispatch decide
Whether we, in the main (to sink detail)
Were one the Pope should hold fast or let go.
"What, take the credit from the Law?" you ask?
Indeed, we did! Law ducks to Gospel here:
Why should Law gain the glory and pronounce
A judgment shall immortalize the Pope?
Yes: our self-abnegating policy
Was Job's — we would pour our David's sloth,
Bid him surmount against a city, sack
A place whereeto ourselves had long laid siege,
Left, taking it at last, it take our name
Nor be styled Innocentpolis.
But no! The modesty was in alarm,
The temperament refused to interefere.
Returned us our petition with the word
"Ad judices suos," "Leave him to his judge!"
As who should say, "Why trouble my repose?
Why consult Peter in a simple case,
Peter's wife's sister in her fewer-fitt
 Might solve as readily as the Apostle's self?
Are my Tribunals posed by aught so plain?
Hath not my Court a conscience? Is it of age,
Ask it!"

We do ask, — but, inspire reply
To the Court thou bidst me ask, as I have asked
Oh thou, who vigilantly dost attend
To even the few, the ineffectual words
Which rise from this our low and mundane sphere
Up to thy region out of smoke and noise,
Seeking corroboration from thy nod
Who art all justice — which means mercy too,
In a low noisy smoky world like ours
Where Adam's sin made peccable his seed!
We venerate the father of the flock,
Whose last faint sands of life, the frettred gold,
Fall noiselessly, yet all too fast, o' the cone
And tapering heap of those collected years:
Never have these been hurried in their flow,
Though justice fain would jog reluctant arm,
In eagerness to take the forfeiture
Of guilty life: much less shall mercy sue
In vain that thou let innocence survive,
Precipitate no minim of the mass
O' the all-so precious moments of thy life,
By pushing Guido into death and doom!

(Our Cardinal engages to go read
The Pope my speech, and point its beauties To our out.
They say, the Pope has one half-hour, in twelve,
Of something like a moderate return
Of the intellectuals, — never much to lose! —
If I adroitly plant this passage there,
The Pope will find himself forestalled, I think.
Though he stand, beat till the old ear-drum break!
— Ah, boy of my own bowels, Hyacinth,
Wilt ever catch the knack, require the pains
Of poor papa, become proficient too
I the how and why and when, the time to laugh,
The time to weep, the time, again, to pray,
And all the times prescribed by Holy Writ?
Well, well, we fathers can but care, but cast
Our bread upon the waters?)
In a word,
These secondary charges go to ground,
Since secondary, and superfluous, — motes
Quite from the main point: we did all and some,
Little and much, adjunct and principal,
Causa honoris. Is there such a cause
As the sake of honor? By that sole test try
Our action, nor demand if more or less.
Because of the action's mode, we merit blame
Or maybe deserve praise! The Court decides.
Is the end lawful? It allows the means:
What we may do, we may with safety do,
And what means "safety" we ourselves must judge.
Put case a person wrongs me past dispute:
If my legitimate vengeance he a blow,
Mistrusting my bare arm can deal that blow,
I claim co-operation of a stick;
Doubtful if stick be tough, I crave a sword;
Difident of ability in fence,
I see a friend, a swordsman to assist:
Take one — he may be coward, fool or knave:
Why not take fifty? — and if these excessed
I the due degree of drubbing, whom accuse
But the first author of the aforesaid wrong
THE RING AND THE BOOK

Who put poor me to such a world of pain?
Surgery would have just excised a wart;
The patient made such pother, struggled so
That the sharp instrument sliced nose and all.
Tantus us not that our friends performed for pay!
Ourselves had toiled for simple honor's sake:
But country clowns want dirt they comprehend,
The piece of gold! Our reasons, which suffice
Ourselves, be ours alone; our pieces of gold
Be, to the rustic, reason he approves!
We must translate our motives like our speech,
Into the lower phrase that suits the sense
O' the limitedly apprehensive. Let Each level have its language! Heaven speaks
first.
To the angel, then the angel tames the word
Down to the ear of Tobit: he, in turn,
Diminishes the message to his dog.
And finally that dog finds how the flea (Whence else, important, might check his speed.)
Shall learn its hunger must have holiday,
By application of its tongue or paw:
So many varied sorts of language here,
Each following each with pace to match the
step.

Haud passibus aquis!

Talking of which fleas,
Reminds me I must put in special word
For the poor humble following,—the four
friends,

Sicarii, our assassins caught and caged.
Ourselves are safe in your approval now:
Yet must we care for our companions, plead
The cause o' the poor, the friends (of old-world faith)
Who lie in tribulation for our sake.

Pauperum Procurator is my style:
I stand forth as the poor man's advocate:
And when we treat of what concerns the poor,
Ex cum agatur de pauperibus,
In hora, cascaratis, for their sake;
In corum causis, natural piety,
Pietas, ever ought to win the day,
Triumphare debet, quia ipsa sunt,
Because those very paupers constitute,
Thesusurus Christi, all the wealth of Christ.
Nevertheless I shall not hold you long
With multiplicity of proofs, nor burn
Candle at noon tide, clarify the clear.
There beams a case refugient from our books.

Castrensis, Buttringarius, everywhere
I find it burn to dissipate the dark.
'T is this: a husband had a friend, which
friend
Seemed to him over-friendly with his wife
In thought and purpose,—I pretend no more.
To justify suspicion or diaspel,
He bids his wife make show of giving heed,
Semblance of sympathy—propose, in fine,
A secret meeting in a private place.
The friend, ensnared thus, finds an ambuscade.
To where the husband posted with a pack.
Of other friends, who fall upon the first
And best his love and life out both at once.

These friends were brought to question for their help;
Law ruled, "The husband being in the right,
Who helped him in the right can scarce be wrong."

Opinio, an opinion every way,
Multa tenenda cordi, heart should hold!
When the inferiors follow as betis
The lead o' the principal, they change their name,
And, non dicuntur, are no longer called
His mandatories, mandatorii,
But helpmates, sed auxiliatores; since
To that degree does honor's sake lend aid,
Ado honoris causa est officiar,
That not alone, non solum, does it pour
Itself out, se diffundat, on mere friends
We bring to do our bidding of this sort,
In mandatorios simplices, but sucks
Along with it in wide and generous whirl,
Sed etiam assassini qualitate
Qualificatis, people qualified
By the quality of assassination's self,
Dare I make use of such neologism,
Ut utar verbo.

Haste we to conclude:
Of the other points that favor, leave some for
For Spreti; such as the delinquents' youth.
One of them falls short, by some months, of age
Fit to be managed by the gallows; two
May plead exemption from our law's award.
Being foreigners, subjects of the Granduke—
I spare that bone to Spreti, and reserve
Myself the juicier breast of argument—
Flinging the breast-blade i' the face o' the Fic,
Who furnished me the tidbit: he must needs
Play off his privilege and rack the clowns—
And they, at instance of the rack, confess
All four unanimously made resolve,—
The night o' the murder, in brief minute watched
Behind the back of Guido as he fled,—
That, since he had not kept his promise, paid
The money for the murder on the spot,
So, reaching home again, might please ignore
The pact or pay them in improper coin,—
They one and all resolved, these hopeful
friends,
'T were but sincere augurate the morrow's light,
Nature recruited with her due repose,
By killing Guido as he lay asleep
Followed on wallet which contained their fee.

I thank the Fic for knowledge of this fact:
What fact could hope to make more manifest
Their rectitude, Guido's integrity?
For who fails recognize the touching truth
That these poor rustics bore no envy, hate,
Malice nor yet uncharitableness
Against the people they had put to death?
In them, did such an act reward itself?
All done was to deserve the simple pay,
Obtain the bread clowns earn by sweat of brow.

And missing which, they missed of everything—
Hence claimed pay, even at expense of life
To their own lord, so little warped (admire!)
By prepossession, such the absolute
Instinct of equity in rustic souls!
Whence pure Count, and mild cultivated mind,
He, wholly rapt in his serene regard
Of honor, he contemplating the sun,
Who hardly marks if taper blink below,
He, dreaming of no argument for death
Except a vengeance worthy noble hearts,—
Dared not so debase the deed, forsooth,
Vulgarize vengeance, as defray its cost
By money dug from out the dirty earth,
Irritant mere, in Ovid’s phrase, to ill.
What though he lur’d base minds by lucre’s hope,—
The only motive they could masticate,
Milk for babes, not strong meat which men require?
The deed done, those coarse hands were soiled enough,
He spooked them the pollution of the pay.  So much for the alledge, thine, my Fise,
Quo nihil absurdius, than which naught more mad,
Exsugnari potest, may be squeezed
From out the cogitative brain of thee!
And now, thou excellent the Governor!
(Push to the peroration) ceterum
Entus supplico, I strive in prayer,
Ut domus meis, that unto the Court,
Benigna fronte, with a gracious brow,
Et genere, that to his birth and soul,
Perpendiculat, it may please them weigh,
Quod dominus Guido, that our noble Count,
Occidit, did the killing in dispute,
Ut eurus honor tumulatus, that
The honor of him buried fathom-deep
In infancy, in infancy, might arise,
Benedicet, as ghost breaks sepulchre!
Occidit, for he killed, uxorem, wife,
Quia ille fuit, since she was to him,
Opprobrio, a disgrace and nothing more!
Opprobria, killed her parents too,
Qui, who, postposita perccucundia,
Having thrown off all sort of decency,
Filiam repudiarunt, had renounced
Their daughter, atque declarare non Erubescunt, nor felt blush tinge cheek,
Declaring, meretricis gentium
Essent, she was the offspring of a drab,
Ut iape dehonestaretur, just
That so himself might lose his social rank!
Cujus mentem, and which daughter’s heart and soul,
They, perverterunt, turned from the right course,
Et ad illicitos amores non
Dumtaxat pellexerunt, and to love
Not simply did alluringly incite,
Sed ut obturat, but by force,
O! the duty, filialis, daughters owe,
Cooperunt, forced and drove her to the deed:
Occidit, I repeat he killed the clan,
Ne sceleric amplius in dedecore,
Lest peradventure longer life might trail,
Viseret, link by link his turpitude,
Leviathan into the nose whose
I have put fish-hook, pierced his jaw with thorn,
And gave him to my maidens for a play!
I the rough: to-morrow I review my piece
Tame here and there undus floridity.
It's hard: you have to plead before these priests
And poke at them with Scripture, or you pass
For heathens and, what's worse, for ignorant
O' the quality o' the Court and what it likes
By way of illustration of the law.
To-morrow stick in this, and throw out that,
And, having first ecclesiasticized,
Regularize the whole, next emphasize,
Then latinize, and lastly Cereno-ize.
Giving my Fice his finish. There's my speech!
And where's my fry, and family and friends?
Where's that huge Hycanth I mean to hug
Till he cries out, "Jut satis! Let me breathe!"
Now, what an evening have I earned to-day?
Hail, ye true pleasures, all the rest are false!
Oh, the old mother, oh, the fattish wife!
Rogue Hycanth shall put on paper toque,
As wear himself bored with mamma's veil
Done up to imitate papa's black robe,
(I'm in the secret of the comedy, —
Part of the program leaked out long ago!)
And call himself the Advocate o' the Poor,
Mimic Don father that defends the Count:
And for bread shall have small full glass
Of manly red rosolio to himself,
— Always provided that he conjugate
Bibo, I drink, correctly — nor be found
Make the perfectum, dipes, as last year!
How the ambitious do so harden heart
As lightly hold by those home-sanctitudes,
To me is matter of bewilderment —
Bewilderment! Because ambition's range
Is nowise tethered by domestic tie:
Am I refused an outlet from my home
To the world's stage? — whereon a man should play
The man in public, vigilant for law,
Zealous for truth, a credit to his kind,
Nay, — since, employing talent so, I yield
The Lord his own again with unsurly
— A satisfaction, yes, to God himself!
Well, I have modelled me by Agnus's wish,
"Remove far from me vanity and lies,
Feed me with food convenient for me!" — What
I? the world should a wise man require beyond?
Can I but cox and good fat little wife
To tell her fool of a father the mad prank
His scapegrace nephew played this time last year
At Carnival! He could not choose, I think,
But modify that incommodious gift
Of a nose (some somewhere in the will Under the pillow, some one seems to guess)
— Correct that clause in favor of a boy
The trifle ought to grace, with name engraved,
Would look so well, produced in future years
To pledge a memory, when poor papa
Latin and law are long since laid at rest —
Hycantho dono dedit amus! Why,
The wife should get a necklace for her pains,
The very pearls that made Violante proud,
And Pietro pawned for half their value once, —
Redeemable by somebody, ne sit
Marita quae redounditibus
Onusta mammis . . . baccis ambulet:
Her bosom shall display the big round balls,
No braver proudly borne by wedded wife!
With which Horatian promise I conclude.
Into the pigeon-hole with thee, my speech!
Off and away, first work, then play, play:
Bottini, burn thy books, thou blazing ass!
Sing "Tra-la-la, for, lamblkins, we must live!"

IX

JURIS DOCTOR JOHANNES—BAPTISTA BOTTINIUS,

FISCI ET REV. CAM. APOSTOL. ADVOCATUS

Had I God's leave, how I would alter things!
If I might read instead of print my speech,—
Ay, and enliven speech with many a flower
Resembling o's own to blow in print,
As wildings planted in a prim parterre,—
This scurvy room were turned an immense hall;
Opposite, fifty judges in a row;
This side and that of me, for audience — Rome:
And, where you window is, the Pope should hide—
Watch, curtained, but peep visibly enough.
A buzz of expectation! Through the crowd,
Jingling his chain and stumping with his staff,
Up comes an usher, louts him low, "The Court Requires the allocution of the Fice!"

I rise, I bend, I look about me, pause
O'er the hushed multitude: I count — One, two—

Have ye seen, Judges, have ye, lights of law,—
When it may hap some painter, much in vogue
Throughout our city nutritive of arts,
Ye summon to a task shall test his worth,
To manufacture, as he knows and can,
A work may decorate a palace-wall,
Affords my lords their Holy Family,—
Hath it escaped the acumen of the Court
How such a painter sets himself to paint?
Suppose that Joseph, Mary and her Babe
A-journeying to Egypt, prove the piece: —
Why, first he sedulously practiceth,
This painter, — girding loin and lighting lamp,—
On what may nourish eye, make facile hand; —
Get thee studies (styled by draughtsmen so)
From some assistant corpse of Jew or Turk
Or, haply, Molinist, he cuts and carves,—
This Lucas or this Carlo or the like.
To him the bones their immost secret yield,
Each notch and nodele signify their use:
On him the muscles turn, in triple tier,
And pleasantly entreat the entranced man
"Familiarize thee with our play that lifts Thns, and thus lowers again, leg, arm and foot!"
— Ensuring due correctness in the nude.
Which done, is all done? — Not a whit, ye know!
He,— to art’s surface rising from her depth,—
If some flax-poll’d soft-bearded sire be found,
May simulate a Joseph, (happy chance!) —
Limmeth exact each wrinkle of the brow,
Least so inovation, check or chap.
Till io, in black and white, the senior lives!
Is it a young and comely peasant-nurse
That poseth? (be the phrase accorded me!)
Each feminine delight of florid lip,
Eyes brimming o’er and brow bowed down with love.
Marmoreal neck and bosom uberosus,—
Glad on the paper in a trice they go
To help his notion of the Mother-maid:
Methinks I see it, chalk a little stumped!
Yes and her babe — that flexure of soft limbs,
That budding face imbued with dewy sleep,
Contribute each an excellence to Christ.
Nay, since he humbly lent companionship,
Even the poor ass, unpanniard and elate
Stands, perks an ear up, he a model too;
While solated shoon, staff, scrip and water-gourd,— Aught may betoken travel, heat and haste,—
No jot nor tittles of these but in its turn
Ministers to perfection of the piece:
 Till now, such piece before him, part by part
Such prelude ended,—pause our painter may,
Submit his fifty studies one by one,
And in some sort boast” I have served my lords!”

But what? And hast he painted once this while?
Or when ye cry, “Produce the thing required,
Show us our picture shall rejoice its niche,
Thy Journey through the Desert done in Yes’s oils!” —
What, doth he fall to shuffling ’mid his sheets,
Fumbling for first this, then the other fact
Consign’d to paper, — “studies,” bear the term! —
And stretch a canvas, mix a pot of paste,
And fasten here a head and there a tail,
(The ass hath one, my Judges!) so dove-tail
Or, rather, ass-tail in, piece sorely out —
By bits of reproduction of the life —
The picture, the expected Family?
I trow not! do I miss with my conceit
The mark, my lords? — not so my lords were served!
Rather your artist turns abrupt from these,
And preferably buries him and broods
(Quite away from vaut vulgar and extern)
On the inner spectrum, filtered through the eye,
His brain-disposing, bred of many a drop,
E pluribus unum: and the wiser he!
For in that brain,— their fancy seys at work,
Could my lords peep indulged,— results alone,
Not processes which nourish such results.
Would they discover and appriciate,— life
Fed by digestion, not raw food itself,
No goblets but smooth comfortable chyme
Secreted from each malled-up crudity,—
Less distinct, part by part, but in the whole
Truer to the subject,— the main central truth
And soul o’ the picture, would my Judges spy,—
Not those mere fragmentary studied facts
Which answer to the outward frame and flesh
Not this nose, not that eyebrow, the other fact
Of man’s staff, woman’s stole or infant’s clout,
But lo, a spirit-birth conceived of flesh,
Truth rare and real, not transcripts, fact and false.
The studies,— for his pupils and himself!
The picture be for our eximious Roma.
And—who knows? — satisfy its Governor,
Whose new wing to the villa he hath bought (God give him joy of it) by Capena, soon
(Tis bruited) shall be glowing with the brush
Of who hath long surpassed the Florentine,
The Urbinate and . . . what if I dared add,
Even his master, yea the Cortonese,—
I mean the accomplished Ciro Ferri, Sirs!
(— Did not he die? I ’ll see before I print.)

End we exordium, Phobus plucks my ear!
Thus then, just so and no whit otherwise,
Have I, — engaged as I were Ciro’s self,
To paint a parallel, a Family,
The patriarch Pietro with his wise old wife
To boot (as if one introduced Saint Anne
By bold conjectures to complete the group)
And juvenile Pompilia with her babe,
Who, seeking safety in the wilderness,
Were all surprised by Herod, while out-stretched
In sleep beneath a palm-tree by a spring,
And killed — the very circumstance I paint,
Moving the pity and terror of my lords
Exactly so have I, a month at least,
Your Fiscal, made me cognizant of facts,
Searched out, pried into, pressed the meaning forth.

Of every piece of evidence in point,
How bloody Herod slew these innocents,—
Until the glad result is gained, the group
Demonstrably presented in detail,
Their slumber and his onslaught, — like as life.
Yes, and, availing me of help allowed
By law, discreet provision lest my lords
Be too much troubled by effrontery,—
The rack, law plies suspected crime withal—
(Law that hath listened while the lyrist sang “Lena tormentum ingenio admoves.”)
Gently thou joggest by a twingle the wit,
“Plerumque duro,” else were slow to blab!)
Through this concession my full cup runs o’er:
The guilty owns his guilt without reserve.
Therefore by part and part I clutch my case
Which, in entirety now, — momentous task,—
My lords demand, so render them I must.
Since, one poor pleading more and I have done.
But shall I ply my papers, play my proofs,
Parade my studies, fifty in a row,
As though the Court were yet in pupillage,
Claimed not the artist’s ultimate appeal?
Much rather let me soar the height prescribed
And, bowing low, proffer my picture’s self!
No more of proof, disproof,— such virtue was,
Such vice was never in Pompilia, now!
Far better say "Behold Pomphilia!"—for
I leave the family as unmanageable,
And stick to just one portrait, but life-size.)
Hatth calumny imputed to the fair
A blemish, mole on cheek or wart on chin,
Much more, blind hidden horrors best un-
Shall I descend to prove you, point by point,
Never was knock-knee known nor splay-foot found
In Phryne? (I must let the portrait go, Contest me with the model, I believe)—
—I prove this? An indignant sweep of hand,
Dash at and doing away with drapery,
And,—use your eyes, Athenians, smooth she smiles!
Or,—since my client can no longer smile,
And more appropriate instances abound,—
What is this Tale of Tarquin, how the slave
Was caught by him, preferred to Collatine?
Thou, even from thy corpse-clothes virginal,
Look'at the lie dead, Lucretia!
Thus at least
I, by the guidance of antiquity,
(Our one infallible guide,) now operate,
Sure that the innocence thus shown is safe;
Sure, too, that, while I plead, the echoes cry (Lend my weak voice thy trump, sonorous Fame!)—
"Monstrosity the Phrynean shape shall mar,
Lucretia's soul comport with Tarquin's lie,
When thistles grow on vines or thorns yield figs,
Or oblique sentence leave this judgment-seat!"

A great theme: may my strength be adequate!
For—paint Pomphilia, dares my feebleness?
How did I unaware engage so much —Find myself undertaking to produce
A faultless nature in a flawless form?
What's here? Oh, turn aside nor dare the bike
Of such a crown, such constellation, say,
As jewels here thy front, Humanity!
First, infancy, pellucid as a pearl;
Then, childhood — stone which, dewdrop at the base.
(An old conjecture) suaks, by dint of gaze,
Blue from the sky and turns to sapphire so:
Yet both these gems eclipsed by, last and best,
Womanliness and witchhood opaline,
Its milk-white pallor, — chastity, — suffused
With here and there a tint and hint of flame, —
Desire, — the lapidary loves to find.
Such jewels bind consecrated thy brow,
Pomphilia, infant, child, maid, woman, wife —
Crowns the ideal in our earth at last!
What should a faculty like mine do here?
Close eyes, or else, the rashlier hurry hand!

Which is to say, — lose no time but begin!
Sermocinando ne declamem, Sirs,
Ultra clepsydrum, as our preachers smile,
Lost and exceed my hour-glass. Whereupon,
As Flegus comports, I dare the epic plunge—
Begin at once with marriage, up till when Little or nothing would arrest your love.
In the easeful life o' the lady; lamb and lamb,
How do they differ? Know one, you know all Manners of maidenhood: mere maiden she.
And since all lambs are like in more than fleece.
Prepare to find that, lamb-like, she too frisks—
O' the weaker sex, my lords, the weaker sex!
To whom, the Teian teaches us, for gift,
Not strength,—man's dower,—but beauty,
nature grave,
"Beauty in lieu of spears, in lieu of shields!"
And what is beauty's sure concomitant,
Nay, intimate essential character,
But melting wiles, delicious sweet,
The whole indubitable armor of love?
Therefore of verum pranks, dishavellings
O' the hair of youth that dances April in,
And easily imagined Hebe-slips
O'er award which May makes over-smooth for foot
These shall we pry into? — or wiser, wink,
Though numerous and dear they may have been?

For lo, advancing Hymen and his pomp!
Dissident nunc amores, loves, farewell!
Maneat amor, let love, the sole, remain!
Farewell to dewiness and prime of life:
Remains the rough determined day: dance
done,
To work, with plough and harrow! What comes next?
"Tis Guido henceforth guides Pomphilia's step.
Crisis, "No more friskings o' the foodful globe.
Else, 'ware the whip!" Accordingly,—first crack
O' the thong,—we hear that his young wife was harried,
Cohibita fuit, from the old free life,
Vitam liberiam ducec.
Demur we? Nowise: beifer brave the hind?
We seek not there should lapse the natural law.
The proper piety to lord and king
And husband: let the beifer bear the yoke?
Only, I crave he cast not patience off,
This hind; for deem you she endures the whip.
Nor winces at the goad, nay, restive, kicks?
What if the adversary's charge be just,
And all unwittingly she pursue her way
With groin and grunt, though hind strike ne'er so hard?
If petulant remonstrance made appeal,
Unreasonable, o'erprowtracted,—if Importunate challenge taxed the public ear
When silence more decorously had served
For protestation,—if Pompilian plaint
Wrought but to aggravate Guidonion ire,—
Why, such mishaps, ungainly though they be,
Ever companion change, are incident
To altered modes and novelty of life:
The philosophic mind expects no less,
Smilingly knows and names the crisis, sits
Waiting till old things go and new arrive.
Therefore, I hold a husband but inept
Who turns impatient at such transit-time,
As if this running from the rod would last!

Since, even while I speak, the end is reached:
Success awaits the soon-disheartened man.
The parents turn their backs and leave the
house,
The wife may wait but none shall intervene:
He hath attained his object, groom and bride
Partake the nuptial bower no soul can see,
Old things are passed and all again is new.
Over and gone the obstacles to peace,
Nor — tenderly the Mantuan turns
The expression, somuch purposed in his eye —
Nascitur ordo! Every storm is laid,
And from plain each pleasant herb may peep.
Each bloom of wifelhod in abeyance late:
(Confer a passage in the Cantiycles.)

But what if, as 'tis wont with plant and wife,
Flowers — after a suppression to good end.
Still, when they do spring forth — sprout here,
Spread there,
Anywhere likelier than beneath the foot
O' the lawful good-man gardener of the ground?
He dug and dilled, sowed and watered, — still
'Tis a chance wayfarer shall pluck the increase.
Just so, respecting persons not too much,
The lady, foes allege, put forth each charm
And proper floweret of femininity
To whosoever had a nose to smell
Or breath to deck: what if the charge be true?
The faunt were graver had she looked with choice,
Fastidiously appointed who should grasp,
Who, in the whole town, go without the prize?
To nobody she destined donative,
But, forth some was first served, the accuser saith.

Put case her sort of . . . in this kind . . . escapes
Were many and oft and indiscriminate—
Impute ye as the action were prepense.
The gift particular, arguing malice so?
Which butterfly of the wide air shall brag
"I was preferred to Guido" — when 'tis clear
The cup, he quaffs at, lay with olent breast.
Open to gnat, midge, bee and moth as well?
Our queenless, she that enthrone,
And if its peevish lord object the more,
Mistake, mismaine such bounty in a wife,
Haste we to advertise him — charm of cheek,
Lustre of eye, allowance of the lip,
All womanly components in a spouse,
These are no household-bread each stranger's bite
Leaves by so much diminished for the mouth
O' the master of the house at supper-time:
But rather like a lump of spice they lie,
Morsel of myrrh, which scents the neighborhood
Yet greets it's lord no lighter by a grain.

Nay, even so, he shall be satisfied!
Concede we there was reason in his wrong,
Grant we his grievance and content the man!
For lo, Pompeia, she submits herself;
Ere three revolving years have crowned their course,
Off and away she puts this same reproach
Of lavish bounty, inconsiderate gift
O' the sweets of wifelhood stored to other ends;
No longer shall he blame "She none excludes;" But substitute "She laudably sees all,
Searches the best out and selects the same."

For who is here, long sought and latest found,
Waiting his turn unmoved amid the thriri,
"Constans in lectate." — Ha, my lords?
Calm in his levity, — indulge the quip —
Since 'tis a levite bears the bell away,
Parades him henceforth as Pompeia's choice.
'Tis no ignoble object, husband! Doubt'st?
When here comes tripping Flaccus with his phrase,
"Trust me, no miscreant singled from the mob,
Crede non illum tibi de seclusa
Plebe detectum," but a man of mark,
A priest, dost hear? Why then, submit thyself!

Priest, ay, and very phonix of such fowl,
Well-born, of culture, young and vigorous,
Comely too, since precise the precept points —
On the selected levite be there found
Nur mole nor scar nor blemish, lest the mind
Come all unscandied through the thwarting flesh!
Was not the son of Jesse ruddy, sleek,
Pleasant to look on, pleasant every way?
Since well he smote the harp and sweetly sang,
And danced till Abigail came out to see,
And seeing smiled and smiling ministered
The raisin-cluster and the riddle of figs.
With ready meal refreshed the gifted youth,
Till Nabai, who was absent shearing sheep,
Felt heart sink, took to bed (discretely done —
They might have been beforehand with him else)
And died — would Guido have behaved as well?
But ah, the faith of early days is gone,
Neu prisco fides! Nothing died in him
Save courtesy, good sense and proper trust,
Which, when they ebb from souls they should o'erflow,
Discover stub, weed, sludge and ugliness.
(The Pope, we know, is Neapolitan
And relishes a sea-side simile.)
Deserted by each charitable wave,
Guido, left high and dry, shows jealous now!
Jealous avouch'd, paraded: tax the fool
With any pessinello, he entreats:
"Truly I beat my wife through jealousy,
Imprisoned her and punished otherwise,
Being jealous: now would threaten, sword in hand,
Now manage to mix poison in her sight,
And so forth: jealously I deck, in fine."
Concede thus much, and what remains to prove?
Have I to teach my masters what effect
Hath jealousy, and how, befouling men,
It makes false true, abuses eye and ear.
Turns more mist adamanite, loads with sound
Silence, and into void and vacancy
Crowds a whole phalanx of conspiring foes?
Therefore who owns "I watched with jealousy
My wife," adds "for no reason in the world!"
What need that, thus proved madman, he remarks
"The thing I thought a serpent proved an eel?"

Perchance the right Comacchian, six foot length,
And not an inch too long for that rare pie
(Master Arcenlle: has heard of such)
Whose succulence makes fasting bearable;
Meant to regale some somoe splenetic
THE RING AND THE BOOK

Who, pleasing to mistake the donor's gift,
Saying I know not what Lernese snake
'If' the luscious Lenten creature, stamps forsooth
The dainty in the dust.

Enough! Prepare,
Such lunes announced, for downright lunacy!
Insani homo, threat succeeds to threat,
And blow redoubles, blow—his wife, the blase.

But, if a block, shall not she jar the hand
That buffets her? The injurious idle stone
Rebounds and hits the head of him who flung.
Causeless rage breeds, 'tis the wife now, rageful cause.

Tyranny wakes rebellion from its sleep.
Rebellion, say I?—rather, self-defence,
Laudable wish to live and see good days,
Pricks our Pompilia now to fly the fool
By any means, at any price—nay, more,
Nay, most of all, 'tis the very interest
Of the foe that baffled of his blind desire
At any price, were truest victor so.

Shall he effect his crime and lose his soul?
No, dictates duty to a loving wife!
Far better that the uncomsummate blow,
Adroitly balked by her, should back again,
Correctively admonish his own fate!

Crime then,—the Court is with me?—she must crush;
How crush it? By all efficacious means;
And these?—why, what in woman should they be?

"With horns the bull, with teeth the lion fights.
To woman," quoth the lyrist quoted late,
"Nor teeth, nor horns, but beauty, Nature gave!"

Pretty? the Pagan! Who dares blame the use
Of armory thus allowed for natural—
Exclaim against a seeming-dubious play
O' the sole permitted weapon, spear and shield
Alike, resorted to 'tis the circumstance
By poor Pompilia? Grant she somewhat plied
Arts that allure, the magic nod and wink,
The witchery of gesture, spell of word,
Whereby the likelier to enlist this friend,
Yea stranger, as a champion on her side?
Such man, being but mere man, ('tis all she knew.)

Must be made sure by beauty's silken bond,
The weakness that subdued the strong, and bow'd
Wisdom alike and folly. Grant the tale
O' the husband, which is false, were proved and true
To the letter—or the letters, I should say,
Abominations he professed to find
And fix upon Pompilia and the priest,—
Allow them here—for though she could not write:

In early days of Eve-like innocence
That plucked no apple from the knowledge-tree,
Yet, at the Serpent's word, Eve plucks and eats
And knows—especially how to read and write:

And so Pompilia,—as the move o' the maw,
Quoth Persius, makes a parrot bid "God day!"
A crow salutes the concave, and a pie
Endeavor at proficiency in speech,—
So she, through hunger after fellowship,
May well have learned, though late, to play the scribe:
As indeed, there's one letter on the list
Explicitly declares did happen here.
"You thought my letters could be none of skill:
She tells her parents—"mine, who wasted skill:
But now I have the skill, and write, you see!"
She needed write love-letters, so she learned.
"Necos artifex sequi voces"—though this
This letter nowise 'scopes the common lot,
But lies I the condemnation of the rest,
Found by the husband's self who forged them all.

Yet, for the sacredness of argument,
For that, or any exemption shall it plead—
Anything, anything to let the wheels
Of argument run glibly to their goal!
Concede she wrote (which were preposterous
This and the other epistle,—what of it?
Where does the figment touch her candid fame?
Being in peril of her life—"my life,
Not an hour's purchase," as the letter runs,—
And having but one stay in this extreme,
Out of the wide world but a single friend—
What could she other than resort to him,
And bow to, with any hope resort but thine?
Shall modesty dare bid a stranger brave
Danger, disgrace, nay death in her behalf—
Think to entice the sternness of the steel
Yet spare love's loadstone moving nay more since:

—Most of all, when such mind is hampered so
By growth of circumstance a-athwart the life
O' the natural man, that decency forbids
He stoop and take the common privilege.
Say frank "I love," as all the vulgar do.
A man is wedded to philosophy,
Married to statesmanship; a man is old;
A man is fettered by the foolishness
He took for wisdom and talked ten years since:
A man is, like our friend the Canon here,
A priest, and wicked if he break his vow:
Shall he dare love, who may be Pope one day?
Despite the coil of such encumbrance here,
Suppose this man could love, unhappily,
And would love, dared he only let love show!
In case the woman of his love speaks first,
From what embarrassment she sets him free!
"Tis I who break reserve, begin appeal,
Confess that, whether you love me or no,
I love you!" What an ease to dignity,
What help of pride from the hard high-backed chair?

Down to the carpet where the kittens bask,
All under the pretense of gratitude!

From all which, I deduce—the lady here
Was bound to proffer nothing short of love
To the priest whose service was to save her.
What?
Shall she propose him lucet, dust o' the mine,
Rubbish o' the rock, some diamond, muck-worms prize,
Some pearl secreted by a sickly fish?
Scarcely! She eaters for a generous taste.
"T is love shall beckon, beauty bid to breast.
Till all the Samson sink into the snare!
Because, permit the end — permit therewith
Means to the end!

How say you, good my lords?
I hope you heard my adversary ring
The changes on this precept: now, let me
Reverse the peal! Quia dato licito fine,
Ad illum assequendum ordinata
Non sunt dammanda media, — licit end
Enough was found in mere escape from death,
To legalize our means illicit else
Of feigned love, false allurement, fancied fact.
Thus Venus losing Cupid on a day,
(See that Idyllium Moschi) seeking help,
In the anxiety of motherhood,
Allowably promised, "Who shall bring report
Where he is wander'd to, my winged babe,
I give him for reward a nectar'd kiss;
But who brings safely back the truant's self,
His be a super-sweet makes kiss seem cold!"
Are not these things writ for example-sake?

To such permitted motive, then, refer
All those professions, else were hard explain,
Of hope, fear, jealousy, and the rest of love!
He is Myrtillus, Amaryllis she,
She burns, he freezes, — all a mere device
To catch and keep the man, may save her life,
Whom otherwise nor catches she nor keeps!
Worst, once, turns best now: in all faith, she feigns:
Fearing,—the liker innocence to guilt,
The truer to the life in what she feigns!
How if Ulysses,—when, for public good
He sunk particular qualms and played the spy,
Entered Troy's hostile gate in beggar's garb—
How if he first had boggled at this clout, Grown dainty o'er that clack-dish? Grime is
To whose propes amid the dung for gold.

Hence, beyond promises, we praise each proof
That promise was not simply made to break,
Mere moonshine-structure meant to fade at dawn:
We praise, as consequent and requisite,
What, enemies allege, were more than words,
Deeds—meetings at the window, twilight,
Nocturnal entertainments in the dim
Old labyrinthine palace: lies, we know —
Inventions we, longsince, turned inside out.
Must such external semblance of intrigue
Demonstrate that intrigue there lurks perdue?
Does every moist-sheath disclose a nut?
He were a Molinist who dared maintain
That midnight meetings in a screened alcove
Must argue folly in a matron — since
So would he bring a slurr on Judith's self,
Commended beyond women, that she lured
The lustful to destruction through his lust.
Pompilia took not Judith's liberty,
No falchion find you in her hand to smite,
No damsel to convey in dish the head
Of Holofernes, — style the Canon so —
Or is it the Canon itself? If I entangle me
With my similitudes, — it wax wings melt,
And earthward down I drop, not mine the fault:
Blame your beneficence, O Court, O sun,
Whereof the beamy smile affects my flight!
What matter, so Pompilia's fame revive
I' the warmth that proves the bane of Icarnis?

Yea, we have shown it lawful, necessary
Pompilia leave her husband, seek the house
O' the parents: and because 'twixt home and Lies a long road with many a danger rife,
Lions by the way and serpents in the path,
To rob and ravish,—much behooves she keep
Each shadow of suspicion from fair fame,
For her own sake much, but for his sake more,
The ingratitude husband's. Evidence shall be,
Plain witness to the world how white she walks
I' the mire she wanders through ere Rome she reach.

And who so proper witness as a priest?
Gainsey ye? Let me hear who dares gainsay!
I hope we still can punish cursious!
"Give me the man," I say with him of Gath,
"That we may fight together!" None, I think:
The priest is granted me.

Then, if a priest,
One juvenile and potent: else, mayhap,
That dragon, our Saint George would slay, slays
him.
And should fair face accompany strong hand,
The more complete equipment: nothing mars
Work, else praiseworthy, like a bodily flaw
I' the worker: as 'tis said Saint Paul himself
Deplored the check o' the puny presence, still Cheating his fulmination of its flash,
Albeit, the bolt therein went true to oak,
Therefore the agent, as prescribed, she takes,
Both juvenile and potent, handsome too, —
In all obedience: "good," you grant again.
Do you? I would you were the husband, lords!
How prompt and facile might departure be!
How boldly would Pompilia and the priest
March out of door, spread flag at head of drum,
But that inapproachable Guido grants
Neither premis nor yet conclusion here,
And, purblind, dreads a bear in every bush!
For his own quietude and comfort, then,
Mans must be found for fight in masquerade
At hour when all things sleep — "Save jealousy!"

Right, Judges! Therefore shall the lady's wit Supply the boon thwart nature balks him of,
And do him service with the potent drug
(Helen's nepenthe, as my lords opine)
Which respires blessedly each fretted nerve
O' the much-enduring man: accordingly,
There lies he, duly dosed and sound asleep,
Relieved of woes or real or raved about.
While soft she leaves his side, he shall not wake;
Nor stop who steals away to join her friend,
Nor do mischief should he catch that friend
Intent on more than friendly office, — nay,
Nor get himself raw head and bones laid bare
In payment of his apparition!

Thus

Would I defend the step, — were the thing true
Which is a fable, — see my former speech,
That Guido slept (who never slept a wink)
Through treachery, an opiate from his wife,
Who not so much as knew what opiate meant.

Now she may start: or hist, — a stoppage still!
A journey is an enterprise of cost!
As in campaigns, we fight but others pay,
Suis expensis, nemo militat.
"Tis Guido's self we guard from accident,
Ensuring safety to Pomphilia, versed
Nowise in misadventures by the way,
Hard riding and rough quarters, the rude fare,
The unready host. What magic mitigates
Each plague of travel to the unpractised wife?
Money, sweet Sirs! And were the fiction fact
She helped herself thereto with liberal hand
From out her husband's store, — what fitter use
Was ever husband's money destined to?
With bag and baggage thus did Dido once
Decamp, — for more authority, a queen!

So is she fairly on her route at last,
Prepared for either fortune: nay and if
The priest, now all aglow with enterprise,
Cool somewhat presently when fades the flush
O' the first adventure, clouded o'er belike
By doubts, misgivings how the day may die,
Though born with such auroral brilliance, — if
The brow seem over-pensive and the lip
'Gain lag and lose the prattle lightsome late,
Vanquished by toil of a prolonged jaunt
In a close carriage o'er a jolting road,
With only one young female substitute
For seventeen other Canones of ripe age
Were wont to keep him company in church,
Shall not Pomphilia haste to dissipate
The silent cloud that, gathering, bodes her bale?

Prop the irresolutions may portend
Suspension of the project, check the flight,
Bring ruin on them both? Use every means,
Since means to the end are lawful! What i' the way
Of wiles should have allowance like a kiss
Sagely and sisterly administered,
Sororia saltem oscula? We find
Such was the remedy her wit applied
To such incipient scruple of the priest,
If we believe, — as, while my wit is mine
I cannot, — what the driver testifies,
Borsi, called Venerino, the mere tool
Of Guido and his friend the Governor,
Avoval I proved wrung from out the wretch.

After long rotting in imprisonment,
As price of liberty and favor: long
They tempted, he at last succumbed, and lo
Counted them out full tale each kiss and more.
"The journey being one long embrace," quoth he.

Still, though we should believe the driver's lie,
Nor even admit as probable excuse,
Right reading of the riddle, — as I urged
In my first argument, with fruit perhaps—
That what the owl-like eyes (at back of head!)
O' the driver, drowsed by driving night and day,
Supposed a vulgar interchange of lips,
This was but innocent joy of head 'gainst head.
Cheek meeting jowl as apple may touch pear
From branch and branch contiguous in the tree.

When Autumn blusters and the orchard rocks:
That rapid run and the rough road were case
O' the casual ambiguity, no harm
I' the world to eyes awake and penetrative: — Say, — not to grasp a truth I can release
And safely fight without, yet conquer still,
Say, she kissed him, say, he kissed her again!
Such subsolation was a potent means,
A very efficacious help, no doubt:
Such with a third part of her nectar did
Venus imbue: why should Pomphilia fling
The poet's declaration in his teeth? —
Pause to employ what — since it had success,
And kept the priest her servant to the end —
We must presume of energy enough,
No whit superfluous, so permissible?

The goal is gained: day, night, and yet a day
Have run their round: a long and devious road
Is traversed, — many manners, various men
Passed in review, what cities did they see,
What hamlets mark, what profitable food
For after-meditation call and store!
Till Rome, that Rome whereof — this voice
Would it might make our Molinists observe,
That she is built upon a rock nor shall
Their powers prevail against her! — Rome, I say,
Is all but reached; one stage more and they stop
Saved: pluck up heart, ye pair, and forward, then!

Ah, Nature — baffled she recurs, alas!
Nature imperiously exacts her due,
Spirit is willing but the flesh is weak:
Pomphilia needs must acquiesce and swoon.
Give hopes alike and fears a breathing-while.
The innocent sleep soundly: sound she sleeps.
So let her slumber, then, unguarded save
By her own chastity, a triple mail,
And his good hand whose stalwart arms have borne
The sweetest senseless burden like a babe
From couch to couch, — the serviceable strength!

Nay, what and if he gazed rewardingly
On the pale beauty imprisoned in embrace,
Stoop'd over, stole a balmy breath perhaps
For more assurance sleep was not decease—
"Ut vidi," "how I saw!" succeeded by
"Ut perii," "how I sudden lost my brains!"
—What harm ensued to her unconscious quite?
For, curiosity — how natural!
Impertinence — what a privilege
In the ardent sex! And why curb ardor here?
How can the priest but pity whom he saved?
And pity is so near to love, and love
So neighborly to all unreasonableness!
As to love's object, whether love were sage
Or foolish, could Pompeii know or care,
Being still sound asleep, as I presumed?
Thus the philosopher absorbed by thought,
Even Archimedes, busy o'er a book
The while besiegers sacked his Syracuse,
Was ignorant of the imminence o' the point
O' the sword till it surprised him: let it stab,
And never knew himself was dead at all.
So sleep thou on, secure what'ser betides!
For thou, too, hast thy problem hard to solve—
How so much beauty is compatible
With so much innocence!

Fit place, methinks,
While in this task she resily is lost,
To treat of and repel objection here
Which, — frivolous, I grant, — my mind misguides.
May somehow still have flitted, gaudily-like,
And teased the Court at times — as if, all said
And done, there seemed, the Court might nearly say,
In a certain acceptation, somewhat more
Of what may pass for insincerity,
Falsehoods, throughout the course Pompeii took,
Than befits Christian. Pagans held, we know,
Man always ought to aim at good and truth,
Not always put one thing in the same words:
Non idem semper dicere sed spectare
Debemus. But the Pagans yoke was light;
"Lie not at all," the exacter precept bids:
Each least lie breaks the law, — is sin, we hold.

I humble me, but venture to submit —
What prevents sin, itself is sinless, sure:
And sin, which hinders sin of deeper dye,
Softens itself away by contrast so.
Now, what is greatest sin of womanhood?
That which unmanners it, abolishes
The nature of the woman, — impudence.
Who contradicts me here? Concede me, then,
Whatever friendly fault may interpose.
To save the sex from self-abolishment
In three-pants on the way to Virtue's rank!
And, what is taxed here as duplicity?
Peint, wile, and trick, — admitted for the nonce.

What worse do one and all than interpose,
Hold, as it were, a depressing hand,
Stain meekness, in the Medicean mode,
Before some shame which modesty would veil?
Who blames the gesture prettily perverse?
Thus, — lest ye miss a point illustrative, —
Admit the husband's calumny — allow
That the wife, having penned the epistle fraught
With horrors, charge on charge of crime she heaped O' the head of Pietro and Violante — (still Presumed her parents) — having dispatched the same
To their arch-enemy Paolo, through free choice
And no sort of compulsion in the world —
Put case she next discards simplicity
For craft, denies the voluntary act,
Declares herself a passive instrument
I' the husband's hands; that, duped by knavery,
She traced the characters she could not write,
And took on trust the unread sense which, read,
And recognized were to be spurned at once:
Allow this calumny, I reiterate!
Who is so dull an wonder at the pose
Of our Pompeii in the circumstance?
Who sees not that the too-ingenuous soul,
Repugnant even at a duty done
Which brought beneath too scrutinising glare
The misdemeanors — buried in the dark —
Of the authors of her being, was believed,
Stung to the quick at her impulsive deed,
And willing to repair what harm it worked,
She — wise in this beyond what Nero proved,
Who, when folk urged the candid juvenile
To sign the warrant, doom the guilty dead,
"Would I had never learned to write!" quoit he!
—Pompeii rose above the Roman, cried,
"To read or write I never learned at all!"
O splendidly mendacious!

But time fleets:
Let us not linger: hurry to the end,
Since flight does end, and that disastrously.
Beware ye blame desert for unsuccess,
Disparage each expedient else to praise,
Call failure folly! Man's best effort fails.
After ten years' resistance Troy succumbed:
Could valor save a town, Troy still had stood.
Pompeii came off halting in no point
Of courage, conduct, her long journey through:
But nature sank exhausted at the close —
And, as I said, she swooned and slept all night.
Morn breaks and brings the husband: we assist
At the spectacle. Discovery succeeds.
Ha, how is this? What moonstruck rage is here?
Though we confess to partial frailty now,
To error in a woman and a wife,
Is 't by the rough way she shall be reclaimed?
Who bursts upon her chambered privacy?
What crowd profanes the chaste cubiculum?
What outeries and lewd laughter, scurril gibe
And ribald jest to scare the ministrant.
Good angels that commerce with souls in sleep?
Why, had the worst crowned Guido to his wish
Confirmed his most irrational surmise,
Yet there be bounds to man's emotion, checks
To an immoderate astonishment.
"'Tis decent horror, regulated wrath,
Befit our dispensation: have we back
THE RING AND THE BOOK

The old Pagan license? Shall a Vulcan clap
His net o' the sudden and expose the pair
To the unenchanted universal mirth?
A feat, antiquity saw scandal in
So clearly, that the nameless tale thereof —
Demodocus his lugubrious song —
Hath ever been concluded modern stuff
Impossible to the mouth of the grave Muse,
So, foisted into that Eighth Odyssey
By some impertinent pickthanked. O thou fool,
Count Guido Franceschini, what didst gain
By publishing thy secret to the world?
Were all the precepts of the wise a waste —
Bred in thee not one touch of reverence?
Admit thy wife — admonish we the fool —
Were falseness self, why chronicles thy shame?
Much rather should thy teeth bite out thy tongue,
Dumb lip consort with desecrated brow,
Silence becomes historiographer,
And shoo! thine own Cornelius Tacitus!
But virtue, barred, still leaps the barrier, lords!
—Still, moon-like, penetrates the encroaching mist
And bursts, all broad and bare, on night, ye know?

Surprize then, in the garb of truth, perhaps,
Pompilia, thus opposed, breaks obstacle,
Springs to her feet, and stands Thalassian-pure,
Confronts the foe, — nay, catches at his sword
And tries to kill the intruder, he complains.
Why, so she gave her lord his lesson back,
Crowded him, this time, the virtuous woman's way,
With an exact obedience; he brought sword,
She drew the same, since swords are meant to draw.

Tell not me 'tis sharp play with tools on edge!
It was the husband chose the weapon here
Why did not he inaugurate the game
With some gentility of apophthegm,
Still pregnant on the philosophic page,
Some captivating cadence still a-lisp
O' the poet's lyre? Such spells subdue the surge,
Make tame the tempest, much more mitigate
The passions of the mind, and probably
Had moved Pompilia to a smiling blush.
No, he must needs prefer the argument
Of the blow; and she obeyed, in duty bound,
Returned him buffet retaliative —
Ay, in the reasoner's own interest,
For wife must follow whither husband lead,
Vindicate honor as himself prescribes,
Save him the very way himself bids save!
No question but who jumps into a quag
Should stretch forth hand and pray us "Full me out
By the hand!" such were the customary cry:
But Guido pleased to bid to: "Leave hand alone!
Join both feet, rather, jump upon my head:
I extricate myself by the rebound!"
And dutifully as enjoined she jumped —
Drew his own sword and menaced his own life,
Anything to content a wilful spouse.

Strange as it seem: at flourish of the blade,
The crowd drew back, stood breathless as abashed,
Then murmured, "This should be no waste wife,
No conscience-stricken sinner, caught i' the act,
And patiently awaiting our first stone:
But a poor hard-pressed all-bewildered thing,
Has rushed so far, misguided perhaps,
Meaning no more harm than a frightened sheep.
She sought for aid; and if she made mistake
I the man could aid most, why — so mortals do:
Even the blessed Magdalen mistook
Far less forgiving; consult the place —
Supposing him to be the gardener,
'Sir,' said she, and so following." Why more words?

With the wife is pronounced innocent:
What would the husband more than gain in cause,
And find that honor flash in the world's eye.
His apprehension was lost soil had smirched?

So, happily the adventure comes to close.
Wherein my fat opponent ground his charge
Preposterous: at mid-day he groans "How dark!"

Listen to me, thou Archangelic swine!
Where is the ambiguity to blame.
The flaw to find in our Pompilia? Safe
She said it, see! Does thy comment follow quick,
"Safe, inasmuch as at the end proposed;
But thither she picked way by devious path—
Stands dirtied, no dubiety at all!
I recognize success, yet, all the same,
Importunately will suggestion prompt —
Better Pompilia gained the right to boast,
'No devious path, no doubtful patch was miss.
I saved my head nor sacrificed my foot!'
Why, being in a peril, shew mistrust
Of the angels set to guard the innocent?
Why rather hold by obvious vulgar help
Of stratagem and subterfuge, excused
Somewhat, but still no less a foil, a fault.
Since low with high, and good with bad is linked?

Methinks I view some ancient bas-relief,
There stands Hesione thrust out by Troy,
Her father's hand has chained her to a crag,
Her mother's from the virgin plucked the vest.
At a safe distance both distressful watch,
While near and nearer comes the smothing sea.
I look that, white and perfect to the end,
She wait till Jove dispatch some demigod;
Not that,—impatient of celestial club
Alcmene's son should brandish at the beast.
She daub, disguise her dainty limbs with pitch.
And so she slises the purblind monster! Ay,
The trick succeeds, but 'tis an ugly trick,
Where needs have been no trick?"
The heavens were bound with brass,—Jove far at feast
(No feast like that thou didst not ask me to, Arescolli,—I heard of thy request.)
With the unblamed Ethiop,—Hercules spun wool
I' the lap of Omphale, while Virtue shrieked—
The brute came padding all the faster. You
Of Troy, who stood at distance, where's the aid
You offered in the extremity? Most and least,
Gentle and simple, here the Governor,
There the Archbishop, everywhere the friends,
Shook heads and waited for a miracle,
Or went their way, left Virtue to her fate.
Just this one rough and ready man forth!—
Was found, sole anti-Fabius (dare I say)
Who restored things, with no delay at all,
Qui guidum cantando rem restituit! He,
He only, Caponsacchi 'mid a crowd,
Caught Virtue up, carried Pomponia off
Through smarting impotence of sympathy
In ranged Aresco: what you take for pitch
Is nothing worse, belike, than black and blue,
Mere evanescent proof that hardy hands
Did yeoman's service, cared not where the gripe
Was more than duly energetic: bruised,
She smarted a little, but her bones are saved
A fracture, and her skin will soon show sleek.
How it disgusts when weakness, false-refined,
Censurest the honest rude effectue strength,—
When sickly dreamers of the impossible
Decry plain steadiness which does the feat
With eyes wide open!

Did occasion serve,
I could illustrate, if my lords allow;
Ouid estat, what forbids I aptly ask
With Horace, that I give my anger vent,
While I let breathe, no less, and recreate,
The gravity of my Judges, by a tale?
A case in point,—what though an apologue
Grace'd by tradition?—possibly a fact:
Tradition must precede all scripture, words
Serving as our warrant ere our cause can be:
So, to tradition back we needs must go
For any fact's authority: and this
Hath lived so far (like jewel hid in muck)
On page of that old lying vanity
Called “Sepher Toldoth Yecheu:” God be praised,
I read no Hebrew,—take the thing on trust:
But I believe the writer meant no good
(Blind as he was to truth in some respects)
To our pestiferous and schismatic... well,
My lords' conjecture be the touchstone, show
The thing for what it is: the author lacks
Discretion, and his zeal exceeds: but zeal,—
How rare in our degenerate day! Enough!
Here is the story: fear not, I shall shop
And change a little, else my Jew would press
All too unmannerly before the Court.

It happened once,—begins this foolish Jew,
Pretending to write Christian history,—
That three, held greatest, best and worst of men,
Peter and John and Judas, spent a day
In toil and travel through the country-side
On some sufficient business—I suspect,
Suppression of some Molinism 't he bud.
Foot-sole and hungry, dropping with fatigue,
They reached by nightfall a poor lonely grange,
Hostel or inn: so, knocked and entered there.
"Your pleasure, great ones?" "Shelter, rest and food!"
For shelter, there was one bare room above;
For rest therein, three beds of bundled straw:
For food, one wretched starveling fowl, no more—
Meat for one mouth, but mockery for three.
"You have my utmost." How should supper serve?
Peter broke silence: "To the spit with fowl!
And while 'tis cooking, sleep—since beds there be,
And, so far, satisfaction of a want.
Sleep we an hour, awake at supper-time,
Then each of us narrate the dream he had,
And he whose dream shall prove the happiest,
point.
The clearliest out the dreamer as ordained
Beyond his fellows to receive the fowl,
Him let our shares be cheerful tribute to,
His the entire meal, may it do him good!"
Who could dispute so plain a consequence?
So said, so done: each hurried to his straw,
Slept his hour's sleep and dreamed his dream,
and waked.
"I," commenced John, "dreamed that I gained the prize
We all aspire to: the proud place was mine,
Throughout the earth and to the end of time
I was the Loved Disciple: mine the meal!"
"But I," proceeded Peter, "dreamed, a word
Gave me the headship of our company,
Made me the Vicar and Vice-governor, gave
The keys of heaven and hell into my hand,
And o'er the earth, dominion: mine the meal!"
"While I," submitted in soft under-tone
The Iascariot—sense of his unworthiness
Turning each eye up to the immost white—
With long-drawn sigh, yet letting both lips smack.
"I have had just the pitifullest dream
That ever proved man meanest of his mates,
And born foot-washer and foot-wiper, nay
Foot-kisser to each comrade of you all!
I dreamed I dreamed; and in that mimic dream
(Impalpable to dream as dream is fact)
Methought I meanly chose to sleep no wink
But wait until I heard my brethren snore;
Then stole from couch, alighted noiseless o'er
The planks,
Slid downstairs, furtively approached the hearth,
Found the fowl duly brown, both back and breast,
Hissing in harmony with the cricket's chirp,
Grilled to a point; said no grace, but fell to,
Nor finished till the skeleton lay bare.
In penitence for which ignoble dream,
Lo, I renounce my portion cheerfully!
Fie on the flesh—be mine the ethereal gust,
And yours the sublunary sustenance!
See that whate'er be left ye give the poor!"
Down the two scuttled, one on other's heel,
Stung by a fell surprize; and found, alack,
A goodly savor, both the drumstick bones,
And that which henceforth took the appropriate name
O' the Merry-thought, in memory of the fact
That to keep wide awake is man's best dream.

So, — as was said once of Thucydides
And his sole joke, "The lion, lo, hath laughed!" —
Just so, the Governor and all that's great
I' the city never meant that Innocence
Should quite starve while Authority sat
at meat;
They meant to sing a song at banquet's end:
Wished well to our Pompilia — in their dreams,
Nor bore the secular sword in vain — asleep.
Just so the Archbishop and all good like him
Went to bed meaning to pour oil and wine
I' the wounds of her, next day, — but long ere
day,
They had burned the one and drunk the other,
while
Just so again, contrariwise, the priest
Sustained poor Nature in extremity
By stuffing barley-bread into her mouth,
Saving Pompilia (grant the parallel)
By the plain homely and straightforward way
Taught him by common sense. Let others

"Oh what refined expedients did we dream Proved us the only fit to help the fair!"
He cried, "A carriage waits, jump in with
me!"

And now, this application pardoned, lords, —
This recreative pause and breathing-while, —
Back to beecomingness and gravity!
For Law steps in: Guido appeals to Law,
Demands she arbitrate, — does well for once.
O Law, of thee how neatly was it said
By a triad'spokesman, thou hast thy seat
I' the very breast of Jove, no measurer throned!
Here is a piece of work now, hitherto Begun and carried on, concluded near,
Without an eye-glance cast thy sceptre's way;
And, lo, the stumbling and discomfiture!
Well may you call them "lawless" means,
mans take
To extricate themselves through mother-wit
When tangled haply in the toils of life!
Guido would try conclusions with his foe,
Who'er the foe was and whate'er the offence;
He would recover certain dowry-dues:
Instead of asking Law to lend a hand,
What pother of sword drawn and pistol cocked
What peddling with forged letters and paid spies,
Politic circumvention! — all to end
As it began — by loss of the fool's head,
First in a figure, presently in a fact.
It is a lesson to mankind at large.
How other were the end, would men be sage
And bear overflowing each quarrel straight,
O Law, to thy recipient mother-knees!
How would the children light come and prompt us
This, with a red-cheeked apple for reward,
The other, peradventure red-cheeked too
I' the rear, by taste of birch for punishment.
No foolish brawling murder any more!
Peace for the household, practice for the pen.
And plenty for the exchequer of my lords!
Too much to hope, in this world: in the next
Who knows? Since, why should sit the Turk enthroned
To judge the tribes, unless the tribes be judged?
And 'tis impossible but offences come:
So, all 's one lawsuit, all one long leat-day!

For give me this digression — that I stand
Entranced awhile at Law's first beam, outstretched
O' the business, when the Count's good sequel bade
"Put up thy sword, born enemy to the ear.
And let Law listen to thy difference!"
And Law does listen and compose the strife.
Settle the suit, how wisely and how well!
On our Pompilia, faultless to a fault,
Law bends a brow maternally severe,
Implies the worth of perfect chastity,
By fancying the flaw she cannot find.
Superficial sifting snow, nor alpin nor hars:
'T is safe to censure levity in youth,
Tax womanhood with indiscretion, sure!
Since, boys, permissible to-day, become Pollies to-morrow: prattle stocks in church.
And that curt skirt which lets a maiden slip.
The matron changes for a trailing robe.
Mothers may aim a blow with half-shut eyes
Nodding above their spindles by the fire,
And chance to hit some hidden fault, else sit.
Just so, Law hazarded a punishment —
If applicable to the circumstance,
Why, well! if not so opposite, well too.
"Quit the gay range o' the world," I hear he cry,
"Enter, in lieu, the penitential pound:
Exchange the gauds of pomp for ashes last!
Leave such non-luxurious hearth of luxury!
The golden-garnished silken-conched abode.
The many-columned terrace that so tempes
Feminine soul put foot forth, extend ear
To fluttering joy of lover's serenade,
Leave those for cellular seclusion! mask
And dance no more, but fast and pray:
avault —
Be burned, thy wicked townsman's somber book!
Welcome, mild hymnal by... some better scribe!
For, for the warm arms were wont enfold thy feel,
Let wire-shirt plough and whipcord discipline!
"If such an exhortation proved, perseverance.
Inapplicable, words bestowed in waste,
What harm, since Law has store, can speed or miss?"

And so, our paragon submits herself,
Goes at command into the holy house.
And, also and command, comes out again:
For, could the effect of such obedience prove Too certain, too immediate? Being healed.
Go blaze abroad the matter, blessed one!
Art thou sound forthwith? Speedily rise!
The step by pool-side, leave Bethsaida free
To patients plentifully posted round,
Since the whole need not the physician! Brief,
She may betake her to her parents' place.
Welcome her, father, with wide arms once more;
Motion her, mother, to thy breast again!
For why? Since Law relinquishes the charge,
Grants to your dwelling-place a prison's style.
Rejoice you with Pomptilla! golden days,
Redeunt Saturnia regna. Six weeks slip,
And she is domiciled in house and home
As though she thence had never budged at all.
And thither let the husband — joyous, ay,
But contrive so — quick betake himself,
Proud that his dove which lay among the pots
Hath mused those dingy feathers, — moulded now,
Shows silver bosom clothed with yellow gold!
So shall he tempt her to the perch she fled,
Bids to domestic bliss the truant back.
But let him not delay! Time fleets how fast,
And opportunity, the irrevocable,
Once flown will flout him! Is the furrow turned?
If field with corn ye fail preoccupy,
Darnel for wheat and thistle-heards for grain,
Infelix lorium, carduos horridus,
Will grow apace in combination prompt,
Defraud the husbandman of his desire.
Almost — but — what munus's monach now
The laggard? — doubtfull, nay, fantastic fruit
Of such an apparition, such return
Interdum, to anticipate the spouse,
Of Capronacchi's very self! 'T is said,
When nights are lone and company is rare,
His visitations brighten winter up.
If so they did — which nowise I believe—
(How can I? — proof abounding that the priest, Once fairly at his relegation-place, Never once left it), still, admit he stole
A midnight march, would fain see friend again,
Find matter for instruction in the past,
Renew the old adventure in such chat
As cheers a fireside! He was lonely too,
He, too, must need his recreative hour.
Shall it amaze the philosophic mind
If he, long wont the emperured cup to quaff,
Have feminine society at will,
Being debared abruptly from all drink
Save at the spring which Adam used for wine,
Dreads harm to just the health he hoped to guard.
And, trying abstinence, gains malady?
Ask Tozzi, now physician to the Pope!
"Little by little break" — (I hear he bids
Master Arcangeli my antagonist,
Who loves good cheer, and may indulge too much:
So I explain the logic of the plea
Wherewith he opened our proceedings late) —
"Little by little break a habit, Don,
Become necessity to feele flesh!"
And thus, nocturnal taste of intercourse
(Which never happened, — but, suppose it did)
May have been used to dishabituate
By sip and sip this drainer to the dregs
O' the draught of conversation, — heady stuff,
Brewage which, broached, it took two days and nights
To properly discuss! the journey, Sirs!
Such power has second-nature, men call use,
That un delight ful objects get to charm
Instead of chafe: the daily coloquy
Tickles the palate by repeated dose.
Old sores scratch kindly, the cance makes a push
Although the mill-yoke-wound be smarting yet,
For mill-door bolted on a holiday:
Nor must we marvel here if impulse urge
To talk the old story over now and then,
The hopes and fears, the stoppage and the haste,
—
Subjects of colloquy to surfeit once.
"Here did you bid me twine a rosy wreath!"
"And there you paid my lips a compliment!"
"Here you admired the tower could be so tall!"
"And there you likened that of Lebanon
To the nose of the beloved!" Trifies! still,
"For san et hoc olim." — such trifles serve
To make the minutes pass in winter-time.

Husband, return then, I re-counsel thee!
For, finally, of all glad circumstance
Should make a prompt return imperative,
What in the world awaits thee, dost suppose?
O' the sudden, as good gifts are wont befall,
What is the hap of our unconscious Count?
That which lights bonfire and sets each a-tilt,
Dissolves the stubborn at heart in jollity.
O admirable, there is born a babe,
A son, an heir, a Franceschini last
And best o' the stock! Pomptilla, thine the palm!
Repaying incredulity with faith,
Ungenerous thrift of each marital debt
With bounty in profuse expenditure,
Pompilla scorns to have the old year end
Without a present shall ring in the new —
Bestows on her too-parsonimous lord
An infant for the apple of his eye,
Core of his heart, and crown completing life,
True summum bonum of the earthly lot!
"We," saith ingenuously the sage, are born
Solely that others may be born of us!
So, father, take thy child, for thine that child,
Oh nothing doubt! In wedlock born, law holds Baseness impossible: since " filius est
Quem nuptiae demonstrant," twists the text
Whoever dares to doubt.

Yet doubt he dares!
O faith, where art thou flown from out the world?
Already on what an age of doubt we fall!
Instead of each disputing for the prize,
The babe is bandied here from that to this.
Whose the babe? " Cujus pecus? " Guido's lamb?
" An Meliboeus? " Nay, but of the priest!
" Non sed Αγονις! " Some one must be sire:
And who shall say, in such a puzzling strait,
If there were not vouchsafed some miracle
To the wife who had been harassed and abused
More than enough by Guido's family
For non-production of the promised fruit
Of marriage? What if Nature, I demand,
Touched to the quick by taunts upon her slot,
Had roused herself, put forth recondite power,
Bestowed this birth to vindicate her sway,
Like the strange favor Maro memorized
As granted Aristaeus when his hive
Lay empty of the swarm? not one more bee —
Not one more babe to Franceschini’s house!
And lo, a new birth filled the air with joy,
Sprung from the bosom of the generous steer,
A novel son and hair rejoiced the Count!
Spontaneous generation, need I prove
Were facile feat to Nature at a pinch?
Let whose doubts, steep horsehair certain weeks,
In water, there will be produced a snake;
Spontaneous product of the horse, which horse
Happens to be the representative —
Now that I think on ‘t — of Arezzo’s self,
The very city our conception blessed:
Is not a prancing horse the City-arms?
What sense are fails to see coincidence?
Cur ego, boast thou, my Pompilia, then,
Desperem fieri sine conjugae
Mater — How well the Ovidian distich suits! —
Et parere instar dummodo
Conturbavero such miracle as wrought!
Not further, as to mark the prodigy,
The babe in question neither took the name
Of Guido, from the sire presumptive, nor Giuseppe, from the sire potential, but
Gaetano — last saint of our hierarchy,
And newest name for a thing so new!
What other motive could have prompted choice?

Therefore be peace again: exult, ye hils!
Ye vale, rejoicing break forth in song!
Incipit parum, begin, small boy,
Risu cognoscent PRATREM, with a laugh
To recognize thy parent! Nor do thou
Boggie, O parent, to return the grace!
Nec accepser breathe, pater, puer
Cognoscendo one may well eke out the
In vain! The perverse Guido doubts his eyes,
Distrusts assurance, lets the devil drive.
Because his house is swept and garnished now,
His, having summoned seven like himself,
Must hurry thither, knock and enter in,
And make the last worse than the first, in deed!
Is he content? We are. No further blame
O’ the man and murder! They were stigmatized
Befittingly: the Court heard long ago
My mind o’ the matter, which, outpouring full,
Has long since swept like surge, i’ the simile
Of Homer, overborne both dyke and dam.
And whelmed alike client and advocate:
His fate is sealed, his life as good as gone,
On him I am not tempted to waste word.
Yet though my purpose holds, — which was and
in
And solely shall be to the very end,
To draw the true effigies of a saint,
Do justice to perfection in the sex, —

Yet let not some gross pamperer of the flesh
And niggard in the spirit’s nourishment,
Whose feeding hath obfuscated his wit
Rather than law, — he never had, to lose
Let not such advocate object to me
I leave my proper function of attack!
“What’s this to Bacchus?” — (in the classic phrase, Well used, for once) he hiccups probably.
O Advocate o’ the Poor, thou born to make
Their blessing void — beati puperis!
By painting sanctity I departure sin:
Beside my meal, I prove how black thy jet,
And, through Pompilia’s virtue, Guido’s grim

Back to her, then, — with but one beauty more.
End we our argument,— one crowning grace
Pre-eminent ’mid agony and death.
For to the last Pompilia played her part,
From the right means to the permissible end,
And, wily as an eel that stirs the mud
Thick overhead, so baffling spearman’s thrust.
She, while her husband eyed her, simulated death,
Delayed, for his sake, the catastrophe,
Obtained herself a respite, four days’ grace.
Whereby she told her story to the world,
Enabled me to make the present speech,
And, by a full confession, saved her soul.

Yet hold, even here would malice leer its last.
Gurgle its choked remonstrance: snake, his free!
Oh, that’s the objection? And to whom?

But me, forsooth as, in the very act
Of both confession and what followed close
Subsequent talk, chatter and gossipry,
Babble to sympathizing he and she
Whom ever chose besige her dying-bed, —
As this were found at variance with my tale,
False all I have adduced for truth,
Admitted not one pescadillo here,
Pretended to perfection, first and last.
O’ the whole procedure — perfect in the end.
Perfect in the means, perfect in everything.
Leaving a lawyer nothing to exonerate,
Reason away and show his skill about!
A flight, impossible to Adrian fleece,
Just to be fancied, scarcely to be wished.
And, anyhow, unpleasable in court!

“Now reconcile,” grasps Malice, “that with this?”

Your “this,” friend, is extraneous to the law.
Comes of men’s outside meddling, the unskilled
Interposition of such fools as press
Out of their province. Must I speak my mind?
Far better had Pompilia died o’ the spot
Than found a tongue to wag and shame the
law,
Shame most of all herself, — could friendship fail,
And advocacy lies less on the alert:
But no, they shall protect her to the end!
Do I credit the alleged narration? No!
Lied our Pompilia then, to land herself?
Still, no! Clear up what seems discrepancy?
The means abound: art's long, though time is short;
So, keeping me in compass, all I urge
Is — since, confession at the point of death,
Vae in articulo mortis, with the Church
Passes for statement honest and sincere,
Nemo presumitor revs esse, — then,
If sure that all affirmed would be believed,
I too scharriot in her so circumstances ceased,
To spend the last breath in one effort more
For universal good of friend and foe:
And, — by pretending utter innocence,
Nay, freedom from each foible we forgive, —
Re-integrate — not solely her own fame,
But do the like kind office for the priest
Whom telling the crude truth about might vex,
Haply expose to peril, abbreviate
Indeed the long career of usefulness
Presumably before him: while her lord,
Whose fleeting life is forfeit to the law, —
What mercy to the news of it by just
The gift of such a full certificate
Of his immitigable guiltiness,
She stifled in him the absurd conceit
Of murder as it were a mere revenge
—Stopped confirmation of that jealousy
Which, did she but acknowledge the first flaw,
The faintest foible, had emboldened him
To battle with the charge, balk penitence,
Bar preparation for impending fate!
Whereas, persuade him that he slew a saint
Whose heart was in his sin, and you have sinned,
You urge him all the briskler repent
Of most and least and aught and everything!
Still, if this view of mine content you not,
Lords, nor excuse the genial falsehood here,
We come to our Triarii, last resource:
We fall back on the last appeal
Submitting, — she confessed before she talked!
The sacrament obliterates the sin:
What is not, — was not, therefore, in a sense,
Let Molinists distinguish, "Souls washed white
But red ones, still show finkish to the eye!"
We say, abolishment is nothingness,
And nothingness has neither head nor tail,
Ead nor beginning! Better estimate
Exorbitantly, than disparage aught
Of the efficacy of the act, I hope!
Solvatur tabula? May we laugh and go?
Well, — not before (in filial gratitude
To Law, who, mighty mother, waves adieu)
We take on us to vindicate Law's self!
For,- yea, Sirs, — curb the start, curtail the
Who stare! —
Remains that we apologize for haste
I? the Law, our lady who here bristles up,
"Blame my procedure? Could the Court mistake?
(Which were indeed a misery to think);
Did not my sentence in the former stage
O? the business bear a title plain enough?
Decretum — I translate it word for word —
"Decreed: the priest, for his complicity
I? the flight and deviation of the dame,
As well as for unlawful discourse,
Is banished three years: 'crime and penalty
Declared alike. If he be taxed with guilt,
How can you call Pomplia innocent?
If both be innocent, have I been just?"
Gently, O mother, judge men — whose mistake
Is in the mere misapprehensiveness!
The Titius a-top of your decree
Was but to ticket there the kind of charge
You in good time would arbitrate upon.
Title is one thing, — arbitration's self,
Probatio, quite another possibly.
Substitit, there holds good the old response,
Respondio tradita, we must not stick,
Quod non sit attendandus Titius,
To the Title, sed Probatio, but the Proof,
Resultans ex processu, the result.
O? the Trial, and the style of punishment,
Et pena per sententiam imposita.
All is tentative, till the sentence come:
An indication of what may expect less,
But nowise assurance they shall find.
Lords, what if we permissibly relax
The tense bow, as the law-god Phoebus bids,
Relieve our gravity at labor's close?
I traverse Rome, feel thirsty, need a draught,
Look for a wine-shop, find it by the bough
Projecting as to say "Here wine is sold!"
So much I know, — "sold:" but what sort of wine?
Strong, weak, sweet, sour, home-made or foreign drink?
That must we discover by myself.
"Wine is sold," quoth the bough, "but good or bad,
Find, and inform us when you smack your lips!"
Exactly so, Law hangs her title forth,
To shew she entertains you with such case
About such crime. Come in! she pours, you quaff.
You find the Priest good liquior in the main,
But heady and provocative of brawls:
Remand the residue to flask once more,
Lay it low where it may depose you,
I? the collar: thence proceed it presently,
Three years the brighter and the better!
Thus,
Law's son, have I bestowed my filial help,
And thus I end, tenet proposito;
Point to point as I purposed have I drawn
Pomplia, and implied as terribly
Guido: so, gazing, let the world crown Law —
Able once more, despite my impotence,
And helped by the acumen of the Court,
To eliminate, display, make triumph truth!
What other prize than truth were worth the pains?
There's my oration — much exceeds in length
That famed panegyric of Isocrates,
They say it took him fifteen years to pen.
But all those ancients could say anything!
He put in just what rushed into his head:
While I shall have to prune and pare and print.
This comes of being born in modern times
With priests for auditories. Still, it pays.
THE POPE

Like to Ahasuerus, that shrewd prince,
I will begin,—as is, these seven years now,
My daily wont,—and read a History
(Written by one whose left right hand was dust
To the last digit, ages are my birth)
Of all my predecessors, Popes of Rome:
For though microphone easily dropped the pen,
Yet others picked it up and wrote it dry.
Since the making books there is no end.
And so I have the Papacy complete
From Peter first to Alexander last;
Can question each and take instruction so.
Have I to dare!—I ask, how dared this Pope?
To suffer? Such-an-one, how suffered he?
Being about to judge, as now, I seek
How judged once, well or ill, some other Pope;
Study some signal judgment that subsists
To blaze on, or else blot, the page which seals
The sum up of what good or loss to God
Came of his one more Vicar in the world.
So, do I find example, rule of life;
So, square and set in order the next page.
Shall be stretched smooth over my own funeral cyst.

Eight hundred years exact before the year
I was made Pope, men made Formosus Pope,
Say Siegbert and other chroniclers.
Ere I confirm or quash the Trial here
Of Guido Franceschini and his friends,
Read,—How there was a ghastly Trial once
Of a dead man by a live man, and both, Popes:
Thus—in the ancient pennam's very phrase.

"Then Stephen, Pope and seventh of the name,
Crawled up, in grand state, sat in state,
While cholera quivered on his brow and beard,
'Come into court, Formosus, thou lost wretch,
That claimedst to be late Pope as even I!'

"And at the word, the great door of the church
Flew wide, and in they brought Formosus' self,
The body of him, dead, even as embalmed
And buried duly in the Vatican
Eight months before, exhumed thus for the nonce.
They set it, that dead body of a Pope,
Clothed in pontific vestures now again,
Upright on Peter's chair as if alive.

"And Stephen, springing up, cried furiously,
' Bishop of Porto, wherefore didst presume
To leave that see and take this Roman see,
Exchange the lesser for the greater see,
A thing against the canons of the Church?'

"Then one—a Deacon who, observing forms,
Was placed by Stephen to repel the charge,
Be advocate and mouthpiece of the corpse)—
Spoke as he dared, set stammering forth
With white lips and dry tongue,—as but a youth.
For frightful was the corpse-face to behold,—
How nowise lacked there precedent for this.

"But when, for his last precedent of all,
Emboldened by the Spirit, out he blurs,
'And, Holy Father, didst not thou thyself
Vacate the lesser for the greater see,
Half a year since change Arago for Rome?'
"Yes, by the sin's defence now, synodwise!
Shrieks Stephen in a beastly froth of rage:
'Judge now betwixt him dead and me alive!
Hath he intruded, or do I pretend?
Judge, judge!'—breaks wavelike one whelk foam of wrath.

"Whereupon they, being friends and followers
Said, 'Ay, thou art Christ's Vicar, and not a!
Away with what is frightful to behold!
This act was uncanonic and a fault.'

"Then, swallowed up in rage, Stephen cried,
'So, guilty! So, remains I punish guilt!
He is unpoped, and all he did I damn:
The Bishop, that ordained him, I degrade:
Depose to laics those he raised to priests:
What they have wrought is mischief nor shall stand,
It is confusion, let it vex no more!
Since I revoke, annul and abrogate
All his decrees in all kinds: they are void!
In token of their own and warning to the world,
Strip me of miscreant of those robes usurped
And clothe him with vile serge befitting such.
Then hale the carrion to the market-place;
Let the town-hangman chop from his ribs
Those same three fingers which he blessed withal;
Next cut the head off, once was crowned for sooth:
And last go sling them, fingers, head and trunk.
To Tiber that my Christian fish may sup!'
—Either because of IXVRO which means Fish
And very aptly symbolizes Christ,
Or else because the Pope is Fisherman,
And seals with Fisher's signet.

"Any way.
So said, so done: himself, to see it done,
Followed the corpse they trailed from street to street.
Till into Tiber wave they threw the thing.
The people, crowded on the banks to see,
Were loud or mute, wept or laughed, cursed or jeered.
According as the deed addressed their sense:
A scandal verily: and out spake a Jew:
'Wot ye your Christ had vexed our Herod
thus?'

"Now when, Formosus being dead a year,
His judge Pope Stephen tasted death is sure.
Made captive by the mob and strangled straight.
Romanus, his successor for a month;
Did make protest Formosus was with God,
Holy, just, true in thought and word and deed.
Next Theodore, who reigned but twenty days.
Therein convoked a synod, whose decree
Did reinsert, repose the late unpoped,
And do away with Stephen as accursed.
So that when presently certain fisher-folk
(As if the queasy river could not hold
Its swallowed Jonas, but discharged the meal)
Produced the timely product of their nets,
The mutilated man, Formoeus, — saved
From putrefaction by the embalmer's spice,
Or, as some said, by sanctity of flesh, —
'Why, lay the body again,' bade Theodore,
'Among his predecessors, in the church
And burial-place of Peter!' which was done.
'And,' addeth Luitprand, 'many of repute,
Pious and still alive, avouch to me
That, as they bore the body up the aisle,
The saints in imaged row bowed each his head
For welcome to a brother-saint come back.'
As for Romanus and this Theodore,
These two Popes, through the brief reign
granted each,
Could but initiate what John came to close
And give the final stamp to: he it was,
Ninth of the name, (I follow the best guides)
Who, — in full synod at Ravenna held
With Bishops seventy-four, and present too
Eude King of France with his Archbishopry, —
Did condemn Stephen, anathematise
The disinterment, and make all plots blank.
'For,' argue here Auxilinus in a place
De Ordinationibus, 'precedents
Had been, no lack, before Formoeus long,
Of Bishops so transferred from see to see, —
Marinus, for example: ' read the tract.

'But, after John, came Sergius, reaffirmed
The right of Stephen, cursed Formoeus, nay
Cast out, some say, his corpse a second time,
And here, — because the matter went to
Prettied by new griefs, other cares of the age, —
Here is the last pronouncing of the Church,
Her sentence that subsists unto this day.
Yet constantly opinion hath prevailed
I' the Church, Formoeus was a holy man.'"

Which of the judgments was infallible?
Which of my predecessors spoke for God?
And what availed Formoeus that this cursed,
That blessed, and then this other cursed again?
'Fear ye not those whose power can kill the body
And not the soul,' saith Christ, "but rather those Can cast both soul and body into hell!"

John judged thus in Eight Hundred Ninety Eight.
Exact eight hundred years ago to-day
When, sitting in his stead, Vioegerent here,
I must give judgment on my own behoof.
So worked the predecessor: now, my turn!

In God's name! Once more on this earth of God's,
While twilight lasts and time wherein to work,
I take his staff with my uncertain hand,
And stay my six and four-score years, my due
Labor and sorrow, on his judgment-seat,
And forthatwith think, speak, act, in place of him —
The Pope for Christ. Once more appeal is made
From man's assize to mine: I sit and see
Another poor weak trembling human wretch
Pushed by his fellows, who pretend the right,
Up to the gulf which,, where I gaze, begins
From this world to the next, — gives way and
way,
Just on the edge over the awful dark:
With nothing to arrest him but my feet.
He catches at me with convulsive face,
Cries 'Leave to live the natural minute more!'
While hollowly the avengers echo "Leave?"
'None!' So has he exceeded man's due share
In man's fit license, wrung by Adam's fall,
To sin and yet not surely die, — that we,
All of us sinful, all with need of grace,
All chary of our life, — the minute more
Or minute less of grace which saves a soul, —
Bound to make common cause with who craves
time,
— We yet protest against the exorbitance
Of sin in this one sinner, and demand
That his poor soul remaining piece of time
Be plucked from out his clutch: put him to Death!
Punish him now! As for the weal or woe
Hereafter, God grant mercy! Man be just.
Nor let the felon boast he went scot-free!''
And I am bound, the solitary judge,
To weigh the worth, decide upon the plea,
And either hold a hand out, or withdraw
A foot and let the wretch drift to the fall.
Ay, and while thus I dally, dare perchance
Put fancies for a comfort 'twixt this calm
And yonder passion that I have to bear, —
As if reprieve were possible for both
Prisoner and Pope, — how easy were reprieve!
A touch o' the hand-bell here, a hasty word
To those who wait, and wonder they wait long.
I' the passage there, and I should gain the
life! —
Yes, though I flatter me with fancy thus,
I know it is but Nature's craven-trick.
The case is over, judgment at an end,
And all things done now and irrevocable:
A mere dead man is Franceschini here,
Even as Formoeus centuries ago.
I have worn through this sombre wintry day,
With winter in my soul beyond the world's,
Over these damnest of documents
Which drew night down on me ere eve befell, —
Pleadings and counter-pleadings, figure of fact
Beside fact's self, these summaries, to wit, —
How certain three were slain by certain five:
I read here why it was, and how it went,
And how the chief o' the five preferred excuse,
And how law rather chose defence should lie, —
What argument he urged by wary word
When free to play off vile, start subterfuge,
And what the unguarded groan told, torture's bet
When law grew brutal, outbroke, overborne
And glutted hunger on the truth, at last, —
No matter for the flesh and blood between.
All's a clear rede and no more riddle now.
Truth, nowhere, lies yet everywhere in these —
Not absolutely in a portion, yet
Evolvable from the whole: evolved at last Painfully, held tenaciously by me.
There is there is not any doubt to clear
When I shall write the brief word presently
And chink the hand-bell, which I pause to do.
Irresolute? Not I, more than the mound
With the pine-trees on it yonder! Some surmise,
Perchance, that since man’s wit is fallible,
Mine may fail here? Suppose it so,—what then?
Say,—Guido, I count guilty, there’s no babe
So guiltless, for I misconceive the man!
What’s in the chance should move me from my mind?
If, as I walk in a rough country-side,
Peasants of mine cry, “Thou art he can help,
Lord of the land and counted wise to boot:
Look at our brother, strangling in his foam,
He felt so where we find him,—prove thy worth!”
I may presume, pronounce, “A frenzy-fit,
A falling-sickness or a fever-stroke!
Breathe a vein, copiously let blood at once!”
So perish the patient, and anon
I hear my peasants — “All was error, lore!
Our story, thy prescription: for there crawled
In due time from our hapless brother’s breast
The serpent which had stung him: bleeding slow, Whom a prompt cordial had restored to health.”
What note, should I say than “God so willed:
Mankind is ignorant, a man am I:
Call ignorance my sorrow, not my sin!”
So and not otherwise, in after-time,
If some acuter wit, fresh probing, sound
This multifarious mass of words and deeds
Deeper, and reach through guilt to innocence,
I shall face Guido’s ghost nor blemish a jot.
“God who set me to judge thee, meted out
So much of judging faculty, no more:
Ask him if I was slack in use thereof!”
I hold a heavier fault imputable:
Insanely as I changed a chaplain once,
For no cause,—no, if I must bare my heart,—
Save that he sniffed somewhat saying mass.
For I am ‘ware it is the seed of act,
God holds appraising in his hollow palm,
Not in my own great thence on the world be-Low,
Leafface and branchage, vulgar eyes admire.
Therefore I stand on my integrity,
Nor fear at all: and if I hesitate,
It is because I need to breathe awhile,
Rest, as the human right allows, review
Intent the little seeds of act, my tree,—
The thought, which, clothed in deed, I give the world
At chink of bell and push of arras door.

O pale departure, dim disgrace of day!
Winter’s in wane, his vengeful worst art thou,
To dash the boldness of advancing March!
Thy chill persistent rain has purged our streets
Of conspiracy; pert tongue and idle ear
By this, consort ‘neath archway, portico.
But whereasoe’er Rome gathers in the gray,

Two names now snap and flash from mouth to mouth—
(Spark, flint and steel strike) — Guido and I,
Pop!—
By this same hour to-morrow eve — aha,
How do they call him? — the sagacious swat
Who finds by figures how the chances prev.
Why one comes rather than another thing.
As, say, such dots turn up by throw of die.
Or, if we dip in Virgil here and there:
And pricks for such a verse, when such a point.

Take this Swede, tell him, hiding name at rank,
Two men are in our city this dull eve;
One doomed to death,—but hundreds is as slight
Slip aside, clean escape by leave of law
Which leans to mercy in this latter time;
Moreover in the multitude of life
Is he, with strength of limb and brain alert,
Presumably of service here: beside,
The man is noble, backed by nobler friends:
Nay, they so wish him well, the city’s self Makes common cause with who — house-guard
rate,
Patron of earth and home, domestic lord—
But ruled his own, let aliens cavil. Die?
He’ll bid a jailer or break prison first!
Nay, a sedition may be helpful, give
Hint to the mob to batter wall, burn gate,
And bid the favorite malefactor march.
Calculate now these chances of escape:
“‘It is not probable, but well may be.”
Again, there is another man, weighed now
By twice eight years beyond the seven-time-ten,
Appointed overweight to break our branc’h.
And this man’s loaded branch lifts, more the snow.
All the world’s dark and care, though a bid’st nest
Were a superfluous burden: notably Hath he been pressed, as if his age were young.
From to-day’s day till now that day depart.
Tiring one question with true sweat of soul.
“Shall the said doomed man fitlher die or live?”
When a straw swallowed in his posset, steel
Stumbled on where his path lies, any puff
That’s incident to such a smoking flask.
Hurries the natural end and quenches him.
Now calculate, thou sage, the chances here.
Say, which shall die the sooner, this or that.
“That, possibly, this in all likelihood.”
I thought so: yet thou trippst, my forlorn friend!
No, it will be quite otherwise,—to-day
Is Guido’s last: my term is yet to run.

But say the Swede were right, and I forswear
Acknowledg’ a prompt summons and his deed:
Why, then I stand already in God’s face.
And hear, “Since by its fruit a tree is judged:
Show me thy fruit, the latest act of thine.”
For in the last is summed the first and all.
What thy life last put heart and soul into,
There shall I taste thy product.” I must plead
This condemnation of a man to-day.
Not so! Expect nor question nor reply
At what we figure as God's judgment-bar!
None of this vile way by the barren words
Which, more than any deed, characterize
Man as made subject to a curse: no speech—
That still bursts o'er some lie which lurks inside,
As the split skin across the coppery snake,
And most denotes man! since, in all beside,
Is hate or lust or greed, or an ulcer,
Out of some core of truth the excrescence comes,
And, in the last resort, the man may urge
"So was I made, a weak thing that gave way
To truth, to impulse only strong since true,
And hated, lasted, used guile, forwent faith."

Speaks or keeps silence as himself sees fit,
Without the least incumbency to lie,

Or how the birds fly, and not alip to false
Though truth serve better? Man must tell his mate
Of you, me and himself, knowing he lies,
Knowing his fellow knows the same,—will think

None of this vile way by the barren words
Which, more than any deed, characterize
Man as made subject to a curse: no speech—
That still bursts o'er some lie which lurks inside,
As the split skin across the coppery snake,
Nor dare suspect the sacrstian the thief!
Shall Judas—hard upon the donor's heel,
To flitch the fragments of the basket—plead
He was too near the preacher's mouth, nor sat
Attent with fifties in a company.
No,—closer to promulgated decree,
Clearer the censure of default. Proceed!

I find him bound, then, to begin life well;
Fortified by propitious circumstance,
Great birth, good breeding, with the Church for guide,
How lives he? Cased thus in a coat of proof,
Mailed like a man-at-arms, though all the while
A puny starveling,—does the breast pant big,
The limb swell to the limit, emptiness
Strive to become solidity indeed?
Rather, he shrinks up like the ambigious fish,
Detaches flesh from shell and outside show,
And steals by moonlight (I have seen the thing)
In and out, now to prey and now to skulk.
A moro he boasts when a wave breaks on beach,
Or bird stoops for the prize: with peril nigh,
The man of rank, the much-befriended man,
The man almost affiliative to the Church,
Such is to deal with, let the world beware!
Does the world recognize, pass prudently?
Do tides chase this and less-favorable? the deep?
Already is the slug from out its mew,
Ignobly facing with all loose and free,
Sand-fly and slush-worm at their garbage-feast,
A naked blotch no better than they all:
Guido has dropped nobility, slipped the Church,
Plays trickster if not cut-purse, body and soul
Prostrate among the filthy feeders—laugh!
And when Law takes him by surprise at last,
Catches the foul thing on its carrion-prey,
Behold, he points to shell left high and dry,
Pleading "But the case out yonder is myself!"
Nay, it is thou, Law prongs amid thy peers,
Congenial vermin; that was none of thee,
Thine outside,—give it to the soldier-crab!

For I find this black mark impinging the man,
That he believes in just the vile of life,
Low instinct, base pretension, are these truth?
Then, that aforesaid armor, probity,
He figures in, is falsehood scale on scale;
Honor and faith,—a lie and a disguise,
Probably for all lives in this world,
Certainly for himself! All say good words
To who will hear, all do thereby bad deeds
To who must undergo; so thrive mankind!
See this habitual creed exemplified
Most in the last deliberate act; as last,
So, very sum and substance of the soul
Of him that planned and leaves one perfect piece,
The sin brought under jurisdiction now,
Even the marriage of the man: this act
I sever from his life as sample, show
For Guido's self, intend to test him by,
As, from a cup filled fairly at the fount,
By the components we decide enough
Or to let flow as late, or stanch the source.

He purposes this marriage. I remark,
On no one motive that should prompt thereto—
Farthest, by consequence, from ends alleged Appropriate to the action; so they were:
The best, he knew and feigned, the worst he took.
Not one possible impulse moves the man.
From the mere liking of the eye and ear,
To the true longing of the heart that loves,
No trace of these: but all to instigate,
Is what sinks man past level of the brute,
Whose appetite if brutish is a truth.
All is the lust for money: to get gold,
—Why, lie, rob, if it must be, murder! Make Body and soul wring gold out, lured within
The clutch of hate by love, the trap's pretense.
What good else get from bodies and from souls?
This got, there were some life to lead thereby,
—What where or how, appreciate those who tell
How the toad lives: it lives,—enough for me!
To get this good—but with a groan or so,
Then, silence of the victims—were the feat.
He fancies made a picture in his mind,—
Of father and mother stunned and robed
To the blow, as they lie staring at fate's jaws
Their folly danced into, till the woe fell;
Edged in a month by strenuous cruelty
From even the poor nook whence they watched
Feast on their heart, the lamb-like child is prey;
Plundered to the last remnant of their wealth.
(What daily pittance pleased the plundered deed.)
Hunted forth to go hide head, starve and die.
And leave the pale awse-stricken wife, past hope
Of help I the world now, mute and motionless.
His slave, his chattel, to first use, then destroy.
All this, he bent mind how to bring about,
Put plain in act and life, as painted plain,
So have success, reach crown of earthly good,
In this particular enterprise of man,
By marriage—undertaken in God's face
With all these lies so opposite God's truth,
For end so other than man's end.

Thus chooses Guide, and thus would carry out his scheme:
But when an obstacle first blocks the path,
When he finds none may boast monopoly.
Of lies and trick I the tricking lying world,—
That sorry woe natures, even this sort
O' the Comparrini, want nor trick nor lie
Proper to the kind,—that as the gor-crow treats
The bramble-finch so treats the finch the moth,
The great Guido is minutely matched
By this same couple,—whether true or false
The revelation of Pomplilia's birth,
Which in a moment brings his scheme to naught,—
Then, he is piqued, advances yet a stage,
Leaves the low region to the finch and fly,
Soars to the zenith whence the fiercer fowl
May dare the inimitable swoop. I see.
He draws now on the curious crime, the fine
Felicity and flower of wickedness;
Determines, by the utmost exercise
Of violence, made safe and sure by craft,
THE POPE

To satiate malice, pluck one last arch-pang
From the parents, else would triumph out of
By punishing their child, within reach yet,
Who, by thought, word or deed, could nowise
I' the matter that now moves him. So plans he,
Always subordinating (note the point!)
Revenge, the manlier sin, to interest
The meaner,— would pluck pang forth, but unolench
No gripe in the act, let fall no money-piece.
Hence a plan for so plaguing; body and soul,
His wife, so putting, day by day, hour by hour,
The untrue tortured to the untouched place,
As must precipitate an end foreseen,
Goad her into some plain revolt, most like
Plunge upon patent suicidal shame,
Death to herself, damnation by rebound
To those whose hearts he, holding hers, holds still:
Such plan as, in its bad completeness, shall
Ruin the three together and alike,
Yet leave himself in luck and liberty,
No claim renounced, no right a forfeiture.
His person unadangered, his good fame
Without a flaw, his pristine worth intact,— While they, with all their claims and rights that cling,
Shall forthwith crumble off him every side,
Search,
Nor does amiss i' the main.—secludes the wife
From the husband, respite the oppressed one,
Grants
Probation to the oppressor, could he know
The mercy of a minute's fiery purge!
The fumes, boil alike of public scorn,
Private remorse, heaped glowing on his head,
What if — the force and guile, the ore's alloy,
Eliminate, his baser soul refined —
The lost be saved even yet, so as by fire?
Let him, rebuked, go softly all his days;
And, when no graver misings claim their due,
Meditate on a man's immense mistake
Who, fashioned to use feet and walk, designs
Craw! —
Takes the unmanly means — ay, though to Man scarce should make for, would but reach
Through wrong —
May sin, but nowise needs shame manhood so:
Since fowlers hawk, shoot, nay and snare the Game,
And yet no seeth vilen practice, nor find sport
In torch-light treachery or the luring owl.

But how hunts Guido? Why, the fraudulent
Trap —
Late spurned to ruin by the indignant feet
Of fellows in the chase who loved fair play —
Here he picks up its fragments to the least,
Lades him and hies to the old lurking-place
Where haply he may patch again, reft
The mischief, fills its blunted teeth anew,
Make sure, next time, first snap shall break
The box.
Craft, greed and violence complot revenge:
Craft, for its quota, schemes to bring about
And seize occasion and be safe withal:
Greed craves its act may work both far and Crush the tree, branch and trunk and root be-
side,
Whichever twig or leaf arrests a streak
Of possible sunshine else would coin itself,
And drop down one more gold piece in the path:
Violence stipulates, "Advantage proved,
And safety sure, be pain the overplus!"
Murder with jagged knife! Cut but tear too!
Foiled oft, starved long, glut malice for Amends!"

And what, craft's scheme? scheme sorrowful and strange
As though the elements, whom mercy checkdo,
Had mustered hate for one elevation more,
One final deluge to surprise the Ark
Crashed and sleeping on its mountain-top:
Their outbreak-signal — what but the dove's
swoo,
Back with the olive in her bill for news
Sorrow was over? "T is an infant's birth,
Guido's first-born, his son and heir, that gives
The occasion: other men out free their souls
From care in such a case, fly up in thanks
To God, reach, recognize his love for once:
Guido cries, "Soul, at last the mire is thine!
Lie there in likeness of a money-bag,
My babe's birth so pinn down past moving now,

That I dare cut adrift the lives I hate
Scrupled to touch lest thou escape with them!
Those parents and their child my wife, — touch
one,

Lost all! Their rights determined on a head
I could but hate, not harm, since from each hair
Dangled a hope for me: now — chance and change!

No right was in their child but passes plain
To that child's child and through such child to
me,

I am a father now, — come what come will,
I represent my child; he comes between —
Cuts sudden off the sunshine of this life
From those three: why, the gold is in his curb!
Not with old Pietro's, Violante's head,
Not his gray horror, her more hideous black —
Go these, devoted to the knife!"

'T is done:
Wherefore should mind misgiv, heart hesitate?
He calls to counsel, fashions certain four Colorless features counted clean till now,
— Rustic simplicity, uncorrupted youth,
Ignorant virtue! Here 's the gold o' the prime When Saturn ruled, shall shock our leaders
day —
The clown ahast the courtier! Mark it, bards!
The courtier tries his hand on chivalry here.
Speaks a word, names a crime, appoints a price, —
Just breathes on what, suffused with all himself.
Is red-hot henceforth past distinction now
I' the common glow of hell. And thus they make

And blaze on us at Rome, Christ's birthnight-
eve!
Oh angels that sang erst "On the earth, peace!
To man, good will!" — such peace finds earth
today!

After the seventeen hundred years, so man
Wills good to man, so Guido makes complete
His murder! what is it I said? — cuts loose
Three lives that hitherto he suffered cling,
Simply because each served to nail secure,
By a corner of the money-bag, his soul, —
Therefore, lives sacred till the babe's first breath
O'erweights them in the balance, — off they fly!

So is the murder managed, sin conceived
To the full: and why not crowned with triumphs
too?

Why must the sin, conceived thus, bring forth
death?
I note how, within hair's-breadth of escape,
Impunity and the thing supposed success,
Guido is found when the check comes, the
change,
The monitory touch o' the tether — felt
By few, not marked by many, named by none
At the moment, only recognized aight
' The fulness of the days, for God's, last sin
Exceed the service, leap the line: meh check —
A secret which this life finds hard to keep,
And, often guessed, is never quite revealed —
Needs must trip Guido on a stumbling-block
Too vulgar, too absurdly plain! the path!
Study this single oversight of care,
This heretube that marred sagacity,
Forgetfulness of all the man best knew, —
How any stranger having need to fly,
Needs but to ask and have the means of flight.
Why, the first urchin tells you, to leave Rome,
Get horses, you must show the warrant, just
The banal scrap, clerk’s scribble, a fair word
boys,
Or fouler, if a douce sweeten word,—
And straight authority will back demand,
Give you the pick o’ the post-house! — how should he,
Then, resident at Rome for thirty years,
Guido, instruct a stranger! — and himself
Forgets just this poor paper scrap, herewith
Armed, every door he knocks at opens wide
To save him: horsed and manned, with such advance
O’ the hunt behind, why, ’t were the easy task
Of hours told on the fingers of one hand,
To reach the Tuscan frontier, laugh at home,
Light-hearted with his fellows of the place,—
Prepared by that strange shameful judgment, that Satire upon a sentence just pronounced
By the Rota and confirmed by the Granduke,— Ready in a circle to receive their peer,
Appreciate his good story how, when Rome,
The Pope-King and the populace of priests
Made common cause with their confederate
The other priestling who seduced his wife,
He, out of the, wiped out the affront
With decent bloodshed and could face his
friends,
Frolic it in the world’s eye. Ay, such tale
Missed such applause, and by such oversight!
So, tired and footsore, those blood-flustered five
Went reeling on the road through dark and cold,
The few permissible miles, to sink at length,
Wallow and sleep in the first wayside straw,
As the other herd quenched, i’ the wash o’ the sea.
— Each swine, the devil inside him: so slept they,
And so were caught and caged — all through one trip.
One touch of fool in Guido the astute!
He curses the omission, I surmise,
More than the murder. Why, thou fool and
blind,
It is the mercy-stroke that stops thy fate,
Hamstrings and holds thee to thy hurt, — but
how?
On the edge o’ the precipice! One minute more,
Thou hast gone farther and fared worse, my son,
Fathoms down on the flint and fire beneath!
Thy comrades each and all were of one mind,
They murkier done, to straightway murder thee
In turn, because of promised pay withheld.
So, to the last, greed found itself at odds
With craft in thee, and, proving conqueror,
Had sent thee, the same night that crowned thy hope.
Thither where, this same day, I see thee not,
Nor, through God’s mercy, need, to-morrow, see.

Such I find Guido, midstest blotch of black.
Discernible in this group of clustered crimes
Huddling together in the cave they call
Their palace, outraged day thus penetrates.
Around him ranged, now close and now remote,
Prominent or obscure to meet the needs
O’ the mage and master, I detect each shape
Subsidiary i’ the scene nor loathed the less,
All alike colored, all descried skin
By one and the same pitchy furnace stirred
At the centre: see, they link the master’s hand, —
This fox-faced horrible priest, this brother-brute
The Abate,— why, mere womanliness looks well,
Guido stands honest in the red o’ the flame,
Beside this yellow that would pass for white,
Twice Guido, all craft but no violence,
This copier of the mien and gait and garb
Of Peter and Paul, that he may go disguised,
Rob halt and lame, sick folk i’ the temple-porch!
Armed with religion, fortified by law,
A man of peace, who trims the midnight lamp
And turns the classic page — and all for craft,
All to work harm with, yet incur no scratch!
While Guido brings the struggle to a close,
Paul steps back the due distance, clear o’ the trap
He builds and baits. Guido I catch and judge;
Paul is past reach in this world and my time:
That is a case reserved. Pass to the next,
The boy of the brood, the young Girolamo, Priest, Canon, and what more? not wolf nor fox,
But hybrid, neither craft nor violence
Wholly, part violence part craft: such cross
Tempts speculation — will both blend one day,
And prove hell’s better product? Or subside
And let the simple quality emerge,
Go on with Satan’s service the old way?
Meanwhile, what promise, — what performance
too!
For there’s a new distinctive touch, I see,
Lost — lacking in the two — hell’s own blue tint
That gives a character and marks the man
More than a match for yellow and red. Once
more,
A case reserved: why should I doubt? Then comes
The gaunt gray nightmare in the furthest smoke,
The bag that gave these three abortions birth,
Unmotherly mother and unwomanly
Woman, that near turns motherhood to shame,
Womanliness to loathing: no one word,
No gesture to curb cruelty a whit
More than the she-pard thwarts her playsome whelp
Trying their milk-teeth on the soft o’ the throat
O’ the first fawn, flung, with those beseeching eyes.
Flat in the covert! How should she but couch,
Lick the dry lips, unheathate the blunted claw,
Catch ’twixt her placid eyewinks at what chance
Old bloody half-forgotten dream may fit,
Born when herself was novice to the taste,
The while she lets youth take its pleasure.
Last,
These God-abandoned wretched lumps of life,
These four companions, — country-folk this time,
Not tainted by the unwholesome civic breath,
Much less the curse of the court! Mere stripplings too,
Fit to do human nature justice still!
Surely when impudence in Guido’s shape
Shall propose crime and proffer money’s worth
To these stout tall rough bright-eyed black-haired boys,
The blood shall bound in answer to each cheek
Before the indignant outcry break from lip!
Are these! ’tis the mood to murder, hardly loosed
From healthy autumn-finish of ploughed glebe,
Grapes in the barrel, work at happy end,
And winter near with rest and Christmas play?
How greet they Guido with his final task —
(As if he but proposed “One vineyard more
To dig, ere frost come, then relax indeed!”)
“Anywhere, anyhow and anywhy,
Murder me some three people, old and young,
Ye never heard the names of, — and be paid
So much!” And the whole four accede at Demur? Do cattle hidden march or halt?
Is it some lingering habit, old fond faith
I’ the lord o’ the land, instructs them, — birthright badge
Of feudal tenure claims its slaves again?
Not so at all, thou noble human heart!
All is done purely for the pay, — which, earned,
And not forthcoming at the instant, makes Religion heresy, and the lord o’ the land
Fit subject for a murder in his turn.
That patron with out threat and false purse,
Deposited i’ the roadside-ditch, his due,
Naught hinders each good fellow trudging home,
The heavier by a piece or two in poke,
And so with new zest to the common life,
Mastick, card and spade, plough-tail and wagon-shaft,
Till some such other piece of luck betide,
Who knows? Since this is a mere start in life,
And none of them exceeds the twentieth year,
Nay, more! the background yet? Unnoticed forms
Claim to be classed, subordinately vile?
Compliant lookers - on that laugh, — perchance
Shake head as their friend’s horse - play grows too rough
With the mere child he manages amiss —
But would not interfere and make bad worse
For twice the fractions tears and prayers: thou know’st
Lavish better, Marzi-Medici,
Governor for thy kinsman the Granduke!
Fit representative of law, man’s lamp
I’ the magistrate’s grasp full-flare, no rushlight-end Sputtering ’twixt thumb and finger of the
These princes.
Whose answer to the couple’s cry for help
Is a threat, — whose remedy of Pomplilia’s wrong
A shrug o’ the shoulder, and facetious word
Or wink, traditional with Tuscan wits,
To Guido in the doorway. — Lead to law!
The wife is pushed back to the husband, be
Who knows how these home-squabblings pass
People who have the public good to mind,
And work best with a silence in the court!
Ah, but I save my word at least for thee,
Archbishop, who art under, ’tis the Church,
As I am under God, — thou, chosen by both
To do the shepherd’s office, feed the sheep —
How of this lamb that panteth at thy foot
While the wolf pressed on her within crook’s reach?
Wast thou the hireling that did turn and flee?
With thee at least anon the little word!
Such denizens o’ the cave now cluster round
And beat the furnace sevenfold: time indeed
A bolt from heaven should cleave roof and clear place,
Transfix and show the world, suspiring flame,
The main offender, scar and brand the rest
Hurling, each miscreant to his hole: then feed
And purify the scene with outside day —
Which yet, in the absolutest drench of dark,
Ne’er wants a witness, some stray beauty-less
To the despair of hell.

First of the first,
Such I pronounce Pomplila, then as now
Perfect in whiteness: stoop thou down, my child,
Give one good moment to the poor old Pope
Heartless at having all his world to bless—
Let me look at thee in the flesh as erst,
Let me enjoy the old clean linen garb,
Not the new splendid vesture! Armed and crowned,
Would Michael, yonder, be, or crowned with armed,
The less pre-eminent angel? Everywhere
I see in the world the intellect of man,
That sword, the energy his subtle spear,
The knowledge which defends him like a shield
Everywhere, but they make not up, I think,
The marvel of a soul like thine, earth’s flower
She holds up to the softened gaze of God!
It was not given Pomplila to know much,
Speak much, to write a book, to move man-kind,
Be memorized by who records my time.
Yet if in purity and patience, if
In faith held fast despite the plucking fled,
Safe like the signet stone with the new name
That saints are known by, — if in right-minded
For wrong, most pardon for worst injury,
If there be any virtue, any praise,—
Then will this woman-child have proved—
who knows?—
Just the one prize vouchsafed unworthy me,
Seven years a gardener of the untoward ground
I till, — this earth, my sweat and blood manure
All the long day that barrenly grows dusk
At least one blossom makes me proud at eve
Born mid the thistles of my enclosure! Still
THE POPE

(Oh, here as elsewhere, nothingness of man!) Those be the plants, imbedded yonder South To mellow in the morning, those made fat By the master’s eye, that yield such timid leaf, Uncertain bud, as product of his pains! While — see how this mere chance-sown, cliff-nursed seed, That sprang up by the wayside ’neath the foot Of the enemy, this breaks all into blaze, Spreads itself, one wide glory of desire To incorporate the whole great sun it loves From the inch-height whence it looks and longs! My flower,

My rose, I gather for the breast of God, I this praise most is thee, where all I praise, That having been obedient to the end According to the light allotted, law Prescribed thy life, still tried, still standing test, —

Dutiful to the foolish parents first, Submissive next to the bad husband, — nay, Tolerant of those meaner miserable That did his hests, eked out the dose of pain, — Thou, patient thus, couldst rise from law to law.

The old to the new, promoted at one cry Of the triumph of God to the new service, not To longer bear, but henceforth fight, be found Sublime in new impatience with the foe! Endure man and obey God: plant firm foot On neck of man, tread man into the hell Meet for him, and obey God all the more! Oh said that didst despise thy life so much When it seemed only thine to keep or lose, How the fine ear felt fall the first low word "Value life, and preserve life for My sake!" Thou didst... how shall I say... receive so long

The standing ordinance of God on earth, What wonder if the novel claim had clashed With old requirement, seemed to supersede Too much the customary law? But, brave, Thou at first prompting of what I call God, And fools call Nature, didst hear, comprehend Accept the obligation laid on thee, Mother elect, to save the nabob-child, As brute and bird do, reptile and the fly, Ay and, I nothing doubt, even tree, shrub, plant And flower o’ the field, all in a common pact To worthily defend the trust of trusts, Life from the Ever Living: — didst resist — Anticipate the office that is mine — And with his own sword stay the uplifted arm, The endeavor of the wicked, and defend Him who — again in my default — was there For visible providence: one less true than thou To touch, i’ the past, less practised in the right, Approved less far in all docility To all instruction, — how had such an one Made scruple? Is this motion a decree? It was authentic to the experienced ear O’ the good and faithful servant, Go past me And get thy praise, — and be not far to seek Presently when I follow if I may!

And surely not so very much apart Need I place thee, my warrior-priest, — in whom

What if I gain the other rose, the gold, We crave to imitate God’s miracle, Great monarchs with, good rose in its degree? Irregular noble scopage — son the same! Vanity — and present future once the fault Who still mistake, mislead, throw hook and line,

Thinking to land leviathan forsooth, Tame the scaled neck, play with him as a bird, And bind him or our maidens! Better bear The King of Praise — whose favouring angels? Unplugged by cord in nose and thorn in jaw, Through deep to deep, followed by all that shine,

Churning the blackness hoary: He who made The comedy terror, He shall make the sword To match that piece of netherstone his heart, Ay, nor miss praise whereby; who else shut fire I’ the stone, to leap from mouth at sword’s first stroke,

In lamps of love and faith, the chivalry That dares the right and disregards alike The yes and nay o’ the world? Self-sacrifice, —

What if an idol took it? Ask the Church Why she was wont to turn each Venus here, — Poor Rome perversely lingered round, despite Instruction, for the sake of purblind love, — Into Madonna’s shape, and waste no whit Of aught so rare on earth as gratitude! All this sweet savour was not ours but thine, Nard of the rock, a natural wealth we name Inseme, and treasure up as food for saints, When fling to roots — whose furnishing away to give Not find the costly perfume. Do I smile? Nay, Caposacchi, much I find amiss, Blameworthy, punishable in this freak Of thine, this youth prolonged, though age was ripe, This masquerade in sober day, with change Of motley too, — now hypocrite’s disguise, Now fool’s-costume: which lie was least like truth, Which the unsinger, more discordant garb, With that symmetric soul inside my son, The churchman’s or the worldling’s, — let him judge,

Our adversary who enjoys the task! I rather chronicle the honesty saga —

When the first moan broke from the martyr maid At that uncaging of the beasts, — made bare My athlete on the instant, gave such good Great undisguised leap over post and pale Right into the middle-cirque, free fighting-place. There may have been rash stripping — every rag Went to the winds, — infringement manifold Of laws prescribed pudicity, I fear. In this impulsive and prompt self-display! Ever such tax comes of the foolish youth; Men mutin the wiser manhood, and suspect No veritable star swins out of cloud. Bear thou such imputation, undergo The penalty I nowise dare relax, —

Conventional chastisement and rebuke. But for the outcome, the brave stary birth Consolating earth with all that cloud,
Thank heaven as I do! Ay, such championship
Of God at first blush, such prompt cheery thud
Of glove on ground that answers ringingly
The challenge of the false knight; — watch we long,
And wait we vainly for its gallant like
From those appointed to the service, sworn
His body-guard with pay and privilege—
White-clint, because in white walks sanctity,
Red-socked, how else proclaims fine scorn of flesh,
Unchariness of blood when blood faith begs!
Where are the men-at-arms with cross on coat?
Alas, bewraying their attire; whilst thou
In mask and motley, pledged to dance no sight.
Sprang'st forth the hero! In thought, word and deed,
How throughout all thy warfare thou wast true,
I find it easy to believe; and if
At any fateful moment of the strange
Adventure, the strong passion of that strait,
Fear and surprise, may have revealed too much;
As when a thunders midnight, with black air
That burns, raindrops that bluster, breaks a spell,
Draws out the excessive virtue of some sheathed
Shut unsuspected flower that hoards and hides
Imensity of sweetness, — so, perchance,
Might the surprise and fear release too much
The perfect beauty of the body and soul
Thou savedit in thy passion for God's sake,
He who is Fit! Was the trial sore?
Temptation sharp? Thank God a second time!
'Why comes temptation but for man to meet
And master and make crouch beneath his foot,
And so be pedalled in triumph? Pray
'Lead us into no such temptations, Lord!'"".
Yes, but, O Thou whose servants are the bold,
Lead such temptations by the head and hair,
Reluctant dragons, up to who dares fight,
That so he may do battle and have praise!
Do I not see the praise? — that while thy mates
Bound to deserve! the matter, prove at need
Unprofitable through the very pains
We gave to train them well and start them fair.—
Are found too stiff, with standing ranked and ranged,
For on set in good earnest, too obtuse
Of ear, through iteration of command,
For catching quick the sense of the real cry,—
Thou, whose sword-hand was used to strike the late,
Whose sentry-station graced some wanton's gate,
Thou didst push forward and show mettle, shame
The lagards, and retrieve the day. Well done!
Be glad thou hast let light into the world,
Through that irregular breach o' the boundary,—see
The same upon thy path and march assured,
Learning anew the use of soldiership,
Self-abnegation, freedom from all fear,
Loyalty to the life's end! Ruminate,
Deserve the initiatory spasm; — once more
Work, be unhappy but bear life, my son!
And troop you, somewhere 'twixt the best and worst,
Where crowd the indifferent product, all so poor
Make-shift, starved samples of humanity!
Father and mother, huddle there and hide!
A gracious eye may find you! Foul and fair,
Sadly mixed natures: self-indulgent, — yet,
Self-sacrificing too; how the love soars,
How the craft, avarice, vanity and spite
Sink again! So they keep the middle come.
Slipt back upon the stupid virtue, stay
Nowhere enough for being classed, I hope
And fear. Accept the swift and restful death.
Taught, somewhat sternelier than is wont, what waits
The ambiguous creature, — how the one look touch
Steadies the aim of the arrow just as well
As the wide faultless white on the bird's breast!
Nay, you were punished in the very part
That looked most pure of speck, 't was honest love
Betrayed you, — did love seem most wry
Pains,
Challenge such purging, since ordained survive!
When all the rest of you was done with? Go!
Nay, never again elude the choice of tints!
Wit shall not neutralize the black, nor god Compensate bad in man, absolve him so:
Life's business being just the terrible choice.
So do I see, pronounce on all and some Grouped for my judgment now, — profess as Shall doubt.
While I pronounce: dark, difficult enough
The human sphere, yet eyes grow sharp by see,
I find the truth, dispart the shine from shade.
As a mere man may, with no special touch
O' the lexus-gifts in each ordinary orb:
Nay, if the popular notion class me right,
One of well-nigh decayed intelligence,—
What of that? Through hard labor and god will.
And habits that gives a blind man sight
At the practised finger-ends of him, I do
Discern, and dare decree in consequence,
Whatever prove the peril of mistake.
Whence, then, this quite new quick cold thrill,
—cloud-like,
This keen dread creeping from a quarter score
Suspected in the skies I nightly scan;
What slacks the tense nerve, naps the wound-up spring
Of the act that should and shall be, sends the mount
And maste o' the whole man's-strength,—car-globe so late—
Shudderingly into dust, a moment's work?
While I stand firm, go fearless, in this world,
For this life recognize and arbitrate,
Drench and let stay, or else remove a thing:
Judge "This is right, this object out of place,"— (Candle in hand that helps me and to spare,—
What if a voice deride me, "Perk and pray!"
Brighten each nook with thine intelligence!
Play the good householder, ply man and maid
With tasks prolonged into the midnight, test
Their work and nowise stint of the due wage
Each worthy worker: but with gyres and whip
Pay thou misprision of a single point
Plaia to thy happy self who liftst the light,
Lament't the darkling,—bold to all beneath!
What if thyself adventure, now the place
Is purged so well?—Leave pavement and mount roof,
Look round thee for the light of the upper sky,
The fire which lit thy fire which finds default
In Guido Franceschini to his cost!
What if, above in the domain of light,
Thou miss the accustomed signs, remark eclipse?
Shalt thou still gaze on ground nor lift a lid,—
Steady in thy superb propagative,
Thy inch of inkling,—nor once face the doubt
I' the sphere above thee, darkness to be felt?"

Yet my poor spark had for its source, the sun;
Thither I sent the great looks which compel
Light from its fount: all that I do and am
Comes from the truth, or seen or else surmised,
Remembered or divined, as mere man may:
I know just so, nor otherwise, As I know
I speak,—what should I know, then, and how speak
Were there a wild mistake of eye or brain
As to recorded governance above?
If my own breath, only, blow coal aight
I styled celestial and the morning-star?
I, who in this world act resolvedly,
Dispose of men, their bodies and their souls,
As they acknowledge or gainsay the light
I show them,—shall I too lack courage?—
I leave
I, too, the post of me, like those I blame?
Refuse, with kindred inconsistency,
To grapple danger whereby souls grow strong?
I am near the end; but still not at the end;
All to the very end is trial in life:
At this stage is the trial of my soul
Danger to face, or danger to refuse?
Shall I dare try the doubt now, or not dare?

O Thou,—as represented here me to
Is each conception as my soul allows,—
Under Thy measureless, my atom width!—
Man's mind, what is it but a convex glass
Wherein are gathered all the scattered points
Picked out of the immensity of sky,
To concentrate there, be our heaven for earth,
Our known, unknown, our God revealed to man?
Exist somewhere, somehow, as a whole;
Here, as a whole proportioned to our sense,—
There, (which is nowhere, speech must babble thus!)
In the absolute immensity, the whole

Appreciable solely by Thyself,—
Here, by the little mind of man, reduced
To littleness that suits his faculty,
In the degree appreciable too;
Between Thee and ourselves—nay even, again,
Below us, to the extreme of the minute,
Appreciable by how many and what diverse Modes of the life Thou madest be I (why live Except for love,—how love unless they know?)
Each of them, on reaching to the edge,
Insect or angel, his just length and breadth,
Due facet of reflection,—full, no less,
Angel or insect, as Thou framedst things,
I it is who have been appointed here
To represent Thee, in my turn, on earth,
Just as, if new philosophy know aught,
This one earth, out of all the multitude
Of peoples worlds, as stars are now supposed,—
Was chosen, and no sun-star of the swarm,
For stage and scene of Thy transcendent act
Beside which even the creation fades
Into a puny exercise of power.
Choice of the world, choice of the thing I am,
Both emanate alike from Thy dread play
Of operation outside this our sphere
Where things are classed and counted small or great,— Incomprehensibly the choice is Thine!
I therefore bow my head and take Thy place.
There is, beside the works, a tale of Thee
In the world's mouth, which I find credible:
I love it with my heart: unsatisfied,
I try it with my reason, nor discept
From any point I probe and pronounce sound.
Mind is not matter nor from matter, but Above,—leave matter then, proceed with mind!
Man's be the mind recognized at the height,—
Leave the inferior minds and look at man!
Is he the strong, intelligent and good
Up to his own conceivable height? Nowise.
Enough o' the low,—soar the conceivable height,
Find cause to match the effect in evidence,
The work i' the world, not man's but God's;
leave man!
Conjecture of the worker by the work:
Is there strength there?—enough: intelligence?
Ample: but goodness in a like degree?
Not to the human eye in the present state,
An isosceles deficient in the base.
What lacks, then, of perfection fit for God
But just the instance which this tale supplies
Of love without a limit? So is strength,
So is intelligence; let love be so;
Unlimited in its self-sacrifice,
The end is the tale true and God shows complete.
Beyond the tale, I reach into the dark,
Feel what I cannot see, and still faith stands:
I can believe this dread machinery
Of sin and sorrow, would confound me else,
Devised — all pain, at most expenditure
Of pain by Who devised pain — to evolve,
By new machinery in counterpart,
The moral qualities of man — how else?—
To make him love in turn and be beloved,
Creative and self-sacrificing too,
And thus eventually God-like, (ay,
"I have said ye are Gods,"—shall it be said for naught?)
Enable man to wring, from out all pain,
All pleasure for a common heritage
To all eternity: this may be surmised,
The other is revealed,—whether a fact,
Absolute, abstract, independent truth,
History not reduced to some man's mind,—
Or only truth reverberate, changed, made pass
A spectrum into mind, the narrow eye,—
The same and not the same, else unconceived—
Though quite conceivable to the next grade
Above it in intelligence,—as truth
Easy to man were blindness to the beast
By parity of procedure,—the same truth
In a new form, but changed in either case:
What matter so intelligence be filled?
To a child, the sea is angry, for it roars:
Frost bites, else why the tooth-like fret on face?
Man makes acoustics deal with the sea's wrath,
Explains the choppy cheek by omen law,—
To man and child remains the same effect
On drum of ear and root of nose, change cause
Never a thorough: so my heart be struck,
What care I,—by God's grieved hand or the bare?
Nor do I much perplex me with aught hard,
Doubious in the transmitting of the tale,—
No, nor with certain riddles set to solve.
This is training and a passage: pass,—
Still, we march over some flat obstacle
We made give way before us; solid truth
In front of it, what motion for the world?
The moral sense grows but by exercises.
'Tis even as man grew progressively Initiated in Godship, set to make
A fairer moral world than this he finds,
Guess now what shall be known hereafter.
Deal
Thus with the present problem: as we see,
A faultless creature is destroy'd, and sin
Has had its way i' the world where God should rule.
Ay, but for this irrelevant circumstance
Of inquisition after blood, we see
Pompilia lost and Guido saved: how long?
For his whole life: how much is that whole life?
We are not babes, but know the minute's worth,
And feel that life is large and the world small,
So, wait till life have passed from out the world.
Neither does this astonish at the end,
That whereas I can so receive and trust,
Other men, made with hearts and souls the same
Reject and disbelieve,—subordinate
The future to the present,—sin, nor fear.
This I refer still to the foremost fact.
Life is probation and the earth no goal
But starting-point of man: compel him strive,
Which means, in man, as good as reach the goal,—
Why institute that race, his life, at all?

But this does overwhelm me with surprise,
Touch me to terror,—not that faith, the pearl,
Should yet let lie by fishers wanting food,—
Nor, seen and handled by a certain few
Critical and contemptuous, straight consigned
To shore and shingle for the pebble it proves,—
But that, when haply found and known named
By the residue made rich for evermore,
These,—that these favored ones, should a trice
Turn, and with double zest go dredge for wheals,
Mud—worms that make the savory soup?
Enough
O' the disbelievers, see the faithful few!
How do the Christians here deport them, keep
Their robes of white unspotted by the world?
What is this Aristeus Archbishop, this Man under me as I am under God,
This champion of the faith, I armed and decked,
Pushed forward, put upon a pinnacle,
To show the enemy his victor,—see!—
What's the best fighting when the couple
Pompilia cries, "Protect me from the wolf!"—
He—"No, thy Guido is rough, heady, strong,
Dangerous to disquiet: let him ride! He needs some bone to mumble, help amass
The darkness of his den with: so, the fawn Whose leaps up bleeding to my foot and lies,
—Come to me, daughter!—thus I threw his back!"

Have we misjudged here, over-armed our knight,
Given gold and silk where plain hard steel Serves best.
Enfeebled whom we sought to fortify,
Made an archbishop and undone a saint?
Well, then, descend these heights, this pride of life,
Sit in the ashes with a barefoot monk
Who long ago stamped out the worldly sparks
By fasting, watching, stone cell and wise Source.
—No such indulgence as unknits the strength—
These breed the tight nerve and tough muscle.
And the world's praise or blame runs rilletwise
Off the broad back and brawny breast, we know!
He meets the first cold sprinkle of the world,
And shudders to the narrow. "Save this child! Oh, my superiors, oh, the Archbishop's self!
Who was it dared lay hand upon the ark
His betters saw fall nor put finger forth?
Great ones could help yet help not: why should small?
I break my promise: let her break her heart!"
These are the Christians not the worldlings, not
The sceptics, who thus battle for the faith!
If foolish virgins disobey and sleep,
What wonder? But, this time, the wise that watch.
Sell lamps and buy lutes, exchange oil for wine,
The mystic Spouse betrays the Bridegroom here.
To our last resource, then! Since all flesh is weak,
Bind weaknesses together, we get strength:
The individual weighed, found wanting, try
Some institution, honest structure
Whereby the units grow compact and firm!
Each prop the other, and so stand is made
By our embodied cowards that grow brave.
The Monastery called of Convertites,
Meant to help women because these helped men.

A thing existent only while it acts,
Does as designed, else a momentary
For what is an idea unrealized? —
Pomphilia is consigned to these for help.
They do help: they are prompt to testify
To her pure life and saintly dying days.
She dies, and lo, who seemed so poor, proves rich!

What does the body that lives through helplessness
To wrongs for Christ's sake? The kiss turns bite.
The dove's note changes to the crow's cry: judge!
"Seeing that this our Convict claims of right
What goods belong to those we succour, be
The same proved women of dishonest life, —
And seeing that this Trial made appear
Pomphilia was in such predicament, —
The Convent hereupon pretends to say
Succession of Pomphilia, issues writ,
And takes possession by the Pisc's advice."
Such is Christ attestation to the cause
Of Christ, who had one saint at least, they hoped:
But, is a title-deed to filch, a corpse
To slander, and an infant-heir to cheat?
Christ must give up his gains then! They unsay
All the fine speaking — who was saint is whore.
Why, scripture yields no parallel for this!
The soldiers only threw dice for Christ's coat;
We want another legend of the Twelve
Disputing if it was Christ's coat at all.
Claiming as prize the woof of price — for why?
The Master was a thief, purloined the same,
Or paid for it out of the common bag!
Can it be this is end and outcome, all
I take with me to show as stewardship's fruit,
The best yield of the latest time, this year
The seventeen-hundredth since God died for man?
Is such effect proportionate to cause?
And still the terror keeps on the increase
When I perceive — how can I blink the fact,
That the fault, the obduracy to good,
Lies not with the impracticable stuff
Whence man is made, his very nature's fault,
As if it were of ice the moon may gild
Not melt, or stone 't was meant the sun should warm
Not melt, but bear flowers, — nor ice nor stone to blame:
But it can melt, that ice, can bloom, that stone,
Impossible to rule of day and night!
This terrifies me, thus compelled perceive,
Whatever love and faith we looked should spring
At advent of the authoritative star,
Which yet lie sluggish, curdled at the source, —
These have leapt forth profusely in old time,
These still respond with promptitude to-day,
At challenge of — what unacknowledged powers
O' the air, what uncommissioned meteors,
Warmth
By law, and light by rule should supersede?
For see this priest, this Caponacashi, stung
At the first summons, — "Help for honor's sake,
Play the man, pity the oppressed!" — no pause,
How does he lay about him in the midst,
Strike any foe, right wrong at any risk,
All blindness, bravery and obedience! — blind?
Ay, as a man would be inside the sun,
Dolphins with the plenitude of light
Should interfere him to the finger-ends—
Let him rush straight, and how shall he go wrong?

Where are the Christians in their panoply?
The lions we girt about with truth, the breasts
Righteousnesses plated round, the shield of faith,
The helmet of salvation, and that sword
O' the Spirit, even the word of God, — where these?
Slunk into corners! Oh, I hear at once
Hubbub of protestation! "What, we monks,
We friers, of such an order, such a rule,
Have not we fought, bled, left our martyr-mark
At every point along the boundary-line
'Twixt true and false, religion and the world,
Where this or the other dogmas of our Church
Called for defence?" And I, despite myself,
How can I but speak loud what truth speaks low,
"Or better than the best, or nothing serves!
What boots deed, I can cap and cover straight
With such another doughiness to match,
Done at an instant of the natural man?" —
Immolate body, sacrosens soul too,
Do not these publicans the same? Outstrip!
Or else stop race you boast runs neck and neck,
You with the wings, they with the feet, — for shame!
Oh, I remark your diligence and zeal!
Five years long, now, rounds faith into my ears,
"Help thou, or Christendom is done to death!"
Five years since, in the Province of To-kien
Which is in China as some people know,
Maigrot, my Vicar Apostolic there,
Having a great qualm, issues a decree.
Alack, the converts use as God's name, not
Tien-chu but plain Tien or else mere Shang-ti,
As Jesuits please to fancy polite,
While, say Dominican, it calls down fire, —
For Tien means heaven, and Shang-ti, supreme prince,
While Tien-chu means the lord of heaven: all cry.
"There is no business urgent for dispatch
As that thou send a legate, specially
Cardinal Tournon, straight to Pekin, there
To settle and compose the differences!"
So have I seen a potentate all fume
For some infringement of his realm's just right,
Some menace to a mud-built straw-thatched farm
O' the frontier; while inside the mainland lie,
Quite undisputed—fore in solitude,
Whole cities plague may waste or famine sap:
What if the sun crumble, the sands encroach,
While he looks on sublime at his ease?
How does their ruin touch the empire’s bound?
And is this little all that was to be?
Where is the gloriously-decisive change,
Metamorphosis the immeasurable
Of human clay to divine gold, we looked
Should, in some poor sort, justify its price?
Had an adept of the mere Rosy Cross
Spent his life to consummate the Great Work,
Would not we start to see the stuff it touched Yield not a grain more than the vulgar got
By the old smelting-process years ago?
If this were sad to see in just the sage
Who should profess so much, perform no more.
What is it when suspected in that Power
Who undertook to make and made the world,
Devised and did effect man, body and soul,
Ordained salvation for them both, and yet...
Well, is the thing we see, salvation?

Put no such dreadful question to myself,
Within whose circle of experience burns
The central truth, Power, Wisdom, Goodness—God,
I must outlive a thing are know it dead:
When I outlive the faith there is a sun,
When I live, ashes to the very soul,—
Some day, not I, must walk above the heap,
"He died in dark whence never morn arose."
While I see day succeed the deepest night—
How can I speak but as I know?—my speech
Must be, throughout the darkness, "It will

The light that did burn, will burn!" Clouds obscure—
But for which obscuration all were bright?
Too hastily concluded! Sun-suffused,
A cloud may soothe the eye made blind by

Better the very clarity of heaven:
The soft streaks are beautiful and dear.
What but the weakness in a faith supplies
The incentive to humanity, no strength
Absolute, irresistible, comports?
How can man love but what he yearns to help?
And that which men think weakness within strength,
But angels know for strength and stronger
yet—
What were it else but the first things made new,
But repetition of the miracle,
The divine instance of self-sacrifice
That never ends and aye begins for man?
So, never I miss footing in the maze.
No,—I have light nor fear the dark at all.

But are mankind not real, who pace outside
My petty circle, world that’s measured me?
And when they stumble even as I stand,
Have I a right to stop ear when they cry,
As they were phantoms who took clouds for Tripped and fell, where man’s march might safely move?

Beside, the cry is other than a ghost’s,
When out of the old time there pleads sees Philosopher, or both, and—whispers not,
But words it boldly. "The inward work is worth
Of any mind, what other mind may judge
Save God only knows the thing he made.
The veritable service he exacts?
It is the outward product men appraise.
Behold, an engine hoists a tower aloft:
"I looked that it should move the mountains
too!
Or else? Had just a turret toppled down,
Success enough!"—may say the Machinist
Who knows what less or more result might be:
But we, who see that done we cannot do,
"A feat beyond man’s force," we men must say.
Regard me and that shake I gave the world!
I was born, not so long before Christ’s birth
As Christ’s birth haply did precede thy day,—
But many a watch before the star of dawn:
Therefore I lived,—it is thy creed affirms,
Pope Innocent, who art to answer me!—

Under conditions, nowise to escape,
Wherewith salvation was impossible.
Each impulse to achieve the good and fair,
Each aspiration to the pure and true,
Being without a warrant or an aim,
Was just as sterile a felicity
As if the insect, born to spend his life
Scorning his circles, stopped them to describe (Painfully motionless in the mid-air)
Some word of weighty counsel for man’s sae.
Some 'Know thyself!' or 'Take the golden
mean!'
For what his happy dance and the glad ray,
Died half an hour the sooner and was dust.
I, born to perish like the brutes, or worse,
Why not live brutishly, obey brutes' law?
But I, of body as of soul complete,
A gymnast at the games, philosopher

The mind, who painted, and made men.
—all

Glories that met upon the tragic stage
When the Third Poet’s tread surprised the

Two,—
Whose lot fell in a land where life was great
And sense went free and beauty lay profuse,
I, untouched by one adverse circumstance,
Adopted virtue as my rule of life,
Waived all reward, loved but for loving’s sake.
And, what my heart taught me, I taught the

And have been teaching now two thousand years.
Witness my work,—plays that should please,
foresort! "They might please, they may displease, they shall teach,
For truth’s sake," so I said, and did, and do.
Five hundred years are Paul spoke, Felix heard,—

How much of temperance and righteousness
Judgment to come, did I find reason for.
Corroborate with my strong style that spared
No sin, nor swerved the more from branding
brow.
Because the sinner was called Zeus and God?
How nearly did I guess at that Paul knew?
How closely, in what I represent
As duty, to his doctrine yet a blank?
And as that limner not untruthly limns
Who draws an object round or square, which

square
Or round seems to the unassisted eye,
Though Galileo's tube display the same
Oval or oblong, — so, who controverts
I rendered rightly what proved wrongly wrought

Beside Paul's picture? Mine was true for me.
I saw that there are, first and above all,
The hidden forces, blind necessities,
Named Nature, but the thing's self unconceived:

Then follow — how dependent upon these,
We know not, how imposed above ourselves,
We would know — what I name the gods, a power

Various or one: for great and strong and good
Is there, and little, weak and bad there too,
Wisdom and folly: say, these make no God, —

What is it else that rules outside man's self?
A fact then, — always, to the naked eye, —
And so, the one revelation possible
Of what were unimagined else by man.
Therefore, what gods do, man may criticise,
Applaud, condemn, — how should he fear the

truth? —
But likewise we have in awe because of power,
Venerate for the main munificence,
And give the doubtful deed its due excuse
From the acknowledged creature of a day
To the Eternal and Divine. Thus, bold
Yet self-mistrusting, should man bear himself,
Most assured on what now concerns him most

The law of his own life, the path he prints, —

Which law is virtue and not vice, I say, —

And least inquisitive where search least skills,
I' the nature we best give the clouds to keep,
What could I paint beyond a scheme like this

Out of the fragmentary truths where light

Lay fitful in a tenable time?
You have the sunrise now, joins truth to truth,
Shoots life and substance into death and void;
Themselves compose the whole we made before:

The forces and necessity grow God. —

The beings so contrarious that seemed gods,
Prove just his operation manifold
And multifirm, translated, as must be,
Into intelligible shape so far

As suits our sense and sets us free to feel.
What if I let a child think, childhood-long,
That Lightning, I would have him spare his eye,
Is a real arrow shot at naked orb?
The man knows more, but shuts his lids the

same:
Lightning's cause comprehends nor man nor child.

Why then, my scheme, your better knowledge
Presently readjusts itself, the small Proportioned largelier, parts and whole named
new:
So much, no more two thousand years have done!
Pope, dost thou dare pretend to punish me,
For not desiring sunshine at midnight,
Me who creep all-fours, found my way so far —

While thou rewardest teachers of the truth,
Who miss the plain way in the blaze of noon, —

Though just a word from that strong style of
mine,
Grasped honestly in hand as guiding-staff,
Had pricked them a sure path across the bog,
That mire of cowardice and slugh of lies
Wherein I find them wallow in wide day! "

How should I answer this Euripides?
Paul — 't is a legend — answered Seneca,
But that was in the day-springs; noon is now,
We have got too familiar with the light.
Shall I wish back once more that thrill of dawn?

When the whole truth-touched man burned up,
one fire? —

— Assured the trial, fiery, fierce, but fleet,
Would, from his little heap of ashes, lend
Wings to that conflagration of the world
Which Christ awaits ere he makes all things

now:
So should the frail become the perfect, rapt
From glory of pain to glory of joy; and so,

Even in the end, — the act renouncing earth,
Lands, houses, husbands, wives and children
here,
Begin that other act which finds all, lost
Regained, in this time even, a hundredfold,
And, in the next time, feels the finite love
Blent and embalmed with the eternal life.
So does the sun ghastly seem to sink
In those north parts, lean all but out of life,
Desist a dread more breathing-still, then slow
Re-assert day, begin the endless morn
Was this too easy for our after-stage?
Was such a lighting-up of faith, in life,

Only allowed initiate, set man's step
In the true way by help of the great glow?
A way wherein it is ordained he walk,
Bearing to see the light from heaven still more

And more encroached on by the light of earth,
Tentatives earth puts forth to rival heaven,
Earthly insinuations that mankind serve God
For man's sole sake, not God's and therefore man's.

Till at last, who distinguishes the sun
From a mere Druid fire on a far mount?
More praise to him who with his subtle prism
Shall decompose both beams and name the true.
In such sense, who is last proves first indeed;
For how could saints and martyrs fail see

truth

Streak the night's blackness? Who is faithful

now,

Who untwists heaven's white from the yellow flare

O' the world's gross torch, without night's foil that helped

Produce the Christian act so possible
When in the way stood Nero's cross and stake, —

So hard now when the world smiles ' "Right and

wise!
Faith points the politic, the thrifty way,
Will make who plods it in the end returns
Beyond mere fool's sport and improvidence.
We fools dance through the cornfield of this
Life,
Pluck ears to left and right and swallow raw,
— Nay, tread, at pleasure, a sheaf underfoot,
To get the better at some poppy-flower,
Well aware we shall have so much less wheat
In the eventual harvest: you meantime
Waste not a spike,— the richlier will you reap!
What then? There will be always garnered Meal
Sufficient for our comfortable loaf,
While you enjoy the undiminisheed sack!’
Is it not this ignoble confidence,
Cowardly hardness, that dulls and damps,
Makes the old heroism impossible?

Unless... what whispers me of times to come?
What if it be the mission of that age
My death will usher into life, to shake
This torpor of assurance from our creed,
Reintroduce the doubt discarded, bring
The formidable danger back, wrappreweeve
Long ago to the distance and the dark?
No wild boast now prows round the infant
Camp:
We have built wall and sleep in city safe:
But if some earthquake try the towers that laugh.
To think they once saw lions rule outside,
And man stand out again, pale, resolute,
Prepared to die,— which means, alive at last?
As we broke up that old faith of the world,
Have we, next age, to break up this the new — Faith, in the thing, grown faith in the report—
Whence need to bravely disbelieve report
Through increased faith? I’ the thing reports be lie?

Must we deny,— do they, these Molinists,
At peril of their body and their soul,—
Recognized truths, obedient to some truth
Unrecognized yet, but perceptible? —
Correct the portrait by the living face,
Man’s God, by God’s in the mind of man?
Then, for the few that rise to the new height,
The many that must sink to the old depth,
The multitude found fall away! A few,
E’en ere new laws speak clear, may keep the old,
Preserve the Christian level, call good good
And evil evil, (even though razed and blank
The old titles,) helped by custom, habitude,
And all else they mistake for finer sense
O’ the fact that reason warrants,— as before.
They hope perhaps, fear not impossibly.
At least some one Pomplia left the world
With say: ‘I know the right place by foot’s feel,
I took it and tread firm there; wherefore change’?

But what a multitude will surely fall
Quite through the crumbling truth, late sub stance
Sink to the next discoverable base,
Rest upon human nature, settle there
On what is firm, the lust and pride of life!
A mass of men, whose very souls even now

Seem to need re-crowning,— so they slink
Worm-like into the mud, light now lay bare,
Whose future we dispose of with shut eyes
And whisper—"They are grated, barren
twigs,
Into the living stock of Christ: may bear
One day, till when they die death-like, not dead." —
Those who with all the aid of Christ succumb.
How, without Christ, shall they, unsaid,
sink?
Whither but to this gulf before my eyes?
Do not we end, the century and I?
The impetent antimasque treads close on kite
O’ the very masque’s self it will mock,— as me,
Last lingering personage, the impotent mime
Puslies already,— will I block the way?
Will my slow trail of garments no more leave space
For pantaloons,sock,plume and castanet?
Here comes the first experimental
In the new order of things,— he plays a priest;
Does he take inspiration from the Church,
Directly make her rule his law of life?
Not he: his own mere impulse guides the man—
Happily sometimes, since ourselves allow
He has come, in gravity of heart, i’ the main
The right step through the maze we bade his foot.
But if his heart had prompted him break lose
And mar the measure? Why, we must sub mit,
And then the chance that brought him safe so far.
Will he repeat the prodigy? Perhaps.
Can he teach others how to quit themselves,
Show why this step was right while that were wrong?
How should he? "Ask your hearts as I asked mine,
And get discreetly through the morrice too;
If your hearts misdirect you,— quit the stage.
And make amends,— be there amends to make!"
Such is, for the Augustin that was once,
This Canon Caponaccachi we see now.
"But my heart answers to another tune,"
Put in the Abate, second in the suite;
"I have my taste too, and tread no such step!
You choose the glorious life, and may, for me!
I like the lowest of life’s appetizes.
So you judge,— but the very truth of joy
To my own apprehension which decides.
Call me knave and you get yourself called fool!
I live for greed, ambition, lust, revenge;
Attain these ends by force, guile: hypocrites.
To-day perchance to-morrow recognized
The rational man, the type of common sense."
There’s Loyola adapted to our time!
Under God’s guidance Guido plays his part.
He also influencing in the din turns
These last elods where I track intelligence
By any glimmer, these four at his beck
Ready to murder any, and, at their own,
As ready to murder him,—such make the
world!
And, first effect of the new cause of things,
There they lie also duly,—the old pair
Of the weak head and not so wicked heart,
With the one Christ as mother, wife, and girl,
—Which three gifts seem to make an angel
up,—
The world's first foot o' the dance is on their heads.
Still, I stand here, not off the stage though these
On the exit: and my last act, as my first,
I owe the scene, and Him who armed me thus
With Paul's sword as with Peter's key. I smite
With my whole strength once more, ere end
my part,
Ending, so far as man may, this offence.
And when I raise my arm, who plucks my sleeve?
Who stops me in the righteous function,—foe
Or friend? Oh, still as ever, friends are they
Who, in the interest of outraged truth
Deprecate such rough handling of a lie!
The facts being proved and incontestable,
What is the last word I must listen to?
Perchance,—"Spare yet a term this barren stock,
We pray thee dig about and dung and dress
Till he repent and bring forth fruit even yet!"
Perchance,—"So poor and swift a punishment
Shall throw him out of life with all that sin:
Let mercy rather pile up pain on pain
Till the flesh expiate what the soul pays else!"
Nowise! Remonstrants on each side commerce
Instructing, there's a new tribunal now
Higher than God's,—the educated man's!
Nice sense of honor in the human breast
Supersedes here the old coarse oracle
Confirming none the less a point or so
Wherein blind predecessors worked aight.
By rule of thumb: as when Christ said,— when where?
Enough, I find it pleaded in a-place,—
"All other wrongs done, patiently I take:
But touch my honor and the case is changed!
I feel the due resentment, — semini
Honorem tradit o meus qui reliquisq.
Right of Him, just as if pronounced to-day!
Sell, should the old authority be mute
Or doubtful, or in speaking clash with new,
The younger takes permission to decide.
At last we have the instinct of the world
Ruling its household without tutelage:
And while the two laws, human and divine,
Have busied finger with this tangled case,
In pushses the brisk junior, cuts the knot,
 Pronounces for acquittal. How it trips
Silvery o'er the tongue!—Remit the death!
Forgive,... well, in the old way, if thou please,
Deceit and the relics of routine
Respected,—let the Count go free as air!
Since he may plead a priest's immunity,—
The minor orders help enough for that,
With Farinace's license,—who decides
That the mere implication of such man,
So privileged, in any cause, before
Whatever Court except the Spiritual,
Straight quashes law-procedure,—quash it,
then!
Remains a pretty loophole of escape
Moreover, that, beside the patent fact O' the law's allowance, there's involved the weak
O' the Popedom: a son's privilege at stake,
Thou wilt pretend the Church's interest,
Ignore all finer reasons to forgive!
But herein lies the crowning cogency—(LET thy friends teach thee while thou talkest beads)
That in this case the spirit of culture speaks,
Civilization is imperative.
To her shall we remand and delicate points
Henceforth, nor for the irregular advice
O' the aly, as heretofore: she used to hint
Remonstrances, when law was out of sorts
Because a saucy tongue was put to rest,
An eye that roved was cured of arrogance:
But why be forced to mumble under breath;
What soon shall be acknowledged as plain fact,
Outspoken, say, in thy successor's time?
Methinks we see the golden age return!
Civilization and the Emperor
Succeeded to Christianity and Pope.
One Emperor then, as one Pope now: meanwhile,
Anticipate a little! We tell thee: Take
Guido's life, sapped society shall crash,
Whereof the main prop was, is, and shall be
Supremacy of husband over wife!
Does the man rule the house, and may his mate
Because of any plea dispute the same?
Oh, pleas of all sorts shall abound, be sure,
One but allowed validity,—for, harsh
And savage, for, inept and silly-sooth.
For, this and that, will the ingenious sex
Demonstrate the best master e'er graced slave:
And there's but one short way to end the coil,—
Acknowledging right and reason steadily.
I' the man and master: then the wife submits
To plain truth broadly stated. Does the time
Advise we shift—a pillar? say, a stake
Out of its place it' the social teneiment?
One touch may send a shudder through the heap
And bring it toppling on our children's heads!
Moreover, if ours breed a qualm in thee,
Give thine own better feeling play for once!
Thou, whose own life winks o'er the socket-
edge,
Wouldest thou it went out in such ugly snuff
As doing sons dead, e'en though justice prompt?
Why, on a certain feast, Barabba's self
Was set free, not to cloud the general cheer:
Neither shalt thou pollute thy Sabbath close!
Mercy is safe and graceful. How one hears
The howl begin, scarce the three little taps
O' the silver mallet silent on thy brow,—
'His last act was to sacrifice a Count
And thereby screen a scandal of the Church!
Guido condemned, the Canon justified
Of course, — delinquents of his cloth go free!' And so the Luthers chuckle, Calvins scowl, So thy hand helps Molinos to the chair Whence he may hold forth till doom's day on just These petit-maitre priesthoods, — in the choir, Sanctus et Benedictus, with a brush Of soft guitar-strings that obey the thumb, Touched by the bedside, for accomplishment! Does this give umbrage to a husband? Death To the fool, and to the priest impurity! But no impunity to any friend So simply over-loyal as these four Who made religion of their patron's cause, Believed in him and did his bidding straight, Asked not one question but laid down the lives This Pope took, — all four lives together make Just his own length of days, — so, dead they lie, As these were times when loyalty's a drug, And zeal in a subordinate too cheap And common to be saved when we spend life! Come, 't is too much good breath we waste in words: The pardon, Holy Father! Spare grimace, Shrugs and reluctance! Are not we the world, Are not we Priam? let some culture plead Hecubine-like, ' nos tali! ' (Virgil serves) ' Auxilio,' and the rest! Enough, it works! The Pope relaxes, and the Prince is loth, The father's bowels yearn, the man's will bends, Reply is apt: Our tears on tremble, hearts Big with a benediction, wait the word Shall circulate through the city in a trio, Set every window flaring, give each man O' the mob his torch to wave for gratitude, Pronounce them, for our breath and patience fail!''

I will, Sirs: but a voice other than yours Quicken's my spirit. "Quis pro Domino? Who is upon the Lord's side?" asked the Count.

I, who write —

"On receipt of this command, Acquaint Count Guido and his fellows four They die to-morrow: could it be to-night, The better, but the work to do, takes time. Set with all diligence a scaffold up, Not in the customary place, by Bridge Saint Angelo, where die the common sort; But since the man is noble, and his peers By predestination haunt the People's Square, There let him be beheaded in the midst, And his companions hanged on either side: So shall the quality see, fear, and learn. All which work takes time: till to-morrow, then, Let there be prayer incessant for the five!"

For the main criminal I have no hope Except in such a suddenness of fate. I stood at Naples once, a night so dark I could have scarce conjectured there was earth Anywhere, sky or sea or world at all: But the night's black was burst through by a blaze —

Thunder struck blow on blow, earth ground and bore, Through her whole length of mountain visible: There lay the city thick and plain with spires, And, like a ghost disrob'd, white the sea. So may the truth be flashed out by one blow, And Guido see, one instant, and be saved. Else I aver my face, nor follow him Into that sad obscure sequestered state Where God unmakes but to remake the soul He else made first in vain; which must not be. Enough, for I may die this very night: And how should I dare die, this man let live?

Carry this forthwith to the Governor!

XI

GUIDO

You are the Cardinal Acciaioli, and you, Abate Panciatichi — two good Tuscan names: Acciaioli — ah, your ancestor it was Built the huge battlemented convent-block Over the little forky flashing Greve That takes the quick turn at the foot o' the hill Just as one first sees Florence: oh those days! 'Tis Emma, though, the other rivulet, The one-arched brown brick bridge yawns over. —

Gallop and go five minutes, and you gain The Roman Gate from where the Emma's bridged:

Kingfishers fly there: how I see the bend Overturreted by Certosa which he built, That Senescale (we styled him) of your House! I do adjure you, help me, Sirs! My blood Comes from as far a source: ought it to end This way, by leakage through their scaffold-planks Into Rome's sink where red refuse runs? Sirs, I bespeak you by blood-sympathy, If there be any vile experiment In the air, — if this your visit simply prove, When all's done, just a well-intentioned trick, That tires for truth truer than truth itself, By startling up a man, ere break of day, To tell him he must die at sunset, — pashaw! That man's a Franceschini; feel his pulse, Laugh at your folly, and let 's all go sleep! You have my last word, — innocent am I As Innocent my Pope and murderer, Innocent as a babe, as Mary's own, As Mary's self, — I said, say and repeat, — And why, then, should I die twelve hours hence? I —

Whom, not twelve hours ago, the jailer bade Turn to my straw-truss, settle and sleep sound That I might wake the sooner, prompter say His due of meat-and-drink-indulgence, cross His palm with fee of the good-hand, beside, As gallants use who go at large again! For why? All honest Rome approved my part; Whoever owned wife, sister, daughter, — nay, Mistress, — had any shadow of any right That looks like right, and, all the more resolved,
GUIDO

Held it with tooth and nail,—these manly men
Approved! I being for Rome, Rome was for me.
Then, there's the point reserved, the subterfuge
My lawyers held by, kept for last resource,
Firm should all else—the impossible fancy!—fail,
And sneaking bourgeois-spirit win the day.
The knaves! One plea at least would hold,—
The then lawyers to let my life alone,
One grappling-iron scratch the bottom-rock
Even should the middle mud let anchor go!
I hooked my cause on to the Clergy's,—plea
Which, if ever law tipped off my hat and plume,
Revealed my priestly tension, saved me so.
The Pope moreover, this old Incautery,
Being so meek and mild and merciful,
So fond o' the poor and so fatigued of earth,
So... fifty thousand devils in deepest hall!
Why must he curse us of our strange conceit
Of the angel in man's likeness, that we loved
And looked should help us at a pinch? He help?
He pardon? Here's his mind and message—death!
Thank the good Pope! Now, is he good in this,
Never mind, Christian,—no such stuff's extant,—
But will my death do credit to his reign,
Show he both lived and let live, so was good?
Cannot I live if he but like? "The Law!"
Why, just the law gives him the very chance,
The less he leave to let my life alone,
Which the archangelic soul of him (he says)
Years after! Here they drop it in his palm,
My lawyers, capital o' the cursed kind,—
Drop life to take and hold and keep: but no!
He sighs, shakes head, refuses to shut hand,
Muttering the grief they bid him grasp,
And of the coyness comes—that off I run
And down I go, he best knows whither I mind,
He knows, who sets me rolling all the same!
Disinterested Vicar of our Lord,
This way he abrogates and disallows,
Nullifies and ignores,—reverts in fine
To the good and right, in detriment of me!
Talk away! Will you have the naked truth?
He's sick of his life's supper,—swallowed lies:
So, hobbling bedward, needs must ease his maw
Just where I sit o' the doorkill. Sir Abate,
Can you do nothing? Friends, we used to frisk:
What of this sudden slash in a friend's face,
This cut across our good companionship
That showed its front so gay when both were young?
Were not we put into a beaten path,
Bid pace the world, we nobles born and bred,
We body of friends with each his 'outcheon full!
Of old achievement and impunity,—
Taking the laugh of morn and Sol's salute
As forth we fare, pricked on to breathe our steeds
And take equesrian sport over the green
Under the blue, across the crop,—what care?
If we went prancing up hill and down dale,
THE RING AND THE BOOK

Would brighten hall and streak its smoke with flame!
How the life I could shed yet never shrink,
Would drench their stalks with sap like grass
in May!
Is it not terrible, I entreat you, Sirs?
With manifold and plenitudinous life,
Prompt at death's menace to give blow for threat,
Answer his "Be thou not!" by "Thus I am!"
Terrible so to be alive yet die?

How I live, how I see! so, — how I speak!
Lucidity of soul unlocks the lips;
I never had the words at will before.
How I see all my folly at a glance!
"A man requires a woman and a wife:"
There was my folly; I believed the saw.
I knew that just myself concerned myself,
Yet needs must look for real next to lack,
In a woman — why, the woman's in the man!
Fools are, how we learn things when too late!

Overmuch life turns round my woman-side;
The male and female in me, mixed before,
Swell'd of a sudden: I'm my wife outright
In this unmanly appetite for truth,
This careless courage as to consequence,
This instantaneous sight through things and through,
This voluble rhetoric, if you please, — 'tis she!
Here be it have that Pompilia whom I slew,
Also the folly for which I slew her!

Fool!

And, fool-like, what is it I wander from?
What did I say of your sharp iron tooth?
Ah, — that I know the hateful thing I said.
I chanced to stroll forth, many a good year gone,

One warm Spring eve in Rome, and unaware
Looking, mayhap, to count what stars were out,
Came on your fine axe in a frame, that falls
And so cuts off a man's head underneath.
Mannias, — thus we made acquaintance first:
Out of the way, in a by-part o' the town,
At the Mouth-of-Truth o' the river-side, you know:

One goes by the Capitol: and wherefore coy,
Retiring out of crowded noisy Rome?
Because a very little time ago
It had done service, chopped off head from trunk,
Belonging to a fellow whose poor house
The thing must make a point to stand before.
Felicis Whatever-was-the-name
Who stabled buffaloes and so gained bread,
(Our cows unyoke them in the ground hard by.)

And, after use of much improper speech,
Had struck at Duke — Some-title-or-other's face,
Because he kidnapped, carried away and kept
Felicis's sister who would sit and sing
I' the filthy doorway while she plaited fringe
To deck the brutes with, — on their gear it go:

The good girl with the velvet in her voice.
So did the Duke, so did Felice, so

Did Justice, intervening with her axe.
There the man-mutilating engine stood
At ease, both gay and grim, like a Swiss guard
Off duty — purified itself as well,
Getting dry, sweet and proper for next week, —
And doing incidental good, 'twas hoped
To the rough lesson-lacking populace
Who now and then, forsooth, must right their wrongs!
There stood the twelve-foot-square of scaffold, railed
Considerately round to elbow-height,
For fear an officer should tumble thence
And sprawl his ankle and be lame a month,
Through starting when the axe fell and head too!

Railed likewise were the steps whereby 'twas reached.
All of it painted red: red, in the midst,
Ran up two narrow tall beams barred across
Since from the summit, some twelve feet to reach.
The iron plate with the sharp shearing edge
Had slammed, jerked, shot, alit, — I shall soon find which!
And so lay quiet, fast in its fit place.
The wooden half-moon collar, now eclipsed
By the blade which blocked its curvature: apart,
The other half, — the under half-moon board
Which, helped by this, completes a neck's embrace,
Joined to a sort of desk that wheels aside
Out of the way when done with, — down you kneel,
In you 're pushed, over you the other drops.
Tight you 're clipped, whiz, there 's the blade cleaves its best,
Out trundles body, down flops head on floor,
And where's your soul gone? That, too, I shall find!

This kneeling-place was red, red, never fear!
But only slimy-like with paint, not blood,
For why? a decent pitcher stood at hand,
A broad dish to hold sawdust, and a broom
By some unnamed utensil, — scraper-rake,—
Each with a conscious air of duty done.
Underneath, loungers, — boys and some few men,
Discoursed this platter, named the other tool
Just as, when groomies take up and dress a steed,
Boys lounge and look on, and embellish
What the round brush is used for, what the square,
So was explained — to me the skill-less then —
The manner of the grooming for next world
Undergone by Felice What's-his-name.
There's no such lovely month in Rome as May —

May's crescent is no half-moon of red placard,
And came now tilting o'er the wave! 't the west
One greenish-golden sea, right 'twixt those bars
Of the engine — I began acquaintance with,
Understood, hated, hurried from before,
To have it out of sight and cleanse my soul!
Here it is all again, conserved for use:
Twelve hours hence, I may know more, not hate worse.
That young May-moon-month! Devils of the deep!
Was not a Pope then Pope as much as now?
used not he chirrup o'er the Merry Tales,
Chuckled, — his nephew so exact the wag
To play a jealous collusen such a trick
As wise the wife i' the pleasant story! Well?
Why do things change? Wherefore is Rome now bolsom?
I tell you, ere Felice's corpse was cold,
The Duke, that night, threw wide his palace-rooms,
Received the compliments o' the quality.
For justice done him, — bowed and smirked his best.
And in return passed round a pretty thing,
A portrait of Felice's sister's self,
Florid old rogue Albano's masterpiece,
As — better than virginity in rags—
Bouncing Europe on the back o' the bull:
They laughed and took their road the safer home.
Ah, but times change, there's quite another Pope,
I do the Duke's deed, take Felice's place,
And, being Felice, tout and clout.
Stomach but ill the phrase, "I lose my head!"
How ephemeristic! Lose what? Lose your ring,
Your snuff-box, tablets, kerchief! — but, your head?
I learnt the process at an early age;
"I was a usual knowledge, in those same old days,
To know the way a head is set on neck.
My fencing-master urged, "Would you excel? Rest not content with mere bold give-and-take,
Nor punk the antagonist somehow anyhow! See me dissect a little, and know your game!
Only anatomy makes a thrust the thing."
Oh, Cardinal, those lithe live necks of ours!
Here go the vertebrae, here's Atlas, here Axis, and here the symphyses stop short,
So wisely and well, — as, o'er a corpse, we cant,
And here's the silver cord which . . . what's our word?
Depends from the gold bowl, which loosed (not lost?)
Let's us from heaven to hell, — one chop, we're loose!
"And not much pain i' the process," quoth a sage:
Who told him? Not Felice's ghost, I think! Such "loosing" is scarce Mother Nature's mode.
She fain would have cord ease itself away,
Worn to a thread by threescore years and ten,
Snap while we slumber: that seems bearable.
I'm told one clot of blood extravastrate
Ends once as certainly as Roland's sword.
— One drop of lymph suffused proves Oliver's mace,
Intruding, either of the pleasant pair,
On the archnoid tunic of my brain.
That's Nature's way of losing cord! — but Art
How of Art's process with the engine here,
When bowl and cord alike are crushed across,
Bored between, bruised through? Why, if Figon's self,
The French Court's pride, that famed practitioner,
Would pass his cold pale lightning of a knife,
Pistoia-ware, adroitly twisted joint and joint,
With just a "See haw facile, gentilfolk!" —
The thing were not so bad to bear! Brute force
Cuts as he comes, breaks in, breaks on, breaks out.
O' the hard and soft; of you: is that the same?
A little snake thrids the hedge, makes throb no leaf:
A heavy ox sets chest, to brier and branch,
Bursts somehow through, and leaves one hideous hole
Behind him!

And why, why must this needs be?
Oh, if men were but good! They are not good,
Nowise like Peter: people called him rough,
But if, as I left Rome, I spoke the Saint,
"Petrus, quo vadis?" — doubtless, I should hear,
"To free the prisoner and forgive his fault!
I plucked the absolute dead from God's own bar,
And raised up Doreas, — why not rescue thee?"
What would cost or such nullifying word?
If Innocent succeed to Peter's place,
Let him think Peter's thought, speak Peter's speech!
I say, he is bound to it: friends, how say you? Conceive I be all one bloodgutliness and mystery of murder in the flesh,
Why should that fact keep the Pope's mouth shut fast?
He excoriat my crime, — good! — see bell yawn
One inch from the red plank's end which I press,—
Nothing is better! What's the consequence?
How should a Pope proceed that knows his one?
Why, leave me linger out my minute here,
Since bale on death comes judgment and comes doom,
Not crib at dawn its pittance from a sheep
destined ere dewfall to be butcher's-meat!
Think, Sirs, if I have done you any harm,
And you require the natural revenge,
Suppose, and so intend to poison me,
— Just as you take and slip into my draught
The papertuf of powder that clears scores,
You notice on my brow a certain blue:
How you both overset the wine at once!
How you both smile, "Our enemy has the plague!"
Twelve hours hence he'll be scraping his bones bare,
Of that intolerable flesh, and die,
Frenzied with pain: no need for poison here!
Step aside and enjoy the spectacle!"
Tender for souls are you, Pope Innocent!
Christ's maxim is — one soul outweighs the world!
Respite me, save a soul, then, curse the world!
"No," venerable sire, I hear you smirk,
"No: for Christ’s gospel changes names, not things,
Renews the obsolete, does nothing more!
Our fire-new gospel is re-tinted law,
Our mercy, justice,—Jo’ve’s rechristened God,—
Nay, whereas, in the popular conceit,
’Tis pity that old harsh Law somehow limpns,
Lingers on earth, although! Law’s day be done,
Else would benignant Gospel interpose,
Not furtively as now, but bold and frank
O’erflutted with healing in her wings,
Law being harshness, Gospel only love—
We tell the people, on the contrary,
Gospel takes up the rod which Law lets fall;
Mercy is vigilant when justice sleeps!
Does Law permit a taste of Gospel-grace?
The secular arm allows the spiritual power
To act for once—a base compliment so fine
As that our Gospel blandly turn harsh,
Thrust victim back on Law the nice and coy!—
Yes, you do say so,—also you would forgive
Me, whom Law does not touch but tosses you!
Don’t think to put on the professional face!
You know not what I know! I cannaists as you are,
Each nerve must creep, each hair start, sting
and stand,
At such illogical inconsequence!
Dear my friends, do but see! A murder’s tried!
There are two parties to the cause: I’m one,— —Defend myself, as somebody must do:
I have the best o’ the battle: that’s a fact,
Simple fact,—fancies had no place just now.
What though half Rome condemned me? Half approved
And, nay, disputes, the luck is mine at last,
All Rome, i’ the main, acquitting me: whereon,
What has the Pope to ask but “How finds
Law?”
"I find," replies Law, "I have erred this while:
Guilty or guiltless, Ghristo proves a priest.
No layman he is therefore yours, not mine:
I bound him: loose him, you whose will is Christ’s!"
And now what does this Vicar of our Lord,
Shepherd o’ the flock,—one of whose charge
bleats sore
For crook’s help from the quag wherein it drowns?
Law suffers him employ the crumpled end:
His pleasure is to turn staff, use the point,
And thrust the shuddering sheep, he calls a wolf,
Back and back, down and down to where hell grapes!
"Guiltless," cries Law—"Guilty," corrects
the Pope!
"Guilty," for the whim’s sake! "Guilty," he sometimes thinks,
And anyhow says: "It’s truth; he dares not lie!
Others should do the lying. That’s the cause
Brings you both here: I ought in decency
Confess to you that I deserve my fate,
Am guilty, as the Pope thinks,—ay, to the end,
Keep up the jest, lie on, lie ever, lie
I’m the latest gasp of me! What reason, Sin?
Because to-morrow will succeed to-day,
For you, though not for me; and if I stick
Still to the truth, declare with my last breath,
I die an innocent and murdered man,—
Why, there’s the tongue of Rome will vest
space
This thin to-morrow,—don’t I hear the talk!
"So, to the last he proved impotent!
Pagans have said so much of martyrred saints!
Law demurred, washed her hands of the whole case.
Princes Somebody said this, Duke Something
that,
Doubtless the man’s dead, dead enough, don’t fear!
But, hang it, what if there have been a spies,
A touch of... eh? You see, the Pope’s so
old,
Some of us add, obtain,—age never slips
The chance of shoving youth to face death first!"
And so on. Therefore to suppress such talk
You two come here, entreat I tell you lies,
And end the edifying way. I end,
Telling the truth! Your self-styled shepherd thieves!
A thief,—and how thieves hate the wolves we
know:
Damage to theft, damage to thrift, all’s one!
The red hand is sworn foe of the black jaw.
That’s only natural, that’s right enough:
But why the wolf should compliment the thief
With shepherd’s title, bark out life in thanks,
And, spiteless, lick the prong that spits him—
eh,
Cardinals? My Abate, scarceply thus!
There, let my sheepskin-garbo, a curse on ‘t, go—
Leave my teeth free if I must show my shag!
Repent? What good shall follow? If I pass
Twelve hours repenting, will that fact hold fast
The thirteenth at the horrid dozen’s end?
If I fall forthwith at your feet, gaash, tear,
Foam, crave, to give your story the due grace.
Will that assist the engine half-way back
Into its hiding-house?—boards, shaking now,
Bone against bone, like some old skeleton
That wants, at winter’s end, to wake and pray!
Will howling put the spectre back to sleep?
Ah, but I misconceive your object, Sirs!
Since I want new life like the creature,—life
Being done with here, begins i’ the world away:
I shall next have “Come, mortals, and be judged!”
There’s but a minute betwixt this and then:
So, quick, be sorry since it saves my soul!
Sirs, truth shall save it, since no lies assist!
Hear the truth, you, whatever you style your solves,
Civilization and society!
Come, one good grapple, I with all the world!
Dying in cold blood is the desperate thing:
The angry heart explodes, bears off in blaze
The icy traitor soul, and I’m combustion-craze.
Why, you intend to do your worst with me!
That’s in your eyes! You dare no more than
death,
And mean no less. I must make up my mind!
So Pietro — when I chased him here and there,
Morsel by morsel cut away the life
I loathed — cried for just respite to confess
And save his soul: much respite did I grant!
Why grant me respite who deserve my doom?
Me — who engaged to play a prize, fight you,
Knowing your arms, and foil you, trick for trick,
At supper-fence, your match and, maybe, more.
I knew that if I chose sin certain sins,
Solace my lusts out of the regular way
Prescribed me, I should find you in the path,
Have to try skill with a redoubtéd foe;
You would lunge, I would parry, and make end.
At last, occasion of a murder comes:
We cross blades, I, for all my brag, break guard,
And in goes the cold iron at my breast,
Out at my back, and end is made of me.
You all! I confessed the adroit swordsman, —
—say,
But on your triumph you increase, it seems,
Want more of me than lying flat on face:
I ought to raise my ruined head, allege
Not simply I pushed worse blade o’ the pair,
But my antagonist dispensed with steel!
There was no passage of arms, you looked me low,
With brow and eye abolished out and thrust,
Nor used the vulgar weapon! This chance acarat,
This mortal hurt, this sort of hole
I’ the heart of me? I stumbled, got it so!
Fall on my own sword as a bungler may!
Yourself prescribe such heathen tools, and trust
To the naked virtue: it was virtue stood
Unarmed and avowed, — on my brow there burned
Crime out so plainly, intolerably red,
That I was fain to cry — "Down to the dust
With me, and bury there brows, brand and
Law had essayed the adventure, — but what’s Law?
Morality exposed the Gorgon shield!
Morality and Religion conquer me.
If Law sufficed would you come here, entreat
I supplement law, and confess forsooth!
Did not the Trial show things plain enough?
"Ah, but a word of the man’s very self
Would somehow put the keystone in its place
And crown the arch!" Then take the word you want!

I say that, long ago, when things began,
All the world made agreement, such and such
Were pleasure-giving profit-bearing acts,
But henceforth extra-legal, nor to be:
You must not kill the man whose death would please
And profit you, unless his life stop yours
Plainly, and need so be put aside:
Get the thing by a public course, by law,
Only no private bloodshed as of old!
All of us, for the good of every one

Renounced such license and conformed to law:
Who breaks law, breaks pact therefore, helps himself
To pleasure and profit over and above the due,
And must pay forfeit, — pain beyond his share:
For, pleasure being the sole good in the world,
Any one’s pleasure turns to some one’s pain,
So, law must watch for every one, — say we,
Who call things wicked that give too much joy,
And nickname mere repriéval, envy makes,
Punishment: quite right! thus the world goes round.
I, being well aware such pact there was,
In my time who found advantage come
Of law’s observance and crime’s penalty, —
Who, but for wholesome fear law bred in friends,
Had doubts of given example long ago,
Furnished forth some friend’s pleasure with my pain,
And, by my death, pleased out his scanty life, —
I could not, for that foolish life of me,
Help risking law’s infringement, — I broke bond,
And needs must pay price, — wherefore, here’s my head.
Flung with a flourish! But, repentance too?
But pure and simple sorrow for law’s breach
Rather than blunderer’s-inexpertitude?
Cardinal, no! Abate, scarcely thus!
’Tis the fault, not that I dared try a fall
With Law and straightway am found underfoot,
But that I failed to see, above man’s law,
God’s precept you, the Christians, recognize?
Colly my cow! Don’t fidget, Cardinal!
Abate, cross your breast and count your beads
And exorcise the devil, for here he stands
And stiffens in the brawny nape of neck,
Daring you drive him hence! You, Christians, both?
I say, if ever was such faith at all
Born in the world, by your community
Suffered to live its little tick of time,
’Tis dead of age, now, luidorously dead;
Honor its ashes, if you be discreet,
In epitaph only! For, concede its death,
Allow extinction, you may boast unchecked
What feasts the thing did in a crazy land
At a fabulous epoch, — treat your faith, that way,
Just as you treat your relics: "Here’s a shred
Of saintly flesh, a scrap of blessed bone,
Raised King Cophetua, who was dead, to life
In Mesopotamy twelve centuries since,
Such was its virtue!" — swag the Sacristan,
Holding the shrine-box up, with hands like feet
Because of gout in every finger-joint:
Does he bestink him to reduce one knob,
Allay one twinge by touching what he vaunts?
I think he half uncorks fist to catch fee,
But, for the grace, the quality of cure, —
Cophetua was the man put that to proof!
Not otherwise, your faith is shrined and shown
And shamed at once: you banter while you bow!
The Ring and the Book

Do you dispute this? Come, a monster-laugh, A madman’s laugh, allowed his Carnival Later ten days than when all Rome, but he, Laughed at the candle-contest: mine’s alight, “’tis just it sputter till the puff o’ the Pope End it to-morrow and the world turn Ash. Come, thus I wave a wand and bring to pass In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, What we have wrought — feigning everywhere grows fast, Professors turn possessors, realize The faith they play with as a fancy now, And bid it operate, have full effect On every circumstance of life, to-day, In Rome, faith’s flow set free at fountain-head!
Now, you ’ll own, at this present, when I speak, Before I work the wonder, there’s no man, Woman or child in Rome, faith’s fountain-head, But might, if each were minded, realize Conversely unbelief, faith’s opposite. Set it to work on life untimingly, Yet give no symptom of an outward change: Why should things change because men disbelieve?
What’s incompatible, in the whitened tomb, With bones and rottenness one inch below? What saintly act is done in Rome to-day But might be prompted by the devil, — “is” I say not. — “has been, and may be” — I do say, full’ the face o’ the crucifix You try to stop my mouth with! Off with it! Look in your own heart, if your soul have eyes! You shall see reason why, though faith were fled,
Unbelief still might work the wiles and move Man, the machine, to play a faithful part. Preade your college, Cardinal, in your cape, Or, — having got above his head, gown Pope, — Abate, gird your loins and wash my feet! Do you suppose I am at loss at all Why you crook, why you whinge, why fast or feast? Praise, blamne, sit, stand, lie or go! — all of it, In each of you, purest unbelief may prompt, And wit explain to who has eyes to see. But, lo, I wave wand, make the false the true! Here’s Rome believes in Christianity! What an explosion, how the fragments fly Of what was surface, mask and make-believe! Begin now, — look at this Pope’s halberdier In wasp-like black and yellow foolery! He, doing duty at the corridor, Wakes from a muse and stands consoled of sin! Down he flings halbert, leaps the passage-length, Pushes into the presence, pantingly Submits the extreme peril of the case To the Pope’s self, — whom in the world besides? And the Pope breaks talk with ambassador, Bids aside bishop, wills the whole world wait Till he secure that prize, outweighs the world, A soul, relieve the sentry of his qualm! His Altitude the Referendary Robert, and ready for the usher’s word To pay devor — is, of all times, just then Ware of a master-stroke of argument
Will out the spinal cord . . . ugh, ugh! . . . I mean, Paralyze Molinism forevermore! Straight he leaves lobby, trundles, two and two. Down steps to reach home, write, if but a word Shall end the impudence: he leaves who likes Go pacify the Pope: there’s Christ to serve! How otherwise would men display their zeal? If the same sentry had the least surmise A powder-barrel’neath the pavement lay In neighborhood with what might prove a match, Meant to blow sky-high Pope and pressentee both. Would be not break through courtiers, reek and file, Bundle up, bear off, and save body so. The Pope, no matter for his priceless soul? There’s no fool’s-freak here, naught to soundly swing. Only a man in earnest, you’ll so praise And pay and prate about, that earth shall ring! Had thought possessed the Referendary His jewel-case at home was left ajar. What would be wrong in running, robes awry, To be first to hand with the powder? What talk then of indecent haste? Which means, That both these, each in his degree, would de Just that — for a comparative nothing’s sake, And thereby gain approval and reward Which be it for or what Christ says is worth the world, Procures the doer curses, cuffs and kicks. I call such difference ‘twixt act and act, Sheer lunacy unless your truth on lip Be recognized a lie in heart of you! How do you all act, promptly or in doubt, When there’s a guest poisoned at supper-time And he sits chatting on with spot on cheek? “Pluck him by the skirt, and round him in its care, Have at him by the beard, warn any how! ” Good; and this other friend that’s cheat and thief And dissolve, — go stop the devil’s feast. Withdraw him from the imminent hell-fire! Why, for your life, you dare not tell your friend, “You lie, and I admonish you for Christ!” Who yet dare seek that same man at the Mass To warn him — on his knees, and tinkle near, — He left a cask a-till, a tap unturned, The Trebbian running: what a grateful jamp Out of the Church rewards your vigilance! Perform that selfsame service just a thought More maladroitly, — since a bishop sits At function! — and he budge not, bites lip, — “You see my case: how can I quit my post? He has an eye to any such default. See to it, neighbor, I beseech your love!” He and you know the relative worth of things, What is permissible or inopportune. Contort your brows! You know I speak the truth. Gold is called gold, and dross called dross, ’tis the Book: Gold you let lie and dross pick up and prize!
GUIDO

— Despite your muster of some fifty monks
And nuns a-maundering here and mumping there;
Who could, and on occasion would, spurn dress,
Clutch gold, and prove their faith a fact so far,—
I grant you! Fifty times the number squeak
And gibber in the madhouse — firm of faith,
This fellow, that his nose supports the moon;
The other, that his straw hat crowns him Pope:
Does that prove all the world outside insane?
Do fifty miracle-mongers match the mob
That acts on the frank faithless principle,
Born-baptized-and-bred Christian-athiests, each
With just as much a right to judge as you,—
As many senses in his soul, and nerves
I'neck of him as I,— whom, soul and sense,
Neck and nerve, you abolish presently,—
I being the unit in creation now
Who pay the Maker, in this speech of mine,
A creature's duty, spend my last of breath
In bearing witness, even by my worst fault,
To the creature's obligation, absolute,
Perpetual: my worst fault protests, "The faith
Claimed all of me: I would give all she claims,
But for a spice of doubt: the risk's too rash:
Double or quits, I play, but, all or naught,
Exceeds my courage: therefore, I descend
To the next faith with no dubiety —
Faith in the present life, made last as long
And prove as full of pleasure as may hap,
When what it cause the world." I'm wrong?

I've had my life, whate'er I lose: I'm right?
I've got the single good there was to gain.
 Entire faith, or else complete unbelief!
Aught between has my loathing and contempt,
Mine and God's also, doubtless: ask yourself,
Cardinal, where and how you like a man!
Why, either with your feet upon his head,
Confessed your caudatory, or, at large,
The stranger in the crowd who ceps to you
But keeps his distance, — why should he presume?
You want no hanger-on and dropper-off,
Now yours, and now not yours but quite his own,
According as the sky looks black or bright.
Just so I copped to and kept off from faith —
You promised trudge behind through fair and foul,
Yet leave i' the lurch at the first spit of rain.
Who holds to faith whenever rain begins?
What does the father when his son lies dead,
The merchant when his money-bags take wing,
The politician whom a rival ousts?
No case but has its conduct, faith prescribes:
Where 's the obedience that shall edify?
Why, they laugh frankly in the face of faith
And take the natural course, — this rends his hair.
Because his child is taken to God's breast,
That smashes teeth and raves at loss of trash
Which rust corrupts and thieves break through and steal,
And this, enabled to inherit earth
Through weakness, curses till your blood runs cold!

Down they all drop to my level, rest
Heart upon duny earth that 's warm and soft,
And let who please attempt the altitudes:
Each playing prodigal son of heavenly sire,
Turning his nose up at the fatteden calf.
Fain to fill belly with the husks, we swine
Did eat by born depravity of taste!

Enough of the hypocrites. But you, Siri,
you —
Who never budged from litter where I lay,
And buried snout i' the draft-box while I fed,
Cried amen to my creed's one article —
"Get pleasure, 'scape pain, — give your prefer-end to the immediate good, for time is brief,
And death ends good and ill and everything!
What's got is gained, what's gained soon is gained twice,
And — inasmuch as faith gains most — feign
faith!"
So did we brother-like pass word about:
— You, now, — like bloody drunkards but half-drunk,
Who fool men yet perceive men find them fools,
— Vexed that a titter gains the gravest mouth, —
O' the sudden you must needs reintroduce
Solemnity, straight sober undue mirth
By a blow dealt me your boon companion here,
Who, using the old license, dreamed of harm
No more than snow in harvest: yet it falls!
You seek the merriment effectually
By pushing your abrupt machine i' the midst,
Making me Rome's example: blood for wine!
The general good needs that you chop and
change!
I may dislike the hons-poons, — Rome,
The laugher-loving people, won't they stare
Chapfallen! — while serious natures sermonize,
"The magistrate, he beareth not the sword
In vain; who sins may taste its edge, we see!"
Why my sin, drunkards? Where have I abused
Liberty, scandalized you all so much?
Who called me, who crooked finger till I came,
Fool that I was, to join companionship?
I knew my own mind, meant to live my life,
Elude your envy, or else make a stand,
Take my own part and sell you my life dear.
But it was "Fie! No prejudice in the world
To the proper manly instinct! Cast your lot
Into our lap, one genius ruled our births,
We'll compass joy by concert; take with us
The regular irregular way i' the wood;
You'll miss no game through riding breast by breast,
In this preserve, the Church's park and pale,
Rather than outside where the world lies datawaste!"
Come, if you said not that, did you say this?
Give plain and terrible warning, "Live, enjoy!
Such life begins in death and ends in hell!
Dare you bid us assist your sins, us priests
Who hurry sin and sinners from the earth?
No such delight for us, why then for you?
Leave earth, seek heaven or find its opposite!"
Had you so warned me, not in lying words
But veritable deeds with tongues of flame,
That had been fair, that might have struck a man,
Silenced the squabble between soul and sense,
Compelled him to make mind up, take one course
Or the other, peradventure! — wrong or right,
Foolish or wise, you would have been at least
Sinner, no question, — forced me choose, in dulge
Or else renounce my instincts, still play wolf
Or find my way submissive to your fold,
Be red-crossed on my fleece, one sheep the more.
But you as good as bade me wear sheep’s-wool
Over wolf’s-skin, suck blood and hide the noise
By mimery of something like a blast, —
Whence it comes that because, despite my care,
Because I smack my tongue too loud for once,
Drop basing, here’s the village up in arms!
Have at the wolf’s throat, you who hate the breed!
Oh, were it only open yet to choose —
One little time more — whether I’d be free
Your foes, or subsidized your friend forsought!
Should not you get a growl through the while ranges
In answer to your beckoning! Cardinal,
Abate, managers o’ the multitude,
I’d turn your gloved hands to account, be sure!
You should manipulate the coarse rough mob:
"If you I’d deal directly with, not them, —
Using your fears: why touch the thing myself
When I could see you hunt, and then cry “Shares!"
Quarter the carcass or we quarrel; come,
Here’s the world ready to see justice done!"
Oh, it had been a deeper game, but game
Wherein the winner’s chance were worth the pains!
We’d try conclusions! — at the worst, what worse
Than this Mannaia-machine, each minute’s talk
Helps push an inch the nearer me? — Fool, fool!
You understand me and forgive, sweet Sire?
I blame you, tear my hair and tell my woe —
All’s but a flourish, figure of rhetoric!
One must try each expedient to save life.
One makes fools look foolisher fifty-fold
By putting in their place men wise like you,
To take the full force of an argument
Would buffet their stolidity in vain.
If you should feel aggrieved by the mere wind
O’ the blow that means to miss you and maul them,
That’s my success! — Is it not folly, now,
To say with folk, “A plausible defence —
We see through notwithstanding, and reject”? —
Reject the plausible they do, these fools,
Who never even make pretence to show
One point beyond its plausibility
In favor of the best belief they hold!
“Saint Somebody—or-other raised the dead: ”
Did he? — How do you come to know as much?
“Known what need? — The story’s plausible,
Avouched for by a martyrologist,
And why should good men sup on cheese and leeks
On such a saint’s day, if there were no saint?"

I praise the wisdom of these fools, and sniff
Tell them my story — “plausible, but false!”
False, to be sure! What else can story be
That runs — a young wife tired of an old wise,
Found a priest whom she fled away with, — led
Took their full pleasure in the two-days’ fest
Which a gray-headed grey-hen-hearted pair
(Whose best boast was, their life had been a lie)
Helped for the love they bore all liars. Oh,
Here incredulity begins! Indeed?
Allow then, were no one point strictly true,
There’s that the tale might seem like true
at least
To the unlucky husband, — jaundiced patch.
Jealousy maddens people, why not him?
Say, he was maddened, so forgivable!
Humanity pleads that though the wits were true,
The priest’s true, and the pair of liars true,
They might seem false to one man in the world!
A thousand gnats make up a serpent’s sting,
And many sly soft stimulants to wrath
Compose a formidable wrong at last.
That game called easily by some one name
Not applicable to the single parts,
And so draws down a general revenge,
Excessive if you take crime, fault by fault.
Jealousy! I have known a score of plays,
Were listened to and laughed at in my time
As like the every-day life on all sides.
Wherein the husband, mad as a March hare,
Suspected all the world contrived his shame.
What did the wife? The wife kissed both eyes blind.

Explained away ambiguous circumstances,
And while she held captive by the hair,
Crowned his head — you know what’s the mockery —
By half her body behind the curtain. That’s Nature now! That’s the subject of a piece
I saw in Vallombrosa Convent, made
Expressly to teach men what marriage was!
But say, “Just so did I misapprehend,
Imagine she deceived me to my face,”
And that’s pretence too easily seen through!
All those eyes of all husbands in all plays,
At stare like one expanded peacock-tail,
Are laughed at for pretending to be keen
While horn-blind: but the moment I say forth —
Oh, I must needs o’ the sudden prove a lynx
And look the heart, that stone-wall, through
and through!
Such an eye, God’s may be, — not yours nor mine.

Yes, presently... what hour is fleeting now?
When you cut earth away from under me,
I shall be left alone with, pushed beneath
Some such an apparitional dread orb
As the eye of God, since such an eye thence glares:
I fancy it go filling up the void
About me, monotone, if devours, or what
Proves wrath. Immensity wrecks on nothingness
Just how I felt once, oozing through the dark
Hard by Vittiano; young I was, and gay,
And wanting to trap fieldfares: first a spark
GUIDO.

581

Tipped a bent, as a mere dew-globe might
Any stiff grass-stalk on the meadow,—this Grew fiercer, flamed out full, and proved the sun.
What do I want with provers, precepts here?
Away, away! What shall I say to God?
This, if I find the tongue and keep the mind—
"Do Thou wipe out the being of me, and smear
This soul from off Thy white of things, I blot!
I am one huge and sheer mistake,—whose fault?
Not mine at least, who did not make myself!")
Some one declares my wife excused me so!
Perhaps she knew what argument to use.
Grind your teeth, Cardinal, Abate, write it!
What else am I to cry out in my rage,
Unable to repent one particle,
O' the past?—Oh, how I wish some cold wise man
Would dig beneath the surface which you scrape,
Deal with the depths, pronounce on my desert
Groundedly! I write simple sober sense,
That asks, before it finishes with a dog,
Who taught the dog that trick you hang him for?
You both persist to call that act a crime,
Which sense would call . . . yes, I maintain it, Sires.
A blunder! At the worst, I stood in doubt
On cross-road, took one path of many paths:
It leads to the red thing, we all see now,
But nobody saw at first: one primrose-patch
In bank, one singing-bird in bush, the less,
Had made me from such wayfare: let me prove!
Put me back to the cross-road, start afresh!
Advise me when I take the first false step!
Give me my wife: how should I use my wife,
Love her or hate her? Prompt my action now!
There she is, there she stands alive and pale,
The thirteen-years'-old child, with milk for blood,
Pompilia Comparini, as at first,
Which first is only four brief years ago!
I stand too in the little ground-floor room
O' the father's house at Via Vittoria: see!
Her so-called mother— one arm round the waist
O' the child to keep her from the toys, let fall
At wonder I can live yet look so grim—
Ushers her in, with deprecating wave
Of the other,— and she fronts me loose at last,
Held only by the mother's finger-tip.
Struck dumb, for she was white enough before!
She eyes me with those frightened balls of black,
As heifer — the old simile comes pat—
Eyes tremblingly the altar and the priest.
The amazed look, all one insuppressive prayer,—
Might she but breathe, set free as heretofore,
Have this cup leave her lips unblistered, bear
Any cross anywhither anyhow,
So but alone, so but apart from me!
You are touched? So am I, quite otherwise,
If 't is with pity. I resent my wrong,

Being a man: I only show man's soul
Through man's flesh: she sees mine, it strikes her thus!
Is that attractive? To a youth perhaps—
Calf-creature, one-part boy to three-parts girl,
To whom it is a flattering novelty.
That he, men use to motion from their path,
Can thus impose, thus terrify in turn
A chit whose terror shall be changed space
To bliss unbearable when grace and glow,
Prowess and pride descend the throne and touch
Esther in all that pretty tremble, cured
By the dove o' the sopoetl! But myself am old,
O' the wane at least, in all things: what do you say
To her who frankly thus confirms my doubt?
I am past the prime, I scare the woman-world,
Done-with that way: you like this piece of news?
A little saucy rose-bud minx can strike
Death-damp into the breast of doughty king
Though 't were French Louis,— soul I understand,— Saying, by gesture of repugnance, just
"Sure, you are regal, puissant, and so forth,
But—young you have been, are not, nor will be!"
In vain the mother nods, winks, bustles up,
"Count, girls incline to mature worth like you! As for Pomplia, what's flesh, fish or fowl?
To one who apprehends no difference,
And would accept you even were you old
As you touch . . . youngish by her father's side?
Trim but your beard a little, thin your bush
Of eyebrow; and for presence, portliness,
And decent gravity, you beat a boy!"
Deceive yourself one minute, if you may,
In presence of the child that so loves age,
Whose neck writhe's, cords itself against your kiss,
Whose hand you wring stark, rigid with despair!
Well, I assert this: I am young in soul,
Nor old in body,— thaws and sinews here,—
Though the vile surface be not smooth as once,—
Far beyond that first wheelwork which went wrong
Through the untampered iron ere 't was proof:
I am the rock man worth ten times the crude,—
Would woman see what this declines to see,
Declines to say "I see,"— the officious word
That makes the thing, pricks on the soul to shoot
New fire into the half-used cinder, flesh!
Therefore 't is she begins with wronging me,
Who cannot but begin with hating her.
Our marriage follows: there she stands again!
Why do I laugh? Why, in the very gripe
O' the jaws of death's gigantic skull, do I
Grin back his grin, make sport of my own pangs?
Why from each clashing of his molars, ground
To make the devil bread from out my grist,
Leaps out a spark of mirth, a hellish toy?
Take notice we are lovers in a church,
Waiting the sacrament to make us one
And happy! Just as bid, she bears herself,
Comes and kneels, rises, speaks, is silent,—
And still you make the church.
So have I brought my horse, by word and blow,
To stand stock-still and front the fire he dreads.
How can I other than remember this,
Resent the very obedience? Gain thereby?
Yes, I do gain my end and have my will,— Thanks to whom? When the mother speaks
the word,
She obeys it — even to enduring me!
There had been compensation in revolt—
Revolts 'to quell: but martyrdom rehearsed,
But predetermined saintship for the sake
O the mother? — "Go!" thought I, "we meet again!"
Pass the next weeks of dumb contented death,
She lives,— wakes up, installed in house and home,
Is mine, mine all day-long, all night-long mine.
Good folk begin at me with open mouth:
"Now, at least, reconcile the child to life!
Study and make her love . . . that is, endure
The . . . hem! the . . . all of you though somewhat old,
Till it amount to something, in her eye,
As good as love, better a thousand times,—
Since nature helps the woman in such strait,
Makes passiveness her pleasure: failing which,
What if you give up boy-and-girl-fools'play
And go on to wise friendship all at once?—
Those boys and girls kiss themselves cold, you
know,
Toy themselves tired and slink aside full soon
To friendship, as they name satisety:
Thither go you and wait their coming!"
"Thank you,"
Considerate advisers, — but, fair play!
Had you and I, friends, started fair at first,
We, keeping fair, might reach it, neck by neck,
This blessed goal, whenever fate so please:
But why am I to miss the daisied mile
The course begins with, why obtain the dust
Of the end precisely at the starting-point?
Why quaff life's cup blown free of all the beads,
The bright red froth wherein our beard should steep
Before our mouth essay the black o' the wine?
Foolish, the love-fit? Let me prove it such.
Like you, before like you I puff things clear!
"The best's to come, no rapture but content!
Not love's first glory but a sober glow,
Not a spontaneous outburst in pure boon,
So much as, gained by patience, care and toil,
Proper appreciation and esteem!"
Go preach that to your nephews, not to me
Who, tired 't the midpoint of my life, would stop
And take my first refreshment, pluck a rose:
What's this coarse woolly hip, worn smooth of leaf,
You counsel. I go plant in garden-plot,
Water with tears, manure with sweet and blood,
In confidence the seed shall germinate
And, for its very best, some far-off day,
Grow big, and blow me out a dog-rose bell?
Why must your nephews begin breathing
O the hundred-petalled Provence prodigy?
Nay, worse and worse,— would such my rose—
Prove really flower and favorite, not the kid
That's queen, but those three leaves that made one cup
And hoist the hedge-bird's breakfast,—the indeed
The prize though poor would pay the care and toil!
Respect we Nature that makes least as most,
Marvelous in the mimin! But this bed,
Bit through and burned black by the tempter's tooth,
This bloom whose best grace was the slough aside
And the wasp inside its bosom,—call ye this rose?"
Claim no immunity from a weed's fate
For the horrible present! What you call my wife
I call a nullity in female shape,
Vapid disgust, soon to be pungent plague,
When mixed with, made confusion and a case
By two abominable nondescripts,
That father and that mother: think you see
The dreadful bronze our boast, we Areteis
The Etruscan monster, the three-headed that Bellerophon's foe! How name you the vile
You choose to name the body from one head
That of the simple kid which droops the eye
Hangs the neck and dies tenderly enough:
I rather see the gensely lion belch
Flame out! the midst, the serpent writhe her

Grafted into the common stock for tail,
And name the brute, Chimera, which I slew!
How was there ever more to be,—concede
My wife's insipid harmless nullity) —
Dissociation from that pair of plagues—
That mother with her cunning and her cast—
The eyes with first their twinkle of conceit.
Then, dropped to earth in mock-demureness,
now,
The smile self-satisfied from ear to ear,
Now, the prim pursed-up mouth's protruded lips,
With deferential duck, slow swing of head,
Tempting the sudden fist of man too much; —
That owl-like screw of lid and rock of ruff!
As for the father,—Cardinal, you know
The kind of idiot! —such are rife in Rome.
But they wear velvet commonly; good feels,
At the end of life, to furnish forth young folk
Who grin and bear with imbecility:
Since the stalled ass, the joker, sheds from yar Coru, in the joke, for those who laugh at starve.
But what say we to the same solemn beast
Wagging his ears and wishful of our pat
When turned, with holes in hide and bones laid bare,
For to forage for himself! the waste o' the world,
Sir Dignity i' the dumps? Pat him? We drub
Self-knowledge, rather, into frowzy pate,
Teach Pietro to get trappings or go hang!
Fancy this qu Damien oracle in vogue
At Via Vittoria, this personified
Authority when time was, — Pantaloon
Flamming his tom-fool tawdry just the same
As if Ash-Wednesday were mid-Carnival!
That's the extreme and unforgivable
Of sins, as I account such. Have you stooped
For your own good to bestallise yourself
By flattery of a fellow of this stamp?
The ends obtained or else shown out of reach,
He goes on, takes the flattery for pure
truth, —
"You love, and honor me, of course: what next?"
What, but the trifie of the stabbing, friend? —
Which taught you how one worships when the shrines
Has lost the relic that we bent before.
Angry! And how could I be otherwise?
'T is plain: this pair of old pretentious fools
Meant to fool me: it happens, I fooled them.
Why could not these who sought to buy and sell
Me, — when they found themselves were bought and sold?
Make up their mind to the proved rule of right.
Be chatted and not Chapman any more?
Miscalculation has its consequence;
But when the shepherd crooks a sheep-like thing
And meaning to get wool, dialogues fleece
And four-foot men to bestallise each other (How that stanch image serves at every turn!) Does he, by way of being politic, Pluck the first whisher grimly visible?
Or rather grow in a trice all gratitate,
Protest this sort-of-what-one-might-name sheep
Beats the old other curli-coated kind,
And shall share board and bed, if so it deign,
With its discoverer, like a royal ram?
Ay, thus, with chattering teeth and knocking knock.
Would we whom treat the adventure! these,
foosorth,
Tried whisher-plucking, and so found what trap
The whisher kept perdue, two rows of teeth —
Sharp, as too late the prying fingers felt.
What would you have? The fools transgress, the fools
With receive appropriate punishment:
They first insult me, I return the blow,
There follows noise enough: four hubbub months,
Now hue and cry, now whimpering and wail —
A perfect goose-yard cackle of complaint
Because I do not gild the geese their oats, —
I have enough of noise, ope wicket wide,
Sweep out the couple to go whine elsewhere,
Frightened a little, hurt in no respect,
And met taking thought to breathe again,
Taste the sweet sudden silence all about.
When, there they raise it, the old noise I know,
At Rome i' the distance! "What, begun once
more?"
Whine on, wail ever, 't is the loser's right!"
But eh, what sort of voice grows on the wind?
Triumph it sounds and no complaint at all!
And triumph it is. My boast was premature:
The creatures, I turned forth, clapped wing and crew
Fighting-cock-fashion, — they had flashed a pearl
From dung-heaps, and might boast with cause
enough!
I was defrauded of all bargained for:
You know, the Pope knows, not a soul but
knows
My dowry was derision, my gain — muck;
My wife (the Church declared my flesh and blood)

The nameless bastard of a common whore:
My old name turned henceforth to . . . shall I
say
"He that received the ordure in his face"?
And they who planned this wrong, performed
this wrong;
And then revealed this wrong to the wide
world
Rounded myself in the ears with my own
wrong, —
Why, these were (note hell's lucky malice, now!) These were just they who, they alone, could act
And publish and proclaim their infamy,
Secure that men would in a breath believe,
Compassionate and pardon them, — for why?
They plainly were too stupid to invent,
Too simple to distinguish wrong from right,
Inconscient agents they, the sily-scooth,
Of heaven's retributive justice on the strong
Proud cunning violent oppressor — me!
Follow them to their fate and help your best,
You Roma, Arezzo, foes called friends of me,
They gave the good long laugh to, at my cost!
Defray your share o' the cost, since you part-took
The entertainment! Do! — assured the while,
That not one stab, I dealt to right and left,
But went the deeper for a fancy — this —
That each might do me twofold service, find
A friend's face at the bottom of each wound,
And scratch its smirk a little!
Paciaticchi!

There 's a report at Florence, — is it true? —
That when your relative the Cardinal
Built, only the other day, that barrack-bulk,
The palace in Via Larga, some one picked
From out the street a sancy quip enough
That fell there from its day's flight through the town,
About the flat front and the windows wide
And bulging heap of cornice, — hitched the joke
Into a sonnet, signed his name thereto,
And forthwith pinned on post the plebsantry:
For which he's at the galleys, rowing now
Up to his waist in water, — just because Paciatic and lymphatic rhymed so pat!
I hope, Sir, those who passed this joke on me
Were not unduly punished? What say you, Prince of the Church, my patron? Nay, indeed,
I shall not dare insult your wits so much
As think this problem difficult to solve.
This Pietro and Violante then, I say,
These two ambiguous insects, changing name
And nature with the season's warmth or chill
Now, grovelled, grubbing toiling moiling ants,
A very synonym of thrift and peace,—
Anon, with lusty June to prick their heart,
Soared 't the air, winged flies for more offence,
Circled me, buzzed me deaf and stung me blind,
And stunk me dead with fetor in the face
Until I stopped the nuisance: there's my crime!

Pity I did not suffer them subside
Into some further shape and final form
Of execrable life? My masters, no!
I, by one blow, wisely cut short at once
Them and their transformations of disgust,
In the snug little Villa out of hand.
"Grant me confession, give bare time for that!"

Shouted the sinner till his mouth was stopped.
His life confessed! — that was enough for me;
Who came to see that he did penance. 'Sdeath!
Here's a soul raised, a pother and for what?
Because strength, being provoked by weakness, fought
And conquered,—the world never heard the like!

Pah, how I spend my breath on them, as if
'T were their fate troubled me, too hard to range
Among the right and fit and proper things!

Ay, but Pomphilia,—I await your word,—
She unimpeached of crime, unimparticulate
In folly, one of alien blood to these
I punish, why extend my claim, exact
Her portion of the penalty? Yes, friends, I go too fast: the orator's at fault:
Yes, ere I lay her, with your leave, by them
As she was laid at San Lorenzo late,
I ought step back, lead you by degrees,
Recounting at each step some fresh offence,
Up to the red bed,—never fear, I will!
Gaze at her, where I place her, to begin,
Confound me with her gentleness and worth!
The horrible pair have fled and left her now,
She has her husband for her sole concern:
His wife, the woman fashioned for his help,
Flesh of his flesh, bone of his bone, the bride
To groom as is the Church and Spouse to Christ:

There she stands in his presence: "Thy desire Shall be to the husband, o'er thee shall he rule!"

"Pomphilia, who declare that you love God,
You know who said that: then, desire my love,
Yield me contentment and be ruled aright!"
She sits up, she lies down, she comes and goes,
Kneels at the couch-side, overseas the sill
O' the window, cold and pale and mute as stone,
Strong as stone also. "What, are they not fled?
Am I not left, am I not one for all?
Speak a word, drop a tear, detach a glance,
Bless me or curse me of your own accord!
Is it the ceiling only wants your soul,
Is worth your eyes?" And then the eyes are shut,
And do look at me. Is it at the meal?
"Speak!" she obey'd. "Be silent!" she obey'd.

Counting the minutes till I cry "Depart,"
As brood-bird when you summon past her egg.
Departs she, just the same through door as well.
I see the same stone strength of white despair.
And all this will be never otherwise!
Before, the parents' presence lent her life:
She could play off her sex's armorry,
Entreat, reproach, be female to my male,
Try all the shrinking doublets of the hare,
Go clamor to the Commissary, bid
The Archbishop hold my hands and stop my tongue,
And yield fair sport so: but the tactics change.
The hare stands stock-still to ensnare the hound.
Since that day when she learned she was a child
Of those she thought her parents, — that this trick
Had tricked me whom she thought so trickster late,—

Why, I suppose she said within herself.
"Then, no more struggle for my parents' sake!
And, for my own sake, why needs struggle?"

But is there no third party to the pact?
What of her husband's relish or dislike
For this new game of giving up the game,
This worst offence of not offending more?
I'll not believe but instinct wrought in this.
Set her on to conceive and execute
The preferable plague: how sure they probe—
These jades, the sensitivest soft of man!
The long black hair was wound now in a wig.
Crowned sorrow better than the wild web laid:
No more soiled dress, 'tis trimness triumph,
now.
For how should malice go with negligence?
The frayed silk looked the fresher for her spite!

There was an end to springing out of bed,
Praying me, with face buried on my feet,
Be hindered of my pastime,—so an end
To my rejoinder, "What, on the ground at last?
Vanquished in fight, a supplicant for life?
What if I raise you? 'Ware the casting down
When next you fight me!" Then, she lay
there, mine:

Now, mine she is if I please wring her neck,—
A moment of disequilibrium, working eyes,
Prostruding tongue, a long sigh, then no more.
As if one killed the horse one could not ride.
Had I enjoined "Cut off the hair!"—why,

She sits up, she lies down, she comes and goes,
Kneels at the couch-side, overseas the sill
O' the window, cold and pale and mute as stone,
Strong as stone also. "What, are they not fled?
Am I not left, am I not one for all?
Speak a word, drop a tear, detach a glance,
Bless me or curse me of your own accord!
Is it the ceiling only wants your soul,
Is worth your eyes?" And then the eyes are
shut,
And do look at me. Is it at the meal?

To my rejoinder, "What, on the ground at last?
Vanquished in fight, a supplicant for life?
What if I raise you? 'Ware the casting down
When next you fight me!" Then, she lay
there, mine:
Would not begin the lie that ends with truth,
Nor feign the love that brings real love about:
Wherefore I judged, sentenced, and punished her.
But why particularize, defend the deed?
Say that I hated her for no one cause
Beyond my pleasure so to do,—what then?
Just on as much inextensiveness sets the world,
All of you! Look and like! You favor one,
Browbeat another, leave alone a third,—
Why should you master natural caprice?
Pure nature! Try: plant elm by sah in file;
Both unexceptionable trees enough,
They ought to overleas each other, pair
At top, and arch across the avenue
The whole path to the pleasurehouse: do they so—
Or loathe, lie off abhorrent each from each?
Lay the fault elsewhere: since we must have faults,
Mine shall have been,—seeing there's ill in the end,
Come of my course,—that I fare somewhat worse
For the way I took: my fault... as God's my judge,
I see not where my fault lies, that's the truth!
I sought... oh, sought in my own interest
Have let the whole adventure go untried,
This chance by marriage,—or else, trying it,
Ought to have turned it to account, some one
O' the hundred others? Ay, my friend,
Easy to say, easy to do: stop right
Now you've stepped left and stumbled on the thing,
—The red thing! Doubt! I any more than you
That practice makes man perfect? Give again
The chance,—same marriage and no other wife,
Be sure I'll edify you! That's because
I'm practised, grown fit guide for Guido's self.
You proffered guidance,—I know, none so well,—
You laid down law and rolled decorum out,
From pulpit-corner on the gospel-side,—
Wanted to make your great experience mine,
Save me the personal search and pains so:
thanks!
Take your word on life's use? When I take his
The muzzled ox that treadeth out the corn,
Gone blind in paddling round and round one path,—
As to the taste of green grass in the field!
What do you know o' the world—that's trodden flat
And salted sterile with your daily dung,
Leavened into a lump of loathsomeness?
Take your opinion of the modes of life,
The aims of life, life's triumph or defeat,
How to feel, how to scheme, and how to do
Or else leave undone? You preached long and loud
On high-days, "Take our doctrine upon trust!
Into the mill-house with you! Grind our corn,
Relish our chaff, and let the green grass grow!"
I tried chaff, found I famished on such fare,
So made this mad rush at the mill-house-door,
Buried my head up to the ears in dew,
Browsed on the best: for which you brain me,
Sir! Be it so, I conceived of life that way,
And still declare — life, without absolute use
Of the actual sweet therein, is death, not life.
Give me, — pay down, — not promise, which is air, —
Something that's out of life and better still,
Make sure reward, make certain punishment.
Entice me, scare me, — I'll forego this life;
Otherwise, no! — the less that words, mere wind,
Would cheat me of some minutes while they plague,
Balk fulness of revenge here, — blame yourselfs
For this eruption of the pent-up soul
You prisoner first and played with afterward!
"Deny myself!" meant simply pleasure you,
The sacred and superior, save the mark!
You, — whose stupidity and insolence
I must defer to, soothe at every turn,
Whose swine-like snuffling greed and grunting lust
I had to wink at or help gratify,
While the same passions, — dared they perk in
me.
Me, the immemorially marked, by God,
Master of the world whole of such as you,
I, boast such passions? 'T was, "Suppress them straight!
Or stay, we'll pick and choose before destroy.
Here's a reward in you, a serviceable sword,
— Beat it into a ploughshare! What's this long
Lance-like ambition? Forge a pruning-hook,
May be of service when our vines grow tall!
But — sword used swordwise, spear thrust out
as spear?
Anathema! Suppression is the word!"
My nature, when the outrage was too gross,
Widened itself an outlet over-wide
By way of answer, sought its own relief
With more of fire and brimstone than you measured.
All your own doing: preachers, blame yourselves!

"Tis I preach while the hour-glass runs and runs!
God keep me patient! All I say just means —
My wife proved, whether by her fault or mine, —
That's immaterial, — a true stumbling-block
I'm the way of me, — her husband. I but plied
The hatchet yourselves use to clear a path,
Was politic, played the game you warrant wins,
Plucked at law's robe a-rustle through the courts,
Bowed down to kiss divinity's buckled shoe
Cushioned i' the church: efforts all wide the aim!
Proceed to no purpose! Then flashed truth.
The letter kills, the spirit keeps alive
In law and gospel: there be nads and winks
Instruct a wise man to assist himself
In certain matters, nor seek aid at all.
"Ask a penny of me," — quoth the clownish saw,
"And take my purse! But, — speaking with respect, —

Need you a solace for the troubled nose?
Let everybody wipe his own himself!"
Sirs, tell me free and fair! Had things gone
well
At the wayside inn: had I surprised asleep
The runaways, as was so probable,
And pinned them each to other partridge-wine.
Through back and breast to breast and back
the trade
Bystanders witness if the split, my sword,
Were loaded with unlawful game for once —
Would you have interposed to damp the glow
Applauding me on every husband's cheek?
Would you have checked the cry, "A judgment, see!"

A warning, note! Be henceforth chaste, ye wives,
Nor stray beyond your proper precincts,
priests!

If you had, then your house against itself
Divides, nor stands your kingdom any more.
Oh why, why was it not ordained just so?
Why fell not things out so nor otherwise?
Ask that particular devil whose task it is
To trip the all-but-at perfection, — slurr
The line o' the painter just where paint leaves off
And life begins, — put ice into the ode.
O' the poet while he cries "Next stanza — fire!"
Inscribe all human effort with one word,
Artistry's haunting curse, the incomplete!
Being incomplete, my act escaped success.
Easy to blame now! Every fool can swear
To hole in net that held and slipped the fish.
But, treat my act with fair unjaundiced eye,
What was there wanting to a masterpiece
Except the luck that lies beyond a man?
My way with the woman, now proved grossly wrong.
Just missed of being gravely grandly right
And making mouths laugh on the other side.
Do, for the poor obstructed artist's sake,
Go with him over that spoiled work once more!
Take only its first flower, the ended act
Now in the dusty pod, dry and defunct!
I march to the Villa, and my men with me,
That evening, and we reach the door and stand.
I say — no, it shoots through me lightning-
like!

While I pause, breathe, my hand upon the latch,
"Let me forebode! Thus far, too much success:
I want the natural failure — find it where?
Which thread will have to break and leave a loop
I' the messy combination, my brain's loom Wove this long while, and now next minute starts?
Of three that are to catch, two should go free.
One must: all three surprised, — impossible!
Beside, I seek three and may chance on six. —
This neighbor, t'other gossip, — the babe's birth
Brings such to fireside, and folks give them
wine, —

'T is late; but when I break in presently
One will be found outlining the rest.
For proof of a posset, — one whose shout
Would raise the dead down in the catacombs.
Much more the city-watch that goes its round.
When did I ever turn adroitly up
To sun some brick embedded in the soil,
And with one blow crush all three scorpions
there ?
Or Piset ? Violante shambles off —
It cannot be but I surprise my wife —
If only she is stopped and stamped on, good !
That shall suffice : more is improbable.
Now I may knock ! " And this once for my sake
The impossible was effected : I called king,
Queen and knave in a sequence, and cards came,
All three, three only ! So, I had my way,
Did my deed : so, unbrokenly lay bare
Each tenia that had smacked me dry of juice,
At last outside me, not an inch of ring
Left now to write about and root itself
I' the heart all powerless for revenge ! Henceforth
I might thrive : these were drawn and dead and red.
Oh, Cardinal, the deep long sigh you heave
When the load 's off you, ringing as it runs
All the way down the serpent-stair to hell !
No doubt the fine delirium fluttered me,
Turned my brain with the influx of success
And if the sole need now were to wave wide
And find doors fly wide, — wish and have my will —
The rest o' the scheme would care for itself : escape ?
Easy enough were that, and poor beside !
It all is proved so,— ought to quite have proved,
Since, half the chances had sufficed, set free
Any one, with his senses at command,
From thrice the danger of my flight. But, drunk,
Redundantly triumphant, — some reverse
Was sure to follow ! There's no other way
Accounts for such prompt perfect failure then
And there on the instant. Any day o' the week,
A decent slid discreetly into palm
O' the damned post-master, while you whisper him —
How you the Count and certain four your knaves,
Have just been mauling who was malapert,
Suspect the kindred may prove troublesome,
Therefore, want horses in a hurry, — that
And nothing more secures you any day
The pick o' the stable ! Yet I try the trick,
Double the bire, call myself Duke for Count,
And say the dead man only was a Jew,
And for my pains find I am dealing just
With the one scurrilous fellow in all Rome—
Just this immaculate official staves.
See ' s I want hat on head and sword in sheath,
Am splashed with other sort of wet than wine,
Shrugs shoulder, puts my hand by, gold and all,
Each is on the strictness of the rite o' the road !
"Where's the Permiston ? " " Where's the wretched rag
With the due seal and sign of Rome's Police,
To be had for asking, half an hour ago ?"
"Gone? Get another, or no horses hence ! "
He dares not stop me, we five glare too grim,
But hinder, — hacks and hamstrings sure enough,
Gives me some twenty miles of miry road
More to march in the middle of that night
Whereof the rough beginning taxed the strength
O' the youngsters, much more mine, both soul
And flesh,
Who had to think as well as act: dead-beat,
We gave in ere we reached the boundary
And safe spot out of this irrational Rome,—
Where, on dismounting from our steeds next day,
We had snapped our fingers at you, safe and sound,
Tuscans once more in blessed Tuscan,
Where laws make wise allowance, understand
Civilized life and do its champions right !
Witness the sentence of the Kota there,
Arezzo uttered, the Granduke confirmed,
One week before I acted on its hint,—
Giving friend Guiliachini, for his love,
The galleys, and my wife your saint, Rome's saint,— Rome manufactures saints enough to know,—
Seduction at the Stincio for her life.
All this, that all but was, might all have been,
Yet was not ! balked by just a scurrilous knife
Whose palm was born through handling horses' hoofs.
And could not close upon my proffered gold !
What say you to the spite of fortune ? Well,
The worst ' s in store : thus hindered, hailed this way
To Rome again by hangdogs, whom find I
Here, still to fight with, but my pale frail wife ?
— Riddled with wounds by one not like to waste
The blows he dealt, — knowing anatomy, —
(I think I told you) bound to pick and choose
The vital parts ? "I was looking all in vain !
She too must shimmer through the gloom o' the grave,
Come and confront me — not at judgment-seat
Where I could twist her soul, as erst her flesh,
And turn her truth into a lie, — but there,
O' the death-bed, with God's hand between us both,
Striking me dumb, and helping her to speak,
Tell her own story her own way, and turn
My plausibility to nothingness !
Four whole days did Pompeila keep alive,
With the best surgery of Rome agraed
At the miracle, — this cut, the other slash,
And yet the life refusing to dissolve,
Four whole extravagant impossible days,
Till she had time to finish and persnade
Every man, every woman, every child
In Rome, of what she would : the selfsame she
Who, but a year ago, had wrung her hands, Reddened her eyes and beat her breasts, rehoarded
The whole game at Arezzo, nor availed
Thereby to move one heart or raise one hand !
When destiny intends you cards like these,
What good of skill and preconcerted play ?
Had she been found dead, as I left her dead,
I should have told a tale brooked no reply:
You scarcely will suppose me found at fault
With that advantage! "What brings me to Rome?"
Necessity to claim and take my wife:
Better, to claim and take my new-born babe,—
Strong in paternity a fortnight old,
When 'tis at strongest: warily I work,
Knowing the machinations of my foe;
I have companionship and use the night:
I seek my wife and child,—I find — no child.
But wife, in the embraces of that priest
Who caused her to elope from me. These two,
Backed by the pander-pair who watch the while,
Spring on me like so many tiger-cats,
Glad of the chance to end the intruder. I —
What should I do but stand on my defence,
Strike right, strike left, strike thick and three-fold, slay,
Not all — because the coward priest escapes.
Last, I escape, in fear of evil tongues.
And having had my taste of Roman law."
What 's disputable, refutable here? —
Save by just this one ghost-thing half on earth,
Half out of it, — as if she held God's hand
While she leaned back and looked her last at me,
Forgiving me (here monks begin to weep)
Oh, from her very soul, commending mine
To heavenly mercies which are infinite, —
While fixing fast my head beneath your knife!
'Tis fate, not fortune. All is of a piece!
When where it chance informed me of your youth?
My rustic four o' the family, soft swains,
What sweet surprise had they in store for me,
Those of my very household, — what did Law
Twist with her rack-and-cord-contrivances late
From out their bones and marrow? What but this —
Had no one of these several stumbling-blocks
Stopped me, they yet were cherishing a scheme,
All of their honest country homespun wit,
To quietly next day at crow of cock
Cut out my own heart too, for their own behoof,
Seeing I had forgot to clear accounts
O' the instant, nowise alackened speed for that —
And somehow never might find memory,
Once safe back in Aresso, where things change,
And a court-lord needs mind no country lout.
Well, being the arch-offender, I die last, —
May, ere my head falls, have my eyesight free,
Nor miss them dangling high on either hand.
Like scarecrows in a hemp-field, for their pains!
And then my Trial,— 'tis my Trial that bites
Like a corrosive, so the cards are packed,
Diee loaded, and my life-stake tricked away!
Look at my lawyers, lacked they grace of law,
Latin or logic? Were not they foils to the height,
Fools to the depth, fools to the level between,
O' the foolishness set to decide the case?
They feign, they flatter; nowise does it skill
Every thing goes against me: deal each judge
His darling battery and feigning,—why,
He turns and tries and snuffs and savors it;
As some old sty the sugar-grain, your gift;
Then eyes your thumb and finger, brushes clean
The absurd old head of him, and whiskets away,
Leaving your thumb and finger dirty. Fangh!
And finally, after this long-drawn range
Of affront and failure, failure and affront,—
This path, 'twixt crosse leading to a skull,
Faced by me barefoot, bloodied by my palms.
From the entry to the end, —there's light at length,
A cranny of escape: appeal may be
To the old man, to the father, to the Pope,
For a little life — from one whose life is spent,
A little pity — from pity's source and seat,
A little indulgence to rank, privilege,
From one who is the thing personified,
Rank, privilege, indulgence, grown beyond
Earth's bearing, even, ask Jansenius else!
Still the same answer, still no other tane
From the cicala perched at the tree-top
Than crickets noisy round the root, —'tis
"Die!"
Bids Law — "Be damned!" adds Gospel, —
May,
No word so frank, —'tis rather, "Save yourself!"
The Pope subjoin: —"Confess and be absolved!
So shall my credit countervail your shame,
And the world see I have not lost the knock
Of trying all the spirits: yours, my son,
Wants but a fiery washing to emerge
In clarity! Come, cleanse you, ease the aches
Of these old bones, refresh our bowels, boy!
Do I mistake your mission from the Pope?
Then, bear this Holiness the mind of me!
I do get strength from being thrust to wall,
Successively wrenched from pillar and from post
By this tenacious hate of fortune, hate
Of all things in, under, and above earth,
Warfare began nor this manly mode,
Does best to end so, —gives earth spectacle
Of a brave fighter who succumbs to odds
That turn defeat to victory. Stab, I fold
My mantle round me! Rome approves my act:
Applauds the blow which costs me life but keeps
My honor spotless: Rome would praise no more
Had I fallen, say, some fifteen years ago,
Helping Vienna when our Aretines
Flocked to Duke Charles and fought Turk Mustafa.
Nor would you two be trembling o'er ray corps
With all this exquisite solicitude.
Why is it that I make such suit to live?
The popular sympathy that's round me now
Would break like bubble that o'er-domes a fly —
Solid enough while he lies quiet there,
But let him want the air and ply the wing,
Why, it breaks and bespatters him, what else?
Cardinal, if the Pope had pardoned me,
And I walked out of prison through the crowd,
It would be — be he any man who could press!
Then, if I got safe to my place again,
How sad and sapless were the years to come!
I go my old ways and find things grown gray;
You priests leer at me, old friends look askance:
The mob's in love, I'll wager, to a man,
With my poor young good beauteous murdered
wife:
For hearts require instruction how to beat,
And eyes on warrant of the story, wax
Wanton at portraits in white and black
Of dead Pomfilla gracing ballad-sheet.
Which eyes, lived she unmurdered and unsung,
Would never turn though she paced street as bare
As the mad prudent ladies do in France.
My brothers quietly would edge me out
Of use and management of things called mine,
Do I command? "You stretched command before!"
Show reason? "Anger little helped you ones!"
Advise? "How managed you affairs of old?"
My very mother, all the while they gird,
Turns eye up, gives confirmatory groan;
For unsucess, explain it how you will,
Disqualifies you, makes you doubt yourself,
— Much more, is found deceptive by your friends.
Beside, am I not fifty years of age?
What new leap would a life take, checked like
mine
The spring at outset? Where's my second
chance?
Ay, but the babe... I had forgot my son,
My heir! Now for a burst of gratitude!
There's some appropriate service to intone,
Some laudeamus and thanksgiving-quesal!
Old, I renew my youth in him, and poor
Possess a treasure, — is not that the phrase?
Only I must wait patient twenty years —
Nourishing all the while, as father ought,
The exercescence with my daily blood of life.
Does it respond to hope, such sacrifice, —
Grows the wen plump while I myself grow modern,
Why, here's my son and heir in evidence,
Who stronger, wiser, handosmer than I
By fifty years, releases me of each load,—
Tames my hot horse, carries my heavy gun,
Courts my coy mistress, — has his apt advice
On house-economy, expenditure,
And what not? All which good gifts and great growth,
Because of my decline, he brings to bear
On Guido, but half apprehensive how
He cumbers earth, crosses the brisk young Count,
Who civilly would thrust him from the scene.
Contrariwise, does the blood-offering fail?
There's an ineptitude, one blank the more
Added to earth in semblance of my child.
Then, this has been a costly piece of work,
My life exchanged for his! — why he, not I,
Enjoy the world, if no more grace acerue?
Dwarf me, what giant have you made of him?
I do not dread the disobedient son —
I know how to suppress rebellion there,
Being not quite the fool my father was.
But grant the medium measure of a man,
The usual compromise 'twixt fool and sage,
— You know — the tolerably-obstinate,
The not-so-much-perverse but you may train,
The true son-servant that, when parent bids
"Go work, son, in my vineyard!" makes reply
"I go, Sir!" — Why, what profit in your son
Beyond the drudges you might subsidize,
Have the same work from, at a paul the head?
Look at those four young precious olive-plants
Reared at Vittiano, — not on flesh and blood,
These twenty years, but black bread and sour
wine!
I bade them put forth tender branch, hook, hold,
And hurt three enemies I had in Rome: They did my heart so unreluctantly,
At promise of a dollar, as a son
Adjudged by mumming memories of the past.
No, nothing repays youth expended so — Youth, I say, who am young still: grant but leave
To live my life out, to the last I'd live
And din condescending age no right of youth!
It is the will runs the renewing nerve Through faisced flesh that faints before the
time.
Therefore no sort of use for son have I —
Sick, not of life's feast but of steps to climb
To the house where life prepares her feast, — of means
To the end: for make the end attainable
Without the means, — my relish were like yours.
A man may have an appetite enough
For a whole dish of robin ready cooked,
And yet lack courage to face sleet, pad snow,
And snare sufficiently for supper.
Thus
The time's arrived when, ancient Roman-like,
I am bound to fall on my own sword: why not Say — Tuscan-like, more ancient, better still?
Will you hear truth can do no harm nor good?
I think I never was at any time
A Christian, as you nickname all the world,
Me among others: truce to nonsense now!
Name me, a primitive religionist —
As should the aboriginary be
I boast myself, Etruscan, Aretine,
One sprung — your frigid Virgil's fieriest word —
From fanns and nymphs, trunks and the heart of oak,
With — for a visible divinity —
The portent of a Jove Αègioschin
Described 'mid clouds, lightning and thunder, Oochoned
On topmost crag of your Capitolines:
'Tis in the Seventh Æneid, — what, the Eighth?
Right, — thanks, Abate, — though the Christian's dumb,
The Latinist's vivacious in you yet!
I know my grand sire had our tapestry
Marked with the motto, 'neath a certain shield,
Whereeto his grandson presently will give gules
To vary azure. First we fight for faiths,
But get to shall hands at the last of all:
Mine's your faith too, — in Jove Αègioskin
Nor do Greek gods, that serve as supplement,
Jar with the simpler scheme, if understood.
We want such intermediary race
To make communication possible;
The real thing were too lofty, we too low,
Midway hang these: we feel their use so plain
In linking height to depth, that we doff hat
And put no question nor pry narrowly
Into the nature hid behind the names.
We grudge no rite the fancy may demand;
But never, more than needs, invent, refine,
Improve upon requirement, idly wise
Beyond the letter; teaching gods their trade,
Which is to teach us: we'll obey when taught.
Why should we do our duty past the need?
When the sky darkens, Jove is wroth,—say prayer!
When the sun shines and Jove is glad,—sing
psalm!
But wherefore pass prescription and devise
Blood-offering for sweat-service, lend the rod
A pungency through pickle of our own?
Learned Abate,—no one teaches you
What Venus means and who's Apollo here!
I spare you, Cardinal,—but, though you wince,
You know me, I know you, and both know
that!
So, if Apollo bids us fast, we fast:
But where does Venus order we stop sense
When Master Pietro rhymes a piaensancy?
Give and be prescribed on Friday,—but, hold hand
Because your foe lies prostrate,—where's the word
Explicit in the book debars revenge?
The rationale of your scheme is just "Fare thee well, there, pursue your pleasure
free!"
So do you turn to use the medium-powers,
Mars and Minerva, Bacchus and the rest,
And so are saved propitiating,—whom?
What all-good, all-wise, and all-potent Jove
Vexed by the very sins in man, himself
Made life's necessity when man he made?
Irrational bunglers! So, the living truth
Revealed to strike Pan dead, ducks low at last,
Prays leave to hold its own and live good days
Provided it go masque grotesquely, called Christian not Pagan. Oh, you purged the sky
Of all gods save the One, the great and good, Clapped hands and triumphed! But the change came fast:
The inexorable need in man for life
(Life, you may mulet and minish to a grain
Out of the lump, so that the grain but live)
Laughed at your substituting death for life,—
And bade you do your worst: which worst was done
In just that age styled primitive and pure
When Saint this, Saint that, dutifully starved,
Froze, fought with beasts, was beaten and abused
And finally ridded of his flesh by fire:
He kept life-long unspotted from the world!—
Next age, how goes the game, what mortal gives
His life and emulates Saint that, Saint this?
Men mutter, make excuse, or mutiny,
In fine are minded all to leave the new,
Stick to the old,—enjoy old liberty,
No prejudice in enjoyment, if you please.
To the new profession: sin o' the sky, henceforth!
The law stands though the letter kills: what
then?
The spirit saves as unmistakably.
Omniscience sees, Omnipotence could stop,
Omnibenevolence pardons: it must be.
Frown law its fierceest, there's a wink some-
where!
Such was the logic in this head of mine:
I, like the rest, wrote "poison" on my bread.
But the old site:—said "Those that use the sword
Shall perish by the same;" then stabbed my foe.
I stand on solid earth, not empty air:
Dislodge me, let your Pope's crook hale me
here!
Not he, nor you! And I so pity both,
I'll make the true charge you want wit to make:
"Count Guido, who reveal our mystery,
And trace all issues to the love of life:
We having life to love and guard, like you,
Why did you put us upon self-defence?
You well knew what prompt pass-word would appear
The sentry's sire when folk infringed his bonds
And yet kept mouth shut: do you warn the
If, in mere decency, he shot you dead?
He can't have people play such pranks as yours
Beneath his nose at noonday: you disdained
To give him an excuse before the world
By crying 'I break rule to save our camp!'
Under the old rule, such offences were death;
And you had heard the Pontefix pronounce,
'Since you slay foe and violate the form,
Slaying turns murder, which were sacrifice
Had you, while, say, lawsuiting foe to death,
But raised an altar to the Unknown God,
Or else the Genius of the Vatican.'
Why then this pother?—all because the Pope
Doing his duty, cried 'A foreigner,
You scandalize the natives: here at Rome
Romano vivere more: wise men, here,
Put the Church forward and efface themselves
The fit defence had been,—you stamped as weath,
Intending all the time to trample taxes.
Were fair extirpate, then, the heretic,
You now find, in your haste was slain a fool:
Nor Pietro, nor Violante, nor your wife
Meant to breed up your babe a Molinist!
Whence you are duly contrite. Not one word
Of all this wisdom did you urge: which slip Death must atone for!"
So, let death atone!
So ends mistake, so end mistakers!—end
Perhaps to recommence,—how should I know?
Only, be sure, no punishment, no pain
Childish, preposterous, impossible.
But some such fate as Ovid could foresee,
Pythia in flames, let the weak soul end
In water, sed Lycaon in iupus, but
The strong become a wolf forevermore!
Change that Pompeia to a puny stream
Fit to reflect the daisies on its bank!
Let me turn wolf, be whole, and satiate once,—
GUIDO

Wallow in what is now a wolfishness
Covered too much by the humanity
That's half of me as well! Grow out of man.
Gut the wolf-nature, - what remains but grow
Into the man again, be man indeed
And all man? Do I ring the changes right?
Deformed, transformed, reformed, informed, conformed!
The honest instinct, pent and crossed through life,
Let surge by death into a visible flow
Of rapture, as the strangled thread of flame
Painfully winds, annoying and annoyed,
Malignant and malignured, through stone and ore,
Till earth exclude the stranger: vented once,
It finds full play, is recognized atop
Some mountain as no such abnormal birth,
Fire for the mount, not streamlet for the vale!
Ay, of the water was that wife of mine —
Be it for good, be it for ill, no run
O' the red thread through that insignificance!
Again, how she is at me with those eyes! —
Away with the empty stars! Be holy still,
And stupid ever! Occupy your patch
Of private snow that's somewhere in what world
May now be growing icy round your head,
And anguish at your footprint, - freeze not me,
Dare follow not another step I take,
Not with so much as those destitute eyes,
No, though they follow but to pray me pause
On the incline, earth's edge that's next to hell!
None of your abnegation of revenge!
Fly at me frank, tag while I tear again!
There's God, go tell him, testify your worst!
Not she that! There was no touch in her of hate:
And it would prove her hell, if I reached mine!
To know I suffered, would still sadden her,
Do what the angels might to make amends!
Therefore there's either no such place as hell,
Or thence shall I be thrust forth, for her sake,
And thereby undergo three hells, not one —
I who, with outlet for escape to heaven,
Would tarry if such flight allowed my foe
To raise his head, relieved of that firm foot
Had pinned him to the fiery pavement else!
So am I made, "who did not make myself:"
(How dared she rob my own lip of the word?)
Beware me in what other world may be! —
Pomplilia, who have brought me to this pass!
All I know here, will I say there, and go Beyond the saying with the deed. Some use
There cannot but be for a mood like mine,
Implacable, persistent in revenge,
She meddled, "All is over and at end:
I go my own road, go you where God will!
Forgive you? I forget you!" There's the saint.
That takes your taste, you other kind of men!
How you had loved her! Guido wanted skill
To value such a woman at her worth!
Properly the instructed criticise,
"What's here, you simpleton have tossed to take
Its chance i' the gutter? This a daub, indeed?
Why, 'tis a Rafael that you kicked to rags!"
Perhaps so: some prefer the pure design:
Give me my gorge of color, glut of gold
In a glory round the Virgin made for me!
Titian's the man, not Monk Angelico
Who traces you some timid chalky ghost
That turns the church into a chamber: ay,
Just such a pencil might depict my wife!
She, — since she, also, would not change herself,
Why could not she come in some heart-shaped cloud,
Rainbowed about with riches, royalty
Rimming her round, as round the tinselled lawn
Guardedly runs the salvage cloth of gold?
I would have left the fault fine gauge untouched,
Needle-worked over with its lily and rose,
Let her bleach unmolested in the midst,
Chill that selected solitary spot
Of quietude she pleased to think was life.
Purity, pallor grace the lawn no doubt
When there's the costly bordure to unthread
And make again an ingot: but what's grace
When you want meat and drink and clothes and fire?
A tale comes to my mind that's apposite —
Possibly true, probably false, a truth
Such as all truths we live by, Cardinal!
'T is said, a certain ancestor of mine
Followed — whoever was the potentiary,
To Paynimrie, and in some battle, broke
Through more than due allowance of the foe,
And, risking much his own life, saved the lord's.
Battered and bruised, the Emperor scrambles up,
Rubs his eyes and looks round and sees my sire,
 Picks a furze-sprig from out his hauberkejoint,
(Took how near the ground went majesty.)
And says, "Take this, and if thou get safe home,
Plant the same in thy garden-ground to grow:
Run thence an hour in a straight line, and stop:
Describe a circle round (for central point)
The furze aforesaid, reaching every way
The length of that hour's run: I give it thee; —
The central point, to build a castle there,
The space circumjacent, for fit demesne,
The whole to be thy children's heritage,—
Whom, for the sake, bid thou wear furze on cap!"
These are my arms: we turned the furze a tree
To show more, and the greyhound tied thereto,
Straining to start, means swift and greedy both;
He stands upon a triple mound of gold —
By Jove, then, he's escaping from true gold
And trying to arrive at empty air!
Aha! the fancy never crossed my mind!
My father used to tell me, and subjoin,
"As for the castle, that took wings and flew:
The broad lands, — why, to traverse them took Scarce tasks my gouty feet, and in my prime
I doubt not it could stand and sit so far:
But for the furze, boy, fear no lack of that,
So long as fortune leaves one field to grub!
Wherefore, hurrah for fortune and loyalty!"
What may I mean, where may the lesson lurk?
"Do not bestow on man, by way of gift,
Furze without land for framework,—vaunt no grace
Of purity, no furze-sprig of a wife,
To me, if the battle be for bread,
Without some better dowry,—gold will do!"
No better gift than sordid nick? Yes, Sirs!
Many more gifts much better. Give them me!
O those Olimpias bold, those Biancas brave,
That brought a husband power worth Ormus' wealth!
Cried, "Thou being mine, why, what but thine am I?"
Be thou to me law, right, wrong, heaven and hell!
Let us blend souls, blent thou, in me, to bid
Two bodies work one pleasure! What are these Called king, priest, father, mother, stranger, friend?
They fret thee or they frustrate? Give the word
Be certain they shall frustrate nothing more!
And who is this young florid foolishness
That holds thy fortune in his pygmy clutch,
—Being a prince and potency, foorsome!—
He hesitates to let the trifles go?
Let me but seal up eye, ring ear to sleep
Sounder than Samson,—pouneou thou on the prize
Shall slip from off my breast, and down couch-side,
And on to floor, and far as my lord's feet—
Where he stands in the shadow with the knife,
Waiting to see what Delilah dares do!
Is the youth fair? What is a man to me
Who am thy call-bird? Twist his neck,—my dupe's,—
Then take the breast shall turn a breast insatiable?
Such women are there; and they marry whom?
Why, when a man has gone and hangs himself
Because of what he calls a wicked wife,—
See, if the very turpitude bemocked
Prove not mere excellence the fool ignores!
His monster is perfection,—Circe, sent Straight from the sun, with wand the idiot blames
As not an honest distaff to spin wool!
O thou Loretzia, is it long to wait
Yonder where all the gloom is in a glow
With thy suspected presence?—virgin yet,
Virtuous again, in face of what's to teach—
Sin unimagined, unimaginable,—
I come to claim my bride,—thy Borgia's self
Not half the burning bridegroom I shall be!
Cardinal, take away your crucifix!
Abate, leave my lips alone,—they bite!
Vainly you try to change what should not change,
And shall not. I have bared, you bathe my breast?
It grows the stonier for your saving dew!
You steep the substance, you would lubricate,
In waters that but touch to petrify!

You too are petrifactions of a kind:
Move not a muscle that shows mere raze.
Another twelve hours, every word were waste!
I thought you would not slay impertinence.
But teased, from men you alew, contrition first,—
I thought you had a conscience. Cardinal,
You know I am wrong!—wronged, say, and wronged, maintain.
Was this strict inquisition made for blood
When first you showed us scarlet on your back,
Called to the College? Your straightforward
To your legitimate end,—I think it passed
Over a scantling of heads braised, hearts brooks,
Lives trodden into dust!—how otherwise?
Such was the way o' the world, and so you walked.
Does memory haunt your pillow? Not a whit
God wills you never pace your garden-path,
One appetizing hour are dinner-time,
But your intrusion there treads out of life
A universe of happy innocent things:
Fuel you remorse about that damsel-fly
Which buzzed so near your mouth and flapped
Your face?
You blotted it from being at a blow:
It was a fly, you were a man, and more,
Lord of created things, so took your course.
Manliness, mind,—these are things fit to save,
Fit to brush fly from; why, because I take My course, must needs the Pope kill me?— kill you!
You! for this instrument, he throws away,
Is strong to serve a master, and were yours
To have and hold and get much good from out!
The Pope who dooms me needs must die next year;
I'll tell you how the chances are supposed
For his successor: first the Chamberlain,
Old San Cesario,—Colloredo, next.
Then, one, two, three, four, I refuse to name:
After these, comes Altieri; then come you—
Seventh on the list you come, unless... ha, ha,
How can a dead hand give a friend a life?
Are you the person to despise the help
O' the head shall drop in pennier presently?
So a child seesaws on or kicks away
The fulcrum-stone that's all the sage requires
To fit his lever to and move the world.
Cardinal, I adjure you in God's name,
Save my life, fall at the Pope's feet, set forth
Things your own fashion, not in words like these
Made for a sense like yours who apprehend!
Translate into the Court-conventional "Count Guido must not die, is innocent."
Fair, be assured! But what an he were fool,
Blood-drenched and murder-crusted head to foot?
Spare one whose death insults the Emperor,
Nay, outrages the Louis you so love!
He has friends who will avenge him; enemies
Who will hate God now with impunity,
Missing the old coercive; would you send
A soul so straight to perdition, dying frank
An atheist?" Go and say this, for God's sake!
—Why, you don't think I hope you'll say one word!
Neither shall I persuade you from your stand
Nor you persuade me from my station: take
Your crucifix away, I tell you twice!

Come, I am tired of silence! Pause enough!
You have prayed: I have gone inside my soul
And shut its door behind me: 'tis your torch
Makes the place dark: the darkness let alone
Grows tolerable twilight: one may grope
And get to guess at length and breadth and depth.

What is the fact I feel persuaded of —
This something like a foothold in the sea,
Although Saint Peter's bark sounds, bilow-born,
Leaves me to founder where it flung me first?
Spite of your splashing, I am high and dry!
God takes his own part in each thing he made;
Made for a reason, he conserves his work,
Gives each its proper instinct of defence.

My lamblike wife could neither bark nor bite,
She bleated, bleated, till for pity pure
The village roused up, ran with pole and prong
To the rescue, and behold the wolf's at bay!
Shall he try bleating — or take turn or two,
Since the wolf owns some kinship with the fox,
And, failing to escape the foe by craft,
Give up attempt, die fighting quietly?

The last bad blow that strikes on my soul
And on to brain, and so out, life and all,
How can it but be cheated of a pang
If, fighting quietly, the jaws enjoy
One re-embrace in mid backbone they break,
After their weary work through the foe's flesh?
That's the wolf-nature. Don't mistake my trope!

A Cardinal so quailish? Eminence,
My fight is figurative, blows i' the air,
Brain-war with powers and principalities,
Spirit-bravado, no real fistioniffs!
I shall not prudently, when the knock comes,
Cling to this bench nor claw the hangman's face;
No, trust me! I conceive worse lots than mine.
Whether it be, the old contemptuous fit
And plague o' the prison have surprised me too;

The appropriate drunkenness of the death-hour Crept on my sense, kind work o' the wine and myrrh, —
I know not, — I begin to taste my strength.
Careless, gay even. What's the worth of life?
The Pope's dead now, my murderous old man,
For Tozzi told me so: and you, forsooth —

Why, you don't think, Abate, do you your best,
You'll live a year more with that hacking cough
And bick'ry of crimson where the cheek 's a pit?
Tozzi has got you also down in book!
Cardinal, only seventh of seventy near,
Is not one called Albano in the lot?
Go eat your heart, you'll never be a Pope!
Inform me, is it true you left your love,
A Pucci, for promotion in the church?
She's more than in the church — in the churchward!

Plantilla Pucci, your affianced bride,
Has dust now in the eyes that held the love, —
And Martinez, suppose they make you Pope,
Stops that with veto, — so, enjoy yourself!

I see you all reel to the rock, you waves —
Some fortright, some describe a sinuous track,
Some, crested brilliantly, with heads above,
Some in a strangled swirl sunk who knows
how,
But all bound whither the main-current sets.
Rockward, an end in foam for all of you!
What if I be o'ertaken, pushed to the front
By all you crowding smoother souls behind,
And reach, a minute sooner than was meant,
The boundary whereon I break to mist?
Go to! the smoothest safest of you all,
Most perfect and comonest wave in my train,
Spite of the blue tranquillity above,
Spite of the breadth before of laping peace,
Where broods the balecony and the fish leaps
free.

Will presently begin to feel the prick
At lazy heart, the push at torpid brain,
Will rock vertiginously in turn, and reel,
And, emotative, rush to death like me.
Later or sooner by a minute then,
So much for the untimeliness of death!
And as regards the man who offends,
The rude and rough, I count the same for gain.
Be the act harsh and quick! Undoubtedly
The soul's condensed and, twice itself, expands
To burst through life, by alternation due,
Into the other state where'er it prove.
You never know what life means till you die:
Even throughout life, 'tis death that makes life live,
Gives it whatever the significance.
For see, on your own ground and argument,
Suppose life had no death to fear, how find
A possibility of nobleness
In man, prevented dreading any more?
What's love, what's faith without a worst to dread?

Lack lustre jewelry! but faith and love
With death behind them bidding do or die —
Put such a foil at back, the sparkle's born!
From out myself how the strange colors come!
Is there a new rule in another world?
Be sure I shall resign myself: as here
I recognized no law I could not see.
There, what I see, I shall acknowledge too:
On earth I never took the Pope for God,
In heaven I shall scarce take God for the Pope,
Un mannured, remanned: I hold it probable —
With something changeless at the heart of me
To know me by, some nucleus that's myself:
Accretions did it wrong? Away with them —
You soon shall see the use of fire!

Till when,

All that was, is; and must forever be.
Nor is it in me to unhate my hates, —
I use up my last strength to strike once more
Old Pietro in the wine-house-gossip-face,
To trample underfoot the whine and wail
Of beast Violante, — and I grow one gorgo
To loathingly reject Pompilia's pale
Poison my hasty hunger took for food,
A strong tree wants no wreaths about its trunk,
No cloying cups, no sickly sweet of scent,
But sustenance at root, a buckestful.
How else lived that Athenian who died so,
Drinking hot bull’s blood, fit for men like me?
I lived and died a man, and take man’s chance,
Honest and bold : right will be done to such.

Who are these you have let descend my stair?
His, their accursed psalm! ‘Treachery at the sill! Is it “Open” they dare bid you? Treachery?
Sirs, have I spoken one word all this while
Out of the world of words I had to say?
Not one word! All was folly — I laughed and mocked.

Sirs, my first true word, all truth and no lie,
Is — awe, awe, notwithstanding! Life is all!
I was just stark mad, — let the madman live
Pressed by as many chains as you please pile!
Don’t open! Hold me from them! I am yours.
I am the Granduke’s — no, I am the Pope’s!
Abate,— Cardinal,— Christ,— Maria,— God,...
Pompilias, will you let them murder me?

XII

THE BOOK AND THE RING

Here were the end, had anything an end:
Thus lit, and launched, up and up soared and soared.
A rocket, till the key o’ the vault was reached,
And wide heaven held, a breathless minute-space.

In brilliant usurpation: thus caught spark,
Rushed to the height, and hung at full of fame
Over men’s upturned faces, ghastly thenerce,
Our glaring Guido: now decline must be.

In its explosion, you have seen his act,
By my power — maybe, judged it by your own.

Or composite as good orbs prove, or crammed
With no worse ingredients than the Wormwood Star.

The act, over and ended, falls and fades:
What was once seen, grows what is now described,
Then talked of, told about, a tinge the less
In every fresh transmission; till it melts,
Trickles in silent orange or wan gray
Across our memory, dies and leaves all dark,
And presently we find the stars again.

Follow the main streaks, meditate the mode
Of brightness, how it hastes to blend with black!

After that February Twenty Two,
Since our salvation, Sixteen Ninety Eight,
Of all reports that were, or may have been,
Concerning those the day killed or let live.
Four I count only. Take the first that comes.
A letter from a stranger, man of rank,
Venetian visitor at Rome, — who knows,
On what pretence of busy idleness?
Thus he begins on evening of that day.

And constant shift of entertaining show:
With influx, from each quarter of the globe,
Of strangers nowise wishful to be last
I’ the struggle for a good place presently
When that befalls fate cannot long defer.
The old Pope totters on the verge o’ the grave:
You see, Malpighi understood far more
Than Tosti how to treat the ailments: age,
No question, renders these inveterate.
Cardinal Spada, actual Minister,
In possible Pope; I wager on his head,
Since those four entertainments of his niece
Which set all Rome a-scare: Pope probably Though Colloredo has his backers too,
And San Cesario makes one doubt at times:
Altieri will be Chamberlain at moest.

“A week ago the sun was warm like May,
And the old man took daily exercise
Along the river-side; he loves to see
That Custom-house he built upon the bank,
For, Naples-born, his tastes are maritime:
But yesterday he had to keep in-doors
Because of the outrageous rain that fell.
On such days the good soul has fainting-fits,
Or lies in stupor, scarcely makes believe
Of minding business, fumbles at his beads.
They say, the trust that keeps his heart alive
Is that, by lasting till December next,
He may hold Jubilee a second time,
And, twice in one reign, ope the Holy Doors.
By the way, somebody responsible
Assures me that the King of France has writ
Fresh orders: Fénelon will be condemned:
The Cardinal makes a wry face enough,
Having a love for the delinquent: still,
He’s the ambassador, must press the point.
Have you a wager too, dependent here?

“Now, from such matters to divert awhile,
Hear of to-day’s event which crowns the week.
Casts all the other wagers into shade.
Tell Dandolo I owe him fifty drops
Of heart’s blood in the shape of gold zoecmites.
The Pope has done his worst: I have to pay
For the execution of the Count, by Jove!
Two days since, I reported him as safe,
Re-echoing the conviction of all Rome:
Who could suspect its one deaf ear — the Pope’s?

But prejudices grow insuperable,
And that old enmity to Austria, that Passion for France and France’s pageant-king
(Of which, why pause to multiply the proofs
Now scandalously rise in Europe’s mouth?)
These fairly got the better in our man
Of justice, prudence, and esprit de corps,
And he persisted in the butchery.
Also, ’t is said that in his latest walk
To that Dogana-by-the-Bank he built,
The crowd, — he suffers question, unrebuked, —
Asked, ‘Whether murder was a privilege
Only reserved for nobles like the Count?’
And he was ever mindful of the mob.
Martinez, the Cassarean Minister,
— Who used his best endeavors to spare blood.
And strongly pleaded for the life ‘of one.’
Urged he, ‘I may have dined at table with .’
The Book and the Ring

He will not soon forget the Pope’s rebuff,
—Feels the slight sensibly, I promise you!
And but for the discussion of two eyes
That make with him foul weather or fine day,
He had abstained, nor graced the spectacle:
As it was, barely would he condescend
Look forth from the palchetto where he sat
Under the Ficinian: we shall hear of this!
The substituting, too, the People’s Square
For the out-o’-the-way old quarter by the Bridge,
Was meant as a conciliatory sop
To the mob; it gave one holiday the more.
But the French Embassy might unfurl flag,—
Still the good luck of France to fling a foe!
Cardinal Bouillon triumphs properly!
Paladotti were erected in the Place,
And houses, at the edge of the Three Streets,
Let their front windows at six dollars each:
Anguisciola, that patron of the arts,
Here our Eavvo Contarini too.

"Now for the thing; no sooner the decree
Gone forth,—‘tis four-and-twenty hours ago,—
Than Acciaiuoli and Pianciati,
Old friends, indeed compatriots of the man,
Being pitched on as the couple proppered
To intimate the sentence you are about,
Were closeted ere cock-crow with the Count.
They both report their efforts to dispose
The unhappy nobleman for ending well,
Despite the natural sense of injury,
Were crowned at last with a complete success.
And when the Company of Death arrived
At twenty-hours,—the way they reckon
here,—
We say, at sunset, after dinner-time,—
The Count was led down, hoisted up on car,
Last of the five, as heinoussest, you know:
Yet they allowed one whole car to each man.
His intrepidity, nay, nonchalance,
As up he stood and down he sat himself,
Struck admiration into those who saw.
Then the procession started, took the way
From the New Prisons by the Pilgrim’s Street,
The street of the Governo, Pasquin’s Street, (Where was stuck up, ‘mid other epigrams,
A quatrain... but of all that, presently!)\n\nThe Place Navona, the Pantheon’s Place,
Place of the Column, last the Corso’s length,
And so debouched thence at Mannia’s foot
’t the Place o’ the People. As is evident, (Despite the malice,—plainly meant, I fear,
By this abrupt change of locality,—
The Square’s no such bad place to head and hang)\n
We had the titillation as we sat
Assembled, (quality in conclave, ha?)
Of, minute after minute, some report
How the slow show was winding on its way.
Now did a car run over, kill a man.
Just opposite a pork-shop you would Twelve:
And bitter were the entreaties of the mob
Against the Pope: for, but that he forbids
The Lottery, why, Twelve were Term Quan-ters!
Now did a beggar by Saint Agnes, lame
From his youth up, recover use of leg,
Through prayer of Guido as he glanced that
way:
So that the crowd near crammed his hat with coin.
Thus wed kept up excitement to the last,
—Not an abrupt out-bolting, as of yore.
From Castle, over Bridge and on to block,
And so all ended ere you well could wink!

“'To mount the scaffold-steps, Guido was last
Here also, as atrociousest in crime.
We hardly noticed how the peasants died.
They dangled somehow soon to right and left,
And we remained all ears and eyes, could give Ourselves to Guido undividedly,
As he harangued the multitude beneath.
He begged forgiveness on the part of God,
And fair construction of his act from men,
Whose suffrage he entreated for his soul,
Suggesting that we should forthwith repeat
A Pater and an Ave, with the hymn
Salve Regina Calvi, for his sake.
Which said, he turned to the confessor, crossed
And reconciled himself, with decency,
Often glancing at Saint Mary’s opposite,
Where they possess, and showed in shrine to-
day,
The blessed Umbilicus of our Lord,
(A relic ’t is believed no other church
In Rome can boast of)—then rose up, as brisk
Knelt down again, bent head, adapted neck,
And, with the name of Jesus on his lips,
Received the fatal blow.

"The headsman showed
The head to the populace. Must I avouch
We strangers own to disappointment here?
Report pronounced him fully six feet high,
Youngish, considering his fifty years,
And, if not handsome, dignified at least.
Indeed, it was no face to please a wife!
His friends say, this was caused by the costume:
He wore the dress he did the murder in,
That is, a just-a-corps of rustem serje,
Black camisole, coarse cloak of barracan
(So they style here the garb of goat’s-hair cloth),
White hat and cotton cap beneath, poor Count,
Preservative against the evening dew
During the journey from Arezzo. Well,
So died the man, and so his end was peace;
Whereas many a moral were to meditate.
Spada—you may bet Dandolo—is Pope!
Now for the quatrains!"

No, friend, this will do!
You’ve sputtered into sparks. What streak cones next?
A letter: Don Giacinto Arcangeli,
Doctor and Proctor, him I made you mark
Buckle to business in his study late,
The virtuous sire, the valiant for the truth,
Acquaints his correspondent,—Florentine,
By name Cencini, advocate as well,
Socr is and brother-in-the-devil to match,—
A friend of Franceschini, anyhow,
And knit up with the bowels of the case,—
Acquaints him (in this paper that I touch)
How their joint effort to obtain reprieve
For Guido had so nearly nicked the nine
And ninety and one over,—folk would say,
At Taroco,—or succeeded,—in our phrase.
To this Concini's care I owe the Book,
The yellow thing I take and toss once more,—
How will it be, my four-years' intimate,
When thou and I part company anon?—
"T was he, the "whole position of the case,"
Pleading and summary, were put before;
Discreetly in my Book he bound them all,
Adding some three apostles to the point.
Here is the first of these, part fresh as penned,
The sand, that dried the ink, not rubbed away,
Though penned the day whereof it tells the deed:
Part extent just as plainly, you know where,
Whence came the other stuff, went, you know how,
To make the Ring that's all but round and done.

"Late they arrived, too late, egregious Sir,
Those same justificative points you urge
Might benefit His Blessed Memory
Count Guido Franceschini now with God:
Since the Court,—to state things succinctly,— styled
The Congregation of the Governor,
Having resolved on Tuesday last our cause
I' the guilty sense, with death for punishment,
Spite of all pleas by me deductible
In favor of said Blessed Memory,—
I, with expenditure of pains enough,
Obtained a reprieve, leave to claim and prove Exemption from the law's award,—alleged
The power and privilege o' the Clericats:
To which effect a courier was dispatched.
But ere an answer from Arezzo came,
The Heiress of our Lord the Pope (prepare I)
Judging it inexpedient to postpone
The execution of such sentence passed,
Saw fit, by his particular chirograph,
To derogate, dispense with privilege,
And wink at any hurt accruing thence to Mother Church through damage of her son:
Also, to overpass and set aside
That other plea on score of tender age,
Put forth by me to do Pasquini good,
One of the four in trouble with our friend.
So that all five, to-day, have suffered death
With no distinction save in dying,—he,
Decollate by mere due of privilege,
The rest hanged decently and in order. Thus
Came the Count to his end of gallant man,
Defunct in faith and exemplarity:
Nor shall the shield of his great House lose shine
Thereby, nor its blue banner blush to red.
This, too, should yield sustenance to our hearts—
He bore commiseration and respect
In his degree, from universal Rome,
Quantum est hominum venustiorum,
The nice and cultivated everywhere:

Though, in respect of me his advocate,
Needs must I groan o'er my debility,
Attribute the untoward event o' the strife
To nothing but my own crass ignorance
Which failed to set the valid reasons forth,
Find fit excuse: such is the fate of war!
May God compensate us the direful blow
By future blessings on his family,
While of dismay and the yoke commands;
—Whereo, as humbly, I confirm myself..."

And so forth,—follow name and place and date.
On next leaf—
"Hactenus senioribus!
There, old fox, show the clients t' other aids
And keep this corner sacred, I beseech!
You and your pleas and proofs were what folk call
Pleasing assistance, aid that comes too late,
Saves a man dead as nail in post of door.
Had I but time and space for narrative!
What was the good of twenty Clericats
When Somebody's thick headpiece once was bent
On seeing Guido's drop into the bag?
How these old men like giving youth a push!
So much the better: next push goes to him,
And a new Pope begins the century.
Much good I get by my superb defence!
But argument is solid and subsists,
While of vanity and iniquity
Accompany the owner to his tomb;
What do I care how soon? Beside, folks see!
Rome will have relished heartily the show,
Yet understood the motives, never fear.
Which caused the indecent change o' the People's Place
To the People's Playground,—stigmatizes the sprite
Which in a trice precipitated things!
As oft the moribund will give a kick
To show they are not absolutely dead,
So feebleness i' the socket shoots its last
A spirt of violence for energy!

"But thou, Concini, brother of my breast,
O fox, whose home is 'mid the tender grapes,
Whose couch in Tuscany by Themis' throne,
Subject to no much... best I shut my mouth
Or only open it again to say,
This pother and confusion fairly laid,
My hands are empty and my satche! hang.
Now then for both the Matrimonial Causes
And the case of Gomes! Serve them hot and hot!

"Reliqua differens in crastinum!
The impatient cassette cracks whip outside:
Still, though the earth should swallow him
Who swears
And me who make the mischief, in must slip—
My boy, your godson, fat-chaps Hyacinth,
Enjoyed the sight while Papa plodded here.
I promised him, the rogue, a month ago,
The day his birthday was, of all the days,
That if I failed to save Count Guido's head,
Cimocciola should at least go see it chopped
THE BOOK AND THE RING

From trunk — 'So, latinize your thanks!' quoth I,
'That I prefer, hoc traditum,' raps me out
The rogue: you notice the subjunctive? Ah!
Accordingly he sat there, bold in box,
Froud as the Pope behind the peacock-fans:
With a certain lady-patroness
For whom I manage things (my boy in front,
Her Marquis sat the third in evidence;
Boys have no eyes nor ears save for the show)
'This time, Cintino,' was her sportive word,
When whiz and thump went axe and mowed the lay man.
And folk could fall to the suspended chat,
'This time, you see, Bottini rakes the roast,
Nor can Papa with all his eloquence
Be reckoned on to help as heretofore';
Whereat Cinone pouts; then, sparkishly —
'Papa knew better than aggrandise his Pope,
And bade him of his grudge against our Count,
Else he'd have argued off Bottini's ... what?
'His nose' — the rogue! well parried of the boy!
He's long since out of Caesar (eight years old)
And as for tripping in Eupatorium ... well,
Reason the more that we strain every nerve
To do him justice, mould a mouth-mouth,
A Bartolus-sum-Baldo for next ages.
For that I purport the pieces, work the brain,
And want both Gomez and the marriage-case,
Success with which shall platter aught of pate
That's broken in me by Bottini's flail,
And bruise his own, belike, that wags and brags.
Adverti suspicio humilitar
Quod, don't the fungus see, the pop divine
That one hand drives two horses, left and right?
With this regis did I rescuse from the ditch
The fortune of our Franceschini, keep Unsplash the credit of a noble House,
And set the fashionable cause at Rome
A-prancing till bystanders shouted 'ware!
The other rain's judicious management
Suffered old Somebody to keep the pace,
Hobbily play the roadster: who but he
Had his opinion, was not led by the nose
In leash of quibbles strung to look like law!
You'll soon see, — when I go to pay devoir
And compliment him on confusing me,—
If, by a back-swing of the pendulum,
Grace be not, thick and threefold, consequent.
'I must decide as I see proper, Don!
I'm Pope, I have my inward lights for guide,
Had learning been the matter in dispute,
Could eloquence avail to gain say fact,
Yours were the victory, be comforted!'
Gianzzo will be gainer by it all.
Quick then with Gomez, hot and hot next case!'"

Follows, a letter, takes the other side.
Tall blue-eyed Fise whose head is capped with cloud,
Doctor Bottini, — to no matter who,
Writes on the Monday two days afterward.

Now shall the honest championship of right,
Crowned with success, enjoy at last, unblamed,
Moderate triumph! Now shall eloquence
Poured forth in fancied flood for virtue's sake,
(The print is sorrowfully dyked and dammed,
But shows where fain the unbridled force would flow)
Finding a channel — now shall this refresh
The thirsty donor with a drop or two!
Here has been truth at issue with a lie:
Let who gained truth the day have handsome pride
In his own prowess! Eh? What ails the man?

"'Well, it is over, ends as I foresaw:
Easily proved, Pompadour's innocence!
Catch them entrusting Guido's guilt to me
Who had, as usual, the plain truth to plead.
I always knew the clearness of the stream
Would show the fish so thoroughly, child might prong
The clumsy monster: with no mud to splash,
Small credit to lynx-eye and lightning-spear!
This Guido — much sport he contrived to make,
Who at first twist, preamble of the cord,
Turned white, told all, like the poltroon he was!"

Finished, as you expect, a penitent,
Fully confessed his crime, and made amends,
And, edifying Rome last Saturday,
Died like a saint, poor devil! That's the man
The gods still give to my antagonist:
Imagine how Arcangeli clape wing
And crowns! 'Such formidable facts to face,
So naked to attack, my client here,
And yet I kept a month the Fise at bay,
And in the end had foiled him of the prize
By this arch-stroke, this plea of privilege,
But that the Pope must gratify his whim,
Put in his word, poor old man, — let it pass!'
— Such is the cue to which all Rome responds.
What with the plain truth given me to uphold,
And, should I let truth slip, the Pope at hand
To pick up, steady her on legs again,
My office turns a pleasantry indeed!
Not that the burly boaster did one jot
O' the little was to do — young Spretti's work!
But for him, — mankin and dudiprat,
Mere candle-end and inch of cleverness
Stuck on Arcangeli's save-all, — but for him
The spruce young Spretti, what is bad were worse!

"'I looked that Rome should have the natural guard
At advocate with case that proves itself;
I knew Arcangeli would grin and brag:
But what say you to one impertinence
Might move a stone? That monk, you are to know,
That barefoot Augustinian whose report
O' the dying woman's words did detriment
To my best points it took the freshness from,
— That meddler preached to purpose yesterday
At San Lorenzo as a winding-up
O' the show which proved a treasure to the church.
Out comes his sermon smoking from the press:
Its text — 'Let God be true, and every man a liar' — and its application, this,
The longest-winded of the paragraphs,
I straighten unstitch, tear out and treat you with:
'T is piping hot and posts through Rome to-day.
Remember it, as I engage to do!

"But if you rather be disposed to see
In the result of the long trial here,—
This dealing doom to guilt and doling praise
To innocence,— any proof that truth
May look for vindication from the world,
Much will you have misread the signs, I say.
God, who seems acquiescent in the main
With those who add 'So will he ever sleep' —
Flatters their foolishness from time to time,
Puts forth his right-hand recognizably;
Even astute fools who deem he needs must right
Wrong on the instant, as if earth were heaven,
He wakes remonstrance — 'Passive, Lord,
how long?'
Because Pomphilia's purity prevails,
Conclude you, all truth triumphs in the end?—
So might those old inhabitants of the ark,
Witnessing haply their dove's safe return.
Pronounce there was no danger, all the while
O' the deluge, to the creature's counterparts, Aught that beat wing i' the world, was white or soft.—

And that the lark, the thrush, the culver too,
Might equally have traversed air, found earth,
And brought back olive-branch in unharmed bill.

Methinks I hear the Patriarch's warning voice—
'Though this one breast, by miracle, return,
No wave rolls by, in all the waste, but bears
Within it some dead dove-like thing as dear,
Beauty made blank and harmlessness destrойed!'

How many chaste and noble sister-names
Wanted the extricating hand, so lie
Strangled, for one Pomphilia proud above
The welter, plucked from the world's calumnys,
Stupidity, simplicity,— who cares?

"Romans! An elder race possessed your land
Long ago, and a false faith lingered still,
As shades do, though the morning-star be out.
Doubtless some pagan of the twilight-day
Has often pointed to a cavern-mouth,
Obnoxious to beholders, hard by Rome,
And said,— nor he a bad man, no, nor fool.—
Only a man born blind like all his mates,—
'Here skulk in safety, lurk, defying law,
The devotees to execrable creed,
Adoring—with what cults?—Jove, avert
Thy vengeance from us worshippers of thee! . . .

What rites obscene— their idol-god an Ass!'
So went the word forth, so acceptance found,
So century re-echoed century,

Cursed the accursed,— and so, from sire to son,
You Romans cried, 'The offspringings of our race,
Corrupt within the depths there: fitly fiends
Perform a temple-service o'er the dead:
Child, gather garment round thee, pass not pray!'
Thus groaned your generations: till the time
Grew ripe, and lightning had revealed, belike,—
Through crevice peeped into by curious fear,—
Some object god that could be recognized
In the place of spectres; on the illuminated wall,
To wit, some nook, tradition talks about,
Narrow and short, a corpse's length, no more:
And by it, in the due receptacle,
The little rude brown lamp of earthenware.
The cruse, was meant for flowers, but now held blood,
The rough-scratched palm-branch, and the legend left
Pro Christo. Then the mystery lay clear:
The abhorred one was a martyr all the time.
Heaven's gifts whoseof earth was not worthy.

What?
Do you continue in the old belief?
Where blackness bides unbroked, must devil brood?
Is it so, there is not another cell
O' the myriad that make up the catacomb,
Contains some saint a second flash would show?
Will you ascend into the light of day
And, having recognized a martyr's shrine,
Go join the votaries that gaze around
Each vulture above the market-place?
Are these the objects of your praising? — See!
In the outstretched right hand of Apollo, there,
Lies screened a scorpion: housed amid the folds
Of Juno's mantle lurks a centipede!
Each statue of a god were filthier styled
Demon and devil. Glorify no brass
That shines like burnished gold in noonday glare,
For fools! Be otherwise instructed, you!
And preferably ponder, ere ye judge,
Each incident of this strange human play
Privily acted on a theatre
That seemed secure from every gaze but God's,— Till, of a sudden, earthquake laid wall low
And let the world perceive wild work inside,
And how, in petrification of surprise,
The actors stood,— raised arm and planted foot,— Mouth as it made, eye as it evidenced,
Despairing shriek, triumphant hate,— transfigured.
Both he who takes and she who yields the life.

"As ye become spectators of this scene—
Watch obsequry of a pearl-pure fame
By vapor films, unwoven circumstance,
A soul made weak by its pathetic want
Of just the first apprenticeship to sin,
Which thenceforth makes the sinning soul secure
From all foes save itself, soul's truest foe,—
THE BOOK AND THE RING

Since egg turned snake needs fear no serpents,
As ye behold this web of circumstances
Deepen the more for every thrill and throe,
Convulsive effort to disperse the films
And dismush the fame o’ the martyr,—mark
How all those means, the unfriended one pursues,
To keep the treasure trusted to her breast,
Each struggle in the flight from death to life
How all, by procuration of the powers
Of darkness, are transformed,—no single ray,
Shot forth to show and save the innocent star,
But, passed as through hell’s prism, proceeding black
To the world that hates white: as ye watch, I say,
Till dusk and such defacement grow eclipse
By — marvellous perversity of man! —
The inadequacy and inaptitude,—
Of that selfsame machine, that very law
Man vaunts, devised to dissipate the gloom
Rescue the drowning orb from calumny,
— Hear law, appointed to defend the just,
Submit, for best defense, that wickedness
Was bred of flesh and innate with the bone
Borne by Pompeilia’s spirit for a space,
And no mere chance fault, passionate and brief:
Finally, when ye find, — after this touch
Of man’s protection which intends to mar
The last pin-point of light and damn the die, —
One wave of the hand of God amid the worlds
Bid vapor vanish, darkness flee away,
And let the vexed star culminate in peace
Approachable no more by earthly mist —
What I call God’s hand,—you, perhaps, — more chance
Of the true instinct of an old good man
Who happens to hate darkness and love light,—
In whom too was the eye that saw, not dim,
The natural force to do the thing he saw,
Not less abused, — both by miracle,
All this well pondered,— I demand assent
To the enunciation of my text.
In face of one proof more that ‘God is true
And every man a liar’—that who trusts
To human testimony for a fact
Geta this sole fact — himself is proved a fool;
Man’s speech being false, if but by consequence
That only strength is true! while man is weak,
And, since truth seem reserved for heaven not earth,
Plagued here by earth’s prerogative of lies,
Should learn to love and long for what, one day,
Approved by life’s probation, he may speak.

"For me, the weary and worn, who happily prompt
To mirth or pity, as I move the mood,—
A friar who glides unnoticed to the grave,
With these bare feet, coarse robe and rope-girt waist,—
I have long since renounced your world, ye know
Yet what forbids I weigh the prize foregone,
The worldly worth? I dare, as I were dead,
Disinterestedly judge this and that
Good ye account good: but God tries the heart.
Still, if you question me of my content
At having put each human pleasure by,
I answer, at the urgency of truth:
As this world seems, I dare not say I know
— Apart from Christ’s assurance which decides —
Whether I have not failed to taste much joy.
For many a doubt will fain perturb my choice
Many a dream of life spent otherwise —
How human love, in varied shapes, might work
As glory, or as rapture, or as grace:
How conversancy with the books that teach,
The arts that help, — how, to grow good and great,
Rather than simply good, and bring thereby
Goodness to breathe and live, nor born, ‘tis the brain
Die there, — how these and many another gift
Of life are precious though abjured by me.
But, for one prize, best meed of mightiest man,
Arch-object of ambition,—earthly praise,
Repute o’ the world, the flourish of loud trump,
The softer social flattering, — Oh, for these,
— No, my friends! Fame, — that bubble which,
world-wide
Each blows and bids his neighbor lend a breath,
That so he happily may behold thereon
One more enlarged distorted false fool’s face
Until some glassy nothing grown as big
Send by a touch the imperishable to ends, —
No, in renouncing fame, my loss was light,
Choosing obscurity, my chance was well!"

Didn’t ever touch such ampollosity
As the monk’s own bubble, let alone its spit?
What’s his speech for, but just the fame he flouts?
How he dares reprehend both high and low,
Nor stoops to turn the sentence “God is true
And every man a liar” — save the Pope
Happily reigning — my respects to him!”
And so round off the period. Molinism
Simple and pure! To what pitch go we next?
I find that, for first pleasant consequence,
Gomez, who had intended to appeal
From the absurd decision of the Court,
Declines, though plain enough his privilege,
To call on help from lawyers any more —
Resolves earth’s liars may possess the world,
Till God have had sufficiency of both:
So may I whistle for my job and fee!

But, for this virulent and rabid monk, —
If law be an inadequate machine,
And advocacy, froth and impotence,
We shall soon see, my blatant brother! That’s Exactly what I hope to show your sort!
For, by a veritable piece of luck
The providence, you monks round period with,
All may be gloriously retrieved. Perpend!
That Monastery of the Convertites
Where to the Court consigned Pompeilia first,
— Observe, if convertite, why, sinner then,
Or what’s the pertinency of award? —
And whither she was late returned to die,
THE RING AND THE BOOK

—Still in their jurisdiction, mark again! —
That thrifty Sisterhood, for pruriute,
Claims every piece whereof may die possessed
Each sinner in the circuit of its walls.
Round him Pompilia sawing by his death
O’ the couple, all their wealth devoted on her,
Straight utilized the respite are decease,
By regular conveyance of the goods
She thought her own, to will and to devise, —
Gave all to friends, Tighetti and the like,
In trust for him she held her son and heir,
Gaetano, — trust which ends with infancy:
So willing and devising, since assured
The justice of the court would presently
Confirm her in her rights and exemptile,
Re-integrate and rehabilitate —
Place her as, through my pleading, now she stands.

But here’s the capital mistake: the Court
Found Guido guilty, — but pronounced no word
About the innocence of his wife:
I ground charge on broader base, I hope!
No matter whether wife be true or false,
The husband must not push aside the law,
And punish of a sudden: that’s the point:
Gather from out my speech the contrary!
It follows that Pompilia, unrelieved
By martial sentence from all imputed guilt,
Remains unfit to have and to dispose
Of property which law provides shall lapse:
Wherefore the Monastery claims its due.
And whose, pray, whose, the office, but the Fisco’s?
Who but I institute procedure next
Upon the persons of the dead Guido’s life.
Pompilia, whom last week I sauntered so?
I it is teach the monk what scripture means,
And that the tongue should prove a two-edged sword,
No axe sharp one side, blunt the other way.

Like what amused the town at Guido’s cost!
Astra redux! I’ve a second chance
Before the selfsame Court o’ the Governor
Who soon shall see volte-face and chop, change sides.

Accordingly, I charge you on your life,
Send me with all dispatch the judgment late
O’ the Florence Rota Court, confirmative
O’ the prior judgment at Arezzo, clenched
Again by the Granducal signature,
Wherein Pompilia is convicted, doomed,
And only destined to escape through flight
The proper punishment. Send me the piece, —
I’ll work it! And this foul-mouthed friar shall find
His Noah’s-dove that brought the olive back
Turn into quite the other sooty soot,
The raven, Noah first put forth the ark,
Which never came back, but ate carcasses! —
No adequate machinery in law?
No power of life and death i’ the learned tongue?

Method I am already at my speech,
Startle the world with “Thou, Pompilia, thus?
How is the fine gold of the Temple dim!”
And so forth. But the courier bids me close,
And clip away one joke that runs through Rome,
Side by side with the sermon which I send.

How like the heartlessness of the old hunks
Arcangelis! His Count is hardly cold.
The client whom his blunders sacrificed,
When somebody must needs describe the scene.

How the procession ended at the church
That boasts the famous relic: quoth our brute.
“Why, that’s a just Martial’s phrase for ‘make an end’ —
Aubicalicum sic perventum est!”
The callous dog, — let who will cut off head,
He cuts a joke, and cares no more than so!
I think my speech shall modify his mirth:
“How is the fine gold dim!” — but send the piece!

Alack, Bottini, what is my next word
But death to all that hope? The Instrument
Is plain before me, print that ends my Book
With the definitive verdict of the Court,
Dated September, six months afterward,
(Such trouble and so long the old Pope gave!) —
In restitution of the perfect fame
Of dead Pompilia, quondam Guido’s wife,
And warrant to her representative
Domenico Tighetti, barred hereby,
While doing duty in his guardianship,
From all unmerited guilt of false attainder,
Each perturbation and vexation brought
Or threatened to be brought against the heir
By the Most Venerable Convent called Saint Mary Magdalen o’ the Conversites
I’ the Corso.” —
Justice done a second time!
Well judged, Marc Antony, Locum-teneurs
O’ the Governor, a Venturini too!
For which I save thy name, — last of the list!

Next year but one, completing his nine years
Of rule in Rome, died Innocent my Pope
— By some account, on his accession-day.
If he thought doubt would do the next age good,
’Tis pity he died unpurged what birth
His reign may boast of, be remembered by —
Terrible Pope, too, of a kind, — Voltaire.

And so an end of all i’ the story. Strain
Never so much my eyes, I miss the mark.
If lived or died that Gaetano, child
Of Guido and Pompilia; only find
Immediately upon his father’s death,
A record, in the annals of the town —
That Porzia, sister of our Guido, moved
The Priors of Arezzo and their head
Its Gonfaloner to give loyally
A public attestation of the right
O’ the Franceschini to all reverence —
Apparently because of the incident
O’ the murder, — there’s no mention made o’ the crime.
But what else could have caused such urgency
To cure the mob, just then, of greediness
For scandal, love of lying vanity,
And appetite to swallow crude reports
That bring annoyance to their betters? — base
Which, here, was promptly met by antidote.
I like and shall translate the eloquence
HELEN'S TOWER

Of nearly the worst Latin ever writ:
"Since anique time whereof the memory
Holds the beginning, to this present hour,
The Franceschini ever shone, and shine
Still i' the primary rank, supreme amid
The lustre of Arezzo, proud to own
In this great family, the flag-bearer,
Guide of her steps and guardian against foe,—
As in the first beginning, so to-day!"
There, would you disbelieve the annalist,
Go rather by the babble of a bard?
I thought, Arezzo, thou hadst fitter souls,
Petrarca, — may, Bionarroti, a pinch,
To do thee credit as vexillifer!
Was it mere mirth the Patavian meant,
Making thee out, in his veracious page,
Founded by Janus of the Double Face?

Well, proving of such perfect parentage,
Our Cestano, born of love and hate,
Did the babe live or die? I fain would find!
What were his fancies if he grew a man?
Was he proud, — a true son of the stock
Whose bane the blazon, shall make bright my
—
Shield, Azure, on a Triple Mountain, Or,
A Palm-tree, Proper, wherunto is tied
A Greyhound, Rampant, striving in the slips?
Or did he love his mother, the base-born,
And fight i' the ranks, unnoticed by the world?

Such, then, the final state o' the story. So
Did the Star Wormwood in a blazing fall
Frighten awhile the waters and lie lost.
So did this woe fade from memory:—
Till after, in the fulness of the days,
I seeds must find an ember yet unquenched.
And, breathing, blow the spark to flame. It lives,
If precious be the soul of man to man.

So, British Public, who may like me yet, (Marry and amen!) learn one lesson hence
Of many which whatever lives should teach:
This lesson, that our human speech is naught,
Our human testimony false, our fame
And human estimation words and wind.
Why take the artistic way to prove so much?
Because, it is the glory and good of Art,
That Art remains the one way possible
Of speaking truth, to mouths like mine at least.
How look a brother in the face and say,
"Thy right is wrong, eyes hast thou yet art
blind;
Thine ears are stuffed and stopped, despite their

And, oh, the foolishness thou countest faith! "
Say this as silverly as tongue can toll
The anguish of the man may be endured,
The shrug, the disappointed eye of him
Are not so bad to bear — but here's the plague
That all this trouble comes of telling truth,
Which truth, by when it reaches him, looks false,
Seems to be just the thing it would supplant,
Nor recognisable by whom it left:
While falsehood would have done the work of
truth.
But Art, — wherein man nowise speaks to men,
Only to mankind. — Art may tell a truth
Obliquely, do the thing shall breed the thought,
Nor wrong the thought, missing the mediate
word.
So may you paint your picture, twice show
truth,
Beyond mere imagery on the wall,—
So, note by note, bring music from your mind,
Deeper than ever s'en Beethoven dived,—
So write a book shall mean beyond the facts,
Suffice the eye and save the soul beside.

And save the soul! If this intent save mine,—
If the rough ore be rounded to a ring,
Ronder all dint which good ring should do,
And, falling grace, succeed in guardianship,—
Might mine but lie outside thine, Lyric Love,
Thy rare gold ring of verse (the poet praised)
Linking our England to his Italy!

HELEN'S TOWER

Written at the request of the Earl of Dufferin and Clandeboye, who had built a tower to the memory of his mother, Helen, Countess of Giffard, on a rock on his estate at Clandeboye, Ireland, and printed in the Pall Mall Gazette of December 28, 1883.

Who hears of Helen's Tower, may dream perchance
How the Greek Beauty from the Saxon Gate
Gazed on old friends unanimous in hate,
Death-doom'd because of her fair countenance.

Hearts would leap otherwise, at thy advance,
Lady, to whom this Tower is consecrate!
Like hers, thy face once made all eyes elate,
Yet, unlike hers, was bless'd by every glance.

The Tower of Hate is outworn, far and strange:
A transitory shame of long ago,
It dies into the sand from which it sprang:
But thine, Love's rock-built Tower, shall fear
no change:
God's self laid stable earth's foundation so,
When all the morning-stars together sang.

BALAUSTION'S ADVENTURE

INCLUDING

A TRANSCRIPT FROM EURIPIDES

"Our Euripides, the Human,
With his droppings of warm tears,
And his touches of things common
Till they rose to touch the spheres."

TO THE COUNTESS COWPER

If I mention the simple truth, that this poem absolutely owes its existence to you,—who not only suggested, but imposed on me as a task, what has proved the most delightful of May-month amusements,—I shall seem honest, indeed, but hardly prudent; for, how good and beautiful ought such a poem to be!

Euripides might fear little; but I, also, have an interest in the performance; and what wonder if I beg you to suffer that it make, in another and far easier sense, its nearest possible approach to those Greek qualities of goodness and beauty, by laying itself gratefully at your feet?

R. B.

LONDON, July 23, 1871.

After the publication of the fourth volume of The Ring and the Book in February, 1869, Browning published nothing until March, 1871, when he printed Hervé Riel in the Cornhill Magazine, afterward including it in his first new volume of collected poems. In August of the same year appeared the first of his larger ventures in the field of Greek life. This poem was followed four years later by Aristophanes' Apology, and it is so intimately connected with Balaustion's Adventure that in this edition it is made to follow it, though the chronological sequence was broken, as will be seen, by the composition and publication of other considerable works. The motto at the head of the poem is from Mrs. Browning, and in the last lines of the poem Browning couples her with his friend Sir Frederick Leighton.

About that strangest, saddest, sweetest song
I, when a girl, heard in Kameiros once,
And, after, saved my life by? Oh, so glad
To tell you the adventure! Petali,
Phyllis, Charopé, Chrusion! You must know,
This "after" fell in that unhappy time
When poor reluctant Nikias, pushed by fate,
Went falteringly against Syracuse;
And there ashamed Athens, lost her ships and men,
And gained a grave, or death without a grave.
I was at Rhodes—the isle, not Rhodes the town.
Mine was Kameiros—when the news arrived:
Our people rose in tumult, cried, "No more Duty to Athens, let us join the League
And side with Sparta, share the spoil,—at worst,
Abjure a headship that will ruin Greece!"
And so, they sent to Knidos for a fleet
To come and help revolters. Ere help came,— Girl as I was, and never out of Rhodes
The whole of my first fourteen years of life,
But nourished with Ilissian mother’s milk,—
I passionately cried to who would hear

And those who loved me at Kameiros—"No!
Never throw Athens off for Sparta’s sake—
Never disloyal to the life and light
Of the whole world worth calling world at all:
Rather go die at Athens, lie outstretched
For feet to trample on, before the gate
Of Diomedes or the Hippodai,
Before the temples and among the tombs,
Than tolerate the grim felicity
Of harsh Lakonia! Ours the faults and feasts,
Chois and Chutrois; ours the sacred grove,
Agora, Dikasteria, Poikile,
Pyx, Keramikos; Salamis in sight,
Peutattia, Marathon itself, not far!
Ours the great Dionnysian theatre,
And tragic triad of immortal names,
Aischulos, Sophokles, Euripidos!
To Athens, all of us that have a soul,
Follow me!" And I wrought so with my prayer.

That certain of my kinsfolk crossed the strait
And found a ship at Kaunos; well-disposed
Because the Captain—where did he draw breath
First but within Peutattia? Thither sped
A few like-minded as ourselves. We turned
The glad prow westward, soon were out at sea,
Pushing, brave ship with the vermilion sheet,
 Proud for our heart's true harbor. But a wind
Lay ambushed by Point Malea of bad fame,
And leapt out, bent us from our course. Next day
Broke stormless, so broke next blue day and next.
"But whither bound in this white waste?"
we plagued.
The pilot's old experience: "Crete or Crete?"
Because he promised us the land ahead.
While we strained eyes to share in what he saw,
The Captain's shout startled us; round we rushed:
What hung behind us but a pirate-ship
Panting for the good prize! "Row! harder row!
Row for dear life!" the Captain cried: "'tis Crete,
Friendly Crete looming large there! Beat this craft
That's but a keels, one-banked pirate-bark,
Lokrias, or that bad breed off Thessaly!
Only, so cruel are such water-thieves,
No man of you, no woman, child, or slave,
But falls their prey, once let them board our boat!"
So, furiously our oarsmen rowed and rowed:
And when the oars flagged somewhat, dash and dip.
As we approached the coast and safety, so
That we could hear behind us plain the threats
And curses of the pirate panting up
In one more three and passion of pursuit,—
Seeing our oars flag in the rise and fall,
I sprang upon the altar by the mast
And sang aloft — some genius prompting me —
That song of ours which saved at Salamis:
"Oh sons of Greeks, go, set your country free,
Free your wives, free your children, free
The foe.
O' the Gods, your fathers founded,—sepulchre
They sleep in! Or save all, or all be lost!"
Then, in a frenzy, so the noble oars
Churned the black water white, that well away
We drew, soon saw land rise, saw hills grow up,
Saw spread itself a sea-wide town with towers,
Not fifty stadia distant; and, betwixt
A large bay and a small, the islet-bar,
Ere Ortygia's self — oh, luckless we! For hers was Sicily and Syracuse:
We ran upon the lion from the wolf.
Ere we drew breath, took counsel, out there came
A galley, hailed us. "Who asks entry here
In war-time? Are you Sparta's friend or foe?"
"Kassians," — our Captain judged his best reply,
"The mainland-seaport that belongs to Rhodes;
Rhodes that casts in her lot now with the League
Forsaking Athens, — you have heard belike!"
"Ay, but we heard all Athens in one ode
Just now! we heard her in that Aischulos!
You bring a hostful of Athenians here,
Kassians although you be: and prudence bids,
For Kassos' sake, why, carry them unhurt.
To Kassos, if you will: for Athens' sake,
Back must you, though ten pirates blocked the bay!
We want no colony from Athens here,
With memories of Salamis, forsooth,
To spirit up our captives, that pale crowd
I' the quarry, whom the daily pint of corn
Keeps in good order and submissiveness."
Then the gray Captain prayed them by the Gods,
And by their own knees, and their fathers' beards.
They should not wickedly thrust suppliants back,
But save the innocent on traffic bound —
Or, maybe, some Athenian family
Perishing of desire to die at home—
From that vile foe still lying on its ears,
Waiting the issue in the distance. Vain!
Words to the wind! And we were just about
To turn and face the foe, as some tired bird
Barbarians pelt at, drive with shouts away
From shelter in what rocks, however rude,
She makes for, to escape the kindled eye,
Split beak, crook'd claw o' the creature, cormorant
Or ossefrage, that, hardly baffled, hangs
Afloat i' the foam, to take her if she turn.
So were we at the distraction's very edge,
When those o' the galley, as they had discussed
A point, a question raised by somebody,
A matter mooted in a moment,—"Wait!"
Cried they (and wait we did, you may be sure).
"That song was veritable Aischulos,
Familiar to the mouth of man and boy,
Old glory: how about Euripides?
The newer and not yet so famous bard,
He that was born upon the battle-day
While that song and the salping sounded him
Into the world, first sound, at Salamis —
Might you know any of his verses too?"
Now, some one of the Gods inspired this speech:
Since ourselves knew what happened but last year —
How, when Gylippus gained his victory
Over poor Nikias, poor Demoethenes,
And Syracuse condemned the conquered force
To dig and starve i' the quarry, branded them —
Freeborn Athenians, brute-like in the front
With horse-head brands, — ah, "Region of the Steed"! —
Of all these men immersed in misery,
It was found none had been advantaged so
By aught in the past life he used to prize
And pride himself concerning, — no rich man
By riches, no wise man by wisdom, no
Wiser man still (as he who loved more the Muse)
By storing, at brain's edge and tip of tongue,
Old glory, great plays that had long ago
Made themselves wings to fly about the world —
Not one such man was helped so at his need
As certain few that (wiser they of all)
Had, at first summons, oped heart, flung door wide
At the new knocking of Euripides,
Nor drawn the bolt with who cried "Decadence!"
And, after Sophokles, be nature dumb!"
Such, and I see in God Bacchos' boon
To souls that recognized his latest child,
He who himself, born latest of the Gods,
Was stoutly held impostor by mankind,—
Such were in safety: any who could speak
A chorus to the end, or prolong it.
Roll out a rhona, wield some golden length
Stiffened by wisdom out into a line,
Or thrust and parry in bright monoetish,
Teaching Euripides to Syracuse —
Any such happy man had prompt reward:
If he lay bleeding on the battlefield
They stanch his wounds and gave him drink and food;
If he were slave i' the house, for reverence
They rose up, bowed to who proved master
now.
And he did him go free, thank Euripides!
Ay, and such did so: many such, he said,
Returning home to Athens, sought him out,
The old bard in the solitary house,
And thanked him ere they went to sacrifice.
I say, we know that story of last year!

Therefore, at mention of Euripides,
The Captain crowed out, "Enoi, praise the
God!
Oopp, boys, bring our owl-shield to the fore!
Out with our Sacred Anchor! Here she Balaustion! Strangers, greet the lyric girl!
Euripides! Babari! what a word there 'scaped
Your teeth's enclosure, quoth my grandsire's song!

Why, fast as snow in Thracoe, the voyage
Through,
Has she been falling thick in flakes of him!
Frequent as figs at Kanuo, Kaunians said.
Balaustion, stand forth and confirm my speech!
Now it was some whole passion of a play;
Now, peradventure, but a honey-drop
That alipt its comb? if the chorus. If there rose
A star, before I could determine steer
Southward or northward — if a cloud surprised
Heaven, ere I fairly hollied 'Furl the sail,?' —
She had at fingers' end both cloud and star;
Some thought that perched there, tame and tunable,
Fitted with wings; and still, as off it flew,
'So sang Euripides,' she said, 'so sang
The meteoric poet of air and sea,
Planets and the pale populace of heaven,
The mind of man, and all that's made to soar!'
And so, although she has some other name,
We only call her Wild-pomegranate-flower,
Balaustion; since, where'er the red bloom burns
I' the dull dark verdure of the bounteous tree,
Dethroning in the Roys' isle, the rose,
You shall find food, drink, odor, all at once;
Cool leaves to bind about an aching brow,
And, never much away, the nightingale.
Sing them a strophe, with the turn-again,
I saw the master: when we found ourselves (Both the yeilding men must follow me) Fir'm on Petraeus, I demanded first Whither to go and find him. Would you think?
The story how he saved us made some smile:
They wondered strangers were exorbitant
In estimation of Euripides.
He was not Aischines nor Sophokles:
"Then, of our younger bards who boast the bay,
Had I sought Agathon, or Jophon,
Or, what now had it been Kephisophon?
A man that never kept good company,
The most inscrutable of all mankind.
All heard that was not frockle in his face!"

I soon was at the tragic house, and saw
The master, held the sacred hand of him
And laid it to my lips. Men love him not:
How should they? Nor do they much love his friend
Sokrates: but those two have fellowship:
Sokrates often comes to hear him read,
And never misses if he teach a piece.
Both being old, will soon have company,
Sit with their peers above the talk. Meantime,
He lives as should a statue in its niche;
Cold walls enclose him, mostly darkness there,
Alone, unless some foreigner unshackled
Breaks in, sits, stays an hour, and so departs.
But nothing worth sustaining his life,
Dry to the marrow 'mid much merchandise.
How should such know and love the man?

Why, mark! Even when I told the play and got the praise,
There spoke up a brisk little somebody,
Critic and whispermonger, in a rage
To set things right: "Ah! The girl departs from truth!

Pretends she saw what was not to be seen,
Making the mask of the actor move, forsooth!"
"Then a fair fitter o'er his wife's white face,"
— "Then frowned the father, — then the husband shook, —

"Then from the festal forehead slip each spray,
And the heroic month's gay grace was gone;"
—as she had seen each naked fleshly face,
And not the merely-painted mask it wore!

Well, is the explanation difficult?
What's poetry except a power that makes?
And, speaking to one sense, inspires the rest,
Pressing them all into its service; so
That who sees painting, seems to hear as well
The speech that's proper for the painted mouth;
And who hears music, feels his solitude
Peopled at once — for how count heartbeats
plain
Unless a company, with hearts which best,
Come close to the musician, seen or no?
And who receives true verse at eye or ear,
Takes in (with verse) time, place, and person too,
So, links each sense on to its sister-sense.
Grace-like: and what if but one sense of three Front you at once? The sidelong pair conceive
Through faintest touch of finest finger-tips, —
Hear, see and feel, in faith's simplicity,
Alike, what one was sole recipient of:
Who hears the poem, therefore, sees the play.

Enough and too much! Hear the play itself!
Under the grape-vines, by the street-side,
Close to Baccoin; till the cool increases,
And other stars steal on the evening-star,
And so, we homeward flock i' the dusk, we five!
You will expect, no one of all the words
Of the play but is grown part now of my soul,
Since the adventure. 'T is the poet speaks:
But if I, too, should try and speak at times,
Leading your love to where my love, perchance,
Climbed earlier, found a nest before you knew —
Why, bear with the poor climber, for love's sake!
Look at Baccoin's beauty opposite,
The temple with the pillars at the porch!
See you not something beside masonry?
What if my words wind in and out the stone
As yonder ivy, the God's parasite?
Though they leap all the way the pillar leads,
Festoon about the marble, foot to frieze,
And serpentingly enrich the roof,
Toy with some few bees and a bird or two, —
What then? The column holds the cornice up!

There slept a silent palace in the sun,
With plains adjacent and Thessalian peace —
Phereus, where King Admetos ruled the land.

Out from the portico there gleamed a God,
Apollo: for the bow was in his hand,
The quiver at his shoulder, all his shape
One dreadful beauty. And he hailed the house,
As if he knew it well and loved it much:
"O Admetian domes, where I endured,
Even the God I am, to drudge awhile,
Do righteous penance for a reckless deed,
Accepting the slaves' table thankfully!"
Then told how Zeus had been the cause of all,
Raising the wrath in him which took revenge
And slew those forgers of the thunderbolt
Wherewith Zeus blazed the life from out the breast

Of Phoibos' son Aaklepios (I surmise,
Because he brought the dead to life again),
And so, for punishment, must needs go slave,
God as he was, with a mere mortal lord:
—Told how he came to King Admetos' land,
And played the ministrant, was herdsman there,
Warding all harm away from him and his Till now: "For, holy as I am," said he,
"The lord I chanced upon was holy too:
Whence I deceived the Moirai, drew from death
My master, this same son of Phereus, — ay,
The Goddesses condescended him escape
From Hades, when the fated day should fall,
Could he exchange lives, find some friendly one
Ready, for his sake, to contest the grave,
But trying all in turn, the friendly list,
Why, he found no one, none who loved so much,
Nor father, nor the aged mother's self
That bore him, no, not any save his wife,
Willing to die instead of him and watch
Never a sunrise nor a sunset more:
And she is even now within the house,
Upborne by pitying hands, the feeble frame
BALAUSTON'S ADVENTURE

Gaspings its last of life out; since to-day
Destiny is accomplished, and she dies,
And I, lest here pollution light on me,
Leave, as ye witness, all my wonted joy
In this dear dwelling. Ay, — for here comes Death.
Close on us of a sudden! who, pale priest
Of the mute people, means to bear his prey
To the house of Hades. The symmetric step!
How he treads true to time and place and thing,
Dogging day, hour and minute, for death's
due !

And we observed another Deity,
Half in, half out of the portal,— watch and ward,—
Eying his fellow: formidably fixed,
Yet faltering too at who affronted him,
As somehow disadvantaged, ahonld they strive.
Like some dread heapy blackness, ruffled wing,
Convulsed and cowering head that is all eye,
Which proves a ruined eagle who, too blind
Swooping in quest o' the quarry, fawn or kid.
Descored deep down the chasm 'twixt rock and rock,
Has wedged and mortised, into either wall
O' the mountain, the pent earthquake of his power;
So lies, half heartless yet still terrible,
Just when — who stalks up, who stands front
to front,
But the great lion-guarder of the gorge,
Lord of the ground, a stationed glory there !
Yet he too pauses are he try the worst
O' the frightful unfamiliar nature, new
To the chasm, indeed, but elsewhere known
enough,
Among the shadows and the silences
Above i' the sky: so, each antagonist
Silently faced his fellow and forbore.
Till Death shrilled, hard and quick, in spite
and fear:

"Ha, ha, and what mayst thou do at the domes,
Why hauntest here, thou Phoibos? Here
again
At the old injustice, limiting our rights,
Balking of honor due us Gods o' the grave?
Was't not enough for thee to have delayed
Death from Admetas, — with thy crafty art
Cheating the very Fates, — but thou must arm
The bow-hand and take station, press 'twixt
me
And Felix's daughter, who then saved her spouse, —
Did just that, now thou comest to undo,—
Taking his place to die, Alcestis here ?"
But the God sighed. "Have courage! All my arms,
This time, are simple justice and fair words."
Then each plied each with rapid interchange:

"What need of bow, were justice arms
enough?"

"Ever it is my wont to bear the bow."

"Ay, and with bow, not justice, help this house?"
"I help it, since a friend's woe weighs me too."
"And now, — wilt force from me this second corpse?"
"By force I took no corpse at first from thee."
"How then is he above ground, not beneath?"
"He gave his wife instead of him, thy prey."
"And prey, this time at least, I bear below!"
"Go take her! — for I doubt persuading thee . . ."
"To kill the doomed one? What my functions
else?"
"No! Rather, to dispatch the true mature."
"Truly I take thy meaning, see thy drift!"
"Is there a way then she may reach old age?"
"No way! I glad me in my honors too!"
"But, young or old, thou tak'st one life, as
more!"
"Younger they die, greater my praise redounds!"
"If she die old, — the sumptuous funeral!"
"Thou layest down a law the rich would Like."
"How so? Did wit lurk there and 'escape thy sense?"
"Who could buy substitutes would die old men."
"It seems thou wilt not grant me, then, this grace?"
"This grace I will not grant: thou know'st my ways."
"Ways harsh to men, hateful to Gods, at least!"
"All things thou canst not have: my rights for me!"

And then Apollon prophesied, — I think,
More to himself than to impatient Death,
Who did not hear or would not heed the
while,—
For he went on to say, "Yet even so,
Cruel above the measure, thou shalt clutch
No life here! Such a man do I perceive
Advancing to the house of Phereas now,
Sent by Eurystheus to bring out of Thrace,
The winter world, a chariot with its steeds!
BALAUSTION’S ADVENTURE

He indeed, when Admetos proves the host,
And he the guest, at the house here,—he it is Shall bring to bear such force, and from thy
hands
Rescue this woman! Grace no whit to me
Will that prove, since thou dost thy deeds the
same,
And earnest too my hate, and all for naught!"

But how should Death or stay or understand?
Doubtless, he only felt the hour was come,
And the sword free; for he but flung some taunt—
"Having taunted much, thou wilt not gain the
more!
This woman, then, descends to Hades' hall
Now that I rush on her, begin the rites
O' the sword; for sacred, to us Gods below,
That head whose hair this sword shall sanctify!"

And, in the fire-flash of the appalling sword,
The uprush and the outburst, the onslaught
Of Death's portentous passage through the door,
Apollon stood a pitying moment-space;
I caught that last golden gaze upon the night
Nearing the world now: and the God was
gone,
And mortals left to deal with misery,
As in came stealing slow, now this, now that Old sojourner throughout the country-side,
Servants grown friends to those unhappy here:
And, eldolike in their increase, all these griefs
Broke and began the over-brimming wall,
Out of a common impulse, word by word.

"What now may mean the silence at the door?
Why is Admetos' mansion stricken dumb?
Not one friend near, to say if we should mourn
Our mistress dead, or if Alkestis lives
And sees the light still, Felias' child—to me,
To all, conspiciously the best of wives
That ever was toward husband in this world!
Hears any one or wall beneath the roof,
Or hands that strike each other, or the groan
Announcing all is done and naught to dread?
Still not a servant stationed at the gates!
O Pausan, that thou shouldst disport the wave
O' the woe, be present! Yet, had woe o'erwhelmed
The housemates, they were hardly silent thus:
It cannot be, the dead is forth and gone.
Whence comes thy gleam of hope? I dare not
hope:
What is the circumstance that heartens thee?
How could Admetos have dismissed a wife
So worthy, unscorched to the grave?
Before the gates I see no hallowed vase
Of fountain-water, such as suits death's door;
Nor any elipt looks strew the vestibule,
Though surely these drop when we grieve the
dead,
Nor hand sounds smitten against youthful
The women's way. And yet—the appointed
time—
How speak the word?—this day is even the day

Ordained her for departing from its light.
O touch calamitous to heart and soul!
Needs must one, when the good are tortured so,
Sorrow,—one reckoned faithful from the first."

Then their souls rose together, and one sigh
Went up in cadence from the common mouth:
How "Vainly — anywhither in the world
Directing or land-labor or sea-search —
To Lukis or the sand-waste, Ammon's seat —
Might you set free their hapless lady's soul
From the abrupt Fate's footstep instant now.
Not a sheep-sacrificer at the hearths
Of Gods had they to go to: one there was
Who, if his eyes saw light still,—Phoibos' son,
Had wrought so, she might leave the shadowy places
And Hades' portal: for he propped up Death's Subdued ones, till the Zeus-ffung thunder-flame
Struck him; and now what hope of life were hailed
With open arms? For, all the king could do
Is done already,—not one God wethers of
The altar fails to seek with sacrifice:
And for assemenage of these evils — naught!"

But here they broke off, for a matron moved Forth from the house: and, as her tears flowed
fast,
They gathered round. "What fortune shall we hear?
For mourning thus, if aught affect thy lord,
We pardon thee: but lives the lady yet
Or has she perished? — that we fain would
know!"

"Call her dead, call her living, each style serves,"
The matron said: "though grave-ward bowed,
She breathed;
Nor knew her husband what the misery meant
Before he felt it: hope of life was none:
The appointed day pressed hard; the funeral pump
He had prepared too."
When the friends broke out,
"Let her in dyeing know herself at least
Sole wife, of all the wives 'neath the sun wide,
For glory and for goodness?" — "Ah, how else
Than best? who controverts the claim?" quoth
she:
"What kind of creature should the woman prove
That has surpassed Alkestis? — surlier shown
Preference for her husband to herself
Than by determining to die for him?
But so much all our city knows indeed:
Hear what she did indoors and wonder then!
For, when she felt the crowning day was come,
She washed with river-waters her white skin,
And, taking from the cedar closets forth
Vesture and ornament, bedecked herself
Nobly, and stood before the hearth, and prayed:
'Mistress, because I now depart the world,
Falling before thee the last time, I ask—"
BALAUSTON'S ADVENTURE

Be mother to my orphans! wed the one
To a kind wife, and make the other's mate
Some princely person: nor, as I who bore
My children perished, suffer that they too
Die all untimely, but live, happy pair,
Their full glad life out in the fatherland!
And even Whar! through Admetos' house
She visited and crowned and prayed before,
Stripping the myrtle-foliage from the boughs,
Without a tear, without a groan, — no change
At all to that skin's nature, fair to see,
Caused by the imminent evil. But this done, —
Reaching her chamber, falling on her bed,
There, truly, burst she into tears and spoke:
"O bride-bed, where I loosened from my life
Virginity for that same husband's sake
Because of whom I die now — fare thee well!
Since now wise do I hate thee: me alone
Hast thou destroyed; for, shrinking to betray
Thee and my spouse, I die: but thee, O bed,
Some other woman shall possess as wife —
Truer, no! but of better fortune, say I!
— So falls on, kisses it till all the couch
Is moistened with the eyes' sad overflow.
But when of many tears she had her fill,
She slips from off the couch, goes headlong
forth,
Yet — forth the chamber — still keeps turning
back
And calls her on the couch again once more.
Her children, clinging to their mother's robe,
Wept meanwhile: but she took them in her arms,
And, as a dying woman might, embraced
Now one and now the other:neath the roof,
All of the household servants wept as well,
Moved to compassion for their mistress; she
Extended her right hand to all and each,
And there was no one of such low degree
She spoke not to nor had an answer from.
Sure, in Admetos' house,
Dying, — why, he had died; but, living, gains
Such grief as this he never will forget!"

And when they questioned of Admetos,
"Why thus —"
Holding his dear wife in his hands, he weeps;
Entreats her not to give him up, and seeks
The impossible, in fine: for there she wastes
And withers by disease, abandoned now,
A mere dead weight upon her husband's arm.
Yet, none the less, although she breathe so faint,
Her will is to behold the beams o' the sun:
Since never more again, but this last once,
Shall she see sun, its circele or its ray.
But I will go, announce your presence, —
friends
Indeed; since 'tis not all so love their lords
As seek them in misfortune, kind the same:
But you are the old friends I recognize."

And at the word she turned again to go:
The while they waited, taking up the plaint
To Zeus again: "What passage from this strait?
What loosing of the heavy fortune fast
About the palace? Will such help appear,
Or must we clip the locks and cast around
Each form already the black peplos' fold?
Clearly the black robe, clearly! All the same.
Pray to the Gods! — like Gods' no power so great!
O thou king Pasion, find some way to save!
Reveal it, vae, reveal it! Since of old
Thou found'st a cure, why, now again become Releaser from the bonds of Death, we beg,
And give the sanguinary Hades pause!"

So the song dwindled into a mere moan,
How dear the wife, and what her husband's woe:
When suddenly —
"Behold, behold!" breaks forth:
"Here is she coming from the house indeed!
Her husband comes, too! Cry aloud, lament,
Phrixias land, this best of women, bound —
So is she withered by disease away —
For realms below and their infernal king!
Never will we affirm there's more of joy
Than grief in marriage; making estimate
Both from old sorrows anciently observed,
And this misfortune of the king we see —
Admetos who, of bravest spouses bereaved,
Will live life's remnant out, no life at all!"

So wailed they, while a sad procession wound
Slow from the innermost o' the palace, stopped
At the extreme verge of the platform-frost
There opened, and disclosed Aekistus' self,
The consecrated lady, borne to look
Her last — and let the living look their last —
She at the sun, we at Aekistus.
We! For would you note a memorable thing?
We grew to see in that severe regard, —
Hear in that hard dry pressure to the point,
Word slow pursuing word in monotone, —
What Death meant when he called her consecrated lady?
Henceforth to Hades. I believe, the sword —
Its office was to cut the soul at once
From life, — from something in this world which hides
Truth, and hides falsehood, and so let us live
Somehow. Suppose a rider furs a cloak
About a horse's head; unfrightened, so,
Between the menace of a flame, between Solicitation of the pasturage,
Untempted equally, he goes his gait
To journey's end: then pluck the pharc's off!
Show what delusions stealed him 'tis the straight
O' the path, made grass seem fire and fire seem grass,
All through a little bandage o'er the eyes!
As certainly with eyes unbanded now
Aekistus looked upon the action here,
Self-immolation for Admetos' sakes;
Saw, with a new sense, all her death would do.
And which of her survivors had the right,
And which the less right, to survive thereby.
For, you shall note, she uttered no one word
Of love more to her husband, though he west
Plenteously, waxed importunate in prayer —
Folly's old fashion when its seed bears fruit.
I think she judged that she had bought the ware
O' the seller at its value,—nor praised him
Nor blamed herself, but, with indifferent eye,
Saw him purse money up, prepare to leave.
The buyer with a solitary bale——
True purple— but in place of all that coin,
Had made a hundred others happy too,
If so willed fate or fortune. What remained
To give away, should rather go to these
Than one with coin to clink and contemplate.
Admetos had his share and might depart.
The rest was for her children and herself.
(Choropé makes a face: but wait awhile!) She saw things plain as Gods do: by one stroke
O' the sword that rends the life-long veil away.
(Also Euripides saw plain enough:—
But you and I, Choropé!—you and I
Will trust his sight until our own grow clear.)

"Sun, and thou light of day, and heavenly dance
O' the fleet cloud - figure!" (so her passion paused,
While the awe-stricken husband made his moan,
Muttered now this now that in perplexity:
"Sun that sees thee and me, a suffering pair,
Who did the Gods no wrong whence thou shouldst die!")

Then, as if caught up, carried in their course,
Fleeting and free as cloud and sunbeam are,
She missed no happiness that lay beneath:
"O thou wide earth, from thee my palace roofs,
To distant mateful chambers once my own
In that folks of my ancestry!"

There the flight failed her. "Raise thee,
Give us not up! Pray pity from the Gods!"

Vainly Admetos: for "I see it—see
The two-pared boat! The ferryer of the dead,
Charyon, hand hard upon the boatman's pole,
Calls me—even now calls—Why delayest thou?
Quick! Thou obstructest all made ready here
For prompt departure: quick, then!"

A bitter voyage this to undergo,
Even I the telling! Adverse Powers above,
How do ye plague us!"

Then a shiver ran:
"He has me—seest not?—hales me,—who is it?
To the hall o' the Dead—ah, who but Hades' self,
He, with the wings there, glares at me, one gaze
All that blue brilliance, under the eyebrow!
What wilt thou do? Unhand me! Such a way
I have to traverse, all unhappy one!"

"Woe be to thy friends, but, most of all,
Me and thy children: ours assuredly
A common partnership in grief like this!"

Whereat they closed about her; but "Let be!
Leave, let me lie now! Strength forsakes my feet.
Hades is here, and shadowy on my eyes
Comes the night creeping. Children—children, now
Indeed, a mother is no more for you!
Farewell, O children, long enjoy the light!"

"Ah me, the melancholy word I hear,
Oppressive words for every kind of death!
No, by the Deities, take heart nor dare
To give me up — no, by our children too
Made orphans of! But rise, be resolute,
Since, thou departed, I no more remain!
For in thee are we bound up, to exist
Or cease to be — so we adore thy love!"

—Which brought out truth to judgment. At this word
And protestation, all the truth in her
Claimed to assert itself: she waved away
The blue-eyed black-wing'd phantom, held in check
The advancing pageantry of Hades there,
And, with no change in her own countenance,
She fixed her eyes on the protesting man,
And let her lips unlock their sentence,—so!

"Admetos,—how things go with me thou seest,—
I wish to tell thee, ere I die, what things
I will should follow. I— to honor thee,
Secure for thee, by my own soul's exchange,
Continued looking on the daylight here—
Die for thee—yet, if so I pleased, might live,
Nay, wed what man of Thessaly I would,
And dwell 't the dome with pomp and queenliness.
I would not,—would not live bereft of thee,
With children orphaned, neither shrank at all,
Though having gifts of youth wherein I joyed.
Yet, who begot thee and who gave thee birth,
Both of these gave thee up; no less, a term
Of life was reached when death became them well,
Ay, well— to save their child and glorious die:
Since thou wast all they had, nor hope remained
Of having other children in thy place.
So, I and thou had lived out our full time,
Nor thou, left lonely of thy wife, wouldst groan
With children reared in orphanage: but thus
Some God disposed things, willed they so should be.
Be they so! Now do thou remember this,
Do me in turn a favor—favor, since
Certainly I shall never claim my due,
For nothing is more precious than a life:
But a fit favor, as thyself wilt say,
Loving our children here no less than I,
If head and heart be sound in thee at least. Uphold them, make them masters of my house,
Nor wed and give a step-dame to the pair,
Who, being a worse wife than I, through spite
Will raise her hand against both thine and mine.
Never do this at least, I pray thee!
For hostile the new-comer, the step-dame,
To the old brood—a very viper she
For gentleness! Here stand they, boy and girl;
The boy has got a father, a defence
Tower-like, he speaks to and has answer from:
But thou, my girl, how will thy virginhood
Conclude itself in marriage fittingly?
Upon what, but of a sire-found yoke-fellow
Art thou to chance? with all to apprehend
Lest, casting on thee some unkind report,
She blax thy nuptials in the bloom of youth.
For neither shall thy mother watch thee wed,
Nor hearken thee in childbearing, standing by
Just when a mother's presence helps the most!
No, for I have to die: and this my ill
Comes to me, nor to-morrow, no, nor yet now,
The third day of the month, but now, even now,
I shall be reckoned among those no more.
Farewell, be happy! And to thee, indeed,
Husband, the boast remains permissible
Thou hadst a wife was worthy! and to you,
Children; as a good mother gave you birth."

"Have courage!" interposed the friends.
"For him
I have no scruple to declare — all this
Will he perform, except he fail of sense."

"All this shall be — shall be!" Admetos sobbed.
"Fear not! And, since I had thee living, dead
Alone wilt thou be called my wife: no fear
That some Thessalian ever styles herself
Bride, hails this man for husband in thy place!
No, since of such lofty line
Or such surpassing beauty otherwise!
Enough of children: gain from these I have,
Such only may the Gods grant! since in thee
Absolute is our loss, where all was gain.
And I shall bear for thee no year-long grief,
But grief that lasts while my own days last,
love!
Love! For my hate is she who bore me, now:
And him I hate, my father: loving-ones
Truly, in word not deed! But thou didst pay
All dearst to thee down, and buy my life,
Saving me so! Is there not cause enough
That who part with such companionship
In thee, should make my moan? I moan, and more:
For I will end the feastings — social flow
O' the wine friends flock for, garlands and the Muse
That graced my dwelling. Never now for me
To touch the lyre, to lift my soul in song
At summons of the Lydian flute; since thou
From out my life hast emptied all the joy!
And this thy body, in thy likeness wrought
By some wise hand of the artificers,
Shall lie disposed within my marriage-bed:
This I will fall on, this enfold about,
Call by thy name — my dear wife in my arms
Even though I have not. I shall seem to have —
A cold delight, indeed, but all the same
So should I lighten of its weight my soul!
And, wandering my way in dreams perchance,
Thyself wilt bless me: for, come when they will,
Even by night our loves are sweet to see.

But were the tongue and tune of Orpheus mine,
So that to Kore crying, or her lord,
In hymns, from Hades I might resone thee —
Down would I go, and neither Pluton's dog
Nor Charon, he whose oar sends souls across,
Should stay me till again I made thee stand
Living, within the light! But, failing this,
There, where thou art, await me when I die.
Make ready our abode, my housemate still!
For in the selfsame cedar, me with thee
Will I provide that these our friends shall place,
My side lay close by thy side! Never, corpse
Although I be, would I division bear
From thee, my faithful one of all the world!

So he stood sobbing: nowise insincere,
But somehow child-like, like his children, like Childishness the world over. What was new
In this announcement that his wife must die?
What particle of pain beyond the past
He made, with eyes wide open, long ago —
Made and was, if not glad, content to make?
Now that the sorrow, he had called for, came.
He sorrowed to the height: none heard him say.
However, what would seem so pertinent,
"To keep this pact, I find surpass my power:
Rescind it, Moirai! Give me back her life.
And take the life I kept by base exchange!
Or, failing that, here stands your laughing stock
Fooled by you, worthy just the fate o' the fool
Who made a potter to escape the best
And gain the worst you wiser Powers allot!"
No, not one word of this: nor did his wife
Despite the sobbing, and the silence soon
To follow, judge so much was in his thought —
Fancy that, should the Moirai acquiesce,
He would relinquish life nor let her die.
The man was like some merchant who, is storm,
Throws the freight over to redeem the ship:
No question, saving both were better still.
As it was, — why, he sorrowed, which sufficed.
So, all she seemed to notice in his speech
Was what concerned her children. Children, too,
Bear the grief and accept the sacrifice.
Rightly rules nature: does the bloomed
Bough
O' the grape-vine, or the dry grape's self, bleed wine?

So, bending to her children all her love,
She fastened on their father's only word.
To purpose now, and followed it with this:
"O children, now yourselves have heard these things —
Your father saying he will never wed
Another woman to be over you,
Nor yet dishonor me!"

"And now at least
I say it, and I will accomplish too!"

"Then, for such promise of accomplishment, Take from my hand these children!"
"Thus I take—

"Do thou become

Mother, now, to these children in my place!"

"Great the necessity, I should be so,
At least, to these bereaved of thee!"

"Child—child!

Just when I needed most to live, below
Am I departing from you both?"

"Ah me!

And what shall I do, then, left lonely thus?"

"Time will appease thee: who is dead is naught."

"Take me with thee—take, by the Gods

below!"

"We are sufficient, we who die for thee."

"O Powers, ye widow me of what a wife!"

"And truly the dimmed eye draws earthward

now!"

"Wife, if thou leav'st me, I am lost indeed!"

"She once was—now is nothing, thou mayst

say."

"Raise thy face, nor forsake thy children

thus!"

"Ah, willingly indeed I leave them not!
But—fare ye well, my children!"

"Look on them—

"I am nothingness."

"What dost thou? Leav'st..."

"Farewell!"

And in the breath she passed away.

"Undone—me miserable!" moaned the king,
While friends released the long-suspended sigh.

"Gone is she: no wife for Admetos more!"

Such was the signal: how the woe broke forth,
Why tell?—or how the children's tears ran
fast

Bidding their father note the eyelids' stare,

Hands' droop, each dreadful circumstance of death.

"Ay, she hears not, she sees not: I and you,
'Tis plain, are stricken hard and have to bear!"

Was all Admetos answered: for, I judge,
He only now began to taste the truth:
The thing done lay revealed, which undone

thing,

Rehearsed for fact by fancy, at the best,

Never can equal. He had used himself
This long while (as he muttered presently)
To practise with the terms, the blow involved
By the bargain, sharp to bear, but bearable
Because of plain advantage at the end.
Now that, in fact not fancy, the blow fell —

Needs must he busy him with the surprise.

"Alkestis—not to see her nor be seen,

Hear nor be heard of by her, any more

To-day, to-morrow, to the end of time —

Did I mean this should buy my life?" thought he.

So, friends came round him, took him by the

hand,

Bade him remember our mortality,

Its due, its doom: how neither was he first,

Nor would be last, to thus deplore the loved.

"I understand," slow the words came at last.

"Nor of a sudden did the evil here

Fly on me: I have known it long ago,

Ay, and essayed myself in misery;

Nothing is new. You have to stay, you friends,

Because the next need is to carry forth

The corpse here: you must stay and do your part,

Chant proper pean to the God below;

Drink-sacrifice he likes not. I decree

That all Thebanians over whom I rule

Hold grief in common with me; let them shear

Their locks, and be the peplons black they show!

And you who to the chariot yoke your steeds,

Or manage steeds one-frontleted,—I charge,

Clip from each neck with steel the mane away!

And through my city, nor of flute nor lyre

Be there a sound till twelve full moons succeed.

For I shall never bury any corpse

Dearer than this to me, nor better friend:

One worthy of all honor from me, since

Me she has died for, she and she alone."

With that, he sought the innest of the house,

He and his dead, to get grave's garniture,

While the friends sang the pean that should peon.

"Daughter of Polias, with farewell from me,

I' the house of Hades have thy unsunned home!

Let Hades know, the dark-haired deity,—

And he who sits to row and steer alike,

Old corpse-conductor, let him know he bears

Over the Acherontian lake, this time

I' the two-oared boat, the best—eh, best by far

Of womankind! For thee, Alkestis Queen!

Many a time those haunters of the Muse

Shall sing thee to the seven-stringed mountain-shell.

And glorify in hymns that need no harp,

At Sparta when the cycle comes about,

And that Kameian month wherein the moon

Rises and never sets the whole night through:

So too at splendid and magnificent

Athenae. Such the spread of thy renown,

And such the lay that, dying, thou hast left

Singer and sayers; Oh that I availed

Of my own might to send thee once again

From Hades' hall, Kokutos' stream, by help

O' the oar that dips the river, back to-day!"
So, the song sank to prattle in her praise:
"Light, from above thee, lady, fall the earth,
Thou only one of womankind to die,
Wife for her husband! If Admetos take Anything to him like a second spouse—
Hate from his offspring and from us shall be
His portion, let the king assure himself!
No mind his mother had to hide in earth
Her body for her son's sake, nor his sire
Had heart to save whom he begot, — not they.
The white-haired wretches! only thou it was,
I, the bloom of youth, didst save him and so
die!
Might it be mine to chance on such a mate
And partner! For there's penury in life
Of such allowance: were she mine at least,
So wonderful a wife, assuredly
She would companion me throughout my days
And never once bring sorrow!"

"My hosts here!"
Oh, the thrill that ran through us!
Never was sought so good and opportune
As that great interrupting voice! For see!
Here maundered this dispirited old age
Before the palace; whence a something crept
Which told us well enough without a word
What was a-dicing inside, — every tongue
O' the garland on those temples, tenderest
Disposure of each arm along its side,
Came putting out what warmth 't had the world was left.
Then, as it happens at a sacrifice
When, drop by drop, some instral bath is brimmed:
Into the thin and clear and cold, at once
They slaught' a whole wine-skin; Bacchos' blood
Sets the white water all aflush: even so,
Sudden into the midst of sorrow, leapt
Along with the gay cheer of that great voice,
Hope, joy, salvation: Herakles was here!
Himself, o' the threshold, sent his voice on first
To herald all that human and divine
O' the weary happy face of him. — half God, Half man, which made the god-part God the
more.

"Hosts mine," he broke upon the sorrow with
"Inhabitants of this Pherean soil, Chances I upon Admetos inside here?"

The irresistible sound wholesome heart.
O' the hero, — more than all the mightiness
At labor in the limbs that, for man's sake,
Labor and meant to labor their life-long.
— This drove back, dried up sorrow at its source.
How could it brave the happy weary laugh
Of who had bantered sorrow. "Sorrow here?
What have you done to keep your friend from harm?"
Could no one give the life I see he keeps?
Or, say there's sorrow here past friendly help.
Why waste a word or let a tear escape
While other sorrows wait you in the world,
And want the life of you, though helpless
here?"
Clearly there was no telling such an one

How, when their monarch tried who loved him
more
Than he loved them, and found they loved, as he,
Each man, himself, and hold, no otherwise,
That, of all evils in the world, the worst
Was — being forced to die, whate'er deat gain:
How all this selfishness in him and thern
Caused certain sorrow which they sang about,—
I think that Herakles, who held his life
Out on his hand, for any man to take —
I think his laugh had marred their threnody.

"He is in the house," they answered. After
all,
They might have told the story, talked their best
About the inevitable sorrow here,
Nor changed nor checked the kindly nature, —
So long as men were merely weak, not bad.
He loved men: were they gods he used to help?
"Yea, Pheres' son is in doors, Herakles.
But say, what sends thee to Thessalian soil,
Brought by what business to this Pherei
town?"

"A certain labor that I have to do Eurystheus the Tirynthian," laughed the God.

"And whither wendest — on what wandering Bound now?" (They had an instinct, guessed what meanest
Wanderings, labors, in the God's light mouth.)

"After the Thrakian Diomedes' car
With the four horses."

"Ah, but canst thou that?
Art inexperiencd in thy host to be?"

"All-inexperienced: I have never gone
As yet to the land o' the Bistones."

"Then, look
By no means to be master of the steeds
Without a battle!"

"Battle there may be:
I must refuse no labor, all the same."

"Certainly, either having slain a foe
Wilt thou return to us, or, slain thyself,
Stay there!"

"And, even if the game be so.
The risk in it were not the first I run.

"But, say thou overpower the lord o' the place.
What more advantage dost expect thereby?"

"I shall drive off his horses to the king."

"No easy handling them to bit the jaw!"

"Easy enough; except, at least, they breathe Fire from their nostrils!"

"But they mine up man
With those quick jaws!"
"You talk of provender for mountain-beasts, and not mere horses' food!"

"Thou mayst behold their mangers caked with gore!"

"And of what sire does he who bred them boast Himself the son?"

"Of Ares, king o' the targe — Thrakian, of gold throughout." Another laugh.

"Why, just the labor, just the lot for me
Dost thou describe in what I recognize!
Since hard and harder, high and higher yet,
Truly this lot of mine is like to go
If I must needs join battle with the brood
Of Ares: ay, I fought Lukason first,
And again, kukmos: now engage in strife
This third time, with such horses and such lord.
But there is nobody shall ever see Alkménê's son ahrink foemen's hand before!"

"Or ever hear him say" (the Chorus thought)
"That death is terrible; and help us so
To chime in — terrible beyond a doubt,
And, if to thee, why, to ourselves much more:
Know what has happened, then, and sympathize!"

Therefore they gladly stopped the dialogue,
Shifted the burden to new shoulder straight.
As, "Look where comes the lord o' the land, himself, Admetos, from the palace!"
they outbroke
In some surprise, as well as much relief.
What had induced the king to waive his right
And luxury of woe in loneliness?

Out he came quietly; the hair was clipt,
And the garb sable; else no outward sign
Of sorrow as he came and faced his friend.
Was truth fast terrifying tears away?
"Hail, child of Zeus, and sprung from Perseus
too!"

The salutation ran without a fault.

"And thou, Admetos, King of Thessaly!"

"Would, as thou wishest me, the grace might fall!
But my good-wisher, that thou art, I know."

"What's here? these shorn locks, this sad show of thee?"

"I must inter a certain corpse to-day."

"Now, from thy children God avert mis-
chance!"

"They live, my children; all are in the house!"

"Thy father — if 't is he departs indeed,
His age was ripe at least."

"My father lives,
And she who bore me lives too, Herakles."

"It cannot be thy wife Alkéstis gone?"

"Twofold the tale is, I can tell of her."

"Dead dost thou speak of her, or living yet?"

"She is — and is not: hence the pain to me!"

"I learn no whit the more, so dark thy speech!"

"Know'st thou not on what fate she needs must fall?"

"I know she is resigned to die for thee."

"How lives she still, then, if submitting so?"

"Eh, weep her not beforehand! wait till then!"

"Who is to die is dead; doing is done."

"To be and not to be are thought diverse."

"Thou judgest this — I, that way, Herakles!"

"Well, but declare what causes thy complaint!
Who is the man has died from out thy friends?"

"No man: I had a woman in my mind."

"Alien, or some one born akin to thee?"

"Alien: but still related to my house."

"How did it happen then that here she died?"

"Her father dying left his orphan here."

"Alas, Admetos — would we found thee gay,
Not grieving!"

"What as if about to do Subjoinest thou that comment?"

"I shall seek Another hearth, proceed to other hosts."

"Never, O king, shall that be! No such ill Betide me!"

"Nay, to mourners should there come
A guest, he proves importunate!"

"The dead —
Dead are they: but go thou within my house!"

"'Tis base carousing beside friends who mourn."

"The guest-rooms, whither we shall lead thee,
he,
Apart from ours."

"Nay, let me go my way! Ten-thousandfold the favor I shall thank!"

"It may not be thou goest to the hearth
Of any man but me!" so made an end
Admetos, softly and decisively.
Of the altercation. Herakles forbore:
And the king bade a servant lead the way,
Open the guest-rooms ranged remote from view.
O' the main hall, tell the functionaries, next,
They had to furnish forth a plenteous feast:
And then shut close the doors o' the hall, mid-
way:
"Because it is not proper friends who feast
Should hear a groaning or be grieved," quoth he.

Whereat the hero, who was truth itself,
Let out the smile again, repressed awhile
Like fountain-brilliance one forbids to play.
He did too many grandesses, to note
Much in the meaner things about his path:
And stepping there, with face towards the sun,
Stopped seldom to pluck weeds or seek their names.

Therefore he took Admetos at the word:
This trouble must not hinder any more
A true heart from good will and pleasant ways.
And so, the great arm, which had slain the snake,
Strained his friend's head a moment in embrace
On that broad breast beneath the lion's hide,
Till the king's cheek winced at the thick rough gold;
And then strode off, with who had care of him.

To the remote guest-chamber: glad to give
Poor flesh and blood their respite and relief
In the interval 'twixt fight and fight again—
All for the world's sake. Our eyes followed him.

Be sure, till those mid-doors shut us outside.
The king, too, watched great Heracles go off
All faith, love, and obedience to a friend.

And when they questioned him, the simple ones,
"What dost thou? Such calamity to face,
Lies full before thee — and thou art so bold
As play the host, Admetos? Hast thy wits?"
He replied calmly to each chiding tongue:
"But if from house and home I forced away
A coming guest, wouldst thou have praised me more?

No, truly! since calamity were mine,
Nowise diminished: while I showed myself
Unhappy and inhospitable too:
So adding to my ills this other ill,
That mine were styled a stranger-hating house.
Myself have ever found this man the best
Of entertainers when I went his way
To parched and thirsty Argos."

"If so be —
Why didst thou hide what destiny was here,
When one came that was kindly, as thou say'st?"

"He never would have willed to cross my door
Had he known aught of my calamities.
And probably to some of you I seem
Unworthy in doing what I do:
Such will scarce praise me: but these halls of mine
Know not to drive off and dishonor guests."

And so, the duty done, he turned once more
To go and busy him about his dead.

As for the sympathizers left to muse,
There was a change, a new light thrown on things,
Contagion from the magnanimity
Of the man whose life lay on his hand so light.
As up he stepped, pursuing duty still "Higher and harder," as he laughed and said
Somehow they found no folly now in the act.
They blamed erewhile: Admetos' private grief
Shrank to a somewhat pettier obstacle
I' the way of the world: they saw good days
had been,
And good days, perdurance, still might be,
Now that they overlooked the present cloud
Heavy upon the palace opposite.

And soon the thought took words and music thus:

"Harbor of many a stranger, free to friend.
Ever and always, O thou house o' the man
We mourn for! Thee, Apollo's very self.
The lyric Puthan, deigned inhabit ones,
Become a shepherd here in thy domains,
And pipe, adown the winding hillside paths,
Pastoral marriage-poesy to thy flocks
At feed: while with them fed in fellowship,
Through joy i' the music, spot-skin lynxes; y
And lions, the bloody company,
Came, leaving Othrus' dell; and round th' lyre,
Phoebus, there danced the speckle-coated fava.
Facing on lightsome fetlock past the pinse
Trees-topped, the creature's natural boundary
Into the open everywhere; such heart
Had she within her, beating joyous beats.
At the sweet reassurance of thy song!
Therefore the lot o' the master is, to live
In a home multitudinous with herds,
Along the fair-flowing Bobian lake,
Limited, that ploughed land and pasture-plains.
Only where stand the sun's steeds, stabled west
I' the cloud, by that mid-air which makes the clime
Of those Molossi: and he rules as well
O'er the Alpians, up to Pelion's shore,— Sea-stretch without a port! Such lord have we;
And here he opens house now, as of old,
Takes to the heart of it a guest again:
Though moist the eyelid of the master, still Mourning, 'neath his dear wife's body, dead but now!

And they admired: nobility of soul
Was self-impelled to reverence, they saw:
The best men ever prove the wisest too:
Something instinctive guides them still aright.
And on each soul this boldness settled now,
That one who reverence the Gods so much
Would prosper yet: (or I could wish it ran)
Who venerates the Gods! the main will still Practise things honest though obscure to judge.

They ended, for Admetos entered now;
Having disposed all duteously indoors,
He came into the outside world again,
Quies as ever: but a quietude
Bent on pursuing its descent to truth,
As who must grope until he gain the ground
O' the dungeon doomed to be his dwelling now.
Already high o'er head was piled the duck,
When something pushed to stay his downward step.
Pluck back despair just reaching its repose.
He would have bidden the kind presence there
Observe that, — since the corpse was coming out,
Cared for in all things that bet the case,
Carried aloft, in decency and state,
'To the last burial-place and burning pile,
'Twere proper friends addressed, as custom prompts,
Alkestis bound on her last journeying.

"Ay, for we see thy father," they subjoined,
"Advancing as the aged foot best may;"
His servants, too: each bringing in his hand
Adornments for thy wife, all pomp that's due
To the downward-dwelling people." And in truth,
By slow procession till they filled the stage,
 Came Phereus, and his following, and their gifts.
You see, the worst of the interruption was,
It plucked back, with an over-hasty hand,
Admetos from descending to the truth,
(I told you) — put him on the brink again,
Fall! the noise and glare where late he stood:
With nay fate fallen and irrevocable,
But all things subject still to chance and change:
And that chance — life, and that change — happiness.

And with the last strife came the little mind:
He was once more the man might gain so much,
Life too and wife too, would his friends but help!
All he felt now was that there faced him one
Supposed the likeliest, in emergency,
To help: and help, by mere self-sacrifice
So natural, it seemed as if the sire
Must needs lie open still to argument,
Withdraw the rash decision, not to die
But rather live, though death would save his son:
Argument like the ignominious grasp
O' the drowner whom his fellow grasps as fierce,
Each marvelling that the other needs must hold
Head out of water, though friend choke thereby.

And first the father's salutation fall.
Burdened he came, in common with his child,
Who lost, none would gainsay, a good chaste spouse:
Yet such things must be borne, though hard to bear.

"So, take this tribute of adornment, deep
Is the earth let it descend along with her!
Behooves we treat the body with respect:
— Of one who died, at least, to save thy life,
Kept me from being childless, nor allowed
That I, bereft of thee, should peak and pine
In melancholy age! she, for the sex,
All of her sisters, put in evidence.
By daring such a feat, that female life
Might prove more excellent than men suppose.
O' thou Alkestis!" out he burst in fine,
"Who, while thou savedst this my son, didst raise
Also myself from sinking, — hail to thee!
Woll be it with thee even in the house
Of Hadès! I maintain, if mortals must Marry, this sort of marriage is the sole Permitted those among them who are wise!"

So his exclamation ended. Like hate's like:
Accordingly Admetos, — full 't the face
Of Phereus, his true father, outward shape
And inward fashion, body matching soul,—
Saw just himself when years should do their work
And reinforce the selfishness inside
Until it pushed the last disguise away:
As when the liquid metal cools in the mould,
Stands forth a statue: bloodless, hard, cold bronze.

So, in old Phereus, young Admetos showed,
Pushed to completion: and a shudder ran,
And his repugnance soon had vent in speech:
Glad to escape outside, nor, peat within,
Find itself there fit food for exercise.

"Neither to this interment called by me
Comest thou, nor thy presence I account
Among the crometable proofs of love
As for thy tribute of adornment, — no!
Ne'er shall she don it, ne'er in debt to thee
Be buried! What is thine, that keep thou still!
Then it behoved thee to commiserate
When I was perishing: but thou — who stood'st
Foot-free o' the snare, wast acquiescent then
That I, the young, should die, not thou, the old —
Wilt thou lament this corpse thyself hast slain?
Thou wost not, then, true father to this flesh; —
Nor she, who makes profession of my birth
And styles herself my mother, neither she Bore me: but, come of slave's blood, I was cast
Stealthily 'neath the bosom of thy wife!
Thou showedst, put to touch, the thing thou art,
Nor I esteem myself born child of thee!
Otherwise, thine is the pre-eminence
O'er all the world in cowardice of soul:
Who, being the old man thou art, arrived
Where life should end, didst neither will nor dare
Die for thy son, but left the task to her,
The alien woman, whom I well might think
Own, only mother both and father too!
And yet a fair strife had been thine to strive,
— Dying for thy own child; and brief for thee
In any case, the rest of time to live;
While I had lived, and she, our rest of time,
Nor I been left to groan in solitude.
Yet certainly all things which happy man
Ought to experience, thy experience grasped.
Thou wert a ruler through the bloom of youth,
And I was son to thee, recipient duc
Of sceptre and domesme, — no need to fear
That dying thou shouldst leave an orphan
house
For strangers to despoil. Nor yet wilt thou
Abide that saintly honor, forsooth,
Thy length of days, I gave thee up to die, —
I, who have held thee in such reverence!
And in exchange for it, such gratitude
Thou, father, — thou award'st me, mother
mine!
Go, lose this time, then, in begetting sons
Shall cherish thee in age, and, when thou diest,
Deck up and lay thee out as corpses claim!
For never I, at least, with this my hand
Will bury thee: it is myself am dead
So far as lies in thee. But if I light
Upon another savior, and still see
The sunbeam, — his, the child I call myself,
His, the old age that claims my cherishing.
How vainly do these aged pray for death,
Abuse the slow drag of senility!
But should death stop up, nobody inclines
To die, nor age is now the weight it was!

You see what all this poor pretentious talk
Tried at, — how weakness strove to hide itself
In bluster against weakness, — the loud word
To hide the little whisper, not so low.
Already in that heart beneath those lips!
Ha, could it be, who hated cowardice
Stood confessed craven, and who lauded so
Self-immolating love, himself had pushed
The loved one to the altar in his place?
Friends interposed, would fain stop further play
O' the sharp-edged tongue: they felt love's champion here
Had left an undefended point or two,
The antagonist might profit by. bade "Pamse!
Enough the present sorrow! Nor, O son,
What thus against thyself thy father's soul!

Ay, but old Phereas was the stouter stuff! Admetos,
At the ftiest of the heart,
Had so much soft in him as held a fire:
The other was all iron, clashed from flint.
Its fire, but shed no spark and showed no briose.
Did Phereas crave instruction as to facts?
He came, content, the ignoble word, for him,
Should lurk still in the blackness of each breath.
As sleeps the water-serpent half surmised:
Not brought up to the surface at a bound,
By one touch of the idle-probing spear.
Reed-like against unconquerable scale.
He came pacific, rather, as strength should,
Bringing the decent praise, the due regrets,
And each banality prescribed of old.
Did he commence "Why let her die for you?"
And rouse the coiled and quiet ugliness.
"What is so good to man as man's own life?"
No: but the other did; and, for his pains,
Out, full in face of him, the venom leapt.

"And whom dost thou make bold, son — Ludian slave,
Or Phrygian whether, money made thy ware,
"Let him speak,—I have spoken!" said the youth:
And so died out the wrangle by degrees,
In wretched bickering: "If thou wince at fact,
Behooved thee not prove fusty to myself!"

"Had I died for thee I had faulted more!"

"All's one, then, for youth's bloom and age to die?"

"Our duty is to live one life, not two!"

"Go then, and outlive Zeus, for aught I care!"

"What, curse thy parents with no sort of cause?"

"Curse, truly! All thou lovest is long life!"

"And dost not thou, too, all for love of life, Carry out now, in place of thine, this corpse?"

"Monument, rather, of thy cowardice, Thou worst one!"

"Not for me she died, I hope!
That, thou wilt hardly say!"
"No; simply this: Would, some day, thou mayst come to need myself!"

"Meanwhile, woo many wives—the more will die!"

"And so shame thee who never dared the like!"

"Dear is this light o' the sun-god—dear, I say!"

"Proper conclusion for a beast to draw!"

"One thing is certain: there's no laughing now,
As out thou bearest the poor dead old man!"

"Die when thou wilt, thou wilt die infamous!"

"And once dead, whether famed or infamous,
I shall not care?"

"Alas and yet again!
How full is age of impudence!"

"True!
Thou couldst not call thy young wife impudent:
She was found foolish merely!"

"Get thee gone!
And let me bury this my dead!"

"I go.
Thou bastiest whom thou didst murder first;
Whereof there's some account to render yet.
Those kinfolk by the marriage-side! I think,
Brother Akastos may be classed with me,
Among the beasts, not man, if he omit
Avenging upon thee his sister's blood!"

"Go to perdition, with thy housemate too!
Grow old all childlessly, with child alive,
Just as ye merit! for to me, at least,
Beneath the same roof ne'er do ye return.
And did I need by heralds' help renounce
The ancestral hearth, I had renounced the same!
But we—since this woe, lying at our feet
'P' the path, is to be borne—let us proceed
And lay the body on the pyre."

I think,
What, through this wretched wrangle, kept the man
From seeing clear—beside the cause I gave—
Was, that the woe, himself described as full
I' the path before him, there did really lie—
Not roll into the abyss of dead and gone.
How, with Alkestis present, calmly crowned,
Was she so irrecoverable yet—
The bird, escaped, that 's just on bough above,
The flower, let flutter half-way down the brink?
Not so detached seemed lifelessness from life
But—one dear stretch beyond all straining
Yet—
And he might have her at his heart once more,
When, in the critical minute, up there comes
The father and the fact, to trifite time!

"'To the pyre!' an instinct prompted: pallid face,
And passive arm and pointed foot, when these
No longer shall absorb the sight. O friends,
Admetos will begin to see indeed
Who the true foe was, where the blows should fall!

So, the old selfish Pheres went his way,
Case-hardened as he came; and left the youth,
(Only half selfish now, since sensitive)
To go on learning by a light the more,
As friends moved off, renewing dirge the while:

"Unhappy in thy daring! Noble dame,
Best of the good, farewell! With favoring face
May Hermes the infernal, Hades too, Receive thee! And if there,—ay, there,— some touch
Of further dignity await the good,
Sharing with them, mayst thou sit throned by her
The Bride of Hades, in companionship!"

Wherewith, the sad procession wound away,
Made slowly for the suburb sepulchre.
And lo,—while still one's heart, in time and Faced after that symmetric stop of Death
Mute-marching, to the mind's eye, at the head
O' the mourners—one hand pointing out their path
With the long pale terrific sword we saw,
The other leading, with grim tender grace,
Alkestis quieted and consecrate,—
Lo, life again knocked laughing at the door!
The world goes on, goes ever, in and through,
And out again o' the cloud. We faced about,
Fronted the palace where the mid-hall gate
Opened—not half, nor half of half, perhaps—
Yet wide enough to let out light and life,
And warmth, and bounty, and hope, and joy, at once.

Festivity burst wide, fruit rare and ripe
Crushed in the mouth of Bacchus, pulpy-prime,
All juice and flavor, save one single seed
Duly ejected from the God's nice lip,
Which lay o' the red edge, blackly visible—
To wit, a certain ancient servitor:

On whom the festal jaws o' the palace shut,
So, there he stood, a much-bewildered man.
Stupid? Nay, but sagacious in a sort:
Learned, life-long, i' the first outside of things,
Though bat for blindness to what lies beneath
And needs a nail-scratch ere 't is laid yon bare.

This functionary was the trusted one
We saw directed by Admetos late,
To lead in Herakles and help him, soul
And body, to such matched repose, snapped-up

Sustenance, as might do away the dust
O' the last encounter, knit each nerve anew
For this—never ones to come at cry
O' the creature next assailed,—say, should it prove

Only the creature that came forward now
To play the critic upon Herakles!

"Many the guests,"—so he soliloquised
In musings burdensome to breast before,
When it seemed not too prudent tongue should wag.

"Many, and from all quarters of this world,
The guests I now have known frequent our hall,
For whom I spread the banquet; but than this,
Never a worse one did I yet receive
At the hearth here! One who seeing, first of all,
The master's sorrow, entered gate the same,
And had the hardihood to house himself.
Did things stop there! But, modest by no means,
He took what entertainment lay to hand,
Knowing of our misfortune,—did we fail
In aught of the fit service, urged us serve
Just as a guest expects! And in his hands
Taking the ivied goblet, drinks and drinks
The unmixed product of black mother-earth,
Until the blaze o' the wine went round about
And warmed him: then he crowns with myrtle sprigs

His head, and bow's discordance—towfold lay
Was thereupon for us to listen to—
This fellow singing, namely, nor restrained
A jot by sympathy with sorrow here—
While we o' the household mourned our mistress—mourned,

That is to say, in silence—never showed
The eyes, which we kept wetting, to the guest,—

For there Admetos was imperative.
And so, here am I helping make at home
A guest, some fellow ripe for wickeliness.
Robber or pirate, while she goes her way
Out of our house: and neither was it mine

To follow in procession, nor stretch forth
Hand, waving lady decked in a last farewell,
Lamenting who to me and all of us
Domestics was a mother: myriad harms
She used to ward away from every one,
And mollify her husband's 1eful mood.
I ask then, do I justly hate or no
This guest, this interloper on our grief?"

"Hate him and justly!" Here's the proper judge
Of what is due to the house from Herakles!
This man of much experience saw the first
O' the feable duckings-down at destiny.

When King Admetos went his rounds, por soil,
A-begging somebody to be so brave
As die for one afraid to die himself—
"Thou, friend? Thou, love? Father or mother, then!
None of you? What, Alkestis must Death catch?
O best of wives, one woman in the world!
But nowise droop: our prayers may still assist:
Let us try sacrifice; if those avail
Nothing and Gods avert their countenance.
Why, deep and durable our grief will be!" Whereat the house, this worthy at its head,
Re-echoed "deep and durable our grief!"

This sage, who justly hated Herakles,
Did he suggest once "Rather I than she!"
Admonish the Turanore—"Be a man!
Bear thine own burden, never think to thrust
Thy fate upon another and thy wife!
It were a dubious gain could death be doomed
That other, and no passionate plea
Of thine, to die instead, have force with fate:
Seeing thou lov'st Alkestis: what were life Unlighted by the loved one? But to live—
Not merely live unsoiled by some thought.
Some word so poor—yet solace all the same—
As 'Trough death' the sepulchre, Alkestis, say!
Would I, or would not I, to save thy life,
Die, and die on, and die forevermore!' No!
But to read red-written up and down
The world: 'This is the sunshine, this the shade
This is some pleasure of earth, sky or sea,
Due to that other, dead that thou mayest live!
Such ere a coveted gain to thee?
Go die, fool, and be happy while 't is time!" One word of counsel in this kind, methinks,
Had fallen to better purpose than Al, ai.
Phew, phew, e, papai, and a pother of praise
O' the best, best, best one! Nothing was to hate

In King Admetos, Phereas, and the rest
O' the household down to his heroic self!
This was the one thing hateful: Herakles
Had sunk unto the presence, frack and free,
Out from the labor into the repose.

Ere out again and over head and ears
I' the heart of labor, all for love of men:
Making the most o' the minute, that the soul
And body, strained to height a minute since.
Might lie relaxed in joy, this breathing-space.
For man's sake more than ever; till the bow,
Restrung o' the sudden, at first cry for help.
Should send some unimaginable shaft
True to the aim and shatteringly through
The plate-mail of a monster, save man so.
He slew the pest # the marsh yesterday:
To-morrow, he would hit the flame-breathed stud
That fed on man’s flesh: and this day between —
Because he held it natural to die,
And fruitless to lament a thing past cure.
So, took his fill of food, wine, song and flowers,
Till the new labor claimed him soon enough,
— "Hate him and justly!"

True, Charon mine!
The man surmised not Herakles lay hid
I the guest; or, knowing it, was ignorant
That still his lady lived — for Herakles;
Or else judged lightness needs must indicate
This or the other calf’s quality:
And therefore — had been right if not so wrong!
For who expects the sort of him will scratch
A nail’s depth, scrape the surface just to see
What peradventure underlies the same?

So, he stood petting up his puny hate,
Parent-wise, proud of the ill-favored babe.
Not long! A great hand, careful lest it crush,
Startled him on the shoulder: up he started,
And stood, but Herakles!
There smiled the mighty presence, all one smile
And no touch more of the world-woary God,
Through the brief respite. Just a garland’s grace
About the brow, a song to satisfy
Head, heart and breast, and trumpet-lips at once,
A solemn draught of true religious wine,
And — how should I know? — half a mountain goat
Torn up and swallowed down, — the feast was fierce.
But brief: all cares and pains took wing and flew,
Leaving the hero ready to begin
And help mankind, whatever woe came next,
Even though what came next should be naught more
Than the mean querulous mouth o’ the man, remarked
Pursing its grievance up till patience failed
And the sage needs must rush out, as we saw,
To seek outside and put his hate in peace.
By no means would the Helper have it so:
He who was just about to handle brutes
In Thrace, and bit the jaws which breathed the flame,—
Well, if a good laugh and a jovial word
Could bridle aga which blew bad humors forth,
That were a kind of help, too!
— "Thou, there!" hailed
This grand benevolence the ungracious one —
"Why look’st so solemn and so thought-absorbed?"
To guesst a servant should not sour-faced be,
But do the honors with a mind urbane.
While thou, contrariwise, beholding here
Arrive thy master’s comrade, hast for him
A curchil visage, all one beetle-brow —
Having regard to grief that’s out-of-door!
Come hither, and so get to grow more wise!

Things mortal — know’st the nature that they have?
No, I imagine! whence could knowledge spring?
Give ear to me, then! For all flesh to die,
Is Nature’s due; nor is there any one
Of mortals with assurance he shall last
The coming morrow: for, what’s born of chance
Invisibly proceeds the way it will,
Not to be learned, no fortune-teller’s prize.

This, therefore, having heard and known through me,
Gladden thyself! Drink! Count the day-by-day
Existence thing, and all the other — chance!
Ay, and pay hommage also to by far
The sweetest of diversities for man.
Kupris! Benignant Goddess will she prove!
But as for aught else, leave and let things be!
And trust my counsel, if I seem to speak
To purpose — as I do, apparently.
Wilt not thou, then — discarding overmuch
Mournfulness, do away with this shut door,
Come drink along with me, be-garlanded
This fashion? Do so, and — I well know what —
From this stern mood, this shrunk-up state of mind,
The pit-pat fall o’ the flagon-juice down throat,
Soon will dilodge thee from bad harborage!

Men being mortal should think mortal-like:
Since to your solemn, brow-contracting sort,
All of them, — so I lay down law at least, —
Life is not truly life but misery."

Where do the man with softened surliness:
"We know as much: but deal with matters, now, Hardly befitting mirth and revelry."

"No intimate, this woman that is dead:
Mourn not too much! For, those o’ the house itself,
Thy masters live, remember!"

"Live indeed?
Ah, thou know’st naught o’ the woe within these walls!"

"I do — unless thy master spoke me false Somehow!"
"Ay, ay, too much he loves a guest,
Too much, that master mine!" so muttered he.

"Was it improper he should treat me well,
Because an alien corpse was in the way?"

"No alien, but most intimate indeed!"

"Can it be, some woe was, he told me not?"

"Farewell and go thy way! Thy cares for thee —
To us, our master’s sorrow is a care."

"This word begins no tale of alien woe!"

"Had it been other woe than intimate,
I could have seen thee feast, nor felt amiss."
“What! have I suffered strangely from my host?”

“Thou cam’st not at a fit reception-time:
With sorrow here beforehand: and thou seest
Shorn hair, black robes.”

“But who is it that’s dead?
Some child gone? or the aged sire perhaps?”

“Admetos’ wife, then! she has perished, guest!”

“How sayest? And did ye house me, all the same?”

“Ay: for he had thee in that reverence
He dared not turn thee from his door away!”

“O hapless, and bereft of what a mate!”

“All of us now are dead, not she alone!”

“But I divined it! seeing, as I did,
His eye that ran with tears, his close-clipt hair,
His countenance! Though he persuaded me,
Saying it was a stranger’s funeral
He went with to the grave: against my wish,
He forced on me that I should enter doors,
Drink in the hall o’ the hospitable man
Circumstanced so! And do I revel yet With wreath on head? But — thou to hold thy peace,
Nor tell me what a wo oppressed my friend!
Where is he gone to bury her? Where am I to go and find her?”

“By the road that leads
Straight to Larissa, thou wilt see the tomb,
Out of the suburb, a caved sepulchre.”

So said he, and therewith dismissed himself
Inside to his lamenting: somewhat soothed,
However, that he had adroitly spoil’d
The mirth of the great creatures: oh, he marked
The movement of the mouth, how lip pressed lip,
And either eye forgot to shine, as, fast,
He plucked the chaplet from his forehead,
Underfoot!

The myrtle-sprays down, trod them underfoot!

And all the joy and wonder of the wine
Withered away, like fire from off a brand
The wind blows over — beacon though it be,
Whose merry ardor only meant to make
Somebody all the better for its blaze,
And save lost people in the dark: quenched
now!

Not long quenched! As the flame, just hurried off
The brand’s edge, suddenly renewes its bite, Tasting some richness caked i’ the core o’ the tree, —

Pine, with a blood that’s oil, — and triumphs

Pillar-wise to the sky and saves the world:
So, in a spasm and splendor of resolve,
All at once did the God surmount the man.

“O much-enduring heart and hand of mine!
Now show what sort of son she bore to Zeus,
That daughter of Elektron, Tiruns’ child,
Alkmene! for that son must needs save now
The just-dead lady: ay, establish here
I’ the house again Alkestis, bring about
Comfort and succor to Admetos so!
I will go lie in wait for Death, black-sto’ed
King of the corpses! I shall find him, sure.
Drinking, beside the tomb, o’ the sacrifice:
And if I lie in ambush, and leap
Out of my lair, and seize — encircle him
Till one hand join the other —
There lives not who shall pull him out from me.
Rib-maul’d, before he let the woman go!
But even say I miss the booties, — say,
Death comes not to the bolted blood, — why
then,

Down go I, to the unsummed dwelling-place
Of Koré and the king there, — make demand.
Confident I shall bring Alkestis back,
So as to put her in the hands of him
My host, that housed me, never drove me off:
Though stricken with sore sorrow, hid the stroke.
Being a noble heart and honoring me!
Who of Thessalians, more than this man, loves
The stranger? Who, that now inhabits Greece?
Wherefore he shall not say the man was vile
Whom he befriended, — native noble heart!”

So, one look upward, as if Zeus might laugh
Approval of his human progeny,—
One summons of the whole magnific frame,
Each sinew to its service, — up he caught,
And over the shoulder cast, the lion-spear!
Let the club go, — for had he not those hands?
And so went striding off, on that straight way
Leads to Larissa and the suburb tomb.
Gladness be with thee, Helper of our world! I Think this is the authentic sign and seal
Of Godship, that it ever waxes glad,
And more glad, until gladness blossoms, bursts
Into a rage to suffer for mankind,
And recommence at sorrow: drops like seed
After the blossom, ultimate of all.
Say, does the seed scorn earth and seek the sun?
Surely it has no other end and aim
Than to drop, once more die into the ground,
Taste cold and darkness and oblivion there:
And thence rise, tree-like grow through pains to joy,
More joy and most joy, — do man good again.

So, to the struggle off strode Herakles.
When silence closed behind the lion-garb,
Back came our dull fact settling in its piles,
Though heartiness and passion half-dispersed
The inevitable fate. And presently
In came the mourners from the funeral,
One after one, until we hoped the last
Would be Alkestis and so end our dream.
Could they have really left Alkestis lose
I’ the wide sepulchre! I beg to save her!
And when Admetos felt that it was so.
By the stand-still: when he lifted head and face
Balaustion's Adventure

Thou hast saved soul and body. Dead, thy wife—
Living, the love she left. What's novel here?
Many the man, from whom Death long ago
Loosed the life-partner!"

Then Admetos spoke:

"Turned on the comfort, with no tears, this time,
He was beginning to be like his wife,
I told you of that pressure to the point,
Word slow pursuing word in monotone,
Admetos spoke with; so Admetos, now,
Solemnly bore the burden of the truth.
And as the voice of him grew, gathered strength,
And groaned on, and persisted to the end,
We felt how deep had been descent in grief,
And with what change he came up now to light,
And left behind such littleness as tears.

"Friends, I account the fortune of my wife
Happier than mine, though it seem otherwise:
For, for her indeed no grief will ever touch,
And she from many a labor passes now,
Renowned one! Whereas I, who ought not live,
But do live, by evading destiny,
Sad life am I to lead, I learn at last!
For how shall I bear going in-doors here?
Accosting whom? By whom saluted back,
Shall I have joyous entry? What's their turn?
Inside, the solitude will drive me forth,
When I behold the empty bed — my wife's —
The seat she used to sit upon, the floor
Unsprinkled as when dwellers loved the cool,
The children that will clam my knees about,
Cry for their mother back: those servants too
Moaning for what a guardian they have lost!
Inside my house such circumstance awaits,
Ontaide, — Thessalian people's marriage-feasts
And gatherings for talk will harass me,
With overflow of women everywhere;
It is impossible I look on them —
FAMILIARs of my wife and just her age!
And then, whoever is a foe of mine,
And lights on me — why, this will be his word —
'See there! alive ignobly, there he skulks
That played the dastard when it came to die,
And, giving her he wedded, in exchange,
Kept himself out of Hades safe and sound,
The coward! Do you call that creature — man?
He hates his parents for declining death,
Just as if he himself would gladly die!
This sort of reputation shall I have,
Beside the other ills enough in store,
ILL-famed, ill-faring, — what advantage, friends,
Do you perceive I gain by life for death?"

That was the truth. Vexed waters sank to smooth:
'T was only when the last of bubbles broke,
The latest circlet widened all away
And left a placid level, that up swim
To the surface the drowned truth, in dreadful change.
So, through the quiet and submission, — ay,
Spite of some strong words — (for you miss the tone)
The grief was getting to infinite —
Grief, friends fell back before. Their office shrank
To that old solace of humanity! —
"Being born mortal, bear grief! Why born else?"
And they could only meditate awne.

"They, too, upborne by airy help of song,
And happy science, which can find the stars,
Had searched the heights: had sounded depths as well
By catching much at books where logic lurked,
Yet nowhere found they aught could overcome
Necessity: not any medicine served.
Which 'Th Thracian tablets treasure, Orphic voice
Wrote itself down upon: nor remedy
Which Phoebus gave to the Asklepiadai;
Cutting the roots of many a virtuous herb
To solace overburdened mortals. None!
Of this sole goddess, never may we go
To altar nor to image: sacrifice.
She hears not. All to pray for is — ‘Approach!'
But, oh, no harder on me, awful one,
Than heretofore! Let life endure thee still!
For, whatsoever Zeus' nod decrees, that same
In concert with these hath accomplishment.
Iron, the very stuff o' the Chalaboi,
Thou, by sheer strength, dost conquer and subdue;
Nor, of that harsh abrupt resolve of thine,
Any relenting is there!"

"O my king!
These also, in the shackles of those hands,
Not to be shunned, the Goddess grasped! Yet, bear!
Since never wilt thou lead from underground
The dead ones, wail thy worst! If mortals die,
The very children of immortals, too,
Dropped 'mid our darkness, these decay as sure!
Dear indeed was she while among us: dear,
Now she is dead, must she forever be:
Thy portion was to clasp, within thy couch,
The noblest of all women as a wife.
Nor be the tomb of her supposed some heap
That hides mortality: but like the Gods
Honored, a veneration to a world
Of wanderers! Off the wanderer, struck there-by,
Who else had sailed past in his merchant-ship,
Ay, he shall leave ship, land, long wind his way
Up to the mountain-summit, till there break
Speech forth, 'So, this was she, then, died of old
To save her husband! now, a deity
She bends above us. Hail, benignant one!
Give good! Such voices so will supplicate. But — can it be? Akmene's offspring cometh, Admetos! — to thy house advances here!"

I doubt not, they supposed him decently
Dead somewhere in that winter world of Thess.

Vanquished by one o' the Bistones, or else
Victim to some mad steed's voracity —
For did not friends prognosticate as much?
It were a new example to the point,

That "children of immortals, dropped by stealth
Into our darkness, die as sure as we!"
A case to quote and comfort people with:
But, as for lamentation, ai and pheu,
Right-minded subjects kept them for their lord.

Ay, he it was advancing! In he strode,
And took his stand before Admetos,—turned
Now by despair to such a quistude,
He neither raised his face nor spoke, this time,
The while his friend surveyed him steadily.
That friend looked rough with fighting: had he strained
Worst brute to breast was ever strangled yet?
Somehow, a victory — for there stood the strength,
Happy, as always; something grave, perhaps
The great veil-cordage on the fret-worked front
Black-swollen, beaded yet with battle-dew
The yellow hair o' the hero! — his big frame
A-quiver with each muscle sinking back
Into the sleepy smooth it leaped from late.
Under the great sat guard of one arm, there lies
A shrouded something, live and woman-like,
Propped by the heartbeats 'neath the lion-cast.
When he had finished his survey, it seemed,
The heavings of the heart began subside,
The helps breath returned, and last the smile
Shone out, all Herakles was back again,
As the words followed the saluting hand.

"To friendly man, behooves we freely speak.
Admetos! — nor keep buried, deep in breast.
Blame we leave silent. I assuredly
Judged myself proper, if I should approach
By accident calamities of thine,
To be demonstrably thy friend: but thou
Told'st me not of the corpse then claiming care,
That was thy wife's, but didst instal me guest
I' the house here, as though busied with a grief
Indeed, but then, mere grief beyond thy gate:
And so, I crowned my head, and to the Gods
Poured my libations in thy dwelling-place,
With sway, misfortune round me. And I blame —
Certainly blame thee, having suffered thus!
But still I would not pain thee, pained enough:
So let it pass! Wherefore I seek thee now,
Having turned back again though onward bound,
That I will tell thee. Take and keep for me
This woman, till I come thy way again,
Driving before me, having killed the king
O' the Bistones, that drove of Thracian steeds:
In such case give the woman back to me!
But should I fare, — as fare I fain would not,
Seeing I hope to prosper and return,
Then, I bequeath her as thy household slave.
She came into my hands with good hard toil!
For, what find I, when started on my course,
But certain people, a whole country-side,
Holding a wrestling-bout? as good to me
As a new labor: whence I took, and here
Balaustion's Adventure

Come keeping with me, this, the victor's prize.
For, such as conquered in the easy work,
Gained horses which they drove away: and such
As conquered in the harder,—those who Boxed
And wrestled,—cattle; and, to crown the prize.
A woman followed. Chancing as I did,
Base were it to forego this fame and gain!
Well, as I said, I trust her to thy care:
No woman I have kidnapped, understand!
But good hard toil has done it: here I come!
Some day, who knows? even thou wilt praise
the feat!"

Admetos raised his face and eyed the pair:
Then, hollowly and with submission, spoke,
And spoke again, and spoke time after time,
When he perceived the silence of his friend
Would not be broken by consenting word.
As a tired slave goes adding stone to stone
Until he stop some moment that meseems lack
So poor a breath—Admetos piled up argument
Vainly against the purpose all too plain
In that great brow acquainted with command.

"Nowise dishonoring, nor amid my foes
Banishing thee, did I hide my wife's ill fate;
But it were grief superimposed on grief,
Shouldst thou have hastened to another home.
My own woe was enough for me to weep!
But, for this woman,—if it may so be,—
Saw some Theessalian,—I entreat thee, Nowise—king!—
Keep her,—who has not suffered like myself!
Many of the Phereci welcome thee.
Be no reminder to me of my ills!
I could not, if I saw her come to live,
Restrain the tear! Insult me, diseased,
No new disease: woe bends me down enough!
Then, where could she be sheltered in my house,
Female and young too? For that she is young,
The vesture and adornment prove. Reflect!
Should such an one inhabit the same roof
With men? And how, mixed up, a girl, with youths.
Shall she keep pure, in that case? No light task
To curb the May-day youngster, Herakles!
I only speak because of care for thee.
Or must I, in avoidance of such harm,
Make her to enter, lead her life within
The chamber of the dead one, all apart?
How shall I introduce this other, couch
This where Alkestis lay? A double blame
I apprehend: first, from the citizens—
Lost some tongue of them taunt that I betray
My benefactress, fall into the snare
Of a new fresh face: then, the dead one's self,—
Will she not blame me likewise? Worthy, sure,
Of worship from me! circumspect my ways,
And jealous of a fault, are bound to be.
But thou,—O woman, whose'er thou art,—
Know, thou hast all the form, art like as like Alkestis, in the bodily shape! Ah me!
Take—by the Gods—this woman from my sight,

Loest thou undo me, the undone before!
Since I seem—seeing her—as if I saw
My own wife! And confusions cloud my heart,
And from my eyes the springs break forth!
Ah me
Unhappy—how I taste for the first time
My misery in all its bitterness!"

Whereat the friends conferred: "The chance,
in truth,
Was an untoward one—none said otherwise.
Still, what a God comes giving, good or bad,
That, one should take and bear with. Take her, then!"

Herakles,—not unfastening his hold
On that same misery, beyond mistake
Horse in the words, convulsive in the face,—
"I would that I had such a power," said he,
"As to lead up into the light again
Thy very wife, and grant thee such a grace!"

"Well do I know thou wouldst: but where the hope?
There is no bringing back the dead to light."

"Be not extravagant in grief, no less!
Bear it, by augury of better things!"

"Tis easier to advise 'bear up,' than bear!"

"But how carve way i' the life that lies before,
If bent on groaning ever for the past?"

"I myself know that: but a certain love Allures me to the choice I shall not change."

"Ay, but, still loving dead ones, still makes woe.
"And let it be so! She has ruined me,
And still more than I say: that answers all."

"Oh, thou hast lost a brave wife: who disputes?"

"So brave a one—that he whom thou behold'st
Will never more enjoy his life again!"

"Time will assuage! The evil yet is young!"

"Time, thou mayst say, will; if time mean—to die."

"A wife—the longing for new marriage-joys
Will stop thy sorrow!"

"Hush, friend,—hold thy peace!
What hast thou said! I could not credit ear!"

"How then? Thou wilt not marry, then, but keep A widowed couch?"

"There is not any one
Of womankind shall couch with whom thou seest!"
"Dost think to profit thus in any way
The dead one?"

"Her, wherever she abide,
My duty is to honor."

"And I praise —
Indeed I praise thee! Still, thou hast to pay
The price of it, in being held a fool!"

"Fool call me — only one name call me not!
Bridgroom!"

"No: it was praise, I portioned thee,
Of being good true husband to thy wife!"

"When I betray her, though she is no more,
May I die!"

And the thing he said was true:
For out of Herakles a great glow broke.
There stood a victor worthy of a prize:
The violet-crown that withers on the brow
Of the half-hearted claimant. Oh, he knew
The signs of battle hard fought and well won,
This queller of the monsters — knew his friend
Planted firm foot, now, on the loathly thing
That was Admetos late! "would die," he knew,
Ere let the reptile raise its crest again.
If that was truth, why try the true friend
more?

"Then, since thou canst be faithful to the
death.
Take, deep into thy house, my dame!" smiled he.

"Not so! — I pray, by thy Progenitor!"

"Thou wilt mistake in disobeying me!"

"Obeying thee, I have to break my heart!"

"Obey me! Who knows but the favor done
May fall into its place as duty too?"

So, he was humble, would decline no more Bearing a burden: he just sighed, "Alas! Would thou hadst never brought this prize from game!"

"Yet, when I conquered there, thou conqueredst!"

"All exalently urged! Yet — spite of all, Bear with me! let the woman go away!"

"She shall go, if needs must: but ere she go, See if there is need!"

"Need there is! At least,
Except I make thee angry with me, so!"

"But I persist, because I have my spice
Of intuition likewise: take the dame!"

"Be thou the victor, then! But certainly Thou dost thy friend no pleasure in the act!"

"Oh, time will come when thou shalt praise me! Now —
Only obey!"

"Then, servants, since my home
Must needs receive this woman, take her
there!"

"I shall not trust this woman to the care
Of servants."

"Why, conduct her in, thyself.
If that seem preferable!"

"I prefer,
With thy good leave, to place her in thy
hands!"

"I would not touch her! Entry to the house —
That, I concede thee."

"To thy sole right hand
I mean to trust her!"

"King! Thou wroncest this Out of me by main force, if I submit!"

"Courage, friend! Come, stretch hand forth!
Good! Now touch
The stranger-woman!"

"There! A hand I stretch —
As though it meant to cut off Gorgon’s head!"

"Hast hold of her?"

"Fast hold."

"Why, then, hold fast
And have her! and, one day, assume
Thou wilt, I think, thy friend, the son of Zeus.
He was the gentle guest to entertain!
Look at her! See if she, in any way,
Present thee with resemblance of thy wife!"

Ah, but the tears come, find the words at fault!
There is no telling how the hero twitched
The veil off: and there stood, with such fixed
eyes
And such slow smile, Alcestis’ silent self!
It was the crowning grace of that great heart,
To keep back joy: procrastinate the truth
Until the wife, who had made proof and found
The husband wanting, might essay once more:
Hear, see, and feel him renovated now —
Able to do, now, all herself had done,
Risen to the height of her: so, hand in hand.
The two might go together, live and die.

Beside, when he found speech, you guess the speech.
He could not think he saw his wife again:
It was some mocking God that used the bliss
To make him mad! Till Herakles must help:
Assure him that no spectre mocked at all;
He was embracing whom he buried once.
Still, — did he touch, might he address the
true, —
True eye, true body of the true live wife?

And Herakles said, smiling, "All was truth.
Spectre? Admetos had not made his guest
One who played ghost-invoker, or such ghost!
Oh, he might speak and have response, in time!
All heart could wish was gained now — life for
death:
Only, the rapture must not grow immense:
Take care, nor wake the envy of the Gods!"
Balaustion’s Adventure

"O thou, of greatest Zeus true son," — so spoke Admetos when the closing word must come,
"Go ever in a glory of success,
And save, that sire, his offspring to the end!
For thou hast — only thou — raised me and mine
Up again to this light and life!" Thus asked Tremblingly, how was trod the perilous path
Out of the dark into the light and life:
How it had happened with Alkestis there.

And Heracles said little, but enough —
How he engaged in combat with that king
O’ the daemons: how the field of contest lay
By the tomb’s self: how he sprang from ambush,
Captured Death, caught him in that pair of hands.

But all the time, Alkestis moved not once
Out of the seat gazè and the silent smile;
And a cold fear ran through Admetos’ frame:
"Why does she stand and front me, silent thus?"

Heracles solemnly replied, "Not yet
Is it allowable thou hear the things
She has to tell thee; let vanish quite
That consecration to the lower Gods,
And on our upper world the third day rise!
Lead her in, meanwhile; good and true thou art,
Good, true, remain thou! Prayse piety
To stranger-guests the old way! So, farewell!
Since forth I fare, fulfil my urgent task
Set by the king, the son of Sthenelos."

Fain would Admetos keep that splendid smile
Ever to light him. "Stay with us, thou heart!
 Remain our house-friend!"

"At some other day!"
Now, of necessity, I haste!" smiled he.

"But mayst thou prosper, go forth on a foot
Sure to return! Through all the tetrarchy,
Command my subjects that they institute
Thanksgiving-dances for the glad event,
And bid each altar smoke with sacrifice!
For we are minded to begin a fresh
Existence, better than the life before;
Seeing I own myself supremely blest."

Whereupon all the friendly moralists
Drew this conclusion: chirped, each beard to each:
"Manifest are thy shapings, Providence!
Many a hopeless matter Gods arrange.
What we expected never came to pass:
What we did not expect Gods brought to bear;
So have things gone, this whole experience through!"

Ah, but if you had seen the play itself!
They say, my post failed to get the prize:

Sophokles got the prize, — great name! They say,
Sophokles also means to make a piece,
Model a new Admetos, a new wife:
Success to him! One thing has many sides.
The great name! But no good suppliants a good,
Nor beauty undoes beauty. Sophokles
Will carve and carry a fresh cup, brimful
Of beauty and good, firm to the altar-foot,
And glorify the Dionysiac shrine:
Not clash against this crater in the place
Where the God put it when his mouth had drained,
To the last drop, libation lifeblood-like,
And praised Euripides forevermore —
The Human with his droppings of warm tears.

Still, since one thing may have so many sides,
I think I see how, — far from Sophokles,
You, I, or any one might mould a new Admetos, new Alkestis. Ah, that brave
Bounty of poets, the one royal race
That ever was, or will be, in this world!
They give no gift that bounds itself and ends
I’ the giving and the taking: theirs so breeds
I’ the heart and soul o’ the taker, so transmutes
The man who only was a man before,
That he grows godlike in his turn, can give —
He also: share the poets’ privilege,
Bring forth new good, new beauty, from the old.
As though the cup that gave the wine, gave,
too,
The God’s prolific giver of the grape,
That vine, was wont to find out, fawn around
His footstepspringing still to bless the dearest,
At bidding of a Maimad. So with me:
For I have drunk this poem, quenched my thirst,
Satisfied heart and soul — yet more remains!
Could we too make a poem? Try at least,
Inside the head, what shape the rose-mists take!

When God Apollon took, for punishment,
A mortal form and sold himself a slave
To King Admetos till a term should end, —
Not only did he make, in servitude,
Such music, while he fed the flocks and herds,
As saved the pasturage from wrong or fright,
Curing rough creatures of ungentleness:
Much more did that melodious wisdom work
Within the heart o’ the master: there, ran wild
Many a lust and greed that grow to strength
By preying on the native pity and care,
Would else, all undisturbed, possess the land.

And these the God so tamed, with golden tongue,
That, in the plenteous of youth and power,
Admetos vowed himself to rule thenceforth
In Pherei solely for his people’s sake,
Subduing to such end each lust and greed
That dominates the natural charity.

And so the struggle ended. Right ruled might:
And soft yet brave, and good yet wise, the man
Stood up to be a monarch; having learned
The worth of life, life's worth would he bestow
On all whose lot was cast, to live or die,
As he determined for the multitude.
So stands a statue: pedestalled sublime,
Only that it may wave the thunder off,
And ward, from winds that vex, a world below.

And then, — as if a whisper found its way
E'en to the sense o' the marble, — "Vain thy vow!"
The royalty of its resolve, that head
Shall hide within the dust ere day be done:
That arm, its outstretched beneficence,
Shall have a speedy ending on the earth:
Lie patient, prone, while light some cricket leaps
And takes possession of the masterpiece,
To sit, sing louder as more near the sun.
For why? A flaw was in the pedestal;
Who knows? A worm's work! Sapped, the certain fate
O' the statue is to fall, and thine to die!"

Whereas the monarch, calm, addressed himself
To die, but bitterly the soul broketh —
"O prodigality of life, blind waste
I the world, of power profuse without the will
To make life do its work, deserve its day!
My ancestors pursued their pleasure, poured
The blood o' the people out in idle war,
Or took occasion of some weary peace
To bid men dig down deep or build up high,
Spend bone and marrow that the king might feast
Entrenched and buttressed from the vulgar gaze.
Yest then all lived, nay, lingered to old age;
As though Zeus loved that they should laugh to scorn
The vanity of seeking other ends
In rule, than just the ruler's pastime. They lived; I must die."

— And, as some long loam
Of a monarch suddenly is propped beneath
By note which, new-struck, turns the wall that was
Into a wonder and a triumph, so Began Alkestis: "Nay, thou art to live!
The glory that, in the disguise of flesh,
Was helpful to our house, — he prophesied
The coming fate: whereon, I pleaded sore
That he, — I guessed a God, who to his couch
Aidid the clouds must go and come again,
While we were darkling, — since he loved us both.
He should permit thee, at whatever price,
To live and carry out to heart's content
Soul's purpose, turn each thought to very deed,
Nor let Zeus lose the monarch means in thee.

"To which Apollo, with a sunset smile,
Sadly — 'And so should mortals arbitrate!
It were unseemly if they aped us Gods,
And, mindful of our chain of consequence,
Ist care of the immediate earthly link:
Forwent the comfort of life's little hour,
In prospect of some cold abysmal blank
Alien eternity, — unlike the time

They know, and understand to practise with —
No — cite eternity — no heart's blood, bright
And warm outpoured in its behalf, would stain
Never so palely, warm a whit the more:
Whereas retained and treasures — left to last
Joyously on, a life's length, in the breast.
O' the loved and loving — it would thrust itself
Through, and suffuse the earthly tenement,
Transform it, even as your mansion here
Is love-transformed into a temple-home
Where I, a God, forget the Olympian glow,
I the feel of human richness like the rose:
Your hopes and fears, so blind and yet so vast
With death about them. Therefore, well is the see thigh
To look, not on eternity, but time:
To apprehend that, should Admetos die,
All, we Gods purposed in him, dies as sure:
That life's link snapping, all our chain is lost
And yet a mortal glance might pierce, me thinks,
Deeper into the seeming dark of things,
And learn, no fruit, man's life can bear, will so soon
Learn, if Admetos die now, so much more
Will pity for the frailness found in flesh,
Will terror at the earthly chance and change
Frustrating wisest scheme of noblest soul,
Will these go wake the seeds of good asleep
Through out the world: as oft a rough wild shed
The unripe promise of some field-flowers, — true!
But loses too the leval, and lets breathe
A thousand captives for the year to come.
Nevertheless, obtain thy prayer, stay fate
Admetos lives — if thou wilt die for him!"

"So was the pact concluded that I die,
And thou live on, live for thyself, for me.
For all the world. Embrace and bid me hail
Husband, because I have the victory —
Am, heart, soul, head to foot, one happiness!"

Wherefore Admetos, in a passionate cry:
"Never, by that true word Apollo spoke! All the unwised wish is unwished, O wife!
Let purposes of Zeus fulfill themselves,
If not through me, then through some other man
Still, in myself he had a purpose too,
Inalienably mine, to end with me:
This purpose — that, throughout my earthly life,
Mire should be mingled and made up with thine, —
And we two prove one force and play one part
And one thing. Since death divides the pair,
'T is well that I depart and thou remain
Who wait to me as spirit is to flesh:
Let the flesh perish, be perceived no more.
So thou, the spirit that informed the flesh.
Pend yet awhile, a very flame above
The rift I drop into the darkness by, —
And bid remember, flesh and spirit once
Worked in the world, one body, for man's sake.
Never be that abominable show
Of passive death without a quickening life—
Admetos only, no Alkestis now!

Then she: "O thou Admetos, must the pile
Of truth on truth, which needs but one truth
more
To toil on in completeness, trophy-like,
Empire of man, and triumph of the world,
Must it go ever to the ground again
Because of some faint heart or faltering hand,
Which we, that breathless world about the base,

Trusted should carry safe to altitude,
Superimpose o' the summit, our supreme
Achievement, our victorious opening-stone?
Shall thine, Beloved, prove the hand and heart
That fail again, flinch backward at the truth
Would cap and crown the structure this last time,

Precipitate our monumental hope
And strew the earth ignobly yet once more?
See how, truth piled on truth, the structure wants,

Wait for the crowning truth I claim of thee!
Wouldst thou, for, any joy to be enjoyed,
For any sorrow that thou mightst escape,
Unswill thy will to reign a righteous king?
Nowise! And were there two lots, death and life,—

Life, wherein good resolve should go to air,
Death, whereby finest fancy grew plain fact
I' the reign of thy survivor,—life or death?
Certainly death, thou choosest. Here stand I
The wedded, the beloved one: hadst thou loved

Her voice, most worthy could estimate
Both life and death than thou? Not so should say Admetos, whom Apollo made come court
Alkestis in a car, submissive brutes
Of blood were yoked to, symbolizing soul
Must dominate unruly sense in man.
Then, shall Admetos and Alkestis see
Good alike, and alike choose, each for each,
Good, — and yet, each for other, at the last,
Choose evil? 'What? thou soundest in my soul
To depths below the deepest, reapest good in evil, that makes evil good again,
And so allotest to me that I live
And not die—letting die, not thee alone,
But all true life that lived in both of us?
Look at me once ere thou decree the lot!"

Therewith her whole soul entered into his,
He looked the look back, and Alkestis died.

And even while it lay, 'tis the look of him,
Dead, the dimmed body, bright Alkestis' soul
Had penetrated through the populace
Of ghosts, was got to Kore,—throned and crowned
The penive queen o' the twilight, where she dwells
Forever in a muse, but half away
From every earth she lost and hankers for,—
And there demanded to become a ghost
Before the time.

Whereat the softened eyes
Of the lost maidenhood that lingered still Straying among the flowers in Sicily,
Sudden was startled back to Hades' throne
By that demand: broke through humanity
Into the orb'd omniscience of a God,
Searched at a glance Alkestis to the soul,
And said — while a long slow sigh lost itself
I' the hard and hollow passage of a laugh:

"Hence, thou deceiver! This is not to die,
If, by the very death which mocks me now,
The life, that 's left behind and past my power,
Is formidable doubled, say, there fight
Two athletes, side by side, each athlete armed
With only half the weapons, and no more,
Adapted to a contest with their foes:
If one of these should fling helm, sword and shield
To fellow — shieldless, swordless, helmsless late—
And so leap naked o'er the barrier, leave
A combatant equipped from head to heel,
Yet cry to the other side, 'Receive a friend
Who fights no longer!' 'Back, friend, to the fray!'
Would be the prompt rebuff; I echo it.
Two souls in one were formidable odds:
Admetos must not be himself and thou!

And so, before the embrace relaxed a whit,
The lost eyes opened, still beneath the look;
And lo, Alkestis was alive again,
And of Admetos' rapture who shall speak?

So, the two lived together long and well,
But never could I learn, by word of scribe
Or voice of poet, rumor wafts our way
That — of the scheme of rule in righteousness,
The bringing back again the Golden Age,
Which, rather than renounce, our pair would die—
That ever one faint particle came true,
With both alive to bring it to effect:
Such is the envy Gods still bear mankind!

So might our version of the story prove,
And no Euripidean pathos plague
Too much my critic-friend of Syracuse.

"Besides your poem failed to get the prize:
(That is, the first prize: second prize is none.)
Sophokles got it!" Honor the great name! All cannot love two great names; yet some do:
I know the poetess who graved in gold,
Among her glories that shall never fade,
This style and title for Euripides,
The Human with his droppings of warm tears.

I know, too, a great Kannian painter, strong
As Hesekles, though rosy with a robe
Of grace that softens down the sinewy strength:
And he has made a picture of it all.
There lies Alkestis dead, beneath the sun,
She longed to look her last upon, beside
The sea, which somehow tempts the life in us
To come trip over its white waste of waves,
And try escape from earth, and live as free.
Behind the body, I suppose there bends
Old Phere in his hoary impotence;
And women-wailers in a corner crouch
— Four, beautiful as you four — yes, indeed! —
Close, each to other, agonizing all,
As fastened, in fear’s rhythmic sympathy,
To two contending opposite. There strains
The might o’ the hero ‘gainst his more than match,
— Death, dreadful not in them and bone, but
like
The envenomed substances that exudes some dew
Whereby the merely honest flesh and blood
Will fester up and run to ruin straight,
Ere they can close with, clasp and overcome

The poisonous impalpability
That simulates a form beneath the flow
Of those gray garments; I pronounce that piece
Worthy to set up in our Poikilé!

And all came, — glory of the golden verse,
And passion of the picture, and that fine
Frank outburst of the human gratitude
Which saved our ship and me, in Syræa,
— Ay, and the tear or two which slip perhaps Away from you, friends, while I told my tale,
— It all came of this play that gained no prize!
Why crown whom Zeus has crowned in sea before?

ARISTOPHANES’ APOLOGY
INCLUDING A TRANSCRIPT FROM EURYPIDES, BEING

THE LAST ADVENTURE OF BALAUSTON.

WIND, wave, and bark, bear Euthukles and me,
Balauston, from — not sorrow but despair,
Not memory but the present and its pang!
Athenai, live thou hearted in my heart:
Never, while I live, may I see thee more,
Never again may these repugnant orbs
Ache themselves blind before the hideous pomp,
The ghastly mirth which mocked thine overthrow — Death’s entry, Hades’ outrage!

Doomed to die, —
Fire should have sung a passion of embrace
About thee till, resplendently inarmed,
(Temple by temple folded to his breast,
All thy white wonder fainting out in ash.)
Lightly some vaporous sigh of soul escaped
And so the Immortals bade Athenai back!
Or earth might ponder and absorb thee, save,
Buried below Olumpos and its gods,
Akropolis to dominate her realm
For Kord, and console the ghosts; or, sea,
What if thy watery plural vastitude,
Rolling unanimous advance, had rushed,
Might upon might, a moment, — stood, one
stare,
Sea-face to city-face, thy glauous wave
Glissening that marbled last magnificence, —
Till fate’s pale tremulous foam-flower tipped
the gray,
And when wave broke and overswarmed, and,

To bounds back, multitudinously ceased,
Let land again breathe unconfused with sea,
Attiké was, Athenai was not now!

Sauk and I could have borne, for I had shed
But this which, glanced at, aches within my orbs
To blinding, — bear me thence, bark, wind and wave!
Me, Euthukles, and, hearted in each heart,
Athenai, undisgraced as Pallas’ self,
Bear to my birthplace, Helle’s island-bride,
Zeus’ daring: thither speed us, homeward-
bound,
Wafted already twelve hours’ sail away
From horror, nearer by one sunset Rhodes!

Why should despair be? Since, distinct above
Man’s wickedness and folly, flies the wind
And floats the cloud, free transport for our soul
Out of its fleshly durance dim and low, —
Since disembodied soul anticipates
(Thought-borne as now in rapturous unrestraint)
Above all crowding, crystal silences,
Above all noise, a silver solitude: —
Surely, where thought so bears soul, soul is
time
May permanently hide, “assert the wise,”
There live in peace, there work in hope once
more —
Oh, nothing doubt, Philemon! Greed and strife, Hatred and care and care, what place have they
In you blue liberality of heaven? How the sea helps! How rose-erewhit earth will Breast-high thence, some bright morning, and be Rhodes! Heaven, earth and sea, my warrant—in their name, Believe o'er falsehood, truth is surely nearer heaven. O'er ugliness beams beauty, o'er this world
Extends that realm where "as the wise assert," Philemon, thou shalt see Euripides
Clearer than mortal sense perceived the man!

A sunset nearer Rhodes, by twelve hours' sweep
Of surge secured from horror? Rather say, Quizzed out of weakness into strength. I dare invite, survey the scene my sense Staggered to apprehend: for, disenchanged, From the mere outside anguish and contempt, Slowly a justice centred in a doom Reveals itself. Ay, pride succumbed to pride, Oppression met the oppressor and was matched.

Athenai's want braved Sparte's violence Tell in the she, in the moonfall Chartreuse, low Rampant and burkwark lay, as— timing stroke Of hammer, axe, and beam hoist, poised and swung— The very flute-girls blew their laughing best, In dance about the conqueror while he bade Music and movement help enginery Batter down, break to pieces all the trust Of citizens once, slaves now. See what walls Play substitute for the long double range Thermistokles, heralding a guest From harbor on to citadel! Each side Their senseless walls demolished stone by stone. See, — outer wall as stonelike, heads and hearts, Athenai's terror-stricken populace!

Frattlers, tongue-tied in crouching abjection,— Braggarts, who wring hands wont to flourish swords— Sophist and rhetorician, demagogue, (Argument dumb, authority a jest,) Dikast and heliast, pleader, litigant, Quack-priest, sham-prophecy-retailer, scoundrels of the customs, syphoranth, what'er the style, Altar-scarp-snatcher, pimp and parasites,— Rivalties at truce now each with each, Stupefied mud-banks,— such an use they serve! While the one order which performs exact To promise, functions faithful last as first, What is it but the city's lyric troop, Chantresses and palmresses, flute-girl, dancing-girl? Athenai's ha’otry takes laughing care Their patron miss no pipes, late she loved, But deathward tread at least the kordax-step.

Die then, who pulled such glory on your heads! There let it grind to powder! Perikles! The living are the dead now: death be life! Why should the sunset homo waste its wealth? Prove thee Olympian! If my heart supply Involvate the structure, — true to type, Build me some spirit-place no flesh shall find, As Pheidias may inspire thee; alab on slab, Renum Athenai, quarry out the cloud, Convert to gold you west extravagance! 'Neath Propulaios, from Akanthos, low By vapory grade and grade, gold all the way, Step to thy snow-Pauz, mount thy Bema-cloud, Thunder and lighten thence a Hellas through That shall be better and more beautiful And too august for Sparte’s foot to span! Chameled in the cres, against our Theatre Predominates, one purple: Staghunt-month, Brings it not Dionysus? Hall, the Three! Aiasules, Sophokles, Euripides Compete, gain prize or lose prize, godlike still. Nay, lest they lack the old god-exercise Their noble want the unworthy,— as of old, (How otherwise should patience crown their might?)

What if each find his ape promoted man, His censor raised for antic service still? Some new Herminus to pelt Perikles, Kratinos to swear Pheidias robbed a shrine, Eruxis— I suspect, Euripides, No brow will ache because with mop and mow He gives my poet! There's a dog-faced dwarf That gets to godship somehow, yet remains His sheephood in the Farm of the cattle— More decent, indecorous just enough:
Why should not dog-sap, grazed in due degree, Grow Monos as thou Zeus? Or didst thou sigh Rightly with thy Makaria? " "After life, Better no sentiency than turbulence; Death eures in the Percy Theatre. Be it so! Yet progress means contention, to my mind.

Euthulkes, who, except for love that speaks, Art silent by my side while words of mine Prowse that foe from which escape is vain Henceforward, wake Athenai's fate and fall,— Memories aseep as, at the altar-foot,

Those Furies in the Orestian song,— Do I amiss, who wanting strength use craft, Advance upon the foe I cannot fly, Nor feign a snare's as dormant through it grew? That fate and fall, once bedded in our brain, Roots itself past upwrenching; but coaxed forth, Encouraged out to practise fork and fang,— Perhaps, when satiate with prompt sustenance, It may pine, likely die than if left swell In peace by our pretension to ignore, Or prickled to threefold fury, should our stamp

Bruse and not brain the pest.

A middle course!

What hinders that we treat this tragic theme As the Three taught when either woke some woe.
— How Klitaimnestra hated, what the pride
Of lokast, why Medea clothe,
Nature assurred. Small rebuked by large,
We felt our puny hates reffite to air,
Our poor pride sink, prevent the humbling hand,
Our petty passions purify their tide.
So, Euthulkes, permit the tragedy
ARISTOPHANES’ APOLOGY

To re-enact itself, this voyage through,
Till sunsets end and sunrise brighten Rhodes!
Majestic on the stage of memory,
Peopled and kithsored, let Athenais fall
With all their pride, often again till life conclude,
Lent for the lesson: Choros, I and thou!
What else in life seems piteous any more
After such pity, or proves terrible
Beside such terror?

Still—since Phrunichos
Offended, by too premature a touch
Of that Milesian smart-place freshly frayed—
(At, my poor people, whose prompt remedy
Was—line the poet, not reform thyself!)
Beware precipitate approach! Rehearse
Rather the prologue, wall a year away,
Than the main misery, a sunset old.
What else but fitting prologue to the piece
Style an adventure, stranger than my first
By so much as the issue it enwombs
Lurked big beyond Balauston’s littleness?
Second mouving adventure! O that Spring,
That eve I told the earlier to my friends!
Where are the four now, with each red-ripe
mouth
Crumped so close, no quickest breath it fetched
Could discernage the lip-flower funed to bud
For fear Admetos—shivering head and foot,
As with sick soul and blind averted face
He trusted hand forth to obey his friend—
Should find no wife in her cold hand’s response,
Nor see the disconsolated statue stand
Alcestis, live the life and love the love!
I wonder, does the streamlet ripple still,
Out-smoothing galantine and watermint
Its mat-floor? while at brim, ’twixt sedge and sedge,
What doppelings past Bacchosion, broadened
much
Pricked by the Reed and fretted by the fly,
Oared by the boatman-sparrow’s pair of arms!
Lenais was a gladsome month ago—
Euripides had taught “Andromedé”;
Next month would teach “Krephontes” — which same month
Some one from Phokis, who companioned me
Since all that happened on those temple-steps,
Would marry me and turn Athenian too.
Now if next year the masters let the slaves
Do Bacchic service and restore mankind
That trilogy whereof, ’t is noised, one play
Presents the Bacchai,—no Euripides
Will teach the choros, nor shall we be tided
By any such grand sunset of his soul,
Exiles from dead Athenais,—not the live
That’s in the cloud there with the new-born star!

Speak to the infinite intelligence,
Sing to the everlasting sympathy!
Wends belly sail, and drench of dancing brine
Buffet our boat-side, so the prove bound free!
Condense our voyage into one great day
Made up of sunset-closes: eve by eve,
Resume that memorable night-discourse
When—like some meteor-brilliance, fire and flint,

Or say, his own Amphitheatro, deity
And dung, who, bound on the gods’ embassage,
Got men’s acknowledgment in kick and cuff—
We made acquaintance with a visitor
Ominous, apparitional, who went
Strange as he came, but shall not pass away.
Let us attempt that memorable talk,
Clothe the adventure’s every incident
With due expression: may not looks be told,
Gesture made speak, and speech so amplified
That Aischu has, find blood-warmth which, cold-write, they lose?

Recall the night we heard the news from Thrace,
One year ago, Athenais still herself.
We two were sitting silent in the house,
Yet cheerless hardly. Euriskles, forgive! I
I somehow speak to unseen auditors.
Not you, but—Euriskles had entered, grave,
Grand, may I say, as who brings laurel-branch
And message from the tripod: such it proved.
He first removed the garland from his brow,
Then took my hand and looked into my face.

“Speak good words!” much misgiving faltered I.

“Good words, the best, Balauston! He is crowned,
Gone with his Attic ivy home to feast,
Since Aischu has required companionship.
Pour a libation for Euripides!”

When we had sat the heavier silence out—
“Dead and triumphant still!” began reply
To my eye’s question. “As he willed, he worked:
And, as he worked, he wanted not, be sure,
Triumph his whole life through, submitting
work
To work’s right judges, never to the wrong.
To competency, not iniquity.
When he had run life’s proper race and worked
Quite to the stade’s end, there remained to try
The stade’s turn, should strength dare the double course.
Half the dialogues reached, the hundred plays
Accomplished, force in its rebound suffice
To lift along the athletes and ensure
A second wreath, proffered by fools for first,
The statistic’s olive as the poet’s bay.
Wisseler, he suffered not a twofold aim
Retard his pace, confuse his sight; at once
Poet and statistic; though the multitude
Girded him ever ‘All thine aim thine art?’
The idle poet only? No regard
For civic duty, public service, here?
We drop our ballot-bean for Sophokles!
Not only could he write “Antigone,”
But—since (we argued) whose penned that piece
Might just as well conduct a squadron—
straight
Good-naturedly he took on him command,
Got laughed at, and went back to making plays,
Having allowed us our experiment
Respecting the fit use of faculty,
No whit the more did athlete slacken pace,
Soon the peers grew: 'Cold hater of his kind,
A sea-cave suits him, not the vulgar hearth!
What need of tongue-talk, with a bookish store
Would stock ten cities?' 'Shadow of an ass!
No whit the worse did athlete touch the mark
And, at the turning-point, consign his sohn
O' the scorners to that final trilogy
'Hupeisipole,' 'Phoinissai,' and the Match
Of Life Contemplative with Active Life,
Zethos against Amphion. Ended so?
Nowise! — began again; for heroes rest
Dropping shield's oval o'er the entire man
And he who thus took Contemplation's prize
Turned state-point but to face Activity.
Out of all shadowy hands extending help
For life's decline pledged to youth's labor still,
Whatever renovation flatter age, —
Society with pastime, solitude
With peace, — he chose the hand that gave the heart,
Bade Macedonian Archelaus take
The levings of Athenai, ash once flame.
For fifty politicians' grov'y work,
One poet's ash proved ample and to spare:
He propped the state and filled the treasury,
Counselled the king as might a meaner soul,
Furnished the friend with what shall stand in stead.
Of crown and sceptre, star his name about
When these are dust; for him, Euripides
Last the old hand on the old phorminx sung,
Clashed thence 'Alkaion,' maddened 'Pentheus' up;
Then music bred itself away, one moan
Iphigeneia made by Aulis' strand;
With her and music died Euripides.

"The poet-friend who followed him to Thrace,
Again he writes thus much: the merchant-ship,
Moreover brings a message from the king
To young Euripides, who went on board
This morning at Mounochia: all is true,"
I said "Thank Zeus for the great news and good!"

"Nay, the report is running in brief fire
Through the town's stubbly furrow," he resumed:
— "Entertain brightly what their favorite styles
'The City of Gapers' for a week perhaps,
Supplants three luminous tales, but yesterday
Prounced sufficient lamps to last the month:
How Glanthesse, outbidding Morismos,
Paid market-price for one Kopaic calf
A thousand drachmai, and then cooked his prize
Not proper conger-fashion but in oil
And nettle, as man fries the foam-fish-kind;
How all the customaries, late
Victors at Arginouia, on return
Will, for return, be straightway put to death;

How Mikon wagered a Thessalian mime
Trained him by Laia, looked on as complete,
Against Leougora's blood-mare koppa-marked,
Valued six talents, — swore, accomplished so,
The girl could swallow at a draught, nor breathe,
A choinox of unmixed Mendesian wine;
And having lost the match will — dine on herbs;
Three stories late aflame, at once extinct,
Outblazed by just 'Euripides is dead!'

"I met the concourse from the Theatre,
The audience flocking homeward: victory
Again awarded Aristophanes
Precisely for his old play chopped and changed,
'The Female Celebrators of the Feast.' —
That Thesmophoria, tried a second time.
'Th' never such full success!' — assured the folk,
Who yet stopped praising to have word of month
With 'Euthylkes, the bard's own intimate,
Balastous's husband, the right man to ask.'

"'Dead, yes, but how dead, may acquaintance
know?"
You were the couple constant at his cave:
Tell us now, is it true that women, moved
By reason of his liking Krateros'...

"I answered 'He was loved by Sokrates.'"

"'Nay,' said another, 'envy did the work!'
For, emulating poets of the place,
One Arridaeo, one Kraterous, both Established in the royal favor, these..."

"'Protagoras instructed him,' said I.

"'Phu,' whistled Comic Platon, 'hear the fact!'
'Twas well said of your friend by Sophokles,
"He hate our women? In his verse, belike.
But when it comes to prose-work, — ha, ha, ha!"
New climes don't change old manners: so, it chanced,
Pursuing an intrigue one moonless night
With Arethousian Nikokles' wife.
(Comen now, his years were simply seventy-five,) Crossing the palace-court, what hap he on
But Archelaos' pack of hungry hounds?
Who tore him piecemeal ere his cry brought help.'

"I asked: Did not you write 'The Festivals'? You best know what dog tore him when alive.
You others, who now make a ring to hear,
Have not you just enjoyed a second treat,
Proclaimed that n'er was play more worthy prize
Than this, myself assisted at, last year,
And gave its worth to, — spitting on the same?
Appraises no poetry,— price cuttlefish,
Or that seaweed-alphasteas, scorpion-sort.
Much famed for mixing mud with fancy
On midnights! I interpret no foul dreams."
If so said Euthukles, so could not I,
Balaustion, say. After "Lunistraté"
No more for me of "people's privilege,"
No witnessing "the Grand old Comedy
Coeval with our freedom, which, curtailing,
Will freedom's deathblow; relics of the past,
When Virtue laughingly told truth to Vice,
Uncensored, since the stern mouth, stuffed with
flowers,
Through poetry breathed satire, perfumed blast
Which sense snuff'd up while searched unto
As I was a stranger: "For first joy," urged
friends,
"Go hear our Comedy, some patriot piece
That plies the selfish advocates of war
With argument so unbeatable
That crash fall Kisons whom the finer play
Of reason, tickling, deeper wounds no whit
Than would a spear-thrust from a savory-stalk!
No: you hear knave and fool told crime and
fault,
And see each scourged his quantity of stripes.
'Hound dealing, awkward language,' while our fops:
The world's too squeamish now to bear plain words
Concerning deeds it acts with gust enough:
But, think'st, at wine-les and demore Pyx,
We've still our stage where truth calls spade a spade!
Ashamed? Phuromachos' decree provides
The sex may sit discreetly, witness all,
Sorted, the good with good, the gay with gay,
Then the bone'1m, no need to force a blush.
A Rhodian wife and ignorant so long?
Go hear next play!"

I heard "Lunistraté."
Waves, said to wash pollution from the world,
Take that plague-memory, cure that pestile
caught
As, past escape, I sat and saw the piece
By one appalled at Phaidra's fate, — the chaste, Whom, because chaste, the wicked goddess chained
to that same serpent of unchastity
She lost most, and who, coiled so, did disstraught
Rather than make submission, loose one limb
Love-wards, at lambency of honeyed tongue,
Or torture of the scales which scraped her snow
— I say, the piece by him who charged this piece (Because Euripides shrunk not to teach,
If gods be strong and wicked, man, though
weak,
May prove their match by willing to be good)
With infames the Scythian's whip to be good — "Such outrage done the public — Phaidra named!
Such purpose to corrupt ingenuous youth,
Such insult cast on female character!" —
Why, when I saw that bestiality
So beyond all brute-beast imagining,
That when, to point the moral at the close,
Poor Salabascho, just to show how fair
Was "Reconciliation," stripped her charms,
That exhibition simply bade us breathe,
Seemed something healthy and commendable
After obscenity grotesqued so much
It slunk away revolted at itself.
Henceforth I had my answer when our sage
Pattern-proposing seniors pleaded grave,
"You fail to fathom here the deep design!
All 's acted in the interest of truth,
Religion, and those manners old and dear
Which made our city great when citizens
Like Aristide of and like Miltiades
Wore each a golden tettix in his hair."
What do they wear now under — Kiosphon?

Well, for such reasons, — I am out of breath,
But loathsome ness we needs must hurry past,
— I did not go to see, nor then nor now.
The "Themorrhiazousâi." But, since make Choose to brave first, blame afterward, or brand
Without fair taste of what they stigmatize,
Euthukles had not missed the first display,
Original portrait of Euripides
By "Virtue laughingly reviving Vice :"
"Virtue," — the author, Aristophanes,
Who mixed an image out of his own depths,
Ticketed as I tell you. Oh, this time
No more pretension to reconcile worth!
No joke in aid of Peace, no demagogue
Pun-palleted from Pyx, no border-clanks
Overt helped covertly the Ancient Faith!
All now was muck, home-produce, honestes
The author's soul secreted to a play
Which gained the prize that day we heard the death.

I thought "How thoroughly death alters things!
Where is the wrong now, done our dead and
great?
How natural seems grandeur in relief,
Cliff-base with frothy spires against its calm"!

Euthukles interposed — he read my thought—

"O'er them, too, in a moment came the charge.
The crowd's enthusiastic, to a man
Since, rack as such may please the ordure-heap
Because of certain sparkles presumed ore,
At first flash of true lightning overhead,
They look up, nor resume their search too soon.
The insect-scattering sign is evident,
And nowhere winks a firefly rival now.
Nor hurries any beetle of the brood
With trundled dung-ball meant to mance heaven.
Contrariwise, the cry is 'Honor him!'
A statue in the theatre! ' wants one
Another ' Bring the poet's body back,
Bury him in Peiraisos: o'er his tomb
Let Alkamenes carve the music-witch,
The songstress-siren, mood of melody:
' Thonkudos invent his epitaph!'
To-night the whole town pays its tribute then."

Our tribute should not be the same, my friend!
Statue? Within our heart he stood, he standst
As for the vest outgrown now by the form,
Low flesh that clothed high soul, — a vestite's
fate —
THE LAST ADVENTURE OF BAlAUSTION

Why, let it fade, mix with the elements
There, where it, falling, freed Euripides!
But for the soul that 's tutelary now
Till time end, 'er the world to teach and bless —
How better hail its freedom than by first Singing, we two, its own song back again,
Up to that face from which flowed beauty — face
Now able to see triumph and take love
Than when it glorified Athenaal once?

The sweet and strange Alkestis, which saved
me,
Secured me — you, ends nowise, to my mind,
In pardon of Admetos. Hearts are fain
To follow cheerful weary Herakles
Striding away from the huge gratitude,
Clubshoulder'd, lion-fleece round loin and flank,
Bound on the next new labor "height o'er height
Ever surmounting, — destiny's decree!"
Thither He helps us: that's the story's end;
He smiling said so, when I told him mine
My great adventure, how Alkestis helped.
Afterward, when the time for parting fell,
He gave me, with two other precious gifts,
This third and best, consummating the grace,
"Herakles,"' writ by his own hand, each line.

"If it have worth, reward is still to seek.
Somebody, I forget who, gained the prize
And proved arch-poet: time must show!" he smiled:
"Take this, and, when the noise tires out, judge
me —
Some day, not slow to dawn, when somebody —
Who? I forget — proves nobody at all!"

Is not that day come? What if you and I
Re-sing the song, inaugurate the fame?
We have not waited to acquaint ourselves
With song and subject; we can prologize
How, at Eurnstheus' bidding, — hate strained hard, —
Herakles had departed, one time more,
On his last labor, worst of all the twelve;
Descended into Hades, thence to drag
The triple-headed hound, which sun should see Spite of the god whose darkness whelped the Down went the hero, "back — how should he come?"

So laughed King Lukos, an old enemy,
Who judged that absence testified defeat
Of the land's loved one, — since he saved the land;
And for that service wedded Megara
Daughter of Thebai, realm her child should rule.
Ambition, greed and malice seized their prey,
The Heraklean House, defenceless left,
Father and wife and child, to trample out
Trace of its earth-fire: since extreme old age
Wakes pity, woman's wrong wins championship,
And child may grow up man and take revenge.
Hence see we that, from out their palace-home
Hunted, for last resource they cluster now
Coshed over the cold ground, hopeless suppliants
About their court-yard altar, — Household Zeus
It is, the Three in funeral garb beseech,
Delaying death so, till deliverance come —

When did it ever? — from the deep and dark.
And thus breaks silence old Amphitrion's
voice.

Say I not true thus far, my Euthukles?

Suddenly, torch-light! knocking at the door,
Loud, quick, "Admittance for the revels' lord!"
Some unintelligible Komoos-cry —
Raw-flesh red, no cap upon his head,
Dionysos, Bacchos, Phales, Iacchos,
In let him red with the kid-skin at his heel,
Where it buries in the spread of the bushy myrtle-bed!

(Our Rhodian Jackdaw-song was sense to that!) Then laughter, outbursts ruder and more rude, Through which, with silver point, a flitting pierced,
And ever "Open, open, Bacchos bids!"

But at last — one authoritative word,
One name of an immense significance:
For Euthukles rise up, throw wide the door.

There trooped the Choros of the Comedy
Crowned and triumphant; first, those flushed Fifteen,
Men that wore women's garb, grotesque disguise,
Then marched the Three, — who played Mnesilochos,
Who, Toxotes, and who, robed right, masked rare,
Monkeyed our Great and Dead to heart's content
That morning in Athenaal. Masks were down
And robes doffed now; the sole disguise was drink.

Mixing with these — I know not what gay crowd,
Girldancers, flute-boys, and pre-eminent
Among them, — doubtless draped with such reserve
As stopped fear of the fifty-draconia fine
(Beside one's name on public fig-tree nailed)
Which women pay who in the streets walk
bare, —
Behold Elaphion of the Pernic dance!
Who lately had frisked fawn-foot, and the rest,
— All for the Patriot Cause, the Antiqua Faith,
The Conservation of True Poesy
Could I but penetrate the deep design!
Elaphion, more Peiraicous–known as "Phapa."
Tripped at the head of the whole banquet-band
Who came in front now, as the first fell back;
And foremost — the authoritative voice, the revels-leader, he who gained the prize,
And got the glory of the Archen's feast —
There stood in person Aristophanes.

And no ignoble presence! On the bulge
Of the clear baldness, — all his head one brow,— True, the veins swelled, blue network, and there surged
A red from cheek to temple, — then retired
As if the dark-leaved chaplet damped a flame,—
Was never nursed by temperance or health.
But huge the eyeballs rolled back native fire,
Imperiously triumphant: nostrils wide
Waited their incense; while the pursed mouth's pout
Aggressive, while the beak supreme above,
While the head, face, nay, pillar'd throat thrown back,
Beard whitening under like a vinous foam,
These made a glory, of such insolence —
I thought, — such domineering deity
Hephaistos might have carved to cut the brine
For his gay brother's prow, imurne that path
Which, purpling, recognized the conqueror.
Impudent and majestic: drunk, perhaps,
But that 's religion; sense too plainly smuffed:
Still, sensuality was grown a rite.

What I had disbelieved most proved most true.
There was a mind here, mind a-wantoning
At ease of undisputed mastery
Over the body's brood, those appetites.
Oh, but he grasped them grandly, as the god
His either struggling handful, — hurtless snakes
Held deep down, strained hard off from side and side.
Mastery his, theirs simply servitude,
So well could firm fist help intrepid eye.
Fawning and fulous, had they licked and hissed?
At most a twist of one muscle, order reigned.
They had been wresting much familiar now
About him on his entry; but a squeeze
Choked down the pests to please: their lord stood free.

Forward he stepped: I rose and fronted him.

"Hail, house, the friendly to Euripides !" (So he began) "Hail, each inhabitant!
You, lady? What, the Rhodian? Form and face,
Victory's self appearing to receive
The poet? Right they named you... some rich name,
Vowel-buds thorned about with consonants,
Fragrant, felicitous, rose-glow enriched
By the lute's urgent: some diminished end
In trio, Kallistion? delicatelier still,
Kubelen or Melition, — or, suppose
(Less vulgar love than bee or violet)
Phibalion, for the mouth split red-fir-wise,
Korakindion for the coal-black hair,
Nettarion, Phasion for the darlingness?
But no, it was some fruit-flower, Rhodion...
ha,
We near the balsam-bloom — Balaustion !
Thanks,
Rhodes! Folk have called me Rhodian, do you know?
Not fools so far! Because, if Helios wived,
As Findoras sings somewhere prettily,
Here blooms his offspring, earth-flesh with sun
fire,
Rhodes' blood and Helios' gold. My phorminx, boy!
Why does the boy hang back and balk an ode Tiptoe at spread of wing? But like enough,
Sunshine frays torchlight. Witness whom you scarce,
Superb Balaustion! Look outside the house!

Pho, you have quenched my Komos by firstrown.
Struck dead all joyance: not a fluting puff
From idle cheekband! Ah, my Choros too?
You've eaten euckoo-apple? Dumb, ye dogs?
So much good Thasian wasted on your throats
And out of them not one Threttaneio?
Neblaretat! Because this earth-and-sun
Product looks wormwood and all bitter herbs! Well, do I blench, though me she hates the most Of mortals? By the cabbage, off they alink!
You, too, my Chrusomelolothion-Phapa,
Girl-goldling-beetle-beauty? You, abaehed,
Who late, supremely unashamed,
Propred up my play at that important point
When Artemisia tricks the Toxotes?
Ha, ha, — thank Hermes for the lucky throw,—
We came last comedy of the whole seven,
So went all fresh to judgment well-disposed
For who should fatly feast them, eye and ear,
We two between us! What, you fail your friend?
Away then, free me of your cowardice!
Go, get you the goat's breakfast! Fare afiel,
Ye circumcised of Egypt, pigs to sow!
Back to the Priest's or forward to the cows,
So you but rid me of such company!
Once left alone, I can protect myself
From statuemque Balaustion podestalled
On much disapprobation and mistake!
She dares not beat the sacred brow, besides!
Baecheek equipment, ivy safeguards well
As Phoibos' bay.

"They take me at my word!
One comfort is, I shall not want them long.
The Archon's cry creeks, creaks, 'Curtail exmonic."
The war wants money, year the twenty-sixth!
Cut down our Choros number, clip costume,
Save birds' wings, beetles' armor, spend the cash
In three-crest skull-caps, three days' salt-fabalien.
Three-banked-ships for these sham-ambassadors,
And what not: any cost but Comedy's!" "No Choros — soon will follow; what care I? Archinos and Arurhichio, scrape your flirt,
Flay your dead dog, and curry favor so:
Choros in rags, with loss of leather next,
We lose the boys' vote, lose the song and dance,
Lose my Elaphion! Still, the actor stays.
Save but my acting, and the baldhead bard
Kudadhanias and Pandionid,
Son of Philippos, Aristophanes
Surmounts his rivals now as heretofore,
Though stinted to mere sober prose verse —
'Manners and men,' so squeamish gets the world!
No more 'Step forward, strip for anapests!' No calling naughty people by their names,
No tickling audience into gratitude
With chickpease, barleygroat and nuts and plums,
No setting Salabaccho"...
"True, lady, I am tolerably drunk:
The praise of inspiration! Others, —
Phrynichus, Chorilus! — had Aischylus
So foiled you at the goat-song? Drink 's a god.
How else did that old dozing driveller
Kratinos fume me, match my masterpiece
The 'Clouds'? I swallowed cloud-distilment
—dew
Undimmed by any grape-blush, knit my brow
And gnawed my style and laughed my learned-est;
While he worked at his 'Willow-wicker-flask,' Swigging at that same flask by which he swore,
Till, sing and empty, sing and fill again,
Somehow result was — what it should not be
Next time, I promised him and kept my word!
Hence, brimful now of Thesian ... I'll be bound Mendian, merely: triumph-night, you know,
The High Priest entertains the conqueror,
And, since war worsens all things, stingily
The rascal starves whom he is bound to stuff,
Choros and actors and their lord and king
The supper, still he needs must spread —
And this time all was conscientious fare:
He knew his man, his match, his master —
Amdns, spared neither fish, flesh, fowl nor wine:
So merrily increased, I promise you,
Till — something happened."

Here he strangely paused,

"After that. — Well, it either was the cup
To the Good Genius, our concluding pledge,
That wrought me mischief, decently unmixed, —
Or, what if, when that happened, need arose
Of new libation? Did you only know
What happened! Little wonder I am drunk."

Euthules, o'er the boat-side, quick, what change,
Watch, in the water! But a second since,
It laughed a ripply spread of sun and sea,
Ray traced with wave, to never disunite,
Now, sudden all the surface, hard and black,
Lies a quenched light, dead motion: What the cause?

Look up and lo, the menace of a cloud
Has solemnized the sparkling, spoil the sport! —
Just so, some overshadow, some new care
Stopped all the mirth and mocking on his face
And left there only such a dark surmise
— No wonder if the revel disappeared,
So did his face shed silence every side!
I recognized a new man fronting me.

"So!" he smiled, piercing to my thought at once,
"You see myself? Balaustion's fixed regard
Can strip the proper Aristophanes
Of what our sophists, in their jargon, style
His accidents? My soul sped forth but now

To meet your hostile survey, — soul unseen,
Yet veritably cinct for soul-defence
With satyr sportive quipes, cranks, boss and spike,
Just as my visible body paced the street,
Environed by a boon companionship
Your apparition also puts to flight.
Well, what care I, if, unaccounted twice,
I fronts my foe — no comicality
Bound soul, and body-guile, leaves each wretch
Thank your eyes' searching, undisguised I stand:
The merest female child may question me.
Spare not, speak bold, Balaustion!"

I did speak:

"Bold speech be — welcome to this honored hearth.
Good Genius! Glory of the poet, glow
O' the humorist who castigates his kind,
Snare summer-lightening lambency which plays
On stag-born tree, mishapen Craig sakaw,
Then vanishes with unvindictive smile
After a moment's laying black earth bare.
Splendor of wit that springs a thunderball
Natter — to burn and purify the world,
True aim, fair purpose: just wit justly strikes
Injustice, — right, as rightly quells the wrong,
Finds out in knaves', fools', cowards' armory
The tricky tinselled place fire flashes through
No damage else, sagacious of true ore;
Wit, learned in the jailral, leaves each wretch
O'er lyric scroll or tragic bariton...
Though alien gands be sinned, — undescrate,
The genuine solace of the sacred brow.

And, how pulses flame a patriot-star
Steadfast athwart our country's night of things,
To beacon, would she trust no meteor-blaze,
Athenai from the rock she steers for straight!
O light, light, light, I hail light everywhere,
No matter for the murk that was, — perchance,
That will be, — certes, never should have been Such orb's associate!

"Aristophanes!
'The merest female child may question you?'
Once, in my Rhodes, a portent of the wave
Appalled our coast: for many a darkened day
Intolerable mystery and fear.
Who snatched a furtive glance through crannied peak,
Could but report of snake-scale, lizard-limb,
— So swam what, making whirlpools as it went,
Maddened the brine with wrath or monstrous sport.

'Tis Tophon, loose, unmanacled from mount,'
Declared the priests, 'no way appeasable
Unless perchance by virgin-sacrifice!'
Thus grew the terror and o'erhung the doom —
Until one eve a certain female-child
Strayed in safe ignorance to seacoast edge,
And there sat down and sang to please herself.
When all at once, large-looming from his wave,
Out leaned, ohn hand-propped, pensive on the ledge,
A sea-worn face, sad as mortality,
Divine with yearning after fellowship.
He rose but breast-high. So much god she saw;
So much she sees now, and does reverence!"

Ah, but there followed tail-splash, frisk of fin!
Let cloud pass, the seas' ready laugh outbreaks.
No very godlike trace retained the mouth
Which mocked with —

"So, He taught you tragedy!
I always asked 'Why may not women act?'
Nay, wear the comic visor just as well;
Or, better, quite cast off the face-disguise
And voice-distortion, simply look and speak,
Real women playing women as men — men!
I shall not wonder if things come to that,
Some day when I am distant far enough,
Do you conceive the quite new Comedy
When laws allow? laws only let girls dance,
Pipe, poon, oare,—above all, Elaphron,
Provided they keep decent — that is, dumb.
Ay, and, conceiving, I would execute,
Had I but two lives: one were overworked!
How penetrate encrusted prejudice,
Fierce ignorance three generations thick
Since first Somarian crossed our boundary?
He battered with a big Megaron stone;
Chromides felled oak and rough-hewed thence
This club I wield now, having spent my life
In planing knobs and sticking studs to shine;
Somebody else must try more polished steel!"

Emboldened by the sober mood's return,
"Meanwhile," said I, "since planed and studded club
Once more has pushed competitors to dust,
And post proves triumphant with that play
Enthuses found last year unfortunate —
 Does triumph spring from smoothness still more smoothed,
Fresh studs sown thick and threefold? In plain words,
Have you exchanged brute-blows, — which teach the brute
Man may surpass him in brutality, —
For human fighting, or true god-like force Which breathes persuasion nor needs fight at
all?
Have you essayed attacking ignorance,
Convicting folly, by their opposites,
Knowledge and wisdom? not by yours for ours,
Fresh ignorance and folly, new for old,
Greater for less, your crime for our mistake!
If so success at last have crowned desert,
Bringing surprise (dashed haply by concern
At your discovery such wild waste of strength — And what strength! — went so long to keep in vogue
Such warfare — and what warfare! — shamed
so fast,
So soon made obsolete, as fell their foe
By the first arrow native to the orb,
First onslaught worthy Aristophanes) —
Was this conviction's entry that strange
'Something that happened' to confound your feast?"

"Ah, did he witness then my play that failed,
First 'Thermoporialiausa!'? Well and good!
But did he also see — your Enthusles —
My 'Grasshoppers,' which followed and failed
too?
Three months since, at the 'Little-in-the-Fields'?

"To say that he did see that First — should
He never cared to see its following!"

"There happens to be reason why I wrote
First play and second also. Ask the camei!
I warrant you receive, ere talk be done,
Fit answer, authorizing either act.
But here's the point: as Enthusles made we,
Never again to taste my quality,
So I was minded next experiment
Should tickle palate — yes, of Enthusles!
Not by such utter change, such absolute
A topsy-turvy of stage-habitude
As you and he want, — Comedy built fresh,
By novel brick and mortar, base to roof, —
No, for I stand too near and look too close!
Pleasure and pastime yours, spectators brave,
Should you turn art's fixed fabric upside down!
Little you guess how such tough work tests
soul!
Not overtasks, though: give fit strength his
play,
And strength's a demiourgoi! Art renewed!
Ay, in some close where strength shoots at
first
The friendly faces, sympathetic cheer:
'More of the old provision, none supplies
So bounteously as thon, — our love, our pride,
Our author of the many a perfect piece!
Stick to that standard, change were des
dence!'
Next, the unfriendly: 'This time, strain will tire,
He's fresh, Amsipsa thy antagonist!'

— Or better, in some Salaminian cave
Where sky and sea and solitude make earth
And man and noise one insignificance, Let strength propose itself, — behind the
world, —
Solo prize worth winning, work that satisfies
Strength it has dared and done strength's star
most!
After which, — clap-to closet and quit cave, —
Strength may conclude in Archelaco's court,
And yet esteem the silken company
So much sky-scud, sea-froth, earth-thistlebow.
For aught their praise or blame should joy or grieve,
Strength amid crowds as late in solitude
May lead the still life, ply the wordless task:
Then only, when seems need to move or speak.
Moving — for due respect, when statements pass (Strength, in the closet, watched how spears spin!)
Speaking — when fashion shows intelligence.
(Strength, in the cave, oft whistled to the gulp!)
In short, has learnt first, practised afterwards!
Despise the world and reverence yourself, —
Why, you may unmake things and remake
things,
And throw behind you, uncoenormed enough,
What 's made or marred: ' you teach men, are not taught! '
So marches off the stage Euripides!

"No such thin fare feeds flesh and blood like mine,
No such faint flame of fancy sates my soul,
No such seclusion, closet, cave or court,
Suita either: give me Iostophanes
Worth many a happy what course way she will —
O happy-maker, when her cries increase
About the favorites! ' Aristophanes!
More grait to mill, here 's Kleophon to grind!
He 's for refining peace, though Sparte code
Even Dakealia! Here 's Kleomnoes
Declaring — though he throw away his shield,
He 'll thresh you till you lay your lyre aside
Creates bids mind where you walk of nights —
He wants your cloak as you his endgailing.
Here 's, firstly, Telephus fat with fish,
The formalizer-spendthrift-dramatist!
So, bustle! Pounce on opportunity!
Let fun a-screaming in Parabasis,
Find food for folk agape at either end,
Mad for amusement! Times grow better
And should they worsen, why, who laughs, forgives.
In no case, venture boy-experiments!
Old wine 's the wine: new poetry drinks raw:
Two plays a season is your pledge, besides;
So, go on ' 'Wasps' again, grown hornets now!'"

Then he changed.

"Do you so detect in me —
Brow-bald, ohn-bearded, me, curved cheek, carped lip,
Or where soul sits and reigns in either eye —
What suits the — stigma, I say, — style say you,
Of ' Wine-less poet ' I! Bravest of buffoons,
Less blint than Telamon, less obscene
Than Murti, Hermippus: quite a match
In elegance for Eupolis himself,
Yet pungent as Kratinoes at his best?
Graced with traditional immunity
Ever since, much about my grand sire's time,
Some funny village-man in Megara,
Lout-lord and clown-king, used a privilege,
As due religious drinking-bouts came round,
To daub his phis, — no, that was afterward, —
He merely mounted cart with mates of choice
And traversed country, taking house by house,
At night, — because of danger in the frast, —
Then hollaed 'Skin-fint starves his laborers!
Cleach-flint stows figs away, cheats government!'
Such an one likes to kiss his neighbor's wife,
And beat his own; while such another . . .

Bosh!"

Soon came the broad day, circumstantial tale,
Dancing and verse, and there's our Comedy,
There's Mullas, there's Eutetes, there's the stock
I shall be proud to draft my powers upon!
Protected? Punished quite as certainly
When Archons pleased to lay down each his law,—
Your Mornehiades-Surakosius sort,—
Each season, ' No more naming citizens,
Only abuse the vice, the vicious spare!
Observe, henceforth no Aropeagites
Demean his rank by writing Comedy! '
(They one and all could write the ' Clouds ' of course.)
' Needs must we nick expenditure, allow
Comedy half a chorus, supper — none,
Times being hard, while applicants increase
For, what costs cash, the Tragic Trilogy,
Lofty Tragedians! How they lounge aloof
Each with his Triad, three plays to my one,
Not counting the contemptuous fourth, the frank Concession to mere mortal levity,
Satyric pitance tossed our beggar-world!
Your proud Euripides from first to last Dole out some five such, never disdain us
more!
And these — what curds and whey for marrowy wine!
That same Alkeites you so rave about
Passed master with him for a Satyr-play,
The prig! — why tripe time with toys and skits
When he could stuff four rhapsodes sausage-wise
With sophistry, with bookish odds and ends,
Sokrates, meteors, moonshine, 'Life's not Life, '
'The tongue, swore, but unsown the mind remains,'
And fifty such concoctions, crabtree-fruit
Dugested while, head low and heels in heaven,
He lay, let Comics laugh — for privilege!
Looked puzzled on, or pitilying off,
But never dreamed of paying gibe by jeer,
Buffet by blow: plenty of proverb-pokes
At vice and folly, wicked kings, mad mobs!
No sign of wincing at my Comic lash,
No protest against infamous abuse,
Malignant censure, — naught to prove I scoured
With tougher thong than leek-and-onion-plant!
If ever he glanced gloom, aggrieved at all,
The aggrevor must be — Aischulos perhaps:
Or Sophokles he'd take exception to,
— Do you detect in me — in me, I ask,
The man like to accept this measurement
Of faculty, contentedly sit classed
More Comic Poet — since I wrote 'The Birds ?'"

I thought there might lurk truth in jest's disguise.

"Thanks! " he resumed, so quick to construe smile
I answered — in my mind — these gapers thus:
Since old wine's ripe and new verse raw, you judge —
What if I vary vintage-mode and mix
Blossom with must, give nosegay to the brew,
Fining, refining, gently, surely, till
The educated taste turns unsaware
Only abuse the vice to draught divine?
Then answered — with my lips: More 'Wasps' you want?
Come next year and I give you 'Grasshoppers'! And 'Grasshoppers' I gave them, — last month's play. They formed the Chorus, Alkibiades, No longer Thriphaeus but Trilophos, (Whom I called Darling-of-the-Summertime, Born to be nothing else but beautiful And brave, to eat, drink, love his life away) Persuades the Tetix (our Autochthon-brood, That she the daw and sing on olive-branch Above the ant-and-emmet populace) To summon all who meadow, hill and dale Inhabit — bee, wasp, woodlouse, dragonfly — To band themselves against red nippur-noose Stag-beetle, huge Taqgetan (you guess — Sparté) Athenai needs must battle with, Because her sons are grown effeminates To that degree — so moribifies their flesh The poison-drama of Euripides, Morals and music — there's no antidote Occurs save warfare which inspires blood, And brings us back perchance the blessed time When (Chorus takes up tale) our commonalty Firm in primeval virtue, antique faith, Ere earwigs-sophist plagued or pismire-sage, Cockered no noddle up with A, b, g, Bawdy-singing, loggan-singing, and the moon, But just employed their brains on 'Rappopat, Row, boys, munch barley-bread, and take your ease — Mindful, however, of the tier beneath! 'Ah, golden epoch! while the nobler sort (Some must study, no contesting that!) Wore so long curls but used to crop their hair, Gathered the tunic well about the ham, Remembering 't was soft sand they used for seat At school-time, while — mark this — the lesson long, No learner ever dared to cross his legs! Then, if you bade him take the myrtle-bough And sing for supper — 't was some grave romanse How from of Mitulun, wondrous wine, Jumped into bradage, by mortals quickest called, And there, anticipating Oidipous, Scratched out his eyes and scratched them in again. None of your Phaidras, Augés, Kanakés, To musing music, turn, trill, tweedle-trash, Whence comes that Marathon is obsolete! Next, my Antistrophé was — praise of Peace: Ah, could our people know what Peace implies! Home to the farm and furrow! Grub one's vine, Romp with one's Thratta, pretty serving-girl, When wife's busy bathing! Eat and drink, And drink and eat, what else is good in life? Slice hare, toss pancake, gayly gurgle down The Thasian grape in celebration due Of Bacchos! Welcome, dear domestic rite, When wife and sons and daughters, Thratta too, Pour pea-soup as we chant delectably In Bacchos reels, his tunic at his heels! Enough, you comprehend, — I do at least! Then, — be but patient — the Parabasis! Pray! For in that I also pushed reform. None of the self-laundation, vulgar brag, Vainglorious rivals cultivate so much! No! If some merest word in Art's defence Justice demanded of me, — never fear! Claim was preferred, but dignifiedly. A cricket asked a locust (winged, you know) What he had seen most rare in foreign parts? 'I have flown far,' chirped he, 'North, East, South, West, And made a heard of poet a fig If matched with Bald-head here, Aigina's boast, Who in this play bids rivalry despair Past, present, and to come, so marvellous His Tragic, Comic, Lyric excellence! Whereof the fit reward were (not to speak Of dinner every day at public cost I' the Fratanaeion) supper with yourselves My Public, best dish offered bravest hard! No more! no sort of sin against good taste! Then, satire, — Oh, a plain necessity! But I won't tell you: for — could I dispense With one more gird at old Aphilodes? How scorpion-like he feeds on human flesh — Ever finds out some novel infamy Unutterable, inconceivable, Which our great need, we, was to describe Minutely, each tail-twist at ink-shod time . . . Now, what 's your gesture caused by? What you loathe, Don't I loathe doubly, else why take such pain To tell it you? But keep your prejudices! My audience justified you! Housebreakers! This pattern-purity was played and failed Last Rural Dionysia — failed! for why? Ameipias followed with the genuine stuff. He had been mindful to engage the Four — Karkinos and his dwarf-earl-family — Father and sons, they whirled like spinning tops, Chorus gigantically poked his fun, The boys' frank laugh relaxed the senior's brow, The skin — re-schooled victory's acclamation, Ameipias gained his due, I got my dose Of wisdom for the future. Purity? No more of that next month, Athenai mine! Contrive new cut of robe who will, — I patch The old exomes, add no purple sleeve! The Thermophorionzerei, smartened up With certain plaits, shall please, I promise you: "Yes, I took up the play that failed last year, And re-arranged things; threw adroitly in — No Parschoregema — men to match My women there already; and when these (I had a hit at Aristolos here, His plan how womankind should rule the roost) Drove men to plough — 'A-field, ye cribbed of cape! Men shored themselves exempt from servage straight Stupendously, till all the boys cried 'Brave!' Then for the elders, I betought me too, Improved upon Mneslochos' release From the old bowman, board and binding-strap: I made him son-in-law Euripides Engage to put both shrewish wives away —

'Gravity,' one, the other 'Sophist-lore'—
And mate with the Bald Bard's hetaira's train.
'Goodhumor' and 'Indulgence:' on they tripped,
Murriné, Akalanthis, — 'beautiful
Their whole belongings' — crowd joined chorus there!
And while the Toxotes wound up his part
By shower of nuts and sweetmeats on the mob,
The woman-chorus celebrated New Kalligenia, the frank last-day rite.
Brief, I was châréd and caressed and crowned
And the whole theatre broke out a-roar,
Echoed my admonition — choros-cap —
Rivals of mine, your hands to your faces!
Summon no more the Muses, the Graces,
Since here by my side they have chosen their places!

And so we all flocked merrily to feast, —
I, my choruses, choros, actors, mates
And flutes aforesaid, friends in crowd, no fear,
At the Priest's supper; and hilarity
Grew none the less that, early in the piece,
Ran a report, from row to row close-packed,
Of messenger's arrival at the Fort
With weighty tidings, 'Of Lusandros' flight,'
Opined one; 'That Eubola penitent
Sends the Confederation fifty ships,'
Preferred another; while 'The Great King's Eye
Has brought a present for Elaphion here,
That rarest peacock Kompolakuthes!'
Such was the supposition of a third.
'No matter what the news,' friend Strattis laughed,
'It won't be worse for waiting: while each
Of the klepsandra sets a shaking grave
Reirement in our shark's-head, boiled and spoiled
By this time: dish'd in Sphettian vinegar,
Sphion and honey, served with o'ocks'brain—
So, swift to supper, Poet! No mistake,
This play; nor, like the unflavored "Grass-hoppers," Salt without thyme! Right merrily we supped,
Till — something happened.

"Out it shall, at last!

"Mirth draw to ending, for the cup was crowned
To the Triumphant! 'Kleosclapper erst,
Now, Plieer of a scourge Euripides
Fairly turns tail from, flying Attiké
For Makedonia's rocks and frosts and bears,
Where, furry grown, he grows to match the squeak
Of girl-voiced, crocus-vested Agathon!
Ha ha, he he!" When suddenly a knock —
Solitary, cold, authoritative.

"Balaias! Sokrates a-passing by,
A-peeking in, for Aristillus' sake,
To put a question touching Comic Law?

"No! Enters an old pale-swathed majesty,
Makes slow mute passage through two ranks as mute, (Strattis stood up with all the rest, the sneak!
Gray brow still bent on ground, upraised at length
When, our Priest reached, full front the vision paused.

"'Priest!' — the deep tone succeeded the fixed gaze
'Thou carest that thy god have spectacle
Doeent and seemly; wherefore, I announce
That, since Euripides is dead to-day,
My Choros, at the Greater Feast, next month,
Shall, clothed in black, appear ungarlanded!'

"Then the gray brow sank low, and Sophokles
Re-swathed him, sweeping doorway: mutely
Passed 'Twixt rows as mute, to mingle possibly
With certain gods who convoy age to port;
And night resumed him.

"When our stupor broke,
Chirpings took courage, and grew audible.

"'Dead — so one speaks now of Euripides!'
"Ungarlanded dance Choros, did he say?
I guess the reason: in extreme old age
No doubt such have the gods for visitants.
Why did he dedicate to Herakles
An altar else, but that the god, turned Judge,
Told him in dream who took the crown of gold?
He who restored Akropolis the theft,
Himself may feel perhaps a timely twinge
At thought of certain other crowns he filched
From — who now visits Herakles the Judge.
Instance "Medea!" that play yielded palm
To Sophokles; and he again — to whom?
Euphorion! Why? Ask Herakles the Judge!
"Ungarlanded, just means — economy!
Suppress robes, chaplets, everything suppress Except the poet's present! An old tale
Put capitally by Tragaios — eh?
News from the world of transformation strange!
How Sophokles is grown Simonides,
And — aged, rotten — all the same, for greed
Would venture on a hurdle out to sea!
So jokes Philomedes. Kallistratos
Retros, Mistake! Instead of stinginess
The fact is, in extreme decrepitude,
He has discarded poet and turned priest,
Priest of Half-Hero Alkon: visited
In his own house too by Asklepious' self,
So he aver. Meanwhile, his own estate
Lies fallow; Iophon's the manager,—
Nay, touches up a play, brings out the same,
Asserts true sonship. See to what you sink
After your dozen-dozen prodigies!
Looking so old — Euripides seems young,
Born ten years later.'

"Just his tricky style!
Since, stealing first away, he wins first word

'Since, stealing first away, he wins first word.
Out of good-natured rival Sophokles, Procures himself no bad panegyric. Had fate willed otherwise, himself were taxed To pay survivor's-tribute, — harder squeezed From anybody beaten first to last, Than one who, steadily a conqueror, Finds that his magnanimity is taxed To merely make pretense and — beat itself!'

"So chirped the feasters though suppressedly.

"But I — what else do you suppose? — had pierced Quite through friends' outside-straining, foes' mock-praise, And reached conviction hearted under all. Death's rapid line had closed a life's account, And cut off, left unalterably clear The summed-up value of Europides.

"Well, it might be the Thasian! Certainly There sang suggestive music in my ears; And, through — what sophists style — the wall of sense My eyes were closed: death seemed life and life seemed death, Envisaged that way, now, which I, before, Conceived was just a moon-struck mood. Quite plain There re-insisted, — ay, each prim stiff phrase Of each old play, my still-new laughing-stock, Had meaning, well worth poet's pains to state, Should life prove half true life's term, — death, the rest. As for the other question, late so large, Now all at once so little, — he or I, — Which thought be better comprehended — playwright craft, — There, too, old admonition took fresh point. As clear recurred our last word-interchange Two years since, when I tried with 'Ploutos,' Make a Vain!"

Saluted me the cold grave-bearded bard — 'Vain, this late trial, Aristophanes! None balks the genius with impunity! You know what kind 'a the nobler, what makes grave Or what makes grin: there's yet a nobler still, Possibly, — what makes wise, not grave, — and glad, Not grinning: whereby laughter joins with tears.

Tragic and Comic Poet prove one power, And Aristophanes becomes our Fourth — Nay, greatest! Never needs the Art stand still, But those Art leans on lag, and none like you, Her strongest of supports, whose step aside Undoes the march: defection checks advance Too late adventured! See the 'Ploutos' there! This step decides your foot from old to new — Proves you relinquish song and dance and jest, Discard the beast, and, rising from all-fours, Pain would paint, manlike, actual human life, Make veritable men think, say and do. Here 's the conception: which to execute, Where's force? Spent! Ere the race began, was breath

O' the runner squandered on each friendly foot. Wit-fireworks fizzed off while day creaved a flame: How should the night receive her due of fire Flared out in Wasps and Horses, Clouds and Birds, Prodigious — crackle? Rest content! The new adventure for the novel man Born to that next success myself foresee In right of where I reach before I rest. At end of a long course, straight all the way, Well may there tremble somewhat into kea The unord path, clouds veiled from earlier gaze! None may live two lives: I have lived miss through, Die where I first stand still. You retrograde. I leave my life's work. I compete with you, My last with your last, my "Aniope" — "Phoinissai!" — with this "Ploutos"? No! I think! Ever shall great and awful Victory Accompany my life — in Maketis If not Athenai. Take my farewell, friend! Friend, — for from no consummate excellence Like yours, whatever fault may countervail, Do I profess estrangement: mourn the marth, Yet where a solitary marble block Blanches the gloom, there let the eagle perch! You show — what splinters of Pentelikes, Islanded by what ordure! Eagles fly, Rest on the right place, thence depart as free; But 'ware man's footstep, would it traverse mine Untainted! Mire is safe for worms that crawl.

"Balaustion! Here are very many words. All to portray one moment's rush of thought; — And much they do it! Still, you understand. The Archon, the Feast-master, read their sum And a substance, judged the banquet-glow ex- tinct. So rose, discreetly if abruptly, crowned The parting cup, — 'To the Good Genius, then!'

"Up starts young Strattis for a final flash: 'Ay, the Good Genius! To the Comic Muse, She who evolves superiority, Triumph and joy from sorrow, unsuccess And all that's incomplete in human life; Who proves such actual failure transient wrong Since out of body uncouth, halt and maimed — Since out of soul grotesque, corrupt or blank — Fancy, uplifted by the Muse, can fit To soul and body, reinstate them Man: Beside which perfect man, how clear we see Divergence from type was earth's effect! Escaping whence by laughter, — Fancy's feat, — We right man's wrong, establish true for false, Above unshapen body, uncouth soul, Reach the fine form, the clear intelligence — Above unseemliness, reach decent law, — By laughter: attestation of the Muse.
THE LAST ADVENTURE OF BALAUSTH

That low-and-uglysea is not signed and sealed
Incontrovertibly man's portion here,
Or, if here — why, still high-and-fair exists
In that otheral realm where laughs our soul.
Lift by the Muse. Hail thou minerant!
Hail who accepted no deformity
In man as normal and remediless,
But rather pushed it to such gross extreme.
That outraged, we protest by eye's soul.
The opposite proves somewhere rule and law.
Hail who implied, by limning Lamachos,
Plenty and pastime wait on peace, not war.
Philokleon — better bear a wrong than plead.
Play the litigious fool to stuff the mouth
Of diest with the due three-ool fee!
The Paphlagonian — stick to the old sly.
Of few and wise, not rabble-government!
Tragaks, Pisthetakos, Strigakos, —
Why multiply examples? Hail, in fine,
The hero of each painted monster and so
Suggesting the unpicturated past shows!
Four out! A laugh to Aristophanes!

"Stay, my fine Stratias" — and I stopped applause —
"To the God of Genius — but the Tragic Muse!
She who extracts her poet, bids man's soul
Pla youth's part merely nor attempt the gods'
Ill-gueas of! Task humanity to height,
Put passion to prime urge, urge will, unashamed.
Where will's last effort breaks in impotence?
No power forego, elude: no weakness, oil.
That cowardice shall shirk contending, cant,
Pretension, shrivel at truth's first approach!
Four to the Tragic Muse's minerant.
Who, as he pictured pure Hippolitos,
Abolished our earth's blotted Arisphrades;
Who, as he drew Ballerophon the bold,
Proclaimed Klesonumos incredible.
Who, as his Thesus towered up man once more,
Made Alkibiades shrink boy again!
A tear — no woman's tribute, weak exchange.
For action, water spent and heart's-blood saved —
No man's regret for greatness gone, ungraced.
Perchance by even that poor meed, man's praise —
But some god's superabundance of desire,
Yearning of will to escape necessity, —
Love's overbearing for self-sacrdice,
Whence good might be, which never else may be,
By power displayed, forbidden this strain.
Sphere, —
Effort expressible one only way —
Such tear from me fail to Euripides!"

"Whereupon outburst the whole company Into applause and — laughter, would you think?"
"'The unrivalled one! How, never at a loss,
He turns the Tragic on its Comic side
Else imperceptible! Here's death itself —
Death of a rival, of an enemy, —
Scarce seen as Comic till the master-touch
Made it acknowledge Aristophanes!
Lo, that Euripidean lanbal-tree
Struck to the heart by lightning! Sokrates
Would question us, with buzz of "how" and "why,"
Wherefore the berry's virtue, the blook's vice,
Till we all wished him quiet with his friend;
Agathon would compose an elegy,
Lyric bewailment fit to move a stone.
And, stones responsive, we might winos, 'tis like;
Nay, with most cause of all to weep the least,
Sophokles ordains mourning for his sake.
While we confess to a remorseful twinge:
Suddenly, who but Aristophanes,
Prompt to the rescue, puts forth solemn hand,
Singles us out the tragic tree's best branch,
Persuades it gow inward and, at tip, append,
For votive-visor, Faun's goat-grimning face!
Back it flies, evermore with jest a-top,
And we recover the true mood, and laugh!"

"I felt as when some Nikias, — ninny-like
Troubled by sunเคs-portent, moon-eclipse,
At fault a little, sees no choice but sound
Retreat from foe man; and his troops mistake
The signal, and hail onest in the blast,
And at their joyous answer, ala'd,
Back the old courage brings the scattered wits;
He wonders what his doubt meant, quick conirms
The happy error, blows the charge amin.
So I repaired things."

"'Tis both praised," thanked I.
'You who have laughed with Aristophanes,
You who wept rather with the Lord of Tears!
Priest, do thou, president alike o'er each,
Tragic and Comic function of the god,
Help with libation to the blended twin!
Either of which who serving, only serves —
Proclaims himself disqualified to pour
To that Good Genius — complex Poetry,
Uniting each god-grace, including both:
Which, operant for body as for soul,
Masters alike the laughter and the tears,
Supreme in lowlest earth, sublimest sky.
Who dares disjoin these, — whether he ignores
Body or soul, whichever half destroys, —
Maims the else perfect manhood, perpetrates
Again the inexpressible crime we curse —
Hacks at the Hermal, halves each guardian shape.
Combining, nowise vainly, prominence
Of august head and enthroned intellect,
With homelier symbol of asserted sense —
Nature's prime impulse, earthly appetite.
For, when our folly ventures on the freak,
Would fair abolish joy and fruitfulness.
Mutilate nature — what avails the Head
Left solitarily predominant,— Unbodied soul,—not Hermes, both in one?
I, no more than our City, acquiesce
In such a desecration, but defend Man's double nature—a, y, wert thou its foe!
Could I once more, thou cold Euripides,
Encounter thee, in naught would I shate
My warfare, nor subdue my worst attack
On thee whose life-work 'proached "Raise soul, sink sense!"
Evirate Hermes!"—would avenge the god,
And justify myself. Once face to face,
Thou, the argute and tricky, shouldst not wrap,
As thine old fashion was, in silent scorn
The breast that quickened at the sting of truth,
Nor turn from me, as, if the tale be true,
From Laia when she met thee in thy walks,
And questioned why she had no rights as thou.
Not so shouldst thou betake thee, be assured,
To book and pencil, deign me no reply!
I would extract an answer from those lips
So closed and cold, were mine the garden-chance!
Gone from the world! Does none remain to take Thy part and ply me with thy sophist-skill?
No sun makes proof of his whole potency
For gold and purple in that orb we view:
The apparent orb does little but leave blind
The audacious, and confound the worshipping;
But, close on orb's departure, must succeed
The serviceable cloud,—must intervene,
Induce expenditure of rose and blue,
Reveal what lay in him was lost to us.
So, friends, what hinders, as we homeward go,
If, privileged by triumph to-day,
We clasp that cloud our sun left saturate,
The Rhodian rosy with Euripides?
Not of my audience on my triumph-day,
She nor her husband! After the night’s news
Neither will sleep but watch; I know the mood.
Accompany! my crown declares my right!

"And here you stand with those warm golden eyes!"

"In honest language, I am scarce too sure
Whether I really felt, indeed expressed
Then, in that presence, things I now repeat:
Nor half, nor any one word,—will that do?
Maybe, such eyes must strike conviction, turn
One's nature bottom upwards, show the base—
The live rock latent under wave and foam:
Superimpose these! Yet solid stuff
Will ever and anon, obeying star,
(And what star reaches rock-nerve like an eye?)
Swim up to surface, spout or mud or flame,
And find no more to do than sink as fast.

"Anyhow, I have followed happily
The impulse, pledged my Genius with effect,
Since, come to see you, I am shown—myself!"

I answered:

"One of us declared for both
'The glory of Aristophanes.'
The other adds: and,—if that glory last,
Nor marah-born vapor creep to veil the same,—

Once entered, share in our solemnity!
Commemorate, as we, Euripides!"

"What?" he looked round, "I darken the bright house?
Profane the temple of your deity?
That's true! Else wherefore does he stand portrayed?
What Rhodian paint and pencil saved so much Beard, freakled face, brow—all but breath!—
hope!
Come, let's be unfair: myself am somebody,
Yet my pictorial fame 's just potter's work.—
I merely figure on men's drinking-mugs!
I and the Flat-nose, Sophroniakos' son,
Oft make a pair. But what 's this lies below?
His table-book and graver, playwright's tool!
And lo, the sweet psalterion, string and scroll,
Whereon he tried those let-tett-tes
And kee-tett-tes and turns and trills,
Lovely lark's tirra-lirra, lad's delight!
Aeschulos' bronze-throat eagle-hark at blood
Has somehow spoiled my taste for twitters!—
With ... what, and did he leave you 'bre
skles'?"

The 'Frenzied Hero,' one unfractured sheet.
No pine-wood tablets smeared with treacle
Papercraft so pure as ever tempted pen!
This sacred twist of bay-leaves dead and dry
Must be that crown the fine work faileth to catch,

"No wonder! This might crown 'Antiope.'
Hera's triumph? In your heart perhaps?
But elsewhere? Come now, I'll explain the case,
Show you the main mistake. Give me the sheet!"

I interrupted:

"Aristophanes!
The stranger-woman snee in her abode—
'Be honored as our guest!' But, call it a shame.
Then 'No dishonor to the Daimon!' bids
The priestess 'or expect dishonor's due!'
You enter fresh from your worst infamy,
Last instance of long outrage; yet I pause,
Withhold the word a-tremble on my lip,
Incline me, rather, yearn to reverence,—
So you but suffer that I see the blaze
And not the bolt,—the splendid fancy-flag.
Not the cold iron malice, the launched lie
Wheno Heaven's fire has withered; impotent.
Yet execrable, leave it 'neath the look
Of you impulsive presence! What he scored,
His life long, need I touch, offend my foot.
To prove that malice missed its mark, that it
Cumbers the ground, returns to whence it came?
I marvel, I deplore,—the rest be mute!
But, throw off hate's celestially—
Show me, apart from song-flash and wit-flame.
A mere man's hand ignobly clenched against
You supreme calmness,—and I interpose.
Such as you see me! Silk breaks lightning's blow!"
He seemed to scarce so much as notice me,
Aught I had spoken, save the final phrase;
Arrested there.

"Euripides grown calm!
Calmness supreme means death and therefore safe,"
He muttered; then more audibly began—

"Dead! Such must die! Could people comprehend!
There's the unfairness of it! So obtuse Are all: from Solon downward with his saw, 'Let none revile the dead,—no, though the son, Nay, far descendant, should revile thyself!'—
To him who made Elektra, in the act
Of wreaking vengeance on her worst of foes, Scruple to blame, since speech that blameth results Too much the very villain life-released.
Now, I say, only after death, begins
That formidable claim,—immunity
Of faultlessness from fault's due punishment!
The living, who defame me,—why, they live: Fools,—I best prove them foolish by their life, Will they but work on, lay their work by mine, And wait a little, one Olympiad, say!
Then, where's the vital force, mine froze beside?
The sturdy fibre, shamed my brittle stuff?
The school-correctness, sure of wise award
When my vagaries cease to tickle taste?
Where's censure that must sink me, judgment big Awaiting just the word postterity
Pants to pronounce? Time's wave breaks, buries—tehom.
Fools, when myself confronts you four years hence?
But die, ere next Lenaia,—safely so
You 'scape me, sink with all your ignorance,
Simplicity and malice, to that hole
'Or which survivors croak 'Respect the dead!'
Ay, for I needs must! But allow me clutch
Only a carrion-handful, lend it sense,
(Mine, not its own, or could it answer me?)
And question. 'You, I pluck from hiding-place,
Whose cant was, certain years ago, my 'Clouds''
Might last until the swallows came with Spring—
Whose chatter, Birds are unintelligible,
Mere psychologic puzzling: poetry?
List, the true lay to rock a cradle with!
0 man of Minilant, wondrous wise!'—
—Would not I rub each face in its own filth
To tune of 'Now that years have come and gone,
How does the fact stand? What's demonstrable
By time, that tries things?—your own test, not mine
Who think men are, were, ever will be fools,
Though somehow fools confute fools,—as these, you
Don'tumble to the sheepish twos and threes
You cornered and called "audience!" face this me

Who know, and can, and—helped by fifty years—
Do pulverize you pygmies, then as now!'

"Ay, now as then, I pulverize the brood.
Balaustion! Mindful, from the first, where foe
Would hide head safe when hand had flung its stone,
I did not turn cheek and take pleasantry,
But flogged while skin could purple and flesh start,
To teach fools whom they tried conclusions with.
First face a-splatter at me got such splotch
Of prompt slab mad as, filling mouth to maw,
Made its concern thenceforward not so much
To criticise me as go cleanse itself.
The only drawback to which huge delight,—
(He saw it, how he saw it, that calm cold Sagacity you call Euripides)
—Why, it's that, make a muckheap of a man,
There, pillared by your prowess, he remains,
Immortally immered. Not so he!
Men pelted him but got no pellet back.
He reasoned, I'll engage,—*Acquaint the world
Certain minutenses butted at my knee?
Dogface Eruxis, the small satirist,—
What better would the manikin desire
Than to strut forth on tiptoe, notable
As who so far up fouled me in the flank?'
So dealt he with the dwarfs: we giants, too,
Why must we emulate their pin-point play?
Render imperishable,—impotence,
For mud throw mountains? Unus, by mud unrushed,— Well, 't was no dwarf he heaved Olimpos at!''
ARISTOPHANES' APOLOGY

Of hopes and fears which root no deeper down
Than where all such mere fungi breed and blow—

Namely, man's misconception of the God: —
I, loving, hating, wishful from my soul
That truth should triumph, falsehood have defeat.
— Why, all my soul's supremacy of power
Did I pour out in volley just on him
Who, his whole life long, championed every cause
I called my heart's cause, loving as I loved,
Hating my hates, spurned falsehood, championed truth—

Championed truth not by flagellating foe
With simple rose and lily, gibe and jeer,
Silk wynn of boon-companion o'er the bowze
Who, while he blames the liquor, smacks the lip,
Blames, doubtless, but leers condonation too—
No, the balled fist broke brow like thunderbolt,
Batte'd till brain flew! Seeing which descent,
None questioned that was first acquaintance
The avenger's with the vice he crushed through bone.
Still, he displeased me; and I turned from foe
To fellow-fighter, flung much stone, more mud—
But missed him, since he lives aloof, I see,'
Pah! stop more shame, deep-cutting glory through,
Nor add, this post, learned, — found no tant
Tell like 'That other post studies books!'
Wise, — cried 'At each attempt to move our hearts,
He uses the mere phrase of daily life!'
Witty, — 'His mother was a herb-woman!'
Veracious, honest, loyal, fair and good,—
'It was Kephisophon who helped him write!'

'Whence, — oh the tragic end of Comedy!—
Balanstion pities Aristophanes,
For, who believed him? Those who laughed so loud?
They heard him call the sun Sicilian cheese!
Had he called true cheese — curt, would muscle move?
What made them laugh but the enormous lie?
Kephisophon wrote "Herakles"? ha, ha,
What can have stirred the wine-dregs, soured the soul,
And set a-lying Aristophanes?
Some accident at which he took offence
The Tragic Master in a moody muse
Passed him unhailing, and it hurts — it hurts!
Beside, there's license for the Wine-lesseong!"

Blood burnt the cheekbone, each black eye flashed fierce.

"But this exceeds our license! Stay awhile —
That's the solution! Both are foreigners,
The fresh-come Rhodian lady, and her spouse
The man of Phokia: newly resident,
Nowise instructed — that explains it all!

No born and bred Athenian but would smile,
Unless brown seemed more fit for ignorance.
These strangers have a privilege L

"You blame"
(Prosently he resumed with milder mien)
"Both theory and practice — Comedy:
Blame her from ait tudes the Tragic friend
Rose to, and upraised friends along with him,
No matter how. Once there, all's cold as fine,
Passionless, rational; our world beneath
Shows (should you condescend to grace so rare)
As glance at poor Athenai grimly grows —
A population which, mere flesh and blood,
Esteems, drinks, and kisses, falls to fasticuffs,
Then huge as hugely: speaks too as it acts
Prodigiously talks nonsense, — townsmen and Must parley in their town's vernacular.
Such work has, of two courses, one to choose:
Unworld itself, — or else go blackening on
To its crow-kindred, leave philosophy.
Her heights serene, fit perch for owls like you.
Now, since the world damnus to either course,
Permit me, — in default of boy or girl,
So they be reared Athenian, good and true—
To praise what you most blame! Hear Art's defense!
I'll prove our institution, Comedy,
Coeval with the birth of freedom, matched
So nice with our Republic, that its growth
Measures each greatness, just as its decline
Would signalize the downfall of the pair.
Our Art began when Bacchos ... ne'er mind!
You and your master don't acknowledge gods:
'They are not, no, they are not!' well, — began
When the rude instinct of our race outspoke.
Found, — on recurrence of festivity
Occasioned by black mother-earth's good will
To children, as they took her vintage-gifts, —
Found — not the least of many benefits —
That wine unlocked the stiffest lip, and loosed
The tongue late dry and reticent of jokes.
Through custom's grip which gladness thrusts so wide.
So, emulating liberalities,
Heaven joined with earth for that god's day at least,
Renewed man's privilege, grown obsolete,
Of telling truth nor dreading punishment.
Whereon the joyous band disguised their forms
With skins, beast-fashion, daubed each pith
With dregs,
Then hollaid 'Neighbor, you are fool, yea—
Knave,
You — hard to serve, you — stingy to reward!'
The guileless crowd, the guilty sink their crest,
And good folk gained thereby, 't was evident.
Whence, by degrees, a birth of happier thought.
The notion came — not simply this to say,
But this to do — prove, put in evidence.
And act the fool, the knave, the harsh, the hunks,
Who did prate, cheat, shake fist, draw pure-string tight,
As crowd might see, which only heard before
On sun and moon, and worship Whirligig.
Oh, your tragedian, with the lofty grace,
Aims at no other and affects as much?
Candidly: what's a polished period worth,
Filed curt sententiousness of loaded line,
When he who deals out doctrine, primly steps
From just that selfsame moon he maulseners of,
And, blood-thimned Lai his paunt: "Such a play-
Proposes to rich earth-blood — purity?
In me, 't was equal-balanced flesh rebuked
Excess alike in stuff-guts Glaukotes
Or starveling Chairephon; I challenged both, —
Strong understander of our common life,
I urged sustainer of humanity,
Whereas when your tragedian cries up Peace
He's silent as to cheese-cakes Peace may chew;
Seeing through rabble-rule, he shuts his eye
To what were better done than crowing
Peace —
That's a dance 'Threttanelo, the Kuklopes drunk'!

"My power has hardly need to vaunt itself!
Opposers peep and mutter, or speak plain:
'No naming names in Comedy!' Nature says one,
'Nor vilifying live folk!' legislates
Another, 'urge amendment on the dead'!
'Don't throw away hard cash,' supplies a third,
But erib from actor's dresses, chores-treats!
Then Kleon did his best to bully me:
Called me before the Law he said: "Such a play
Satirized citizens with strangers there,
Such other,' — why, its fault was in myself!
I was, this time, the stranger, privileged
To set no play at all, — Egyptian, I —
Rhodian or Kameirosian, Aiginites,
Lindian, or any foreigner his liked —
Because I can't write Attic, probably!
Go ask my rivals, — how they roughed my fleece,
And how, shorn pink themselves, the huddled sheep
Shiver at distance from the mapping shears!
Why must they needs provoke me?

"All the same,
No matter for my triumph, I foretell
Subsidence of the day-star: quench his beams?
No Aias e'er was equal to the feat
By throw of shield, tough-hid ten seven times seven,
'Twixt sky and earth! 'tis dullards soft and
sure
Who breathe against his brightest, here a sigh
And there a 'So let be, we pardon you'!
Till the minute mist hangs a block, has tamed
Noonblaze to 'twilight mild and equable,'
Vote the old women spinning out of doors.
Give me the earth-spasm, when the lion ramped
And the bull penned in the brave gold fiare
Oh, you shall have amusement, — better still,
Instruction! no more horse-play, naming names,
Taxing the fancy when plain sense will serve!
Theorion, now, my friend who bakes you bread,
What's worthier limning than his household
life?
His whims and ways, his quarrels with the spouse,
And how the son, instead of learning knea’d
Kilikian leaves, brings heartbreak on his sire
By buying horseflesh branded Saus, each flank,
From shrewd Menippus who imports the ware:
While pretty daughter Kasphe too much haunts
The shop of Sporgileos the barber! brave!
Out with Theorion’s meal-tub-politics
In lieu of Pisistratios, Strepsiades!

That’s your exchange? O Muse of Magara!
Advise the fools: Feed baebe on weasel-lap!
For mild-boar’s marrow, Theorion’s hero-pup.
And rear, for man—Arýphrades, mayhap!—
Yes, my Balaustion, yes, my Euthukles,
That’s your exchange, — who, foreigners in fact
And fancy, would impose your squeamishness
On sturdy health, and substitute such brat
For the right offshoot of us Rocky Ones,
Because babe kicks the cradle, — crows, not mewls!

“Which brings me to the prime fault, poison-speak:
Whence all the plague springs — that first feud of all
’Twixt me and you and your Euripides.
Unworld the world,” frowns he, my opposite.
I cry, ’Life! ’ ‘Death,’ he groans, ’our better Life!’—
Despire what is — the good and graspable,
Prefer the out of sight and in at mind.
To village-joy, the well-side violet-patch,
The jolly club-feast when our field is in soak,
Roast thrushes, hare-soup, pea-soup, deep washed down
With Peparthenion: the prompt paying off
That black-eyed brown-skinned country-flavored wench.
We caught among our brushwood foraging:
On these look fine juice, curdle up life’s cream,
And fall to magnifying misery!
Or, if you condescend to happiness,
Why, talk, talk, talk about the empty name
While thing’s self lies neglected ‘neath your nose!
I need particular discourtesy
And private insult from Euripides.
To render contest with him credible?
Say, all of me is outraged! one stretched sense,
I represent: the whole Republic: — gods,
Heroes, priests, legislators, poets, — prone,
And pummelled into insignificance.
If will in him were matched with power of stroke,
For see what he has changed or hoped to change!

How few years since, when he began the fight,
Did there beat life indeed Athenian through!
Plenty and peace, then! Hellas thundersmote
The Persian. He himself had birth, you say,
That morn salvation broke at Salamis,
And heroes still walked earth. Themistocles —
Surely his mien back-stretch of hand could still Find, not so lost in dark, Odusseus? — he Holding as surely on to Herakles, —
Who touched Zeus, link by link, the unruptured chain?
Were poets absent? Aischylus might hail —
With Pindaros, Theognis, — whom for sire?

Homeros’ self, departed yesterday!
While Hellas, saved and sung to, then as thus,

Ah, people, — ah, lost antique liberty!
We lived, ourselves, undoubted lords of earth;
Wherever olives flourish, corn yields crop
To constitute our title — ours such land!
Onto of oil and breadstuff, — barbarism!
What need of conquest? Let barbarism stand!
Devote our whole strength to our sole defense.
Content with peerless native products, home,
Beauty profuse in earth’s mere sights as sounds,
Such men, such women, and such gods that guard!
The gods? he worshipped best who feasted them most,
And left their nature uninquired into,
— Nature? their very names! pay reverence.
Do sacrifice for our part, theirs would be
To prove beneficest of all playfellows.
With kindly humanism they countenanced
Our emulsion of divine escapes
Through sense and soul: soul, sense are made to use;
Use each, acknowledging its god the while!
Crush grape, dance, drink, indulge, for Bebo’s sake!
’Tis Aphrodite’s feast-day — friek and fling,
Provided we observe our oaths, and house
Duly the stranger: Zeus takes unbragine else!
Ah, the great time — had I been there to taste!
Perikles, right Olympian — occupied
As yet with getting an Olimpos reared
Marble and gold above Akropolis,— Wisey so spends what thirsty fools amassed
For cut-throat projects. Who carves Promachos?
Who writes the Oresteia?

“Ah, the time!”
For, all at once, a cloud has blanched the blue.
A cold wind creeps through the close vineyard-

The olive-leaves curl, violet crisp and close.
Like a nymph’s wrinkling at the bath’s first splash
On breast. (Your pardon!) There’s a restless change.
Deterioration. Larks and nightingales
Are silenced, here and there a gos-crow grim
Flaps past, as scenting opportunity.
Where Kimon passaged to the Boule once,
A starving crew, unkempt, unshorn, un

Occupying altar-base and temple-step,
Are minded to indoctrinate our youth!
How call these carrion kill-joys that intrude?
‘Wise men,’ their nomenclature! Prodikes —
Who scorns could, unsausset, pick his steps
From way Thessis to the Tripods’ way,—
This empty noddle compriseth the sun,—
How he’s Aigna’s bigness, wheels no whirn
His way from east to west, nor wants a steed;
And here’s Protagoras set wrongheads right,
Explains what virtue, vice, truth, falsehood

Makes all we seemed to know prove ignorance
THE LAST ADVENTURE OF BALAUSTON

Denies the plainest rules of life, long since
Proved sound; sets all authority aside,
Must simply recommence things, learn ere act,
And think out thoroughly how youth should pass —
Just as if youth stops passing, all the same!

"One last resource is left us — poetry!
Vindicate nature, prove Ptaelian help,
Turn out, a thousand strong, all right and tight,
To save Sense, poet! Bang the sophist-brood
Would cheat man out of wholesome sustenance
By swearing wine is water, honey — gall,
Saperdon — the Empousa! Panio-emit,
Our juveniles abstain from Sense and starve:
Be yours to disenchant them! Change things back!
Or better, strain a point the other way
And handsomely exaggerate wronged truth!
Lend wine a glory never gained from grape,
Help honey with a snatch of him we style
The Muses’ Bee, hay-bloom-fed Sophokles,
And give Saperdon a Kimberie robe!

"I, his successor," gruff the answer grunts,
"Incline to positize philosophy,
Extend it rather than restrain; as thus —
Are heroes men? No more, and scarce as much.
Shall mine be represented. Are men poor?
Behold them ragged, sick, lame, halt and blind!
Do they use speech? Ay, street-terms, market-phrase!
Having thus drawn sky earthwards, what comes next
But dare the opposite, lift earth to sky?
Mere puppets once, I now make woman-kind,
For thinking, saying, doing, match the male.
Lift earth? I drop to, daily with, earth's dung!
— Recognize in the very slave — man's mate,
Declare him brave and honest, kind and true,
And reasonable as his lord, in brief.
I paint men as they are — so runs my boast —
Not as they should be: paint — what's part of man,
— Women and slaves, — not as, to please your pride.
They should be, but your equals, as they are.
Oh, and the Gods! Instead of abject men,
Submitive whisper, while my Choros chants,
"Zeus,— with thy cubit's length of attributes,—
May I, the ephemeral, ne'er scrutinize
Who made the heaven and earth and all things there!"
Myself shall say . . . Ay, 'Herakles' may help!
Give me, — I want the very words, — attend!

He read. Then — "Murder's out, — 'There are no Gods,'"
Man has no master, owns, by consequence,
No right, no wrong, except to please or plague!
His nature: what man likes be man's sole law
Still, since he likes Saperdon, honey, figs,
Man may reach freedom by your roundabout!

et knowledge also, since, on either side
any question, something is to say, othing to 'stabish, all things to disturb!
nd shall youth go and play at kottabos,
saving unsettled whether moon-spots breed?
'dare keep Choes ere the problem 's solved —
' should I like my wife who dislikes me?
Sure the gods permit this, censure that?
'tell them! Straight the answer 's in your teeth:
You relegate these points, then, to the gods?
hat and where are they? ' What my sire supposed,
and where you cloud conceals them! 'Till they 'scape,
nd scramble down to Leda, as a swan,
copa, as a bull! why not as — ass somebody? Your sire was Zeus perhaps!
ther — away with such ineptitude!
, wasting energy to break your bonds,
k to the good old stories, think the rain
— Zeus distilling pickle through a sieve!
ink thunder 's thrown to break 'Theoros' head breaking oaths first! Meanwhile let ourselves struct your progeny you prize like fools
father Zeus, who's but the atmosphere,
ther Poseidon, otherwise called — sea,
ndson Haphaistos — fire and nothing else!
ver which things there 's a something still,
Necessity,' that rules the universe and care as much about your Choes-feast formed or intermitted, as you care /ether grains sound their trump from head or tail!

'Ten, stupeled at such philosophy,
't cry, 'Arrest the madmen, governor!
end hemlock and pour bull's-blood, Perikles!'
ould you believe? The Olympian bends his brow, øre passes from his building! 'Say they thus?
em, they say wisely. Anaxagoras, not known how simple proves eclipse fore thy teaching! Go, fools, learn like me!'

Well, Zeus nods: man must reconcile himself,
let the Charon's-company harangue,
and Anaxagoras be — as we wish!
comfort is in nature: while grass grows and water runs, and sesame piqsks tongue, and honey from Brilseian hollow melts mouth, and Bacchi' flavorful lip beats
both,
ou will not be untaught life's use, young man?
ko! My young man just proves that paniered ass aid to have borne Youth strapped on his stout
back,
ith a serpent bargained, bade him swap
the priceless boon for — water to quench thirst!
That's youth to my young man? In love
age,
Spartanizes, argues, fasts and frowns,
Never believe yourselves the freer thence!
There are no gods, but there's "Necessity," —
Duty enjoined you, fact in figure's place,
Throned on no mountain, native to the mind!
Therefore deny yourselves Saperion, sigs
And honey, for the sake of — what I dream,
A-sitting with my legs up! — "Infamy!

The poet casts his lot with these Assailants of Apollo! Sworn to serve
Each Graeco, the Furies call him minister —
He, who was born for just that rosesate world
Renowned so madly, where what's false is fact,
Where he makes beauty out of ugliness,
Where he lives, life itself disguised for him
As immortality — so works the spell,
The enthusiastic mood which marks a man
Muse-mad, dream-drenched, wrap around by prose,
Encircled with poetic atmosphere,
As lark embalmed by its own crystal song,
Or rose enmisted by that scent it makes!
No, this were unreality! the real
He wants, not falsehood, — truth alone he Truth, for all beauty! Beauty, in all truth —
That's certain somehow! Must the eagle lilt
Lark-like, needs fire-tree blossom rose-like?
No!
Strength and utility charm more than grace,
And what's most ugly proves most beautiful.
So much assistance from Euripides!

"Whereupon I betake me, since needs must,
To a concluding — 'Go and feed the crows!
Do! Spoil your art as you renounce your life,
Poetize your so precious system, do,
Degrade the hero, nullify the god,
Exhibit women, slaves and men as peers,—
Your castigation follows prompt enough!
When all's concocted upstairs, heels o'erhead,
Your must submissive drop the masterpiece
For public praise or blame: so, praise away,
Friend Sokrates, wife's friend Kephisophon!
Boast innovations, cram phrase, uncouth song,
Hard matter and harsh manner, gods, men,
And women jumbled to a laughing-stock
Which Hellas shall hold sides at lest she split!
Hellas, on these, shall have her word to say!

"She has it and she says it — there's the curse! —
She finds he makes the shag-rag hero-race,
The noble slaves, wise women, move as much
Pity and terror as true tragic types:
Applauds inventiveness — the plot so new,
The plot and trick subsidiary so strange!
She relishes that homely phrase of life,
That common talk-tale, more than trumpet-blasts;
Accords him right to chop and change a myth:
What better right had he, who told the tale
In the first instance, to embellish fact?
This last may disembellish yet improve!
Both find a block: this man curves butt bull
What first his predecessor cut to sphinx;
Such writing actual roars nature's brain,
Intelligible to our time, was sure
The old-world artist's purpose, had he weird
To mind; this both means and makes a thing!
If, past dispute, the verse slips oily-bathed
In medley mosaic — say, effeminate —
We also say, like Kutheria's self,
A lulling effluence which ensawathes some
Where hides a nymph, not seen but felt & more;
That's Hellas' verdict! —

"Does Euripides
Even so far absoluted, remain content?
Nowise! His task is to refine, refine,
Divide, distinguish, subtilize away
Whether seemed a solid planting-place
For footfall, — not in that phantasmal sphere
Proper to poet, but on vulgar earth
Where people used to tread with confidence.
There's left no longer one plain positive
Enunciation incontestable
Of what is good, right, decent here on earth
Nobody now can say, 'This plot is mine,
Though but a plethron square, — my duty!' —
'Yours?
Mine, or at least not yours,' snaps somebody!
And, whether the dispute be parent-right
Or noxious service, husband's privilege
Or wife's submission, there's a snarling strain
Smart passage of opposing 'yes' and 'say,'
'Should,' 'should not,' till, how'er the contest end,
Spectators go off sighing: 'Clever thrust!
Why was I so much hurried to pay debt,
Attend my mother, sacrifice an ox,
And set my name down "for a trireme, good!"
Something I might have urged on t'other side!
No doubt, Chrysophanes or Bellerophon
We don't get every day, but true and straightforward
The tailor — are I turn the drachmae o'er
I owe him for a chiton, as he thinks,
I'll pose the blockhead with an argument!'

"So he has triumped, your Euripides!
Oh, I concede, he rarely gained a prize:
That's quite another matter! cause for that!
Still, when 't was got by Ion, Iophon,
Off he would pace confoundedly superb,
Supreme, no smile at movement on his mouth
Till Sokrates winked, whispered: out it helm!
And Aristocles jotted down the jest,
While Iophon or Ion, lay on brow,
Looked queerly, and the foreigners — ey'yon —
Asked o'er the border with a puzzled smile,
— 'And so, you value Ions, Iophons, Emphorions? How about Euripides?'
'(Eh, brave bard's-champion? Does the sage boil?
Keep within bounds a moment, — eye and lip
Shall loose their doom on me, their fiery wands?
What strangers? Archelac heads the El!
He sympathizes, he concerns himself,
He pens epistle, each successess play:
'Athenae sinks offete; there's younger blood
In Makedon. Visit where I rule!
Do honor to me and take gratitude!
Live the guest's life, or work the poet's way,
Which also means the statesman's: he who wrote
"Erechtheus" may seem rawly politic
At home where Kleophon is ripe; but here
My council-board permits him choice of seats.'

"Now, this was operating,—what should prove
A poison-tree, had flowered far on to fruit
For many a year,—when I was moved, first man,
To dare the adventure, down with root and branch.
So, from its sheath I drew my Comic steel,
And dared what I am now to justify.
A serious question first, though!

"Once again!
Do you believe, when I desired in youth,
I made no estimate of power at all,
Nor paused long, nor considered much, what class
Of fighters I might claim to join, beside
That class wherewith I cast in company?
Say, you—profuse of praise no less than blame—
Could not I have competed—franket phrase
 Might truerer correspond to meaning—still,
Competed with your Tragic paragon?
Suppose me minded simply to make verse,
To fabricate, parade resplendent arms,
Flourish and sparkle out a Trilogy,—
Where was the hindrance? But my soul bade

'Fight!
Leave flourishing for mock-foo, pleasure-time;
Prove arms efficient on real heads and hearts!
How? With degeneracy sapping fast
The Marathonian muscle, nerved of old
To maun the Mede, now strung at best to help
—How did I fail?—War and Hubble mash
To mine miemit Fatherland and Brotherhood,
Found in their mortar Uallas, State by State,
That greed might gorge, the while frivolity Rabbed hands and smacked lips o'er the dainty dish!
Authority, experience—pushed aside
By any upstart who pleads throne and press
O' the people 'Thinks, say, do thus!' Wherefore, pray?
' We are the people: who impugns our right
Of choosing Kleon that tans hide so well,
Hyperboles that turns out lampes so trim,
Hemp-seller Enkrateos or Lusikles
Sheep-dealer, Kephalos the potter's son,
Dirithres who weaves the willow-work
To go round bottles, and Naoukides
The meal-man? Such we choose and more,
their mates,
To think and say and do in our behalf!
While sophistry wagged tongue,—emboldened still,
Found matter to propose, contest, defend,
Stablish, turn topetyrtury,—all the same,
No matter what provided the result

Were something new in place of something old,—
Set wagging by pure insolence of soul
Which needs must pry into, have warrant for Each right, each privilege good policy
Protects from curious eye and prating mouth!
Everywhere lust to shape the world anew,
Spurn this Athenae as we find her, build
A new impossible Cloucduckoozbourg
For feather-headed birds, once solid men,
Where rules, discarding jolly habitude,
Nourished on myrtle-berries and stray ants,
King Tereus who, turned Hoopoe Triple-Crest,
Shall terrify and bring the gods to terms!

"Where was I? Oh! Things ailing thus—I ask,
What cure? Cut, thrust, hack, hew at heap-on-heaped Abomination with the exquisite
Palatista-tool of polished Tragedy?
Erechtheus shall harangue Amphiklyron,
And incidentally drop word of weight
On justice, righteousness, so turn aside
The audience from attacking Sicily!—
The more that Choros, after he recounts
How Phrixos rode the ram, the far-famed Fleece,
Shall add—at last fall of grave dancing-foot—
'Aggression never yet was helped by Zeus!'
That helps or hinders Alkibiades?
As well expect, should Phedias carve Zeus' self
And set him up, some half a mile away,
His frown would frighten sparrows from your field!
Eagles may recognize their lord, belike,
But as for vulgar sparrows,—change the god,
And plant some big Priapos with a pole!
I wield the Comic weapon rather—hate!
Hate! honest, earnest, and directest hate—
Warfare wherein I close with enemy,
Call him one name and fifty epithets,
Remind you his great-grandfather sold bran,
Describe the new exomion, sleeveless coat
He knocked me down last night and robbed me of,
Protest he voted for a tax on air!
And all this hate—If I write Comedy—
Finds tolerance, most like—applause, perhaps True veneration; for I praise the god
Present in person of his minister,
And pay— the wilder my extravagance—
The more appropriate worship to the Power
Adulterous, night-roaming, and the rest:
Otherwise,—that originaive force
Of nature, impulse stirring death to life,
Which, underlying law, seems lawlessness,
Yet is the outbreak which, ere order be,
Must thrill creation through, warm stocks and stones,
Phales Isachos.

"Comedy for me!
Why not for you, my Tragic masters? Sneaks
Whose art is mere desertion of a trust!
Such weapons lay to hand, the ready club,
The clay ball, on the ground a stone to snatch,—
Arms fit to bruise the boar’s neck, break the chin.
O’ the wolf,—and you must impiously despise?
No, I’ll say, frantically let fall that trust
Consigned you! ’T was not ’take or leave alone.’
But, ’take and wield, recognize your god
In his prime attributes!’ And though full soon
You sneaked, subseised into poetry,
Nor met your due reward, still,—heroize
And speechify and sing-song and forego
Far as you may your function,—still its pact
Exordium, one piece of early homage still Exacted of you; after your three bouts
At hoity-toity, great men with long words,
And so forth,—at the end, must tuck itself
The genuine sample, the Satyrie Play,
Concession, with its wood-boys’ fun and, freak,
To the true taste of the mere multitude.
Yet, there again! What does your Still-at-itch,
Always-the-innovator? Shrugs and shirks!
Out of his fifty Trilogies, some five
Are somehow suited: Satyres dance and sing,
Try merriment, a grimly prank or two,
Sour joke squeezed through pursed lips and teeth on edge,
Then quick on top of toe to pastoral sport,
Goat-tending and sheep-herding, cheese and cream.
Soft grass and silver rillets, country-fare—
When threats were promised Thasian! Five such feats,— Then frankly off he threw the yoke: next Droll,
Next festiva drama, covenanted fun,
Decent reversion to indecency,
Proved—your ‘Alkistis’! There’s quite fun enough, Herakles drunk! From out fate’s blackening wave
Calamitous, just zigzags some shot star,
Poor promise of faint joy, and turns the laugh
On dupes whose fears and tears were all in waste!

“For which sufficient reasons, in truth’s name,
I closed with whom you count the Measurer
Muse,
Classed me with Comic Poets who should weld
Dark with bright metal, show their blade may keep
Its adamantine birthright though ablaze
With poetry, the gold, and wit, the gem,
And strike mere gold, unstifened out by steel,
Or gem, no iron joints its strength around,
From hand of—posturer, not combatant!

“Such was my purpose; it succeeds, I say!
Have not we beaten Kallikratidas,
Not humbled Spartē? Peace awaits our word,
Spite of Theramenes, and fools his like.
Since my previsions—warranted too well
By the long war now waged and worn to end—
Had spied such heritage of misery.
My after-counsels scarce need fear repulse.
Athenai, taught prosperity has wings,
Cages the glad recapture. Demos, see,
From folly’s premature decrepitude
Boiled young again, emerges from the stew
Of twenty-five years’ trouble, sits and sways.
One brilliance and one balsam,—sways and sits.
Monarch of Hellas! ay, and, sage again,
No longer jeopardizes chieftainship,
No longer loves the brutish demagogue
Appointed by a bestial multitude,
But seeks out sound advisers. Who are they?
Ourselves, of parentage proved wise and good,
To such may hap strains thwarting quality,
(As where shall want its flaw mere human stuff?)
Still, the right grain is proper to right race;
What’s contrary, call curious accident!
Hold by the usual! Orchard-grafted tree,
Not wilding, raccoho-sired, not rouney-bom.
Aristocrat, no sausage-selling mob!
Nay, why not Alkibiades, come back
Filled by the Genius, freed of petulance,
Frailty,—mere youthfulness that’s all at fault,— Advised to Parikles and something more?
—Being at least our duly born and bred.—
Curse on what chauhoneer first gained in ear
And got his . . . well, once true man in right place,
Our commonality soon content themselves
With doing just what they are born to do,
Eat, drink, make merry, mind their own affairs
And leave state-business to the larger brain:
I do not stickle for their punishment;
But certain culprits have a cloak to twitch,
A purse to pay the piper: s h o g , s a y I,
Your fine fantasies, paragons of parts,
Who choose to play the important! For fear
With us, their natural supports, allies,
And, best by brain, help who are best by births To fill every each weak point in the wall
Built broad and wide and deep for permanence
Between what’s high and low, what’s rich and vile,—
They cast their lot pervasively in low
And vile, lay flat the barrier, lift the mob
To dizzy heights where Privilege stood firm.
And then, simplicity become conceit,
Woman, slave, common soldier, artisan,
Crazy with new—found worth, new—fashioned claims,—
These must be taught next how to use their heads
And hands in driving man’s right to mob’s rule!
What fellows thus inflame the multitude?
Your Sokrates, still crying: ‘Understand!’
Your Aristocles,—’Argue!’ Last and vast.
Should, by good fortune, mob still hesitate,
Remember there’s degree in heaven and earth.
Cry: ‘Aischulos enjoined us fear the gods,
And Sophokles advised respect the kings!’
Why, your Euripides informs them—Gods?
They are not Kings? They are, but . . .
do not I,
In ‘Suppliants,’ make my Theoseus,—yea,
no more,—
THE LAST ADVENTURE OF BALASTAUN 651

Fire up at insult of who styles him King?
Play off that Herald, I despise the most,
As patronizing kings' prerogative
Against a Theseus proud to dare no step
I'll be consult the people?

"Such as these—
Ah, you expect I am for straining straight?
Nowise, Balasthun! All my roundabout
Ends at beginning, with my own defence!
I dose each culprit just with—Comedy.
Let each be doctored in exact the mode
Himself prescribes: by words, the word-mon-gar—

My words to his words,—my lies, if you like,
To his lies. Sokrates I nickname thief,
Quad!' necromancer; Aristuleus,—say,
Mal Kirké who bewitches and bewrays
And changes folk to swine; Euripides,—
Well, I acknowledge! Every word is false, Looked close at; but stand distant and stare
through,
All's absolute indubitable truth
Behind lies, truth which only lies declare!
For come, concede me truth's in thing not
word,
Meaning not manner! Love smiles 'rogue'
and 'wretch,'
When 'sweet' and 'dear' seem rapid; Hate adopts
Love's 'sweet' and 'dear', when 'rogue' and
'wretch' fall flat;
Love, Hate—are truths, then, each, in sense
not sound.
Further: if Love, remaining Love, fall back
On 'sweet' and 'dear,'—if Hate, though
Hate the same,
Dropped down to 'rogue' and 'wretch',—each phrase were false.
Good! and now grant I hate no matter whom
With reason: I must therefore fight my foe,
Finish the mischief which made enmity.
How? By employing means to most hurt him
Who much harmed me. What way did he do harm?
Through word or deed? Through word? with word, wage war!
Word with myself directly? As direct
Reply shall follow: word to you, the wise,
Whence indirectly came the harm to me?
What wisdom I can muster waits on such Word to the populace which, misconceived
By ignorance and incapacity,
Ends in no such effect as follows cause
When I, or you the wise, are reasoned with,
So damages what I and you hold dear?
In that event, I ply the populace
With just such word as leaves their whole lump
To the right ferment for my purpose. They Arbitrate properly between us both?
They weigh my answer with his argument,
Match up with quibble, wit with eloquence?
All they attain to understand is—blank!
Two adversaries differ; which is right
And which is wrong, none takes on him to say,
Since both are unintelligible. Pooh!
Swear my foe's mother vended herbs she stole,
They fall a-laughing! Add,—his household drudge
Of all-work justifies that office well,
Kisses the wife, composing him the play,—
They grin at whom they gaped in wonderment,
And go off—'Was he such a sorry scrub?
This other seems to know! we praised too
fast!'
When then, my lies have done the work of
truth,
Since 'scrub,' improper designation, means Exactly what the proper argument—
—Had such been comprehensible—proposed To proper audience—were I grazed with
such—
Would properly result in; so your friend
Gots an impartial verdict on his verse,
'The tongue swears, but the soul remains un-sworn!'

"There, my Balasthun! All is summed and said,
No other cause of quarrel with yourself!
Euripides and Aristophanes
Differ: he needs must round our difference
Into the mob's ear; with the mob I pleased.
You angrily start forward 'This to me?'
No speck of this on you the thrice refined!
Could parley be restricted to us two?
My first of duties were to clear up doubt
As to our true divergence each from each,
Does my opinion so diverge from yours?
Probably less than little—not at all!
To know a matter, for my very self
And intimates—that's one thing: to imply
By 'knowledge'—loosing whatsoever I know
Among the vulgar who, by mere mistake,
May brain themselves and me in consequence,
That's quite another. 'O the daring flight!
This only bard maintains the exalted brow
Nor grovels in the slime nor fears the gods!'
Did I fear—I play superstitious fool,
Who, with the due proviso, introduced,
Active and passive, their whole company
As creatures too absurd for scorn itself?
Zena? I have styled him — 'slave, mere thrashing-block!'
I'll tell you: in my very next of plays,
At Bacchos' feast, in Bacchos' honor, full
In front of Bacchos' representative,
I mean to make main-actor — Bacchos' self!
Forth shall he strut, apparent, first to last,
A blockhead, coward, braggart, liar, thief,
Demonstrated all these by his own mere Xanthias the man-slave: such man shows such
god
Shamed to brute-beastship by comparison!
And when ears have their fill of his abuse,
And eyes are satiated with his pummelling,—
My Choros taking care, by, all the while Singing his glory, that men recognize
A god in the abused and pummelled beast,—
Then, should one ear be stopped of auditor,
Should one spectator shut revolted eye,—
Why, the Priest's self will first raise outraged
voice:
'Back, thou barbarian, thou ineptitude!
Does not most license hallow best our day,
And least decorum prove its strictest rite?
Since Bacchus bids his followers play the fool,
And there’s no fooling like a majesty
Mocked at, — who mocks the god, obeys the
law —
Law which, impute but indiscretion to,
And, ... why, the spirit of Euripides
Is evidently active in the world!
Do I stop here? No! feat of fightier force!
See Hermes! what commotion raging, — refect! —
When imaged god alone got injury
By drunkards’ frolic! How Athisani stared
Aghast, then fall to frenzy, fit on fit. —
Ever the last, the longest! At this hour,
The craze abates a little: so, my Play
Shall have up Hermes: and a Karion, slave,
(Since there’s no getting lower) calls our friend
The profitorable god, we honor so,
Whatever contumely fouls the mouth —
Bids him go earn more honest livelihood
By washing tripe in well-trouch — wash he does,
Duly obedient! Have I dared my best?
Asklepios, answer — deity in vogue,
Who visits Sophokles familiarly,
If you believe the old man, — at his age,
Living is dreaming, and strange guests haunt doors
Of house, belike, peep through and tap at times
When a friend yawns there, waiting to be fetched,—
At any rate, to memorize the fact,
He has spent money, set an altar up
In the god’s tripe, now in Athisani repute.
That temple-service trust me to describe — Cheaters and choused, the god, his brace of girls,
Their snake, and how they manage to snap gifts
‘And democrate the same into a bag,‘
For whimsies done away with in the dark!
As if, a stone’s throw from that theatre
Whereon I thus unmask their dupery,
The thing were not religious and august!

"Of Sophokles himself — nor word nor sign
Beyond a harmless parody or so!
He founds no anti-school, upsets no faith,
Bnt, living, lets live, the good easy soul
Who, — if he saves his cash, unspoiletike, Loves wine and — never mind what other sport,
Boasts for his father just a swordblade-smith,
Proves but queer captain when the people
claim,
For one who conquered with ‘Antigone,‘
The right to undertake a squadron’s charge, —
And needs the son’s help now to finish plays,
Seeing his dotage calls for governance
And Lophon to share his property, —
Why, of all this, reported true, I breathe
Not one word — true or false, I like the man!
Sophokles lives and lets live: long live he!
Otherwise, — sharp the scourge and hard the blow!

"And what’s my teaching but — accept the
old,
 Contest the strange! acknowledge work that’s
done,
 Misdoubt men who have still their work to do.
Religions, laws and customs, poetries,
Are old? So much achieved victorious truth!
Each work was product of a lifetime, wrong:
From each man by an adverse world: for why?
He worked, destroying other older work
Which the world loved and so was lost to man.
Whom the world beat in battle: dust and ash
Who beat the world, left work in evidence.
And when its crown still men live: its
lives,
And fight new fights, and triumph in the turn.
I mean to show you on the stage! you’ll see
My Just Judge only venture to decide Between two suitors, which is god, which is
By thrashing both of them as flesh can bear.
You shall agree, — whichever bellows first.
He’s human: who holds longest out, divine:
That is the only equitable test!
Crucify! Pray, who picked them on to My thing’s award? Must they needs den-note?
Then I — rebel! Their instinct grasps the new?
Mine bids retain the old: a fight must be,
And which is stronger the event will show.
Oh, but the pain! Your proved divinity Still smarts all reddened? And the right served!
Was not some man’s-flesh in him, after all?
Do let us lack no frank acknowledgment
There’s nature common to both gods and men.
All of them — spirit? What so winced in clay!
Away pretence to some exclusive sphere
Cloud-nourishing a sole selected few
Pume-fed with self-superiority!
I stand up for the common one: as clay Existence, — stamp and ramp with heel and hoof
On solid vulgar life, you fools disown!
Make haste from your unreal eminence,
And measure lengths with me upon that ground
Whence this mud-pelted sings and summer
you!
I know the soul, too, how the spark ascends,
And how it drops space and dies away.
I am your poet-peer, man thrice your match!
I too can lead an airy life when dead,
Fly like Kinesias when I’m cloud-ward bound: But here, no death shall mix with life it must!

"So, my old enemy who caused the fight,
Own I have beaten you, Euripides!
Or, — if your advocate would contravene, —
Help him, Balaustion! Use the rosy strength!
I have not done my utmost, — treated you
As I might Aristullos, mint-perfumed, —
Still, let the whole rage burst in brave attack!
Don’t pay the poor ambitious compliment
Of fearing any pearl-white knuckled fist
Will damage this broad buttress of a brow!
Fancy yourself my Aristonummos,

Finally, am I not a foreigner?

No born and bred Athenian,— isled about,

I scarce can drink, like you, at every breath,

Just some particular doctrine which may best

Explain the strange thing I revolt against—

How— by involvement, who may extricate?—

Religion perks up through impity,

Law leers with license, folly wise-like frowns,

The sneeze larks in the admissible.

But opposites,— each neutralizes each

Haply by mixture: what should promise death,

May haply give the good ingredient force,

Disperse in fume the antagonistic ill.

This institution, therefore,— Comedy,—

By origin, a rite; by exercise,

Proved an achievement tasking poet's power

To utmost, eking legislation out

Beyond the legislator's faculty,

Playing the censor where the moralist

Declines his function, far too dignified

For dealing with minute absurdities;

By efficacy,— the virtue's guard, the scourge

Of vice, each folly's fly-flap, arm in aid

Of all that's righteous, customary, sound

And wholesome; sanctioned therefore,— better

say,

Prescribed for fit acceptance of this age

By, not alone the long recorded roll

Of earlier triumphs, but, success to-day—

(The multitude as prompt recipient still

Of good gay teaching from that monitor

They crownd this morning— Aristophanes—

As when Sousarion's car first traversed street)—

This product of Athenai— I dispute,

Impugn? There's just one only circumstance

Explains that! I, poor critic, see, hear, feel;

But eyes, ears, senses prove me— foreigner!

Who shall gain say that the raw new-come guest

Blames oft, too sensitive? On every side

Of—larger than your stage— life's spectacle,

Convention here permits and there forbids

Impulse and action, nor alleges more

Than some mysterious 'So do all, and so

Does no one:' which the hasty stranger blames

Because, who bends the head unquestioning,

Transgresses, turns to wrong what else were right,

By failure of a reference to law
Beyond convention; blames unjustly, too—
As if, through that defect, all gained were lost
And slave-brand set on brow indelibly;—
Blames unobservant or experimentless
That men, like trees, if stout and sound and sane,
Show stem no more affected at the root
By bough’s exceptional submissive dip
Of leaf and bell, light danced at end of spray
To wind’s fluctuation in ways, and sport;—
No more lie prostrate,—than low files of flower
Which, when the blast goes by, unreuffled raise
Each head again o’er ruder meadow-wreck
Of thorn and thistle that refractory
Demured to cower at passing wind’s caprice.
Why shall not guest extend like charity,
Conceive how,—even when astounded most
That natives seem to acquiesce in muck
Changed by prescription, they affirm, to gold,—
Such may still bring to test, still bear away
Safely and surely much of good and true
Though latent ore, themselves unpecked, unspoiled?

Fresh bathed i’ th’ icebrook, any hand may pass
A placid moment through the lamp’s fierce flame:
And who has read your 'Lemnians,' seen 'The Hours,'
Heard 'Female-Playhouse-seat-Preoccupants,'
May feel no worse effect than, once a year,
Those who leave decent vesture, dress in rags
And play the mendicant, conform thereby
To country’s rite, and then—no beggar-taint
Retained, don vesture due next morning-day.
What if I share the stranger’s weakness then?
Well, could I also show his strength, his sense
Untutored, ay! — but then untampered with!

"I fancy, though the world seems old enough,
Though Hellas be the sole unbarrable land,
Years may conduct to such extreme of age,
And outside Hellas so inane may lurk,
That haply,— when and where remain a dream!—
In fresh days when no Hellas fills the world,
In novel lands as strange where, all the same,
Their men and women yet behold, as we,
Blue heaven, black earth, and love, hate, hope
And fear.

Over again, unhelped by Attiké—
Haply some philanthropic god steers bark,
Gift-laden, to the lonely ignorance
Islanded, say, where mist and snow mass hard
'To metal — ay, those Kassiterides!'
Then asks: 'Ye apprehend the human form,
What of this statue, made to Pheidias' mind,
This picture, as it pleased our Zeus' paint?
Ye too feel truth, love beauty: judge of these!'
Such strangers may judge feebly, stranger-like:
'Each hair too indistinct — for, see our own!
Hands, not skin-colored as these hands we have,
And lo, the want of due decorum here!
A citizen, arrayed in civic garb,
Just as he walked your streets apparently,
Yet wears no sword by side, adventures thus,
In these unobservant or experimentless

While here’s his brother-sculptor found at fault
Still more egregiously, who shames the world,
Shows wrestler, wrestling at the public game.
Arousingly exposed from head to foot!
Sure, the Immortal would impart at once
Our slow-stored knowledge, how small truth suppressed
Conduce to the far greater truth’s display,—
Would replace simple by instructed sense.
And teach them how Athena first so tame
The natural fierceness of her progeny
Discarded arms nor feared the beast in man:
Wherefore at games, where earth’s wise guilde,
Proved by responsive culture, claimed the pis
For man’s mind, body, each in excellence,—
When mind had bared itself, came body’s tes,
And only irreligion grudged the gods
One naked glory of their master-work
Where all is glorious rightly understood,—
The human frame; enough that man mistake
Let him not think the gods mistaken too!

"But, peradventure, if the stranger’s eye
Detected... Ah, too high my fancy-flight!
Pheidias, forgive, and Zeusia bear with me—
How on your faultless should I fasten fault
Of my own framing, even? Only say,—
Suppose the impossible were realized,
And some as potent incongruity,
Uanseemliness, — of no more warrant, there
And then, than now and here, whatever the time
And place,— I say, the Immortal,— what on
And doubt?—
Would never shrink, but own, 'The blot cursed
Our artist: thus he shows humanity'!

"May stranger tax one peccant part in thee,
Poet, three-parts divine! May I proceed?

" 'Comedy is prescription and a rite.'
Since when? No growth of the blind antique
time,
'It rose in Attiké with liberty;'
When freedom falls, it too will fall.' Sources all
Your dates, — the Olympian Zeus gave birth to these;
Your Puthian, — these were Phoibos' institution.
Isthmian, Nemean, — Theseus, Herakles
Appointed each, the boys and barbers say!
Earth’s day is growing late: where’s a Comedy?
'Oh, that commenced an age since, — two, let
like,—
In Megara, whence here they brought the thing?
Or I misunderstand, or here’s the fact—
Your grandsire could recall that rustic song
How such-an-one was thief, and miser such,
And how, — immunity from chastisement
Once promised to bold singers of the same
By daylight on the drunkard’s holiday,—
The clever fellow of the joyous troop
Tried acting what before he sang about,
Acted and staid, or hoarded, acting too:
While his companions ranged a-row, closed up
For Choros, — bade the general rabblement
Sit, see, hear, laugh, — not join the dance themselves.

Soon, slow-stored clever fellow found a mate,
And these two did the whole stage-mimicking.
Still closer in approach to Tragedy,—
THE LAST ADVENTURE OF BALAUSTON

So led the way to Aristophanes,
Whose grand sire saw Sosias, and whose sire—
Chionides; yourself wrote 'Banqueters,'
When Aischulos had made 'Prometheus, ' nay,
All of the marvels; Sophokles, — I'll cite,
'Odipous,' — and Euripides — the head—
'Medea' henceforth awed the world!

'Banqueters,' 'Babylonians' — next come you!
Surely the great days that left Hellas free
Happened before such advent of huge help,
Rude vagaries, its divination
Platae, Salamis were fought, I think,
Before new educators stood reprov'd,
Or foreign legates blushed, exosted to!
Where did the helpful vates pretend its rise?
Did it break forth, as gifts divine are wont,
Plainly authentic, incontestably
Adequate to the helpful ordinance?
Founts, dowered with virtue, pull out pure
From sources;
'T is there we taste the god's benign intent,
Not when—fatigued away by journey, foul
With tristroad trampling, — crystal links to slime,
And lymph forgets the first salubraneous.
Sprang Comedy to light thus crystal-pure?
'Nowise'! yourself protest with vehemence;
'Gross, beastial, did the cowards' diversion break;
Every successor peddled in the alms;
Nay, my contemporaries one and all
Gay played the mudlark till I joined their game;
Then was I first to change buffonery
For wit, and stupid flirt for cleanly sense,
Transforming pointless joke to purpose fine,
A20 outrage of, or theme
"Drop knave's tricks, deal more neighbor-like, Ye boors!"
With such new glory of poetic breath
As, lifting application far past use
O' the present, launched it o'er men's lowly reign.
To future time, when high and low alike
Are dead and done with, while my airy power
Flies disengaged, as vapor from what stuff it—say not, dwelt in — filler, dailied with
To forward work, which done, — deliverance brave.
It soars away, and mud subsides to dust.
Say then, myself invented Comedy!

"So months fell many a famed Parabasis!
Agreed! No more, then, of prescriptive use,
Authorization by antiquity,
For what offends our judgment? 'T is your
work,
Performed your way: not work delivered you intact, intact producible in turn.
Everywhere have you authorized aid to new —
Your will, your warrant therefore, work must stand
Or stumble by intrinsic worth. What worth?
A aim and object! Peace you advocate,
And war you would abate from the land:
Support religion, laze irreverence,
Yet laughingly administer rebuke
To superstitious folly, — equal fault!
While innovating rashness, lust of change,
ARISTOPHANES' APOLOGY

You never took the joke for earnest? scarce
Supposed mere figure-head meant entire ship,
And Sokrates — the whole fraternity?'

"This then is Comedy, our sacred song,
Censor of vice, and virtue's guard as sure:
Manners-instructing, morals' stop-stray,
Which, born a twin with public liberty,
Thrives with its welfare, dwindles with its wane!
Liberty? what so exquisitely framed
And fitted to suck dry its life of life
To last faint fibre? — since that life is truth.
You who profess your indignation wheels
At sophistry, when specious words confuse
Deeds right and wrong, distinct before, you say (Though all that 's done is — dare veracity,
Show that the true conception of each deed
Affirmed, in vulgar parlance, 'wrong' or 'right,'
Proves to be neither, as the hasty hold,
But, change your side, shoots light, where dark alone
Was apprehended by the vulgar sense)
— You who put sophistry to shame, and about
'There 's but a single side to man and thing;
A side so much more big than thing or man
Possibly can be, that — believe ' t is true?
Such were too many worlds, simplicity!
— Confess, those sophists whom yourself depict,
(— Abide by your own painting!) what they teach,
They wish at least their pupil to believe,
And, what believe, to practise! Did you wish
Hannel should haste, as taught, with torch in hand,
And fire the horrid Speculation-shop?
Straight the shop's master rose and showed the mob
What was your so monstrous Sokrates;
Himself received amanuense, why not they?
Just as did Kleon first play magistrate
And bid you put your birth in evidence
— Since no unbadged buffoon is licensed here
To shame unall when foreign guests may mock
Then, —birth established, foiling licensed you,—
He, duty done, resumed mere auditor.
Laughed with the loudest at his Lamia-shape,
Kukloboros-roaring, and the camel-rest.
Nay, Aristolochus, — once your volley spent
On the male-Kirké and her swinish crew, —
Platov, — so others call the youth we love, —
Sends your performance to the curious king
— ' Do you desire to know Athenai's knack
At turning seriousness to pleasantry?
Read this! One Aristolochus means myself.
The author is indeed a merry griz!
Nay, it would seem as if yourself were bent
On laying down the law, 'Tell lies I must — Aforeshought and of purpose, no mistake!'
When forth yourself step, tell us from the stage,
— Here you behold the King of Comedy —
Me, who, the first, have purged my every piece
From each and all my predecessors' filth,
Absurd those satyr-adjuncts sewn to bid
The boys laugh, satyrs-jokes whereof not one
Least sample but would make my hair turn gray

Beyond a twelvemonth's ravage! I renounce
Mountebank-claptrap, such as firework-fizz
And torchfire, or else nuts and barleycorns
Scattered among the crowd, to scramble for
And stop their months with; no such stuff shall amuse me!
Who — what's more serious — know both wise to strike
And when to stay my hand; once dead, my foe,
Why, done, my fighting! I attack a corpse!
I spare the corpse-like even! punish sage?
I pity from my soul that and affecte
Toothless old mumble called Kratinos! once
My rival, — now, slack, the dotard s-links
Ragged and hungry to what hole's his home;
Ay, slinks through byways where no passenger Flings him a bone to pick. You formerly Adored the Muse's darling: dotard now,
Why, he may starve! O mob most mutable!
So you harangued in person; while, — to point
Precisely out, these were but lies you launched,— Prompt a play followed primed with satyric frisks.
No spice spared of the stomach-turning stew,
Full-fraught with torch-display, and barley throw,
And Kleon, dead enough, bedaubed afresh;
While dotard Kratinos to holes trudges by,
Wrung dry his wit to the last viscous drops,
Decanted them to 'Bottle,' — beat, —
year,
— 'Bottle' and drags — your best of 'Clouds'
dew!
Where, Comic King, may keenest eye detect
Improvement on your predecessors' work
Except in lying more audaciously?

"Why — genius! That's the grandeur, that
That's your — superlatively true to touch —
Gold, leaf or lump — gold, anyhow the mass
Takes manufacture and proves Pallas' casque
Or, at your choice, simply a cask to keep Corruption from decay. Your rivals' heard
May ooze forth, lacking such preservative:
Yours cannot — gold plays guardian far too well!

Genius, I call you: dross, your rivals share;
Ay, share and share alike, too! says the world.
However you pretend supremacy
In aught beside that gold, your very own.
Satire? ' Kratinos for our satiast!' —
The world cries. Eloquence? 'Who elegant
As Eupolis?' resounds as noisily.
Artistic fancy? Choros-creatures quaint?
Muses invented ' Birds' and ' Frogs' enough,
Archippus panned, Higemon parodied,
To heart's content, before you stepped on stage.
Moral inventive? Eupolis exposed
'That prating beggar, he who stoles the crop.'
Before your ' Clouds' raised grime on Sokrates:
Nay, what best ' Clouds' but ' Konnos,' sneer for mud?
Courage? How long before, well-masked, you poured Abuse on Enkrates and Lysikles,
Did Telekleides and Hermippos peit
THE LAST ADVENTURE OF BALAUSTON

Their Perikles and Kumon? standing forth,
Bareheaded, not safe crouched behind a

Philonides or else Kallistratos,
Put forth, when danger threatened,—mask for

To bear the brunt,—if blame fell, take the blame,—
If praise...why, frank laughed Aristoph-

'They write such rare stuff? No, I promise
you!
Rather, I see all true improvements, made
Or making, go against you—tooth and nail
Contended with; ’tis still Mornchides,
’Tis Euthumenes, Sarakosios, say,
Arpichios and Kinesias,—common sense
And public shame, these only cleanse your sty!
Coerced, prohibited,—you grin and bear,
And, soon as may be, hug to heart again
The banished nastiness too dear to drop!
Erates could teach and practise festive song
Yet seem sourcerous; as gay and good,
Therakrates could follow. Who loosed hold,
Must let fall rose-wreath, stoop to mucT more
Did your particular self advance in anght,
That sad genius—steady slave the while—
To further—say, the patriotic aim?
No, there’s deterioration manifest
Year by year, play by play! survey them all,
From that boy’s triumph when ‘Acharnes’ dawned.
To ‘Thesmophoriazomai,—this man’s shame!
There, truly, patriot zeal so prominent
Allowed friends’ pleas perhaps: the baster stuff
Was but the noble spirit’s vehicle.
Who would imprison, unvolatilize
A violet’s perfume, blends with fatty oils
Expressed too fugitive in flower name;
So, calling unguent—violet, call the play—
Obscenity impregnated with ‘Peace’!
But here’s the boy grown bald, and here’s the
play
With twenty years’ experience: where’s one spice
Of odor in the hogs’-lard? what pretends
To saught except a grease-pot’s quality?
Friend, sophist-hating! know,—worst sophistry
Is when man’s own soul plays its own false, self,
Reason a vice into a virtue, pleads
‘I detail sin to shame its author’—not
‘I shame Aristophanes for sin’s display’!
‘I show Opora to commend Sweet Home’—
Not ‘I show Bacchis for the stripings’ sake!’

"Yet all the same—O genius and O gold—
Had genius ye’er diverted gold from use
Worthy the temple, to do copper’s work
And cost a swine’s trough — which abundantly
Might furnish Phoebos’ tripod, Pallas’ throne! I
Had you, I dream, discarding all the base,
The bottom, spurred lone convention’s watch
And ward against invading decency
Disgraced as license, law in lawlessness,
And so, re-ordinating outworn rule,
Made Comedy and Tragedy combine.
Prove some new both-yet-neither, all one bard,
Euripides with Aristophanes
Co-operant! this, reproducing Now
As that gave Then existence: Life to-day,
This, as that other—Life dead long ago!
The mob decrees such fest no crown, perchance.
But—why call remaining the reward of quest?
Tell him, my other poet,—where thou walk’st
Some rarer world than o’er Ilios washed!

"But dream goes idly in the air. To earth!
Earth’s question just amounts to—which succeeds,
Which fails of two life-long antagonists?
Suppose my charges all mistake! assume
Your end, despite ambiguous means, the best—
The only! you and he, a patriot-pair,
Have striven alike for one result—say, Peace!
You spoke your best straight to the arbiters—
Our people: have you made them end this war
By dint of laughter and abuse and lies
And postures of Opora? Sadly—No!
This war, despite your twenty-five years’ work,
May yet endure until Athenai falls,
And freedom falls with her. So much for you!
Now, the antagonist Euripides—
Has he succeeded better? Who shall say?
He spoke quite o’er the heads of Kloon’s crowd
To a dim future, and if there he fail,
Why, you are fellows in adversity.
But that’s unlike the fate of wise words launched
By music on their voyage. Hail, Depart,
Arrive, Glad Welcome! Not my single wish—
Yours also wafts the white sail on its way,
Your nature too is kingly. All beside
I call pretension,—no true potentate,
Whatever intermediary be crowned,
Zeus or Poseidon, where the vulgar sky
Lacks not Tribales to complete the group.
I recognize—behind such staunch crew—
Necessity, Creation, Poet’s Power,
Else never had I dared approach, appeal
To poesy, power, Aristophanes!
But I trust truth’s inherent kinglyness,
Trust who, by reason of much truth, shall reign
More or less royally—may prayer but push
His sway past limit, purge the false from true!
Nor, even so, had boldness nerved my tongue
But that the other king stands suddenly,
In all the grand investiture of death,
Bowing your knee beside my lowly head—
Equals one moment!

"Now, arise and go!
Both have done homage to Euripides!"
Silence pursued the words: till he broke out—

"Scarce so! This constitutes, I may believe,
Sufficient homage done by who defines
Your poet’s foe, since you account me such;
But homage-proper,—pay it by defence
Of him, direct defence and not oblique,
Not by mere mild admonishment of me!"

"Defence? The best, the only!" I replied.
A story goes—When Sophockles, last year,
Cited before tribunal by his son
(A poet — to complete the parallel),
Was certified unsound of intellect,
And claimed as only fit for tutelage,
Since old and doting and incompetent.
To carry on this world's work — the defence
Consisted just in its reciting (calm
As the verse bore, which sets our heart a-swell
And voice a-heaving too tempestuously)
That chorus-chant 'The station of the steed,
Stranger! thou comest to, — Kolonos white!'
Then he looked round and all revolt was dead.
You know the one adventure of my life —
What made Euripides Balanustion's friend.
When I last saw him, as he bade farewell,
'I sang another "Herkules,"' 'smiled he;
'It gained no prize: your love be prize I gain!
Take it — the tablets also where I traced
The story first with stulos pendent still
Nay, the psalterion may complete the gift,
So, should you croon the ode bewildering Age,
Yourself shall modulate — same notes, same strings —
With the old friend who loved Balanustion once.'
There they lie! When you broke our solitude,
We were about to honor him once more
By reading the consummate Tragedy,
Night is advanced; I have small mind to sleep;
May I go on, and read, — so make defense,
So test true godship? You affirm, not I.
— Beating the god, affords such test: I hold
That when rash hands but touch divinity,
The chains drop off, the prison-walls dispar,
And — fire — he fronts mad Penteus! Dare we try?"

Accordingly I read the perfect piece.

HERAKLES

Amphitryon. Zeus' Conchmate, — who of mortals knows not me,
Argive Amphitryon whom Alkeus sired
Of old, as Perseus him, I — Herakles?
My home, this Thesbai where the earth-born spike
Of Sown — ones burgeoned: Ares saved from these
A handful of their seed that stocks to-day
With children's children Thebes, Kadmos built.
Of these had Kreon birth, Menoikos' child,
King of the country, — Kreon that became
The father of this woman, Megara,
Whom, when time was, Kadmeians one and all
Pealed praise to, marriage-songs with fluted help,
While to my dwelling that grand Herakles Bore her, his bride. But, leaving Thebes — where I
Abode perforce — this Megara and these
Her kinsmen, the desire possessed my son
Rather to dwell in Argos, that walled work,
Kaklopian city, which I fly, myself,
Because I slew Elektrou. Seeking so
To ease away the hardships and once more Inhabit —

Heavy the prize he pays Eurystheus there —
The setting in of light on this choked world:
Either he promised, vanquished by the god
Of Heró, or because fate willed it thus.
The other labors — why, he toiled till
They were done —
But for this last one — down by Tainaraos,
Its mouth, to Haides' realm descended he
To drag into the light the three-shaped hound
Of Hell: whence Herakles returns no more.
Now, there's an old-world tale, Kadmeians have:
How Dirke's husband was a Lukos once,
Holding the seven-towered city here in sway
Before they ruled the land, white — steeds pair.
The twins Amphion, Zethos, born to Zeus.
This Lukos' son, — named like his father too.
No born Kadmeian but Euboea's gift —
Comes and kills Kreon, lords it o'er the land.
Falling upon our town sedition-sick.
To us, akin to Kreon, just that bond
Becomes the worst of evils, seemingly;
For, since my son in the earth's abysses,
This man of valor, Lukos, lord and king,
Seeks now to slay these sons of Herakles,
And slay his wife as well — by murder thus
Thinking to stamp out murder, — slay too me.
(If me 'tis fit you count among men still — Useless old age,) and all for fear lest these,
Grown men one day, exact due punishment
Of bloodshed and their mother's father's fate.
I therefore, since he leaves me in these doses
The children's household guardian, — left, who earth's
Dark dread he underwent, that son of mine, —
I, with their mother, lest his boys should die,
Sit at this altar of the savior Zeus
Whose, glory of triumphant spear, he raised
Conqueror — my nobly-born! — the Minnai.
Here do we guard our station, desistiate
Of all things, drink, food, raiment, on our
ground
Couched side by side: sealed out of house and home
Sit we in a resourcelessness of help.
Our friends — why, some are no true friends I see!
The rest, that are true, want the means to aid:
So operates in man adversity:
Whereof may never anybody — no.
Though half of him should really wish me
well, —
Happen to taste! a friend-test faultless, that!
Megara. Old man, who erst did raze the Tephian town.
Illustrious, the army-leader, thou,
Of speared Kadmeians — how gods play men false!
I, now, missed nowise fortune in my sire,
Who, for his wealth, was boasted mighty once.
Having supreme rule, — for the love of which Leap the long lances forth at favored breasts, —
And having children too: and me he gave
Thy son, his house with that of Herakles
Uniting by the far-famed marriage-bed.
And now these things are dead and flown away
While thou and I await our death, old man,
These Heraclian boys too, whom—my chicks—
I save beneath my wings like brooding bird.
But one or other falls to questioning:
"O mother," cries he, "where in all the world
Is father gone to? What's he doing? when Will he come back?" At fault through tender years,
They seek their sire. For me, I put them off,
Telling them stories; at each creak of doors,
All wonder "Does he come?"—and all a-foot
Make for the fall before the parent knee.
Now then, what hope, what method of escape
Facilitatest thou?—for, thee, old man,
I look to,—since we may not leave by stealth
The limits of the land, and guards, more strong
Than we, are at the outlets: nor in friends
Remain to us the hopes of safety more.
Therefore, whatever thy decision be,
Impart it for the common good of all.
Lost now should prove the proper time to die,
Though, being weak, we spin it out and live.
Amph. Daughter, it scarce is easy, do one's best,
To blurt out counsel, things at such a pass.
Meg. You want some sorrow more, or so love life?
Amph. I both enjoy life, and love hopes beside.
Meg. And I; but hope against hope—no, old man!
Am. In these delaying of an ill lurks cure.
Meg. But bitter is the meantime, and it bites.
Amph. Oh, there may be a run before the wind
From out these present ills, for me and thee,
Daughter, and yet may come my son, thy spouse!
But hush! and from the children take away
Their founts allow with tears, and talk them calm.
Seal them by stories—sad theft, all the same!
For, human troubles—they grow weary too;
Neither the wind—blasts always have their strength,
Nor happy men keep happy to the end:
Since all things change—themselves part in twain;
And that man's bravest therefore, who hopes on,
Hopes ever: to despair is coward-like.
Chorus. These dutes that overfool,
This long-used couch, I come to, having made
A staff my prop, that song may put to proof
The swan-like power, age-whitened,—poet's aid
Of sobbed-forth dirges—words that stand aloof
From action now: such am I—just a shade
With night for all its face, a mere nightdream
And words that tremble too: bowe'er they seem,
Devoted words, I deem.

O of a father ye unfathered ones,
O thou old man, and thou whose groaning stumps—

Unhappy mother—only us above,
Norr reaches him below in Haides' realm, thy love!
—(Faint: not too soon, urge forward foot and limb
Way-weary, nor lose courage—as some horse
Yoked to the car whose weight recoils on him
Just at the rock-ridge that concludes his course!
Take by the hand, the peplos, any one
Whose foothold fails him, portly and forlorn!
Aged, assist along me aged too,
Who,—mate with thee in toils when life was new.
And shields and spears first made acquaintance—
Stood by myself and proved no bastard-ship
Of fatherland when loftiest glory grew.)—
See now, how like the sire's
Each eyeball fiercely fires!
What though ill—fortune have not left his race?
Neither is gone the grand paternal grace!
Hellas! O what—what combats, destroyed
In these, wilt thou one day seek—seek, and find all void!

Pause! for I see the ruler of this land,
Lukos, now passing through the palace-gate.
Lukos. The Heraclian couple—father, wife—
If needs I must, I question: "must" forsooth?
Being your master—all I please, I ask.
To what time do you seek to spin out life?
What hope, what help see, so as not to die?
Is it you trust the sire of these, that's sunk
In Haides, will return? How past the pitch,
Suppose you have to die, you pile the woe—
Thou, casting, Hellas through, thy empty vaunts
As though Zeus helped thee to a god for son;
And thou, that wast styled your best man's wife!
Where was the awful in his work wound up,
If he did quell and quench the marshy snake
Or the Nemean monster whom he snared
And—says, by throttling of his arm, he slew?
With these do you outwrestle me? Such feats
Shall save from death the sons of Heracles
Who got praise, being naught, for bravery
In wild-beast-battle, otherwise a blank?
No man to throw on left arm buckler's weight,
Not he, nor get in spear's reach! bow he bore—
True coward's-weapon: shoot first and then fly!
No bow—and-arrow proves a man is brave,
But who keeps rank,—stands, one unwinking stare
As, ploughing up, the darts come,—brave is he.
My action has no impudence, old man!
Providence, rather: for I own I slew
Kreon, this woman's sire, and have his seat.
Nowise I wish, then, to leave, these grown up,
Avengers on me, payment for my deeds.

_Amph._ As to the part of Zeus in his own child.

Let Zeus defend that! As to mine, 'tis me
The case concerns to show by argument
The folly of this fellow. — Herakles,
Whom I stand up for! since to hear thee
styled —
Cowardly — that is unendurable.
First then, the infamous (for I account
Amongst the words denied to human speech,
Timidity ascribed thee, Herakles!)
This I must put from thee, with gods in proof.
Zeus' thunder I appeal to, these four steeds
Whereof he also was the charioteer
When, having shut down the earth's Giantgrowth —
(Never shaft flew but found and fitted flanks) —
Triumph he sang in common with the gods.
The Kentaur-race, four-footed insolence —
Go ask at Pholoe, vilest thou of kings,
Whom they would pick out and pronounce best
man,
If not my son, "the seeming-brave," say'st thou!
But Dirphus, thy Abantid mother-town,
Question her, and she would not praise, I think!
For there's no spot, where having done some good,
The country thou might'st call to witness
Now, that allwise invention, archer's-gear,
Thou blamest: hear my teaching and grow
sage!
A man in armor is his armor's slave,
And, mixed with rank and file that want to run,
He dies because his neighbors have lost heart.
Then, should he break his spear, no way remains
Of warding death off, — gone that body-guard,
His one and only; while, whatever folk
Have the true bow-hand, — here's the one main
good,
Though he have sent ten thousand shafts abroad,
Others remain wherewith the archer saves
His limbs and life, too, — stands afar and wards
Away from flesh the foe that vainly stares
Hurt by the viewless arrow, while himself
Offers no full front to those opposite;
But keeps in thorough cover: there's the
point.
That's capital in combat — damage foe,
Yet keep a safe skin — foe not out of reach
As you are! Thus my words contrast with thine,
And such, in judging facts, our difference.
These things then, now, why dost thou seek to
say?
What have they done thee? In a single point
I count thee wise — if, being base thyself,
Thou dread'st the progeny of nobleness.
Yet this bears hard upon us, all the same,
If we must die — because of fear in thee —
A death 'tis worse of at our hands,

Thy better, did Zeus rightly judge us all.
If therefore thou art bent on sceptre-sway,
Thyself, here — suffer us to leave the land.
Fugitives! nothing do by violence,
Or violence thyself shalt undergo
When the gods' gale may chance to change its thee!

_Alas, O land of Kadmea, — for 'tis thee
I mean to close with, dealing out the due Revelation, — be sure all dost thou defend Herakles and his children? Herakles
Who, coming, one to all the world, against The Minuai, fought them and left Thebes as eye
Unblinded henceforth to front freedom with!
Neither do I praise Hellas, nor shall brook
Ever to keep in silence that I count
Towards my son, craven of craven — her Whom it behooved go bring the young ones
here
Fire, spears, arms — in exchange for seas mad-safe,
And cleansings of the land, his labor's price.
But fire, spears, arms, — O children, neither
Thebes
Nor Hellas has them for you! 'Tis myself,
A feeble friend, ye look to: nothing now
But a tongue's murmur, for the strength is gone
We had once, and with age are limbs a-shake
And force a-flicker! Were I only young,
Still with the mastery o'er bone and breath,
Graping flint, spear that cut as yellow locks
Of this insulter would I bloody so — Should send him skipping o'er the Atlantic bounds
Out of my arm's reach through poltroonery!

_Cho._ Have not the really good folk starting points
For speech to purpose, — though rare talked they?

_Luk._ Say thou against us words thou tower'st
with!
I, for thy words, will deal thee blows, their
due.
Go, some to Helikon, to Paracoe
Some, and the eulays there! Bid the woodmen fell
Oak-trunks, and, when the same are brough	inside
The city, pile the altar round with logs,
Then fire it, burn the bodies of them all,
That they may learn thereby, no dead men rules
The land here, but 'tis I, by acts like these!
As for you, old sirs, who are set against
My judgments, you shall groan for — not also
The Herakleian children, but the fate
Of your own house beside, when faring ill
By any chance: and you shall recollect
Slaves are you of a tyranny that's mine!

_Cho._ Of progeny of earth, — whom Are sowed
When he laid waste the dragon's greedy jaw —
Will ye not lift the staves, right-hand supports
And bloody this man's irreligious head?

_Who._, hence no Kadmeian, rules, — the wretch,
Our easy youth: an interloper too!
But not of me, at least, shalt thou enjoy
Thy lordship ever; nor my labor’s fruit—
Hand worked so hard for—have! A curse with thee,
Whence thou didst come, there go and tyrannize!
For never while I live shalt thou destroy
The Heraklean children: not so deep
Hides he below ground, leaving thee their lord!
But we bear both of you in mind,—that thou,
The land and sea, and river, doth possess the land,
While he who saved it, loses every right.
I play the busybody—for I serve
My dead friends when they need friends’ service most?
O right-hand, how thou yearnest to snatch
My spear!
And serve indeed! in weakness dies the wish,
Or I had stayed thee calling me a slave,
And nobly drawn my breath at home in Thebes
Where thou exultest!—city that’s insane,
Sick through addiction and bad government,
Else never had she gained for master—thee!
Meg. Old friends, I praise you; since a righteous wrath
For friend’s sake well becomes a friend. But no!
On our account in anger with your lord,
Suffer no injury! Hear my advice,
Amphitrion, if I seem to speak aright.
Oh, yes, I love my children! how not love
What I brought forth, what toiled for? and to die—
Sad I esteem too; still, the hated way
Who breaks on this last, that man I count
Poor creature; us, who are of other mood,
Since we must die, behooves us meet our death
Not burnt to cinders, giving foes the laugh—
To me, worse ill than dying, that! we owe
Our houses many a brave deed, now to pay.
That, indeed, gloriously men estimate
For spear-work, so that unendurable
Were it that thou shouldst die a death of shame.
And for my glorious husband, where wants he
A witness that he would not save his boys
If touched in their good fame thereby? since birth
Bears ill with baseness done for children’s sake,
My husband needs must be my pattern here.
See now thy hope — how much I count thereon! Thou
Thinkkest that thy son will come to light:
And, of the dead, who came from Hades back?
But we with talk this man might mollify:
Never! Of all foes, fly the foolish one!
Wis, wall-bred people, make concession to!
Sooner you meet respect by speaking soft.
Already it was in my mind—perchance
We might beg off these children’s banishment;
But even that is sad, involving them
In hatred, ay—and piteous poverty!
Since the best’s for the dying friend
Has, only one day, the sweet look, ’tis said.
Dare with us death, which waits thee, dared or no!
We call on thine ancestral worth, old man!
For who out-labors what the gods appoint
Shows energy, but energy gone mad.
Since what must — none o’er makes what must not be!
Cho. Had any one, while yet my arms were strong,
Been scouring thee, he easily had ceased.
But we are naught, now; thine henceforth to see—
Amphitrion, how to push aside these fates?
Amph. Nor cowardice nor a desire of life
Stops me from dying; but I seek to save
My son his children. Vain! I set my heart,
It seems, upon impossibility.
See, it is ready for the sword, this throat
To pierce, divide, dash down from precipice!
But one grace grant us, king, we supplicate!
Slay me and this unhappy one before
The children, lest we see them — impious sight!—
Gasp ing the soul forth, calling all the while
On mother and on father’s father! Else,
Do as thy heart inclines thee! No resource
Have we from death, and we resign ourselves.
Meg. And I too supplicate: add grace to grace,
And, though but one man, doubly serve us both!
Let me bestow adornment of the dead
Upon these children! Throw the palace wide!
For now we are shut out. Thence these shall share
At least so much of wealth was once their sirs’!
Luk. These things shall be. Withdraw the bolts, I bid
My servants! Enter and adorn yourselves!
I grudge no peop lei; but when these ye wind
About your bodies,—that adornment done,—
Then I shall come and give you to the grave.
Meg. O children, follow this unhappy foot,
Your mother’s, into your ancestral home,
Where others have the power, are lords in truth,
Although the empty name is left us yet!
Amph. O Zeus, in vain I had thee marriage-mate,
In vain I called thee father of my child!
Thou wast less friendly far than thou didst seem.
I, the mere man, o’ermatch in virtue thee
The mighty god: for I have not betrayed
The Heraklean children,—whereas thou
Hadst wit enough to come clandestinely
Into the chamber, take what no man gave,
Another’s place; and when it comes to help
Thy loved ones, there thou lackest wit indeed!
Thou art some stupid god or born unjust.
Cho. Even a dirge, can Phoibos suit
In song to music jubilant
For all its sorrow: making shout
His golden plectron o’er the lute,
Melodious minstrel.
And I, too, am of mind to raise,
Despite the imminence of doom,
A song of joy, outpour my praise
To him — what is it rumor says? —
ARISTOPHANES’ APOLOGY

Whether — now buried in the ghostly gloom
Below ground — he was child of Zeus indeed,
Or mere Amphirion’s mortal seed —
To him I weave the wreath of song, his labor’s meed.
For, is my hero perished in the feat?
The virtues of brave toils, in death complete,
These save the dead in song, — their glory-garland must!

First, then, he made the wood
Of Zeus a solitudo,
Slaying its lion-tenant; and he spread
The tawanness behind — his yellow head
Emuffled by the brute’s, backed by that grin of dread.
The mountain-rovings savage Kentaur-race
He strewed with deadly bow about their place,
Slaying with wingéd shafts: Penelope knew,
Beautésously edgy; and the long tracts too
Of pasture trifled fruitless, as well there
These desolated haunts Mount Pelion under,
And, grasse up to Homolé, each dall
Whence, having filled their hands with pine-tree plunder,
Horse-like was wont to prance from, and subdue
The land of Thessaly, that bestial crew.
The golden-headed spot-back’d stag he slew,
That robber of the rustics: glorified
Therewith the goddess who in hunter’s pride
Slaughters the game along Oinos’s side.
And, yoked abreast, he brought the chariot-breed
To pace submissive to the bit, each steed
That in the bloody ews of Diomed Champed and, unbridled, hurried down that gore
For grain, exultant the dread feast before —
Of man’s flesh: hideous feeders they of yore!
All as he crossed the Herbs’ silver-flow
Accomplished he such labor, toiling so
For Makenian tyrant; ay, and more —
He crossed the Miden shore
And, by the sources of Amauros, shot
To death that strangers’-pest Kuknos, who dwelt in Amphania: not
Of fame for good to guest!

And next, to the melodious maids he came,
Inside the Hesperian cour-yard: hand must aim
At plucking gold fruit from the appléd leaves,
Now he had killed the dragon, backed like
a flame,
Who guards the unapproachable he weaves
Himself all round, one spire about the same.
And into those sea-troughs of ocean dived
The hero, and for mortals calm contrived,
Whatever ears should follow in his wake.
And under heaven’s mid-seat his hands thrust
he, at Home with Atlas: and, for valor’s sake,
Held the gods up their star-faced mansionry.
Also, the rider-host of Amazons
About Malitsa many-streasted, he went
To conquer through Erin once,
Having collected
ent
Of friends from Hellas, all on conquest bent
Of that gold-garnished cloak, dread girdle-phase!
So Hellas bounded the girl’s barbarian grace
And at Makena she saves the trophy still —
Go wonder there, who will!
And the ten-thousand-headed hound
Of many a murder, the Lernaian snake
He burned out, head by head, and cast around His darts a poison thence, — darts soon to alake
Their rage in that three-bodied herdsman’s gore
Of Eurtheis. Many a running more
He made for triumph and felicity,
And, last of toils, to Haides, never dry
Of tears, he sailed: and there he, luckless, ends
His life completely, nor returns again.
The house and home are desolate of friends.
And where the children’s life-path leads them,
plain
I see, no step retroactive, no god
Availing, and no law to help the lost!
The oak of Charon marks their period,
Waits to end all. Thy hands, these roofs ac-cost! —
To thee, though absent, look their uttermost!
But if in youth and strength I flourished still,
Still shook the spear in flight, did power match
will
In these Kadmeian com-mates of my age,
They would, — and 1, — when warfare was to wage,
Stand by these children, but I am bereft
Of youth now, lone of that good genius left!

But hie, desert! for here come these, —
Draped as the dead go, under and over, —
Children long since — now hard to discover —
Of the once so potent Herakles!
And the loved wife dragging, in one tether
About her feet, the boys together;
And the hero’s aged sire comes last!
Unhappy that I am! Of tears which rise, —
How am I all unable to hold fast,
Longer, the aged fountains of these eyes!
Meg. Be it so! Who is priest, who butcher
here
Of these ill-fated ones, or stops the breath
Of me, the miserable? Ready, see,
The sacrifice — to lead where Haides lives!
O children, we are led — no lovely team
Of oppression — age, youth, motherhood, all mixed!
O sad fate of myself and these my sons
Whom with these eyes I look at, this last time!
I, indeed, bore you: but for enemies
I brought you up to be a laughing-stock,
Matter for merriment, destruction-stuff!
Woe’s me!
Strangely indeed my hopes have struck me down
From what I used to hope about you once —
The expectation from your father’s talk!
For thee, now, thy dead sire desart Argos to:
Thou wast to have Eurystheus’ house one day,
And rule Pelagesia where the fine fruits grow;
And, for a stole of state, he wrapped about
Thy head with that the lion-monster bore,
That which himself went wearing armor wise. And thou wast King of Thebes — such chariots there!
Those plains I had for portion — all for thee. As thou hadst coaxed them out of who gave birth
To thee, his boy: and into thy right hand He thrust the guardian-club of Daidalos, — Poor guardian provest the gift that plays thee false!
And upon thee he promised to bestow Ochalia — what, with those far-shooting shafts, He ravaged once; and so, since three you were, With threefold kingdoms did he build you up To very towers, your father, — proud enough, Prognosticating, from your mainliness In boyhood, what the manhood’s self would be. For my part, I was picking out for you Brides, suiting each with his alliance — this From Athens, this from Sparté, this from Thebes — Whence, suited — as stern-cables steady ship — You might have hold on life gods bless. All gone! Fortune turns round and gives us — you, the Listens Instead of brides — me, tears for nuptial baths, Unhappy in my hoping! And the sire Of your sire — he prepares the marriage-feast Smiting Haides who plays father now — Bitter relationship! Oh me! which first — Which last of you shall I to bosom fold? To whom shall I fit close, his mouth to mine? Of whom shall I lay hold and ne’er let go? How would I gather, like the brown-winged bee, The groans from all, and, gathered into one, Give them you back again, a crowded tear! Dearest, if any voice be heard of men Dungened in Haides, thee — to thee I speak! Here is thy father dying, and thy boys! And I too perish, famed as fortunate By mortals once, through thee! Assist them! Come!
But come! though just a shade, appear to me! For, coming, thy ghost-grandeur would suffice, Such cowards are they in thy presence, these Who kill thy children now thy back is turned! Amph. Ay, daughter, bid the powers below assist! But I will rather, raising hand to heaven, Call thee to help, O Zeus, if thy intent Be, to these children, helpful anyway, Since soon thou wilt be valueless enough! And yet thou hast been called and called; in vain
I labor: for we needs must die, it seems. Well, aged brothers — life’s a little thing! Such as it is, then, pass life pleasantly From day to night, nor once grieve all the while! Since Time concerns him not about our hopes, To save them, — but his own work done, flies off. Witness myself, looked up to among men, Doing noteworthy deeds: when here comes fate Lifts me away, like feather skyward borne, In one day! Riches then and glory,— whom These are found constant to, I know not. Friends, Farewell! the man who loved you all so much,
Now, this last time, my mates, ye look upon!
Meg. Ha!
O father, do I see my dearest? Speak!
Amph. No more than thou canst, daughter — dumb like thee!
Meg. Is this he whom we heard was under ground?
Amph. Unless at least some dream in day we see?
Meg. What do I say? what dreams insanely view?
This is no other than thy son, old sire! Here, children! hang to these paternal robes, Quick, haste, hold hard on him, since here’s your true Zeus that can save — and every whit as well! Herakles. Oh, hail, my palace, my heart’s propulsa —
How glad I see thee as I come to light! Ha, what means this? — My children I behold Before the house in garments of the grave, Chapleted, and, amid a crowd of men, My very wife — my father weeping too, Whatever the misfortune! Come, best take My station nearer these and learn it all!
Wife, what new sorrow has approached our home?
Meg. O dearest! light flashed on thy father now!
Art thou come? art thou saved and dost thou fall
On friends in their supreme extremity?
Her. How say’st thou? — Father! what’s the trouble here?
Meg. Undone are we! — but thou, old man, forgive If first I match what thou shouldst say to him! For somehow womanhood wakes pity more. Here are my children killed and I undone!
Her. Apollon, with what preludes speech begins!
Meg. Dead are my brothers and old father too. Her. How say’st thou! — doing what? — by spear-stroke whence?
Meg. Lukon destroyed them — the land’s noble king!
Her. Met them in arms? or through the land’s disease?
Meg. Sedition: and he sways seven-gated Thebes.
Her. Why then came fear on the old man and thee?
Meg. He meant to kill thy father, me, our boys.
Her. How say’st thou? — Fearing what from orphanage?
Meg. Lest they should some day pay back Kreon’s death.
Her. And why trick out the boys corpse-fashion thus?
Meg. These rags of death we have already donned.
Her. And you had died through violence? Woe’s me!
Meg. Left bare of friends: and thou wast dead, we heard.
Her. And whence came on you this faint-heartedness?
Meg. The heralds of Eurystheus brought the news.
Her. And why was it you left my house and hearst?
Meg. Forced thence: thy father — from his very coach!
Her. And no shame at insulting the old
man?
Meg. Shame, truly! no near neighbors he and
Shame!
Her. And so much, in my absence, lacked
friends?
Meg. Friends, are there any to a luckless
man?
Her. The Minin-war I waged, — they spat forth these?
Meg. Friendless — again I tell thee — is illdwell.
Her. Will you not cast these hall-wraps from your hair
And look on light again, and with your eyes Taste the sweet change from neither dark to day?
While — for now there needs my handi-
work —
First I shall go, demolish the abodes
Of these new lordships; next how off the head
Acrost and toss it for the dogs to trawl.
The, such of the Kadmeians as I find
Were craven though they owed me gratitude, —
Some I intend to handle with this club
Renowned for conquest; and with winged shafts
Scatter the others, fill Ixmones full
With bloody corpses, — Dirke’s flow so white
Shall be incarnadined. For, whom, I pray,
Behooves me rather help than wife and child
And aged father? Farewell, “ Labors” mine!
Vainly I wrought them: my true work lay
here!
My business is to die defending these, —
If for their father’s sake they meant to die.
Or how shall we call brave the battling it
With snake and lion, as Eurystheus bade,
If yet I must not labor death away
From my own children? “ Conquering Herakles”
Folk will not call me as they used, I think!
The right thing is for parents to act
Children, old age, the partner of the coach.
Amph. True, son! thy duty is — be friend to
friends
And foe to foes: yet — no more haste than needs!
Her. Why, father, what is over-hasty here?
Amph. Many a pauper — seeming to be rich,
As the word goes — the king calls partisan.
Such made a riot, ruined Thebes to rob
Their neighbor: for, what good they had at home
Was spent and gone, — flew off through idleness.
You came to trouble Thebes, they say: since seen,
Beware lest, raising foes, a
You stumble where you ap
Her. If all Thebes saw:
But seeing as I did a certain bird
Not in the lucky seats, I knew some woe
Was fallen upon the house: so, purposely.
By stealth I made my way into the land.
Amph. And now, advancing, hail the hear:
with praise
And give the ancestral home thine eye to see:
For he himself will come, thy wife and sons
The drag-forth — slaughter — slay me too. — this king!
But, here remaining, all succeeds with thee—
Gain lost by no false step. So, this thine town
Disturb not, son, ere thou right matters here.
Her. Thus will I do, for thou say’st well my home
Let me first enter! Since at the due time Returning from the unsummed depths when dwells
Haides’ wife Kore, let me not affront
These gods beneath my roof, I first should hail:- Amph. For didst thou really visit Haides’
son?
Her. As — dragged to light, too, his threeheaded beast.
Amph. By fight didst conquer — or through Kore’s gift?
Her. Fight: well for me, I saw the Orgies
first!
Amph. And is he in Eurystheus’ house, the brute?
Her. Chthonia’s grove, Hermione’s city, holds him now.
Amph. Does not Eurystheus know thee back on earth?
Her. No: I would come first and see matters here.
Amph. But how wast thou below ground such a time?
Her. I stopped, from Haides, bringing The-sens up.
Amph. And where is he? — bound o’er the plain for home?
Her. Gone glad to Athens — Haides’ fasitive!
But, up, boys! follow father into house!
There’s a far better going-in for you.
Truly, than going-out was! Nay, take heart.
And let the eyes no longer run and run!
And thou, O wife, my own, collect thy soul
Not tremble now! Leave grasping, all of
you,
My garments! I’m not winged, nor fly from
friends.
Ah —
No letting go for these, who all the more
Hang to my garments! Did you foot indeed
The razor’s edge? Why, then I’ll carry them —
Take with my hands these small craft up, and tow
Just as a ship would. There! don’t fear I shirk
My children’s service! this way, men are men.
No difference! best and worst, they love their
boys
After one fashion: wealth they differ in —
Some have it, others not; but each and all
Combine to form the children-loving race.
Cho. Youth is a pleasant burden to me; but age on my head, more heavily than the eras of Aithra, weights and weighs, and darkening cloaks the lids and intercepts the rays. Never be mine the preference of an Asian empire's wealth, nor yet of a house all gold, to youth, to youth that's beauty, whatever the gods dispense! Whether in wealth we joy, or fret, all God's gifts most beautiful, in truth!

but miserable murderous age I hate! set it to go wreak, the waves adown, for ever by rights plague tower or town. There mortals bide, but still elate with wings, on ether, precipitate, Vander them round — nor wait!

but if the gods, to man's degree, in life and wisdom, they would bring basking a twofold youth, to be their virtue's sign-mark, all should see, a those with whom life's winter thus grew spring. or when they died, into the sun once more knew they have traversed twice life's race-source o'er;

While ignobility had simply run instance through, nor second life begun, so might we discern both bad and good is surely as the hasty multitude numbered by the sailors, one and one. but now the gods by so apparent line omit the worthy and the base define; why, a certain period rounds, and so kings man more wealth, — but youthful vigor, no!

Yea! I am not to pause singing together — wine and wine in cup — the Graces with the Muses up — last ducet marriage: loosed from music's laws, a life of love! but where the wreaths abound, there ever may I be!

and still, an aged bard, I shout Memesous — till chant of Herakles the triumph-chant, companioned by the seven-stringed tortoise-shell! Libria flute, and Bromo's self as well, in the grape, with man participant! all yet will we arrest their glad advance! So Muses who so long have led me forth to dance!

psians — hymn the Delian girls indeed, feasting a beauteous measure in and out its temple-gates, Latona's goodly seed; psians — to thee, these thy domes about, from these gray cheeks, my king, will swan—like about —

Luk. From out the house Amphitryon comes — in time! For 'tis a long while now since ye bedecked your bodies with the dead-folks' finery. But quick! the boys and wife of Herakles — Bid them appear outside this house, keep pace To die, and need no bidding but your own! Amphi. King! you press hard on me sore-pressed enough, and give me soorn — beside my dead ones here. Meet in such matters were it, though you reign, to temper zeal with moderation. Since you do impose on us the need to die — needs must we love our lot, obey your will.

Luk. Where's Megara, then? Alkmend's grandsons, where?

Amphi. She, I think, — as one figures from outside —

Luk. Well, this same thinking, — what affords its ground?

Amphi. Sits supplicant on the holy altar-steps —

Luk. Idly indeed a supplicant to save life! Amphi. — And calls on her dead husband, vainly too!

Luk. For he's not come, nor ever will arrive. Amphi. Never — at least, if no god raise him up.

Luk. Go to her, and conduct her from the house!

Amphi. I should partake the murder, doing that.

Luk. We, — since thou hast a scruple in the case, —

Outside of fears, we shall march forth these lads.

Mother and all. Here, follow me, my folk — and gladly so remove what stops our toils!

Amphi. Thou — go then! March where needs must! What remains — Perhaps concerns another. Doing ill, expect some ill be done thee!

Ha, old friends! On he strides beautifully! in the toils O' the net, where swords spring forth, will he be fast — Minded to kill his neighbors — the arch-knave! I go, too — I must see the falling corpse! For he has sweets to give — a dying man, your foe, that pays the price of deeds he did.

Cho. Troubles are over! He the great king once, turns the point, tends for Haides, goal of life! O justice, and the gods' back-flowing fate! Amphi. Thou art come, late indeed, where death pays crime —

These insults heaped on better than thyself! Cho. Joy gives this outburst to my tears! Again Come round those deeds, his doing, which of old He never dreamed himself was to endure — King of the country! But enough, old man! Indoors, now, let us see how matters stand — If somebody be faring as I wish!

Luk. Ah me — me!

Cho. This strikes the keynote — music to my mind,
Merry i' the household! Death takes up the tune!
The king gives voice, groans murder's prelude well!
Luk. O all the land of Kadmos! slain by guile!
Cho. Ay, for who slew first? Paying back thy due,
Resign thee! make, for deeds done, more amends!
Who was it grazed the gods through lawlessness —
Mortal himself, threw up his fools'-conceit
Against the blessed heavenly ones — as though Gods had no power? Old friends, the impious man Exists not any more! The house is mute.
Turn we to song and dance! For, those I love, Those I wish well to, well fare they, to wish!
Dances, dances and banqueting
To Thebes, the sacred city through,
Are a care! for, change and change
Of tears to laughter, old to new,
Our lays, glad birth, they bring, they bring!
He is gone and past, the mighty king!
And the old one reigns, returned — Oh, strange!
From the Acheronian harbor too!
Advent of hope, beyond thought's widest range!
To the gods, the gods, are crimes a care,
And they watch our virtue, well aware
That gold and that prosperity drive man
Out of his mind — those charioteers who hate Might-without-right behind them: face who can Fortune's reverse which time prepares, nor quail?
— He who evades law and in lawlessness
Delineates plan, — he has broken down his trust —
The chariot, riches haled — now blackening in the dust!

Ismene, go thou galloped!
Break into dance, ye ways, the polished bed
O' the seven-gated city! Dirks, thou
Fair-flowing, with the Asopid sisters all,
Leave your sire's stream, attend the festival
Of Herakles, one choir of nymphs, sing triumph now!
O woody rock of Puthos and each home
O' the Helikonian Muse, ye shall come
With joyous shouting to my walls, my town
Where saw the light that Spartan race, those "Sown."
Brazen-shield-bearing chiefs, whoseof the band
With children's children renovates our land,
To Thebes a sacred light!
O combination of the marriage rite —
Bed of the mortal-born and Zeus, who couched
Beside the nymph of Perseus' progeny!
For credible, past hope, becomes to me.
That nuptial story long ago avouched,
O Zeus! and time has turned the dark to bright,
And made one blaze of truth the Herakleidan might —
His, who emerged from earth's pavilion, left
Plouton's abode, the nether palace-cleft.
Thou wast the lord that nature gave me —
That baseness born and bred — my king, by lot:
— Baseness made plain to all, who now regard
The match of sword with sword in fight, —
If to the gods the Just and Right
Still pleasing be, still claim the palm's award.

Horror!
Are we come to the selfsame passion of fear,
Old friends? — such a phantasm fronts me here
Visible over the palace-roof!
In flight, in flight, the laggard limb
Bestir! and haste aloof
From that on the roof there — grand and grim!
O Paian, king!
Be thou my safeguard from the woeful thing!
Iris. Courage, old men! beholding here —
Night's birth —
Madness, and me the handmaid of the gods,
Iris: since to your town we come, no plague —
Wage war against the house of but one man
From Zeus, and from Alkmene sprung, they say.
Now, till he made an end of bitter toils,
Fate kept him safe, nor did his father Zeus
Let us once hurt him, Heré nor myself.
But, since he has tolled through Eurystheus' task,
Héré does desire to fix fresh blood on him —
Slaying his children: I desire it too.

Up then, collecting the unsmeared heart,
Unwedded virgin of black Night! Drive, dav,
Frenzy upon the man there — whirls of brain
Big with child-murder, while his feet leap gay!
Let go the bloody cable its whole length!
So that, — when o'er the Acheronian ford
He has sent floating, by self-homicide,
His beautiful boy-garland, — he may know
First, Heré's anger, what it is to him,
And then learns mine. The gods are vile indeed
And mortal matters vast, if he 'scape free!

Madness. Cerises, from well-born sire and mother too
Had I my birth, whose blood is Night's and Heaven's;
But here's my glory, — not to grudge the god!
Nor love I raids against the friends of man.
I wish, then, to persuade, — before I see
You stumbling, you and Heré! trust my words!
This man, the house of whom ye hound me to
Is not unfamed on earth nor gods among;
Since, having quelled waste land and savage sea,
He alone raised again the falling rights
Of gods — gone ruinous through impious men.
Desire no mighty mischief, I advise!
Iris. Give thou no thought to Heré's faulty schemes!

Mad. Changing her step from faulty to fault-free!
Iris. Not to be wise, did Zeus' wife send thee here!

Mad. Sun, thee I cite to witness — doing what I loathe to do!
But since indeed to Heré and thyself I must subserve,
And follow you quick, with a whiz, as the hounds a-hunt with the huntsman,
— Go I will! and neither the sea, as it groans with its waves so furiously,
Nor earthquake, no, nor the bolt of thunder
gaping out heaven’s labor-three,
Shall cover the ground as I, at a bound, rush into the bosom of Herakles!
And home I scatter, and house I batter,
Having first of all made the children fall,—
And he who failed them is never to know
He gave birth to each child that received the blow,
Till the Madness, I am, have let him go!

Ha, behold, already he rocks his head — he is off from the starting-place!
Not a word, as he rolls his frightful orbs, from their sockets wrenched in the ghastly race!
And then the breathings of him he tempers and times no more than a bull in act to toss,
And hideously he bellows invoking the Kereis,
daughters of Tartaros.
Ay, and I soon will dance thee madder, and pipe thee quite out of thy mind with fear!
So, up, with the famous foot, thou! Iris, march to Olimpos, leave me here!
Me and mine, who now combine, in the dreadful shape no mortal sea,
And now are about to pass, from without, inside of the home of Herakles!
Cho. Groom! groom! — groom! —

And leave no trace in the dwelling-place!
Ai ai, because of the evil!
Ai ai, the old man — how I groan
For the father, and not the father alone!
The one who was nurse of his children, — small
Her gain that they ever were born at all!

See! See!
A whirlwind shakes either and thither
The house — the roof falls in together!
Ha, ha! what dost thou, son of Zeus?
A trouble of Tartaros broke loose,
Such as once Pallas on the Titan thundered, Thou sendest on thy domes, roof-shattered and wall-sundered!

Message. O bodies white with age! —
Cho. What cry, to me —
What, dost thou call with?
Mes. There’s a curse indoors!
Cho. I shall not bring a prophet: you sufficate!
Mes. Dead are the children!
Cho. Ai ai!
Mes. Groom! for, groans
Suit well the subject! Dire the children’s death,
Dreary too the parent’s hands that dealt the fate.
No one could tell worse woe than we have borne!
Cho. How dost thou that same curse — curse, curse for groan
The father’s on the children, make appear?
Tell in what matter they were buried from

Against the house — these evils; and recount
The children’s hapless fate, O Messenger!
Mes. The victims were before the hearth of Zeus
A household-expiation: since the king
O’ the country, Herakles had killed and cast
From out the dwelling; and a beauteous choir
Of boys stood by his sire, too, and his wife.
And now the basket had been carried round
The altar in a circle, and we used
The consecrated speech. Alkménés’ son —
Just as he was about, in his right hand,
To bear the torch, that he might dip into
The cleansing-water — came to a stand-still;
And, as their father yet delayed, his boys
Had their eyes on him. But he was himself
No longer: lost in rollings of the eyes;
Out-thrusting eyes — their very roots — like
blood!
Froth he dropped down his bushy-bearded cheek,
And said — together with a madman’s laugh —
“Father! why sacrifice, before I slay
Eurystheus? why have twice the lustral fire,
And double pains, when ’tis permitted me
To end, with one good hand-sweep, matters
here?"
Then, — when I hither bring Eurystheus’
head,
Then for these just slain, wash hands once for
all!
Now, — cast drink-offerings forth, throw baskets down!
Who gives me bow and arrows, who my club?
I go to that Makená! One must match
Crowbars and mattocks, so that—those sunk stones
The Cyclops squared with picks and plumb-line red—
I, with my bent steel, may o'ertumbe town!"
Which said he, and—no car to have—
Affirms he has one! mounts the chariot-board,
And strikes, as having really good in hand!
And two ways laughed the servants—laugh
With awe;
And one said, as each met the other's stare,
"Playing us boys' tricks? or is master mad?"
But up he climbs, and down along the roof,
And, dropping into the men's place, maintains He's come to Nisos city, where he's some
Only inside his own house! then reclines
On floor, for couch, and, as arrived indeed, Makes himself supper; goes through some brief stay,
Then says he 's traversing the forest-flats
Of Ithomes; thereupon lays body bare
Of bucklings, and begins a contest with —No one! and is proclaimed the conqueror—
He by himself—having called out to hear
—Nobody! Then, if you will take his word,
Barring against Eurystheus horribly,
He's at Makenai. But his father laid Hold of the strong hand and addressed him thus:
"O son, what aile thee? Of what sort is this Extravagance? Has not some murder-craze,
Bred of those corpses thou didst just dispatch,
Danced thee drunk?"
But he, —taking him to crouch,
Eurystheus' sire, that apprehensive touched
His hand, a suppliant,—presses him aside,
Goes ready quiver, and bends low against
His children—thinking them Eurystheus' boys
He means to slay. —Those, beseeched with fear,
Rushed here and there, —this child, into the robes
O' the wretched mother,—this, beneath the shade
O' the colonn — and this other, like a bird,
Covered at the altar-foot. The mother shrieks,
"Parent—what dost thou? —kill thy children?"
So
Shriek the old sire and crowd of servitors.
But he, outwinding him, as round about
The column ran the boy,—a horrid whirl
O' the lathe his foot described!—stands oppos'd,
Strikes through the liver! and supine the boy
Bedews the stone shafts, breathing out his life.
But "Victory," he shouted! boasted thus:
"Well, this one nestling of Eurystheus—dead—Falls by me, pays back the paternal hate!"
Then bends bow on another who was crouched
At base of altar—overlooked, he thought—
And now prevents him, falls at father's knee,
Throwing up hand to beard and cheek above.
"O dearest! cries he, "father, kill me not!
Yours, I am—your boy: not Eurystheus' boy
You kill now!" But he, rolling the wild eye
Of Gorgon,—as the boy stood too all too close
For deadly bowshot,—mimicry of smith
Who batters red-hot iron,—hand o'er head
Heaving his club, on the boy's yellow hair Hurls it and breaks the bone. This seems caught,—
He goes; would slay the third, one sacrifice
And he and the couple; but, beforehand here,
The miserable mother catches up,
Carries him inside house and bars the gate.
Then he, as he were at those Cyclops' work,
Digs at, heaves doors up, wrenches doorspace—
Lays wife and child low with the selfsame shaft.
And this done, at the old man's death he drives;
But there came, as it seemed to us who saw,
a statue—Pallas with the created head,
Swinging her spear—a stone which smote
Hercules' breast and stayed his slaughter-rate.
And sent him safe to sleep. He falls a ground
Striking against the column with his back—
Column which, with the falling of the roof,
Broken in two, lay by the altar-base.
And we, foot-free now from our several flights,
Along with the old man, we fastened bonds
Of rope-noose to the column, so that he,
Ceasing from sleep, might not go adding deed to deeds done. And he sleeps a sleep, for wretch,
No gift of any god! since he has slain
Children and wife. For me, I do not know
What mortal has more misery to bear.
Cho. A murder there was which Argolis
Holds in remembrance, Hellas through,
As, at that time, best and famousest:
Of those, the daughters of Danaos slew.
A murder indeed was that! but this
Outstrip it, straight to the goal has pressed.
I am able to speak of a murder done
To the hapless Zeus-born offspring, too—
Prokne's son, who had but one—
Or a sacrifice to the Muses, say
Rather, who thus sing alway,
Her single child! But thou, the sire
Of children three—O thou consuming fire!—
In one outrageous fate hast made them all expire!
And this outrageous fate—
What groan, or wail, or deadmen's dirge,
Or choric dance of Haides shall I urge
The Muse to celebrate?

Woe! woe! behold!
The portalled palace lies unrolled,
This way and that way, each prodigious fold!
Alas for me! these children, see,
Stretched, hapless group, before their father—he,
The all-unhappy, who lies sleeping out
The murder of his sons, a dreadful sleep!
And bonds, see, at about—
Rope-tangle, ties and tether,—these Tightenings around the body of Hercules
To the stone columns of the house made fast!
But—like a bird that grieves
For callow nestlings some rude hand bereaves—
See here, a bitter journey overpast,
The old man—all too late—is here at last!
Amph. Silently, silently, aged Kadmeians!
Will ye not suffer my son, diffused
Ye age, to slide from his sorrows in sleep?
Cho. And thee, old man, do I, groaning, weep,
And the children too, and the head there—used
Of old to the wreathes and pains!
Amph. Farther away! Nor beat the breast,
Nor rail aloud, nor rouse from rest
The slumberer—a sleep, so best!
Cho. Ah me—what a slaughter!
Amph. Refrain—refrain!
Ye will prove my perdiction!
Cho. Unlike water,
Bloodshed rises from earth again!
Amph. Do I bid you hate your breath, in vain—
Ye elders! Lament in a softer strain!
Lest he rouse himself, burst every chain,
And bury the city in ravage—bray
Father and house to dust away!
Cho. I cannot forbear—I cannot forbear!
Amph. Hush! I will learn his breathings:
there!
I will lay my ears close.
Cho. What, he sleeps?—
Amph. Ay—sleeps! A horror of slumber keeps
The man who has piled
On wife and child
Death and death, as he shot them down
With clang o’ the bow.
Amph. —
Cho. —
Amph. —
Cho. —
The fate of the children—
Amph. —
Cho. —
Amph. —
Cho. —
The fate of thy son!
Amph. Hush, hush! Have done!
He is turning about!
He is breaking out!
Away! I steal
And my body conceal,
Before he arouse,
In the depths of the house!
Cho. Courage! The Night
Maintains her right
On the lads of thy son there, sealed from sight!
Amph. See, see! To leave the light
And, wretch that I am, bear one last ill,
I do not avoid; but if he kill
Me, his own father, and devise
Beyond the present miseries
A misery more ghastly still—
And to haunt him, over and above
Those here who, as they used to love,
Now hate him, what if he have with these
My murder, the worst of Erinnus?
Cho. Then was the time to die, for thee,
When ready to wreak in the full degree
Vengeance on those
Thy consort’s foes
Who murdered her brothers! glad, life’s close,
With the Taphioi down,
And sacked their town
Clustered about with a wash of sea!

Amph. To flight—to flight!
Away from the house, troop off, old men!
Save yourselves out of the maniac’s sight!
He is rousing himself right up: and then,
Murder on murder heaping anew.
He will revel in blood your city through!
Cho. O Zeus, why hast, with such unmeasured hate,
Hated thy son, whelmed in this sea of woes?
Her. Ha,—
In breath indeed I am—see things I ought—
Relate, and earth, and these the sunbeam-shafts,
But then—some billow and strange whirl of sense
I have fallen into! and breathings hot I breathe—
Smoked upwards, not the steady work from lungs.
See now! Why, bound—at moorings like a ship,—
About my young breast and young arm, to this Stone piece of carved work broke in half, do I sit,
Have my rest in corseps’ neighborhood?
Strewn on the ground are winged darts, and bow
Which played my brother-shieldman, held in hand,—
Guarded my side, and got my guardianship!
I cannot have gone back to Hades—twice Begun Eurystheus’ race I ended thence;
But I nor see the Siupheian stone,
Nor Plouton, nor Demeter’s sceptred maid!
I am struck witless sure! Where can I be?
Ho there! what friend of mine is near or far—
Some one to cure me of bewildermint?
For naught familiar do I recognize.
Amph. Old friends, shall I go close to these my woes?
Cho. Ay, and let me too,—nor desert your ills!
Her. Father, why weepst thou, and buriest up
Thine eyes, aloof so from thy much-loved son?
Amph. O child!—for, faring badly, mine thou art!
Her. Do I fear somehow ill, that tears should flow?
Amph. Ill,—would cause any god who bore to groan!
Her. That’s boasting, truly! still, you state no hap.
Amph. For, thyself seest—if in thy wits again.
Her. Heyday! How riddlingly that hint returns!
Amph. Well, I am trying—art thou sane and sound!
Her. Say if thou lay’st aught strange to my life’s charge!
Amph. If thou no more art Haides-drunk,—
I tell!
Her. I bring to mind no drunkenness of soul.
Amph. Shall I unbind my son, old men, or what?
Her. And who was binder, tall!—not that,
my deeds!
Amph. Mind that much of misfortune—pass
the rest!

672

Her. Enough! from silence, I nor learn nor wish.
Amph. O Zeus, dost witness here throne'd
Here's work? and why
Her. But who have I had to bear aught hostile thence?
Amph. Let be the goddess—bury thine own guilt!
Her. Undone! What is the sorrow thou wilt say?
Amph. Look! See the ruins of thy children here!
Her. Ah me! What sight do wretched I behold?
Amph. Unfair fight, son, this fight thou fastenest
On thine own children!
Her. What fight? Who slew these?
Amph. Thou and thy bow, and who of gods was cause.
Her. How say'st? What did I? Ill-announcing sire!
Amph. Go mad! Thou sakes a sad clear
Her. And am I also murderer of my wife?
Amph. All the work here was just one hand's work—thine!
Her. Ah! all— for groans encompass me—a cloud!
Amph. For these deeds' sake do I begroan thy fate!
Her. Did I break up my house or dance it down?
Amph. I know just one thing—all's a woe
Her. But where did the craze catch me, where destroy?
Amph. When thou didst cleanse hands at the altar-flame.
Her. Ah me! why is it then I save my life—
Proved murderer of my dearest ones, my boys?
Shall not I rush to the rock-level's leap,
Or, darting sword through breast and all, become
My children's blood-avenger? or, this flesh
Burning away with fire, so thrust away
The infancy, which waits me there, from life?
Ah, but, — a hindrance to my purposed death, Theseus arrives, my friend and kinsman, here!
Eyes will be on me! my child-murder-plague
In evidences before friends loved so much!
O me, what shall I do? Where, taking wing
Or gliding underground, shall I seek out
A solitariness from misery?
I will pull night upon my muffled head!
Let this wretch here content him with his curse
Of blood: I would pollute no innocents!
Theseus. I come, — with others who await beside.
Amph. Oh, dream, the armed Athenian youth,—
Bring thy son, old man, spear's fight-fellowship!
For a fruit reached the Erechtheidai's town
That, having seized the sceptre of this realm,
Lakos prepares you battle-violence.
So, paying good back,—Heraclcs began,

Saving me down there,—I have come, old man.
If aught, of my hand or my friends', you want.
What's here? Why all these corpesse on the ground?
Am I perhaps behindhand—come too late?
For now, ill? Who killed these children now?
Whose wife was she, this woman I behold?
Boys, at least, take no stand in reach of spear:
Some other woes than war, I chance upon!
Amph. O thou, who sway'st the olive-bearing height! —

Thee. Why hail'st thou me with woeful prelude thus?
Amph. Dire sufferings have we suffered from the gods.

Thee. These boys, — who are they, thou weeping o'er?
Amph. He gave them birth, indeed, my hapless son.
Begot, but killed them—dared their bloody death.

Thee. Speak no such horror!
Amph. Would I might obey!

Thee. O teller of dread tidings!

Amph. Lost— flown away from life!

Thee. What sayest thou?

What did he?

Amph. Erring through a frenzy-fit,
He did all, with the arrows dipt in dye
Of hundred-headed Hidra.

Thee. Here's strife!
But who is this among the dead, old man?

Amph. Mine, mine, this progeny — the labor-plagued,
Who went with gods once to Phlegraia's plain,
And in the giant-slaying war bore shield!

Thee. Woe— woe! What man was born mischanceful thus?

Amph. Thou couldst not know another mortal man
Toil-weary, more outworn by wanderings.

Thee. And why I' the peploj hides he his sad head?

Amph. Not daring meet thine eye, thy friendship,
And kinship, — nor that children's blood about!

Thee. But I come to who shared my woe with me!

Uncover him!

Amph. O child, put from thine eyes
The peplos, throw it off, show face to sun!
Woe’s weight well matched contends with tears in thee.
I supplicate thee, falling at thy cheek
And knee and hand, and shedding this old tear!
O son, remit the savage lion’s mood,
Since to a bloody, an unholy race
Art thou led forth, if thou be resolute
To go on adding ill to ill, my child!

Thee. Let me speak! Thee, who wistest —

I call upon to show thy friends thine eye!
For there’s no darkness has a cloud so black
May hide thy misery thus absolute.
HERAKLES

Why, waving hand, dost sign me — murder's done?
Lest a pollution strike me, from thy speech?
Nangare I to — with these, at least — fare ill:
For I had joy once! Then, — soul rises to,
When thou didst save me from the dead to light!
Friends' gratitude that tastes old age, I loathe,
And him who likes to share when things look fine,
But, sail along with friends in trouble — no!
Aris, uncover thine unhappy head!
Look on us! Every man of the right race
Bears what, at least, the gods inflict, nor shrinks.

Her. Theseus, hast seen this match — my boys with me?
Thes. I heard of, now I see the ills thou sign'st.
Her. Why then hast thou displayed my head to sun?
Thes. Why? mortals bring no plague on sough divine!
Her. Fly, O unhappy, this my impious plague!
Thes. No plague of vengeance flits to friends from friends.
Her. I praise thee! But I helped thee, — that is truth.
Thes. And I, advantaged then, now pity thee.
Her. — The pitiable, — my children's murderer!
Thes. I mourn for thy sake, in this altered lot.
Her. Hast thou found others in still greater woe?
Thes. Thou, from earth, touchest heaven, one huge distress!
Her. Accordingly, I am prepared to die.
Thes. Think'st thou thy threats at all import the gods?
Her. Gods please themselves: to gods I give their like.
Thes. Shut thy mouth, lest big words bring bigger woe!
Her. I am full fraught with ills — no stowing more!
Thes. Thou wilt do — what, then? Whither moody borne?
Her. Dying, I go below earth whence I came.
Thes. Thou hast used words of — what man turns up first!
Her. While thou, being outside sorrow, schoolest me.
Thes. The much-enduring Herakles talks thus —
Her. Not the so much-enduring: measure's past.
Thes. Mainstay to mortals, and their mighty friend?
Her. They nowise profit me: but Heré rules.
Thes. Helias fordiest thou shouldst ineptly die.
Her. But hear, then, how I strive by arguments Against thy teachings! I will ope thee out
My life — past, present — as unlivable.

First, I was born of this man, who had slain
His mother's aged sire, and, sullied so,
Married Alkméné, she who gave me birth.
Now, when the basis of a family
Is not laid right, what follows needs must fall;
And Zeus, whoever Zeus is, formed me foe
To Héré (take not thou offence, old man!)
Since father, in Zeus' stead, account I thee)
And, while I was a youth, did might voice frightful snakes
She introduced among my swaddling-clothes, —
That bedfellow of Zeus! — to end me so.
But when I gained the youthful garb of flesh,
The labors I endured — what need to tell?
What lions ever, or three-bodied brutes,
Tunbous or giants, or the four-leg'd swarms
Of Kentaurs battle, did not I end out?
And that hound, headed all about with heads
Which cropped up twice, the Hudra, having slain
I both went through a myriad other toils
In full drove, and arrived among the dead
To convoy, as Eurystheus bade, to light
Haides' three-headed dog and doorkeeper.
But then I, — wretch, — dared this last labor — see!
Slew my sons, keystone-coped my house with ills.
To such a strait I come! nor my dear ÆTHEs
Dare I inhabit, — and, suppose I stay?
Into what fane or festival of friends
Am I to go? My curse scarce courts access!
Shall I seek Aegae? How, if fled from home?
But say, — I hurry to some other town!
And there they eye me, as notorious now,—
Kept by sharp tongue-taunts under lock and key
— "Is not this he, Zeus' son, who murdered once Children and wife? Let him go rot elsewhere!"

To any man renowned as happy once,
Reverses are a grave thing; but to whom
Evil is old acquaintance, there's no hurt
To speak of, he and misery are twins.
To this degree of woe I think to come:
For earth will utter voice forbidding me
To touch the ground, and sea — to pierce the wave,
The river-springs — to drink, and I shall play
Ixion's part quite ont, the chained and wheeled!
And best of all will be, if so I 'scape
Sight from one man of those Hellenes, — once
I lived among, felicitous and rich!
Why ought I then to live? What gain accrues
From good-for-nothing, wicked life I lead?
In fine, let Zeus' brave consort dance and sing,
Stamp foot, the Olumpian Zeus' own sandal-trick!
What she has willed, that brings her will to pass
The foremost man of Hellas pedestal,
Up, over, and down whirling! Who would pray
To such a goddess? — that, begrudging Zeus
Because he loved a woman, ruins me
Lover of Helias, faultless of the wrong! —
Thes. This strife is from no other of the gods
Than Zeus' wife; rightly apprehend, as well,
Why, to no death — thou meditatest now —
I would persuade thee, but to bear thy woes!
None, none of mortals boasts a fate unmixed,
Nor gods—if poets' teaching be not false.
Have not they joined in wedlock against law
With one another? not, for sake of rule.
Branded their sires in bondage? Yet they house,
All the same, in Olimpos, carry heads.
High there, notorious sinners though they be!
What wilt thou say, then, if thou, mortal-born,
Bearest outrageously fate gods endure?
Leave Thebes, now, pay obedience to the law,
And follow me to Pallas' citadel!
There, when thy hands are purified from stain,
House will I give thee, and goods shared alike.
What gifts I hold too from the citizens
For saving twice seven children, when I slew
The Knaesian bull, these also give I thee.
And everywhere about the land are plots
Apportioned me: these, named by thine own
name,
Shall be henceforward styled by all men—
thine,
Thy life-long; but at death, when Haides-bound,
All Athens shall uphold the honored one
With sacrifices, and huge marble heaps:
For that 's a fair crown our Hellenes grant
Their people—glory, should they help the brave!
And I repay thee back this grace for thine
That saved me, now that thou art lorn of friends
—Since, when the gods give honor, friends may flit:
For, a god's help suffices, if he please.
Her. Ah me, these words are foreign to my woes!
I neither fancy gods love lawless beds,
Nor, that with chains they bind each other's hands,
Have I judged worthy faith, at any time;
Nor shall I be persuaded—one is born
His fellows' master! since God stands in need.
If he is really God—of naught at all.
These are the poets' pithful conceits!
But this it was I pondered, though woefully
—wept
"Take heed lest thou be taxed with cowardice
Somehow in leaving thus the light of day!"
For whose cannot make a stand against
These same misfortunes, neither could withstand
A mere man's dart, oppose death, strength to strength.
Therefore unto thy city I will go
And have the grace of thy ten thousand gifts.
There! I have tasted of ten thousand toils
As truly—never waiving a single one,
Nor let my runnings drop from out my eyes!
Nor ever thought it would have come to this—
That I from out my eyes do drop tears! Well!
At present, as it seems, one bows to fate.
So be it! Old man, thou seest my exile—
Most, too, me—my children's murderer,
These, move thou to the tomb, and deck the dead,
Doing them honor with thy tears—since me

Law does not sanction! Propping on he breast.
And giving them into their mother's arms,
Reinstituted the sad community.
Which is a mockery, brought to nothingness—
Not by my will! And, when earth hides its dead,
Live in this city!—sad, but, all the same.
Force thy soul to bear woes along with me!
O children, who begat and gave you birth—
Your father—has destroyed you! naught's gain
By those fair deeds of mine I laid you up,
As by main-force I labored glory out.
To give you,—that fine gift of fatherhood!
And thee, too, O my poor one, I destroyed.
Not rendering like for like, as when the kempt:
My marriage-bed inviolate,—those long
Household-seclusions draining to the dregs
Inside my house! O me, my wife, my boys—
And—O myself, how, miserably moved.
Am I disyoked now from both boys and wife!
Oh, bitter those delights of kisses now—
And bitter these my weapons' fellowship!
For I am doubtful whether shall I keep
Or cast away these arrows which will clang
Ever such words out, as they knock my side—
"Us—thou didst murder wife and children with!
Us—child-destroyers—still thou keep'st thine!"
Ha, shall I bear them in my arms, then? What Say for excuse? Yet, naked of my darts
Wherewith I did my bravest, Hellas through.
Throwing myself beneath foot to my foes,
Shall I die basely? No! relinquishment
Of these must never be,—companions once,
We sorrowfully must observe the pact!
In just one thing, co-operate with me
Thy sad friend, Theseus! Go along with him
To Argos, and in concert get arranged
The price my due for bringing there the Horse!
O land of Kadmus, Thbana people all,
Shore off your locks, lament one wide lament.
Go to my children's grave and, in one strain,
Lament the whole of us—my dead and me—
Since all together are foreordained and lost,
Smitten by Here's single stroke of fate!
Then arise up now from thy dead ones!
Tears enough,
Poor friend!
Her. I cannot: for my limbs are fast
Thes. Ay: even these strong men fate overthrows!
Her. Woe!
Here might I grow a stone, nor mind was more!
Thes. Cease! Give thy hand to friendly helpmate now!
Her. Nay, but I wipe off blood upon thy robe!
Thes. Squeez out and spare no drop! I take it all!
Her. Of sons bereaved, I have thee like my soul.
Thes. Give to my neck thy hand! 'tis I will lead.
HERAKLES 675

Her. Yoike - fellows friendly — one heart-
0 father! such a man we need for friend!
Amp. Cartes, the land that bred him boasts good sons!
Her. Turn me round, Theseus — to behold my boys!
Thes. What? will the having such a love-charm soothes?
Her. I want it; and to press my father's breast.
Amp. See here, O son! for, what I love thou seek'st!
Thes. Strange! Of thy labors no more memory?
Her. All those were less than these, those Ille bore!
Thes. Who sees thee grow a woman, — will not praise!
Her. I live low to thee? Not so once, I think!
Thes. Too low by far! "Famed Herakles"
where's he?
Her. Down amid evils, of what kind vast Thes. As far as courage — least of all mankind!

Her. How say'st, then, I in evils shrink to naught?
Thes. Forward!
Her. Farewell, old father!
Amp. Thou too, son!
Her. Bury the boys as I enjoined!
Amp. And me —
Who will be found to bury now, my child?
Her. Myself!
Amp. When, coming?
Her. When thy task is done.
Amp. How?
Her. I will have thee carried forth from Thebes.
To Athens. But bear in the children, earth Is burdened by! Myself, — who with these shames
Have cast away my house, — a ruined hulk,
I follow — trailed by Theseus — on my way;
And whose rather would have wealth and
strength
Than good friends, reasons foolishly therein!
Cho. And we depart, with sorrow at heart,
Sole that increase with tears that start;
The greatest of all our friends of yore
We have lost forevermore!

Moreover, Pallas wields the thunderbolt,
Yet has not struck the artist all this while.
Pheidias and Aischulos? Euripides
And Laches? But youth will have its way!
The ripe man ought to be as old as young —
As young as old. I too have youth at need.
Much may be said for stripping wisdom bare!

"And who's 'our best friend'? You play
kottabos;
Here's the last mode of playing. Take a sphere
With orifices at due interval,
Through topmost one of which, a throw adroit
Sends wine from cup, clean passage, from outside
To where, in hollow midst, a manikin
Suspended ever bobs with head erect
Right underneath whatever hole's a-top
When you set orb a-rolling: plumb, he gets Ever this benediction of the splash.
An other-fashioned orb presents him fixed:
Of all the outlets, he fronts only one,
And only when that one — and rare the
chance —
Comes uppermost, does he turn upward too:
He can't turn all sides with the turning orb.
Inside this sphere of life — all objects, sense
And soul perceives — Euripides hangs fixed,
Gains knowledge through the single aperture
Of High and Right: with visage fronting these
He waits the wine thence ere he operates,
Work in the world and write a tragedy.
When that hole happens to resolve to point,
In drops the knowledge, waiting meets reward.
But, duly in rotation, Low and Wrong
When these enjoy the moment's altitude,
His heals are found just where his head should
be!
No knowledge that way! I am movable,
To slightest shift of orb make prompt response.
Face Low and Wrong and Weak and all the rest,
And still drink knowledge, wine-drenched every turn,
Equally favored by their opposites.
Little and Great exist, are natural:
Then let me know them, and be twice as great
As he who only knows one phase of life!
So doubly shall I prove 'best friend of man,'
If I report the whole truth — Vice, perceived
While he shut eyes to all but Virtue there.
Man's made of both: and both must be of use
To somebody: if not to him, to me.
While, as to your imaginary Third,
Who, — stationed (by mechanics past my guess)
So as to take in every side at once,
And not successively, — may reconcile
The High and Low in tragicomic verse,
He shall be haled superior to us both
When born — in the Tin-lands! Meantime,
here
In bright Atheni, I contest the claim,
Call myself Isestephanos' best friend!
Who took my own course, worked as I descried
Ornament, stuck to my first faculty!

"For, listen! There's no failure breaks the heart,
ARISTOPHANES' APOLOGY

Whate'er be man's endeavor in this world,
Like the rash poet's when he — nowise fails
By poetizing badly, — Zeus or makes
Or mars a man, so — at it, merrily!
But when, — made man, — much like myself,
— equipt
For such and such achievement, — rash he turns
Out of the straight path, bent on snatch of feast
From — who's the appointed fellow born thereof, —
Crowe take him! — in your Kassiterides?
Half-doing his work, leaving mine untouched,
That were the failure! Here I stand, heartwhole,
No Thamuris!

"Well thought of, Thamuris!
Has zeal, pray, for 'best friend' Euripides
Allowed you to observe the honor done
His elder rival, in our Poikile?
You don't know? Once and only once, trod stage,
Sang and touched lyre in person, in his youth,
Our Sophokles, — youth, beauty, dedicate
To Thamuris who named the tragedy.
The voice of him was weak; face, limbs and lyre,
These were worth saving: Thamuris stands yet
Perfect as painting helps in such a case.
At least you know the story, for 'best friend'
Enriched his 'Rhesos' from the Blind Bard's store;
So haste and see the work, and lay to heart
What it was struck me when I eyed the piece!
Here stands a poet punished for rash strife
With Powers above his power, who see with sight
Beyond his vision, sing accordingly
A song, which he must needs dare emulare! Poet, remain the man nor ape the Muse!

"But — lend me the psalterion! Nay, for once —
Once let my hand fall where the other's lay!
I see it, just as I were Sophokles,
That sunrise and combution of the east!"

And then he sang — are these unlike the words?
Thamuris marching, — lyre and song of Thrase — (Perpend the first, the worst of woes that were, Allotted lyre and song, ye poet-race!)
Thamuris from Oichalia, feasted there
By kingly Eurutos of last, now bound
For Dorion at the uprise broad and bare
Of Mount Pangaios (ore with earth enwound Glittered beneath his footstep) — marching gay
And glad, Thessalia through, came, robed and crowned,
From triumph on to triumph, 'mid a ray
Of early morn, — came, saw and knew the spot
Assigned him for his worst of woes, that day.

Balura — happier while its name was not —
Met him, but nowise menaced; alipt aside,
Obsequious river, to pursue its lot
Of solacing the valley — say, some wide
Thick busy human cluster, house and home,
Embarked for peace, or thrift that thanks the tide.

Thamuris, marching, laughed "Each flake of foam"
(As sparkingly the ripple raced him by)
"Mock's slower clouds adrift in the biz dome!"

For Autumn was the season: red the sky
Held morn's conclusive signet of the sun
To break the mists up, bid them blaze and die.

Morn had the mastery as, one by one,
All pompes produced themselves along the tract
From earth's far ending to near heaven began.

Was there a ravaged tree? it laughed compact
With gold, a leaf-ball crisp, high-brandished now,
Tempting to onset frost which late attacked.

Was there a wizen shrub, a staving bough
A fleecey thistle flished from by the wind.
A weed, Pan's trampling hoof would disallow?

Each, with a glory and a rapture twined
About it, joined the rush of air and light
And force: the world was of one joyous mind.

Say not the birds flew! they forebore their right —
Swarm, reveling onward in the roll of things.
Say not the beasts' mirth bounded! that we flight —

How could the creatures leap, no lift of wings?
Such earth's community of purpose, such
The ease of earth's fulfilled imaginings, —

So did the near and far appear to touch
I' the moment's transport, — that an interchange
Of function, far with near, seemed scarce too much;

And had the rooted plant aspired to range
With the snake's license, while the isent yearned
To glow fixed as the flower it were not strange —

No more than if the fluttery tree-top turned
To actual music, sang itself aloft;
Or if the wind, impressed chanted, earned
The right to soar embodied in some soft
Fine form all fit for cloud-companionship.
And, blissful, once touch beauty chased so oft.

Thamuris, marching, let no fancy slip
Born of the fiery transport; lyre and song.
The Last Adventure of Balautus

Were his, to smite with hand and launch from lip—

Peerless recorded, since the list grew long
Of poets (saith Homere) free to stand
Pedestalled 'mid the Muse's temple-throng,

A statuesque service, lanacelled, lyre in hand,
(Ay, for we see them)—Thamusis of Thrace
Predominating foremost of the band.

Therefore the morn-ray that enriched his face,
If it gave lambent chill, took flame again
From flush of pride; he saw, he knew the place.

What wind arrived with all the rhythms from plain,
Hill, dale, and that rough wildwood interspersed?
Compounding these to one consummate strain,

It reached him, music; but his own outburst
Of victory concluded the account,
And that sweet song which was mere music erst.

"Be my Parnassos, thou Pangaiain mount!
And turn thee, river, nameless hitherto!
Famed shalt thou vie with famed Pieria's fount!

Here I await the end of this ado:

Which wins—Earth's poet or the Heavenly Muse.

But song broke up in laughter. "Tell the rest,
Who may! I have not spurned the common life,
Nor vaunted mine a lyre to match the Muse
Who sings for gods, not men! Accordingly,
I shall not decorate her vestibule—
Maste marble, blind the eyes and quenched the brain.
Loose in the hand a bright, a broken lyre—
—Not Thamusis but Aristophanes!

"There! I have sung content back to myself,
And started subject for a play beside.
My next performance shall content you both.
Did 'Prelude-Battle' maul 'best friend' too much?
Then 'Main-Fight' be my next song, fairness' self!

Its subject—Contest for the Tragic Crown.
Ay, you shall hear none else but Aischulos
Lay down the law of Tragedy, and prove
'Best friend' a stray-away, — no praise denied
His manifold deservings, never fear—
Nor word more of the old fun! Death defends!

Sound admonition has its due effect.
Oh, you have uttered weighty words, believe
Such as shall bear abundant fruit, next year,
In judgment, regular, legitimate.
Let Bacchos' self preside in person! Ay—
For there's a buzz about those 'Bacchantes'
Rumor attributes to your great and dead

For final effort: just the prodigy
Great dead men leave, to lay survivors low!
— Until we make acquaintance with our fate
And find, fate's worst done, we, the same, survive

Perchance to honor more the patron-god,
Fittler inaugurates a festal year.
Now that the cloud has broken, sky laughs blue,
Earth blossoms youthfully! Athenai breathe!
After a twenty-six years' wintry blank
Struck from her life,—war-madness, one long swoon,
She wakes up: Arginausai bids good cheer!
We have disposed of Kallikratidas:
Once more will Spartan sue for terms,—who knows?

Cede Dekeleia, as the rumor runs:
Terms which Athenai, of right mind again,
Accepts—she can no other! Peace declared,
Have my long labors borne their fruit or no?
Grinned coarse buffoonery so oft in vain?
Enough,—it simply saved you. Saved ones, praise
Theoria's beauty and Opera's breadth!

Nor, when Peace realizes promised bliss,
Forget the Bald Bard, Envy! but go burst
As the cup goes round, and the cates abound,
Collops of hare, with roast spinks rare!
Confess my pipings, dancings, posings served
A purpose: guttling, guzzling, had their use!
Say whether light Muse, Rosy-finger-tips,
Or, 'best friend's' Heavy-hand, Melpomené,
Touched lyre to purpose, played Amphion's part,
And built Athenai to the skies once more!

Farewell, brave couple! Next year, welcome me!

No doubt, in what he said that night, sincere!
One story he referred to, false or fact,
Was not without aptaptability.
They do say—Laís the Corinthian once
Chancing to see Euripides (who paced
Composing in a garden, tablet-book
In left hand, with appended stulos prompt) —
"Answer me," she began, "O Poet, —this!
What didst intend by writing in thy play,
Go hang, thou filthy doer?" Struck on heap,
Euripides, at the audacious speech—
"Well now," quoth he, "thyself art just the one
I should imagine fit for deeds of filth!"
She laughingly returned his own line
"What's filth,—unless who does it, thinks it so?"

So might he doubtless think. "Farewell," said we.

And he was gone, lost in the morning-gray.
Rose-streaked and gold to eastward. Did we dream?
Could the poor twelve-hours hold this argument?
We render durable from fugitive,
As duly at each sunset's droop of sail,
Delay of oar, submission to sea-might,
I still remember, you as duly dint
Remembrance, with the punctual rapid style,
Into — what calm cold page!

Thus soul escapes
From eloquence made captive: thus mere
word.
— Ah, would the lifeless body stay! But no:
Change upon change till, — who may recognize
What did soul service, in the dusty heap?
What energy of Aristophanes
Infames the wreck Balanauta saves to show?
Ashes be evidence how fire — with smoke —
All night went lamping on! But morn must rise.
The poet — I shall say — burned up and, blank
Smouldered this ash, now white and cold enough.
Nay, Euthukles! for best, though mine it be,
Comes yet! Write on, write ever, wrong no
word!
Add, first, — he gone, if jollity went too,
Some of the graver mood, which mixed and marred,
Departed likewise. Sight of narrow scope
Has this meek consolation: neither ills
We dread, nor joys we dare anticipate,
Perform to promise. Each soul sows a seed —
Euripides and Aristophanes;
Seed bears crop, scarce within our little lives;
But germinates — perhaps enough to judge —
Next year?

Whereas, next year brought harvest-time!
For, next year came, and went not, but is now,
Still now, while you and I are bound for Rhodes
That’s all but reached! — and harvest has it brought,
Dirae as the homicidal dragon-crop!
Sophokles had dismissal are it dwaned.
Happy as ever; though men mournfully
Pleasure, — when only soul could triumph now,
And Iophon produced his father’s play, —
Crowned the consummate song where Odipous
Dared the descent ‘mid earthquake-thundering,
And hardly Theseus’ hands availed to guard
Eyes from the horror, as their grove disregarded
Its dread ones, while each daughter sank to
ground.

Then Aristophanes, on heel of that,
Triumphant also, followed with his “Frogs”
Produced at next Lenais, — three months since, —
The promised Main-Fight, loyal, license-free!
As if the poet, primed with Thasian juice,
(Himself aware — wine that conquers every kind
For long abiding in the head) could fix
Thenceforward any object in its truth,
Through eyeballs bathed by mere Castalian dew,
Nor miss the borrowed medium— vinous drop
That colors all to the right crimson pitch.
When mirth grows mockery, censure takes the tinge
Of malice!

All was Aristophanes:
There blazed the glory, there shot black his
shame!
Ay, Bacchos did stand forth, the Tragic Gid
In person! and when duly dragged through mire, —
Having lied, filched, played fool, proved worst
thing
The boys their dose of fit indolency,
And finally got trounced to heart’s content.
At his own feast, in his own theatre
(Oh, never fear! ’T was consecrated spot
Exact tradition, warranted no whit
Offensive to instructed taste, — indeed,
Essential to Athenis’s liberty,
Could the poor stranger understand!) why,
then —
He was pronounced the rarely-qualified
To rate the work, adjust the claims to worth.
Of Alcibiades (of whom, in other mood,
This same appreciative poet pleased
To say, “He’s all one stiff and guey piece Of back of swine’s-neck!”) — and of Chatter-box
Who, “If existing words like wool,” usurped his seat
In Plouton’s realm: “the arch-rogue, liar, scamp
That lives by matching-up of altar-orts,”
— Who failed to recognize Euripides?
Then came a contest for supremacy —
Crammed full of genius, wit and fun and fust.
No spice of undue spite to spoil the dish
Of all sorts, — for the Mystics matched the Furies
In poetry, no Seiren sang so sweet! —
Till, pressed into the service (how dispense
With Phæae-Elphion and free foot-display?)
The Muse of dead Euripides danced frank;
Rattled her bits of tile, made all too plain
How baby-work like “Herakles” had birth!
Last, Bacchos — candidly proclaiming brains
Able to follow finer argument:
Confessed himself much moved by three main facts:
First, — if you stick a “Lost his flask of oil”
At pace of period, you perplex the sense. —
Were it the Elegy for Marathon!
Next, if you weigh two verses, “cat” — the
word,
Will outweigh “club” — the word, in each packed line!
And — last, worst fact of all! in rivalry
The younger poet dared to improve
Lantation less distinct of — Triphales?
(Nay, that served when ourself abused the youth!)
Phedippides — (nor that’s appropriate now!)
Then, Alkibiades, our city’s hope,
Since times change and we Comies should charge
too!
These three main facts, well weighed, drew judgment down
Conclusively assigned the wretch his fate—
“Fate deo” admonished the sage Mystic choir.
“To sitting, prate-pace, with Sokrates, Neglecting music and each tragic aid!” —
— All wound-up by a wish “We soon may cease
From certain griefs, and warfare, worst of them all!
— Since, deaf to Comedy’s persistent voice,
War still raged, still was like to rage. In vain
Had Sparta cried once more, “But grant us
Peace,
We give you Dekeleia back!” Too shrewd
Was Kleophon to let escape, forsooth,
The enemy — at final gape, besides!

So, Aristophanes obtained the prize,
And so Athenai felt she had a friend
Far better than her “best friend,” lost last year;
And so, such fame had “Frogs” that, when came round
This present year, those Frogs croaked gay again
At the great Feast, Elaphbolion-month.
Only — there happened Aigipotamoi!

And, in the midst of the fro-merriment,
Plump o’ the sudden, pounces stern King Stork
On the light-hearted people of the march!
Spartan Lusandros swooped precipitate,
Killed Athenai, rowed her sacred bay
With oars which brought a hundred triremes back Captive!

And first word of the conqueror
Was “Down with those Long Walls, Peiraios’ pride!” Destroy, yourselves, your bulwarks! Peace needs none!”
And “We obey” they shuddered in their dream.

But, at next quick imposure of decree —
“No longer democratic government!
Henceforth such oligarchy as ourselves
Please to appoint you!” — then the horror-stung:
Dreamers awake; they started up a-stare
At the half-holt captain and his crew —
Spartans, “men used to let their hair grow long,
To fast, be dirty, and just — Sokratize” —
Whose word was “Trample on Themistokles!”

So, as the way is with much misery,
The heads swam, hands refused their office, hearts
Sink as they stood in stupor. “Wreck the Walls?
Rain Peiraios? — with our Pallas armed
For interference? — Herakles apprized,
And Theseus hastening? Lay the Long Walls low?”

Three days they stood, stared, — stouter than their walls.

Whereupon, sleep who might, Lusandros woke:
Saw the prostration of his enemy,
Utter and absolute beyond belief,
For hope of hatred even. I surmise
He slightly blamed saw fade in fame
Certain fears, bred of Baktis-prophecy,
Nor apprehended any more that gods

And heroes, — fire, must glow forth, guard the ground
Where prone, by sober day-dawn, corpse-like lay
Powerless Athenai, late predominant
Lady of Hellas, — Sparta’s slave-prize now!
Where should a menace lurk in those slack limbs?
What was to move his circumspection? Why
Demolish just Peiraios?

“Stay!” bade he:
“Already promise-breakers? True to type,
Athenai! past, and present, and to come, —
The fickle and the false! No stone dislodged,
No implement applied, yet three days’ grace
Expire! Forbearance is no longer-lived.
By breaking promise, terms of peace you break —
Too gently framed for falsehood, fickleness!
All must be reconsidered — yours the fault!”

Wherewith, he called a council of allies,
Pent-up resentment used its privilege, —
Outburst at ending: this the summed result.

Because we would avenge no transient wrong
But an eternity of insolence,
Aggression, — folly, no disasters mend,
Pride, no reverses teach humility, —
Because too plainly were all punishment,
Such as comport with less obdurate crime,
Evidable by falsehood, fickleness —
Experience proves the true Athenian type, — Therefore, ‘t is need we dig deep down into
The root of evil; lop nor bole nor branch.
Look up, look round and see, on every side,
What nurtured the rank tree to noisome fruit!
We who live butted (so they laugh) not housed,
Build barns for temples, prize mud-monuments,
Nor show the sneering stranger aught but men, —
Spartans take insult of Athenians just Because they boast Akropolis to mount,
And Propylaea to make entry by,
Through a mad maze of marble arrogance
Such as you see — such as let none see more!
Abolish the detested luxury!
Leave not one stone upon another, raise Athenai to the rock! Let hill and plain
Become a waste, a greasy pasture-ground
Where sheep may wander, grazing goats depend
From shapeless crags once columns! so at last
Shall peace inhabit there, and peace enough.”

Whereon, a shout approved “Such peace be stow!”

Then did a Man of Phokis rise — O heart!
Rise — when no bolt of Zeus dispersed sky,
No omen-bird from Pallas scared the crew,
Rise — when mere human argument could stem
No foam-fringe of the passion surging fierce,
Baffle no wrath-wave that o’er barrier broke —
Who was the Man of Phokis rose and sung
A flower ’t the way of that fierce foot’s advance.
Which — stop for? — may, had stamped down
sword’s assault!”
Above the slain Aigisthos, bides his blow Dreadful Orestes!

Klatostimnstra, wise
This time, forebore; Elektra held her own;
Saved was Athena through Euripides,
Through Euthukles, through — more than we — me,
Balaustion, me, who, Wild-pomegranate-flow,
Felt my fruit triumph, and fade proudly so!

But next day, as ungracious minds are wont,
The Spartan, late surprised into a grace,
Grew sudden sober at the enormity,
And grudged, by daybreak, midnight’s fig gift;
Splenetically must repay its cost
By due increase of rigor, doglike snatch
At aught still left dog to concede like man.
Rough seas, at flow of tide, may lip, perches.
Smoothly the land-line reached as for repos —
Lie indolent in all unquestioned away;
But ebbing, when needs must, all thwart and loth.
Sea claws at sand relinquished strugglingly.
So, harah Lusandros — pinioned to infirm
The lesser penalty alone — spoke harsh,
As minded to embitter scathe by soorn.

"Athenai’s self be saved then, thank the Lyn!"
If Tragedy withdraws her presence — quick,
If Comedy replace her, — what more just?
Let Comedy do service, frieak away,
Dance off stage these indomitable stones,
Long Walls, Peiraias bulwarks! Hw sa!

Pick at, pound into dust each dear defense!
Not to the Kommos — eilelelu
With breast bethumped, as Tragic lyre prefers.
But Comedy shall sound the flute, and crows.
At kordax-end — the hearty slapping-dance!
Collected these flute-girls — trash who flattened ear
With whistlings, and fed eye with caper-cuts.
While we Lakonians supped black broth or crunched
Sea-urchin, conchs and all, unprickled — cow-brute!
Command they lead off step, time steady stroke
To spare and pickaxe, till demolished lie
Athenai’s pride in powder!"

Done that day—
That sixteenth famed day of Munychion-month:
The day when Hellas fought at Salamis,
The very day Euripides was born,
Those flute-girls — Phaese-Elaphion at their head:
Did blow their best, did dance their worst, the while Sparté pulled down the walls, wreaked wide
The works,
Laid low each meanest molehill of defense.
And so the Power, Athena, passed away!

We would not see its passing! Ere I knew
The issue of their counsels, — crouching low and shrouded by my peplos, — I conceived,

They mix in Arethusa by his grave.
The warm spring, traveller, dip thine arms into.

That he does live, Philemon! Ay, most sure!

'Thodes, — shall it not be there, my Enthukles,

But pen the prime plays, labor the right life,

And die at good old age as grand men use,

'resides now in the little valley, laughed

Keeping thee, with that great thought, warm the while,— and moaned about by those mysterious streams,

May enter gladly, blow what wind there will, —

'felling and freezing, like the love and hate

Boiled round with breakers, to no other cry!'

Which helped or harmed him through his earthly course.

All in one choros, — what the master-word

'They take up? — hark! "There are no gods,

Glory to God — who saves Euripides!''

PRINCE HOHENSTIEL-SCHWANGAU

SAVOIiIR OF SOCIETY

Thus poem, written in Scotland in 1871,

I slew the Hydra, and from labor pass'd

shortly after the downfall of Napoleon III.,

To labor—tribes of labors! Till, at last,

was published in December of the same year.

Attempting one more labor, in a trice,

The suggestion of the emperor is transparent,

Alack, with ill I crowned the edifice.

and Browning writing in January, 1872, to Miss got my little book, and seen for yourself

I am glad you have whether I make the best or the worst of the case. I think, in the main, he meant to do what I say, and, but for weakness—grown —would have done what I say he did not. I thought badly of him at the beginning of his career, et pour cause: better afterward, on the strength of the promises he made, and gave indications of intending to redeem. I think him very weak in the last miserable year. At his worst I prefer him to Thiers's best. I am told my little thing is succeeding — sold 1400 in the first five days, and before any notice appeared." And again, to the same correspondent: "I am glad you like what the editor of the Edinburgh calls my eulogium on the second empire — which it is not, any more than what another wisecracker affirms it to be, 'a scandalous attack on the old constant friend of England!' — it is just what I imagine the man might, if he pleased, say for himself." Mr. Browning's well-known enthusiasm for Napoleon III. as instanced in her poems unquestionably gave distinctness to Browning's own reflections. The motto is from the Heroides Fures of Euripides, vv. 1276-1280, and the translation is presumably by Browning. There is a palace Hohen-Schwangau, built by the Bavarian mad king Ludwig.

PRINCE HOKENSTIEL-SCHWANGAU

You have seen better days, dear? So have I —
And worse too, for they brought no such bud-month
As yours to lisp, "You wish you knew me!"
Well, Wise men, 'tis said, have sometimes wished
the same,
And wished and had their trouble for their pains.
Suppose my Oedipus should luck at last
Under a pork-pie hat and crinoline,
And, latin, pounce on Sphinx in Leicester Square?
Or likelier, what if Sphinx in wise old age,
Grown sick of snapping foolish people's heads,
And jealous for her riddle's proper rede,
Jealous that the good trick which saved the turn
Have justice rendered it, nor class one day
With friend, Home's stilts and tongs and medium-ware,
What if the once redoubted Sphinx, I say,
(Because night draws on, and the sands increase, And desert-whispers grow a prophecy,)
Tell all to Corinth of her own accord,
Bright Corinth, not dull Thebes, for Lais'
saga,
Who finds me hardly gray, and likes my nose,
And thinks a man of sixty at the prime?
Good! It shall be! Revealment of myself! But listen, for we must co-operate;
I don't drink tea: permit me the cigar!
First, how to make the matter plain, of course —
What was the law by which I lived. Let's see:
Ay, we must take one instant of my life
Spent sitting by your side in this neat room:
Watch well the way I use it, and don't laugh! Here's paper on the table, pen and ink:
Give me the soiled bit — not the pretty rose!
See! I having sat an hour, I'm rested now, Therefore want work: and say no better word
For eye and hand and mind that guides them both,
During this instant, than to draw my pen
From blot One — thus — up, up to blot Two — thus —
Which I at last reach, thus, and here's my line
Five inches long and tolerably straight:
Better to draw than leave undrawn, I think,
Fitter to do than let alone, I hold,
Though better, fitter, by but one degree.
Therefore it was that, rather than sit still Simply, my right-hand drew it while my left Pulled smooth and pinched the moustaches to a point.

Now I permit your plump lips to unpurse:
"So far, one possibly may understand.
Without recourse to witchcraft?" True, my dear.
Thus folks begin with Euclid, — finish, how?
Trying to square the circle! — at any rate.
Solving abstruser problems than this first,
"How find the nearest way 'twixt point and point."
Deal but with moral mathematica so —
Master one merest moment's work of mine.
Even this practising with pen and ink, —
Demonstrate why I rather plied the quill
Than left the space a blank, — you gain a fact.
And God knows what a fact's worth! So proceed.
By inference from just this moral fact
—I don't say, to that plaguy quadrature,
"What the whole man meant, whom you wish you knew,"
But, what meant certain things he did of old.
Which puzzled Europe, — why, you'll find them plain,
This way, not otherwise: I guarantee,
Understand one, you comprehend the rest.
Rays from all round converge to any point:
Study the point then ere you track the rays:
The size or 'the circle's nothing; subdivide
Earth, and earth's smallest grain of mustard.
You count as many parts, small matching large.
If you can use the mind's eye: otherwise,
Material optics, being gross at best.
Prefer the large and leave our mind the small—
And pray how many folk have minds can see? Certainly you — and somebody in Thrace, Whose name escapes me at the moment. Yea —
Send me your mind then! Analyze with me
This instance of the line 'twixt blot and blot
I rather chose to draw than leave a blank.
Things else being equal. You are taught thereby
That 't is my nature, when I am at ease,

SAVIOUR OF SOCIETY

Rather than idle out my life too long,
To want to do a thing — to put a thought,
Whether a great thought or a little one,
Into an act, as nearly as may be.

Make what is absolutely new — I can't,
Nor what is a mere repetition well enough
I won't: but turn to best account the thing
That's half-made — that I can. Two blots, you

saw

I knew how to extend into a line
Symmetric on the sheet they blundered before —
Such little act sufficed, this time, such thought.

Now, we'll extend rays, widen out the verge,
Describe a larger circle; leave this first
Clod of an instance we began with, rise
To the complete world many clouds effect.

Only continue patient while I throw,
Delver-like, sapulent after spaceful up,
Just as truths come, the subsoil of me, mould Whereby spring my moods: your object, — just to find,

Alike the handlift and from barrow-load,
What salts and silts constitute the earth —
If it be proper stuff to blow man glass,
Or bake him pottery, bear him oaks or wheat —
What's born of me, in brief; which found,

all's known.

If it were genius did the digging-job,
Logic would speedily sift its product smooth
And leave the crude truths bare for poetry;
But I'm no poet, and am stiff 't the back.

What one spread fails to bring, another may.
In goes the shovel and out comes scoop — as here!

I live to please myself. I recognize
Power passing mine, immeasurable, God —
Above me, whom he made, as heaven beyond
Earth — to use figures which assist our sense.
I know that he is there as I am here,

By the same proof, which seems no proof at all,
It so exceeds familiar forms of proof.

Why "there," not "here"? Because, when

I say "there,"

I treat the feeling with distinction shape
That space exists between us: I, — not he, —

Live, think, do human work here — no machine,
His will moves, but a being by myself,
His, and not he who made me for a work,
Watches my working; judges its effect,
But does not interpose. He did so once,
And probably will again some time — not now,
Life being the minute of mankind, not God's,
In a certain sense, like time before and time
After man's earthly life, so far as man

Needs apprehend the matter. Am I clear?

Suppose I bid a courier take to-night —

(. . . Once for all, let me talk as if I smoked
Yet in the Residenz, a personage:
I must still represent the thing I was,
Galvanically make dead muscle play,
Or how shall I illustrate muscle's use?)
I could then, last July, bid courier take
Message for me, post-haste, a thousand miles.
I bid him, since I have the right to bid,

And, my part done so far, his part begins;
He starts with due equipment, will and power,

Means he may use, misuse, not use at all,
At his discretion, at his peril too.
I leave him to himself: but, journey done,
I count the minutes, call for the result
In quickness and the courier quality.

Weigh its worth, and then punish or reward
According to proved service; not before.
Meanwhile, he sleeps through noontide, rides till
dawn,

Sticks to the straight road, tries the crooked path,
Measures and manages resource, trusts, doubts
Advisers by the wayside, does his best
At his discretion, lags or launches forth,

(He knows and I know) at his peril too.
You see? Exactly thus men stand to God:
With my courier, God with me. Just so
I have his bidding to perform; but mind
And body, all of me, though made and meant
For that sole service, must consult, concert
With my own self and nobody beside,
How to effect the same: God helps not else.
"Tis I who, with my stock, my craft and strength,
Choose the director cut across the hedge,

Or keep the foot-track that respects a crop.
Lie down and rest, rise up and run, — live spare,
Fed free, — all that's my business: but, ar rive,

Deliver message, bring the answer back,
And make my bow, I must: then God will

speak,

Praise me or haply blame as service proves.
To other men, to each and every one,
Another law! what likelier? God, perchance,
Grants each new man, by some as new a mode,
Intercourse with himself,

Wreaking on finiteness infinitude;
By such a series of effects, gives each

Last his own imprint : old yet ever new
This process: 't is the way of Deity.

How it succeeds, his knows: I only know
That varied modes of creaturship abound,
Imposing just as varied intercourse
For each with the creator of them all.

Each has his own mind and no other's mode,
What mode may yours be? I shall sympathize!
No doubt, you, good young lady that you are,

Despite a natural naughtiness or two,

Turn eyes up like a Pradier Magdalen
And see an outspread providential hand
Above the owl's-wing sigarette — guard and guide —

Visibly o'er your path, about your bed,
Through all your practisings with London-town.
It points, you go; it stays fixed, and you stop;
You quicken its procedure by a word

Spoken, a thought in silence, prayer and praise.
Well, I believe that such a hand may stop,

And such appeals to it may stave off harm,

Pacify the grim guardian of this Square,

And stand you in good stead on quarter-day:
Quite possible in your case; not in mine.

"Ah, but I choose to make the difference,

Find the emancipation?" No, I hope!

If I deceive myself, take noon for night,

Please to become determinedly blind
To the true ordinance of human life,

Through mere presumption — that is my affair,
And truly a grave one; but as grave I think
Your affair, yours, the specially observed,—
Each favored person that perceives his path
Pointed him, inch by inch, and looks above
For guidance, through the mazes of this world,
In what we call its meanest life-career
—Not how to manage Europe properly,
But how keep open shop, and yet pay rent,
Rear household, and make both ends meet, the same.
I say, such man is no less tasked than I
To duly take the path appointed him
By whatsoever sign he recognizes.
Our insincerity on both our heads!
No matter what the object of a life,
Small work or large,—the making thrive a shop,
Or seeing that an empire take no harm,—
There are known fruits to judge obedience by.
You've read a ton's weight, now, of newspaper—
Lives of me, gabble about the kind of prince—
You know my work! the rough; I ask you, then,
Do I appear subordinated less
To hand-impulsion, one prime push for all,
Than little lives of men, the multitude
That run out, every quarter of an hour,
For fresh instructions, did or did not work,
And praised in the odd minutes?

Such is the reason why I acquiesced
In doing what seemed best for me to do,
So as to please myself on the great scale,
Having regard to immortality
No less than life—did that which head and heart
Prescribed my hand, in measure with its means
Of doing,—used my special stock of power—
Not from the aforesaid head and heart alone,
But every sort of helpful circumstance,
Some problematic and some nondescript:
All regulated by the single care
Of the last resort—that I made thoroughly serve
The when and how, toiled where was need, reposed
As resolutely at the proper point,
Braved sorrow, courted joy, to just one end:
Namely, that just the creature I was bound
To be, I should become, nor thwart at all God's purpose in creation. I conceive
No other duty possible to man,—
Highest mind, lowest mind,—no other law
By which to judge life failure or success:
What folk call being saved or cast away.

Such was my rule of life; I worked my best,
Subject to ultimate judgment, God's not man's.
Well then, this settled,—take your tea, I beg,
And meditate the fact, 'twixt sip and sip,—
This settled,—why I pleased myself, you saw,
By turning blot and blot into a line,
O! the little scale,—we'll try now (as your tongue Tries the concluding sugar-drop) what 's meant
To please me most o' the great scale. Why, just now,

With nothing else to do within my reach,
Did I prefer making two blots one line
To making yet another separate
Third blot, and leaving those I found unfinished:
It meant, I like to use the thing I find,
Rather than strive at unfound novelty:
I make the best of the old, nor try for new.
Such will to act, such choice of action's way.
Constitute,—when at work on the great scale.
Driven to their farthest natural consequences
By all the help from all the means,—my own
Particular faculty of serving God,
Instinct for putting power to exercise
Upon some wish and want o' the time, I proc
Possible to mankind as best I may.
This constitutes my mission,—grant the phrase,—
Namely, to rule men,—men within my reach.
To order, influence and dispose them so
As render solid and stability
Mankind in particles, the light and loose.
For their good and my pleasure in the act.
Such good accomplishes proves twice good to me—
Good for its own sake, as the just and right.
And, in the effecting also, good again
To me its agent, tasked as suits my taste.
Is this much easy to be understood
At first glance? Now begin the steady gas!

My rank—(if I must tell you simple truth—
Telling were else not worth the whiff o' de
I lose for the tale's sake)—dear, my nab the world
Is hard to know and name precisely: err
I may, but scarcely overestimate
My style and title. Do I class with men
Most useful to their fellows? Possibly, —
Therefore, in some sort, best; but, greatest mind
And rarest nature? Evidently no.
A conservator, call me, if you please,
Not a creator nor destroyer: one
Who keeps the world safe. I profess to trace
The broken circle of society,
Dim actual order, I can redescribe
Not only where some segment silver-true
Stays clear, but where the breaks of that Come commence
Baffling you all who want the eye to probe
As I make out you problematic thin
White paring of your thumb-nail outside then.
Above the plaster-monarch on his steed—
See an inch, name an ell, and prophecy
O' the rest that ought to follow, the round
Moon
Now hiding in the night of things: that rose
I labor to demonstrate moon enough
For the month's purpose,—that society,
Rendred deficient for the age's need:
Preserving you in either case the old,
Nor aiming at a new and greater thing.
A sun for moon, a future to be made
By first abolishing the present law:
No such proud task for me by any means!
History shows you men whose master-tech
Not so much modifies as makes anew:
Minds that transmute the commonplace at all.
A breath of God made manifest in flesh
Subjects the world to change, from time to time,
Alters the whole conditions of our race
Abruptly, not by unperceived degrees
Nor play of elements already there.
But quite new leaven, leavening the lump,
And like so, the natural process. See!
Where winter reigned for ages — by a turn
T’ the time, some star-change, (ask geologists,)
The ice-tracts split, clash, splinter and disperse,
And there’s an end of immobility,
Silence, and all that tinted pageant, base
To pinnacle, one flush from fairy-land
Dead-sleep and deserted somewhere, — see! —
As a fresh sun, wave, spring and joy outburst.
Or else the earth it is, that starts from trance,
Her mountains tremble into fire, her plains
Heaved blinded by confusion: what result?
New teeming growth, surprises of strange life
Impossible before, a world broke up
And re-made, order gained by law destroyed.
Not otherwise, in our society
Follow like portents, all as absolute
Regenerations: they have birth at rare
Uncertain unexpected intervals
O’ the world, by ministry impossible
Before and after fulness of the days:
Some other fresh descente nor need restore
Lawnyer, lyrist, — oh, we know the names!
Quite other these than I. Our time requires
No such strange potentate, — who else would dawn,
No fresh force till the old have spent itself.
Such seems the natural economy.
To shoot a beam into the dark, assists:
To make that beam do fuller service, spread
And utilize such bounty to the height,
That assists also, — and that work is mine.
I profess contempt, and approve
The general compact of society,
Not simply as I see effectd good,
But good? the germ, each chance that’s possible?
I’ the plan traced so far: all results, in short,
For better or worse of the operation due
To those exceptional natures, unlike mine,
Who, helping, thwarting, conscious, unaware,
Did somehow manage to so far describe
This diagram left ready to my hand,
Waiting my turn of trial. I see success,
See failure, see what makes or mars through-out.
How shall I else but help complete this plan
Of which I know the purpose and approve,
By letting stay therein what seems to stand,
And adding good thereo to of easier reach
To-day than yesterday?

So much, no more!
Whereon, “No more than that?” — inquire
My critics.
Half of my critics: “nothing new at all?
The old plan saved, instead of a sponged slate
And fresh-drawn figure?” — while, “So much as that?”

Object their fellows of the other faith:
“I leave unfauced the crazy labyrinth
Of alteration and amendment, lines
Which every dabster felt in duty bound
To signalize his power of pen and ink
By adding to a plan once plain enough?
Why keep each fool’s bequeathment, scratch
And blur
Which oversrawl and underscores the piece —
Nay, strengthen them by touches of your own?”

Well, that’s my mission, so I serve the world,
Figure as man o’ the moment, — in default
Of somebody inspired to strike such change
Into society — from round to square,
The ellipse to the rhomboid, how you please,
As suits the size and shape o’ the world he finds
But this I can, — and nobody my peer, —
Do the best with the least change possible:
Carry the incompleteness on, a stage,
Make what was crooked straight, and roughness smooth,
And weakness strong: wherein if I succeed,
It will not prove the worst achievement, sure,
In the eyes at least of one man, one I look
Nowise to catch in critic company:
To wit, the man inspired, the genius’ self
Destined to come and change things thoroughly.
He, at least, finds his business simplified,
Distinguishes the done from undone, reads
Plainly what meant and did not mean this time
We live in, and I work on, and transmit
To such successor: he will operate
On good hard substance, not mere shade and shine.
Let all my critics, born to idleness
And impotency, get their good, and have
Their hooting at the giver: I am deaf —
Who find great good in this society,
Great gain, the purchase of great labor. Touch
The work I may and must, but — reverent
In every fall o’ the finger-tip, no doubt.
Perhaps I find all good there’s warrant for
’I the world as yet: nay, to the end of time,
Since evil never means part company
With mankind, only shift side and change shape.
I find advance i’ the main, and notably
The Present an improvement on the Past,
And promise for the Future — which shall prove
Only the Present with its rough made smooth,
Its indistinctness emphasized; I hope
No better, nothing newer for mankind,
But something equally smoothed everywhere,
Good, reconciled with hardly-quite-as-good,
Instead of good and bad each jostling each.
“And that’s all?” — Ay, and quite enough for me!
We have toiled so long to gain what gain I find
I’ the Present, — let us keep it! We shall toil
So long before we gain — if gain God grant —
A Future with one touch of difference
I’ the heart of things, and not their outside face, —
Let us not risk the whiff of my cigar
For Fourier, Comte, and all that ends in smoke!

This is clearest probably of men
With power to act and influence, now alive:
Juder than they to the true state of things;
In consequence, more tolerant that, side
By side, shall co-exist and thrive alike
In the age, the various sorts of happiness
Moral, mark! — not material — moods o' the mind
Suited to man and man his opposite:
Say, minor modes of movement — hence to them,
Or thence to here, or simply round about —
So long as each too spares its neighbor's kike,
Nor spoils the major march and main advance.
The love of peace, care for the family,
Contentment with what's bad but might be worse —
Good movements these! and good, too, disc.
So long as that spurs good, which might be best,
Into becoming better, anyhow:
Good health, pride of country, putting heart and home
I' the background, out of undue prominence:
Good — yearning after change, strife, victory,
And triumph. Each shall have its orbit marked,
But no more, none impede the other's path
In this wide world, — through each and all alike,
Save for me, fame would spread itself through space
And leave its fellow not an inch of way.
I rule and regulate the course, excite,
Restrain: because the whole machine should march
Impelled by those diversely-moving parts,
Each blind to aught beside its little bent,
Outward turnings round and round inside,
Comes that straightforward world-advance, I want,
And none of them supposes God wants too
And gets through just their hindrance and my help.
I think that to have held the balance straight
For twenty years, say, weighing claim and claim
And giving each its due, no less more more,
This was good service to humanity,
Right usage of my power in head and heart,
And reasonable piety beside,
Keep those three points in mind while judging me!
You stand, perhaps, for some one man, not men,
Represent this or the other interest,
Nor mind the general welfare, — so, impugn
My practice and dispute my value: why?
You man of faith, I did not tread the world
Into a paste, and thereof make a smooth
Uniform round wherein to plant your flag,
The lily-white, above the blood and brains!
Nor yet did I, you man of faithlessness,
So roll things to the level which you love,

That you could stand at ease there and sure
The universal Nothing undisgraced
By pert intrusion of some old church-gripe
I' the distance! Neither friend would I entreat,

Nor, as the world were simply meant for him
Thrust out his fellow and mend God's misfit
Why, you two fools, — my dear friends all the same,

Is it some change o' the world and nothing does Contents you? Should whatever was, not be?
How thanklessly you view things! There's the root
Of the evil, source of the entire mistake:
You see no worth i' the world, nature and art.
Unless we change what is to what may be.
Which means, — may be, i' the brain of one don't you?

"Reject what is?" — all capabilities —
Nay, you may style them chances if ye choose —
All chances, then, of happiness that lie
Open to anybody that is born,
Tumbles into this life and out again, —
All that may happen, good and evil too, i' the space between, to each adventurer
Upon this 'sixty, Anno Domini:
A life to live — and such a life! a world
To learn, one's lifetime in, — and such a world!
How did the foolish ever pass for wise
By calling life a burden, man a fly
Or worm or what 's most insignificant?
"O littleness of man!") depletes the hard;
And then, for fear the Powers should pass him,

"O grandeur of the visible universe
Our human littleness contrasts withal!
O sun, O moon, ye mountains and thou sea.
Thou emblem of immensity, thou this,
That and the other, — what impertinence
In man to eat and drink and walk about
And have his little notions of his own,
The while some wave sheds foam upon the shore!"

First of all, 't is a lie some three-times thick:
The bard, — this sort of speech being poetry.
The bard puts mankind well outside himself
And then begins instructing them: "This way
I and my friend the sea conceive of you!
What would you give to think such thoughts
As ours
Of you and the sea together?" Down they draw
On the humble knees of them: at once they draw

Distinction, recognize no mate of theirs
In one, despite his mock humility,
So plain a match for what he plays with. Not
The turn of the great ocean-playfellow.
When the bard, leaving Bond Street very far
From ear-shot, cares not to ventriloquise,
But tells the sea its home-truths: "You, my match?
You, all this terror and immensity
And what not? Shall I tell you what you are?
Just fit to hitch into a stanza, so
Wake up and set in motion who's asleep
O' the other side of you in England, else
Saviour of Society

Lead to the centre equally, red lines
Or black lines, so they but produce themselves—
This, I do say, and here my sermon ends,—
This makes it worth our while to tenderly Handle a state of things which mend we might,
Mar we may, but which meanwhile helps so far.
Therefore my end is—save society!

"And that's all?" twangs the never-failing taunt
O' the foe—"No novelty, creativeness,
Mark of the master that renews the age?"
"Nay, all that?" rather will demur my judge
I look to hear some day, nor friend nor foe—
"Did you attain, then, to perceive that God Knew what he undertook when he made things?"
Ay: that my task was to co-operate
Rather than play the rival, chop and change
The order whence comes all the good we know,
With this,—good's last expression to our sense,—
That there's a further good conceivable
Beyond the utmost earth can realize:
And, therefore, that to change the agency
The evil whereby good is brought about—
Try to make good do good as evil does—
Were just as if a chemist, wanting white,
And knowing black ingredients bred the dye,
Insisted these too should be white forsooth!
Correct the evil, mitigate your best,
Blend mild with harsh, and soften black to gray
If gray may follow with no detriment
To the eventual perfect purity!
But as for hazarding the main result
By hoping to anticipate one's self
In the intermediate process,—no, my friends!—
This bad world, I experience and approve;
Your good world,—with no pity, courage, hope,
Fear, sorrow, joy,—devotedness, in short,
Which I account the ultimate man
Of which there's not one day nor hour but brings,
In flower or fruit, some sample of success,
Out of this same society I save
None of it for me! That I might have none,
I rapped your tampering knuckles twenty years.
Such was the task imposed me, such my end.

Now for the means thereto. Ah, confidence—
Keep we together or part company?
This is the critical minute! "Such my end?"
Certainly; how could it be otherwise?
Can there be question which was the right task—
To save or to destroy society?
Why, even prove that, by some miracle,
Destruction were the proper work to choose,
And that a torch best remedies what's wrong?
I? the temple, whence the long procession wound
Of powers and beauties, earth's achievements all,
The human strength that strove and overthrew,—
The human love that, weak itself, crowned strength.—
The instinct crying, "God is whence I came!"—
The reason laying down the law, "And such His will? the world must be!"—the leap and shout
Of genius, "For I hold his very thoughts,
The meaning of the mind of him!"—nay, more
The ingenuities, each active force
That turning in a circle on itself
Looks neither up nor down but keeps the spot,
Mere creature-like and, for religion, works,
Works only and works ever, makes and shapes
And changes, still wrings more of good from less.

Still stamps some bad out, where was worst before,
So leaves the handiwork, the act and deed,
Were it but house and land and wealth, to show
Here was a creature perfect in the kind —
Whether a bee, beaver, or behemoth,
What's the importance? he has done his work
For work's sake, worked well, earned a creature's praise;—
I say, concede that same fame, whence deploys
Age after age, all this humanity,
Diverse but ever dear, out of the dark
Behind the altar into the broad day
By the portal — enter, and, concede there mocks
Each lover of free motion and much space
A perplexed length of apse and aisle and na—
— Pillared roof and carved screen, and what care I?—
Which irk the movement and impede the march,—
Nay, possibly, bring flat upon his nose
At some odd breakneck angle, by some freak
Of old-world artistry, that personage
Who, could he but have kept his skirts from grief
And catching at the hooks and crooks about,
Had stepped out on the daylight of our time
Plainly the man of the age, — still, still, I bar
Excessive conflagration in the case.
"Shake the flame freely!" shout the multitude:
The architect approves I stuck my torch
Inside a good stout lantern, hung its light
Above the hooks and crooks, and ended so.
To save society was well: the means
Whereby to save it, — there begins the doubt
Permitted you, imperative on me;
Were mine the best means? Did I work aright
With powers appointed me? — since powers denied
Concern me nothing.

Well, my work reviewed
Fairly, leaves more hope than discouragement.
First, there's the deed done: what I found, I leave,—
What tottered, I kept stable: if it stand
One month, without sustinment, still thank me

The twenty years' sustainer! Now, observe,
Sustaining is no brilliant self-display
Like knocking down or even setting up:
Much bustle these necessitate; and still
To vulgar eye, the mightier of the myth
Is Hercules, who substitutes his own
For Atlas' shoulder and supports the globe
A whole day,—not the passive and obscure
Atlas who bore, are Hercules was born,
And is to go on bearing that same load
When Hercules turns ash on Óta's top.
'T is the transition-stage, the tug and strain,
That strike men: standing still is stupid-like.
My pressure was too constant on the whole
For any part's eruption into space
'Mid sparks, cracks, and much praise

I saw that, in the ordinary life,
Many of the little make a mass of men
Important beyond greatness here and there;
As certainly as, in life exceptional,
When old things terminate and new commence
A solitie man's worth the world;
God takes the business into his own hands
At such time: who creates the novel flower
Contrives to guard and give it breathing-room:
I merely tend the cornfield, care for crop,
And weed no acre thin to let emerge
What prodigy may stifle there perchance;
— No, though my eye have noted where lurks.
Oh those mute myriads that spoke loud to me—
The eyes that craved to see the light, the months
That sought the daily bread and nothing more
The hands that supplicated exercise,
Men that had wives, and women that had babies:
And all these making suit to only live!
Was I to turn aside from husbandry,
Leave hope of harvest for the corn, my care.
To play at horticulture, rear some rose
Or poppy into perfect leaf and bloom
When, 'mid the furrows, up was pleased to sprout
Some man, cause, system, special interest
I ought to study, stop the world meanwhile?
"But I am Liberty, Philanthropy,
Enlightenment, or Patriotism, the power
Whereby you are to stand or fall!" cries each
"Mine and mine only be the flag you flaunt!"
And, when I venture to object, "Meantime,
What of you myriads with no flag at all —
My crop which, who flaunts flag must tread across?"
"Now, this it is to have a puny mind!"
Admirè my mental prodigies: "down—
Ever at home o' the level and the low,
There bides he brooding! Could he look above,
With less of the owl and more of the eagle eye.
He'd see there's no way helps the little cause
Like the attainment of the great. Dare first
The chief emprise; dispel you cloud between
The sun and us; nor fear that, though our heads
Find earlier warmth and comfort from his ray.
What lies about our feet, the multitude,

'ow many years, o' the average, do men live in this world? Some score, say computists.

't unwind me that term and give mankind he likely hundred, and with all my heart
'll take your task upon me, work your way, accentuate energy on some one cause: ace, counsellor, I also have my cause, y flag, my faith in its effect, my hope its eventual triumph for the good the world. And once upon a time, when I 'as like all you, mere voice and nothing more, yself took wings, soared sunward, and thence sang,

'Look where I live i' the loft, come up to me, roundlings, nor grovel longer! gain this height, and prove you breathe here better than below! Thy, what emancipation far and wide will follow in a trice! They too can soar, each tenant of the earth's circumference claiming to elevate humanity, they also must attain such altitude, live in the luminous circle that surrounds

The planet, not the leaden orb itself.

'Press out, each point, from surface to you verge Which one has gained and guaranteed your realm!"

'Ay, still my fragments wander, music-fragmented, Sighs of the soul, mine once, mine now, and mine

'Forever! Crumbled arch, crushed aqueduct. Alive with tremors in the shadow growth Of wild-wood, overgrown-sown, that triumphs there Imparting exultation to the hills!

'Sweep of the swathe when only the winds walk

And waft my words above the grassy sea Under the binding blue that basks o'er

'Hear ye not still — "Be Italy again"? And ye, what strikes the panic to your heart?

'Decrepit council-chambers, — where some lamp Drives the unbroken black three paces off From where the grayboards huddle in debate, Dun cowls and capes, and midstmost glimmers one

'Like tarnished gold, and what they say is done, And what they think is fear, and what suspends The breath in them is not the plaster-patch Tissue disengages from the painted wall;

'Where Rafael moulderingly bids adieu, Nor tick of the insect turning tapestry Which a queen's finger troosed of old, to dust; But some word, resonant, redoubtable, Of who once felt upon his head a hand Whereof the head now apprehends his foot.

'"Light in Rome, Law in Rome, and Liberty O' the soul in Rome — the free Church, the free State!

'Stamp out the nature that 'a best typified By its embodiment in Peter's Dome, The scorpion-body with the greedy pair Of outstretched nippers, either colonnade Agape for the advance of heads and hearts!"

'There 's one cause for you! one and only one,

'For I am vocal through the universe, I the workshop, manufactury, exchange And market-place, seaport and custom-house

'O' the frontier: listen if the echoes die —

'"Unfettered commerce! Power to speak and hear,

'And print and read! The universal vote! Its rights for labor!" This, with much beside, I spoke when I was voice and nothing more, But altogether such an one as you

'My censors. "Voice, and nothing more, indeed!"

'Re-echoes round me: "that's the censure, there's"

'Involved the ruin of you soon or late!

'Voice, — when its promise beat the empty air: And nothing more, — when solid earth's your stage,

'And we desiderate performance, deed

'For word, the realizing all you dreamed

'In the old days: now, for deed, we find at door O' the council-chamber posted, mute as mouse, Hohenstiel-Schwangau, sentry and safeguard O' the grayboards all a-chuckle, owl to cape, Who challenge Judas, — that's endearment's style,
To stop their mouths or let escape grimace,
While they keep cursing Italy and him.
The power to speak, hear, print and read is ours?
Ay, we learn where and how, when clapped inside
A convict-transport bound for cool Cayenne!
The universal vote we have; its use,
We also have where votes drop, fingered-‘o’er
By the universal Prefect. Say, Trade’s free
And Toil turned master out o’ the slave it was:
What then? These feed man’s stomach, but
His soul
Craves finer fare, nor lives by bread alone,
As somebody says somewhere. Hence you stand
Proved and recorded either false or weak,
Faulty in promise or performance: which p’r
Neither, I hope. Once pedelled on earth,
To act not speak, I found earth was not air.
I saw that multitude of mine, and not
The nakedness and nullity of air
Fit only for a voice to float in free.
Such eyes I saw that craved the light alone,
Such months that wanted bread and nothing else.
Such hands that supplicated handiwork,
Men with the wives, and women with the babes,
Yet all these pleading just to live, not die!
Did I believe one whit less in belief,
Tak’ in truth or falsehood, wish the voice revok’d
That told the truth to heaven for earth to hear?
No, this should be, and shall; but when and how?
At what expense to those who average
Your twenty years of life, my contemporaries?
"Not bread alone," but bread before all else
For these: the bodily want serve first, said I;
If earth-space and the lifetime help not here,
Where is the good of body having been?
But, helping body, if we somewhat balk
The enjoyment there, such food’s to find
Elsewhere and afterward— all indicates,
Even this selfsame fact that soul can starve
Yet body still exist its twenty years:
While, stint the body, there’s an end at once
O’ the revel in the fancy that Rome’s free,
And superstition’s fettered, and one prints
What’er one pleases, and who pleases reads
The same, and speaks out and is spoken to,
And divers hundred thousand fools may vote
A vote untampered with by one wise man,
And so elect Barabbas deputy
In lieu of his concurrent. I who trace
The purpose written on the face of things,
For my behoof and guidance— (whose needs
No such sustenance, see beneath my signs,
Proves, what I take for writing, pennmanship,
Scribbles not flourish with no sense for me
O’ the sort I solemnly go spelling out, —
Let him! there’s certain work of mine to show
Alongside his work: which gives warranty
Of shrewder vision in the workman— judge I!
I who trace Providence without a break
I’ the plan of things, drop plumb on this plain Print
Of an intention with a view to good,

That man is made in sympathy with man
At outset of existence, so to speak;
But in dissociation, more and more.
Man from his fellow, as their lives advance
In culture; still humanity, that’s born
A mass, keeps flying off, flying away
Ever into a multitude of points,
And ends in isolation, each from each:
Peerless above i’ the sky, the pinnacle,—
Absolute contact, fusion, all below
At the base of being. How comes this able?
This stamp of God characterizing man
And nothing else but man in the universe—
That, while he feels with man (to use man’s speech)
I’ the little things of life, its fleshly wants
Of food and rest and health and happiness.
Its simplest spirit-motions, loves and hates.
Hopes, fears, soul-crawlings on the ignoble streak.
O’ the fellow ‘r creature, owns the base at base,—
He tends to freedom and divergence,
In the upward progress, plays the pinnacle
When life’s at greatest (grant again the base)
Because there’s neither great nor small is bid
“Consult thou for thy kind that have the eyes
To see, the mouths to eat, the hands to work.
Men with the wives, and women with the babes!”
Prompts Nature. “Care thou for thyself else
I’ the conduct of the mind God made thee wise?
Think, as if man had never thought before!
Act, as if all creation hung attend
On the acting of such faculty as thine,
To take prime pattern from thy masterpiece!”
Nature prompts also: neither law obeyed
To the uttermost by any heart and soul
We know or have in record: both of these Acknowledged blindly by whatever man
We ever knew or heard of in this world.
“Will you have why and wherefore, and the made plain as piketaff?” modern Science asks
“Such man sprung from was a jelly-bump
Once on a time; he kept an after-course
Through fish and insect, reptile, bird and beast.
Till he attained to be an ape at last
Or last but one. And if this doctrine shock
In aught the natural pride.” . . . Friend, barish fear.
The natural humility replies.
Do you suppose, even I, poor potentate,
Hohenstiel—Schwangau, who once ruled the roast,—
I was born able at all points to play
My tools? or did I have to learn my trade,
Practise as exile ere perform as prince?
The world knows something of my ups and downs,
But grant me time, give me the management
And manufacture of a model me,
Me fifty-fold, a prince without a flaw,—
Why, there’s no social grade, the north west.
My amethyst potentiates should blink and keep
King, all the better he was cobbler once.
He should know, sitting on the throne; how tastes
SAVIOUR OF SOCIETY

life to who sweeps the doorway. But life's hard, occasion rare; you out probation short,
and, being half-instructed, on the stage
on shuffle through your part as best you can,
and bless your stars, as I do. God takes time.
like the thought he should have lodged me
'the hole, the cove, the hut, the tenement, the mansion and the palace; made me learn he feel o' the first, before I found myself
cottier i' the last, not more emancipate;
rom first to last of lodging, I was I,
and not at all the place that harbored me.
I refuse to follow farther yet
'the backwardness, repine if tree and flower, fruiten or streamlet were my dwelling-place before I gained enlargement, grew moluscous?
so well to make that way for many a thrill of kinship, I confess to, with the powers altered Nature: animate, inanimate, parts or in the whole, there's something there far-like that somehow meets the man in me.
ly goes altogether with the heart of the Psalmist, that old despairer, when he stayed his march to conquest of the world, a day
'desert, for the sake of one superfluous tree, which quenched it there in solitude:
living her neck its necklace, and each arm
an armlet, sitting soft waist, snowy side, Fist cincture and apparel. Yes, I lodged these some one or another tenement; perchance was flat or in the straightness of them while I stretch and enjoy new liberty the more.
and some abodes are lost or ruinous;
the patched-up and pieced-out, and so trans-retorted
they still accommodate the traveller his day of lifetime. Oh, you count the links, how many of the broken man?
—and who welds a lump of ore, suppose is liken to make a chaos and not a bar.
reach by link on link, link small, link large,
'to the due length — why, there's forethought still inside o' the series, forging at one end, while at the other there is — no matter what he kind of crass or thing, he everlast that last link had last but one or parent, and no link was, first of all,
left to anvil, hammered into shape.
I, I accept the doctrine, and deduce
his duty, that I recognize mankind,
a man size, height and depth and length and breadth.
likewise the main have little wants, not large:
being of will and power to help, i' the main, likewise, must help the least wants first. My
friend,
that is, my foes, without such power and will,
lay pleasantly concentrate all he wields,
and do his best at helping some large want,
such as noble cause, that's seen soate enough from where I stand, is he helps. I helped once, when like himself, able to help better, work more wide;
and so would work with heart and hand to-day,
'do only compacts confess a fault,
And multiply the single score by five,
Five only, give man's life its hundred years.

Change life, in me shall follow change to match!
Time were then, to work here, there, everywhere.
By turns and try experiment at ease!
Full time to mend as well as mar: why wait
The slow and sober uprise all around;
O' the building? Let us run up, right to roof,
Some sudden marvel, piece of perfectness,
And testify what we intend the whole!
Is the world losing patience? "Wait!" say we:
"There's time: no generation needs to die
Unslated; you've a century in store!"
But, no; I sadly let the voices wing,
Their way i' the upper vacancy, nor test
Truth on this solid as I promised once,
Well, and what is there to be said about?
The world's the world, life's life, and nothing else.
'Tis part of life, a property to prize,
That those o' the higher sort engaged i' the world,
Should fancy they can change its ill to good,
Wrong to right, ugliness to beauty: find
Enough success in fancy turning fact,
To keep the sanguine kind in countenance
And justify the hope that basies them:
Failure enough, — to who can follow change
Beyond their vision, see new good prove ill
The consequence, see blacks and whites of life
Shift square indeed, but leave the checkered face
Unchanged i' the main, — failure enough for such,
To bid ambition keep the whole from change,
As their best service. I hope naught beside.
No, my brave think o' whom I recognize,
Gladly, myself the first, as, in a sense,
All that our world's worth, flower and fruit of man!
Such minds myself award supremacy
Over the common insignificance,
When only Mind's in question, — Body bows
To quite another government, you know.
Be Kant crowned king o' the castle in the air!
Hans Slouch — his own, and children's mouths
To feed
I' the box on the ground — wants meat, nor chews
"The Critique of Pure Reason" in exchange.
But, now, — suppose I could allow your claims
And quite change life to please you, — would it
Please?
Would life comport with change and still be life?
Ask, now, a doctor for a remedy:
There's his prescription. Bid him point you out
Which of the five or six ingredients saves
The sick man. "Such the efficacy?"
Then why not dare and do things in one dose
Simple and pure, all virtue, no alloy
Of the idle drop and powder?" What's his word?
The efficacy, neat, were neutralized:
It wants dispensing and retarding, — nay,
Is put upon its mettle, plays its part
Precisely through such hindrance everywhere,
Finds some mysterious give and take i' the case,
Some gain by opposition, he foresees
Should he unfetter the medicament,
So with this thought of yours that pain would work
Free in the world: it wants just what it finds —
The ignorance, stupidity, the hate,
Envy and malice and uncharitableness
That bar your passage, break the flow of you
Down from those happy heights where many a cloud
Combined to give you birth and bid you be
The royalties of rivers: on you slide
Silverly till you reach the summit-edge,
Then over, on to all that ignorance,
Stupidity, hate, envy, bluffs and blocks,
Posted to fret you into foam and noise.
What of it? Up you mount in minute mist,
And bridge the chasm that crushed your quietude,
A spirit-rainbow, earthen jewelry
Outsparkling the insipid firmament
Blue above Terni and its orange-trees.
Do not mistake me! You, too, have your rights!
Hans must not burn Kant’s house above his head
Because he cannot understand Kant’s book:
And still less must Hans’ pastor burn Kant’s self
Because Kant understands some books too well.
But, justice seen to on this little point,
Answer me, is it manly, is it sage
To stop and struggle with arrangements here
It took many lives, so much of toil,
To tinker up into efficiency?
Can’t you contrive to operate at once, —
Since time is short and art is long, — to show
Your quality in the world, what’ser you boast,
Without this fractional call on folks to crush
The world together just to set you free,
Admire the capers you will cut perchance,
Nor mind the mischief to your neighbors?

With neither sons nor serpents to denote
The purpose of his gesture. Then a crowd
Was called to try the question, criticize
Wherefore such energy of legs and arms,
Nay, eyeballs, starting from the socket. One —
I give him leave to write my history —
Only one said, “I think the gesture strives Against some obstacle we cannot see.”
All the rest made their minds up. “Tis yawn
Of sheer fatigue subsiding to repose:
The statue’s ‘Somnolency’ clear enough!”

There, my arch stranger-friend, my andiesse both
And arbitrress, you have one half your wish.
At least: you know the thing I tried to do!
All, so far, to my praise and glory — all
Told as befits the self-apologist,
Who ever promises a candid sweep
And clearance of those errors miscalled crimes
None knows more, none laments so much as he.
And ever rises from confession, proved
A god whose fault was — trying to be man.
Just so, fair judge, — if I read smite aright —
I condescend to figure in your eyes
As biggest heart and best of Europe’s friends.
And hence my failure. God will estimate
Success one day; and, in the mean time — yes!
I dare say those 's some fancy of the sort Frolicking round this final puff I send
To die up yonder in the ceiling-rose, —
Some consolation-stakes, we losers win!
A plague of the return to “I — I — I Did this, meant that, hoped, feared the other thing!”
Autobiography, adieu! The rest
Shall make amends, be pure blame, history
And falsehood: not the ineffective truth,
Hear what? I never was, but might have been
I the better world where goes tobacco-smoke!
Here lie the dozen volumes of my life:
(Do I say “lie”? the pregnant word will serve.)
Cut on to the concluding chapter, though!
Because the little hours begin to strike.
Hurry Thiess-Hugo to the labor’s end!

Something like this the unwritten chapter reads.

Exemplify the situation thus!
Hohenstiel-Schwangau, being, no dispute,
Absolute mistress, chose the Assembly, first,
To serve her: chose this man, its President.
Afterward, to serve also, especially
To see that folk did service one and all.
And now the proper term of years was out,
When the Head-servant must vacate his place;
And nothing lay so patent to the world
As that his fellow-servants one and all
Were — mildly to make mention — knaves or fools.
Each of them with his promise flourished full
I the face of you by word and impudence.
Or filtered alway out by nod and wink.
And nudge upon your sympathetic rib—
That not one minute more did knave or fool
Mean to keep faith and serve as he had sworn Hohenstiel-Schwangau, once her Head away.
Why should such swear except to get the chance,
When time should ripen and confusion bloom,
Or singing Hohenstiel's hymn in praise
To the true use of human property—
Restoring souls and bodies, this to Pope,
And that to King, that other to his planned
Perfection of a Share-and-share-alike,
That other still, to Empire absolute
In shape of the Head-servant's very self Transformed to Master whole and sole? each scheme
Discernible, conceals one circumstance—
That each scheme's parent were, beside himself,
Hohenstiel-Schwangau, not her serving-man
Sworn to do service in the way she chose
Rather than his way: way superlativ,
Only,—by some infatuation,—his
And his and his and every one's but hers
Who stuck to just the assembly and the Head,
I make no doubt the Head, too, had his dream
Of doing sudden duty swift and sure
On all that heap of untrustworthiness—
Catching each vaunter of the villany
He meant to perpetrate when time was ripe,
Once the Hohenstiel was fairly out of doors,—
And, caring here a knave and there a fool
Cry: "Mistress of your servants, these and me,
Hohenstiel-Schwangau! I, your trusty Head,
Pounce on a pretty scheme concocting here
That's stopped, extinguished by my vigilance.
You none of you safe again! but mark!
Safe in these hands, not yours, who lavish trust
Too lightly. Leave my hands their charge awhile!
I know your business better than yourself:
Let me alone about it! Some fine day,
Once we are rid of the embarrassment,
You shall look up and see your longings crowned!"
Such fancy might have tempted him to be false,
But this man chose truth and was wiser so.
He recognized that for great minds 'tis the world
There is no trial like the appropriate one
Of leaving little minds their liberty
Of littleness to blunder on through life,
Now aiming at right ends by foolish means,
No, now, at absurd achievement through the aid
Of good and wise endeavor—to acquiesce
In folly's life-long privilege, though with power
To do the little minds the good they need,
Despite themselves, by just abolishing
Their right to play the part and fill the place
I 'm the scheme of things He schemed who made alike
Great minds and little minds, saw use for each.
Could the orb sweep those puny particles
It just half-light's at distance, hardly leads
I 'm the cloud—sweep out each speck of them from space
They anticise in with their days and nights
And whirlings round and dancings off, forsooth,
And all that fruitless individual life
One cannot lend a beam to but they spoil—
Sweep them into itself and so, one star,
Preponderate henceforth 'tis the heritage
Of heaven! No! in less senatorial phrase,
The man endured to help, not save outright
The multitude by substituting him
For them, his knowledge, will and way, for God's:
Nor change the world, such as it is, and was
And will be, for some other, suitating all Except the purpose of the maker. No!
He saw that weakness, wickedness will be,
And therefore should be: that the perfect man,
As we account perfection—at most pure
O' the special gold, what'er the form it take,
Head-work or heart-work, fined and thrice-refined
I' the crucible of life, where to the powers
Of the refiner, one and all, are flung
To feed the flame, he saw that e'en the block,
Such perfect man holds out triumphant, breaks
Into some poisonous ore, gold's opposite,
At the very purest, so compensating
Man's Adversary—what if we believe?
For earlier stern exclusion of his stuff.
See the sage, with the hunger for the truth,
And see his system that's all true, except
The one weak place that's stanchioned by a lie!
The moralist, who walks with head erect
I' the crystal clarity of air so long,
Until a stumble, and the man's one mire!
Philanthropy undoes the social knot
With axe-edge, makes love room 'twixt head and trunk:
Religion—buts, enough, the thing 'tis too clear!
Well, if these sparks break out? the greenest tree,
Our topmost of performance, yours and mine,
What will be done i' the dry inequity
Of ordinary mankind, back and bale,
All seems ashamed of but their mother-earth?
Therefor through Head's term of servitude
He did the appointed service, and forebore
Extraneous action that were duty else,
Done by some other servant, idle now
Or mischievous: no matter, each his own—
Own task, and, in the end, own praise or blame!
He suffered them strut, prate, and brag their best,
Squabble at odds on every point save one,
And there shake hands,—agree to trifle time,
Obstruct advance with, each, his cricket-cry,
"Wait till the Head be off the shoulders here!
Then comes my King, my Pope, my Autocrat,
My Socialist Republic to her own—
To-wit, that property of only me,
Hohenstiel-Schwangau who conceivest herself
Free, forsooth, and expects me to keep her so!"
Nay, suffered when, perceiving with dismay
Head's silence paid no tribute to their noise,
They turned on him. "Dumb menace in that mouth,
Malice in that unstridulosity! He cannot but intend some strokes of state
Shall signalize his passage into peace
Out of the creaking,—hinder transference
O' the Hohenstielers-Schwangauese to king,
Pope, autocrat, or socialist republic! That's Exact the cause his lips unlooked would cry!
Therefore be stirring: brave, beard, bully him!
Dock, by the million, of its friendly joints.
The electoral body shat at once! who did,
May do again, and undo us beside;
Wrest from his hands the sword for self-defence,
The right to parry any thrust in play
We peradventure please to meditate!
And so forth; creek, creek, creek, and never a line
His locked mouth oped the wider, till at last
O' the long degraded and insulting day,
Sudden the clock told it was judgment-time.
Then he addressed himself to speak indeed
To the fools, not knaves: they saw him walk straight down
Each step of the eminence, as he first engaged,
And stand at last o' the level, — all he swore.
"People, and not the people's varlety,
This is the task you set myself and these!
Thus I forsook my part of it, and thus
They thwarted me throughout, here, here and here:
Study each instance! yours the loss, not mine.
What they intend now is demonstrable
As plainly: here's such man, and here's such mode
Of making you some other than the thing
You, wisely or unwisely, choose to be,
And only set him up to keep you so.
Do you approve this? yours the loss, not mine.
Do you condemn it? there's a remedy.
Take me — who know your mind, and mean
Your good,
With clearer brain and stouter arm than they,
Or you, or haphazard anybody else —
And make me master for the moment! choose
What time, what power you trust me with: I too
Will choose as frankly ere I trust myself
With time and power: they must be adequate
To the end and aim, since mine the loss, with yours.
If means be wanting; once their worth approved,
Grant them, and I shall forthwith operate —
Ponder it well! — to the extremest stretch
O' the power you trust me: if with success,
God wills it, and there's nobody to blame."
Whereon the people answered with a shout,
"The trusty one! no tricksters any more!"
How could they other? he was in his place.
What followed? just what he foresaw, what proved
The soundness of both judgments, — his, o' the knaves
And fools, each trickster with his dupes, — and theirs.
The people's, in what head and arm could help.
There was uprising, masks dropped, flags unfurled,
Weapons outflourished in the wind, my faith!

Heavily did he let his fist fall plumb
On each perturber of the public peace.
No matter whose the wagging head it broke—
From bald-pate craft and greed and impudence
Of night-hawk at first chance to prowl and prey
For glory and a little gain beside,
Passing for eagle in the dusk of the age,—
To florid head-top, foamy patriotism
And tribunitial daring, breast laid bare
Through confidence in rectitude, with haste.
On private pistol in the pocket: these
And all the dupes of these, who lent themselves
As dust and feather do, to help offence
O' the wind that whirls them at you, them aside.
In safety somewhere, leaving fifth aside.
Annoyance you may brush from eyes as a board,—
These I stopped: bade the wind's spite bow or whine
Its worst outside the building, wind conceived
Meant to be pulled together and become
Its natural playground so. What foolishness
Of dust or feather proved importunate
And fell 'twixt thumb and finger, found the gripe.
To detriment of bulk and buoyancy.
Then followed silence and submission. next
The inevitable comment came on work
And work's cost: he was censured as prof.
Of human life and liberty: too swift
And thorough his procedure, who had lagged
At the outset, lost the opportunity
Through timid scruples as to right and wrong.
"There's no such certain mark of a mind"
(So did sagacity explain the fault)
"As when it needs must square away and sink
To its own small dimensions, private scale
Of right and wrong, — humanity i' the large.
The right and wrong of the universe, forest!
This man addressed himself to guard and guide
Hohenstiel-Schwangau. When the case demands
He frustrate villany in the egg, unhatched,
With easy stamp and minimum of pang.
E'en to the punished reptile, 'There's my cat Restrains my foot,' objects our guide and guard,
'I must leave guardianship and guidance now:
Rather than stretch one handbreadth of the law.
I am bound to see it break from end to end.
First show me death i' the body politic.
Then prescribe pill and potion, what may please Hohenstiel-Schwangau! all is for her sake!
'T was she ordained my service should be so.
What if the event demonstrate her unwise,
If she unwill the thing she willed before?
I hold to the letter and obey the bond
And leave her to perdition loyally.'
When he followed thrice the expenditure we blame
Of human life and liberty: for want
O' the by-blow, came deliberate butcher's work!"
Elsewhere go carry your complaint!" bade he.

Least, largest, there's one law for all the minds.

PRINCE HOHENSTIEL-SCHWANGAU

"How, indeed?" he asked,
"When all to see, after some twenty years,
Wore your own fool-face waiting for the sight,
Faced by as wide a grin from ear to ear
O' the knaves who, while the fools were wait-

Broke yet another generation's heart—

'Compliance with, before you suck, the test!'
Find what that means, and meanwhile hold your tongue!"

Whereof the war came which he knew must
be.

Now, this had proved the dry-rot of the race
He ruled o'er, that, 'tis the old day, when was need
They fought for their own liberty and life,
Well did they fight, none better: whence, such
love
Of fighting somehow still for fighting's sake
Against no matter whose the liberty
And life, so long as self-conceit should crow
And cut the wing, while justice sheathed her claw, —
That what had been the glory of the world
When thereby came the world's good, grew its plague
Now that the champion-armor, dommed to dare
The disgrace once, was clattered up and down
Highway and by-path of the world at peace,
Merely to mask marauding, or for sake
O' the shine and rattle that apprised the fields
Hohenstiel-Schwangau was a fighter yet,
And would be, till the weak world suppressed
Her pecent humors out of fashion now.
Accordingly the world spoke plain at last,
Promised to punish who next played with fire.

So, at his advent, such discomfiture
Taking its true shape of beneficence,
Hohenstiel-Schwangau, half-sad and part-wise,
Sat: if with wistful eye reverting oft
To each pet weapon, rusty on its peg,
Yet, with a sigh of satisfaction too
That, peacefulness become the law, herself
Got the due share of godsenda in its train,
Cried shame and took advantage quietly.
Still, so the dry-rot had been nursed into Blood, bones and marrow, that, from worst to
best,
All — clearest brains and soundest hearts save
here, —
All had this lie acceptable for law
Plain as the sun at noonday — "War is best,
Peace is worst; peace we only tolerate
As needful preparation for new war:
War may be for whatever we will —
Peace only as the proper help thereto.
Such is the law of right and wrong for us
Hohenstiel-Schwangau: for the other world,
As naturally, quite another law.
Are we content? The world is satisfied.
Discontent? Then the world must give us
leave
To strike right, left, and exercise our arm

Torpid of late through overmuch repose,
And show its strength is still superlative
At somebody's expense in life or limb:
Which done — let peace succeed and hast a
year!"

Such devil's-doctrine so was judged God's le
We say, when this man stepped upon the sap,
That it had seemed a venial fault at most
Had he once more obeyed Sagacity.
"You come i' the happy interval of peace,
The favorable weariness from war:
Prolong it! artfully, as if intent
On ending peace as soon as possible.
Quietly so increase the sweets of ease
And safety, so employ the multitude,
Put hod and trowel so in idle hands,
So stuff and stop up wagging jaws with brass.
That selfishness shall surreptitiously
Do wisdom's office, whisper in the ear
Of Hohenstiel-Schwangau, there's a pleasant
deed.
In being gently forced down, pinioned fast
To the easy arm-chair by the pleading arms
O' the world beseeching her to there abide Content with all the harm done hitherto,
And let herself be petted in return.
Free to re-wage, in speech and prose and verse.
The old unjust wars, nay — in verse and prose
And speech, — to vaunt new victories, shall prove
A plague o' the future, — so that words suffice.
For present comfort, and no deeds denote
That — tired of illimitable line on line
Of boulevard-building, tired o' the theatre
With the tuneful thousand in their throes
above,
For glory of the male intelligence,
And Nakedness in her due niche below,
For illustration of the female use —
That she, 'twixt yawn and sigh, prepare to alp
Out of the arm-chair, wantst fresh blood again
From over the boundary, to color-up
The sheeny sameness, keep the world aware
Hohenstiel-Schwangau's arm needs exercise
Despite the petting of the universe!
Come, you're a city-builder: what 's the way
Wisdom takes when time needs that she call
Some fierce tribe, castled on the mountain-peak
Into the quiet and amenity
O' the meadow-land below? By crying: 'Dare
With fight now, down with fortress? Rather Dare
On, dare ever, not a stone displaced!'
Cries Wisdom: 'Cradle of our ancestors,
Be bulwark, give our children safety still
Who of our children please may stoop and taste
O' the valley-fatness, uneafraid, — for why?
At first alarm they have thy mother-rib
To run upon for refuge; foes forget
Scarcely that Terror on her vantage-coign.
Conchunt supreme among the powers of air
Watches — prepared to pounce — the country wide!
Meantime the encircled valley holds its sway
From the first hill's adventure in descent.
Half home, half hiding-place, — to done and

SAVIOUR OF SOCIETY

Defeating the assured metropolis:

Ver means offence to the fort which opes the crag,
All undemolished of a turret-stone,
And bears the banner-pole that breaks at times
In the wind in rust and obbligation,
When festal days are to commemorate:
Otherwise left unentangled, no doubt,
Since, never fear, our myriads from below
Would rush, if needs be, man the walls again,
To new the exploits of the earlier time
At moment's notice! But till notice sound,
Abide we in ease and opulence!

And so, till one day thus a notice sounds,
For trumpetted, but in a whisper-gust
Truly playing through mute city streets
It midnight weary of day's feast and game —
Friends, your famed fort 's a ruin past repair
'Tis use is — to proclaim it had a use
Inoleate long since. Climb and study there
How to paint barbecue and battlement
The scene of our new theatre! We fight low
By forbidding neighbors to sell steel
To buy wine, not by blowing out their brains!
Forever, while we let time sap the strength
The walls omnipotent in menace once,
Neighbors would seem to have prepared surprise

In up defences in a mushroom-growth,
Or all the world like what we boasted: brief
Hohenstiel-Schwangau's policy is peace!"

Only one eye thy ball was solid gold,
Hadst thou less breath to buoy thy vacancy
Than a whole multitude expends in praise,
Less range for roaming than from head to head
Of a whole people? Pit, fall, fly again,
Only, fix never where the resolute hand
May prink thee, prove the glassy lie thou art!
Give me real intellect to reason with,
No multitude, no entity that ases
One wise man, being but a million fools!
How and whence wishest glory, thou wise one?
Wouldst get it, — didst thyself guide Providence,
By stoning of his due each neighbor round
In strength and knowledge and dexterity
So as to have thy littleness grow large

As children make a molehill mountainous
By scooping out a trench around their pile,
And saving so the mudwork from approach?
Quite otherwise the cheery game of life,
True yet minute warfare, whereby man
Does his best with his utmost, and so ends
The victor most of all in fair defeat.
Who thinks, — would he have no one think be-
side?
Who knows, who does, — save his must learning
die
And action cease? Why, so our giant proves
No better than a dwarf, once rivalry
Prostrate around him. Let the whole race stand
For him to try conclusions fairly with Show me the great man would engage his peer
Rather by grinning 'Cheat, thy gold is brass!'
Than granting 'Perfect piece of purest ore'
Still, is it less good mintage, this of mine?'
Well, and these right and sound results of soul
I' the strong and healthy one wise man, — shall such
Be vainly sought for, scornfully renounced
I' the multitude that make the entity —
The people? — to what purpose, if no less,
In power and purity of soul, below
The reach of the unit than, by multiplied
Might of the body, vulgarised the more,
Above, in thick and threefold brutalishness?
See! you accept such one wise man, myself:
Wiser or less wise, still I operate
From my own stock of wisdom, nor exact
Of other sort of nature you admire,
That whose rhymes a sonnet pays a tax.
Who paints a landscape dips brush at his cost,
Who scores a septet true for strings and wind
Mulcted must be — else how should I impose
Properly, attitudinisie aright,
Did such conflicting claims as these divert
Hohenstiel-Schwangau from observing me?
Therefore, what I find facile, you be sure,
With effort or without it, you shall dare
You, I aspire to make my better self
And truly the Great Nation. No more war
For war's sake, then I and, — seeing, wickedness
Springs out of folly, — no more foolish dread
O' the neighbor waxing too inordinate
A rival, through his gain of wealth and ease!
What? — keep me patient, Powers! — the people here,
Prince Hohenstiel-Schwangau

Earth proffers to her heart, nor owns a pride
Above her pride! — the race all flame and air
And aspiration to the boundless Great,
The incomensurably Beautiful —
Whose very falterings groundward come of flight
Urged by a pinion all too passionate
For heaven and what it holds of gloom and glow:
Bravest of thinkers, bravest of the brave
Doers, exalt in Science, rapturous
In Art, — more than all — magnetic race
To fascinate their fellows, mould mankind Hohenstiel-Schwangau-fashion, — these, what?
— these
Will have to abdicate their primacy
Should such a nation sell them steel untaxed,
And such another take itself, on hire
For the natural serenight, somebody for lord
Unpatronized by me whose back was turned?
Or such another yet would fain build bridge,
Lay rail, drive tunnel, busy its poor self
With its appropriate fancy: — so there's —

Hohenstiel-Schwangau up in arms at once!
Genius has somewhat of the infantile:
But of the childish, not a touch nor taint
Except through self-will, which, being foolishness,
Is certain, soon or late, of punishment.
Which Providence avert! — and that it may
Avert what both of us would so deserve,
No foolish dread o' the neighbor, I enjoin!
By consequence, no wicked war with him,
While I rule!

"Does that mean — no war at all
When just the wickedness I here proscribe
Comes, haply, from the neighbor? Does my speech
Proceed the praying that you beat the sword
To ploughshares, and the spear to pruning-hook,
And sit down henceforth under your own vine
And fig-tree through the sleepy summer month,
Letting what hurly-burly please explode
On the other side the mountain-frontier? No, Beloved! I foresee and I announce
Necessity of warfare in one case,
For one cause: one way, I bid broach the blood
O' the world. For truth and right, and only right
And truth, — right, truth, on the absolute scale
Of God,
No pettiness of man's admureasurement, —
In such case only, and for such one cause,
Fight your hearts out, whatever fate beside
Hands energetic to the uttermost!
Lie not! Endure no lie which needs your heart
And hand to push it out of mankind's path —
No lie that lets the natural forces work
Too long ere lay it plain and pulverized —
Seeing man's life lasts only twenty years!
And such a lie, before both man and God,
Proving, at this time present, Austria's rule
O'er Italy, — for Austria's sake the first,
Italy's next, and our sake last of all,
Come with me and deliver Italy!
Smite hip and thigh until the oppressor leave
Free from the Adriatic to the Alps
The oppressed one! We were they who had her low
In the old bad day when Villainy brav'd Truth
And Right, and laughed ' Henceforward I'm deposed, Satan set to rule forevermore'
t I' the world! — whereof to stop the consequence,
And for atonement of false glory there
Gaped at and gabbled over by the world,
I purpose to get God enthroned again
On his seat, whereof will give me then
I' the cost of blood and treasure. — All is naught —
Not even, say, some patch of province, sics
O' the frontier? — some snug honorarium?
Shut into glove and pocketed amidst!
(Questions Sagacity) in defence
To the natural susceptibility
Of folks at home, unwitting of that pitch
You soar to; and misjudging: if Truth, Light
And the other such augustnesses repay
Expense in coin o' the realm, — but prate
To recognize the cession of Savoy?
And Nice as marketable value! No,
Sagacity, go prash to Metternich,
And, sermon ended, stay where he resides!
Hohenstiel-Schwangau, you and I must meet
The other road I war for the hate of war,
Not love, this once!" So Italy was free.

What else noteworthy and commendable
I' the man's career? — that he was resolute
No trepidation, much less treachery
On his part, should imperil from its roots
The ball o' the world, heaved up at such expanse
Of pains so far, and ready to rebound,
Let but a finger maladroitly fall,
Under pretense of making fast and sure
The inch gained by late volubility
And run itself back to the ancient rest
At foot o' the mountain. Thus he ruled, — proof

The world had gained a point, progressive.
By choice, this time, as will and power ordained
O' the fittest man to rule; not chances of birth
Or such-like dice-throw. Oft Sagacity
Was at his ear: "Confirm this clear advance
Support this wise procedure! You, elect
O' the people, mean to justify their choice
And out-king all the kingly imbeciles;
But that's just half the enterprise: remain
You find them a sucessor like yourself,
In head and heart and eye and hand and aim.
Or all done 's undone; and whom hope is monied.
So like you as the pupil Nature sends.
The son and heir's completeness which you lack?
Lack it no longer! Wed the pick o' the web Where'er you think you find it. Should she be a queen, — tall Hohenstielers-Schwangau,
'So do the old enthroned despots praise
Acknowledge, in the rotten hearts of them,
Their knell is knoll'd, they hasten to make peace
With the new order, recognize in me
Your right to constitute what king you will,
Cringe therefore crown in hand and bride on arm,
To both of us: we triumph, I suppose!
Is it the other sort of rank?—bright eye,
Soft smile, and so forth, all her queenly boast?
Undaunted the exordium—'I, the man
O' the people, with the people myself:
So stand, so fall. Kings, keep your crowns and brides!
Our progeny (if Providence agrees)
Shall live to tread the bales underfoot
And bid the scarecrows consort with their kin.
For son, as for his sire, be the free wife
In the free state!"

That is, Sagacity
Would prop up one more lie, the most of all
Perfidious fancy that the son and heir
Receives the genius from the sire, himself
Transmits as surely,—ask experience else!
Which answers,—never was so plain a truth
As that God drop his seed of heavenly flame
Just where he willed on earth:—sometimes where
man
Seems to tempt,—such the accumulated store
Of faculties—one spark to fire the heap;
Sometimes where, fireball-like, it falls upon
The naked unpreparedness of rock,
Burns, beaconing the nations through their
night.
Faculties, fuel for the flame? All helps Come, ought to come, or come not, crossed by
chance,
From culture and transmission. What's your want
I' the son and heir? Sympathy, aptitude,
Teachableness, the fuel for the flame?
You'll have them for your pains: but the flame's self,
The novel thought of God shall light the world?
No, poet, though your orphrey rhyme and chime
I' the Bradley,—painter, no, for all your pet
Draws his first eye, beats Salvatore's boy,—
And thence no statesman, should your progeny
Tie buck and tucker with no tape but red,
And make a foolscap-kite of protocols!
Critics and copyists and bureaucrats
To heart's content! The seed o' the appletree
Brings forth another tree which bears a crab:
'T is the great gardener grafts the excellence
On wildings where he will.

"How plain I view
Across those misty years 'twixt me and
Rome"—
(Such the man's answer to Sagacity)
"The little wayside temple, halfway down
To a mild river that makes oxen white
Miraculously, un-mouse-colors skin,
Or so the Roman country people dream!
I view that sweet small shrub-embedded shrine
On the declivity, was sacred once
To a transmutting Genius of the land,
Could touch and turn its dullest natures bright,

—Since Italy means the Land of the Ox, we
know.
Well, how was it the due succession fall
From priest to priest who ministered 't' the cool
Calm fase o' the Clitumnian god?—The sire
Brought forth a son and a sacerdotal sprout,
Endowed instinctively with good and grace
To suit the gliding gentleness below—
Did he? Tradition tells another tale.
Each priest obtained his predecessor's staff,
Robe, fillet and insignia, blamelessly,
By springing out of ambush, soon or late,
And playing him: the initiative rite
Simply was murder, save that murder took,
I' the case, another and religious name.
So it was once, is now, shall ever be
With genius and its priesthood in this world:
The new power slays the old—but handsomely.
There he lies, not diminished by an inch
Of stature that he grasped 'a the altar with,
Though somebody of other bulk and build
Cries, 'What a goodly personage lies here
Reddening the water where the bullrash roots!
May I conduct the service in his place,
Decently and in order, as did he,
And, as he did not, keep a wary watch
When meditating 'neath you willow shade!'
Find out your best man, sure the son of him
Will prove best man again, and, better still Somehow than the last who groaned profusely
You think the world would last another day
Did we so make us masters of the trick
Whereby the works go, we could pre-arrange
Their play and reach perfection when we please?
Depend on it, the change and the surprise
Are part o' the plan: 't is we with steadiness;
Nature prefers a motion by unrest,
Advancement through this force which jostles
that.
And so, since much remains i' the world to
see,
Here's the world still, affording God the sight."
Thus did the man refute Sagacity,
Ever at this old whisper in his ear:
"Here are you picked out, by a miracle,
And placed constitutionally enough, folks say
And you believe, by Providence outright.
Taking a new way—or without success—
To put the world upon its mettle: good!
But Fortune alternates with Providence;
Resource is soon exhausted. Never count
On such a happy hit occurring twice!
Try the old method next time!"

"Old enough,"
(At whisper in his ear, the laugh outbreak.)
("And made the most discredited of all,
By just the men and women who make boast
They are kings and queens thereby! Mere self-defence
Should teach them, on one chapter of the law
Must be no sort of trifling—chastity:
They stand or fall as their progenitors
Were chaste or unchaste. Now, run eye around
My crowned acquaintance, give each life its look
And no more,—why, you’d think each life was led
Purposely for example of what pains
Who leads it took to cure the prejudices,
As who is who, what son of what a sire,
And—inferentially—how faint the chance
That the next generation needs to fear
Another fool o’ the selfsame type as he Happily reignant now by right divine
And not under the pillow! No: select your lord
By the direct employment of your brains
As best you may,—bad as the blunder prove,
A far worse evil stank beneath the sun
When some legitimate blockhead managed so
Matters that high time was to interfere,
Though interference came from hell itself
And not the blind mad miserable mob
Happily ruled so long by pillow-look
And divine right,—by lies in short, not truth.
And meanwhile use the allotted minute... .”

One,—

Two, three, four, five,—yes, five the pendulum warns!

Oh? Why, this wild work wanders past all bound,

And bearing! Exile, Leicesther Square, the life
I’ the old gay miserable time, rehearsed,

Tried on again like cast clothes, still to serve
At a pinch, perhaps? “Who’s who?” was aptly asked,

Since no one can not I! since when?

Where is the bud-mouthed arbiters? A nod

Out-Homer! Homer!—Stay—there fits the clue.

I fain would find the end of! Yes,—“Meanwhile, use the allotted minute!” Well, you see,

(Varacious and imaginary Thiers,

Who map out thus the life I might have led,

But did not,—all the worse for earth and me,

Doff spectacles, wipe pen, shut book, decamp!)

“You see ’tis easy in heroes! Plain

Pedestrian speech shall help me perorate,

Ah, if one had no need to use the tongue!

How obvious and how easy ’tis to talk

Inside the soul, a ghostly dialogue—

Instinct with guesses,—instinct, guess, again

With dubious knowledge, half—experience: each

And all the interlocutors alike

Subordinating,—as decorum bids,

Oh, never fear! but still decisively

Claims from without that take too high a tone,

(“God wills this, man wants that, the digni-

Prescribed a prince would wish the other

thing”)

Putting them back to insignificance,

Besides one intimated fact—myself

Am first to be considered, since I live

Twenty years longer and then end, perhaps!

But, where one ceases to soliloquize,

Somehow the motives, that did well enough

I’ the darkness, when you bring them into light

Are found, like those famed cave-fish, to let

eye

And once for the upper magnitudes.

The other common creatures, of less fine

Existence, that acknowledge earth and heaven.

Have it their own way in the argument.

Yes, forced to speak, one stoops to say—on’s aim

Was—what if peradventure should have been:

To renovate a people, mend or end

That bane come of a blessing meant for

world—

Inordinate culture of the sense made quick

By soul,—the lust o’ the flesh, lust of the eye

And pride of life,—and, consequent on these.

The worship of that prince o’ the power o’ its

air

Who paints the cloud and fills the emptiness

And bids his votaries, famishing for truth,

Feed on a lie.

Alack, one lies one’s self

Even in the stating that one’s end was truth.

Truth only, if one states as much in words!—

Give me the inner chamber of the soul

For obvious easy argument! ’tis there

One pits the silent truth against a lie—

Truth which breaks shell a careless simple bid!

Nor wants a gorget nor a beak filed fine.

Steel spurs and the whole armory o’ the torso.

To equalize the odds. But, do your best.

Words have to come: and somehow wort defect

As the best cannon ever ri ffed will.

“Deflect!” indeed! nor merely words from thoughts

But names from facts: “Clitumnus” did I

say?

As it had been his ox-whitening wave

Whereto folk practised that grim cult of old

The murder of their temple’s priest by whose

Would qualify for his succession. Sure—

Nemi was the true lake’s style. Dream’d had

need

Of the ox-whitening pesce of prettiness

And so confused names, well known one awake.

So, i’ the Residenz yet, not Leicesther Square,

Alone,—no such congenial intercourse!—

My reverie concludes, as dreaming should.

With daybreak: nothing done and over yet.

Except cigars! The adventure thus may be

Or never needs to be at all: who knows?

My Cousin-Duke, perhaps, at whose hard bed

Is it, now — is this letter to be launched,

The sight of whose gray oblong, whose grim seal,

Set all these fancies floating for an hour?

Twenty years are good gain, come what come

will!

Double or quits! The letter goes! Or stays!
FIFINE AT THE FAIR

DONNE ELVIRA
Vous plait-il, don Juan, nous éclaircir ces beaux mystères?

DON JUAN
Madame, à vous dire la vérité...

DONNE ELVIRA
Ah! que vous savez mal vous défendre pour un homme de cour, et qui doit être accoutumé à ces sortes de choses! J'ai pleuré de vous voir la confusion que vous avez. Que ne vous armez-vous le front d'une noble effronterie? Que ne me jurez-vous que vous êtes toujours dans les mêmes sentiments pour moi, que vous m'aimez toujours avec une ardeur sans égale, et que rien n'est capable de vous détacher de moi que la mort?—(Molière, Don Juan, Acte I, Sc 3.)

DANNA ELVIRA
Don Juan, might you please to help one give a guess, Hold up a candle, clear this fine mysteriousness?

DON JUAN
Madam, if needs I must declare the truth,—in short...

DANNA ELVIRA
Fle, for a man of mode, accustomed at the court To such a style of thing, how awkwardly my lord Attempts defence! You move compassion, that's the word— Dumb-founded and chapfallen! Why don't you arm your brow With noble impudence? Why don't you swear and vow No sort of change is come to any sentiment You ever had for me? Affection holds the bent, You love me now as erst, with passion that makes pale All ardor else: nor aught in nature can avail To separate us two, save what, in stopping breath, May peradventure stop devotion likewise—death!

PROLOGUE

AMPHIBIAN

The fancy I had to-day, Fancy which turned a fear! I swam far out in the bay, Since waves laughed warm and clear.

I lay and looked at the sun, The noon-sun looked at me: Between us two, no one Live creature, that I could see.

Yes! There came floating by Me, who lay floating too, Such a strange butterfly! Creature as dear as new:

Because the membraned wings So wonderful, so wide, So sun-suffused, were things Like soul and naught beside.

A handbreadth overhead! All of the sea my own, It owned the sky instead; Both of us were alone.

I never shall join its flight, For, naught buoys flash in air, If it touch the sea—good night! Death sure and swift waits there.

Can the insect feel the better For watching the uncouth play Of limbs that slip the fetter, Pretend as they were not clay?

Undoubtedly I rejoice That the air comports so well With a creature which had the choice Of the land once. Who can tell?

What if a certain soul Which early slipped its sheath, And has for its home the whole Of heaven, thus look beneath,
Thus watch one who, in the world,
Both lives and likes life's way,
Nor wishes the wings unfurled
That sleep in the worm, they say?

But sometimes when the weather
Is blue, and warm waves tempt
To free one's self of tether,
And try a life exempt

From worldly noise and dust,
In the sphere which overbrims
With passion and thought, — why, just
Unable to fly, one swims!

By passion and thought upborne,
One smiles to one's self — "They fare
Scarce better, they need not scorn
Our sea, who live in the air!"

Emanoplate through passion
And thought, with sea for sky,
We substitute, in a fashion,
For heaven — poetry:

Which sea, to all intent,
Gives flesh such noon-disport
As a finer element
Affords the spirit-sort.

Whatever they are, we seem:
Imagine the thing they know;
All deeds they do, we dream;
Can heaven be else but so?

And meantime, yonder streak
Meets the horizon's verge;
That is the land, to seek
If we tire or dread the surge:

Land the solid and safe
To welcome again (confess!) When, high and dry, we change The body, and don the dress.

Does she look, pity, wonder At one who mimes flight, Swims — heaven above, sea under, Yet always earth in sight?

FIFINE AT THE FAIR

I
O trip and skip, Elvire! Link arm in arm with me! Like husband and like wife, together let us see The tumbling-troop arrayed, the strollers on their stage, Drawn up and under arms, and ready to engage.

II
Now, who supposed the night would play us such a prank? — That what was raw and brown, rough pole and shaven plank, More bit of hoarding, half by trestle propped, half tub,

Would flaunt it forth as brisk as butterfly from grub? This purple of sun and air, of Autumn afternoons, And Pornic and Saint Gilles, whose feast affords the boon — This scaffold turned parterre, this flower-bed is full blow, Bataleurs, baladiers! We shall not miss the show! They pace and promenade; they presently will dance: What good were else i' the drum and fifes? O pleasant land of France!

III
Who saw them make their entry? At wak of eve, be sure! They love to steal a march, nor lightly risk their lure. They keep their treasure hid, nor stale (impudent) Before the time is ripe, each wonder of their tent — Yon six-legged sheep, to wit, and he who be a gong, Lifts cap and waves salute, exhilarates the throng — Their age of many years and much adventure, grim And gray with pitting fools who find a joke is him. Or, best, the human beauty, Mimi, Toisette, Erene. Tricot fins down if fat, padding plumps up if lean, Ere, shedding petticoat, modesty, and such toys. They bounce forth, squallid girls transformed to gamey boys.

IV
No, no, thrice, Pornic, no! Perplexed the authentic tale! 'T was not for every Gawain to gaze upon the Grail! But whose so went his rounds, when flew bat, Flitted midge, Might gaze across the dusk, — where both roads join the bridge, Hard by the little port, — creak a slow canvass. A chimneyscyd house on wheels; so skyly sheathed, began To broaden out the bud which, bursting unaware, Now takes away our breath, queen-tulip of the Fair!

V
Yet morning promised much: for, pitched and slung and reared On terrace 'neath the tower, 'twixt tree and tree appeared An airy structure; how the pennon from its dome, Frenetic to be free, makes one red stretch for home! The home far and away, the distance where lives joy,
FIFINE AT THE FAIR

be sure, at once and ever, of world and world's annoy;
see, what lolls full in front, a furlong from the booth,
at ocean-tidiness, sky-blue and millpond-smooth?

VI
Frenzied to be free! And, do you know, there beats something within my breast, as sensitive?—repeats be fever of the flag? My heart makes just
the same
animate stretch, fires up for lawlessness, lays claim
to love the life they lead: loafers, who have and use to hour what way they will,—applaud them or abuse society, whose self I am at the book, love to obey, and stoop to burden stillest neck!

VII
Why is it that when'er a faithful few combine cast allegiance off, play truant, nor repine, pro to bear the worst, forego the best in store for us who, left behind, do duty as of yore,—by is it that, disgraced, they seem to relish life the more?

Seem as they said, "We know a secret passing praise blame of such as you! Remain! we go our ways the something you o'erlooked, forgot or chose to sweep out of door: our pearl picked from your rubbish-heaps.
are for your loss, we calculate our gain:
't right. Are you content? Why, so let things remain!
the wood then, to the wild: free life, full liberty!"

ad when they rendezvous beneath the inclement sky,
use by the hedge, reduced to brute-companionship,
Misguided ones who gave society the slip,
find too late how boon a parent they despised,
that ministration spurned, how sweet and civilized—
men, left alone at last with self-sought wretchedness, interloper else! — why is it, can we guess? — somebody's expense, goes up so frank a laugh?
though they held the corn, and left us only chaff sum garners crammed and closed. And we indeed are clever
we get grain as good, by threshing straw forever!

VIII
Still, truant as they are and purpose yet to be,
That nowise needs forbid they venture—as you see—
To cross confines, approach the once familiar roof
O' the kindly ease their flight estranged: stand half aloof, Sidle half up, press near, and proffer wares for sale
—in their phrase,—make in ours, white levy of black mail.
They, of the wild, require some touch of us the tame,
Since clothing, meat and drink, mean money all the same.

IX
If hunger, proverbs say, allures the wolf from wood,
Much more the bird must dare a dash at something good:
Must snatch up, bear away in beak, the trifle-treasure
To wood and wild, and then—oh, how enjoy at leisure!
Was never tree-built nest, you climbed and took, of bird,
(Rare city-visitant, talk of, scarce seen or heard.)
But, when you would dissect the structure, piece by piece,
You found, enwreathed amid the country-product—fleece
And feather, thistle-fluffs and bearded windlestraw—
Some shred of foreign silk, unravelling of gauze,
Bit, maybe, of brocade, mid fur and blow-bell
Pilched plainly from mankind, dear tribute paid by town,
Which proved how oft the bird had plucked up heart of grace,
Swooped down at waif and stray, made furiously our place
Pay tax and toll, then borne the booty to enrich
Her paradise? the waste; the how and why of which,
That is the secret, there the mystery that stings!

x
For, what they traffic in, consists of just the things
We,—prond ones who so scorn dwellers without the pale,
Bateleurs, baladines, white leviers of black mail,—
I say, they sell what we most pique us that we keep!
How comes it, all we hold so dear they count so cheap?
What price should you impose, for instance, on praise?
Good fame, your own good fame and family’s to boot?
Stay start of quick moustache, arrest the angry
rise
Of eyebrow! All I asked is answered by surprise.
Now tell me: are you worth the cost of a cigar?
Go boldly, enter booth, disburse the coin at bar
Of doorway where presides the master of the troop,
And forthwith you survey his Graces in a group.
Live Picture, picturesque no doubt and close to life;
His sisters, right and left; the Grace in front,
his wife.
Next, who is this performs the feat of the Trapeze?
Lo, she is launched, look — fie, the fairy! — how she flies
O’er all those heads thrust back, — mouths, eyes, one gape and stare, —
No scrap of skirt impedes free passage through the
air,
Till, plumb on the other side, she lights and laughs again,
That fairy-form, whereof each muscle, nay,
each vein
The crimson may inspect — his daughter that he sells
Each rustic for five sous. Desiderate aught else
O’ the vendor? As you leave his show, why, joke the man!
"You boast: your six-legged sheep, I recollect, began
Both life and trade, last year, trimmed properly and clipt.
As the Twin-headed Babe, and Human Nondes-cript!"
What does he care? You paid his price, may pass your jest.
So values he repute, good fame, and all the rest!

But try another tack; say: "I indulge car-
price,
Who am Don and Duke, and Knight, beside, o’
the Golden Fleece,
And, never mind how rich. Abandon this carer! Have hearth and home, nor let your woman-kind appear

Without as multiplied a coating as protects
An onion from the eye! Become, in all respects, God-fearing householder, subsistent by brain-
skill.
Hand-labor; win your bread whatever way
you will,
So it be honestly — and, while I have a purse, Means will not lack!" — his thanks will be the roundest curse
That ever rolled from lip.

Now, what is it? — return
The question — heartens so this loss the b’s spurns
All we so prize? I want, put down in kid and white,
What compensating joy, unknown and inte,
Turns lawlessness to law, makes desertsic–
wealth,
Vice — virtue, and disease of soul and body health?

Ah, the slow shake of head, the melancholy
smile.
The sigh almost a sob? What’s wrong, we right erewhile?
Why are we two at. once such ocean-side
apart?
Pale fingers press my arm, and sad eyes pier
my heart.
Why is the wife in trouble?

This way, this way, Fifi! Here’s she, shall make my thoughts be as what they mean!
First let me read the signs, portray you no mistake
The gypsy’s foreign self, no swarth can as could bake.
Yet where’s a woolly trace degrades the sly
hair?
And note the Greek-nymph nose, and — oh My Hebrew pair
Of eye and eye — o’erarched by velvet of the mole—
That swim as in a sea, that dip and rise as roll,
Spilling the light around! While either ear is cut
Thin as a duch-leaved rose carved from a coconut.
And then, her neck! now, grant you had the power to deck,
Just as your fancy pleased, the bistre-length of
neck,
Could lay, to shine against its shade, a mas-like row
Of pearls; each round and white as bubble
Cupids blow
Big out of mother’s milk, — what pearl-rose would surpass
That string of mock-turquoise, those amberdines of glass,
Where girlhood terminates? for with breast-birth commence
The box, and page-costume, till pink and impudence
End admirably all: complete the creation trips
Our way now, brings sunshine upon her expended hips,
As here she fronts us full, with pose half frank, half-fierce!

xvi
Words urged in vain, Elivre! You waste your quent and treciue, lane at a phantoam here, try fence in fairy-land. For me, I own defeat, ask but to understand The acknowledged victory of whom I call my queen. Sexless and bloodless sprite: though mischievous and mean, Yet free and flower-like too, with loveliness for law, And self-sustainment made mortality.

xvii
A flaw
Do you account i' the lily, of lands which travellers know, That, just as golden gloom supersedes Northern snow I' the chalice, so, about each pistil, spicce is packed,— Deliciously—drugged scent, in lieu of odor diffused. With us, by bee and moth, their banquet to enhance At morn and eve, when dew, the chilly sustenance, Needs mixture of some chaste and temperate perfume? I ask, is she in fault who guards such golden gloom, Such dear and damning scent, by who cares what devices. And takes the idle life of insects she entices When, drowned to heart's desire, they satiate the inside O' the lily, mark her wealth and manifest her pride?

xviii
But, wiser, we keep off, nor tempt the acid juice; Dissect we peer and praise, put rich things to right use. No flavorous venomed bell,—the rose it is, I wot, Only the rose, we pluck and place, unwronged a jot. No worse for homage done by every devotee, I' the proper royal throne, on breast where rose should be. Or if the simpler sweets we have to choose among, Would taste between our teeth, and give its toy the tongue,— O gorgeous poison-plague, on thee no hearts are set! We gather daisy meek, or maiden violet: I think it is Elivre we love, and not Fifine.

xix
"How does she make my thoughts be sure of what they mean?"
Judge and be just! Suppose, an age and time long past Renew for our behoof one pageant more, the last
O' the kind, sick Louis liked to see defile between Him and the yawning grave, its passage served to screen. With eye as gray as lead, with cheek as brown as bronze, Here where we stand, shall sit and suffer Louis Xvii: The while from yonder tent parade forth, not — oh, no — Bateleurs, baladines! but range themselves a-row Those well-sung women-worthies whereof loud fame still finds Some echo linger faint, less in our hearts than minds.

xx
See, Helen! pushed in front o' the world's worst night and storm, By Lady Venus' hand on shoulder: the sweet form Shringly prominent, though mighty, like a moon Outbreaking from a cloud, to put harsh things in tune, And magically bring mankind to acquiesce In its own ravage,—call no curse upon, but bless (Bel Dame, a moment since) the outbreaking beauty, now. That casts o'er all the blood a candor from her brow.

xli
See, Clopeatra! barest, the entire and sinuous wealth O' the shining shape; each orb of indolent ripe health, Captured, just where it finds a fellow-orn as fine I' the body: traced about by jewels which outline, Fire-frame, and keep distinct, perfections — lest they melt To soft smooth unity are half their hold be felt:
Yet, o'er that white and wonder, a soul's predominance I' the head so high and haughty—except one thievish glance, From back of oblong eye, intent to count the slain. Hush, — oh, I know, Elivre! Be patient, more remain! What say you to Saint? . . . Fish! Whatever Saint you please, Cold-pinnacled aloft o' the spire, prays calm the seas From Parnie Church, and oft at midnight (peasants say) Goes walking out to save from shipwreck: well she may! For think how many a year has she been conversant With naught but winds and rains, sharp courtesy and scant. O' the wintry snow that coats the pent-house of her shrine, Covers each knee, climbs near, but spares the smile benign
Which seems to say, "I looked for scarce so much from each!"
She follows, one long thin pure finger in the girth
O' the girdle—whence the folds of garment, eye and eye,
Besprinkled with fleurs-de-lys, flow down and multiply
Around her feet, and one, pressed hungrily to lip;
As it, while thus we made her march, some foundering ship
Might miss her from her post, nearer to God halfway
In heaven, and she inquired, "Who that treads earth can pray?"
I doubt if even she, the unashamed! though, sure,
She must have stripped herself only to clothe the poor."

"Well, what's the meaning here, what does the masque intend,
Which, unabridged, we saw file past us, with no end
Of fair ones, till Fifine came, closed the catalogue?"

Task fancy yet again! Suppose you cast this clog
Of flesh away (that weeps, upbraids, withstands my arm)
And pass to join your peers, paragon charm with charm,
As I shall show you may—prove best of beauty there!
Yourself confront yourself! This, help me to declare
That yonder—you, who stand beside these, braving each
And blinking none, best her who lured to Troy-town beach
The purple prows of Greece,—nay, beat Fifine whose face,
Mark how I will inflame, when seigneur-like I place
The tambourine, to spot the strained and piteous blank
Of pleasing parchment, see, no less than a whole frame!

Ah, do you mark the brown o' the cheek,
Made bright with fire
Through and through? as, old wiles succeeding desire,
Quality (you and I) once more compassionate
A hapless infant, doomed (lie on such partial fate)!
To sink the inborn shame, waive privilege of sex.
And posture as you see, support the nod and beaks
Of clowns that have their stare, nor always pay its price;
An infant born perchance as sensitive and nice
As any soul of you, proud dames, whom destiny
Keeps uncontaminated from stigma of the sty
She wallows in! You draw back skirts from filth like her
Who, possibly, braves scorn, if, scorned, she minister
To age, want, and disease of parents one or both;
Nay, peradventure, stoops to degradation, leaft
That some just-budding sister, the dew yet on the rose,
Should have to share in turn the ignoble trade,—
—who knows?

Ay, who indeed! Myself know nothing, let dare guess
That off she trips in haste to hand the booty...yes,
'Twixt fold and fold of tent, there looms he, dim-discerned,
The ogre, lord of all those lavish limbs have earned!
—Brute-beast-face, —ravage, scar, scowl and malignancy,— O' the Strong Man, whom (no doubt, her husband) by and by
You shall behold do feats: lift up nor quail beneath
A quintal in each hand, a cart-wheel 'twixt his teeth.
Oh, she prefers sheer strength to ineffective grace,
Breeding and culture seeks the essential is the case!
To him has flown my flame; and welcome, if that squint
O' the diabolic eye so soft then through absinthe,
That for once, tambourine, tune and trist 'scape
Their customary curse "Not half the gain o' the ape!"
Ay, they go in together!

Yet still her phantom stays
Opposite, where you stand: as steady "heath our gaze,—
The live Elvire's and mine,—though fascin-stuff and more
In me, for things externe, was all mistake, she finds, —
Or will find, when I prove that bodies show me minds,
That, through the outward sign, the inward
grace allure,
And sparks from heaven transpire earth’s
coarsest overtures,
All by demonstrating the value of Fifine!

Partake of my confidence! No creature’s made so mean
But that, some way, it boasts, could we investigate,
Its supreme worth: fulfills, by ordinance of
fate.
Its momentary task, gets glory all its own,
Tastes triumph in the world, pre-eminent, alone.
Where is the single grain of sand, ’mid millions
hoaped
Confusedly on the beach, but, did we know, has hoaped
Or will leap, would we wait? ’tis the century,
some once,
To the very throne of things? — earth’s brightest for the nonce,
When sunshine shall impinge on just that grain’s facets
Which fronts him fullest, first, returns his ray with jet
Of promptest praise, thanks God best in crea-tion’s name!
As firm is my belief, quick sense perceives the
same
Self-vindicating flash illustrate every man
And woman of our mass, and prove, throughout the plan,
No detail but, in place allotted it, was prime
And perfect.

Witness her, kept waiting all this time!
What happy angle makes Fifine reverberate
Sunshine, least sand-grain, she, of shadiest social state?
No adamantine shield, polished like Helen
there,
Fit to absorb the sun, regorge him till the glare, Dazzing the universe, draw Troy-ward those blind beams
Of equal-sided ships rowed by the well-greaved Greeks!
No Asian mirror, like you Ptolemaic witch
Able to fix sun fast and tame sun down, enrich,
Not burn the world with beams thus flatteringly rolled
About her, head to foot, turned slavish snakes of gold!
And oh, no tinted pane of oriel sanctity,
Does our Fifine afford, such as permits supply
Of lustrous heaven, revealed, far more than mundane sight
Could master, to thy cell, pure Saint! where,
else too bright,
So suit thy sense the orb, that, what outside was noon,
FIFINE AT THE FAIR

Fales, though thy lozenged blue, to meek
benefic moon!
What then? does that prevent each dunghill,
We may pass
Daily, from boasting too its bit of looking-glass,
Its shard which, sun-smite, shines, shoots arrowy fire beyond
That satin-muffled mope, your sulky diamond?

And now, the mingled ray she shoots, I do compose.
Her antecedents, take for execrable! Gloze
No whit on your premises: let be, there was no worst
Of degradation spared Fifine: ordained from first
To last, in body and soul, for one life-long debanch.
The Pariah of the North, the European Nautch! This, far from seek to hide, she puts in evidence Calmly, displays the brand, bids prey without offence
Your finger on the place. You comment, "Fancy us
So operated on, maltreated, mangled thus!
Such a course in our case, had we survived an hour?
Some other sort of flesh and blood must be, with power
Appropriate to the vile, unsensitive, touched through.
In lieu of our fine nerve! Be sure, she was not wronged Too much: you must not think she winced at prick as we!"
Come, come, that's what you say, or would,
were thoughts but free.

Well then, thus much confessed, what wonder if there steal
Unchallenged to my heart the force of one appeal
She makes, and justice stamp the sole claim she asserts?
So absolutely good is truth, truth never hurts
The teller, whose worst crime gets somehow grazed, avowed.
To me, that silent pose and prayer proclaimed aloud:
"Know all of me outside, the rest be emptiness
For such as you! I call attention to my dress, Coiffure, outlandish features, lithe memorable
limbs,
Piquant entreaty, all that eye-glance overskim.
Does this give pleasure? Then, repay the pleasure, put Its price? the tambourine! Do you seek further? Tut!
I'm just my instrument, - sound hollow:
more smooth skin
Stretched o'er gilt framework, I; rub-dub, naught else within -
Always, for such as you! — if I have use elsewhere, —
If certain bells, now mute, can jingle, need you care?

Be it enough, there's truth in the pleasing,
which comports
With no word spoken out in cottages or courts.
Since all I plead is, 'Pay just the night we
see
And give no credit to another charm in me!
Do I say, like your Love? 'To praise my be is well,
But, who would know my worth, must seek my heart to tell!
Do I say, like your Wife? 'Had I passed a review
The produce of the globe, my man of men was
—you!'
Do I say, like your Helen? 'Yield yourself
Implicitly, nor pause to question, to survey
Even the worshipful: prostrate you at my shrine!
Shall you dare controvert what the world counts divine?
Array your private taste, own liking of the
sense,
Own longings of the soul, against the impedance
Of history, the blare and bullying of verse?
As if man ever yet saw reason to disparage
The sense of what sense liked, soul tempt for, — given, devised
As love, forsooth, — until the price was recog nized
As moderate enough by divers fallow-men!
Then, with his warrant safe that these would not too, then,
Sure that particular gain implies a public loss.
And that no smile he buys but proves a stab
across
The face, a stab into the side of somebody—
Sure that, along with love's main-purchase, he will buy
Up the whole stock of earth's uncharitableness.
Envy and hatred, — then, decides he to profess
His estimate of one, by love discerned, though dim
To all the world beside: since what's the world to him?'
Do I say, like your Queen of Egypt? 'We foregoes
My cup of witchcraft — fault be on the fool!
He knows
Nothing of how I pack my wine-press, tan its winch
Three-times-three, all the time to song and dance, nor finish
From charming on and on, till at the last I squeezes
Out the exhaustive drop that leaves behind more lees
And drogs, vapidity, thought essence hitherto

Sup of my sorcery, old pleasures please no more!
Be great, be good, love, learn, have potency of
love
Or heart or head, — what boots? You die, nor understand
What bliss might be in life: you ate the grapes.
but knew
Never the taste of wine, such vintage as I brew!'
FIFINE AT THE FAIR

Do I say, like your Saint? 'An exquisite touch
Bides in the birth of things: no after-time can Enhance that fine, that faint, fugitive first of all!
What color paints the cup o' the May-rose, like the small
Suspicion of a blush which doubtfully begins?
What sound outwarbles brook, while, at the source, it wins
That moss and stone dispar, allow its bub-blings breathes?
What taste excels the fruit, just where sharp flavors shae the
Their sting, and let enroach the honey that allays?
And so with soul and sense; when sanctity betray
First fear lest earth below seem real as heaven
above,
And holy worship, late, change soon to sinful
love —
Where is the plenitude of passion which endures
Comparison with that, I ask of amateurs?'
Do I say, like Elvire " . . .

XXXIII
(Your husband holds you fast,
Will you listen, learn your character at last!)
"Do I say?" —like her mixed unrest and discontent,
Reproucefulness and scorn, with that submission
bent
So strangely, in the face, by sad smiles and gay
eyes—
Quiescence which attacks, rebellion which endears, —
Say? 'As you loved me once, could you but love me now!
Years probably have graved their passage on your brow,
Lips turn more rarely red, eyes sparkle less than erst;
Sucha tribute body pays to time; but, un-ameresed,
The soul retains, nay, boasts old treasure multiplied.
Though dew-prime flee, — mature at noontide,
love defied
Chance, the wind, change, the rain: love strenuous all the more
For storm, struck deeper root and chosen fruit-
age borer,
Despite the rocking world; yet truth struck root in vain:
While tenderness bears fruit, you praise, not taste again.
Why? They are yours, which once were hardy
yours, might go
To grace another's ground; and then — the hopes we knew,
The fears we keep in mind! — when, ours to arbitrate,
Your part was to bow neck, bid fall decree of fate.

Then, O the knotty point — white-night's work to revolve—
What meant that smile, that sigh? Not Solon's self could solve!-
Then, O the deep surmise what one word might express,
And if what seemed her "No" may not have meant her "Yes!"
Then, such samby, for sense — calm welcome, such acquiesc Observance if, refused her arm, hand touched her wrist!
Now, what's a smile to you? Poor candle that lights up
The descent household gloom which sends you out to sup.
A tear? worse! warms that health requires you keep aloof
From nuptial chamber, since rain penetrates
the roof!
Soul, body got and gained, inalienably safe
Your own, become despised; more worth has any waif
Or stray from neighbor's pole: pouched then, —
't is pleasure, pride,
Novelty, property, and larceny beside!
Preposterous thought! to find no value fixed in
things,
To covet all you see, hear, dream of, till fate brings
About that, what you want, you gain; then follows change.
Give you the sun to keep, forthwith must fancy
range:
A goodly lamp, no doubt, — yet might you catch her hair
And capture, as she frisks, the fen-fire dancing
there!
What do I say? at least a meteor's half in heaven;
Provided filth but shine, my husband hankers even
After putridity that's phosphorescent, oribe
The rustic's tallow-rush, makes spoil of urechins'
squibs,
In short, prefers to me — chaste, temperate,
serene —
What sputters green and blue, this flagging called Fifine!'

XXXIV
So all your sex mistake! Strange that so plain a fact
Should raise such dire debate! Few families were racked
By torture self-supplied, did Nature grant but
this—
That women comprehend mental analysis!

XXXV
Elvire, do you recall when, years ago, our home
The intimation reached, a certain pride of Rome,
Authenticated piece, in the third, last and best Manner — whatever, fools and connoisseurs contest,—
No particle disturbed by rude restorer's touch,
The palaced picture-pearl, so long eluding clutch
Of creditor, at last, the Rafael might—could we
But come to terms—change lord, pass from the Prince to me?
I think you recollect my fervor of a year:
How the Prince would, and how he would not;
That promise was, he made his grandsire so long since,
Rather to boast "I own a Rafael" than "am Prince!"
And now, the fancy soothed—if really sell he must.
His birthright for a mess of pottage—such a thrust
I' the vitals of the Prince were mollified by balm,
Could he prevail upon his stomach to bear qualm,
And bequeath Liberty (because a purchaser
Was ready with the sum—a trifle! yes, transfer
His heart at all events to that land where, at least—
Free institutions reign! And so, its price increased Fivefold (Americans are such importunes!),
Soon must his Rafael start for the United States.
Oh, alternating bursts of hope now, then despair!
At last, the bargain's struck, I'm all but beggared, there.
The Rafael faces me, in fine, no dream at all,
My housemate, evermore to glorify my walk.
A week must pass, before heart-palpitations sink;
In gloatings o'er my gain, so late I edged the brink
Of doom; a fortnight more, I spend in Paradise:
"Was outline o'er so true, could coloring entice
So calm did harmony and quiet so avail?
How right, how resolute, the action tells the tale!"
A month, I bid my friends congratulate their best:
"You happy Don!" (to me): "The blockhead!" (to the rest):
"No doubt he thinks his daub original, poor dupe!"
Then I resume my life: one chamber must not coop.
Man's life in, though it boast a marvel like my prize.
Next year, I saunter past with unaverted eyes,
Nay, loll and turn my back: perchance to overlook,
With relish, leaf by leaf, Doré's last picture-book.

XXXVI

Imagine that a voice reproached me from its frame:
"Here do I hang, and may! Your Rafael, just the same,
'Tis only you that change; no ecstasies of yore!
No purpose suicide distracts you any more!
Prompt would my answer meet such frivolous attack:
"You misappropriate sensations. What we lack,
And labor to obtain, is hoped and feared amid
After a fashion; what they once obtain, makes doubt,
Expectance's old fret and fame, henceforward void.
But do they think to hold such havings unbothered?
By novel hopes and fears, of fashion just anew,
To correspond! the scale? Nowise, I promise you!
Mine you are, therefore mine will be, as fit a treasure.
My soul and glad my sense to-day as this day
So, any sketch or scrap, pochade, caricature,
I snap at, seize, enjoy, then tire of, throw aside.
Find you in your old places. But if a servant cried
'Fire in the gallery!'—methinks, were I engaged
In Doré, elbow-deep, picture-books mislaid.
To the four winds would pack, sped by the heartiest curse
Was ever launched from lip, to strew the universe.
Would not I brave the best o' the burning,
Either my perfect piece in safety, or else stay
And share its fate, be made its martyr, conspire
Inextricably wed, such ashes mixed with mine!"

XXXVII

For which I get the eye, the hand, the heart, the whole
O' the wondrous wife again!

XXXVIII

But no, play out your role
I' the pageant! 'Tis not fit your passion leave the stage:
I want you, there, to make you, here, confess you wage
Successful warfare, pique those proud ones, and advance
Claim to... equality? nay, but predominance
In physique o'er them all, where Helen heads the scene
Closed by its tiniest of tail-tips, pert Fifi.
How ravishingly pure you stand in pale constraint!
My new-created shape, without or touch or taints.
Inviolate of life and worldliness and sin—
Fettered, I hold my flower, her own cym's weight would win
From off the tall slight stalk a-top of which she turns
And trembles, makes appeal to one who roughly earns
Her thanks instead of blame, (did lily only know,)
By thus constraining length of lily, letting snow
Of cup-crown, that’s her face, look from its guardian stake,
Superb on all that crawls beneath, and mutely make
Defiance, with the mouth’s white movement of disdain,
To all that stoops, retires, and hovers round again!
How windingly the limbs delay to lead up, reach
Where, crowned, the head waits calm: as if reluctant, each,
That eye should traverse quick such lengths of loveliness,
From feet, which just are found embedded in the dress
Deep swathed about with folds and flowings virginal,
Up to the pleated breasts, rebellious ’neath theirail,
As if the vesture’s snow were moulding sleep not death,
Must melt and so release; whereat, from the fine sheath,
The flower-cup-crown starts free, the face is unmanned,
And what shall now divert me, once the sweet face revealed,
From all I loved so long, so lingeringly left?

XXXIX

‘Because indeed your face fits into just the cleft
O’ the heart of me, Elvire, makes right and whole once more
All that was half itself without you! As before,
My truant finds its place! Doubtlessly sea-shells yearn,
If plundered by sad chancés: would pray their pearls return,
Let negligently slip away into the wave!
Never may eyes desist, those eyes so gray and grave,
From their slow sure supply of the effluent soul within!
And, would you humor me? I dare to ask, unpin
The web of that brown hair! O’erwash o’ the sudden, but
As promptly, too, disclose, on either side, the jut
Of alabaster brow! So part rich rilletts dried
Deep by the woodland leaf, when down they pour, each side
O’ the rock-top, pushed by Spring!

XL

“‘And where is the world is all
This wonder, you detail so trippingly, espied?
My mirror would reflect a tall, thin, pale, deep-eyed Personage, pretty once, it may be, doubtless still Loving, — a certain grace yet lingers, if you will, —
But all this wonder, where?”

XLI

Why, where but in the sense
And soul of me, Art’s judge? Art is my evidence
That something was, is, might be; but no more thing itself.
Than flame is fuel. Once the verse-book laid on shelf,
The picture turned to wall, the music fled
Each beauty, born of each, grows clearer and more clear,
Mine henceforth, ever mine!

XLII

But if I would retrace
Effect, in Art, to cause, — corroborate, erase
What ‘s right or wrong? I the lines, test fancy in my brain
By fact which gave it birth? I re-peruse in vain
The verse, I fail to find that vision of delight
I’ the Bazzi’s lost-profile, eye-edge so exquisite.
And, music: what? that burst of pillared cloud by day
And pillared fire by night, was product, must we say,
Of modulating just, by enharmonic change, —
The augmented sixth resolved, — from out the straighter range
Of D sharp minor — leap of disimprisoned thrill —
Into thy light and life, D major natural?

XLIII

Elvire, will you partake in what I shall impart? I seem to understand the way heart chooses heart
By help of the outside form, — a reason for our wild
Diversity in choice, — why each grows reconciled
To what is absent, what superfluous in the mask
Of flesh that’s meant to yield, — did nature ply her task
As artist should, — precise the features of the soul
Which, if in any case they found expression, whole
I’ the traits, would give a type, undoubtedly display
A novel, true, distinct perfection in its way.
Never shall I believe any two souls were made Similar; granting, then, each soul of every grade
Was meant to be itself, prove in itself complete,
And, in completion, good, — nay, best o’ the kind, — as most Needs must it be that show on the outside correspond
With inward substance,—flesh, the dress which soul has donned,
Exactly reproduce,—were only justice done
Inside and outside too,—types perfect every one.
How happens it that here we meet a mystery
Insoluble to man, a plaguy puzzle? Why
Each soul is either made imperfect, and deserves
As rude a face to match; or else a bungler swerves,
And nature, on a soul worth rendering aight,
Works ill, or proves perverse, or, in her own despite,
—Here too much, there too little,—bids each face, more or less,
Retire from beauty, make approach to ugliness? And yet succeeds the same: since, what is wanting to success,
If somehow every face, no matter how deform,
Evidence, to some one of hearts on earth, that,
Warm Beneath the veryest sah, there hides a spark of soul
Which, quickened by love’s breath, may yet pervade the whole
O’ the gray, and, free again, be fire?—of worth the same,
How’er produced, for, great or little, flame is flame.
A mystery, whereof solution is to seek.

I find it in the fact that each soul, just as weak
Its own way as its fellow,—departure from design
As flagrant in the flesh,—goes striving to combine
With what shall right the wrong, the under or above
The standard: supplement unloveliness by love.
—Ask Plato else! And this corroboration the rage,
That Art,—which I may style the love of loving, rage
Of knowing, seeing, feeling the absolute truth of things
For truth’s sake, whole and sole, not any good, truth brings
The knower, seer, feeler, besides,—instinctive Art
Must tumble for the whole, once fixing on a part
However poor, surpass the fragment, and aspire
To reconstruct thereby the ultimate entire
Art, working with a will, discards the superfluous,
Contributes to defect, toils on till,—
There’s the restored, the prime, the individual type!

Look, for example now! This piece of broken pipe
(Some shipman’s solace erst) shall act as crayon; and What tablet better serves my purpose than the sand?
—Smooth slab whereon I draw, no matter with what skill,
A face, and yet another, and yet another still.
There lie my three prime types of beauty!

"Exaggeration and absurdity?" Confessed:
Yet, what may that face mean, no matter in its nose,
A yard long, or its chin, a foot short?

"You suppose Horror?" Exactly! What’s the odds if more or less
By yard or foot, the features do manage to express
Such reasoning in the main? Were I of Gérome’s force,
Nor feeble as you see, quick should my crayon course
O’er outline, curb, excite, till,—so complete SPEEDS
With Gérome well at work,—observe how brow recedes,
Head shudders back on spine, as if one basted the hair.
Would have the full-face front what pis-pis eye’s sharp stare
Announces; mouth agape to drink the flowing fate,
While chin protrudes to meet the burst o’ the wave: slate
Almost, spurred on to brave necessity, expend
All life left, in one flash, as fire does at its end.
Retrenchment and addition effect a masterpiece.
Not change i’ the motive: here diminish, then increase—
And who wants Horror, has it.

Who wants some other show
Of soul, may seek elsewhere,—this second o’ the row?
What does it give for garm, monadic mere intent
Of mind in face, faint first of meanings ever meant?
Why, possibly, a grin, that, strengthened, grows a laugh:
That, softened, leaves a smile; that, tempered, bids you quaff
At such a magic cup as English Reynolds once
Compound’d: for the witch pulls out of ye serene
Like Garrick’s to Thalia, however due may be
Your homage claimed by that stiff-stoled Molpomene!

And just this one face more! Pardon the bold pretense!
May there not lurk some hint, struggle toward evidence
In that compressed mouth, those strained nostrils, steadfast eyes
Of utter passion, absolute self-sacrifice,
Which — could I but subdue the wild grotesque, refine
That bulge of brow, make blunt that nose's aquiline,
And let, although compressed, a point of pulp appear
I' the mouth — would give at last the portrait of Elvire?

Well, and if so succeed hand-practice on awry
Preposterous art-mistake, shall soul-proficiency
Despair, — when exercised on nature, which at worst
Always implies success, — however crossed and curt
By failure, — such as art would emulate in vain?
Shall any soul despair of setting free again
Trait after trait, until the type as wholly start
Forth, visible to sense, as that minutest part, (What'ere the chance,) which first arresting eye,
warned soul
That, under wrong enough and ravage, lay the whole
O' the loveliness it "loved" — I take the accepted phrase?

So I account for tastes: each chooses, none gainsays
The fancy of his fellow, a paradise for him,
A hell for all beside. You can but crown the brim
O' the cup; if it be full, what matters less or more?
Let each, i' the world, amend his love, as I, o' the shore,
My sketch, and the result as undisputed be!
Their handiwork to them, and my Elvire to me:
— Result more beautiful than beauty's self, when lo
What was my Rafael turns my Michelagluolo!

For, we two boast, beside our pearl, a diamond.
I' the palace gallery, the corridor beyond,
Upheaves itself a marble, a magnitude man-shaped As snow might be. One hand — the Master's — smoothed and scraped
That mass, he hammered on and hewed at, till he hurled
Life out of death, and left a challenge for the world,
Death still, — since who shall dare, close to the image, say
If this be purposed Art, or mere mimetic play
Of Nature? — went to deal with crag or cloud, as stuff
To fashion novel forms, like forms we know, enough
For recognition, but enough unlike the same,
To leave no hope ourselves may profit by her game;
Death therefore to the world. Step back a pace or two!

And then, who dares dispute the gradual birth its due
Of breathing life, or breathless immortality,
Where out she stands, and yet stops short, half bold, half shy,
Heiates on the threshold of things, since partly blent
With stuff she needs must quit, her native element
I' the mind o' the Master, — what's the creature, dear-divine
Yet earthly-awful too, so manly-feminine,
Pretends this white advance? What startling brain-escape
Of Michelagluolo takes elemental shape?
I think he meant the daughter of the old man o' the sea,
Emerging from her wave, goddess Eidothae —
She who, in elvish sport, spite with benevolence
Mistook Mab-wise up, must needs instruct the Hero whence Salvation dawns o'er that mad misery of his isle.
Yes, she imparts to him, by what a pranksome wife
He may surprise her sire, asleep beneath a rock,
When he has told their tale, amid his webfoot flock
Of sea-beasts, "fine fat seals with bitter breath!" laughs she.
At whom she likes to save, no less: Eidothae,
Whom you shall never face evolved, in earth, in air,
In wave, — but, manifest i' the soul's domain,
why, there
She ravishingly moves to meet you, all through aid
O' the soul! Bid shine what should, dismiss into the shade
What should not be, — and there triumphs the paramount
Emprise o' the Master! But, attempt to make account
Of what the sense, without soul's help perceives? I bought
That work — (despite plain proof, whose hand it was had wrought
I' the rough: I think we trace the tool of triple tooth,
Here, there, and everywhere) — bought dearly that uncouth Unwieldy bulk, for just ten dollars — "Bulk, would fetch — Converted into lime — some five pails!" grinned a wretch,
Who, bound on business, paused to hear the bargaining,
And would have pitied me "but for the fun o' the thing!"

Shall such a wretch be — you? Must — while I show Elvire
Shaming all other forms, seen as I see her here
I' the soul, — this other-you perversely look outside,
And ask me, "Where i' the world is charm to be descried
I' the tall thin personage, with paled eye, pen-

Whether an aura girds the soul, wherein it seems

To float and move, a belt of all the glints and gleams

It struck from out that world, its weaker fellows found

So dead and cold; or whether these not so much surround,

As pass into the soul itself, add worth to worth,

As wine enriches blood, and straightway send it

forth,

Conquering and to conquer, through all eternity,

That 's battle without end.

What purpose serves the soul that strives, or world it tries

Conclusions with, unless the fruit of victory

Stay, one and all, stored up and guaranteed its own

Forever, by some mode whereby shall be made known

The gain of every life. Death reads the title clear—

What each soul for itself conquered from out things here:

Since, in the seeing soul, all worth lies, I assert,—

And nought i' the world, which, save for soul

that sees, inert

Was, is, and would be ever,—stuff for trans-

muting,—null

And void until man's breath evoke the beautiful—

But, touched aright, prompt yields each particle

its tongue

Of elemental flame,—no matter whence flame sprung

From gums and spice, or else from straw and rottenness,

So long as soul has power to make them burn, express

What lights and warms henceforth, leaves only ash behind,

H owe'er the chance: if soul be privileged to find

Food so soon that, by first snatch of eye, suck

of breath,

It can absorb pure life: or, rather, meeting death

I' the shape of ugliness, by fortunate recoil

So put on its resources, it find therein a foil

For a new birth of life, the challenged soul's response

To ugliness and death,—creation for the nono.

LVI

I gather heart through just such conquest of the soul,

Through evocation out of that which, as the whole,

Was rough, ungainly, partial accomplishment

at best,

And—what, at worst, save failure to spit a and detest?—

—or

—Through transference of all, achieved in visible things,

To where, secured from wrong, rest soul's imagination,—

Through ardor to bring help just where complication halts,

Do justice to the purpose, ignore the slips and faults—

And, last, through waging with deformity a

fight

Which wrings thence, at the end, precise is opposite,

I praise the loyalty o' the scholar,—stung by samer

Of fools. " Does this evince thy Master was so vaunted?"

Did he then perpetrate the plain abomin-

ations here?"—

Who cries, "His work am I! full fraught by him. I clear

His fame from each result of accident and

time,

Myself restore his work to its fresh morning prime,

Not daring touch the mass of marble, fear-

deride,

But putting my idea in plaster by its side.

His, since mine; I, he made, vindicate we made me!"

FIFINE AT THE FAIR

Except a special soul had gained it, — that such gain
Can ever be estranged, do aught but appertain
Immortally, by right firm, indefasible,
To who performed the feat, through God’s grace and man’s will!
Gain, never shared by those who practised with earth’s stuff,
And spoiled whate’er they touched, leaving its roughness bare,
Its blankness bare, and, when the ugliness opposed,
Either that work or laughed “He doted or he dozed!”

LIX

While, oh, how all the more will love become intense
Hereafter, when “to love” means yearning to dispense,
Each soul, its own amount of gain through its own mode
Of practising with life, upon some soul which owed
Its treasure, all diverse and yet in worth the
same,
To new work and changed way! Things furnish you rose-flame,
Which burn up red, green, blue, nay, yellow
more than needs.
For me, I nowise doubt; why doubt a time succeeds
When each one may impart, and each receive,
both share
The chemic secret, learn, — where I lit force,
why there
You drew forth lambent pity, — where I found only food
For self-indulgence, you still blew a spark at brood
I’ the integral ember, stopped not till selfsacriﬁce imbued
Heaven’s face with flame? What joy, when each may supplement
The other, changing each, as changed, till,
wholly bient.
Our old things shall be new, and, what we both ignite,
Fuse, lose the varicolored in achromatic white!
Exemplifying law, apparent even now
In the eternal progress, — love’s law, which I avow
And thus would formulate: each soul lives, longs and works
For itself, by itself, because a lodestar lurks,
An other than itself, — in whatsoever the niche
Of mistiest heaven it hide, who’s-er the Glumdalelch
May grasp the Gulliver: or it, or he, or she —
Thescottos e broteios eper kekrumene,
(For fun’s sake, where the phrase has fastened, leaves it ﬁxed!)
So soft it says, — “God, man, or both together mixed!”
This, guessest at through the ﬂesh, by parts which prove the whole,
This constitutes the soul discernible by soul
— Ervire, by me!

LX

“And then” — (pray you, permit remain
This hand upon my arm! — your cheek dried,
if you deign,
Choosing my shoulder) — “then!” — (Stand up for, boldly stale
The objection in its length and breadth!) “You abdicate,
With boast yet on your lip, soul’s empire, and accept
The rule of sense: the Man, from monarch’s throne has stept—
Leapt, rather, at one bound, to base, and there lies, Brute.
You talk of soul, — how soul, in search of soul
to suit,
Must needs review the sex, the army, rank and file
Of womankind, report no face nor form so vile
But that a certain worth, by certain signs, may thence Evolve itself and stand confessed — to soul —
by sense.
Sense? Oh, the loyal bee endeavors for the hive!
Disinterested hunts the ﬂower-ﬁeld through,
alive
Not one mean moment, no, — suppose on sugar
he light, —
To his peculiar drop, petal-dew perquisite,
Matter-of-course smacked matched: unless he taste, how try?
This, light on tongue-tip laid, allows him pack
his thigh,
Transport all he counts prize, provision for the comb,
Food for the future day, — a banquet, but at
home!
Soul? Ere you reach Fifine’s, some ﬂesh may be to pass!
That burned brow, that eye, a kindling chryso-opreas,
Beneath its stiff black lash, inquisitive how speeds
Each functional limb, how play of foot suc-
sceeds,
And how you let escape or duly sympathize
With gastro-knemian grace, — true, your soul
tastes add triest,
And trifles time with these, but, fear not, will arrive
At essence in the core, bring honey home to
hive,
Brain-stock and heart-stuff both — to strike
objectors dumb—
Since only soul affords the soul ﬁt pabulum!
Be frank for charity! Who is it you deceive?
Yourself or me or God, with all this make believe?”

LXI

And frank I will respond as you interrogate.
Ah, Music, wouldst thou help! Words struggle with the weight
So feebly of the False, thick element between
Our soul, the True, and Truth! which, but that intervene
False shows of things, were reached as easily by thought:
Reducible to word, as now by yearnings, wrought.
Up with thy fine free force, O Music, that canst thrid
Electrically win a passage through the lid
Of earthly sepulchre, our words may push against,
Hardly transpire as thou! Not dissipate, thou desig'nat,
So much as trickishly elude what words attempt
To heave away, 'tis the mass, and let the soul, exempt
From all that vaporly obstruction, view, instead
Of glimmer underneath, a glory overhead.
Not feebly, like our phrase, against the barrier go
In suspensive swell the authentic notes I know.
By help whereof, I would our souls were found without
The pale, above the dense and dim which breeds the doubt!
But Music, dumb for you, withdraws her help from me;
And, since to weary words recourse again must be,
At least permit they rest their burden here and there,
Music-like: cover space! My answer, — need you care
If it exceed the bounds, reply to questioning
You never meant should plague? Once fairly on the wing,
Let me flap far and wide!

LXII
For this is just the time.
The place, the mood in you and me, when all things chime.
Clash forth life's common chord, whence, list how there ascend
Harmonies far and faint, till our perception end.
Reverberated notes whence we construct the scale
Embracing what we know and feel and are!
How fail To find or, better, lose your question, in this quick
Reply which nature yields, ample and catholic?
For, arm in arm, we too have reached, nay, passed, you see,
The village-precinct; sun sets mild on Sainte-Marie —
We only catch the spire, and yet I seem to know What 's hid l' the turn o' the hill: how all the graves must glow
Soberly, as each warms its little iron cross, Flourished about with gold, and graced (if private lose
Be fresh) with stiff rose-wreath of yellow crisp bead-blooms
Which tempt down birds to pay their supper, 'mid the tombs,
With prattle good as song, amuse the ear awhile,
If couched they hear beneath the matted bough mile!

LXIII
Bid them good-by before last friend is sung and supped!
Because we pick our path and need our eye abrupt
Desolate enough, — but here 's the beach, there 's the bay,
And, opposite, the streak of Île Noirmoutier.
Thither the waters tend; they freshen as they haste,
At feel o' the night-wind, though, by cliff or cliff embraced,
This breadth of blue retains its self-possessed still:
As you and I intend to do, who take our fill
Of sights and sounds — soft sound, the courtly hum and skip
Of insects we disturb, and that good fellowship
Of rabbits our footfall sends huddling, each hide
He best knows how and where; and virus, whirred past, wings wide?
That was an owl, their young may just apprehend!
Though you refuse to speak, your beating heart my friend,
I feel against my arm, — though your beat be fast for birds
A look into your eyes, yet, on my cheek, the lids
That ope and shut, soft send a silken thrill the same.
Well, out of all and each these nothings, one what came Often enough before, the something that we aim
Once more at the old mark: the impulse to last
Success where hitherto was failure in the past.
And yet again essay the adventure. Cloak and singing
No bird to its couched corpse, " Into the true of things —
Out of their falseness rise, and reach thou, remain!"

LXIV
"That rise into the true out of the false explain?"
May an example serve? In yonder bay I hailed
This sunny morning: swam my best, then lay half swathed
With chill, and half with warmth, l' the dawn's midmost deep:
You know how one — not treads, but stands in water? Keep Body and limbs below, hold head back, up to chin.
And, for the rest, leave care! If brow, eye, mouth, should win Their freedom, — excellant! If they — brook the surge,
FIFINE AT THE FAIR

No matter though they sink, let but the nose emerge,
So, all of me in brine lay soaking: did I care
One jot? I kept alive by man's due breath of air
I' the nostrils, high and dry. At times, o'er these would run
The ripple, even wash the wavelet, — morning's sun
Tempting advance, no doubt: and always flash of froth,
Fish-outbreak, bubbling by, would find me nothing loth
To rise and look around; then all was overswept
With dark and death at once. But trust the old adopt!
Back went again the head, a merest motion made,
Fin-fashion, either hand, and nostril soon conveyed
Assurance light and life were still in reach as fate:
Always the last and — wait and watch — sometimes the first.
Try to ascend breast-high? wave arms wide free of tether?
Be in the air and leave the water altogether?
Under went again, till I resigned myself
To only breathe the air, that's footed by an elf,
And only swim the water, that's native to a fish
But there is no denying that, ere I curbed my wish,
And schooled my restive arms, salt entered mouth and eyes
Often enough — sun, sky, and air so tantalize!
Still, the adept swims, this accorded, that denied:
Can always breathe, sometimes see and be satisfied!

\noindent \textbf{LXV}

I liken to this play o' the body — fruitless strife
To slip the sea and hold the heaven — my spirit's life
'Twixt false, whence it would break, and true, which it would hide.
I move in, yet resist, am upborne every side
By what I beat against, an element too gross
To live in, did not soul duly obtain her close
Of life-breath, and inhale from truth's pure plenitude
Above her, snatch and gain enough to just illude
With hope that some brave bound may baffle evermore
The obstructing medium, make who swam henceforward soar:
Gains scarcely snatched when, foiled by the very effort, souse,
Underneath dunks the soul, her truthward yearnings down
Deeper in falsehood I say, but fitted less and less
To bear in nose and mouth old briny bitterness Proved alien more and more: since each experience proves Air — the essential good, not sea, wherein who Must thence, in the act, escape, apart from will or wish.

Move a mere hand to take water-weed, jelly-fish,
Upward you tend! And yet our business with the sea
Is not with air, but just o' the water, watery:
We must endure the false, no particle of which
Do we acquaint us with, but up we mount a pitch
Above it, find our head reach truth, while hands explore
The false below: so much while here we bathe,

\noindent \textbf{LXVI}

Now, there is one prime point (hear and be edified!)
One truth more true for me than any truth beside —
To-wit, that I am I, who have the power to swim,
The skill to understand the law whereby each limb
May bear to keep immersed, since, in return, made sure
That its mere movement lifts head clean through overture.
By practice with the false, I reach the true?
Why, then: it follows, that the more I gain self-confidence,
Get proof I know the trick, can float, sink, rise, at will,
The better I submit to what I have the skill
To conquer in my turn, even now, and by and by Leave wholly for the land, and there laugh, shake me dry.
To last drop, saturate with noonday — no need more
Of wet, and fret, plagued once: on Pornic's placid shore,
Abundant air to breathe, sufficient sun to feel!
Meantime I buoy myself: no whitt my senses reel
When over me there breaks a bellow; nor, slate
Too much by some brief taste, I quaff intermittate
The air, o'ertop breast-high the wave-environment.
Full well I know the thing I grasp, as if intent
To hold, — my wandering wave, — will not be grasped at all:
The solid-seeming grasped, the handful great
Or small
Must go to nothing, glide through fingers fast enough:
But none the less, to treat liquidity as stuff —
Though failure — certainly succeeds beyond its aim,
Sends head above, past thing that hands miss, or the same.

\noindent \textbf{LXVII}

So with this wash o' the world, wherein life-long we drift;
We push and paddle through the foam by making shift
To breathe above at whiles when, after deepest duck
Down underneath the show, we put forth hand and pluck
At what seems somehow like reality—a soul.
I catch at this and that, to capture and contr.
Presume I hold a prize, discover that my pains
Are rightly taught: my hands are barked, my head regain.
The surface where I breathe and look about, a space.
The soul that helped me mount? Swallowed up in the race.
O' the path, some who knows whence, gone gayly who knows where!
I thought the prize was mine; I flattered myself.
It did its duty, though: I felt it, it felt me;
Or, where I look about and breathe, I should not be.
The main point is—the false fluidity was bound Aknowledgment that it frothed o'er substance, nowise found Fluid, but firm and true. Man, outcast,
"Howls,"—at rods?—
If "sent in playful spray a-shivering to his gods!"
Childishest child, man makes thereby no bad exchange.
Stay with the flat-fish, thou! We like the exchange
Where the "gods" live, perchance the demons also dwell:
Where operates a Power, which every throbb and swell
Of human heart invites that human soul ap-roach, "Sent" near and nearer still, however "spray" encroach
On "shivering" flesh below, to altitudes, which gained,
Evil proved good, wrong right, obscurity ex-
And "howling" childishness. Whose howl have we to thank.
If all the dogs 'gan bark and puppies whine, till sink
Each yelpers's tail 'twixt legs? for Huntsman
Common-sense Came to the rescue, bade prompt thaw of thong dispense Quiet! the kennel; taught that ocean might be blue,
And rolling and much more, and yet the soul have, too,
Its touch of God's own flame, which he may so expand,
"Who measured the waters i' the hollow of his hand,"
That ocean's self shall dry, turn dewdrop in respect
Of all-triumphant fire, matter with intellect
Once fairly matched; bade him who egged on hounds to bay,
Go curse, i' the poultry yard, his kind: "there let him lay"
The swan's one added egg: which yet shall put to use,
Rub breast-bone warm against, so many a sterile goose!

---

LXVIII

No, I want skye not sea, prefer the lark a shrimp.
And never dive so deep but that I get a glimpse
O' the blue above, a breath of the air around.
Elvire, I seize—by catching at the melted berial hue,
The tawnys hair that just has trickled off,
Fifine!
Did we not two trip forth to just enjoy the scene,
The tumbling-troop arrayed, the strollers as their stage,
Drawn up and under arms, and ready to engage—
Dabble, and there an end, with foam and froth
O'er face, Till suddenly Fifine suggested change of place:
Now we taste ether, scomb the wave, and interchange space.
No ordinary thoughts, but such as evidence
The cultivated mind in both. On what pretence
Are you and I to sneer at who lent help to hand,
And gave the lucky lift?

---

LXIX

Still sour? I understand.
One ugly circumstance discredits my fair plan.
That Woman does the work: I waive the help of Man.
"Why should experiment be tried with only waves,"
When solid spar float round? Still see
The mermaids saves
Too pertinaciously, as though no Triton, baf
As e'er blew brine from ouch, were free to help enough!
Surely, to recognize a man, his mates save
Why is there not the same or greater interest
In the strong spouse as in the pretty persons pray,
Were recognition just your object, as you say.
Amid this element o' the false?"

---

LXX

We come to terms,
I need to be proved true; and nothing so con-

---

LXXI

Because, one woman's worth, in that respect, such hairy hosts
Of the other sex and sort! Men? Say you have the power
To make them yours, rule men, throughout life's little hour,
According to the phrase; what follows? Men, you make,
By ruling them, your own: each man for his own sake
Accepts you as his guide, avails him of what worth
He apprehends in you to sublimate his earth
With fire: content, if so you convoy him through night,
That you shall play the sun, and he, the satellite.
Piffer your light and heat and virtue, starry self,
While, caught up by your course, he turns upon himself.
Women rush into you, and there remain absorbed.
Beside, 't is only men completely formed, full-orbed,
Are fit to follow track, keep pace, illustrate so
The leader: any sort of woman may bestow
Her atom on the star, or cold she counts for such.—
Each little making less bigger by just that much.
Women grow you, while men depend on you at best.
And what dependence! Bring and put him to the test,
Your specimen disciple, a handbreadth separate
From you, he almost seemed to touch before! A bate Complacency you will, I judge, at what's divulged!
Some flabbiness you fixed, some vacancy outbulged,
Some—much—nay, all, perhaps, the outward man's your work:
But, inside man?—find him, wherever he may lurk,
And where 's a touch of you in his true self?

LXXXII
I wish
Some wind would waft this way a glassy bubble-fish
O' the kind the sea inflates, and show you, once detached
From wave... or no, the event is better told than Chanced;
Still may the thing float free, globose and opaline
All over, save where just the amethysts combine
To blue their best, rim-round the sea-flower with a tinge.
Earth's violet never knew! Well, 'neath that gem-tipped fringe,
A head lurks—of a kind—that acts as stomach too;
Then comes the emptiness which out the water blew
So big and belly-like, but, dry of water drained,
Withers away nine-tenths. Ah, but a tenth remained!
That was the creature's self: no more akin to sea,

LXXXIII
Poor rudimental head and stomach, you agree,
Than sea's akin to sun who yonder dips his edge.

LXXXIV
But take the rill which ends a race o'er yonder ledge
O' the fissured cliff, to find its fate in smoke below!
Disengage that, and ask—what news of life, you know
It led, that long lone way, through pasture, plain and waste?
All's gone to give the sea! no touch of earth, no taste
Of air, reserved to tell how rushes used to bring
The butterfly and bee, and fisher-bird that's king
O' the purple kind, about the snow-soft silver-sweet
Infant of mist and dew; only these atoms fleet,
Embittered evermore, to make the sea one drop
More big thereby—if thought keep count where sense must stop.

LXXXV
The full-blown ingrate, more recipient of the brine,
That takes all and gives naught, is Man; the feminine Rillet that, taking all and giving naught in turn
Goes headlong to her death i' the sea, without concern
For the old inland life, snow-soft and silver-clear,
That's woman—typified from Fifine to Elvire.

LXXXV
Then, how diverse the modes prescribed to who would deal
With either kind of creature! 'T is Man, you seek to seal
Your very own? Resolve, for first step, to discard Nine-tenths of what you are! To make, you must be marred,—
To raise your race, must stoop,—to teach them aught, must learn
Ignorance, meet halfway what most you hope to spurn
I' the sequel. Change yourself, disseminate the thought
And vulgarize the word, and see the deed be brought
To look like nothing done with any such intent
As teach men—though perchance it teach, by accident!
So may you master men: assured that if you show
One point of mastery, departure from the low
And level,—head or heart-revolt at long disguise,
Immurement, stifling soul in mediocrity,—
If inadvertently a gesture, much more, word
Reveal the hunter no companion for the herd,
His chance of capture's gone. Success means, they may snuff,
Examine, and report,—a brother, sure enough,
Disport him in brute-guisce; for skin is truly skin.
Horns, hoofs, are hoofs and horns, and all, outside and in,
Is veritable beast, whom fellow-beasts resigned
May follow, made a prize in honest pride, behind
One of themselves and not creation's upstart lord!
Well, there's your prize i'the pound—much joy may it afford
My Indian! Make survey and tell me,—was it worth
You acted part so well, went all-fours upon earth
The live-long day, brayed, belled, and all to bring to pass
That stage should deign eat hay when winter stints them grass?

LXXVI
So much for men, and how disguise may make them mind
Their master. But you have to deal with womankind?
Abandon stratagem for strategy! Cast quite
The vile disguise away, try truth clean-opposite
Such creep-and-crawl, stand forth for what it is, might it chance,
Somewhat of angel too!—what'ser inheritance,
Actual on earth, in heaven prospective, be your boast,
Lay claim to! Your best self revealed at uttermost.
That's the wise way o'the strong! And s'en should falsehood tempt
The weaker sort to swerve,—at least the lie's exempt
From slur, that's loathlier still, of aiming to deceive
Rather than elevate its object. Mimie grace,
Not make deformity your mask! Be sick by stealth,
Nor traffic with disease—malingering in health!
No more of: “Countrymen, I boast me one like you—
My lot, the common strength, the common weakness too!
I think the thoughts you think; and if I have the knack
Of fitting thoughts to words, you peradventure lack.
Envy me not the chance, yourselves more fortunate!
Many the loaded ship self-sunk through treasure freight,
Many the pregnant brain brought never child to birth,
Many the great heart broke beneath its girdle-girth!
Be mine the privilege to supplement defect,
Give a dumness voice, and let the laboring intellect
Find utterance in word, or possibly in deed!

What though I seem to go before? 'tis you that lead!
I follow what I see so plain—the general mael
Projected, pillar-wise, flame kindled by the kind,
Which dwarfs the unit—me—to insignificance!
Halt you, I stop forthwith,—proceeded, I too advance!

LXXVII
Ay, that's the way to take with men ye wish to lead, Instruct and benefit. Small prospect you see
With women so! Be all that's great and good and wise,
August, sublime—swell out your frog the right ox-size—
He's buoyed like a balloon, to soar, not burst,
You never'll see! The more you prove yourself, less fear the prize will flee
The captor. Here you start after no pompous stag
Who condescends be snared, with toms of horn and brag
Of bray, and ramp of hoof; you have not to subdue
The foe through letting him imagine he saves you!
'Tis rather with...

LXXVIII
Ah, thanks! quick—where the dipping fist
Shows red against the rise and fall o'the face
there frik
In shoal the—pomposities? Dolphins, they shall and must Cut through the freshening clear—dolphins, my instance just!
'Tis fable, therefore truth: who has to do with these,
Needs not your practice trick of going hands and knees
As beasts require. Art fain the fish to captivate?
Gather thy greatness round, Arion! Stand in state,
As when the banqueting thrilled conscious—like a rose
Throughout its hundred leaves at that approach it knews
Of music in the bird—while Corinth grew one breast
A-throb for song and thee; nay, Persiander pressed
The Mæthymnian hand, and felt a king indeed, and guessed
How Phoebus' self might give that great mouth
Of the gods
Such a magnificence of song! The pillar nods,
Rocks roof, and trembles door, gigantic, post and jamb,
As harp and voice rend air—the shattering din and throb!
So stand thou, and assume the robe that tinges
yet
With triumph; strike the harp, whose every golden fret
Still soundeth with the flame, was late at fingers' end —
So, standing on the bench o' the ship, let voice expand
Thy soul, sing, unalloyed by measner mode, thine own,
The Orphian lay; then leap from music's lofty throne
Into the lowest surge, make fearlessly thy launch!
Whatever storm may threat, some dolphin will be stanch!
Whatever roughness rage, some exquisite seeing
Will surely rise to save, will bear — palpitating —
One proud humility of love beneath its load —
Stern tide, part wave, till both roll on, thy jewell'd road —
Of triumph, and the grim o' the gulf grow wonder-white
I' the phosphorescent wake; and still the exquisite
Sea-things stem on, savs still, palpitating thus,
Lands safe at length its load of love at Temorus,
True woman-creature!

LXXXIX
Man? Ah, would you prove what power
Marks man, — what fruit his tree may yield, beyond the sour
And stunted crab, he calls love-apple, which remains:
After you toil and moil your utmost, — all, love gains
By lavishing manure? — try quite the other plan!
And, to obtain the strong true product of a man,
Set him to hate a little! Leave cherishing his root,
And rather prune his branch, nip off the pettiest shoot
Superfluous on his bough! I promise, you shall learn
By what grace came the goat, of all beasts else, to earn
Such favor with the god o' the grape: 't was only he
Who, browsing on its tops, stung fertility
Into the stock's heart, stayed much growth of tendril-twine,
Some faintish flower, perhaps, but gained the indignant wine,
Wrath of the red press! Catch the puniest of the kind —
Man-animalcule, starved body, stunted mind,
And, as you nip the blotch 'twixt thumb and finger-nail,
Admire how heaven above and earth below
No jet to soothe the mite, sore at God's prime offence
In making mites at all, — coax from its impotence

One virile drop of thought, or word, or deed, by strain
To propagate for once — which nature rendered vain,
Who lets first failure stay, yet eares not to record
Mistake that seems to cast opprobrium on the Lord!
Such were the gain from love's best pains!
But let the elf
Be touched with hate, because some real man bears himself
Manlike in body and soul, and, since he lives, must thwart
And furify and set a-fizz this counterpart
O' the pimomre that's surprised to offervescence, if,
By chance, black bottle come in contact with chalk cliff,
Aeid with alkali! Then thrice the bulk, out blows
Our insect, does its kind, and cuckoo-spits some rose!

LXXX
No — 'tis ungainly work, the ruling men, at best!
The gracefule instinct's right: 't is women stand confessed
Auxiliary, the gain that never goes away,
Takes nothing and gives all: Elvire, Fifine, 't is they Convince, — if little, much, no matter! — one degree
The more, at least, convince unreasonable me
That I am, anyhow, a truth, though all else seem
And be not: if I dream, at least I know I dream.
The falsity, beside, is fleeting: I can stand Still, and let truth come back, — your steady ing touch of hand
Assists me to remain self-centred, fixed amid
All on the move. Believe in me, at once you bid Myself believe that, since one soul has disengaged
Mine from the shows of things, so much is fact: I waged
No foolish warfare, thei, with shades, myself a shade,
Here in the world — may hope my pains will be repaid!
How false things are, I judge: how changeable, I learn:
When, where, and how it is I shall see truth return,
That I expect to know, because Fifine knows me! —
How much more, if Elvire!

LXXXI
"And why not, only she?
Since there can be for each, one Best, no more, such Best;
For body and mind of him, abolishes the rest
O' the simply Good and Better. You please select Elvire
To give you this belief in truth, dispel the fear
FIFINE AT THE FAIR

Youself are, after all, as false as what surround
And why not be content? When we two watched the rounds
The boatman made, 'twixt shoal and sandbank, yesternight account,
As, at dead slack of tide, he chose to push his way
With oar and pole, across the creek, and reach the isle
After a world of pains — my word provoked you 'a while
Yet none the less deserved reply: 'T were wiser wait
The turn o' the tide, and find conveyance for his freight—
How easily — within the ship to purpose moored,
Managed by sails, not oars! But no — the man 's allured
By liking for the new and hard in his exploit —
First come shall serve! He makes — courageous and adroit —
The merest willow-leaf of boat do duty, bear
His merchandise across: once over, needs he care
If folk arrive by ship, six hours hence, fresh and gay!
No: he acorns commonplace, affects the unusual way;
And good Elvire is moored, with not a breath to flap
The yards of her, no lift of ripple to o'erlap.
Keel, much less, prow. What care? since a cookie-shell,
Fifine, that's tant and crank, and carries just as well
Such seamanship as yours!'

LXXXII

Alack, our life is lent,
From first to last, the whole, for this experiment
Of proving what I say — that we ourselves are true!
I would there were one voyage, and then no more to do
But tread the firm-land, tempt the uncertain sea no more
I would we might dispense with chance of shore for shore
To evidence our skill, demonstrate — in no dream
It was, we tided o'er the trouble of the stream.
I would the steady voyage, and not the fitful trip,— Elvire, and not Fifine,—might test our seamanship.
But why expend one's breath to tell you, change of boat
Means change of tactics too? Come see the same afloat
To-morrow, all the change, new stowage fore and aft
O' the cargo; then, to cross requires new sailer-craft!
To-day, one step from stern to bow keeps boat in trim:

To-morrow, some big stone — or woe to best and him!—
Must ballast both. That man stands for Miel, paramount
Throughout the adventure: ay, how e'er ye vertebrate your account,
'Tis mind that navigates, — skips over, 'twixt between
The bales i' the boat, — now gives importance to the mean,
And now abates the pride of life, accepts all fact,
Discards all fiction, — steers Fifine, and cries, 't the act,
"Thou art so bad, and yet so delicate a bower! Wouldst tell no end of lies: I talk to smile and frown!
Wouldst rob me: do men blame a squirrel lithe and sly,
For pilfering the nut she adds to hoard? Ne I."
Elvire is true, as truth, honesty's self, alack!
The plume! too safe the ship, the transport there and back
Too certain! one may roll and lounge and leave the helm,
Let wind and tide do work: no fear the waves o'erwhelm
The steedily-going bark, as sure to feel her way
Blindfold across, reach land, next year as yesterday!
How can I but suspect, the true feat were to slip
Down side, transfer myself to cockle-shell fast ship,
And try if, trusting to sea-tracklessness, I class
With those around whose breast grew oak as triple brass:
Who dreaded no degree of death, but, with dry eyes,
Surveyed the turgid main and its masteneties —
And rendered futile so, the prudent Power's decree
Of separate earth and disassociating sea;
Since, how is it observed, if impious vessel leap
Across, and tempt a thing they should not touch — the deep?
(See Horace to the boat, wherein, for Athens bound,
When Virgil must embark — Jove keep his safe and sound! —
The poet bade his friend start on the watery road,
Much reassured by this so comfortable odes)

LXXXIII

Then, never grudge my poor Fifine her compliment!
The rakish craft could slip her moorings in the tent,
And, hoisting every stitch of spangled canvas, steer
Through divers rocks and shoals, — in fine, de posit here
Your Virgil of a spouse, in Attica: yes, thrid
The mob of men, select the special virtue hid
In him, foresooth, and say — or rather, smile so sweet.
Of all the multitude, you — I prefer to cheat!
Are you for Athens bound? I can perform the trip,
Shove little pinacee off, while you superior ship.
The Elvire, refits in port!" So, off we push from beach
Of Pornic town, and lo, ere eye can wink, we reach
The Long Walls, and I prove that Athens is no mast,
For there the temples rise! they are, they nowise seem!
Earth is not all one lie, this truth attests me true!
Thanks therefore to Fifine! Elvire, I 'm back with you!
Share in the memories! Embark I trust we shall Together some fine day, and so, for good and all,
Bid Pornic Town adieu, — then, just the strait to cross,
And we reach harbor, safe, in Isthophonoe!

How quickly night comes! Lo, already 't is the land
Turns sea-like; overreep by gray, the plains expand,
Assume significance; while ocean dwindles, shrinks
Into a batter bound: its plash and plain, musthinks,
Six steps away, how both retire, as if their part
Were played, another force were free to prove her art,
Protagonist in turn! Are you unterrified?
All false, all fleeting too! And nowhere things abide,
And everywhere we strain that things should stay, — the one
Truth, that ourselves are true!

A word, and I have done.
Is it not just our hate of falsehood, fleeting-dream?
And the mere part, things play, that constitutes express
The immost charm of this Fifine and all her tribe?
Actors! We also act, but only they inscribe
Their style and title so, and preface, only they,
Performing with "A lie is all we do or say."
Wherein but there can be the attraction, Falsehood's brie, That wins so surely o'er to Fifine and her tribe
The liking, nay the love of who hate Falsehood most.
Except that these alone of mankind make their boast.

"Frankly, we simulate!" To feign, means—to have grace
And so get gratitude! This ruler of the race,
Crowned, scep'tred, stol'd to suit, — 'tis not that you detect
The cobbler in the king, but that he makes effect
By seeming the reverse of what you know to be
The man, the mind, whole form, fashion, and quality.
Mistake his false for true, one minute, — there's an end.
Of the admiration! Truth, we grieve at or rejoice:
'T is only falsehood, plain in gesture, look and voice,
That brings the praise desired, since profit comes thereby.
The historic truth is in the natural lie.
Because the man who wept the tears was, all the time,
Happy enough; because the other man, a-grime
With guilt was, at the least, as white as I and you;
Because the timid type of bashful maidhood, who Starts at her own pure shade, already numbers seven Born babes and, in a month, will turn their odd to even;
Because the sanguine prince would prove, could you unfurl
Some yards of wrap, a meek and moritious girl—
Precisely as you see success attained by each
O' the mimes, do you approve, not foolishly impeach
The falsehood!

That's the first o' the truths found: all things, slow
Or quick! the passage, come at last to that, you know!
Each has a false outside, whereby a truth is forced
To issue from within: truth, falsehood, are divorced
By the excepted eye, at the rare season, for
The happy moment. Life means — learning to abhor
The false, and love the true, truth treasured snatch by snatch,
Waifs counted at their worth. And when with strays they match
I' the perticolored world,— when, under fons, shines fair.
And truth, displayed i' the point, flashes forth everywhere
I' the circle, manifest to soul, though hid from sense,
And no obstruction more affects this confidence,—
When faith is ripe for sight,— why, reasonable, then Comes the great clearing-up. Wait threescore years and ten!
FIFINE AT THE FAIR

LXXXVII
Therefore I prize stage-play, the honest cheating; thence
The impulse pricked, when fife and drum bade
Fair commence,
To bid you trip and skip, link arm in arm with me,
Like husband and like wife, and so together see
The tumbling-troop arrayed, the strollers on their stage
Drawn up and under arms, and ready to engage.
And if I started thence upon astrasian themes... Well, 't was a dream, pricked too!

LXXXVIII
A poet never dreams:
We prose-folk always do: we miss the proper duct
For thoughts on things unseen, which stagnate and obstruct
The system, therefore; mind, sound in a body sane,
Keeps thoughts apart from facts, and to one flowing vein
Confines its sense of that which is not, but might be,
And leaves the rest alone. What ghosts do poets see?
What demons fear? what man or thing misadventure?
Unchecked, the channel's flush, the fancy's free to spend
Its special self aright in manner, time and place.
Never believe that who create the busy race
O' the brain, bring poetry, to birth, such act performed,
Feel trouble them, the same, such residue as warmed
My proxy blood, this morn, — intrusive fancies, meant
For outbreak and escape by quite another vent!
Whence follows that, asleep, my dreamings oft exceed
The bound. But you shall hear.

LXXXIX
I smoked. The webs o' the weed,
With many a break i' the mesh, were floating to re-form
Cupola-wise above: chased thither by soft warm
Inflow of air without; since I — of mind to muse, to clench
The gain of soul and body, got by their noon-day drench
In sun and sea — had flung both frames o' the window wide,
To soak my body still and let soul soar beside.
In came the country sounds and sights and smells — that fine
Sharp needle in the nose from our fermenting wine!

In came a dragon-fly with whirl and stir, the out
Off and away: in came, — kept coming, rather. — pout
Succeeding smile, and take-away still close a give, —
One loose long creeper-branch, tremblingly sensitive
To risks, which blooms and leaves, — each leaf tongue-broad, each bloom
Midfinger-deep, — must run by prying in the room
Of one who loves and grasps and spoils and speculates.
All so far plain enough to sight and see: but, weights,
Measures and numbers, — ah, could one apply such test
To other visitants that came at no request
Of who kept open house, — to fancies manifest
From this four-cornered world, the memories new and old,
The antenatal prime experience — what know I?
The initiatory love preparing us to die —
Such were a crowd to count, a sight to see, a prize
To turn to profit, were but fleshly ears and eyes
Able to cope with those o' the spirit!

XC
Therefore, — size
Thought hankers after speech, while no speech may elince
Feeling like music, — mine, o'erburdened with each gift
From every visitant, at last resolved to shift
Its burden to the back of some musician dead
And gone, who feeling once what I feel now, instead
Of words, sought sounds, and saved forever, is the same,
Truth that escapes prose, — nay, puts poetry to shame.
I read the note, I strike the key, I bid record
The instrument, — thanks greet the veritable word!
And not in vain I urge: "O dead and gone away,
Assist who struggles yet, thy strength become my stay,
Thy record serve as well to register — I felt
And knew thus much of truth! With me must knowledge melt Into surprise and doubt and disbelief, unless
Thy music reassure — I gave no idle guess.
But gained a certitude, I yet may hardly keep!
What care? since round is piled a monumental heap
Of music that conserves the assurance, then as well
Wast certain of the same! thou, master of the spell
Mad'st moonbeams marble, didst record what other men
Feel only to forget!" Who was it helped me, then?
What master's work first came responsive to my call,
Found my eye, fixed my choice?

XCI

Why, Schumann's "Carnival"!
My choice chimed in, you see, exactly with the sounds
And sights of yestereve, when, going on my rounds,
Where both roads join the bridge, I heard across the dusk
Creak a slow caravan, and saw arrive the husk
O' the spice-nut, which peeled off this morning and displayed,
Twirl the tree and tree, a tent whence the red pennon made
Its vivid reach for home and ocean-idleness
And where, my heart surmised, at that same moment,—yes,— Tugging her trioct on—yet tenderly, last stitch Announce the crack of doom, reveal disaster which
Our Pornic's modest stock of merce ries in vain
Were ransack'd to retrieve,—there, cautiously
A-strain
(My heart surmised) must crouch in that tent's corner, curdled
Like Spring-month's russet moon, some girl by fate reserved
To give me once again the electric snap and spark
Which prove, when finger finds out finger in the dark
O' the world, there's fire and life and truth there, link but hands
And pass the secret on. Lo, link by link, expands
The circle, lengthens out the chain, till one embrace
Of high with low is found uniting the whole race,
Not simply you and me and our Fifine, but all.
The world: the Fair expands into the Carni-
And Carnival again to . . . ah, but that's my dream!

XCI

I somehow played the piece: remarked on each old theme
I' the new dress; saw how food o' the soul, the stuff that's made
To furnish man with thought and feeling, is purveyed
Substantially the same from age to age, with change
Of the outside only for successive feaster's,
Range
The banquet-room o' the world, from the dim
Farthest head
O' the table, to its foot, for you and me be-spread.
This merry morn, we find sufficient fare, I 'row.
But, novel? Scrap away the sauce; and taste, below,
The variety o' the viand,—you shall perceive there went

To board-head just the dish which other condi-
M't makes palate able now: guests came, sat down, fell-to,
Rose up, wiped mouth, went way,—lived, died,—and never knew
That generations yet should, seeking sustenance,
Still find the selfsame fare, with somewhat to enhance
Its flavor, in the kind of cooking. As with hates
And loves and fears and hopes, so with what emulates
The same, expresses hates, loves, fears, and hopes in Art:
The forms, the themes—no one without its counterpart
Agés ago; no one but, mumbled the due time
I' the mouth of the eater, needs be cooked again in rhyme,
Dished up anew in paint, sauce-smothered fresh in sound,
To suit the wisdom-tooth, just cut, of the age, that's found
With gums obtuse to gust and smack which relished so
The meat o' the meal folk made some fifty years ago.
But don't suppose the new was able to efface
The old without a struggle, a pang! The commonplace
Still clung about his heart, long after all the rest
O' the natural man, at eye and ear, was caught, confessed
The charm of change, although wry lip and wrinkled nose
Owned ancient virtue more conducive to repose
Than modern nothings roused to somethings by some shred
Of pungency, perchance garlic in amber's stead.
And so on, till one day, another age, by due Rotation, pries, sniffs, smacks, discovers old is new,
And sauce, our sires pronounced insipid, proves again
Sole piquant, may resume its titillating reign—
With music, most of all the arts, since change is there
The law, and not the lapse: the precious means the rare,
And not the absolute in all good save surprise.
So I remarked upon our Schumann's victories
Over the commonplace, how faded phrase grew fine,
And palled perfection—piqued, up-startled by that brine.
His pickle—bit the mouth and burnt the tongue aright.
Beyond the merely good no longer exquisite:
Then took things as I found, and thanked without demur
The pretty piece—played through that movement, you prefer
Where dance and shuffle past,—he sooling while she ponts,
She canti ng while he calms,—in those eternal bouts
Of age, the dog—with youth, the cat—by rose-festoon
Tied teasingly enough — Columbine, Pantaloon:
She, toe-tips and staccato, — legato, shakes his poll
And ambles in pursuit, the senior. Fi la folle!
Lie to him! get his gold and pay its price!
begin
Your trade betimes, nor wait till you ’ve wed
Harlequin
And, need, at the week’s end, to play the duteous wife,
And swear you still love slaps and leapings
more than life!
Pretty! I say.

XCVIII
And so, I somehow-nohow played
The whole o’ the pretty piece; and then . . .
whatever weighed
My eyes down, furled the films about my wits?
suppose
The morning-bath, — the sweet monotony of those
Three keys, flat, flat and flat, never a sharp at all,
—
Or else in the brain’s fatigue, forced even here to fail
Into the same old track, and recognize the shift
From old to new, and back to old again, and, — swift
Or slow, no matter, — still the certainty of
change,
Conviction we shall find the false, where’er we
range,
In art no less than nature: or what if wrist were numb,
And over-tense the muscle, abductor of the thumb,
Taxed by those tenths’ and twelfths’ unconscionable stretch?
Howe’er it came to pass, I soon was far to fetch —
Gone off in company with Music!

XCV
Whither bound
Except for Venice? She it was, by instinct found
Carnival-country proper, who far below the perch
Where I was pinnacled, showed, opposite,
Mark’s Church,
And, underneath, Mark’s Square, with those two lines of street,
Procurati-sides, each leading to my feet —
Since from above I gazed, however I got there.

XCV
And what I gazed upon was a prodigious Fair, Concourse immense of men and women, crowned or casqued,
Turbaned or tier’d, wreathed, plumed, hatted or wigged, but masked — Always masked, — only, how? No face-shape, beast or bird,
Nay, fish and reptile even, but some one had preferred,

From out its frontispiece, feathered or scaled or curled,
To make the viezal whence himself abjot
view the world;
And where the world believed himself as manifest.
Yet when you came to look, mixed up among
the rest
More funny by far, were masks to imitate
Humanity’s mishap: the wrinkled brow, bale
pate,
And rheumy eyes of Age, peak’d chia and parchment chap,
Were signs of day-work done, and wage-tis ness as mishap
Merely; but, Age reduced to simple greed and
guile,
Worn apathetic else as some smooth slab, as
while
A clear-cut man-at-arms i’ the pavement, till foot’s tread
Effaced the sculpture, left the stone you sw instead, —
Was not that terrible beyond the mere w
OUTH?
Well, and perhaps the next revolted you as Youth,
Stark ignorance and crude conceit, half sport half stare
On that frank fool-face, gay beneath its bed of hair
Which covers nothing.

XCVI
These, you are to understand.
Were the mere hard and sharp distinctions.
On each hand,
I soon became aware, flocked the infinitude
Of passions, loves and hates, man pampers all his mood
Becomes himself, the whole sole face we war him by,
Nor want denotement else, if age or youth supply
The rest of him: old, young, — classed crea ture: in the main
A love, a hate, a hope, a fear, each soul
astrain
Some one way through the flesh — the face, as evidence
O’ the soul at work inside; and, all the more intense,
So much the more grotesque.

XCVII
"Why should each soul be taxed
Some one way, by one love or else one hate?"
I asked.
When it occurred to me, from all those sights beneath
There rose not any sound: a crowd, yet dumb
as death!

XCVIII
Soon I knew why. (Propose a riddle, and it is solved.
Forthwith — in dream! ) They spoke; but,
since on me devolved
To see, and understand by sight,— the vulgar speech
Might be dispensed with. "He who cannot see, must reach
As best he may the truth of men by help of words
They please to speak, must fare at will of who affords
The banquet,"— so I thought. "Who sees not, hears and so
Gets to believe; myself it is that, seeing, know,
And, knowing, can dispense with voice and vanity
Of speech. What hinders then, that, drawing closer, I Put privilege to use, see and know better still
These simulacra, taste the profit of my skill,
Down in the midst?"

And plumb I pitched into the square—
A grounding like the rest. What think you
How it happened there?
Precise the contrary of what one would expect!
For,— whereas, so much more monstrosities deflect
From nature and the type, as you the more approach
Their precinct,— here, I found brutality encroach.
Less on the human, lie the lightlier as I looked
The nearer on these faces that seemed but now so crook’d,
And clawed away from God’s prime purpose.
They diverged
A little from the type, but somehow rather urged
To pity than disgust: the prominent, before,
Now dwindled into mere distinctness, nothing more.
Still, at first sight, stood forth undoubtedly the fact
Some deviation was: in no case there lacked
The certain sign and mark, say hint, say, trick of life;
Or twain of pose, that proved a fault in workmanship,
Change in the prime design, some hesitancy here
And there, which checked the man and let the beast appear;
But that was all.

All; yet enough to bid each tongue
Lie in abeyance still. They talked, themselves among,
Of themselves, to themselves: I saw the mouths at play,
The gesture that enforced, the eye that strove to say
The same thing as the voice, and seldom gained
Its point—That this was so, I saw; but all seemed out
Of joint
I the vocal medium ’twixt the world and me. I gained Knowledge by notice, not by giving ear,— attained
To truth by what men seemed, not said: to me
One glance
Was worth whole histories of noisy utterance,
— At least, to me in dream.

And presently I found
That, just as ugliness had withered, so unwound
Itself, and perished off, repugnance to what wrong
Might linger yet? the make of man. My will was strong
I’ the matter; I could pick and choose, project
My weight:
(remember how we saw the boatman trim his freight!)
Determine to observe, or manage to escape,
Or make divergence assume another shape
By shift of point of sight in me the observer:
thus
Corrected, added to, subtracted from,— discuss Each variant quality, and brute-beast touch
was turned
Into mankind’s safeguard! Force, guiles, were arms which earned
My praise, not blame at all: we must learn to live,
Case-hardened at all points, not bare and sensitive,
But plated for defence, nay, furnished for attack,
With spikes at the due place, that neither front nor back
May suffer in that squeeze with nature, we find
— life.
Are we not here to learn the good of peace
Through strife,
Of love through hate, and reach knowledge by ignorance?
Why, those are helps thereto, which late we eyed askance,
And nicknamed unaware! Just so, a sword we call
Superfluous, and cry out against, at festival:
Wear it in time of war, its clink and clatter grate
O’ the ear to purpose then!

I found, one must abide One’s scorn of the soul’s casing, distinct from
The soul’s self—
Which is the centre-drop: whereas the pride in self,
The lust to seem the thing it cannot be, the greed
For praise, and all the rest seen outside,— these indeed
Are the hard polished cold crystal environment
Of those strange orbs unearthed i’ the Druid temple, meant
For divination (so the learned please to think)
Wherein you may admire one dewdrop roll and wink,
All unaffected by— quite alien to— what sealed
And saved it long ago: though how it got concealed
I shall not give a guess, nor how, by power occult
The solid surface-shield was outcome and result
Of simple dew at work to save itself amid
The unwatery force around; protected thus, dew slid
Safe through all opposites, impatient to absorb
Its spot of life, and last forever in the orb
We, now, from hand to hand pass with impunity.

CIII
And the delight wherewith I watch this crowd must be Akin to that which crowns the chemist when he winds
Thread up and up, till clue be fairly clutched,— unbinds
The composite, ties fast the simple to its mate,
And, tracing each effect back to its cause, elate,
Constructs in fancy, from the fewest primitives,
The complex and complete, all diverse life, that lives
Not only in beast, bird, fish, reptile, insect, but
The very plants and earths and ores. Just so
I glut
My hunger both to be and know the thing I am,
By contrast with the thing I am not; so,
through sham
And outside, I arrive at inmost real, probe
And prove how the nude form obtained the checkered robe.

CIV
— Experience, I am glad to master soon or late,
Here, there, and everywhere i’ the world, without debate!
Only, in Venice why? What reason for Mark’s Square
Rather than Timbuctoo?

CV
And I became aware,
Scarce the word escaped my lips, that swift ensued
In silence and by stealth, and yet with certitude,
A formidable change of the amphitheatre
Which held the Carnival; although the human stir
Continued just the same amid that shift of scene.

CVI
For as on edifice of cloud i’ the gray and green
Of evening,—built about some glory of the west.
To barricade the sun’s departure,—manifest,
He plays, pre-eminently gold, gilds vapor, crag and crest
Which bend in rapt suspense above the act and deed
They cluster round and keep their very own, nor heed
The world at watch; while we, breathlessly at the base

O’ the castellated bulk, note momently its mace
Of night fall here, fall there, bring change with every blow,
Alike to sharpened shaft and broadened portia
I’ the structure: heights and depths, beneath
The leaden stress, Crumble and melt and mix together, osolence.
Re-form, but sadder still, subdued yet more and more
By every fresh defeat, till weared eyes need pause
No longer on the dull impoverished decadence
Of all that pomp of pile in towering evidence
So lately:

CVII
Even thus nor otherwise, meacoed
That if I fixed my gaze awhile on what I dreamed
Was Venice’s Square, Mark’s Church, the scheme was straight unshamed.
A subtle something had its way within the heart
Of each and every house I watched, with counterpart
Of tremor through the front and outward face.
until
Mutation was at end; impassive and stock-still Stood now the ancient house, grown—new, is scarce the phrase,
Since older, in a sense,—altered to... what i’ the ways,
Ourselves are wont to see, coerced by city, town.
Or village, anywhere i’ the world, pace up or down
Europe! In all the maze, no single testament
I saw, but I could claim acquaintance with.

CVIII
There west
Conviction to my soul, that what I took of late
For Venice was the world; its Carnival — the state
Of mankind, masquerade in life-long permanence.
For all time, and no one particular feast-day.
Whence
’T was easy to infer what meant my late disgust
At the brute-pageant, each grotesque of greed and lust
And idle hate, and love as impotent for good —
When from my pride of place I passed the interlude
In critical review; and what, the wonder that ensued
When, from such pinnacled pre-eminence, I found
Somehow the proper goal for wisdom was the ground
And not the sky,—so, slid sagaciously betimes
Down heaven’s baluster-ropes, to reach the mob of mimes
And mummers; whereby came discovery there was just Enough and not too much of hate, love, greed and lust,
FIFINE AT THE FAIR

Could one discerningly but hold the balance, shift
The weight from scale to scale, do justice to the drift
Of nature, and explain the glories by the shames
Mixed up in man, one stuff miscalled by different names
According to what stage i' the process turned his rough,
Even as I gazed, to smooth — only get close enough!
— What was all this except the lesson of a life?

CIX

And — consequent upon the learning how from strife
Grew peace — from evil, good — came knowledge that, to get Acquaintance with the way o' the world, we must nor fret
Nor fume, on altitudes of self-sufficiency,
But bid a frank farewell to what — we think — should be,
And, with as good a grace, welcome what is — we find.

CX

Is — for the hour, observe! Since something to my mind
Suggested soon the fancy, nay, certitude that change,
Never suspending touch, continued to derange
What architecture, we, walled up within the cirque!
O' the world, consider fixed as fate, not fairy-work.
For those were temples, sure, which tremulously grew blank
From bright, then broke afresh in triumph, — ah, but sank
As soon, for liquid change through artery and vein
O' the very marble wound its way! And first a stain
Would startle and offend amid the glory; next, spot succeeded spot, but found me less perplexed
By portents; then, as 't were, a sleepiness soft stole
Over the stately fane, and shadow sucked the whole
Façade into itself, made uniformly earth
What was a piece of heaven; till, lo, a second birth,
And the veil broke away because of something new Inside, that pushed to gain an outlet, paused in view
At last, and proved a growth of stone or brick or wood
Which, alien to the aim o' the Builder, somehow stood
The test could satisfy, if not the early race
For whom he built, at least our present populace,
Who must not bear the blame for what, blamed, proves mishap

Of the Artist: his work gone, another fills the gap.
Serves the prime purpose as. Undoubtedly there spreads
Building around, above, which makes men lift their heads
To look at, or look through, or look — for aught I care —
Over: if only up, it is, not down, they stare.
"Commercing with the skies," and not the pavement in the Square.

CXI

But are they only temples that subdivide, collapse,
And tower again, transformed? Academies, perhaps!
Domes where dwells Learning, seats of Science, bower and hall
Which house Philosophy — do these, too, rise and fall,
Based though foundations be on steadfast mother-earth,
With no chimeric claim to supemundane birth.
No boast that, dropped from cloud, they did not grow from ground?
Why, these fare worst of all! These vanish and are found
Nowhere, by who tasks eye some twice within his term
Of threescore years and ten, for tidings what each germ
Has burgeoned out into, whereof the promise stunned
His ear with such acclaim, — praise-payment to refund
The praisers, never doubt, some twice before they die
Whose days are long i' the land.

CXII

Alack, Philosophy! Despite the chop and change, diminished or increased,
Patch-ed-up and plastered-o'er, Religion stands at least
I' the temple-type. But thou? Here gape I, all agog
These thirty years, to learn how tadpole turns to frog;
And thrice at least have gazed with mild astonishment,
As, skyward up and up, some fire-new fabric sent
Its challenge to mankind, that, clustered underneath
To hear the word, they straight believe, ay, in the teeth
O' the Past, clap hands, and hail triumphant Truth's outbreak —
Tadpole-frog-theory propounded, past mistake!
In vain! A something ails the edifice, it bends,
It bows, it Huries...! Hasten! cry "Heads below" to friends —
But have no fear they find, when another shall subsidse,
Some substitution perk with unabated pride
I' the predecessor's place!
CXIII
No, — the one voice which failed
Never, the preachment's coign of vantage
Nothing ailed, —
That had the luck to lodge i' the house not Made with hands!
And all it preached was this: "Truth builds
Upon the sands,
Though stationed on a rock: and so her work
decays,
And so she builds afar, with like result.
Naught stays
But just the fact that Truth not only is, but fares
Would have men know she needs must be, by each so plain
Attempt to visibly inhabit where they dwell."
Her works are work, while she is she; that work does well
Which lasts mankind their lifetime through,
and lets believe
One generation more, that, though sand run through sieve,
Yet earth now reached is rock, and what we moderns find
Erected here is Truth, who, 'established to her
mind
I' the fulness of the days, will never change in show
More than in substance erst: men thought they knew; we know!

CXIV
Do you, my generation? Well, let the blocks prove must
I' the main enclosure, — church and college, if they list,
Be something for a time, and everything anon,
And anything awhile, as fit is off or on,
Till they grow nothing, soon to reappear no less
As something, — shape reshaped, till out of shapelessness
Come shape again as sure! no doubt, or round or square.
Or polygon its front, some building will be there,
Do duty in that nook o' the wall o' the world where once
The Architect saw fit precisely to enseconce
College or church, and bid such bulkward guard
the line
O' the barrier round about, humanity's confine.

CXV
Leave watching change at work i' the greater scale, on these
The main supports, and turn to their interstices Filled up by fabrics too, less costly and less
rare,
Yet of importance, yet essential to the Fair
They help to circumscribe, instruct, and regulate!
See, where each booth-front boasts, in letters
small or great,
Its speciality, proclaims its privilege to stop
A breach, beside the best!

CXVI
Here History keeps shop,
Tells how past deeds were done, so and as otherwise:
"Man! hold truth evermore! forget the early
lies!
There sits Morality, demure behind her stall.
Dealing out life and death: "This is the thing to call
Right, and this other, wrong; thus think, thus
say,
Thus joy, thus suffer! — not to-dy as yesterday—
Yesterday's doctrine dead, this only shall ensure!
Obey its voice and live!" — enjoins the dame demure.
While Art gives flag to breeze, bids drum beat,
trumpet blow,
Inviting eye and ear to yonder raree-show.
Up goes the canvas, hauled to height of pole.
I think,
We know the way — long lost, late learned — to paint! A wink
Of eye, and lo, the pose! the statue on its plinth!
How could we moderns miss the heart o' the labyrinth
Perverse! these years, permit the Greek seclude
His secret till to-day? And here's another fend
Now happily composed: inspect this quartet-score
Got long past melody, no word has Music more
To say to mortal man! But is the hard to be Behindhand? Here's his book, and now perhaps you see
At length what poetry can do!

CXVII
Why, that's stability
Itself, that change on change we sorrowfully
saw
Creep o' the prouder piles! We acquiesced in law
When the fine gold grew dim i' the temple, when the brass
Which pillared that so brave abode where Knowledge was,
Bowed and resigned the trust; but, bear all
this caprice,
Harlequinado where swift to birth succeeds decease
Of hue at every turn o' the tinsel-flag which flames
While Art holds boot in Fair? Such glories chased by shame
Like these, distract beyond the solemn and august
ProceEDURE to decay, evanishment in dust,
Of those marmoreal domes, — above victori-
tude,
We used to hope!

CXVIII
"So, all is change, in fine," pursued
The preaching to a pause. When——'All is permanence!'" Returned a voice. Within? without? No matter whence.
The explanation came; for, understand, I ought.
To simply say——"I saw," each thing I say "I thought."
Since ever, as, unrolled, the strange scene-picture grew
Before me, sight flashed first, though mental comment too
Would follow in a trice, come hobblingly to halt.

CXIX

So, what did I see next but,—much as when the vault I' the west,—wherein we watch the vapory, manifold Transfiguration,—tired turns blaze to black,—behold, Peak receded to base, dark ending fend with bright. The multiform subsides, becomes the definite. Contrasting life and strife, where battle they in the blank
Severity of peace in death, for which we thank One wind that comes to quell the concourse, drive at last
Things to a shape which suits the close of things, and cast Palpably o'er vexed earth heaven's mantle of repose?

CXX

Just so, in Venice's Square, that things were at the close
Was signalled to my sense; for I perceived arrest
O' the change all round about. As if some impulse pressed Each gently into each, what was distinctness, late,
Grew vague, and, line from line no longer separate.
No matter what its style, edifice... shall I say,
Died into edifice? I find no simpler way
Of saying how, without or dash or shock or trace
Of violence, I found unity in the place
Of temple, tower,—nay, hall and house and hut,—one blank
Severity of peace in death;
For which they sank
Resigned enough, till... ah, conjecture, I beseech,
What special blank did they agree to, all and each?
What common shape was that wherein they mutely merged?
Likes and dislikes of form, so plain before?

CXXI

I urged
Your step this way, prolonged our path of enterprise

To where we stand at last, in order that your eyes Might see the very thing, and save my tongue describe
The Druid monument which fronts you. Could I bribe Nature to come in aid, illustrate what I mean, What wants there she should lend to solemnize the scene?

CXXII

How does it strike you, this construction gaunt and gray— Sole object, these piled stones, that gleam un-ground-away By twilight's hungry jaw, which champs fine all beside I' the solitary waste we grope through? Oh, no guide Need we to grope our way and reach the monstrous door Of granite! Take my word, the deeper you explore That caverned passage, filled with fancy to the brim, The less will you approve the adventure! such a grim Bar-sinister soon blocks abrupt your path, and ends All with a cold dread shape,—shape whereon Learning spends Labor, and leaves the text obscure for the gloss, While Ignorance reads right—recoiling from that Cross! Whence came the mass and mass, strange quality of stone Unquarried anywhere i' the region round? Unknown! Just as unknown, how such enormity could be Conveyed by land, or else transported over sea, And laid in order, so, precisely each on each, As you and I would build a grotto where the beach Sheds shell—to last an hour: this building lasts from age To age the same. But why?

CXXIII

Ask Learning! I engage
You get a proxy wherefore, shall help you to advance In knowledge just as much as helps you Ignorance Surmising, in the mouth of peasant-lad or lass, "I heard my father say he understood it was A building, people built as soon as earth was made Almost, because they might forget (they were afraid) Earth did not make itself, but came of Somebody They labored that their work might last, and show thereby He stays, while we and earth, and all things come and go. Come whence? Go whither? That, when come and gone, we know
Perhaps, but not while earth and all things need our best
Attention: we must wait and die to know the rest.
Ask, if that's true, what use in setting up the pile?
To make one fear and hope: remind us, all the while
We come and go, outside there's Somebody that stays;
A circumstance which ought to make us mind
our ways,
Because, whatever end we answer by this
life,—
Next time, best chance must be for who, with toil and strife,
Manages now to live most like what he was meant
Become: since who succeeds so far, 'tis evident,
Stands foremost on the file; who fails, has less
to hope
From new promotion. That's the rule — with even a rope
Of much worse, like this rope I dangle! those that grew
Greatest and roundest, all in life they had to do,
Gain a reward, a grace they never dreamed, I
think;
Since, outside white as milk and inside black as ink,
They go to the Great House to make a dainty dish
For Don and Donna; while this basket-load, I wish
Well off my arm, it breaks, — no starveling of the heap
But had his share of dew, his proper length of sleep
I' the sunshine: yet, of all the, the outcome is—this queer
Cribbed quantity of dwarfs which burden bas-et here
Till I reach home; 't is there that, having run their rigs,
They end their earthly race, are flung as food
for pigs.
Any more use I see? Well, you must know,
there lies
Something, the Curé says, that points to mysteries.
Above our grasp: a huge stone pillar, once up-
right,
Now laid at length, half-lost — discreetly shunning sight
I' the bush and brier, because of stories in the
air,
Hints what it signified, and why was stationed
there.
Once on a time. In vain the Curé tasked his lungs—
Showed, in a preaching, how, at bottom of the new
O' the ladder, Jacob saw, where heavenly angels stoop
Up and down, lay a stone which served him,
while he slept,
For pillow; when he woke, he set the same up right
As pillar, and a top poured oil: things repair
To instruct posterity, there mounts from sea
to roof,
A staircase, earth to heaven; and also put a
proof,
When we have scaled the sky, we well may be alone
What raised us from the ground, and — payer to the stone
Proper respect, of course — take staff and p our way,
Leaving the Pagan night for Christian break of
day.
'For,' preached he, 'what they dreamed, thes
Pagans, wide-awake
We Christians may behold. How strange, then, were mistake
Did anybody style the stone, — because of de Remainning there from oil which Jacob poured a top,— Itself the Gate of Heaven, itself the end, and is
The means thereeto! 'Thus preached the Cur
Hence the more persuaded people but that, what are a thing
Meant and had right to mean, it still now mean. So cling
Folk somehow to the prime authority
And so distrust report, it seems as they could reach
Far better the arch-word, whereon their fate depends.
Through rude charactery, than all the grass's lends,
That lettering of your scribes! who furnish pen space
And ornament the text, they say — we my effect.
Hence when the earth began its life fresh is
May,
And fruit-trees bloomed, and waves would v
ton, and the bay
Ruffle its wealth of weed, and stranger-birds
arrive,
And beasts take each a mate, — folk, too
found sensitive,
Surmised the old gray stone upright there through such tracts
Of solitariness and silence, kept the facts
Entrusted it, could deal out doctrine, did it
please:
No fresh and frothy draught, but liquor on the lees,
Strong, savage, and sincere: first bleedings from a vine
Whereas the product now do Curés so refuse
To insinpidity, that, when heart sinks, we strive
And strike from the old stone the old resista ve.
'Which is ?' — why go and ask our grandmas
how they used
To dance around it, till the Curé disabused
Their ignorance, and bade the parish is a land Lay flat the obtrusive thing that embeared the land!
And there, accordingly, in bush and brier it —
'birds's
'Its time to rise again!' (so somebody derides, That's pert from Paris,) 'since, you spire, you keep erect
Yonder, and pray beneath, is nothing, I suspect,
But just the symbol's self, expressed in slate
for rock,
Art's smooth for Nature's rough, new chip from the old block l'
'There, sir, my say is said! Thanks, and Saint Gille increase
The wealth bestowed so well!' — wherewith
he pockets piece,
Doffs cap, and takes the road. I leave in Learning's clAth
More money for his book, but scarcely gain as much.

CXXIV
To this it was, this same primeval monument,
That, in my dream, I saw building with building
blent
Fall: each on each they fast and founderingly sustained
Confusion-ward, but then again subsided fast,
Became the mound you see. Magnificently massed
Indeed, those mammoth-stones, piled by the Protoseul
Tempel-wise in my dream! beyond compare with fanes
Which, solid-looking late, had left no least remains
I the bald and blank, now sole usurper of the plains
Of heaven, diversified and beautiful before.
And yet simplicity appeared to speak no more Nor less to me than spoke the compound. At the core,
One and no other word, as in the crust of late,
Whispered, which, audible through the transition-state,
Was no loud utterance in even the ultimate
Disposure. For as some imperial chord subsists,
SteadiLy underlies the accidental mists
Of music springing thence, that run their mazy
race
Around, and sink, absorbed, back to the triad
base,—
So out of that one word, each variant rose and fell
And left the same "All's change, but permanence
as well," —
Grave note whence — list aloft! — harmonics sound, that mean:
"Truth inside, and outside, truth also; and between
Each, falsehood that is change, as truth is permanence.
The individual soul works through the shows of sense
(Which, ever proving false, still promise to be true)
Up to an outer soul as individual too;
And, through the fleeting, lives to die into the fixed
And reach at length 'God, man, or both to tgether mixed,'
Transparent through the flesh, by parts which prove a whole,
By hints which make the soul discernible by
soul —
Let only soul look up, not down, not hate but
love,
As truth successively takes shape, one grade
above
Its last presentment, tempts as it were truth
indeed
Revealed this time; so tempts, till we attain to read
The signs aight, and learn, by failure, truth is forced
To manifest itself through falsehood; whence divorced
By the excepted eye, at the rare season, for
The happy moment, truth instructs us to abhor
The false, and prize the true, obtainable thereby.
Then do we understand the value of a lie;
Its purpose served, its truth once safe deposited.
Each lie, superfluous now, leaves, in the singer's
steed,
The indubitable song; the historic personage
Put by, leaves prominent the impulse of his age;
Truth sets aside speech, act, time, place, in deed, but brings
Nakedly forward now the principle of things
Highest and least."

CXXV
Wherewith change ends. What change to dread
When, disengaged at last from every veil, in stead
Of type remains the truth? once — falsehood:
but anon
Theosum, et reteion eper ekeumenon,
Something as true as soul is true, though veils
between Prove false and fleet away. As I mean, did he mean,
The poet whose bird-phrase sits, singing in my ear
A mystery not unlike? What through the dark and drear
Brought comfort to the Titan? Emerging from the lymph,
"'God, man, or mixture" proved only to be a nymph:
"From whom the clink on clink of metal" (money, judged
Abundant in my purse) "struck" (bumped at, till it budged)
"The modesty, her soul's habitual resident" (Where late the sisterhood were lively in their tent)
"As out of winged car" (that caravan on wheels)
"ImpulSively she rushed, no slippers to her heels,"
And " Fear not, friends we flock!" soft smiled
the sea-Fifine —
Primitive of the veils (if he meant what I mean)
The poet’s Titan learned to lift, ere “Three-formed Fate, Moirai Trimorphoi,” stood unmasked the Ultimate.

CXVI

Enough o’ the dream! You see how poetry turns prose.
Announcing wonder-work, I dwindle at the close
Down to mere commonplace old facts which everybody knows.
So dreaming disappoints! The fresh and strange at first,
Soon wears to trite and tame, nor warrants the outburst
Of heart with which we hail those heights, at very brink
Of heaven, where to one least of lifts would lead, we think,
But wherefrom quick decline conducts our step, we find.
To homely earth, old facts familiar left behind.
Did not this monument, for instance, long ago
Say all it had to say, show all it had to show,
Nor promise to do duty more in dream?

CXVII

What if we, homeward-bound, all peace and some fatigue,
Trudge, soberly complete our tramp of near a league,
Last little mile which makes the circuit just, Elvire?
We and where we began: that consequence is clear.
All peace and some fatigue, wherever we were nursed.
To life, we bosom us on death, find last is first
And thenceforth final too.

CXVIII

“Why final? Why the more Worth credence now than when such truth proved false before?”
Because a novel point impresses now: each lie
Redounded to the praise of man, was victory
Man’s nature had both right to get, and might to gain,
And by no means implied submission to the reign
Of other quite as real a nature, that saw fit
To have its way with man, not man his way with it.
This time, acknowledgment and acquiescence quell
Their contrary in man; promotion proves as well
Defeat: and Truth, unlike the False with Truth’s outside,
Neither plumes up his will nor puffs him out with pride.
I fancy, there must lurk some cogency i’ the claim,
Man, such abatement made, submits to, all the same.

Soul finds no triumph, here, to register its Sense
With whom ’tis ask and have,—the vast,
That the thing wanted, soon or late, will be supplied.
This indeed plumes up will; this, sure, pak out with pride.
When, reading records right, man’s instinct still attest
Promotion comes to Sense because Sense fits it best;
For bodies sprouted legs, through a desire to
While hands, when faint to file, got fingers as by one.
And nature, that’s ourself, accommodative brings
To bear that; tired of legs which walk, we saw Bad wings
Since of a mind to fly. Such savor in the air
Of Sense would stimulate Soul sweetly, I suppose,
Soul with its proper itch of instinct, pressing clear
To recognize soul’s self soul’s only master here
Alike from first to last. But if time’s pressent light’s
Or rather dark’s approach, wrest thoroughly the rights
Of rule away, and bid the soul submissive be.
Another soul than it play master everywhere
In great and small—this time, I fancy, sees disputes.
There’s something in the fact that such conclusion suits
Nowise the pride of man, nor yet chimes in with attributes Conspicuous in the lord of nature. He receive
And not demands—not first likes faith and then believes.

CXIX

And as with the last essence, so with its last faint type.
Inconstancy means raw, ’tis faith alone means ripe
I’ the soul which runs its round: no matter where it range
From Helen to Fifine, Elvire bids back the change.
To permanence. Here, too, love ends when love began.
Such ending looks like law, because the natural man
Inclines the other way, feels lordlier free thus bound
Poor pabulum for pride when the first love is found.
Last love! and, so far from realizing gain, Each step aside just proves divergency is main.
The wanderer brings home no profit from his quest Beyond the sad surmise that keeping house was best.
Could we begin anew. His problem past ariight Was — “From the given point evolve the infinite!”
Not — "Spend thyself in space, endeavoring to join Together, and so make infinite, point and point:
Fix into one Elvire a Fair-ful of Fifines!"
Fifine, the foam-flake, she: Elvire, the sea's self, means Capacity at need to shower how many such!
And yet we left her calm profundity, to clout
Foam-flutter, bell on bell, that, bursting at a touch,
Blistered us for our pains. But wise, we want
O' the sickle element. Enough of foam and roar!
Land-locked, we live and die henceforth: for here's the villa door.

CXXX
How pallidly you pause o' the threshold!
Hardly night,
Which drains you, ought to make real flesh and blood so white!
Touch me, and so appear alive to all intents!
Will the saint vanish from the sinner that repents?
Suppose you are a ghost! A memory, a hope,
A fear, a conscience! Quick! Give back the hand I grope
I' the dusk for!

CXXXI
That is well. Our double horoscope
I cast, while you concur. Discard that smile
O' the sickle element! Elvire is land not sea —
The solid land, the safe. All these word-bubbles came O' the sea, and bite like salt. The unlucky bath 's to blame.
This hand of yours on heart of mine, no more
The bay
I beat, nor bask beneath the blue! In Pornic, say,
The Mayor shall catalogue me duly domiciled,
Contributable, good-companion of the guild
And mystery of marriage. I stickle for the town.
And not this tower apart; because, though, halfway down,
Its tawny wink o' erwebbed with bloomy greenness, yet
Who mounts to staircase top may tempt the parapet,
And suddenly's the sea! No memories to arouse,
No fancies to delude! Our honest civic house
Of the earth be earthly too — or graced perchance with shell
Made prize of long ago, picked haply where the swell
Menaced a little once — or seaweed-branch that yet
Dampens and softens, notes a freak of wind, a fret
Of wave: though, why on earth should sea-change mend or mar
The calm contemplative householders that we are?

So shall the seasons fleet, while our two selves abide:
E'en past astonishment how sunrise and spring-tide
Could tempt one forth to swim; the more if time appoints
That swimming grow a task for one's rheumatic joints.
Such honest civic house, behold, I constitute
Our villa! Be but flesh and blood, and smile to boot!
Enter for good and all! then fate bolt fast the door,
Shut you and me inside, never to wander more!

CXXXII
Only, — you do not use to apprehend attack!
No doubt, the way I march, one idle arm, thrown ask
Behind me, leaves the open hand defenseless at the back,
Should an impertinent on tiptoe steal, and stuff — Whatever can it be? A letter sure enough, Pushed betwixt palm and glove! That largess of a franc?
Perhaps insconsiously, — to better help the blank
O' the nest, her tambourine, and, laying egg, permade
A family to follow, the nest-egg that I laid
May have contained — but just to foil suspicious folk —
Between two silver whites a yellow double yolk!
Oh, threaten no farewell! five minutes shall suffice
To clear the matter up. I go, and in a trice
Return; five minutes past, expect me! If in vain —
Why, slip from flesh and blood, and play the ghost again!

EPILOGUE

THE HOUSEHOLDER

Savage I was sitting in my house, late, lone:
Dreary, weary with the long day's work:
Head of me, heart of me, stupid as a stone:
Tongue-tied now, now blaspheming like a Turk;
Whom, in a moment, just a knock, call, cry,
Half a pang and all a rapture, there again were we!—
"What, and is it really you again?" quoth I:
"I again, what else did you expect?" quoth She.

"Never mind, his away from this old house —
Every crumbling brick embrowned with sin and shame!
Quick, in its corners are certain shapes arouse!
Let them — every devil of the night — lay claim,
Make and mend, or rap and rend, for me! Good-by!

RED COTTON NIGHT-CAP COUNTRY

If you knew but how I dwelt down here:
"quoth I:
"And was I so better off up there?" quoth She.
"Help and get it over! Reunited to his wife (How draw up the paper lets the pant people know?)
Lies M. or N., departed from this life,
Day the this or that, month and year the so and so.
What i' the way of final flourish? From verse? Try!
Affliction sore long time he bore, or, what is it to be?
Till God did please to grant him ease. Do end!" quoth I:
"I end with—Love is all, and Death's naught!" quoth She.

OR TURF AND TOWERS

TO MISS THACKERAY

This poem, dated January 23, 1873, was published in the early summer of the same year.
Browning had been staying with his sister at St. Aubin, in Normandy, and there met Miss Thackeray, who was to tell a tale of the White Cotton Night-cap Country, but a tragedy then just coming to a culmination in the courts supplied Browning with the more suggestive title which he adopted. Mr. Cooke records: —
"In the poem as written the names of the actors and places were correctly given, but when the poem was being revised in proofsheets they were changed from prudential reasons, because the last act in the tragedy occurred only a brief period prior to the writing of the poem.

I

AND so, here happily we meet, fair friend!
Again once more, as if the years rolled back
And this our meeting-place were just that

Browning submitted the proof-sheets of the poem to his friend Lord Coleridge, then the English Attorney-General, afterwards Chief Justice, who thought that a case of libel might lie for what was said, however improbable said action might be. He accordingly changed the names to fictitious ones. It was the year following this, and the publication of the poem, that the appeal against the judgment in favor of the will of Mellerio was dismissed, and the case finally set at rest in harmony with the conclusion reached by the poet."

The firm, "Miranda," blazed about the world—
Or, what it were London, where my toe Trespassed upon your Hoarse? "Small blame," you smile,
Seeing the Staircase Party in the Square
Was Small and Early, and you broke no rib.

Bound for some shop-front in the Place Vendôme—Goldsmithy and Golconda mine, that makes
"The Firm 'Miranda'" blazed about the world—

Out in the champaign, say, o'er-rioted
By verdure, ravage, and gay winds that war
Against strong sunshine settled to his sleep;
Or on the Paris Boulevard, might it prove,
You and I came together saunteringly,
Even as we met where we have met so oft,
Now meet we on this unpretending beach,
Below the little village: little, ay!
But pleasant, may your gratitude subjoin?
Meek, hitherto un-Murreday bathing-place,
Best loved of seacoast-nookful Normandy!
That, just behind you, is mine own hired house:
With right of pathway through the field in front,
No prejudice to all its growth unheaved
Of emerald azure bursting into blue.
Be sure I keep the path that hags the wall,
Of mornings, as I pad from door to gate!
You yellow — what if not wild-mustard flower?
Of that, my naked sole makes lawful prize,
Brusing the acrid aromatics out,
Till, what they profuse, good salt savors sting.
From first, the sifted sands, then sands in slabs,
Smooth save for pippy wreath-work of the worm:
(Granite and mussel-shell are ground alike
To glittering paste, — the live worm troubles not.)
Then, dry and moist, the varech limit-line,
Burst cinder-black, with brown uncrumpled swathes
Of berried softness, sea-swollen thvice its size;
And, lo, the wave protrudes a lip at last,
And checks my foot with froth, nor tempts in vain.

Such is Saint-Rambert, wilder very much
Than Joyeux, that famed Joyous-Gard of yours,
Some three miles farther down; much homelier too —
Right for me, — right for you the fine and fair!
Only, I could endure a transfer — wrought
By angels famed still, through our country-side,
For weights they fished and carried in old time
When nothing like the need was — transfer, just
Of Joyeux church, exchanged for yonder prig,
Our brand-new stone cream-colored masterpiece.

Well — and you know, and not since this one year,
The quiet seaside country? So do I:
Who like it, in a manner, just because
Nothing is prominently likable
To vulgar eye without a soul behind,
Which, breaking surface, brings before the ball
Of sight, a beauty buried everywhere,
If we have souls, know how to see and use,
One place performs, like any other place,
The proper service every place on earth
Was framed to furnish man with: serves alike
To give him note that, through the place he sees.

A place is signified he never saw,
But, if he lack not soul, may learn to know.
Earth's ugliest walled and cell'd imprisonment
May suffer, through its single rent in roof,
Admittance of a cataract of light
Beyond attainment through earth's palace-panes
Pinholed aathwart their windowed filigree
By twinklings sobered from the sun outside.
Doubtless the High Street of our village here
Imposes hardly as Rome's Corso could:
And our projected race for sailing-boats
Next Sunday, when we celebrate our Saint,
Falls very short of that attractiveness,
That artistry in festive spectacle,
Paris ensures you when she welcomes back
(When shall it be?) the Assembly from Versailles;
While the best fashion and intelligence
Collected at the counter of our Mayor
(Dry-goods he deals in, grocery beside)
What time the post-bag brings the news from Vire, —
I fear me much, it scarce would hold its own,
That circle, that assorted sense and wit,
With Five-o'clock Tea in a house we know.

Still, 't is the check that gives the leap its lift.
The nullity of cultivated souls,
Even advantaged by their news from Vire,
Only conduces to enforce the truth
That, thirty paces off, this natural blue
Brooks o'er a bag of secrets, all unbosomed,
Beneath the bosom of the placid deep,
Sines first the Post Director sealed them safe;
And formidable I perceive this fact —
Little Saint-Rambert torches the great sea.
From London, Paris, Rome, where men are men,
Not mice, and mice not Mayors presumably,
Thought scarce may leap so fast, alight so far.
But this is a pretence, you understand,
Disparagement in play, to parry thrust
Of possible objector: nullity
And ugliness, the taunt be his, not mine
Nor yours, — I think we know the world too well!
Did you walk hither, jog it by the plain,
Or jaunt it by the highway, braving bruise
From springless and uncushioned vehicle?
Much, was there not, in place and people both,
To lend an eye to? and what eye like yours —
The learned eye is still the loving one!
Our land; its quietude, productiveness,
Is length and breadth of grain-crop, meadow-ground.
Its orchards in the pasture, farms a-field,
And hamlets on the road-edge, naught you missed
Of one and all the sweet rusticities!
From stalwart strider by the wagon-side,
Brightening the acre with his purple blouson
To those dark-featured comedy women-folk,
Healthy and tall, at work, and work indeed,
On every cottage doorstep, plying brisk
Bobbins that bob you ladies out such lace!
Oh, you observed! and how that nimble play
Of finger formed the sole exception, bobbed
The one disturbance to the peace of things,
Where nobody esteems it worth his while,
If time upon the clock-face goes asleep,
To give the rusted hands a helpful push.
Nobody lifts an energetic thumb
And index to remove some dead and gone
Notice which, posted on the barn, repeats
For truth what two years' passage made a lie.
Still is for sale, next June, that same château
With all its immobilities, — were sold
Duly next June behind the last but last;
And, woe's me, still placards the Emperor
His confidence in war he means to wage,
God aiding and the rural populace.
No: rain and wind must rub the rags away
And let the lazy land untrodden more.

Ah, in good truth? and did the drowsihead
So suit, so soothed the learned loving eye,
That you were minded to confer a crown,
(Does not the poppy boast such?) — call the land
By one slow hither-thither stretching, fast
Subsidizing-into-slumber sort of name,
Symbolic of the place and people too,
"White Cotton Night-cap Country?" — Excellent!
For they do, all, dear women young and old,
Upon the heads of them bear notably
This badge of soul and body in repose;
Nor its fine thimble fits the scorn-top,
Keep them woolly yonder that oval brow,
Its plaeid feature, more than muffer makes
A safeguard, circumvents intelligence
In — what shall evermore be named and famed,
If happy nomenclature aught avail,
"White Cotton Night-cap Country."

Do I hear —

Oh, better, very best of all the news —
You mean to catch and cage the winged word,
And make it breed and multiply at home
Till Norman Idiotes stock our England too?
Normandy shown minute yet magnified
In one of these small books, the truly great,
We never know enough, yet know so well?
How I foresee the curvate diamond-dints —
Composite pen that plays the pencil too, —
As, touch the page and up the glamour goes,
And filmy o'er grain-crop, meadow-ground,
O'er orchard in the pasture, farm a-field,
And hamlet on the road-edge, floats and forms
And falls, at lazy last of all, the Cap
That crowns the country! we, awake outside,
Further than ever from the imminence
Of what cool comfort, what close coverture
Your magic, deftly weaving, shall surround
The unconscious captive with. Be theirs to crowe
Trammelled, and ours to watch the trammel-trick!
Ours be it, as we con the book of books,
To wonder how is winking possible!

All hail, "White Cotton Night-cap Country," then!
And yet, as on the beach you promise book, —
On beach, mere razor-edge 'twixt earth and sea,
I stand at such a distance from the world
That 'tis the whole world which obtains regard.
Rather than any part, though part presumed
A perfect little province in itself,
When wayfare made acquaintance first there
with.
So standing, therefore, on this edge of things,
What if the backward glance I gave, retains Loaded with other spoils of vagrancy
Than I dispatched it for, till I propose
The question — puzzled by the sudden store
Officious fancy plumps beneath my nose —
"Which sort of Night-cap, have you glorified?"

You would be gracious to my ignorance; —
What other Night-cap than the normal one?—
Old honest guardian of man's head and hair
Is its elastic yet continuous, soft,
No less persisting, circumambient gripe, —
Night's notice, life is respite from day!
Its form and fashion vary, trotting so
Each seasonable want of youth and age.
In infancy, the rowy naked ball
Of brain, and that faint golden fluff it bears,
Are smothered from disaster, — nurses know
By what foam-fabric; but when youth succeeds,
The sterling value of the article
Discards adornment, cap is cap henceforth Unfeathered by the ruffle row on row.
Manhood strains hard a sturdy stocking-stuff
O'er well-deserving head and ears: the one
Is tasseled-tipt, commendably takes pride,
Announcing workday done and wages paused,
And liberty obtained to sleep, nay, snore.
Unwise, he perseveres shall essay
The sweets of independency once —
Waive its advantage on his wedding-night:
Fool, only to resume it, night the next,
And never part companionship again.
Since, with advancing years, night's sales
soon
Intrudes upon the daybreak dubious life
Persuades it to appear the thing it is Half—sleep; and so, encroaching more and more
That lingering long past the abstemious meal
Of morning, and, as prompt to serve, precedes
The supper-summings, gruel grown a feast.
Finally, when the last sleep finds the eye
So tired it cannot even shut itself,
Does not a kind domestic hand unite
Friend to friend, lid from lid to part no more.
Consigns alike to that receptacle
So bleak without, so warm and white within?

"Night-caps, night's comfort of the human soul:
Their usage may be growing obsolete,
Still, in the main, the institution stays.
And though yourself may possibly have lived,
And probably will die, undignified —
The Never-night-capped — more experienced folk Laugh you back answer — What should Night-cap be Save Night-cap pure and simple? Sorts of such?
Take cotton for the medium, cast an eye
his side to comfort, lamb's wool, or the like,
has side to frilly cambric cutlines.
and all between proves Night-cap proper."

Add
Fiddle!" and I confess the argument.

My, your ignorance here again proceeds as tardily to recognize distinctions: ask him what a fiddle means,
and "Just a fiddle" seems the apt reply.
et, is not there, while we two pace the beach,
his blessed moment, at your Kensington, special Fiddle-Show and rare array all the sorts were over set to check, established on clavele, sawn bow-hand-wise,
touched into-fashion and forefinger-plucked?
doubt not there be duly catalogued achievements all and some of Italy warnerius, Stradunarius, — old and new,
ugustly rude, refined to finicking,
his mammoth with his belly full of blare,
hat mouse of music—inch-long silvery wheeze,
and here a specimen has effloresced its to the roll-head, there subsides supreme,
and with the tailpiece satisfies mankind.
Why should I speak of woods, grains, stains and streaks,
be topaz varnish or the ruby gum?
Is preferably pause where tickets teach,
Over this sample would Corelli croom, rievng, by minors, like the cussat-dove,
lost dulcet Giga, dreamiest Saraband."
From this did Paganini comb the fierce electric sparks, or to tenuity
all forth the inmost wailing of the wire —
o cat-gut could swoon out so much of soul!"

Three hundred violin-varieties exposed to public view! And dare I doubt some future enterprise shall give the world
wite as remarkable a Night-cap-show?
Think, we, arm-in-arm, that festal day,
see the long range of relics shrined aight,
rated, glazed, each cushioned curiosity,
and so begin to smile and to inspect:
Pope's sickly head-sustaining, damped with the warm
'run from the all-unfair fight: such a frame — boeth doctor and the devil helped their best ought such a world that, waiving doctor's help, ad the mean devil at its service too!
oltaire's imperial velvet! Hogarth eyed his thumb-nail record of some alley-phiz, ten chuckingly clapped yonder coyness
a pate, and painted with true flesh and blood!
soe hectic Cowper's soothing sarinet-stripe!
and so we profit by the catalogue,
smowhow our smile subseiding more and more,
ill we decline into... but no! shut eyes
and hurry past the shame unconfined here, he hangman's toilet! If we needs must trench, or sciences' sake which craves completeness still,
at the sad confine, not the district's self,
be object that shall close review be...

Well, it is French, and here are we in France:
It is historic, and we live to learn,
And try to learn by reading story-books.
It is an incident of 'Ninety-two,
And, twelve months since, the Commune had the sway.
Therefore resolve that, after all the Whites
Presented you, a solitary kid
Shall pain us both, a minute and no more!
Do not you see poor Louis pushed to front
Of palace-window, in persuasion's name,
A spectacle above the howling mob
Who tasted, as it were, with tiger-smack,
The outstart, the first spurt of blood on brow,
The Phrygian symbol, the new crown of thorns,
The Cap of Freedom? See the feeble mirth
At odds with that half-purpose to be strong
And merely patient under misery!
And note the ejaculation, ground so hard
Between his teeth, that only bed could hear,
As the lean pale proud insignificance
With the sharp-featured liver-worried stare
Out of the two gray points that did him staid,
And passed their eagle-owner to the front
Better than his rub-allowed underize,
The Corssican lieutenant commented,
"Had I but one good regiment of my own,
How soon should volleys to the due amount
Lay stiff upon the street-flags this cannon!"
As for the droll there, he that plays the king,
And scarce out smile with a Red night-cap on,
He's done for! somebody must take his place."
White Cotton Night-cap Country: excellent!
Why not Red Cotton Night-cap Country too?

"Why not say swans are black and blackbirds white,
Because the instances exist?" you ask.
"Enough that white, not red, predominates.
Is normal, typical, in cleric phrase
Quod semel, semper, et ubique." Here,
Applying such a name to such a land,
Especially you find supported
Impertinent, my scruple whether white
Or red describes the local color best.
"Let be," (you say,) "the universe at large
Supplied us with exceptions to the rule,
So manifold, they bore no passing-by,—
Little Saint-Rambert has conserved at least
The pure tradition: white from head to heel,
Where is a hint of the ungracious hue?
See, we have traversed with hop, step, and jump,
From heel to head, the main-street in a trio,
Measured the garment (help my metaphor!) Not merely criticised the cap, forsooth;
And were you pricked by that collecting-itch,
That pruriency for writing o'er your reds,
Rare, rare, rarest, not rare but unique,—
The shelf, Saint-Rambert, of your cabinet,
Unlabelled, — virginal, no Rahab-thread
For bluffing token of the spy’s success,—
Would taunt with vacancy, I undertake! What, yonder is your best apology, Proterity at most approach to loveliness,
Impingement of the ruddy on the blank? This is the criminal Saint-Rambertese
Who smuggled in tobacco, half-a-pound!
RED COTTON NIGHT-CAP COUNTRY

The Octroi found it out and fined the wretch.
This other is the culprit who dispatched
A hare, he thought a hedgehog, (clods obstruct.)
Unfurnished with Permission for the Chase !
As to the womankind — renounce from those
The hope of getting a companion-tinge,
First faint touch promising romantic fault !"

Enough : there stands Red Cotton Night-cap shelf —
A cavern's ostentations vacancy —
No contribution to the show, while yours —
Whites heap your row of pegs from every hedge
Outside, and house inside Saint-Rambert here —
We soon have come to end of. See, the church
With its white steeple gives your challenge point,
Perks as it were the night-cap of the town,
Starchedly warrants all beneath is matched
By all above, one snowy innocence !

You put me on my mettle. British maid
And British man, suppose we have it out
Here in the fields, decide the question so —
Then, British fashion, shake hands hard again,
Go home together, friends the more confirmed
That one of us — assuredly myself —
Looks puffy about eye, and pink at nose ?
Which "pink" reminds me that the arduous

We both acknowledge in the enterprise,
Claims, counts upon a large and liberal
Acceptance of as good as victory
In whatsoever just escapes defeat.
You must be generous, strain point, and call
Victory, any the least flush of pink
Made prize of, labelled scarlet for the nonce —
Paintest pretension to be wrong and red
And picturesque, that varies by a splotch
The righteous flat of insipidity.

Quick to the quest, then — forward, the firm foot !
Onward, the quarry-overtaking eye !
For, what is this, by way of march-tune, makes
The musicalest buzzing at my ear
By re-assurance of that promise old,
Though sines as scarlet they shall be as wool?
Whence — what fantastic hope do I deduce ?
I am no Liebig : when the dyer dyes
A texture, can the red dye prime the white ?
And if we washed well, wrung the texture hard,
Would we arrive, here, there and everywhere,
At a fierce ground beneath the surface meek ?

I take the first chance, rub to threads what rag
Shall flutter snowily in sight. For see !
Already those few yards upon the rise,
Our back to brave Saint-Rambert, how we reach
The open, at a dozen steps or strides !
Turn round and look about, a breathing-while !
There lie, outspread at equidistance, thorpes And villages, and towns along the coast,
Distinguishable, each and all alike,
By white persistent Night-cap, spire on spire.
Take the left : yonder town is — what say you
If I say "Lourdes" ? Ay, the mother-mouse (Reversing fable, as truth can and will)
Which gave our mountain of a London birth :
This is the Conqueror's country, bear in mind.
And Londres-district blooms with Londres-pride.
Turn round ; La Roche, to right, where oyster thrive.
Monlouis the lighthouse is a telegraph ;
This, full in front, Saint-Rambert ; then succeeds
Villeneuve, and Pons the Young with Pons the Old,
And — ere faith points to Joyeux, out of sight,
A little nearer — oh, La Revissante !

There now is something like a Night-cap spire.
Donned by no ordinary Notre-Dame !
For, one of the three safety-guards of France,
You front now, lady ! Nothing intercepts
The privilege, by crow-flight, two miles far.
She and her sisters Lourdes and La Salette
Are at this moment hailed the cynosure
Of poor dear France, such waves have buffeted
Since she eschewed infallibility
And chose five men — the vague compass-box.
This same midsummer month, a week ago,
Was not the memorable day observed
For reinstatement of the misused Three
In old supremacy forennoremore ?
Did not the faithful flock in pilgrimage
By rail, by diligence, and steamer — nay,
On foot with staff and scrip, to see the sights Assured them ? And I say best sight was
Here:
And nothing justified the rival Two
In their pretension to equality ;
Our folk laid out their decket-money best.
And wisest, if they walked, wore shoe away;
Not who went farther only to fare worse.
For, what was seen at Lourdes and La Salette
Except a couple of the common cures
While here it was, here and by no means there.
That the Pope's self sent two great real gold Crowns
As thick with jewelry as thick could stick,
To his present to the Virgin and her Babe —
Provided for — who knows not ? — by that fund,
Count Alessandro Sforza's legacy,
Which goes to crown some Virgin every year.
But this year, poor Pope was in prison-house.
And money had to go for something else;
And therefore, though their present seemed
The Pope's,
The faithful of our province raised the sum
Preached and prayed out of — nowise pane alone.
Gentle and simple paid in kind, not cash.
The most part: the great lady gave her breast.
The peasant-girl, her hairpin; 't was the rough
Bluff farmer mainly who, — admonished well
By wife to care lest his new colewort-crop
Stray sorrowfully sparse like last year's seed.
Lugged from reluctant pouch the fifty-franc,
And had the Curé's hope that rain would come
And so, the sum in evidence at length,
Next stop was to obtain the donative
By the spontaneous bounty of the Pope —
No easy matter, since his Holiness
Had turned a deaf ear, long and long ago,
To much entreaty on our Bishop’s part.
Commendably we boast. “But no,” quoth he,
“Image and image needs must take their turn:
Here stand a dozen as importunate.”
Well, we were patient; but the cup ran o’er
When—who was it pressed in and took the lead?
But our own offset, set far off indeed
To grow by help of our especial name,
She of the Ravissante—in Martinique!
“What!” cried our patience at the boiling-point,
“The daughter crowned, the mother’s head
— goes bare?
Bishop of Raimbeaux!”—that’s our diocese—
“Thou hast a summons to repair to Rome,
Be efficacious at the Council there:
Now is the time or never! Right our wrong!
His thee away, thou valued Milion,
And have the promise, thou who hast the vote!”
So said, so done, so followed in due course
(To cut the story short) this festival,
This famous Twenty-second, seven days since.
Oh, but you heard at Joyeux! Pilgrimage,
Concourse, procession with, to head the host,
Cardinal Mirecourt, quenching lesser lights:
The leafy street-length through, decked end to end
With August-stripage, and adorned with flags,
That would have waved right well but that it rained.
Just this picked day, by some perversity,
And so were placed, on Mother and on Babe,
The pair of crowns: the Mother’s, you must see!
Miranda, the great Paris goldsmith, made
The marvel,—he’s a neighbor: that’s his park.
Before you, tree-topped wall we walk toward.
His shop it was turned out the masterpiece;
Probably at his own expenditure;
Anyhow, his was the munificence
Contributed the central and supreme Splendor that crowns the crown itself, the Stone.
Not even Paris, ransacked, could supply
That gem: he had to forage in New York,
This jeweller, and country-gentleman,
And most undoubted devotee beside!
Worthily weded, too: since his wife it was Bestowed “with friendly hand” — besetting phrase!
The lace which trims the coroation-robe—
Stiff wear—a mint of wealth on the brocade.
Do go and see what I saw yesterday!
And, for that matter, see in fancy still,
Since...

There now! Even for unthankful me,
Who stuck to my devotions at high-tide
That festive morning, never had a mind
To trudge the little league and join the crowd—
Even for me is miracle vouchsafed!
How pointless proves the sneer at miracles!

As if, contrariwise to all we want
And reasonably look to find, they grazed
Merely those grazed-before, grace helps no whit.
Unless, made whole, they need physician still.
I — skeptical in every inch of me—
Did I deserve that, from the liquid name
“Miranda.”—faceted as lovelily
As his own gift, the gem,—a shaft should shine,
Bear me along, another Abaris,
Nor let me light till, lo, the Red is reached,
And yonder lies in luminosity!

Look, lady! where I bade you glance but now!
Next habitation, though two miles away,—
No tenement for man or beast between,—
That park and domicile, is country-seat
Of this same good Miranda! I accept
The sugary: or there, nowhere else,
Will I establish that a Night-cap gleams
Of visionary Red, not White for once!
“Heaven,” saith the sage, “is with us, here inside
Each man:” “Hell also,” simplicity subjoins,
By White and Red describing human flesh.

And yet as we continue, quicken pace,
Approach the object which determines me
Victorious or defeated, more forlorn
My chance seems,—that is certainty at least.
Halt midway, reconnoitre! Either side
The path we traverse (turn and see) stretch fields
Without a hedge: one level, scallop-striped
With bands of beet and turnip and luxur, Limitted only by each color’s end,
Shelves down—we stand upon an eminence—
To where the earth-shell scallops out the sea,
A sweep of semicircle; and at edge—
Just as the milk-white incrustations stud
At intervals some shell-extremitv.,
So do the little growths attract us here,
Towns with each name I told you: say, they touch
The sea, and the sea them, and all is said,
So sleep and sets to stammer that broad blue! The people are as peaceful as the place.
This, that I call “the path” is road, highway;
But has there passed us by a market-cart,
Man, woman, child, or dog to wag a tail?
True, I saw weeders stooping in a field;
But—formidably white the Cap’s extent!

Round again! Come, appearance promises!
The boundary, the park-wall, ancient brick,
Upholds a second wall of tree-heads high
Which overlean its top, a solid green.
That surely ought to shut in mysteries!
A jeweller — no unsuggestive craft?
Trade that admits of much romance, indeed.
For, whom but goldsmiths used old monarchs pledge
Regains to, or seek a ransom from,
Or pray to furnish downy, at a pinch,
According to authentic story-books?
Why, such have revolutionized this land
With diamond-necklace-dealing! not to speak
Of families turned upside-down, because
The gay wives went and pawned clandestinely
Jewels, and figured, till found out, with paste,
Or else redeemed them — how, is horrible!
Then there are those enormous criminals
That love their ware and cannot lose their love,
And murder you to get your purchase back.
Others go courting after such a stone,
Make it their mistress, marry for their wife,
And find out, some day, it was false the while,
As ever wife or mistress, man too fond
Has named his Pilgrim, Hermit, Ace of Hearts.

Beside — what style of edifice begins
To grow in sight at last and top the scene?
That gray roof, with the range of lucarnes,
Four
I count, and that erection in the midst —
Clock-house, or chapel-spire, or what, above?
Conventual, that, beyond manorial, sure!
And reason good; for Clairvaux, such its name,
Was built of old to be a Priory,
Dependent on that Abbey-for-the-Males
Our Conqueror founded in world-famous Caen,
And where his body sought the sepulture,
It was not to retain: you know the tale.
Such Priory was Clairvaux, prosperous
Hundreds of years; but nothing lasts below,
And when the Red Cap put the Crown aside,
The Priory became, like all its peers,
A National Domain: which, bought and sold
And resold, needs must change, with ownership.
Both outside show and inside use; at length
The messuage, three-and-twenty years ago,
Became the purchase of rewarded worth
Impersonate in Father — I must stoop
To French phrase for precision’s sake, I fear —
Father Miranda, goldsmith of renown:
By birth a Madrilene, by domicile
And sojourning accepted French at last.
His energy it was which, trade transferred
To Paris, throve as with a golden thumb,
Established in the Place Vendôme. He bought
Not building only, but belongings far
And wide, at Gonthier there, Monluien, Ville-
- neuve.
A plentiful estate: which, twelve years since,
Passed, at the good man’s natural demise,
To Son and Heir Miranda — Clairvaux here,
The Paris shop, the mansion — not to say
Palatial residence on Quai Rougetat,
With money, movables, a mine of wealth —
And young Léonce Miranda got it all.

Ah, but — whose might the transformation be?
Were you prepared for this, now? As we talked.
We walked, we entered the half-privacy,
The partly-guarded precinct: passed beside
The little paled-off islet, trees and turf,
Then found us in the main ash-avenue
Under the blessing of its branchage-roof:
The sun emerges, what soffrets our gaze? —
Priory — Conqueror — Abbey-for-the-Males —
Hey, presto, pass, who conjured all away?
Look through the railwork of the gate: a park
— Yes, but à l’Amplaise, as they compliment!
Grass like green velvet, gravel-walks like gold
Boxes of shrubs, embosomings of flowers.
Lead you — through sprinkled trees of tiny breed
Disporting, within reach of coverture.
By some habitual aqueduc oak
Or elm, that thinks, and lets the youngest laugh —
Lead, lift at last your soul that walks the air.
Up to the house-front, or its back perhaps —
Whether facade or no, one coquetry
Of colored brick and carved stone! Stace?
The daintiness is cheery, that I know,
And all the sportive floral framework fits
The lightsome purpose of the architect.
Those lucarnes which I called conventual, late;
Those are the outlots in the masard-roof;
And, underneath, what long light elegances
Of windows here suggests how brave inside
Lurk eyeballed gems they play the eyelids to —
Festive arrangements look through such, be sure!
And now the tower a-top, I took for clock’s
Or bell’s obode, turns out a quaint device.
Pillared and temple-treated Belvedere —
Pavilion safe within its railed-about
Sublimity of area — whence what stretch,
Of sea and land, throughout the season’s change.
Must greet the solitary! Or suppose,
— If what the husband likes, the wife likes too —

The happy pair of students cloistered high,
Alone in April kiss when Spring arrives!
Or no, he mounts there by himself to meet
Winds, welcome wafts of sea-smell, first white bird
That flaps thus far to taste the land again,
And all the promise of the youthful year;
Then he descends, umbosoms straight his score
Of blessings in the bud, and both embrace.
Husband and wife, since earth is Paradise,
And man at peace with God. You see it all?

Let us complete our survey, go right round
The place: for here, it may be, we surprise
The Priory, — these solid walls, big bares,
Gray orchard-grounds, huge four-square stores
for stock,
Betoken where the Church was busy once.
Soon must we come upon the Chapel’s self.
No doubt next turn will treat us to... Ah.
Again our expectation proves at fault!
Still the bright graceful modern — not to say
Modish adornment, meets us: Parc Amplais,
Tree-sprinkle, shrub-embosoming as before.
See, the sun splits on yonder buatable world
Of silvered glass concentric, every side.
All the adjacent wonder, made minute
And touched grotesque by ball-convexity!
Just so, a sense that something is amiss,
Something is out of sorts in the display,
Affects us, past denial, everywhere.
The right erection for the Fields, the Wood.
(Fields — but Elyeses, wood — but de Boulogne)!
In periladventure wrong for wood and fields
When Vire, not Paris, plays the Capital.
to may a good man have deficient taste;
since Son and Heir Miranda, he it was
Who, six years now espoused, achieved the work and truly made a wilderness to smile.
Here did their domesticity reside,
A happy husband and as happy wife,
Till... how can I in conscience longer keep y little secret that the man is dead?
for artistic purpose, talk about if he lived still? No, these two years now has he been dead. You ought to sympathize, not mock the sturdy effort to redeem
ly pledge, and wring you out some tragedy from even such a perfect commonplace!
suppose I boast the death of such desert
y tragic bit of Red? Who contravenes assertion that a tragedy exists as any stoppage of benevolence, ility, devotion above all?
resentment? There never was his like:
over poverty, he had an open hand
... Or stop — I use the wrong expression here —
In open purses, then, ever at appeal;
so that the unredeeming rather taxed than consolations, that now in the ues, in his day and generation, deemed of the community? I trust.
la Velleix thus renovated, regalised,
aris expended thus to Normandy, swers that question. Was the man devout?
To one more my Lord.
to Church and all things churchly, men or mois.
bey, his last bequestment gave land, goods,
teach, every stick and stiver, to the Church,
and notably to that church yonder, that party of the parishes thus in arms, herefrom, the latest of his gifts, the Stone
fatefully bore me as on arrow-flash
Clairvaux, as I told you.
"Ay, to find
our Red desiderated article, here every scratch and scrape provokes my White.
all the more superb a prominence!
fly, 't is the story served up fresh again —
thus, fell the restive prophet old ho came and tried to curse but blessed the
land;
ove, your last chance! he disinherited bidden: he made his widow mourn too much y this endowment of the other Bride — understood that gold and jewelry
orn in her a figure, not a fact.
on make that White I want, so very white,
Is it I say now — some trace of Red should be nowhere in this Miranda-sanctitude!"
"at here, at all events, sweet mocking friend!
or he was childless; and what heirs he had ere an uncertain sort of Cousinry ere claiming kindred so as to withhold ke donor's purpose though fantastical!
eppos for that matter, wanting no increase wealth, since rich already as himself;
eirs that had taken trouble off his hands,
Bought that productive goldsmith-business he,
With abnegation wise as rare, renounced.
Precisely at a time of life when youth,
Nigh on departure, bids mid-age discard.
Life's other loves and likings in a pack.
To keep, in lucere, comfort worth them all.
This Cousinry are they who boast the shop
Of "Firm-Miranda, London and New York."
Cousins are an unconscionable kind;
But these — pretension surely on their part
To share inheritance were too absurd.
"Remains then, he dealt wrongly by his wife,
Despoiled her somehow by such testament?"
Farther than ever from the mark, fair friend!
The man's love for his wife exceeded bounds
Rather than failed the limit. 'T was to live
Hers and hers only, to abolish earth
Outside — since Paris holds the pick of earth —
He turned his back, shut eyes, stopped ears, to
all.
Delicious Paris tempts her children with,
And fled away to this far solitude —
She peopling solitude sufficiently!
She, partner in each heavenward flight sublime,
Was, with each condescension to the ground,
Duly associate also: hand in hand,
... Or side by side, I say by preference —
On every good work sidelongly they went.
Here was the instigation — none but she Willed that, if death should summon first her lord.
Though she, sad relict, must drag residue
Of days encumbered by this load of wealth —
(Submitted to with something of a grace
So long as her surviving vigilance
Might worthily administer, convert
Wealth to God's glory and the good of man,
Give, as in life, so now in death, effect
To cherished purpose) — yet she begged and prayed.
That, when no longer she could supervise
The House, it should become a Hospital:
For the support whereof, lands, goods, and cash
Alike will go, in happy guardianship,
To yonder church. La Ravissante: who debt
To God and man undoubtedly will pay.
"Not of the world, your heroine!"
Do you know
I saw her yesterday — set eyes upon
The veritable personage, no dream?
I in the morning strolled this way, as oft,
And stood at entry of the avenue.
When, out from that first garden-gate, we gazed Upon and through, a small procession swept —
Madame Miranda with attendants five.
First, of herself: she wore a soft and white
Engaging dress, with velvet stripes and squares
Severely black, yet scarce discouraging:
Fresh Paris-manufacture! (Vire's would do?
I doubt it, but confess my ignorance.)
Her figure? somewhat small and darling-like.
Her face? well, singularly colorless.
For first thing: which scarce suits a blonde,
you know.
Pretty you would not call her: though perhaps
Attaining to the ends of prettiness,
And somewhat more, suppose enough of soul.
Then she is forty full: you cannot judge
What beauty was her portion at eighteen,
The age she married at. So, colorless
I stick to, and if featureless I add,
Your notion grows complete: for, although
I noticed that her nose was aquiline,
The whole effect amounts with me to — blank!
I never saw what I could less describe.
The eyes, for instance, unforgettable
Which ought to be, are out of mind as sight.

Yet is there not conceivably a face,
A set of wax-like features, blank at first,
Which, as you bingly grow warm above,
Begins to take impressment from your breath?
Which, as your will itself were plastic here
Nor needed exercise of handicrafts
From formless moulds itself to correspond
With all you think and feel and are — in fine
Grows a new revelation of yourself,
Who know now for the first time what you are.

Here has been something that could wait awhile,
Learn your requirement, nor take shape before.
But, by adopting it, make palpable
Your right to an importance of your own,
Companions somehow were so slow to see!
— For, like a tyrant, consecrated
Than should some absolute and final face,
Fit representative of soul inside,
Summon you to surrender — in no way
Your breath's impressment, nor, in stranger's guise,
Yourself — or why of force to challenge you?
Why should your soul's reflection rule your soul?

"You" means not you, nor me, nor any one
Framed, for a reason I shall keep suppressed,
To rather want a slave than a slave:
The slaveah still aspires to dominate
So, all I say is, that the face, to me
One blur of blank, might flash significance
To who had seen his soul reflected there
By that symmetrical silvery phantom-like
Figure, with other five processional
The first, a black-dressed matron — maybe —
Maid —

Mature, and dragonish of aspect, — marched;
Then four came tripping in a joyous flock,
Two giant goats and two prodigious sheep
Pure as the arctic fox that suits the snow,
Tripped, trotted, turned the march to merri

But ambled at their mistress' heel — for why?
A rod of guidance marked the Châtelaine.
And every almost whom would sputter wave,
And milky subject leave meandering.
Nay, one great naked sheep-face stopped to ask
Who was the stranger, snuffed inquisitive
My hand that made acquaintance with its nose,
Examine why the hand — of man at least —
Fasted so lightly, warmly, so like life!
Are they such silly naturals after all?
And thus accompanied, the pale-faced, space,
Isolated shrubs and verdure, gained the group;

Till, as I gave a furtive glance, and saw
Her back hair was a block of solid gold.
The gate shut out my harmless question:

Hair
So young and yellow, crowning sanctity,
And claiming solitude . . . can hair be false?

"Shut in the hair and with it your last hope.
Yellow might on inspection pass for Red! —
Red, Red, where is the tinge of promised Red?
In this old age of town and country life,
This rise and progress of a family?
First comes the bustling man of enterprise,
The fortune-founding father in disguise,
As who must grub and grab, play pioneer.
Then, with a light and airy step, succeds
The son, surveys the fabric of his sire,
And enters home, unmirred from top to toe.
Polish and education quality
Their fortunate possessor to confine
His occupancy to the first-floor suite
Rather than keep exploring needlessly
Where dwelt his sire's content with cellage:
Industry bustles underneath, no doubt,
And superiors should not sit too close.
Next, rooms built, there's the furniture to buy,
And what adornment like a worthy wife?
In comes she like some foreign cabinet,
Purchased indeed, but purifying quick.
What space receives it from all traffic-tost.
She tells of other habits, palace-life;
Royalty may have pried into those depths
Of sandal-wooded drawer, and set a-creak.
That pygmy portal pranked with Ixari.
More fit by far the ignoble we replace
By objects suited to such visitant,
That we dissever her dignity rough.
By neighborhood of vulgar table, chair,
Which happily helped old age to smoke and feed.
The end is, an exchange of city stir
And too intrusive burgess-fellowship,
For rural isolated elegance:
Careless simplicity, how preferable!
There one may fairly throw behind one's back.
The used-up worn-out Past, we want away.
And make a fresh beginning of state life.
'In just the place,' — does any one object —
Where aboriginal gentility
Will scout the upset, twit him with such trick
Of townish trade-mark that stamps word as deed.
And most of all resent that here town-dress
He dans with money-color to desire!
Raashly objected! Is there not the Church
To intercede and bring benefic truce.

At outset? She it is shall equalize
The laborers 't the vineyard, last as first.
Pay cock-sure to her, she stops impertinence.
"Duke, once your sires crusaded it, we know:
Our friend the newcomer observes, no less
Your chapel, rich with their emblazonry,
Wants roofing — might he but supply the means!
Marquis, you gave the honor of your name.
Titorial patronage, abundant will
To what should be an Orphan Institute:
Gave everything but funds, in brief; and these,

't looses to contribute, by your leave!' —
'Brothers and sisters lie they in thy lap,
'Now none-excluding, all-collecting Church!
'Are, one has half a foot in the hierarchy
'If birth, when 'Nay, my dear,' laughs out the Duke,

I'm the crown's cushion-carrier, but the crown —

Who gave its central glory, I or you?

When Marquise jokes, 'My quest, forsooth?

'to purify bread and water in his bonds
Or Peter's self imprisoned — Lord, how long?
'Tours, yours alone the bounty, dear my dame,
On plumped the purse, which, poured into the plate,

Lads be a bishop's open brows so broad!

And if you really mean to give that length
Of lovely lace to edge the robe!... Ah,
Friends,

Am better serves than by calling crowd,
Round sound front to admire the million's

Ae gets more homage than from lorgnettes-
Stan, and comment coarse to match, (should one display

She's robe a trifle o'er the baignoire-edge.)

Well may she line her slippers with the like,
If minded so! their shop it was produced
That wonderful parure, the other day,
Whereof the Baron said, it beggared him,
And so the paired Mirandas built their house,
Enjoyed their fortune, sighed for family,
Round friends would serve their purpose quite as well,

And come, at need, from Paris — anyhow,
With evident alacrity, from Vire —

Meadow at the chase, at least succeed

A smoking, eating, drinking, laughing, and referring country,
Oh, so much to town!

Has lived the husband; though his wife
Would sigh

A confidence, when Countesses were kind,

Cut off from Paris and society!

Pisse, White, I once more round you in the ears!

Though you have marked it, in a corner, yours
Before — Red - lettered 'Failure,' very plain.

Shall acknowledge, on the snowy hem

Of ordinary Night-cap! Come, enough!
Ve have gone round its cotton vastitude,
Half-round, for the end's consistent still,

At - de - sac with stoppage at the sea.

Here we return upon our stop. One look

Let at good - morning — properly good - night —

To evil bliss, Miranda, and his mate!

Are we to rise and go?"

No, sit and stay!

Low comes my moment, with the thrilling thought

If certain from each side a shrouded case.

Aen't the rings shriek an ominous "Ha! ha! if you take Human Nature upon trust!"

List but with like trust to an incident

Which speedily shall make quite red enough

Burn out of yonder spotless napery!

Sit on the little mound here, whence you seize

The whole of the gay front sun-satisfied,

One laugh of color and embellishment!

Because it was there, — past those lacustrines,

On that smooth gravel-swEEP 'twixt flowers

And sword, —

There tragic death befell; and not one grace

Outspread before you but is registered

In that sinistrors coil these last two years

Were occupied in winding smooth again.

"True?" Well, at least it was concluded so,
Sworn to be truth, allowed by Law as such,

(With my concurrence, if it matter here.)

A month ago: at Vire they tried the case.

II

Monsieur Léonce Miranda, then, ... but stay!

Permit me a preliminary word,

And, after, all shall go so straight to end!

Have you, the traveller lady, found yourself

Inside a ruin, fane or bath or cirque,

Renowned in story, dear through youthful

Dream?

If not, — imagination serves as well.

Try fancy-land, go back a thousand years,

Or forward, half the number, and confront

Some work of art gnawn hollow by Time's

Tooth,—

Hallenic temple, Roman theatre,

Gothic cathedral, Gothic Tuileries,

But ruined, one and whichsor'e you like.

Obstructions choke what still remains intact,

Yet proffer change that's picturesque in turn;

Since little life begins where great life ends,

And vegetation soon amaligrams,

Smooths novel shape from out the shapeless old,

Till broken column, battered cornice-block,

The centre with a bulk half weeds and flowers,

Half relays you devoutly recognize.

Devoutly recognizing, — hark, a voice

Not to be disregarded! "Man worked here

Once on a time; here needs again to work;

Ruins obstruct, which man must remedy,"

Would you demur "Let Time fulfill his task,

And, till the scythe-sweep find no obstacle.

Let man be patient?"

The reply were prompt:

"Glisteningly beneath the May-night moon,

Herbage and floral overture bedecked

You splintered mass amidst the solitude:

Wolves occupy the background, or some snake

Glides by at distance: picturesque enough!

Therefore, preserve it? Nay, pour daylight

In.—

The mound proves swarming with humanity,

There never was a thorough solitude.

Now you look nearer: mortal busy life

First of all brought the crumblings down on pate,
Which trip man’s foot still, plague his passage much, And prove what seems to you so picturesque To him is... but experiment yourself On how conducive to a happy home Will be the circumference, your bed for base Boasts tessellated pavement,—equally Affected by the scorpion for his nest,— While what o’er-roofs bed is an architrave, Marble, and not unlikely to crush man To mummy, should its venerable prop, Some figtree-stump, play traitor underneath. Be wise! Decide! For conservation’s sake, Clear the arena forthwith! I lest the trend Of too-much-tried impatience trample out Solid and unsubstantial to one blank Mud-mixture, picturesque to nobody,— And, task done, quarrel with the parts intact Whenever came the filtered fine dust, whence the crash Bides but its time to follow, Quick conclude Removal, time effects so tardily, Of what is plain obstruction; rubbish cleared, Let partial-ruin stand while ruin may, And soothe world’s use, since use is manifold. Repair wreck, stanchion wall to heart’s content, But never think of renovation pure And simple, which involves creation too: Transform and welcome! Yon tall tower may help (Though built to be a belfry and naught else) Some Father Socchi, to tick Venus off In transit: never bring there bell again, To damage him aloft, brain us below, When new vibrations bury both in brick!"

Monsieur Léonce Miranda, furnishing The application at his cost, poor soul! Was instance how,—because the world lay strewn With ravage of opinions in his path, And neither he, nor any friendly wit, Knew and could teach him which was firm, which frail, In his adventure to walk straight through life The partial-ruin,—in such enterprise, He straggled into rubbish, struggled on, And strummed out again observably. "Yon buttress still can back me up," he judged: And at a touch down came both he and it. "A certain statue, I was warned against, Now, by good fortune, lies well underfoot, And cannot tempt to folly any more": So, lifting eye, aloft since safety lay, What did he light on? the Italian shape, The undeposed, erectly Victrix still! These steps ascend the labyrinthine stair Whence, darkling and on all fours, out I stand Exult and safe, and bid low earth adieu — For so instructs 'Advice to who would climb':"
And all at once the climbing landed him — Where, is my story.

Take its moral first. Do you advise a climber? Have respect To the poor head, with more or less of brains To spill, should breakage follow your advice! Head-break to him will be heart-break to you For having preached "Disturb no ruins here! Are not they crumbling of their own accord? Meantime, let poets, painters keep a prime! Beside, a sage pedestrian picks his way." A sage pedestrian — such as you and I! What if there trip, in merry carelessness, And come to grief, a weak and foolish child? Be cautious how you counsel climbing, then!

Are you adventurous and climb yourself? Plant the foot warily, accept a staff, Stamp only where you perceive standing-paths. Move forward, well assured that move you say: Where you mistrust advance, stop short, then stick!

This makes advancing slow and difficult? Hear what comes of the endeavor of brick yard To foot it fast and easy! Keep this same Notion of outside mound and inside masque, Towers yet intact round turfy rotteness. Symbolic partial-ravage, — keep in mind! Here fortune placed his feet who first of all Found, no incumbrance, till head found... But hear!

This son and heir then of the jeweller, Monsieur Léonce Miranda, at his birth, Mixed the Castilian passionate blood of blood With answerable grab, his mother's gift, Of spirit, French and critical and cold. Such mixture makes a battle in the brain, Ending as faith or doubt gets uppermost; Then will have way a moment, but no more: So nicely balanced are the adverse strengths. That victory entails reverse next time. The tactics of the two are different And equalize the odds: for blood comes first. Surrounding life with undisputed faith. But presently a new antagonist, By scorn and expected passage into the dark, Steals spirit, fingers at each crevice found A thwart faith's stronghold, fronts the staid man:

"Such pains to keep me far, yet here stand I. Your doubt inside the faith-defence of you!"

With faith it was friends bulwarked him about From infancy to boyhood; so, by youth, He stood impenetrably circumscribed, Heaven-high and low as hell: what lacked he thus, Guarded against aggression, storm or sap? What foe would dare approach? Historic Doubt?

Ay, were there some half-knowledge to attack! Batter doubt's best, sheer ignorance will best Acumen metaphysic? — drills its way Through what, I wonder! A thick feather-bed

Of thoughtlessness, no operating tool Framed to transpierce the flint-stone — fulminate at. With chance of finding an impediment! This Ravissante, now: when he saw the church For the first time, and to his dying-day. His firm belief was that the same fell fit
From the Delivering Virgin, niched and known;
As if there wanted records to attest
The appellation was a plenipotency,
A pious rendering of Rare Vissante,
The proper name which erst our province bore.
He would have told you that Saint Aldaibert
Founded the church, (Heaven early favored France,.)
About the second century from Christ;
Though the true man was Bishop of Raimbeaux,
Eleventh in succession, Eldobert,
Who flourished after some six hundred years.
He it was brought the image "from afar."
(Made out of stone the place produces still,) "Infantine Art divinely artless," (Art
In the decrepitude of Decadence,)
And set it up a-working miracles
Until the Northmen's fury laid it low,
Not long, however: an egregious sheep,
Zealous with scratching hoof andouting horn,
Unearthed the image in good Mailleville's time,
Count of the country. "If the tale be false,
Why stands it carved above the portal plain?"
Monsieur Léonce Miranda used to ask.
To Londres went the prize in solemn pomp,
But, liking old abodes and loathing new,
Was borne — this time, by angels — back again.
And, reinaugurated, miracle
Succeeded miracle, a lengthy list,
Until indeed the culmination came—
Archbishop Chaumont prayed a prayer and vowed
A vow — gained prayer and paid vow properly—
For the conversion of Prince Vertgalant.
These facts, sucked in along with mother's milk,
Monsieur Léonce Miranda would dispute
As soon as that his hands were flesh and bone,
Milk-nourished two-and-twenty years before.
So fortified by blind Castilian blood,
What say you to the chances of French cold
Critical apse, ah Voltaire hospital!
"Alp, Apennine, and fortified redoubt?"
Ay, would such spirit please to play faith's game
Faith's way, attack where faith defends so well!
But then it shifts, tries other strategy,
Coldness grows warmth, the critical becomes Unquestioning acceptance. "Share and share alike in facts, to truth add other truth!
Why with old truth needs new truth disagree?"
Thus doubt was found invading faith, this time,
By help of not the spirit but the flesh:
Fat Rabelais chuckled, where faith lay in wait
For lean Voltaire's grime—French, either foe.
Accordingly, while round about our friend
Ran faith without a break which learned eye
Could find at two-and-twenty years of age,
The twenty-two-years-old frank footsteps
Assured itself there spread a standing-space
Flourishing comfortable, nowise rock
Nor pebble-pavement roughed for champion's tread
Who scorns discomfort, pacing at his post.
Tall, long-limbed, shoulder right and shoulder left,
And 'twixt acromia such a latitude,
Black heaps of hair on head, and blacker bush
O'er-rioting chin, cheek and throat and chest,—
His brown meridional temperament
Told him — or rather pricked into his sense
Plainer than language — "Pleasant station here!
Youth, strength, and lusthlood can sleep on turf
Yet pace the stony platform afterward:
First signal of a foe and up they start!
Saint Eldobert, at all such vanity,
Nay — sinfulness, had shaken head austere.
Had he? But did Prince Vertgalant? And yet,
After how long a slumber, of what sort,
Was it, he stretched octogenarian joints,
And, nigh on Day-of-Judgment trumpet-blast,
Jumped up and manned wall, brink as any bee?"

Nor Rabelais nor Voltaire, but Sganarelle,
You comprehend, was pushing through the chink!
That stager in the saint's correct costume,
Who ever has his speech in readiness
For thick-head juvenility at fault:
"Go pace you platform and play sentinel!
You won't? The worse! But still a worse might hap,
Stay then, provided that you keep in sight
The battlefront, one bold leap lands you by!
Resolve not desperately 'Wall or turf,
Choose this, choose that, but no alternative!'
No! Earth left once were left for good and all:
'With Heaven you may accommodate yourself!'"

Saint Eldobert — I much approve his mode;
With sinner Vertgalant I sympathize;
But histronic Sganarelle, who prompts
While pulling back, refuses yet concedes,—
Whether he preach in chair, or print in book,
Or whisper due sustainment to weak flesh,
Counting his shamb beads threaded on a lie—
Surely, one should bid peck that mountebank!
Surely, he must have momentary fits
Of self-sufficient stage-forgetfulness,
Escapings of the actor-lassitude
When he allows the grace to show the grin,
Which ought to let even thickheads recognize (Through all the busy and benevolent, part,— Bridge-building, or rock-riving, or good clean
Transport of church and congregation both
From this to that place with no harm at all,)
The Devil, that old stager, at his trick
Of general utility, who leads Downward, perhaps, but fiddles all the way!
Therefore, no sooner does our candidate
For saintship spotlessly emerge soul-cleansed
From First Communion to mount guard at post,
Paris-proof, top to toe, than up there start
The Spirit of the Boulevard — you know
Who—
With jocund "So, a structure fixed as fate,
Faith's tower joins on to tower, no ring more round,
Full fifty years at distance, too, from youth!
O'er each that precinct and there fight your best,
As looking back you wonder what has come
Of daisy-dappled turf you danced across!
Few flowers that played with youth shall pester age,
However age esteem the courtesy;
And Eldobert was something past his prime,
Stocked Caen with churches ere he tried hand here.
Saint-Sauveur, Notre-Dame, Saint-Pierre,
Saint-Jean
Attired his handwork commenced betimes.
He probably would preach that turf is mud.
Suppose it mud, through mud one picks a way,
And when, clay-clogged, the struggling steps to stone,
He unshoes shoe, arrives in manlier guise
Than carried pick-a-back by Eldobert.
Big-baby-fashion, lest his leathers leak!
All that parade about Prince Vertgalant
Amounts to — your Castilian helps enough —
Inveni ovem qui perierat.
But the pretty votive statue-thing
What the lost sheep's meantime amusements were Till the Archbishop found him! That stays blank:
They washed the fleece well and forgot the
Make haste, since time flies, to determine, though!"

Thus opportunely took up parable,—
Admonishing Miranda just emerged,
Pure from The Ravissante and Paris-proof,—
Saint Sganarelle: then slipped aside, changed mask,
And made re-entry as a gentleman
Born of the Boulevard, with another speech,
I spare you.

So, the year or two revolted,
And ever the young man was dutiful
To altar and to hearth: had confidence
In the whole Ravissanteh history.
Voltaire? Who ought to know him —
Old sciolist, whom only boys think sage,—
As one whose father's house upon the Quai
Neighored the very house where that Voltaire
Died mad and raving, not without a burst
Of squeals and cries they too significant?
Father and mother hailed their best of sons,
Type of obedience, domesticity,
Never such an example inside doors!
Outside, as well not keep too close a watch;
Youth might be left to some discretion there.
And what discretion proved, I find deposited
At Vire, confirmed by his own words: to wit,
How, with the spriteness of twenty-five,
Five — and not twenty, for he gave their names
With laudable precision — were the few
Appointed by him unto mistress-ship;
While, meritoriously the whole long week
A votary of commerce only, week
 Ended, "at shut of shop on Saturday,
Do I, as is my wont, get drunk," he writes
In airy accord to a confidant.
"Bravishing and lie!" replies the apostate:
"And do I lose by that?" laughed Somebody.
At the Court-edge a-tiptoe, 'mid the crowd,
In his own clothes, a-listening to men's Lev.

Thus while, prospectively a combatant,
The volunteer bent brows, clenched jaws, and fierce
Whistled the march-tune "Warrior to the wall!"
Something like flowery laughter round his feet
Tangled him of a sudden with "Sleep first!"
And fairly flat upon the turf sprawled he,
And let strange creatures make his mount their home.

Anyhow, 't is the nature of the soul
To seek a show of durability,
Nor, changing, plainly be the slave of chance.
Outside the turf, the towers: but, round the turf,
A tent may rise, a temporary shrubber,
Mock-faith to suit a mimic dwelling-place:
Tent which, while screening jollity inside
From the external circuit — evermore
A menace to who lags when he should march —
Yet stands a-tremble, ready to collapse.
At touch of foot: turf is acknowledged grass.
And grass, though pillowy, held contemptible.
Compared with solid rock, the rumpiled ridge.
To truth a pretty homage thus we pay
By testifying — what we daily wish,
Falsehood, (which, never fear we take for truth!)
We may enjoy, but then — how we despise!

Accordingly, on weighty business bound,
Monsieur Léonce Miranda stopt to play.
But, with experience, soon reduced the game
To principles, and thenceforth played by rule:
Rule, dignifying sport as sport, proclaimed
No less that sport was sport, and nothing more.
He understood the worth of womankind,
To furnish man — provisionally — sport:
Sport transitive — such earth's amusements are.

But, seeing that amusements pail by use,
Variety therein is requisite.
And since the serious work of life were wrong,
Should we bestow importance on our play.
It follows, in such womankind-pursuit,
Cheating is lawful chase. We have to spend
An hour — they want a lifetime thrown away:
We seek to tickle sense — they ask for soul.
As if soul had no higher ends to serve!
A stag-hunt gives the royal creature law:
Bat-fowling is all fair with birds at roost.
The lantern and the clap-net suit the hedge.
Which must explain why, bent on Boulevard game,
Monsieur Léonce Miranda decently
Was prudent in his pleasures: passed himself
Off on the fragile air about his path
As the gay devil rich in mere good looks.
Youth, hope — what matter though the purse be void?

"If I were only young Miranda, now,
Instead of a poor clerkly drudge at desk
All day, poor artist vainly bruising brush
On palette, poor musician scraping gut
With horsehair teased that no harmonies come!
Then would I love with liberality,
Then would I pay! — The next shall be repaid,
Repaid alike for present pain and past,
If Mademoiselle permit the contre-danse,
Sing — Gay in garret youth at twenty lives,' —
And afterward accept a lemonade!"

Such sweet facilities of intercourse
Afford the Winter-Garden and Mabille!
"Oh, I unite" — runs on the confidence.
Poor fellow, that was read in open Court,
"Amusement with discretion: never fear
My escapades cost more than market-price!
No durably-attached Miranda-dupes,
Sucked dry of substance by two clinging lips,
Promising marriage, and performing it!
Trust me, I know the world, and know myself,
And know where duty takes me — in good time!

Thus fortified and realistic, then,
At all points thus against illusion armed,
He wisely did New Year inaugural
By playing truant to the favored five;
"The playhouses," —
Playhouse appropriately named, — to note
(Paying amid the turf that’s floor-y there)
What primrose, firstling of the year, might push
The snows aside to deck his buttonhole
Unnoticed by that outline sad, severe,
(Though fifty good long years removed from youth)
That tower and tower, — our image bear in mind!

No sooner was he seated than, behold,
Out burst a polyanthus! He was ‘ware
Of a young woman niched in neighborhood;
And ere one moment flitted, fast was he Found captive to the beauty evermore,
For life, for death, for heaven, for hell, her own.
Philosophy, bewail thy fate! Adieu,
Youth realistic and illusion-proof!
Monsieur Léonce Miranda, — hero late
Who "understood the worth of womankind,"
"Who found therein — provisionally — sport,"
"Felt, in the fitting of a moment, fool
Was he, and folly all that seemed so wise,
And the best proof of wisdom’s birth would be
That he made all endeavor, body, soul,
By any means, at any sacrifice
Of labor, wealth, repute, and (— well, the time
For choosing between heaven on earth, and heaven
In heaven, was not at hand immediately —)
Made all endeavor, without loss incurred
Of one least minute, to obtain her love.
"Sport transitive!" — "Variety required?"
"In loving were a lifetime thrown away?"
"How singularly may young men mistake!
The fault must be repaired with energy.

Monsieur Léonce Miranda ate her up
With eye-devouring; when the unconscious fair
Passed from the close-packed hail, he pressed behind;
She mounted vehicle, he did the same,
Coach stopped, and cab fast followed, at one door —
Good house in unexceptionable street.
Out stepped the lady, — never think, alone!
A mother was not wanting to the maid,
Or, maybe, wife, or widow, might one say?
Out stepped and properly down flung himself
Monsieur Léonce Miranda at her feet —
And never left them after, so to speak,
For twenty years, till his last hour of life,
When he released them, as precipitate.
Love proffered and accepted then and there!
Such potency in word and look has truth.

Truth I say, truth I mean: this love was true,
And the rest happened by due consequence.
By which we are to learn that there exists
A false false, for truth’s inside the same,
And truth that’s only half true, false truth.
The better for both parties! folks may taunt
That half your rock-built wall is rubble-heaps:
Answer them, half their flowery turf is stones!
Our friend had hitherto been decking coat
If not with stones, with weeds that stones beset.
With dandelions — "primrose-buds," smirked he;
This proved a polyanthus on his breast,
Prize-lawful or prize-lawless, flower the same.
So with his other instance of mistake:
Was Christianity the Ravissante?

And what a flower of flowers he chanced on now!
To primrose, polyanthus I prefer
As illustration, from the fancy-fact
That out of simple came the composite
By culture: that the florist bedded thick
His primrose-root in ruddle, bullock’s blood,
Ochre and devils’-dung, for aught I know,
Until the pale and pure grew fiery-fine,
Ruby and topez, rightly named anew.
This lady was no product of the plain;
Social disease raised a rarity.
Clara de Millaileurs (note the happy name)
Blazed in the full-blown glory of her Spring.
Peerlessly perfect, form and face: for both —
"Imagines what, at seventeen, may have proved Miss Pages, the actress: Pages herself, my dear!"

Noble she was, the name denotes: and rich?
"The apartment in this Coliseum Street,
Furnished, my dear, with such an elegance,
Testifies wealth, my dear, sufficiently!
What quality, what style and title, oh?
Well now, waive nonsense, you and I are boys
No longer: somewhere must a screw be slack!
Don’t fancy, Duchesses descend at door
From carriage — step to stranger prostrate stretched,
And bid him take heart, and deliver mind,
March in and make himself at ease forthwith —
However broad his chest and black his beard,
And comely his belongings, — all through love
Protested in a world of ways save one—Hinging at marriage!—marriage which yet means
Only the obvious method, easiest help
To satisfaction of love's first demand,
That love endure eternally: "my dear,
Somewhere or other must a screw be slack!"

Truth is the proper policy: from truth—
Whate'er the force wherewith you fling your speech,—
Be sure that speech will lift you, by rebound,
Somewhere above the lowness of a lie!
Monsieur Léonce Miranda heard too true
A tale—perhaps I may subjoin, too trite!
As the meek martyr takes her statued stand
Above our pity, claims our worship just Because of what she puts in evidence,
Signal of suffering, badge of torture borne
In days gone by, shame then, but glory now,
Barb, in the breast, turned aureole for the front!
So, half timidity, compose me half,
Clara de Millefleurs told her martyrdom.

Of poor though noble parentage, deprived
Too early of a father's guardianship,
What wonder if the prodigality
Of nature in the girl, whose mental gifts
Matched her external dowry, form and face—
If these suggested a too prompt resource
To the resourceless mother?—"Try the Stage,
And so escape starvation! Prejudice
Defames Mimetic Art: be yours to prove
That gold and dress may meet and never mix,
Purity plumes in pitch yet soil not plume!"

All was prepared in London—(you conceive
The natural shrinking from publicity
In Paris, where the name excites remark)—
London was ready for the grand debut;
When some perverse ill-fortune, incident
To art and taste, some malicious thrust
Of Jealousy who sidles 'twixt the scenes,
Or pops up sudden from the prompter's hole,
—Somehow the brilliant bubble burst in suds.
Want followed: in a foreign land, the pair!
Oh, hurry over the catastrophe—
Mother too sorely tempted, daughter tried
Scarcely so much as circumvented, say!
Caged unsuspecting artless innocence!

Monsieur Léonce Miranda told the rest!—
The rather that he told it in a style
To puzzle Court Guide students, much more
me,
"Brief, she became the favorite of Lord N.,
An aged but illustrious Duke, thereby
Breaking the heart of his competitor,
The Prince of O. Behold her placed straight
In splendor, clothed in diamonds," (phrase how fit!)
"Giving tone to the City by the Thames!
Lord N., the aged but illustrious Duke,
Was even on the point of wedding her—
Giving his name to her "(why not to us?)
"But that her better angel interposed.
She fled from such a fate to Paris back.
A fortnight since: conceive Lord N.'s despair!

Duke as he is, there's no invading France.
He must restrict pursuit to postal plague
Of writing letters daily, duly read
As darlingly she hands them to myself,
The privileged supplanter, who therewith
Light a cigar and see abundant blue (Either of heaven or else Havana-smoke).
"Think! she, who helped herself to diamond late,
In passion of disinterestedness
Now—will accept no tribute of my love
Beyond a paiptry ring, three Louis'-worth!
Littles she knows I have the rummaging
Of old Papa's shop in the Place Vendôme!
So wrote entrancedly to confidant,
Monsieur Léonce Miranda. Surely now,
If Heaven, that see all, understands no less.
It finds temptation pardonable here,
It mitigates the promised punishment.
It recognizes that to tarry just
An April hour amid such dainty turf
Means no rebellion against task imposed
Of journey to the distant wall one day?
Monsieur Léonce Miranda puts the case!
Love, he is purposed to renounce, abjure;
But meanwhile, is the case a common one?
Is it the vulgar sin, none hates as he?
Which question, put directly to "his dear"
(His brother—I will tell you in a trice),
Was doubtless meant, by one meaning:
To reach, to fall not observed before
The auditory cavern 'neath the cope
Of Her, the placable, the Ravisante.
But here's the drawback, that the map smiles.
Smiles! smiles ever, says to supplicant
"Ay, ay, ay"—like some kindly weathercock
Which, stuck fast at Set Fair, Favem Breeze,
Still warrants you from rain, though Astre's

Bring down the sky above your clothes' mirth.
Had he proposed this question to, nor "dear"
Nor Ravisante, but prompt to the Police,
The Commissary of his Quarter, now.
There had been shaggy eyebrows elevate
With twinkling apprehension in each orb
Beneath, and when the sudden shout of mirth
Relaxed,—lip pressing lip, lest out should plump
The pride of knowledge in too frank a flow,—
Then, fact on fact forthcoming, does we deal
Of truth remedial, in sufficiency
To save a chicken threatened with the pig.
Head-staggers and a tumble from its perch.

Alack, it was the lady's salf that made
The revelation, after certain days
—Nor so unwisely! As the hasheisch-mas
Prepares a novice to receive his drug,
Adroitly hides the soil with sudden spread
Of carpet ere he seats his customer:
Then shows him how to smoke himself abash
With Paradise; and only when, at puff
Of pipe, the Hour dances round the brain
Of dreamer, does he judge no need is now

OR TURF AND TOWERS

Would I re-tell this story of your woes,
Would I have heart to do you detriment
By pinning all this shame and sorrow plain
To that poor chignon,—staying with me still,
Though form and face have well-nigh faded
now,—
But that men read it, rough in brutal print,
As two years since some functionary's voice
Kiddled all this—and move by very much
Into the ear of vulgar Court and crowd?
Whence, by reverberation, rumblings grew
To what had proved a week-long roar in France
Had not the dreadful cannon crommy crowned all.
Was, now, the answer of your advocate
More than just this? "The shame fail long ago,
The sorrow keeps increasing: God forbid
We judge man by the faults of youth in age!"
Permit me the expression of a hope
Your youth proceeded like your avenue,
Shooving by bush, and tree, and taller tree,
Until, columnar, at the house they end.
So might your creeping youth columnar rise
And reach, by year and year, symmetrical,
To where all shade stops short, shade's service done.
Bushes on either side, and boughs above,
Darken, deform the path else sun would streak;
And, cornered halfway somewhere, I suspect
Stagnation and a horse-pond: hurry past!
For here's the house, the happy half-and-half
Existence—such as stands for happiness
True and entire, how'er the squeamish talk
Twenty years long, you may have loved this man;
He must have loved you; that's a pleasant life,
Whatever was your right to lead the same.
The white domestic pigeon pairs secure,
Nay, does mere duty by bestowing egg
In authorized compartment, warm and safe,
Boarding about, and gilded spire above,
Holusted on pole, to dogs' and cats' despair!
But I have spied a nestless pair of twigs
On tree-top, every straws a thievish
Where the wild dove—despite the fowler's snare,
The sportsman's hunt, the urchin's stone—crowned gray.
And solely gave her heart to what she hatched,
Nor minded a malignant world below.
I throw first stone forsooth? 'Tis mere assault
Of playful sugarpum against your cheek,
Which, if it makes cheek tingle, wipes off rouge
You, my worst woman? Ah, that touches pride,
Puts on his mettle the exhibitor
Of Night-caps, if you taunt him "This, no doubt,
Now we have got to Female-garniture,— Crowns your collection, Reddest of the row!"
O unimaginative ignorance
Of what dye's depth keeps best apart from worst
In womankind!—how heaven's own pure may seem
To blush aurorally beside such blanched
Divinities as the women-wreaths named White:
While heel, eruptive and fuliginous,
Sickens to very pallor as I point
Her place to a Red clout called woman too!
Hail, heads that ever had such glory once
Touch you a moment, like God's cloven tongues
Of fire! your lambent aureoles lost may leave
You marked yet, dear beyond true diadems!
And hold, each foot, nor spurn, to man's disgrace,
What other twist of fetid rag may fall!
Let alink into the sewer the cupping-cloth!

Lucie, much solaced, I re-finger you,
The medium article; ifuddy-marked
With iron-mould, your cambrie,—clean at least
From poison-speak of rot and purulence!
Lucie Muhlhausen said—"Such thing am I:
Love me, or love me not!" Mirandsaid:
"I do love, more than ever, most for this."
The revelation of the very truth
Proved the concluding necessary shake
Which bids the tardy mixture crystallize
Of lust in liquid, shoot up shaft,
Durbly diamond, or evaporate —
Sluggish solution through a minute's slip.
Monseur Leonce Miranda took his soul
In both his hands, as if it were a vase,
To see what came of the convulsion there,
And found, amid subsidence, love new-born
So sparkingly resplendent, old was new.
"Whatever be my lady's present, past,
Or future, this is certain of my soul,
I love her! in despite of all I know,
Defiance of the much I have to fear,
I venture happiness on what I hope,
And love her from this day forevermore!
No prejudice to old profound respect
For certain Powers! I trust they bear in mind
A most peculiar case, and straighten out
What's crooked there, before we close accounts.
Remorse for the world for them — some day I will:
Meantime, to me let her become the world!"

Thus, mutely might our friend soliloquize
Over the tradesmen's bills, his Clara's gift —
In the apartment, Coliseum Street,
Carlino Centofanti's legacy,
Provided rent and taxes were discharged —
In face of Steiner now, De Millefleurs once,
The tailor's wife and runaway confessed.

On such a lady if election light,
(According to a social prejudice.)
If henceforth "all the world" she constitute
For any lover, — needs must he renounce
Our world in ordinary, walked about
By couple loving as its laws prescribe, —
Renunciation sometimes difficult.
But, in this instance, time and place and thing
Combined to simplify experiment,
And make Miranda, in the current phrase,
Master the situation passably.

For first facility, his brother died —
Who was, I should have told you, confidant,
Adviser, refuge, and substitute,
All from a distance; but I knew how soon
This younger brother, lost in Portugal,
Had to depart and leave our friend at large.
Cut off abruptly from companionship
With brother-soul of bulk about as big,
(Obvious recipient — by intelligence
And sympathy, poor little pair of souls —
Of much affection and some foolishness.)
Monseur Leonce Miranda, meant to less
By nature, needs must shift the leaning-place
To his love's bosom from his brother's neck.
Or fall flat unrelieved of freight sublime.

Next died the lord of the Aladdin's cave,
Master o' the mint, and keeper of the keys
Of chests chokefull with gold and silver charm
By Art to forms where wealth forgot itself,
And casquets where reposéd each pullet-egg
Of diamond, slipping flame from fifty slats.
In short, the father of the family
Took his departure also from our scene,
Leaving a fat succession to his heir
Monseur Leonce Miranda, — "fortunate,
If every man was, in a father's case,
So commented the world, — not be, too kind
Could that be, rather than scarce kind enough.
Indisputably fortunate so far,
That little of incumbrance in his path,
Which money kicks aside, would lie there leg

And finally, a rough but wholesome shock,
An accident which comes to kill or cure,
A jerk which mends a dislocated joint!
Such happy chance, at cost of twinge, nozzle,
Into the socket back again put truth,
And stopped the limb from longer draging lie.
For love suggested, "Better shamble on,
And bear your lameness with what grace you may!"
And but for this rude wholesome accident,
Confidence of disguise and subterfuge,
Retention of first falsehood as to name
And nature in the lady, might have proved Too necessary for abandonment.
Monseur Leonce Miranda probably
Had else been lost to cert the death,
So politic, so self-preservation.
Therefore so pardonable — though so wrong!
For see the bugbear in the background?
Breathe

But ugly name, and wind is sure to wraft
The husband news of the wife's whereabouts:
From where he lies perdue in London town,
Forth steps the needy tailor on the stage,
Deity-like from duak machine of fog,
And claims his consort, or his consort's work
In rubies which her price is far above.
Hard to precipitate, harder to oppose, —
Who but the man's self came to banish fear,
A pleasant apparition, such as shocks
A moment, tells a tale, then goes for good!

Monseur Ulysses Muhlhausen proved no less
Nor more than "Gustave," lodging opposite
Monseur Leonce Miranda's diamond-cave
And ruby-mine, and lacking little theseo ave that its gnome would keep the captive safe, ever return his Clara to his arms.
or why? He was become the man in vogue, the indispensable to who went clothed or cared encounter Paris fashions’s blame, —
ach miracle could London absence work.
colling in riches — so translate "the vogue" — other his object was to keep off claw shold griffin scent the gold, should wise lay claim with a lawful portion at a future day, han tempt his partner from her private spoils.
est forage each for each, nor coupled hunt!
unsuantly, one morning, — knock at door
the knuckle, dry authoritative cough, nd easy stamp of foot, broke startlingly
a household slumber, Coliseum Street:
Admittance in the name of Law!” In shmed he Commissary and subordinate.
no glance sufficed them. “A marital pair:
’t ce certify, and bid good morning, sir!
ademne, a thousand pardons!”
Whereupon
Monsieur Ulysse Mathinser, otherwise
alled "Gustave" for convenience of trade, wposing in due form complaint of wrong
lade his demand of remedy — divorce rom bed, board, share of name, and part in goods.
lonse Léonce Miranda owned his fault, notted his pure ignorance, from first o last, of rights infringed in "Gustave’s"
case:
mitted him to judgment. Law decreed
Body and goods be henceforth separate!
nd thereupon each party took its way,
his right, this left, rejoicing, to abide stranged yet amicable, opposites life as in respective dwelling-place, ill does one read on his establishment
seg-lettered "Gustave," — gold out-glittering Miranda, goldsmith," just across the street —
A first-rate hand at riding-habits" — say he instructed — "special out of chamber-robes.”

bys by a rude in seeming — rightlier judged enfaced surprise, publicity opped further fear and trembling, and what tale
wardice thinks a covert: one bold splash
o the mid-shame, and the shiver ends, ough cramp and drowning may begin perhaps.

Cite just one more point which crowned success:
ademne, Miranda’s mother, most of all a obstacle to his projected life license, as a daughter of the Church, uteous, exemplary, severe by right — over one most thoroughly beloved without a rival to the other sort crossed her son, — first storm of anger spent,
seen, though grimly and grudgingly,
let be what needs must be, acquisitive.

"With heaven — accommodation possible!"
Saint Sylvestre had pressed with such effect, saw now mitigating circumstance.
"The erring one was most unfortunate,
No question: but worse Magdalens repeat.
Were Clara free, did only Law allow,
What fitter choice in marriage could have made
Léonce or anybody?" " ‘Tis is alleged
And evidenced, I find, by advocate,
"Never did she consider such a tie
As baleful, springe to snap whate’er the cost.”
And when the couple were in safety once
At Clairvaux, motherly, considerate,
She shrunk not from advice. “Since safe you be,
Safely abide! for winter, I know well,
Is troublesome in a cold country-house.
I recommend the south room that we styled,
Your air and I, the winter-chamber.”

Chance
Or purpose, — who can read the mystery? —
Combined, I say, to bid "Intrench yourself,
Monsieur Léonce Miranda, on the turf,
About this flower, so firmly that, as tent
Rises on every side around you both,
The question shall become, — Which arrogates
Stability, this tent or those far towers?
May not the temporary structure suit
The stable circuit, co-exist in peace? —
Always until the proper time, no fear!
Lay flat your tent! is easier said than done.”

So, with the best of auspices, betook
Themselves Léonce Miranda and his bride —
Provisionary — to their Clairvaux house,
Never to leave it — till the proper time.

I told you what was Clairvaux-Priory
Ere the improper time: an old demesne
With „ memorise, — relic half, and ruin
whole, —
The very place, then, to repair the wits
Worn out with Paris traffic, when its lord,
Miranda’s father, took his month of ease
Purchased by industry. What contrast here!
Repose, and solitude, and healthy ways!
That ticking at the back of head, he took
For motion of an inmate, stopped at once,
Proved nothing but the pavement’s rattle left Behind at Paris: here was holiday!
Welcome the quaint succeeding to the spruce,
The large and lumberous and — might be breathe
In whisper to his own ear — dignified
And gentry-fashioned old-style haunts of sleep!
Palatial gloomy chambers for parade,
And passage-lengths of lost significance,
Never constructed as receptacle,
At his odd hours, for him their actual lord
By dint of diamond-dealing, goldsmithry,
Therefore Miranda’s father chopped and
changed
Nor roof-tile nor yet floor-brick, undismayed
By rains a-top or rats at bottom there,
Such contrast is so piquant for a month!
But now arrived quite other occupants
Whose cry was "Permanency, — life and death!
Here, here, not elsewhere, change is all we dread!"
Their dwelling-place must be adapted, then,
To inmates, no mere tenants from the town,
No temporary sojourners, forsooth,
At Clairvaux : change it into Paradise!

Fair friend, — who listen and let talk, alas! —
You would, in even such a state of things,
Prone to be misleading, now and then,
Though at the cost of vulgar censure,
That the shell-outside only harbors man
The vital and progressive, meant to build,
When build he may, with quite a difference,
Some time, in that far land we dream about,
Where every man is his own architect.
But then the couple here in question, each
At one in project for a happy life,
Were by no acceptance of the word
So individual that they must aspire
To architecture all-appropriate,
And, therefore, in this world impossible:
They needed house to suit the circumstance,
Proprietors, not tenants for a term.
Despite a certain marking, here and there,
Of fleecy black or white distinguishing,
These vulgar sheep wore the flock's uniform.
They love the country, they renounce the town?
They gave a kick, as our Italians say,
To Paris ere it turned and kicked themselves!
Acquaintances might prove too hard to seek,
Or the reverse of hard to find, perchance.
Since Monsieur Gustave's apparition there.
And let me call remark upon the list
Of notabilities invoked, in Court
At Vire, to witness, by their phrases culled
From common conversation, what was the esteem
Of those we pay respect to, for "the pair
Whereof they knew the inner life," 't is said.
Three, and three only, answered the appeal.
First Monsieur Vaillant, music-publisher,"
"Begs Madame will accept civilities."
Next Alexandre Dumais, — sire, not son, —
"Sends compliments to Madame and to you."
And last — but now prepare for England's voice!
I will not mar nor make — here's word for word —
"A rich proprietor of Paris, he
To whom belonged that beauteous Bagatelle
Close to the wood of Boulogne, Hertford hight,
Assures of homages and compliments
Affectionate? — not now Mirandas but Madame Mulhausen." (Was this friend, the Duke Redoubtable in rivalry before?)
Such was the evidence when evidence
Was wanted, then if ever, to the worth
Wherein acquaintances in Paris prized.
Monsieur Léoncille Miranda's house held charm.
No wonder, then, his impulse was to live,
In Norman solitude, the Paris life:
Surround himself with Art transported thence,
And nature like those famed Ellysia Fields:
Then, warm up the right color out of both,
By Boulevard friendships tempted to one taste
How Paris lived again in little there.
Monsieur Léoncille Miranda practised Art.
Do let a man for once live as man likes!
Politics? Spend your life, to spare a world's:
Improve each unit by some particle
Of joy the more, deteriorate the orb
Entire, your own: poor profit, dismal loss!
Write books, paint pictures, or make music
Since
Your nature leans to such life-exercise!
Ay, but such exercise begins too soon.
Concludes too late, demands life whole and sole,
Artistry being battle with the age
It lives in! Half life, — silence, while we learn
What has been done; the other half, — at least
At speech, amid world's wall of wonderment —
Here's something done was never done before!
To be the very breath that moves the age
Means not to have breath; drive you battle-like
Before it — but yourself to blow: that's strain;
Strain's worry through the lifetime, till then peace;
We know where peace expects the artist's soul.
Monsieur Léoncille Miranda knew as much
Therefore in Art be nowise cared to be Creative; but creation, that had birth
In storminess long years before was born
Monsieur Léoncille Miranda, — Art, enjoyed
Like fleshly objects of the chase that tamed
In cockpit, not in capture — these might last
The dilettante, furnish tavern-fare
Open to all with purses open too.
To sit free and take tribute seigneur-like —
Now, not too lavish of acknowledgment,
Now, self-indulgently profuse of pay.
Always Art's seigneur, not Art's servitor.
What'er the style and title and degree —
That is the quiet life and easy death
Monsieur Léoncille Miranda would approve Wholly — provided (back I go again
To the first simile) that while glasses clink,
And viands steam, and banquetting latches click
All that's outside the temporary test,
The dim grim outline of the circuit-wall,
Forgets to menace "Soon or late will drop
Pavilion, soon or late you need must mark,
And laurels will be sorry they were slack!
Always — unless excuse sound plausible!"
Monsieur Léoncille Miranda knew as much:
Whence his determination just to paint
So creditably as might help the eye
To comprehend how painter's eye grew dim
Ere it produced L'inganno's piece of work —
So to become musician that his ear
Should judge, by its own tickling and turned.
Who made the Solemn Mass might well die defa — to celebrate a literary knock
That, by experience how it wiles the time,
He might imagine how a poet, rapt
A rhyming wholly, grew so poor at last
By carelessness about his banker's book,
That the Siur Boisau (to provoke our smile)
Began abruptly, — when he paid devout
To Louis Quatorze as he dined in state,
'Sire, send a drop of broth to Pierre Cornelle
Low dying and in want of sustenance!' —
'I say, these half-hour playings at life's toil,
Presided by billiards, riding, sport —
With now and then a visitor — Dunas,
Iertford — to check no aspiration's flight
While Clara, like a diamond in the dark,
Could extract shining from what else were shade,
And multiply chance rays a million-fold,
How could he doubt that all offense outside,
Wrong to the towers, which, pillow'd on the turf,
Is thus shut eyes to, — were as good as gone?
So down went Clairvaux-Priory to dust,
And up there rose, in lieu, you structure gay
Above the Norman ghosts: and where the stretch
Of barren country girdled house about,
The Park, the English preference! His made undoubtedly a desert smile
Monsieur Léonce Miranda.

Ay, but she?
She should not so merge soul in soul, you think?
And I think: only, let us wait, nor wait
Two things at once — her turn will come in time.
A cork-float danced upon the tide, we saw
This morning, blind'd-bright with briny dews:
There was no disengaging soaked from sound,
Earth-product from the sister-element.
But when we turn, the tide will turn, I think,
And bare on beach will lie exposed the buoy:
A very proper time to try, with foot
And even finger, which was buoying wave,
Which merely buoyant substance, — power to lift,
And power to be sent skyward passively.
Meanwhile, no separation of the pair!

III
And so slept pleasantly away five years
If Paradiac dream; till, as there flit
Remonstrant symptoms, pricks of pain,
Because the dreamer has to start awake
And find disease dwell active all the while
In head or stomach through his night-long sleep,
So happened here disturbance to content.
Monsieur Léonce Miranda’s last of cares,
Was he composed himself, had been to make Provision that, while sleeping safe he lay,
Somebody else should, dragon-like, set fall
Never a lid, coiled round the apple-stem,
But watch the precious fruitages. Somebody
Kept shop, in short, played Paris substitute.
Himself, shrewd, well-trained, elderly, exercised,
Could take in, at an eye-glance, luck or loss —
Knows commerce throve, though lazily uplift
On elbow merely: leave his bed forsooth?
Such active service was the substitute’s.

But one October morning, at first drop
Of applied gold, first summons to be grave
Because rough Autumn’s play turns earnest now;
Monsieur Léonce Miranda was required
In Paris to take counsel, face to face,
With Madame-mother: and be rated, too,
Roundly at certain items of expense
Whereat the government provisional,
The Paris substitute and shopkeeper,
Shook head, and talked of funds inadequate:
Oh, in the long run, — not if remedy
Occurred betimes! Else,— tap the generous hole
Too near the quick, — it withers to the root —
Leathy, prolific, golden apple-tree.

"Miranda," sturdy in the Place Vendôme!

"What is this reckless life you lead?" began
Her greeting whom most he feared and loved,
Madame Miranda. "Luxury, extravagance
Sardanapalus’ self might emulate: —
Did your good father’s money go for this?
Where are the fruits of education, where
The morals which at first distinguished you,
The faith which promised to adorn your age?
And why such wastefulness outbreaking now,
When heretofore you loved economy?

Explain this pulling-down and building-up
Poor Clairvaux, which your father bought because Clairvaux he found it, and so left to you,
Not a gilt-gingerbread big baby-house! True,
We could somehow shake head and shut eye
To what was past prevention on our part —
This reprehensible illicit bond:
We, in a manner, winking, watched consort
Our modest well-conducted pious son
With Dellaiah: we thought the smoking flax
Would smoulder soon away and end in snuff!
In spark to strengthen, prove consuming fire?
No lawful family calls Clairvaux home —
Why play that fool of Scripture whom the voice
Admonished ‘Whose to-night shall be those things Provided for thy morning jollity?'
To take one specimen of pure caprice
Out of the heap conspicuous in the plan,
— Puzzle of change, I call it, — titled big ‘Clairvaux Restored’: what means this Belvedere?
This Tower, stuck like a fool's-cap on the roof?
Do you intend to soar to heaven from thence?
Tower, truly! Better had you planted turf —
More fitly would you dig yourself a hole
Beneath it for the final journey's help!
O we poor parents — could we prophesy!"
Leonce was found affectionate enough
To many, to woman, child, bird, beast, alike;
But all affection, all one fire of heart Flaming toward Madame-mother. Had she posed
The question plainly at the outset "Choose!
Cut clean in half your all-the-world of love,
The mother and the mistress: then resolve,
Take me or take her, throw away the one!"
He might have made the choice and marred my tale.
But, meth I apprehend, the problem put
Was, "Keep both halves, yet do no detriment
To either! Prize each opposite in turn!"
Hence, while he prized at worth the Clairvaux-
life
With all its tolerated naughtiness,
He, visiting in fancy Quai Rousseau,
Saw, cornered in the cosiest nook of all,
That change of rooms through number Thirty-
three,
The lady-mother bent o'er her Bézique
While Monsieur Curé This, and Sister That —
Superior of no matter what good House —
Did draw, with heartcord and Dumas,
Nay — at his mother's age — for Clara's self.
At Quai Rousseau, things comfortable thus,
Why should poor Clairvaux prove so troublesome?
She played at cards, he built a Belvedere,
But there the difference: she had reached the Towers
And there took pastime: he was still on Turf — Though fully minded that, when once he marshaled,
No sportive fancy should distract him more.

In brief, the man was angry with himself,
With her, with all the world and much beside:
And so the unseemly words were interchanged
Which crystallize what else evaporates,
And make mere misty petulance grow hard
And sharp as each softness, heart and soul,
Monsieur Leonce Miranda flung at last
Out of doors, fever-flushed: and there the Seine
Rolled at his feet, obsequious remedy
For fever, in a cold autumn flow.
"Go and be rid of memory in a bath!"
Craftily whispered Who besets the ear
On such occasions.

Done as soon as dreamed,
Back shivers poor Leonce to bed — where else?
And there he lies a month 'twixt life and death,
Raving, "Remorse of conscience!" friends opine.
"Sirs, it may partly prove so," represents Beaumont (the family physician, he Whom last year's Commune murdered, do you
mind?)
Beaumont reports, "There is some active cause,
More than mere pungency of quarrel past, —
Cause that keeps adding other food to fire.
I hear the words and know the signs, I say! Dear Madame, you have read the Book of Saints,
How Antony was tempted? As for me,
Poor heathen, 'tis by pictures I am taught.
I say then, I see standing here, — between
Me and my patient, and that crucifix
You very properly would interpose —
A certain woman-shape, one white appeal.
'Will you leave me, then, me, me, me for her?'
Since cold Seine could not quench this fire
Of fever does not reddin it away,
— Be rational, indulgent, mute — should chance
Come to the rescue — Providence, I mean —
The while I blister and phlebotomize!"

Well, somehow rescued by whatever power.
At month's end, back again conveyed himself
Monsieur Leonce Miranda, worn to rags,
Nay, tinder: stuff irreparably spoiled,
Though kindly hand should stitch and patch its Clairvaux in Autumn is restorative.
A friend stitched on, patched ever. All the
same,
Clairvaux looked grayer than a month ago.
Unkissed was scrubbary, unglorified
Each covee, so wealthy once; the garden-place
The orchard-walks, showed death and dress-
ness.
The sea lay out at distance crammed by deck
Into a leaden wedge; and sorrowful
Silked field and pasture with persistent rain.
No hope so far from Paris now:
Friends did their duty by an invalid
Whose convalescence claimed entire repose.
Only a single ministrant was stanch
At quiet repartee of the stuff —
Monsieur Leonce Miranda, worn to rags:
But she was Clara and the world beside.

Another month, the year packed up his plumes
And sullenly departed, peddler-like,
As apprehensive old-world ware might show
To clean vantage when the newcomer.
Merchant of novelities, young 'Sixty-eight,
With brand-new bargains, whistled o'er the lot.
Things brightened somewhat o'er the Christmas
hearth,
As Clara pied assiduously her task.

"Words are but words and wind. Why let the wind
Sing in your ear, bite, sounding, to your brain? —
Old folk and young folk, still at odds, of course:
Age quarrels because Spring puts forth a leaf
While Winter has a mind that boughs stay bare;
Or rather — worse than quarrel — age depairs
Propriety in preaching life to death.
'Enjoy not youth, nor Clairvaux, nor poor me!
Dear Madame, you enjoy your age, 'tis thought!
Your number Thirty-three on Quai Rousseau
Cost fifty times the price of Clairvaux, tipped
Even with our prodigious Belvedere;
You entertain the Curé, — we, Dumas;
We play charades, while you prefer Bézique:
Do lead your own life and let ours alone!
Cross Old Year shall have done his worst, my
friend!
Here comes gay New Year with a gift, we doubt!
look up and let in light that longs to shine—
the flash of light, and where will darkness hide?
Your cold makes me too cold, love! Keep me warm!"

Whereat Léonce Miranda raised his head from his two white thin hands, and forced a
smile,
and spoke: "I do look up, and see your light above me! Let New Year contribute warmth shall refuse no fuel that may blaze."
for he did. Three days after, just a spark from Paris, answered by a snap at Caen whiter reached the telegraphic wire:
'Quickly to Paris! On arrival, learn
Why you are wanted!" 'Curt! and critical!

If starts Léonce, one fear from head to foot;
au, Rouen, Paris, as the railway helps;
 becoming the Quai and Number Thirty-three.
What is the matter, consider?" — a grim face mounts the staircase, makes for the main seat
of dreadful mystery which draws him there—wherein is a bedroom known too well—
there lies till left now of the mother once.
spers define the stretch of rigid white,
or want there ghostly velvets of the grave.
Blackness sits on either side at watch,
letters, good souls but frightful all the same,
least: a priest is spokesman for his corpse.
Dead, through Léonce Miranda's stricken down
without a minute's warning, yesterday!
What did she say to you, and you to her,
wo months ago? 'This is the consequence!
be doctors have their name for the disease;
you, and God say—heart-break, nothing
more!"

Sire Léonce Miranda, like a stone
all at the bedfoot and found respite so,
while the priest went to tell the company,
that followed you are free to disagree.
may be true or false that this good priest had taken his instructions, — who shall blame?
o quite another quarter than, perchance,
Sire Léonce Miranda might suppose could offer solace in such pressing need.
If he remembered of his kith and kin
as, they were worthily his substitutes in commerce, did their work and drew their pay.
at they remembered, in addition, this—
by fairly might expect inheritance, nearest kin, called Family by law and gospel both. Now, since Miranda's life owed nothing like abatement of distaste in conjugal, but preference squandered and confirmed of that smooth chain which slips and leaves no knot behind, no heir—assertion was, the man, become mature, bold at a calculable day discard as old and outworn . . . what we blush to
name,
And make society the just avens;
Scarcely by a new attachment—Heaven forbid!
Still less by lawful marriage: that's reserved
For those who make a proper choice at first—
Not try both courses and would grasp in age
The very treasure, youth preferred to spurn!
No! putting decently such thought aside,
The penitent must rather give his powers
To such a repARATION of the past
As, edifying kindness, makes them rich.
Now, how would it enrich prospectively
The Cousins, if he lavished such expense
On Clairvaux? — pretty as a toy, but then
As toy, so much productive and no more!
If all the outcome of the goldsmith's shop
Went to gild Clairvaux, where remain the funds
For Cousinry to spread out lap and take?
This must be thought of and provided for.
I give it you a mere conjecture, mind!
To help explain the wholesome unannounced
Intelligence, the shock that startled guilt,
The scenic show, much yellow, black and
white
By taper-shine, the nun—portentous pair,
And, more than all, the priest's admonishment—
"No flattery of self! You murdered her!
The gray lips, silent now, reprove by mine.
You wasted all your living, rioted
In harlotry — she warned and I repeat!
No warning had she, for she needed none:
If this should be the last you receive?"
Done for the best, no doubt, though clumsily,—
Such, and so startling, the reception here.
You hardly wonder if down fell at once
The tawdry tent, pictorial, musical,
Pesticidal, besprenct with hearts and darts;
its cobweb-work, betinselled stitching,
Lay dust about our sleeper on the turf,
And showed the outer towers distinct and dread.

Senseless he fell, and long he lay, and much
Seemed salutary in his punishment
To planners and performers of the piece.
When pain ends, pardon prompt may operate.
There was a good attendance close at hand,
Waiting the issue in the great saloon,
Cousins with consolation and advice.
All things thus happily performed to point,
No wonder at success commensurate.
Once swooning stopped, once anguish subsequently
Raved out, — a sudden resolution chilled
His blood and changed his swimming eyes to
stone,
As the poor fellow raised himself upright.
Collected strength, looked, once for all, his look,
Then, turning, put officious help aside
And passed from out the chamber. "For affairs!"

So he announced himself to the saloon:
"We owe a duty to the living too!"

Sire Léonce Miranda tried to smile.
How did the hearts of Cousinry rejoice
At their stray sheep returning thus to fold,
As, with a dignity, precision, sense,
All unsuspected in the man before,
Monsieur Léonce Miramda made minute
Detail of his intended scheme of life
Thenceforward and forever. "Vanity
Was ended; its redemption must begin—
And, certain, would continue; but since life
Was awfully uncertain — witness here! —
Behooved him lose no moment but discharge
Immediate burden of the world's affairs
On backs that kindly volunteered to crooch.
Cousins, with easier conscience, blamelessly
Might carry on the goldsmith's trade, in brief,
Uninterfered with by its lord who late
Was used to supervise and take due tithe.
A stipend now sufficed his natural need:
Themselves should fix what sum allows man live.
But half a dozen words concisely plain
Might, first of all, make sure that, on demise,
Monsieur Léonce Miramda's property
Passed by bequeathment, every particle,
To the right heirs, the cousins of his heart.
As for that woman — they would understand!
This was a step must take her by surprise!
It was too cruel did he match away
Decent subsistence. She was young, and fair,
And . . . and attractive! Means must be supplied
To save her from herself, and from the world,
And . . . from anxieties might haunt him else
When his new fain have other thoughts in mind."

It was a sight to melt a stone, that thaw
Of rigid disapproval into dew
Of sympathy, as each extended palm
Of a man hastened to enclose those five
Cold fingers, tendered so mistrustfully,
Despairingly of condonation now!
You would have thought, — at every fervent shake,
In reassurance of those timid tips, —
The penitent had squeezed, considerate,
By way of fee into physician's hand
For physicking his soul, some diamond knob.

And now let pass a week. Once more behold
The same assemblage in the same salon,
Waiting the entry of protagonist
Monsieur Léonce Miramda. "Just a week
Since the death-day, — was ever man transformed
Like this man?" questioned cousin of his mate.

Last seal to the repentance had been set
Three days before, at Seineaux in neighborhood
Of Paris where they laid with funeral pomp
Mother and father. Let me spare the rest:
How the poor fellow, in his misery,
Buried hot face and bosom, where heaped snow
Offered assistance, at the grave's black edge,
And there lay, till uprooted by main force
From where he prayed to grow and ne'er again
Walk earth unworthily as heretofore.

It is not with impunity priests teach
The doctrine he was dosed with from his youth —
"Pain to the body — profit to the soul;
Corporal pleasure — so much woe to pay
When disembodied spirit gives account."

However, woe had done its worst, this time:
Three days allow subsidence of much grief.
Already, regular and equable,
Forward went purpose to effect. At once
The testament was written, signed and sealed.
Disposer of the commerce — that took time.
And would not suffer by a week's delay;
But the immediate, the imperious need,
The call demanding of the Cousinry
Co-operation, what conveyed them thus,
Was — how and when should deputation meet
To Coliseum Street, the old abode
Of wickedness, and there acquaint — at shame!
Her, its old inmate, who had followed up
And lay in wait in the old haunt for prey —
That they had rescued, they possessed Léonce.
Whose loathing at recapture equalled theirs —
Upheld that amner with her sinfulness,
Impart the fellow-sinner's firm resolve
Never to set eyes on her face again:
Then, after stipulations strict but just,
Hand her the first installment — moderate
Enough, no question — of her salary:
Admonish for the future, and so end.
— All which good purposes, decided on Sufficiently, were waiting full effect
When presently the culprit should appear.

Somehow appearance was delayed too long;
Chatting and chirping sunk incoincidentally
To silence, nay, unaccessibility.
Alarm, till — anything for certainty! —
A sleeper was commissioned to explore.
At keyhole, what the laggard's task might be —
What caused so palpable a disrespect!

Back came the tiptoe cousin from his quest.
"Monsieur Léonce was busy," he believed,
"Contemplating — those love-letters, perhaps.
He always carried, as if precious stones.
About with him. He read, one after one,
Some sort of letters. But his back was turned.
The empty coffer open at his side.
He leant on elbow by the mantelpiece
Before the hearth-fire; big and blazing too."

"Better he shovelled them all in at once...
And burned the rubbish!" was a cousin's quip.
Warning his own hands at the fire while,
I told you, snow had fallen outside, I think.

When suddenly a cry, a host of cries,
Screams, hubbub and confusion thronged the room.
All by a common impulse rushed thence reached
The late death-chamber, tricked with trappings still,
Skulls, crossbones, and such moral broderie. Madame Muhlhansen might have played the witch. Dropped down the chimney and appalled Léonce. By some proposal, “Parting touch of hand!” If she but touched his foolish hand, you know! Something had happened quite contrariwise. Monsieur Léonce Miranda, one by one, had read the letters and the love they held. And, that task finished, had required his soul To answer frankly what the prospect seemed Of his own love’s departure—pledged to part! Then, answer being unmistakable, he had replaced the letters quietly, shut coffee, and so, grasping either side By its convenient handle, plunged the whole letters and coffee and both hands to boot— Into the burning grate and held them there. “Burn, burn, and purify my past!” said he, calmly, as if he felt no pain at all.

In vain they pulled him from the torture-place: The strong man, with the soul of tenfold strength Broke from their clutch: and there again smiled he, The miserable hands re-bathed in fire— Constant to that execution, “Burn, burn, burn, purify!” And when, combining force, They fairly dragged the victim out of reach Further harm, he had no hands to hurt— Two horrible remains of right and left, Whereof the bones, phalanges formerly, Carbonized, were still crackling with the flame,” said Beaumont. And he fought them all the while: “Why am I hindered when I would be pure? Why leave the sacrifice still incomplete? She holds me, I must have more hands to burn!” They were the stronger, though, and bound him fast.

Beaumont was in attendance presently. “What did I tell you? Preachment to the deaf!” wished he had been deader when they preached, Those priests! But wait till next Republic comes!”

As for Léonce, a single sentiment Possessed his soul and occupied his tongue—the absolute satisfaction at the deed. Never he varied; ’tis observable, For in the stage of agonies (which proved absent without leave),—science seemed to think), Nor yet in those three months’帝licity Which followed,—never did he vary tale—remaining happy beyond utterance. “Ineffable beatitude”—I quote The words, I cannot give the smile—“such abolished pain! Pain might or might not be: He felt in heaven, where flesh desists to fret.

Purified now and henceforth, all the past Reduced to ashes with the flesh defiled! Why all those anxious faces round his bed? What was to pity in their patient, pray When doctor came and went, and Cousins watched? — Kindness, but in pure waste!” he said and smiled.

And if a trouble would at times disturb The ambrosial mood, it came from other source Than the corporeal transitory pang. “If sacrifice be incomplete!” cried he— “If ashes have not sunk reduced to dust, To nullity! If atoms coalesce Till something grow, grow, yet to be a shape I hate, I hoped to burn away from me! She is my body, she and I are one, Yet, all the same, there, there, at bedfoot stands The woman wound about my flesh and blood, There, the arms open, the more wonderful, The whiter for the burning—vanish thou! Avant, fiend’s self found in the form I wore!”

“Whereat,” said Beaumont, “since his hands were gone The patient in a frenzy kicked and kicked To keep off some imagined visitant. So will it prove as long as priests may preach Spiritual terrors!” groaned the evidence Of Beaumont that his patient was stark mad— Produced in time and place: of which anon. “Mad, or why thus insensible to pain? Body and soul are one thing, with two names For more or less elaborated stuff.”

Such is the new Religio Medici. Though antiquated faith held otherwise, Explained that body is not soul, but just Soul’s servant: that, if soul be satisfied, Possess already joy or pain enough, It uses to ignore, as master may. What increase, joy or pain, its servant brings— Superfluous contribution: soul, once served, Has naught to do with body’s service more. Each, speculated on exclusively, As if its office were the only one, Body or soul, either shows service paid In joy and pain, that’s blind and objectless— A servant’s toiling for no master’s good— Or else shows good received and put to use, As if within soul’s self grew joy and pain, Nor needed body for a ministrant. I note these old unscientific ways: Poor Beaumont cannot: for the Commune ruled Next year, and ere they shot his priests, shot him.

Monsieur Léonce Miranda raved himself To rest; lay three long months in bliss or bale, Inactive, anyhow: more need that heirs, His natural protectors, should assume The management, bestir their cousinship, And carry out that purpose of reform Such tragic work now made imperative. A deputation, with austerity, Nay, sternness, bore her sentence to the fiend Aforesaid,—she at watch for turn of wheel
And fortune's favor, Street — you know the name.

A certain roughness seemed appropriate:

"You —

Steiner, Muhlhausen, whatso'er your name,

Causeth whole and sole of this catastrophe!" —

And so forth, introduced the embassage.

"Monsieur Léonce Miranda was divorced

Once and forever from his — ugly word.

Himself had gone for good to Portugal;

They came empowered to act and stipulate.

Hold! no discussion! Terms were settled now:

So much of present and prospective pay,

But also — good engagement in plain terms

She never seek renewal of the past!"

This little harmless tale produced effect.

Madame Muhlhausen owned her sentence just,

Its execution gentle. "Stern their phrase,

These kinsfolk with a right she recognized —

But kind its import probably, which now

Her agitation, her bewilderment.

Rendered too hard to understand, perhaps.

Let them accord the natural delay,

And she would ponder and decide. Meantime,

So far was she from wish to follow friend

Who fled her, that she would not budge from place.

Now that her friend was fled to Portugal. —

Never! She leave this Coliseum Street?

No, not a footstep!" she assured them. So —

They saw they might have left that tale untold

When, after some weeks more were gone to waste,

Recovery seemed incontestable,

And the poor mutilated figure, once

The gay and glaring fortunate young spark,

Miranda, humble and obedient took.

The doctor's counsel, issued sad and slow

From precints of the sick-room, tottered down,

And out, and into carriage for fresh air,

And so drove straight to Coliseum Street,

And tottered upstairs, knocked, and in a trice

Was clasped in the embrace of whom you know —

With much asseveration, I omit,

Of constancy henceforth till life should end.

When all this happened, — " What reward,"

cried she,

"For judging her Miranda by herself!

For never having entertained a thought

Of breaking promise, leaving home forsooth,

To follow who was fled to Portugal!

As if she thought they spoke a word of truth!

She knew what love was, knew that he loved her;

The Cousinry knew nothing of the kind."

I will not scandalize you and recount

How matters made the morning pass away.

Not one reproach, not one acknowledgment,

One explanation: all was understood!

Matters at end, the home-uneasiness.

Cousins were feeling at this jaunt prolonged

Was ended also by the entry of —
And hastened to subjoin, wherever type Proclaimed "Miranda" to the public, "Called Vow Firm-Miranda." There, a colony,
They flourish under the name that still
Maintains the old repute, I understand.
They built their Clairvaux, dream-Châtean, in Spain,
Perhaps most Place Vendôme is waking
forth:
Oh, they lost little! — only, man and man
Hardly conclude transactions of the kind
As cousin should with cousin, — cousins think.
For the rest, all was honorably done,
So, are buds break to blossom, let us breathe!
Never suppose there was one particle
Of recrudescence — wound, half-healed before,
Yet freshly rising — sin, repressed as such,
New leasomed as necessity of life!
In all this revocation and resolve,
Far be sin's self-indulgence from your thought!
The man had simply made discovery,
By process I respect if not admire.
That what was, was — that turf, his feet had ouched,
Felt solid just as much as yonder towers
He saw with eyes, but did not stand upon,
And could not, if he would, reach in a leap.
People had told him flowery turf was false
To footstep, tired the traveller soon, beside:
That was untrue. They told him "One fair stride
Plants on a safe platform, and secures man rest."
That was untrue. Some varied the advice:
'Neither was solid, towers no more than Turf.'
Double assertion, therefore twice as false.
"I like these amateurs" — our friend had laughed,
Could he what he felt to what he thought,
And, that again, to what he put in words:
'I like their pretty trial, proof of paste
Of precious stone, by delicate approach
May knakace, fine flecking of our tip,
By touch of tongue inquisitive for cold.
I tried my jewels in a crucible.
Fierce fire has felt them, licked them, left
Them sound.
Don't tell me that my earthly love is sham,
My heavenly fear a clever counterfeit!
Each may oppose each, yet be true alike!"

Build up, independent of the towers,
A durable pavilion o'er the turf,
Had issued in disaster. "What remained
Except, by tunnel, or else gallery,
To keep communication 'twixt the two,
Unite the opposites, both near and far,
And never try complete abandonment
If one or other" so he thought, not said.
And to such engineering feat, I say, monsieur Léonce Miranda saw the means
Precisely in this revocation prompt
If just those benefits of worldly wealth
Conferrd upon his Cousiny — all but!

This Clairvaux — you would know, were you at top
If yonder crowning grace, its Belvedere —
Is situate in one angle-niche of three,
At equidistance from Saint-Rambert — there Behind you, and The Revissante, beside —
There: steeple, steeple, and this Clairvaux-top
(A sort of steeple) constitute a trine,
With not a tenement to break each side,
Two miles or so in length, if eye can judge.

Now this is native land of miracle.
Oh, why, why, why, from all recorded time,
Was miracle not wrought once, only once.
To help whoever wanted help indeed?
If on the day when Spring's green girliness
Grew nimbly, and she trembled into May,
And our Miranda climbed to clasp the Spring
A-tiptoe o'er the sea, those wafts of warmth,
Those cloudlets scudding under the bare blue,
And all that new sun, that fresh hope about
His airy place of observation, — friend.
Feel with me that if just then, just for once,
Some angel, — such as the authentick pen
Yonder records a daily visitant
Of ploughman Claude, rheumatic in the joints,
And spinster Jeanne, with megrim troubled sore,
If such an angel, with naught else to do,
Had taken station on the pinnacle
And simply said, "Léonce, look straight before!
Neither to right hand nor to left: for why?
Being a stupid soul, you want a guide
To turn the goodness in you to account
And make stupidity submit itself.
Go to Saint-Rambert! Straightway get such guide!

There stands a man of men. You, jeweller, Must needs have heard how once the biggest block
Of diamond now in Europe lay exposed
'Mid specimenes of stone and earth and ore,
On huckster's stool, — Navona names the Square,
And Rome the city for the incident, —
Labelled 'quarts-crystal, price one halfpenny.'
Haste and secure that ha'pworth, on your
life!
That man will read you rightly head to foot,
Mark the brown face of you, the bushy beard.
The breadth 'twixt shoulderblades, and through each black
Castilian orbit, see into your soul.
Talk to him for five minutes — nonsense, sense,
No matter what — describe your horse, your hound,
— Give your opinion of the policy
Of Monsieur Rouher, — will he succor Rome?
Your estimate of what may outcome be
From Ecumenical Assemblage there!
After which samples of intelligence,
Rapidly run through those events you call
Your past life, tell what once you tried to do,
What you intend on doing this next May!
There he stands, reads an English newspaper,
Stock-still, and now, again upon the move,
Faces the beach to taste the Spring, like you,
Since both are human beings in God's eye.
He will have understood you, I engage.
Endeavor, for your part, to understand
He knows more, and loves better, than the world.
That never heard his name, and never may.
He will have recognized, ere breath be spent
And speech at end, how much that's good in man,
And generous, and self-devoting, makes
Méosind, who once Miranda worth his help;
While sounding to the bottom ignorance
Historical and philosophical
And moral and religious, all oneouch
Of casuistics, a portent of its kind.
Then, just as he would pityingly teach
Your body to repair maltreatment, give Advice that you should make those stumps to stir
With artificial hands of caoutchouc,
So would he soon supply your crippled soul
With crotchets, from his own intelligence,
Able to help you onward in the path
Of rectitude whereto your face is set,
And counsel justice — to yourself, the first,
To your associate, very like a wife
Or something better — to the world at large,
Friends, strangers, horses, hounds, and Country
All which amount of justice will include
Justice to God. Go and consult his voice!
Since angel would not say this simple truth,
What hinders that my heart relieve itself,
Milked, who makest warm my wintry world,
And wise my heaven, if there we consort too?
Monsieur Léonce Miranda turned, alas,
Or was turned, by no angel, t'other way,
And got him guidance of The Ravissante.

Now, into the originals of faith,
Yours, mine, Miranda's, no inquiry here!
Of faith, as apprehended by mankind,
The causes, were they caught and catalogued,
Would too distract, too desperately foil Inquirers. How may analyst reduce Quantities to their opposite?
Value to zero, then bring zero back
To value of supreme preponderance?
How substitute thing meant for thing expressed?
Detect the wire-thread through that flabby silk
Men call their rope, their real compulsive power?
Suppose effected such anatomy,
And demonstration made of what belief
Has moved believer — were the consequence
Reward at all? would such man straight de-duce,
From proved reality of cause, effect
Conformable — believe and unbelievbel
According to your True thus disengaged
From all his heap of False called reason first?
No: hand once used to hold a soft thick twist,
Cannot now grope its way by wire alone:
Childhood may catch the knack, scarce Youth, not Ages!
That 'tis the reply rewards you. Just as well
Remonstrate to your peasant in the bouse
That had he justified the true intent
Of Nature who composed him thus and thus,
Weakly or strongly, here he would not stand
Struggling with uncongenial earth and sky.
But elsewhere tread the surface of the globe,
Since one meridian suits the faulty lungs,
Another bids the sluggish liver work.
"Here I was born, for better or for worse:
I did not choose a climate for myself;
Admit, my life were healthy, led elsewhere."
(He answers,) "How am I to migrate, pray?"

Therefore the course to take is — spare your pains,
And trouble uselessly with discontent
Nor soul nor body, by paradox proof
That neither haply had known ailment, pleased
Precisely where the circumstance forbade
Their lot should fall to either of the pair.
But try and, what you find wrong, remedy,
Accepting the conditions: never ask
"How may you to be born here with these lungs,
That liver?" But bid asthma smoke a pipe,
Stramonium, just as if no Tropics were,
And ply with calomel the sluggish duct,
Nor tarry, "The born Norwegian breeds a bile!"
And as with body, so proceed with soul:
Nor less discerningly, where faith you found
However foolish and fantastic, grudge
To play the doctor and amend mistakes,
Because a wild ox were conceivable
Whence faith had sprang robust above Disease.
Far beyond human help, that source of things!
Since, in the first stage, so to speak, — first stars
Of apprehension at the invisible,
—
Begins disavowal of mind from mind,
Superior from inferior: leave this first!
Little you change there! What comes afterward —
From apprehended thing, such inference
With practicality concerning life,
This you may test and try, confirm the right
Or contravene the wrong which reasons there.
The offspring of the sickly faith must prove Sickly act also: stop a monster-birth!
When water's in the cup, and not the cloud.
Then is the proper time for chemic test:
Belief permits your skill to operate
When, drop by drop condensed from misty heaven,
'T is wrung out, lies a bowl-full in the fleece.
How dew by spoonfuls came, let Gideon say:
What purpose water serves, your word or two
May teach him, should he fancy it lights fire.

Concerning, then, our vaporous Ravissante —
How fable first precipitated faith —
Silence you get upon such point from me.
But when I see some posting to the pair
At Clairvaux, for the cure of soul-disease;
This Father of the Mission, Parish-priest,
This Mother of the Convent, Nun I know —
They practise in that second stage of things;
They boast no fresh distillery of faith;
'T is dogma in the bottle, bright and old,
They bring; and I pretend to pharmacy.
They undertake the cure with all my heart!
le trust them, and they surely trust themselves.
ask no better. Never mind the cause, tous et origo of the malady:
apply the drug with courage! Here's our case.
monsieur Léonce Mirande asks of God,
"May a man, living in illicit tie,
continue, by connivance of the Church,
they visited your shrines in plebeian usage,
his amends be to you henceforth relinquishing the sin?
physicians, what do you propose for sure cure?
father and Mother of The Ravisante, read your own records, and you find prescribed as follows, when a couple out of sorts rather than gravely suffering, sought your skill and thereby got their health again. Perpend!
and a half good centuries ago,
e de la Maison Rouge, a nobleman, with the river gives this country name,) and,
just as noblewoman. Manoe his wife, living been married many happy years
in God's honor and man's service too, received, while yet in flower of youth and beauty,
the project of departing each from each other,
and dissolving marriage-bonds that both might enter a religious life, feeling, before they came to such resolve,
private illumination, — course was clear,
they kissed in church in pilgrimage,
Christmas morn: communicating straight,
they heard three Masses proper for the day,
It is incredible with what effect I had both the Cistercian monk I copy from — and, next day, came, again communicants, as the Masses manifest, but now
With added thanks to Christ for special grace and consolation granted: in the night, had been divorce from marriage, manifest by signs and tokens. So, they made great left money for more Masses, and returned homeward rejoicing — he, to take the rules,
a Brother Dionysius, Capucin!
he, to become first postulant, then nun
according to the rules of Benedict, never Scholastic: so ended they,
and so do I — not end nor yet commence me note or comment. What was done was done.
low, Father of the Mission, here's your case!
and, Mother of the Convvent, here's its cure!
Separation was permissible, and that decree of Christ: "What God hath joined at no man put asunder" nullified.
because a couple, blameless in the world,
lead the consort that, still more blamelessly,
but of the woman, by breach of marriage-vow,
their life was like to pass, — you oracles
If God, — since holy Paul says such you are,— indistinct, not one moment, to pronounce
Then questioned by the pair now needing help,
Each from the other gone, guilty ones,
preliminary to your least approach

Nearer the Power that thus could strain a point
In favor of a pair of innocents
Who thought their wedded hands not clean enough
To touch and leave unsullied their souls' snow!
Are not your hands found filthy by the world,
Mere human law and custom? Not a step Nearer till hands be washed and purified!"

What they did say is immaterial, since
Certainly it was nothing of the kind.
There was no washing hands of him (a lack,
You take me? — in the figurative sense!)
But, somehow, gloves were drawn o'er dirt and all.
And practice with the Church procured thereby.
Seeing that, — all remonstrance proved in vain,
Persuasive tried and terrorized put to use,
I nowise question, — still the guilty pair
Only embraced the cloister, obstinate, —
Father and Mother went from Clairvaux back
Their weary way, with heaviness of heart,
I grant you, but each palm well crossed with coin.
And nothing like a smutch perceptible.
Monsieur Léonce Mirande might compound
For sin? — no, surely! but by gifts — prepare
His soul the better for contrition, say!

Gift followed upon gift, at all events.
Good counsel was rejected, on one part:
Hard money, on the other — may we hope
Was unreflectingly consigned to purser?

Two years did this experiment engage
Monsieur Léonce Mirande: how, by gifts
To God and to God's poor, a man might stay
In sin and yet stave off sin's punishment.
No salve could be conceived more nicely mixed
For this man's nature: generosity, —
Susceptibility to human illa,
Corporal, mental, self-devotedness
Made up Mirande — whether strong or weak
Elsewhere, may be inquired another time.
In mercy he was strong, at all events.
Enough! he could not see a beast in pain,
Much less a man, without the will to aid;
And where the will was, oft the means were too.

Since that good bargain with the Cousinry.
The news flew fast about the countryside
That, with the kind man, it was ask and have;
And ask and have they did. To instance you:
A mob of beggars at The Ravisante
Clung to his skirts one day, and cried "We thirst!"
Forthwith he bade a cask of wine be broached
To satisfy all comers, till, dead-drunk
So satisfied, they strewed the holy place.
For this was grown religious and a rite:
Such alms of judgment, gifts irregular,
Showed but as spillings of the golden grist
On either side the hopper, through blind zeal;
Steadily the main stream went pouring on
From mill to mouth of sack — held wide and close
By Father of the Mission, Parish-priest,
And Mother of the Convent, Nun I know,
With much effect that, in the sequel, proof
Was tendered to the Court at Vire, last month,
That in these same two years, expenditure
At quiet Clairvaux rose to the amount
Of Forty Thousand English Pounds: whereof
A trifling wert, no lump, I praise the man.
Of bounty, to supply the Virgin’s crown
With that stupendous jewel from New York,
Now blazing as befits the Star of Sea.

Such signs of grace, outward and visible,
I rather give you, for your sake and mine,
Than put in evidence the inward strife,
Spiritual effort to compound for fault
By payment of devotion — thank the phrase!
That payment was as punctual, do not doubt,
As its far easier fellow, Yester-day.
I passed the distance from The Ravissante
To Clairvaux, with my two feet; but our friend,
The more to edify the country-folk,
Was wont to make that journey on both knees.
"Maliciously perverted incident!"
Said one, when the next, when the next was told at Vire:
"The man paid mere devotion as he passed,
Kneel decently at just each wayside shrine!"
Alas, my lawyer, I judged yesterday
On my two feet, and with both eyes wide ope, —
The distance, and could find no shrine at all!
A trifling wert, no lump, I praise the man.
Enough! incessant was devotion, say —
With her, you know of, praying at his side.
Still, there be relaxations of the tense:
Or life indemnifies itself for strain,
Or finds its very strain grow feezlessness.
Monsieur Léonce Miranda’s days were passed
Much as of old, in simple work and play.
His first endeavor, on recovery
From that sad insufficent sacrifice,
Had been to set about repairing loss:
Never admitting, loss was to repair.
No, not at any time escaped his lips
— Betrayed a lurking presence, in his heart,
Of sorrow; no regret for mischief done —
Punishment suffered, he would rather say.
Good-tempered schoolboy-fashion, he preferred
To laugh away his flogging, fair price paid.
For pleasure out of bounds: if needs must be,
Get pleasure and get flogged a second time!
A sullen subject would have nursed the scars
And made excuse, for throwing grammar by,
That bench was grown uneasy to the seat.
No: this poor fellow cheerfully got bands
Fit for his stumps, and what hands failed to do,
The other members did in their degree —
Unwonted service. With his mouth alone
He wrote, nay, painted pictures — think of that!
He proved on a piano pedal-keyed,
Kicked out — if it was Bach’s — good music thence.
He rode, that’s readily conceivable,
But then he shot and never missed his bird,
With other feats as dexterous: I infer
He was not ignorant what hands are worth,
When he resolved on ruining his own.

So the two years passed somehow — who shall
say
 Foolishly, — as one estimates mankind,
The work they do, the play they leave undone?
Two whole years spent in that experiment
I told you of, at Clairvaux all the time,
From April on to April: why that month
More than another, notable in life?
Does the law, stoning of the year enclose
Man to new projects, nerve him for fresh feet
Of what proves, for the most part of mankind
Playing or working, novel folly too?
At any rate, I see no slightest sign
Of folly (let me tell you in advance),
Nothing but wisdom meets me manifest
In the procedure of the Twentieth Day
Of April, ‘Seventy, — folly’s year in France.

It was delightful Spring, and out of doors
Temptation to adventure. Walk or ride?
There was a wild young horse to exercise,
And teach the way to go, and pace to keep:
Monsieur Léonce Miranda chose to ride.
So, while they clapped soft saddle straight on back,
And bivalt jaw to satisfaction, — since
The partner of his days must stay at home.
Teased by some trifling legacy of March
To thrust or shouder, — visit duly paid.
And "farewell" given and received again —
As chamber-door considerably closed
Behind him, till five minutes were to spend.
How better, than by clearing, two and two,
The staircase-steps and coming out aloft
Upon the platform yonder (raise your eye)!
And tasting, just as those two years before.
Spring’s bright advance upon the tower a-top,
The feature of the front, the Bellvedere!

Look at it for a moment while I breathe.

Ready to hear the rest? How good you are!

Now for this Twentieth splendid day of Spring.
All in a tale, — man, wind, sky, earth and sea —
To bid man, "Up, be doing!" Mount the stairs.
Monsieur Léonce Miranda mounts so brisk,
And look — ere his elastic foot arrive —
Your longest, far and wide, o’er fronting plane;
You white streak — Havre lighthouse! Name and name,
How the mind runs from each to each relay.
Town after town, till Paris’ self be touched.
Superlatively big with life and death.
To all the world, that very day perhaps!
He who stepped out upon the platform here.
Pinched over the expanse, gave thought
Neither to Rouher nor Ollier, Room
Nor Bismarck, Emperor nor King, but just
To steeple, church, and shrine, the Ravissante.

He saw Her, whom myself saw, but when Spies
Was passing into Fall: not rode and crowned.
As, thanks to him, and her you know about.
Films were about me, though you stood aloof
Smiling or frowning: Where is power like mine
To punish or reward thee? Rise, thou fool!
Will to be free, and, lo, I lift thee loose!
Did I not will, and could I rise a whit?
Lay I, at any time, content to lie?
'To lie, at all events, brings pleasure: make Amends by undemanded pain!' I said.
Did not you prompt me? 'Purchase now by pain.
Pleasure hereafter in the world to come!'
I could not pluck my heart out, as you bade:
Unbitten, I burned off my hands at least.
My soul retained its treasure; but my purse
Lightened itself with much alacrity.
Well, where is the reward? what promised fruit
Of sacrifice in peace, content? what sense
Of added strength to bear or to forbear?
What influx of new light assists me now
Even to guess you recognize a gain
In what was lost enough to mortal me?
But she, the less authoritative voice,
Oh, how distinct enunciating, how
Plain dealing! Gain she gave was gain indeed!
That, you deny: that, you contemptuous call Acorns, swine's food not man's meat! 'Spurn
the draft!'
Ay, but those life-tree apples I prefer,
Am I to die of hunger till they drop?
Husks keep flesh from starvation, anyhow:
Give those life-apples!—one, worth woods of oak.
Worth acorns by the wagon-load, — one shoot
Through heart and brain, assurance bright and brief
That you, my Lady, my own Ravissante,
Feast, through my famine, served and satisfied,
Own me, your starving, soldier of a sort!
Your soldier! do I read my title clear
Even to call myself your friend, not foe?
What is the pact between us but a truce?
At best I shall have staved off emnity,
Obtained a respite, ransomed me from wrath.
I pay, instalment by instalment, life,
Earth's tribute-money, pleasures great and small,
Whereof should at the last one penny piece
Fall short, the whole heap becomes forfeiture.
You find in me deficient soldiership:
Want the whole life or none. I grudge that whole,
Because I am not sure of recompense:
Because I want faith. Whose the fault? I ask.
If insufficient faith have done thus much,
Contributed thus much of sacrifice,
More would move mountains, you are warrant.
Well,
Grant, you, the grace, I give the gratitude!
And what were easier? 'Ask and have' folk say.
Miranda's method: 'Have, nor need to ask!' So do they formulate your quality Superlative beyond my human grace.
The Ravissante, you ravish men away
From puny aches and petty pains, assuaged
By man's own art with small expenditure
Of pill or potion, unless, put to shame,
Nature is roused and sets things right herself.
Your miracles are grown our commonplace;
No day but pilgrim hobbles his last mile,
Stops at a cross, and rises up, flings crutch away,
Or else append it to the reverend hap
Beneath you, votive cripple-carpentry.
Some few meet failure — oh, they wanted faith,
And may betake themselves to La Salette,
Or seek Lourdes, so that hence the scandal limp!
The many get their grace and go their way
Rejoicing, with a tale to tell; — most like,
A staff to borrow, since the crutch is gone,
Should the first telling happen at my house,
And teller wet his whistle with my wine.
I tell this to a doctor and he laughs:
'Give me permission to cry — Out of bed,
You loath rheumatic sluggard! Cheat you chair
Of laziness, its gouty occupant —
You should see miracles performed! But now,
I give advice! and take as fee ten francs —
And do as much as does your Rivascente.
Send her that case of cancer to be cured
I have refused to treat for any fee,
Bring back my would-be patient sound and whole,
And see me laugh on 't'other side my mouth!' Can he be right, and are you hampered thus!
Such pettinesses restrict a miracle
Wrought by the Great Physician, who hears prayer,
Visibly seated in your mother-lap!
He, out of nothing, made sky, earth, and sea,
And all that in them is, man, beast, bird, fish,
Down to this insect on my parapet.
Look how the marvel of a minim crawls!
Were I to kneel among the halt and maimed,
And pray, 'Who mad'st the insect with ten legs,
Make me one finger grow where ten were once!'
The very priests would thrust me out of church.
'What folly does the madman dare expect?'
No faith obtains — in this late age, at least —
Such cure as that! We case rheumatisms, though!

"Ay, bring the early ages back again,
What prodigy were unattainable?
I read your annals. Here came Louis Onze,
Gave thrice the sum he ever gave before
At one time, some three hundred crowns, to wit —
On pilgrimage to pray for — health, he found?
Did he? I do not read it in Comment.
Here sent poor joyous Marie-Antoinette
To thank you that a Dauphin dignified
Her motherhood — called Duke of Normandy
And Martyr of the Temple, much the same
As if no robe of hers had dressed you rich;
No silver lamps, she gave, illumine your shrine!
Here, following example, fifty years
Ago, in gratitude for birth again
Of yet another destined King of France,
Did not the Duchess fashion with her hands,
And frame in gold and crystal, and present
A bouquet made of artificial flowers?

And was he King of France, and is not he Still Count of Chambord?

"Such the days of feck!
And such their produce to encourage mine!
What now, if I too count without my host?
I too have given money, ornament,
And 'artificial flowers' — which, when I plucked,
Seemed rooting at my heart and real enough:
What if I gain thereby nor health of mind,
Nor youth renewed which perished in its prime
Burnt to a cinder 'twixt the red-hot bars,
Nor gain to see my second baby-hope
Of managing to live on terms with both
Opposing potentates, the Power and you,
Crowned with success? I dawdle out my days
In exile here at Clairvaux, with mock love.
That gives, while whispering 'Would I dare refuse!' —
What the loud voice declares my heart's firm gift
Mock worship, mock superiority
O'er those I style the world's beminded one.
That irreligious sort I pity so,
Dumas and even Hertford, who is Duke.

"Impiety? Not if I know myself!
Not if you know the heart and soul I bare,
I bid you out, hack, aha, anatomize,
Till peccant part be found and stung away!
Demonstrate where I need more fail:
Describe
What act shall evidence sufficiency
Of faith, your warrant for such exercise
Of power, in my behalf, as all the world,
Except poor praying me, declares profuse?
Poor me? It is that world, not me alone,
That world which prates of fixed laws and the like,
I fain would save, poor world so ignorant!
And your part were — what easy miracle?
Oh, Lady, could I make your want like mine!"
Thither he went, and there he dug, and thence He disinterred the image he conveyed In pomp to Londres yonster, his domain. You liked the old place better than the new. The Count might surely have divined as much: He did not; some one might have spoke a word: No one did. A mere dream had warned enough, That back again in pomp you best were borne: No dream warned, and no need of convoy was; An angel caught you up and clapped you down, —
No mighty task; you stand one metre high, And people carry you about at times. Why, then, did you despise the simple course? Because you are the Queen of Angels: when You front us in a picture, there flock they, Angels around you, here and everywhere.

"Therefore, to prove indubitable faith, Those angels that acknowledge you their queen, I summon them to bear me to your feet From Clairvaux through the air, an easy trip! Faith without flaw! I trust your potency, Benevolence, your will to save the world — By such a simplest of procedures, too! Not even by affording angel-help.
Unless it please you: there’s a simpler mode: Only suspend the law of gravity, And, while at back, permitted to propel, The air helps onward, let the air in front Cease to oppose my passage through the midst!

"Thus I besride the rolling, leg o’er leg, Thus, lo, I stand, a single inch away, At dizzy edge of death, — no touch of fear, As safe on tower above as turf below! Your smile ensweathes me in beatitude, You lift along the rotary — who vaulks, Who, in the twinkling of an eye, revives, Dropt safely in the space before the church — How crowded, since this morn is market-day! I shall not need to speak. The news will run Like wild-fire. ‘Thousands saw Miranda’s flight!’

’T is telegraphed to Paris in a trice. The Boulevards is one buzz — ‘Do you believe? Well, this time, thousands saw Miranda’s flight: You know him, goldsmith in the Place Vendôme.’
In goes the Empress to the Emperor: ‘Now — will you hesitate to make disgorge Your wicked King of Italy his gains, Give the Legislations to the Pope once more?’ Which done, — why, grace goes back to operate, They themselves set a good example first, Reign the empire twenty years usurped, And Henry, the Desired One, reigns o’er France.
Regenerated France makes all things new! My house no longer stands on Quasi Rousseau, But Quasi rechristened Alacoque: a quai Where Renan burns his book, and Veuillot burns Renan besides, since Veuillot rules the roost, Re-edits now indeed ‘The Universe.’

O blessing, O superlatively big
With blessedness beyond all blessing dreamed
By man! for just that promise has effect,
‘Old things shall pass away and all be new!’
Then, for a culminating mercy-fast,
Wherefore should I dare dream impossible
That I too have my portion in the change?
My past with all its sorrow, sin and shame,
Becomes a blank, a nothing! There she stands, Clara de Millesfeuilles all discordant,
Twenty years’ stain wiped off her innocence!
There never was Muhlenhausen, nor at all
Duke Hertford: naught that was, remains, except
The beauty, — yes, the beauty is unchanged!
Well, and the soul too, that must keep the same!
And so the trembling little virgin hand
Melt in mine, that’s back again, of course!
— Think not I care about my poor old self!
I only want: my hand for that one use,
To take her hand, and say ’I marry you —
Men, women, angels, you behold my wife! There is no secret, nothing wicked here, Nothing she does not wish the world to know!’
None of your married women have the right
To matter! Yes, indeed, she beats us all
In beauty, — but our lives are pure at least!
Bear witness, for our marriage is no thing
Done in a corner! ’Tis The Ravissante
Repairs the wrong of Paris. See, She smiles, She beckons, She bids ‘Hither, both of you!’
And may we kneel? And will you bless us both?
And may I worship you, and yet love her?
Then!’

A sublime spring from the balustrade
About the tower so often talked about,
A flash in middle air, and stone-dead lay
Monsieur Léonce Miranda on the turf.

A gardener who watched, at work the while
Dribbling a flower-bed for geranium-shoots,
Saw the catastrophe, and, straightening back,
Stood up and shook his brows. ‘Poor soul, poor soul,
Just what I prophesied the end would be!
Ugh — the Red Night-cap!’ (as he raised the head)
“This must be what he meant by those strange words
While I was weeding larkspurs, yesterday,
‘Angels would take him!’ Mad!’

No! sane, I say.
Such being the conditions of his life,
Such end of life was not irrational.
Hold a belief, you only half-believe,
With all-momentous issues either way, —
And I advise you imitate this leap:
Put faith to proof, be cured or killed at once!
Call you men, killed through outting cancer out,
The worse for such an act of bravery?
That’s more than I know. In my estimate,
Better lie prostrate on his turf at peace,
Than, wistful, eye, from out the tent, the tower,
Bucked with a doubt, "Will going on bare knees
All the way to The Ravissante and back,
Saying my Ave Mary all the time,
Somewhat excuse if I postpone my march?
— Make due amends for that one kiss I gave
In gratitude to her who held me out
Superior Friquet's sermon, hot from press,
A-spread with hands so sinful yet so smooth?"

And now, sincerely do I pray she stand,
Clara, with interposing sweep of robe,
Between us and this horror! Any screen
Turns white by contrast with the tragic pall;
And her dubiety distracts at least,
As well as snow, from such decided black.
With womanhood, at least, we have to do:
Ending with Clara—is the word too kind?

Let pass the shock! There's poignancy enough
When what one parted with, a minute since,
Alive and happy, is returned a wreck —
All that was, all that seemed about to be,
Razed out and ruined now forevermore,
Because a straw descended on this scale
Rather than that, made death o'ballance life.
But think of cage-mates in captivity,
Inured to day-long, night-long vigilance
Each of the other's tread and angry turn
If behind prison bars the jailer knocked:
Those whom society shut out, and thus Penned in, to settle down and regulate
By the strange law, the solitary life —
When death divorces such a fellowship,
Their may pair off with that prodigions woes
Imagined of a ghostly brotherhood —
One watcher left in lighthouse out at sea,
With tongues of surf between the land and him,
Alive with his dead partner on the rock;
One galley-slave, whom curse and blow compel
To labor on, ply oar — beside his chain,
Encumbered with a corpse-companion now.
Such these: although, no prisoners, self-entrenched,
They kept the world off from their barricade.

Memory, gratitude, was poignant, sure,
Though pride brought consolation of a kind.
Twenty years long had Clara been — of whom
The rival, nay, the victor, past dispute?
What if in turn The Ravissante at length
Proved victor — which was doubtful — anyhow.
Here lay the inconsistent with, conspicuous too,
The fruit of his good fortune!

"Has he gained
By leaving me?" she might soliloquize:
"All love could do, I did for him. I learned
By heart his nature, what he loved and loathed.
Learned to with liking, turned from with distaste.
No matter what his least velleity,
I was determined he should want no wish,
And in conformity administered
To his requirement; most of joy I mixed

With leas of sorrow in life's daily draught.
Twenty years long, life's proper average.
And when he got to quarrel with my cup,
Would needs out-sweeten honey, and discard
That gall-drop we require lest nectar cloy. —
I did not call him fool, and vex my friend,
But quietly allowed experiment,
Encouraged him to spose his drink, and now
Grate ligamum, now, now bruise so-called grains
Of Paradise, and pour now, for perfume,
Distilment rare, the rose of Jericho,
Holy-thorn, passion-flower, and what know I!
Till beverage obtained the fancied smack.
'T was wild-flower-wine that neither helped nor harmed

Who sipped and held it for restorative
What harm? But here he been through the hedge Straying in search of simples, while my back
Was turned a minute, and he finds a prize,
Monkweed and belladonna! O my child,
My absent little boy, despite the beard,
The body two feet broad and six feet long,
And what the calendar counts middle age —
You wanted, did you, to enjoy a flight?
Why not shut up, taken into confidence?
Me, that was mother to you? — never mind
What mock disguise of mistress held you misse! Had you come laughing, crying, with request
'Make me fly, mother!' I had run upstairs
And held you tight the while I danced ye round

In air from tower-top, singing 'Off we go!
(On pilgrimage to Lourdes some day next month),
And swift we soar (to Rome with Peter-pans).
And low we light (at Paris where we pack
Another jewel from our store of stones)
And send it for a present to the Pope)'
So, dropt indeed you were, but on my knees.
Rolling and crowing, not a whit the worse
For journey to your Ravissante and back.
Now, no more Clairvaux — which I made you build,
And think an inspiration of your own
No more fine house, trim garden, pretty park,
Nothing I used to busy you about,
And make believe you worked for my ser-

What weariness to me will work become
Now that I need not seem surprised again!
This boudoir, for example, with the doves
(My stupid maid has damaged, dusting one)
Embosed in stucco 'er the looking-glass
Beside the toilet-table! dear — dear me!

Here she looked up from her absorbing grief.
And round her, crow-like grouped, the Conv-

She grew aware sat witnesses at watch.
For, two days had elapsed since fate befell
The course in the meadow, stretched so stark.
They did not cluster on the tree-tops, close
Their sooty ranks, raw and confabulate.
For nothing: but, like calm determined crows
They came to take possession of their corpse.
And who shall blame them? Had not they the right?
One spoke. "They would be gentle, not austere.
They understood, and were compassionate.
Madame Muhlau was too object now
For aught but the sincerest pity; still,
Since plain speech savors the wound it seems to make,
They must speak plainly — circumstances spoke.
Sin had conceived and brought forth death indeed.
As the commencement, so the close of things:
Just what might be expected all along!
Monseur Léonce Miranda launched his youth
Into a cesspool of debauchery.
And, if he then emerged all dripping slime,
— Where was the change except from thin to thick,
One warm rich mud-bath, Madame? — you, in place of Paris-drainage and distillment, you
He never needed budge from, boiled to rage!
True, some good instinct left the natural man,
Some touch of that deep dye wherewith imbeds
By education, in his happier day,
The hopeful offspring of high parentage
Was reared amid moral and religious sheep,—
Some ruddle, faint reminder (we admit),
Stuck to Miranda, rubbed he never so rude
Against the goatey coarseness: to the last,
Moral he himself styled, religious too!
Which means — what ineradicable good
You found, you never left till good's self proved Perversion and distortion, nursed to growth
So monstrous, that the tree-stock, dead and dry,
Were semblier far than such a heap grotesque
Of famous flourishing exordium. Here,
Sap-like affection, meant for family,
Stole off to feed oneucker fat — yourself;
While branches, trained religiously aloft
To rear its head in reverence to the sun,
Was pulled down earthward, pegged and picketed.

By topiary contrivance, till the tree
Became an arbor where, at vulgar ease,
Sat superstition grinning through the loops.
Still, nature is too strong or else too weak
For cookney treatment: either, tree springs back
To pristine shape, or else degraded droops,
And turns to touchwood at the heart. So here—
Body and mind, at last the man gave way.
His body — there it lies, what part was left
Unmutated! for, the strife commenced
Two years ago, when, both hands burnt to ash,
— A branch broke loose, by loss of what choice
twigs!
As for his mind — behold our register
Of all its moods, from the incipient mad,
Nay, mere erratic, to the stark insane,
Absolute idiocy or what is worse!
All have we catalogued — extravagance
In worldly matters, luxury absurd,
And zeal atavistic in its expenditure
Of nonsense called devotion: Don't we know
— We Cousins, bound in duty to our kin,—
What mummeries were practised by you two
At Clairvaux? Not a servant got discharge
But came and told his grievance, testified
To acts which turn religion to a farce.
And as the private mock, so patent — see—
The public scandal! Ask the neighborhood —
Or rather, since we asked them long ago,
Read what they answer, depositions down,
Signed, sealed and sworn to! Brief, the man was mad.
We are his heirs and claim our heritage.
Madame Muhlau, — whom good taste forbids
We qualify as do these documents,—
Fear not lest justice stifle mercy's prayer!
True, had you lent a willing ear at first,
Had you obeyed our call two years ago,
Restrained a certain insolence of eye,
A volatility of tongue, that time,
Your prospects had been none the worse, perhaps.

Still, fear not but a decent competence
Shall smooth the way for your declining age!
What we propose, then? . . .

Clara dried her eyes,
Sat up, surveyed the consistory, spoke
After due pause, with something of a smile.

"Gentlemen, kinsfolk of my friend defunct,
In thus addressing me — of all the world! —
You much misapprehend what part I play.
I claim no property you speak about,
You might as well address the park-keeper,
Harangue him on some plan advisable
For covering the park with cottage-plots.
He is the servant, no proprietor.
His business is to see the park kept trim,
Untrespassed over by the indiscrèt;
Beyond that, he refers you to myself —
Another servant of another kind —
Who again — quite as limited in act—
Refer you, with your projects, — can I else?
To who in masonry is ultimate,
The Church. The Church is sole administrat,
Since sole possessor of what worldly wealth
Monseur Léonce Miranda late possessed.
Often enough has he attempted, nay,
Forced me, wallingh, to occupy the post
You seemingly suppose I fill, — receive
As gift the wealth intrusted me as grace.
This — for quite other reasons than appear
So cogent to your perspicacity—
This I refused; and, firm as you could wish,
Still was my answer, "We two understand
Each one the other. I am intimate — As how can be mere fools and knaves — or, say,
Even your Cousins? — with your love to me,
Devotion to the Church. Would Providence
Appoint, and make me certain of the same,
That I survive you (which is little like,
Seeing you hardly overpass my age
And more than match me in abundant health)
In such case, certainly I would accept
Your bounty: better I than alien hearts
Should execute your planned benevolence
To man, your proposed largess to the Church,
But though I be survivor,—weakly frame,
With only woman's wit to make amends,—
When I shall die, or while I am alive,
Cannot you figure me an easy mark
For hypocritical rapacity,
Kith, kin and generation, crouching low,
Ever on the alert to pounce on prey?
Far be it I should say they profited
By that first frenzy—fit themselvesinduced,—
Cold-blooded scatological buffoons at sport
With horror and damnation o'er a grave:
That were too shocking—I absolve them there!
Nor did they seize the moment of your swoon
To ride pocket, wring a paper thence,
Their customfully dictation, and enrich
Thereby each mother's son as heart could wish,
Had nobody supplied a codicil.
But when the pain, poor friend! had prostrated
Your body, though your soul was right once more,
I fear they turned your weakness to account!
Why else to me, who agonizing watched,
Sneak, cap in hand, now bribe me to forsake
My mainled Léonce, now bully, cap on head,
The impudent pretension to assassage
Such sorrows as demanded Cousins' care?—
For you rejected, hated, fed me, far
In foreign lands you laughed at me!—they judged.
And think you, will the unkind one hesitate
To try conclusions with my helplessness,—
To pounce on and misuse your derelict,
Helped by advantage that bereavement lends
Folk, who, while yet you lived, played tricks like these?
You only have to die, and they detect,
In all you said and did, insanity!
Your faith was fetish-worship, your regard
For Christ's prime precept which endows the poor
And strips the rich, a craze from first to last!
They so would limn your likeness, paint your life.
That if it ended by some accident,—
For instance, if, attempting to arrange
The plants below that dangerous Belvedere
I cannot warn you from sufficiently;
You lost your balance and fell headlong—fine
Occasion, such, for crying Suicide!
Non compos mentis, naturally next,
Hands over Clairvaux to a Cousin-tribe
Who nor like me nor love The Ravissante:
Therefore be ruled by both! Life-interest
In Clairvaux,—conservation, guardianship
Of earthly good for heavenly purpose,—give Such and no other proof of confidence
Let Clara represent The Ravissante!'
—To whom accordingly, he then and there Bequeathed each stick and stone, by testament in holograph, mouth managing the quill:
Go, see the same in London, if you doubt!"

Then smile grew laugh, as sudden up she stood
And out she spoke: intertempere the speech!
"And now, sir, for your special courtesy,
Your candle hold up to the character
Of Lucie Steiner, whom you qualify
As coming short of perfect womanhood.
Yes, kindly critics, truth for once you tell!
True is it that through childhood, poverty,
Sloth, pressure of temptation, I succumbed.
And, ere I found what honor meant, lost me.
So was the sheep lost, which the Shepherd found
And never lost again. My friend found me;
Or better say, the Shepherd found us both—
Since he, my friend, was much in the same.
When first we made acquaintance. He helped each,—
A twofold extraction from the slough;
And, saving me, he saved himself. Since the Unsmirched kept our cleanliness of soul.
It is his perfect constancy, you call
My friend's main fault—he never left love!
While as for me, I daze your worst, impulse One pitch of loving bond, these twenty years
To me whom only oobweb bound, you cast!
'He was religiously disposed in youth!'
That may be, though we did not meet a church.
Under my teaching did he, like you scamp,
Become a Voltairean—fools who mock is faith?
'Infirm of body!' I am silent there:
Even yourselves acknowledge service done.
Whatever motive your own souls supply
As inspiration. Love made labor light.'

Then laugh grew frown, and frown grew twible.
Do recollect what sort of person shrieked—
'Such was I, saint or sinner, what you please:
And who is it casts stone at me but you?
By your own showing, sir, you bought and sold,
Took what advantage bargain promised by,
Abundantly did business, and with whom?
The man whom you pronounce imbecile, Indignantly aside if he presumed to settle his affairs like other folk!
How is it you have stopped into his shoes,
And stand there, bold as brass, 'Miranda, take;
Now, Firm—Miranda!' Sane, he signed away
That little birthright, did he? Home no trade!
I know and he knew who 'twas dipped and ducked,
Truckled and played the parasite in vain.
As now one, now the other, here you cried.
Were foisted, took our presents, you—the drops.
Just for your wife's adornment! you—this spray
Exactly suiting, as most diamonds would.
Your daughter on her marriage! No word
Indeed then
Of somebody the wanton! Hence, I say, Subscribers to the 'Séicle,' every snob—
For here the post brings me the 'Univers'!
Home and make money in the Place Vendôme.
Sully yourselves no longer by my sight.
And, when next Schneider wants new pants,
Be careful lest you stick there by mischance
That stone beyond compare intrusted you,
To kindle faith with, when, Miranda's gift,
Crowning the very crown, The Raisinsante Shall claim it! As to Clairvaux—talk to Her!
The answers by the Chapter of Raimbaux!"™
Sutuperative, truly! All this wrath
Because the man's relations thought him mad!
Whereat, I hope you see the Consistory
Turn each to other, blankly dolorous,
Consult a moment, more by shrug and shrug
Than mere man's language,—finally conclude
To leave the reprobe untroubled now
A her unholy triumph, till the Law
Shall right the injured one; for gentlemen
Allow the female sex, this sort at least,
A privilege. So, simply "Cockatrice!"—
"Jezzebel!"—"Queen of the Camellias!"—
Cried
Son in son, as you hinge a-creak
Shut out the party, and the gate returned
To custody of Clairvaux. "Pretty place!"
What say you, when it proves our property,
To trying a concurrence with La Roche,
And laying down a rival oyster-bed?
Where the dark ends, the sea begins, you
know!
To took they comfort till they came to Vire.

But I would linger, fain to snatch a look
At Clara as she stands in pride of place,
Someday more satisfying than my glance
to currive, so near futile, yesterday.
Because one must be courteous. Of the masks
That figure in this little history,
She only has a claim to my respect,
And one-eyed, in her French phrase, rules the Miranda hardly did his best with life:
He might have opened eye, exerted brain,
Attained conception as to right and law
In certain points respecting intercourse
Of man with woman—love, one likes to say; Which knowledge had dealt rudely with the
claim
Of Clara to play representative
And from perdition rescue soul, forsooth!
Also, the sense of him should have sufficed
For building up some better theory
Of how God operates in heaven and earth,
Than would establish Him participant
In doings yonder at The Raisantsante.
The heart was wise according to its lights
And limits; but the head refused more sun,
And shrunk into its maw, and craved less space.

Clara! I hold the happier specimen,—
May be, through that artist-preference
For work complete, inferiorly proposed,
To incompleteness, though it aim aight.
Moral! No! Aspire, break bounds! I say,
Endeavor to be good, and better still,
And best! Success is naught, endeavor's all.
But intellect adjusts the means to ends.
Fries the low thing, and leaves it done, at
least;
No prejudices to high thing, intellect
Would do and will do, only give the means.

Miranda, in my picture-gallery,
Presents a Blake; be Clara—Meissonnier!
Merely considered so by artist, mind!
For, break through Art and rise to poetry,
Bring Art to tremble nearer, touch enough
The verge of vastness to inform our soul
What orb makes transit through the dark
above,
And there's the triumph!—there the incomplete,
More than completion, matches the immense,—
Then, Michelagnolo against the world!
With this proviso, let me study her
Approvingly, the finished little piece!
Born, bred, with just one instinct,—that of growth,—
Her quality was, caterpillar-like,
To all-unerringly select a leaf
And without intermission feed her fill,
Become the Painted Peacock, or belike
The Brimstone-wing, when time of year should suit;
And 'tis a sign (say entomologists)
Of sickness, when the creature stops its meal
One minute, either to look up at heaven,
Or turn aside for change of aliment.
No doubt there was a certain ugliness
In the beginning, as the grub grew worm:
She could not find the proper plant at once,
But crawled and fumbled through a whole parterre.

Husband Muhlhausen served for stuff not long:
Then came confusion of the slimy track
From London, "where she gave the tone awhile,"
To Paris: let the stalks start up again,
Now she is off them, all the greener they! But,
settled on Miranda, how she sucked,
Assimilated juices, took the tint,
Mimicked the form and texture of her food!
Was he for pastime? Who so frolic-fond
As Clara? Had he a devotion-fit?
Clara grew serious with like qualm, be sure!
In health and strength he,—healthy too and strong,
She danced, rode, drove, took pistol-practice,
fished,
Nay, "managed sea-skiff with consummate
skill."
In pain and weakness, he,—she patient watched
And whiled the slow drip-dropping hours away.
She bound again the broken self-respect,
She picked out the true meaning from mistake,
Praised effort in each stumble, laughed "Well-climbed!"

When others groaned "None ever grovelled
so!"
"Rise, you have gained experience!" was her
word:
"I've satisfied, the ground is just your place!"
They thought appropriate counsel. "Live, not
die,
And take my full life to eke out your own:
That shall repay me and with interest!
Write!—is your mouth not clever as my hand?
Paint!—the last Exposition warrants me,
Plenty of people must ply brush with toes.
And as for music — look, what folk nickname
A lyre, those ancients played to ravishment, —
O'er the pendule, see, Apollo grasps
A three-stringed gittern which no Liszt could coax.
Such music from a jew's-harp makes to-day!
Do your endeavor like a man, and leave
The rest to 'fortune who assists the bold' —
Leans on you, the Latin which you taught me first,
You clever creature — clever, yes, I say!

If he smiled "Let us love, love's wrong comes right,
Shows reason last of all! Necessity
Must meanwhile serve for plea — so, mind not much Old Fracou's menace!" — back she smiled
"Who minds?"
If he sighed "Ah, but She is strict, they say,
For all Her mercy at The Ravissante,
She scares will be put off so!" — straight a sigh
Returned "My love must go to trim Her gown!"
I nowise doubt she inwardly believed
Smiling and sighing had the same effect
Upon the venerable image. What
She did believe in, as she obliged,
Was — Clara's self's own birthright to sustain
Existence, grow from grub to butterfly,
Upon unlimited Mirinda-leaf;
In which prime article of faith confirmed,
According to capacity, she fed
On and on till the leaf was eaten up,
That April morning. Even then, I praise
Her forethought which prevented leafless stalk
Bestowing any hoarded succulence
On earwig and black-beetle squat beneath; —
Clairvaux, that stalk whereunto her hermitage
She tacked by golden throw of silk, so fine,
So anything but feeble, that her sleep
Inside it, through last winter, two years long,
Recked little of the storm and strife without.
"But — is loved him?" Friend, I do not praise her love!
True love works never for the loved one so,
Nor spares skin - surface, smoothening truth away.
Love bids touch truth, endure truth, and embrace it.
Truth, though, embracing truth, love erases itself.
"Worship not me, but God!" the angels urge:
That is love's grandeur: still, in pettier love
The nice eye can distinguish grade and grade.
Shall mine degrade the velvet green and puce
Of caterpillar, palmer-worm — or what —
Ball in and out of ball, each ball with brush
Of Venus' eye-fringe round the turquoise egg
That nestles soft, — compare such paragon
With any scaramus of the brood
Which, born to fly, keeps wing in wing-case, walks
Persistently a-trundling dung on earth?

Egypt may venerate such hierophants,
Not I — the couple yonder. Father Priest
And Mother Nun, who came and went and came,

Beset this Clairvaux, trundled money-muck
To midden and the main heap off enough,
But never bade unshift from sheath the case.
Nor showed that, who would fly, must let all filth,
And warn "Your jewel, brother, is a bole:
Sister, your lace trails ordure! Leave yer sins,
And as best gift with Crown and grass via Robe!"

The superstition is extinct, you hope?
It were, with my good will! Suppose it so,
Bethink you likewise of the latest use
Whereo a Night-cap is convertible,
And draw your very thickest, thread as thrum,
O'er such a decomposing face of things,
Once so alive, it seemed immortal too!

This happened two years since. The Consay
Returned to Paris, called in help from Law,
And in due form proceeded to dispute
Monseigneur Léonce Mirinda's competence,
Being insane, to make a valid Will.

Much testimony volunteered itself;
The issue hardly could be doubtful — but
For that sad 'Seventy which must intercess,
Provide poor France with other work to sist.
Than settling lawsuits, even for the sake
Of such a party as The Ravissante.
It only was this Summer that the case
Could come and be disposed of, two weeks since.

At Viro — Tribunal Civil — Chamber First.

Here, issued with all regularity,
I hold the judgment — just, inevitable,
Nowise to be contested by what few
Can judge the judges: sum and substance thus:

"Inasmuch as we find, the Consay,
During that very period when they take
Monseigneur Léonce Mirinda for stark mad,
Considered him to be quite sane enough
For doing much important business with —
Nor showed suspicion of his competence
Until, by turning of the tables, less
Instead of gain accrued to them thereby, —
Plea of incompetence we set aside.

— "The rather, that the dispositions, sought
To be impugned, are natural and right,
Nor jar with any reasonable claim
Of kindred, friendship, or acquaintance less.
Nobody is despoiled, none overlooked;
Since the testator leaves his property
To just that person whom, of all the world,
He counted he was most indebted to.
In mere discharge, then, of conisciences debt.
Madame Muhlhausen has priority.
Enjoys the usufruct of Clairvaux.

"Next.
Such debt discharged, such life determining.
Such earthly interest provided for,
Monsieur Léonce Miranda may bequeath,
In absence of more fit recipient, fund
And unfruct together to the Church
Whereof he was a special devotee.

"— Which disposition, being consonant
With a long series of such acts and deeds
Notorious in his lifetime, needs must stand,
Unprejudiced by eccentricity
Nowise amounting to distemper : since,
In every instance signifies and such,
We recognize no overlapping bounds,
No straying out of the permissible :
Duty to the Religion of the Land, —
Neither excessive nor inordinate.

"The minor accusations are dismissed;
They prove mere freak and fancy, boyish mood
In age mature of simple kindly man.

Exuberant in generosity.
To all the world: no fact confirms the fear
He meditated mischief to himself
That morning when he met the accident
Which ended fatally. The case is closed."

How otherwise? So, when I grazed the skirts,
And had the glimpse of who made, yesterday, —
Woman and retinue of goats and sheep, —
The sombre path one whiteness, vision-like,
As out of gate, and in at gate again,
They wavered, — she was lady there for life:
And, after life — I hope, a white success
Of some sort, wheresoever life resume
Seeing that home she goes with prize in hand
Confirmed the Châtelaine of Clairvaux.

THE INN ALBUM

The story told in this poem was suggested to Browning, but not followed in all its details, by an adventure of Lord De Ros, a friend of Wellington’s and mentioned frequently by Greville in his Memoirs. The circumstances of De Ros’s villainy were much talked of in London at the time of their occurrence, just before the middle of this century.

He needed not despair Of dining well here — 'Here!' I myself could find a better rhyme! That bard’s a Browning; he neglects the form:
But ah, the sense, ye gods, the weighty sense!
Still, I prefer this classic. Ay, throw wide!
I’ll quench the bits of candle yet unburnt.
A minute’s fresh air, then to cipher-work!
Three little columns hold the whole account:
Ecarté, after which Blind Hooke, then
Cutting-the-Pack, five hundred pounds the cut.
'T is easy reckoning: I have lost, I think.”

Two personages occupy this room
Shabby-genteel, that’s parlour to the inn
Perched on a view-commanding eminence;
— In which may be a veritable house
Where somebody once lived and pleased good taste
Till tourists found his coigne of vantage out.
And fingered blunt the individual mark,
And vulgarized things comfortably smooth.
On a sprig-pattern-papered wall there brays
Complaint to sky Sir Edwin’s dripping stag;
His cocked, the sentry-guard creature corresponds;
They face the Huguenot and Light o’ the World.

Grim o’er the mirror on the mantelpiece,
Varnished and coifed, Salmo ferox glares,
— Possibly at the List of Wines which, framed
And glazed, hangs somewhat prominent on peg.

So much describes the stuffy little room —
Vulgar flat smooth respectability:
Not so the burst of landscape surging in,
Sunrise and all, as he who of the pair
Is, plain enough, the younger personage.
Draws sharp the shrieking curtain, sends aloft
The sash, spreads wide and fastens back to wall
Shutter and shutter, shows you England’s best.
He leans into a living glory-bath
Of air and light where seems to float and move
The wooded, watered country, hill and dale
And steel-bright thread of stream, a-smoke
With mist,
A-sparkle with May morning, diamond drift
O’ the sun-touched dew. Except the red-roofed patch.

Of half a dozen dwellings that, crept close
For hillside shelter, make the village-clump,
This inn is perched above to dominate —
Except such sign of human neighborhood,
"And this surmised rather than sensible,
There’s nothing to disturb absolute peace,
The reign of English nature — which means art
And civilized existence. Wildness’ self
Is just the cultured triumph. Presently
Deep solitude, be sure, reveals a Place
That knows the right way to defend itself;
Silence hems round a burning spot of life.
Now, where a Place burns, must a village brood,
And where a village broods, an inn should boast —

Close and convenient: here you have them both.
This inn, the Something-arms — the family’s —
(Don’t trouble Guillim: heralds leave out half!)
Is dear to lovers of the picturesque,
And spices have been planned here; but who plan
Take holy orders and find work to do.
Painters are more productive, stop a week,
Declare the prospect quite a Corot, — ay,
For tender sentiment, — themselves incline
Rather to handsweep large and liberal;
Then go, but not without success achieved
Haply some pencil-drawing, oak or beech,
Ferns at the base and ivy up the bole,
On this a slug, on that a butterfly.
Nay, he who hooked the salmon pendent here,
Also exhibited, this same May-month,
"Foxtgloves: a study" — so inspires the scene,
The air, which now the younger personage
Initiates him with till lungs o’er fraught are fair
Sigh forth a satisfaction might bestir
Even those tufts of tree-tops to the South
I the distance where the green dies off to gray,
Which, easy of conjecture, front the Place;
He eyes them, elbows wide, each hand to cheek.

His fellow, the much older — either say
A youth-of-old man or man oldish-young —
Sits at the table: wicks are noisome-deep
In wax, to dotriment of plated ware;
Above mentioned, strewn — is store of playing
Cards, Counters and all that’s proper for a game.
He sets down, rubs out figures in the book.
Adds and subtracts, puts back here, cans there,
Until the summed-up satisfaction stands
Apparent, and he pauses o’er the work:
Soothes what of brain was busy under beew,
By passage of the hard palm, curving so
Wrinkle and crowfoot for a second’s space;
Then lays down book and laughs out. No mis
Take.
Such the sum-total — ask Colenso else!
Roused by which laugh, the other turns, says too —
The youth, the good strong fellow, rough per haps.
"Well, what’s the damage — three, or four, or five?
How many figures in a row? Hand here!
Come now, there’s one expense all yours as mine —
Scribbling the people’s Album over, leaf
The first and foremost too! You think, per haps,
They’ll only charge you for a brand-new book
Nor curtail the literary loss?
Wait till the small account comes!
‘To an night’
Lodging,’ for — ‘beds’ they can’t say, — ‘pom or so;
Dinner, Apollinaris, — what they please,
Attendance not included; ’ last looms large ‘Defacement of our Album, late enriched
With,’ — let’s see what! Here, at the window, though!
Ay, breathe the morning and forgive your lack!
Fine enough country for a fool like me
To own, as next month I suppose I shall!
Eh? True fool’s-fortune! so console yourself.
Let’s see, however — hand the book, I say!
Well, you’ve improved the classic by romance.
Quer rerum, ag! Verse with parenthetic prose —
‘Hail, calm acclivity, salubrious spot!’
(Three-two fives) ‘life how profitably spent’
(Five-naght, five-nine fives) ‘ponder humbly’
(More and more naughts and fives) ‘is wil
content;
And did my feelings find the natural rest
In friendship and in love, how blest my lot!’
Then follow the dread figures — five! ‘Con tent?’
That’s appetite! Are you content as be Simpkin the sonneteer? Ten thousand pounds
Give point to his effusion — by so much
Leave me the richer and the poorer you After our night’s play; who’s content the most.
If, you, or Simpkin?”
So the polished sacred.
The faithful advent! Eh? 'With all my heart.'

Said I to you; said I to mine own self:

'Does he believe I fail to comprehend
He wants just one more final friendly snack
At friend's exchequer ere friend runs to earth,
Marries, renounces yielding friends such sport?'

And did I spill sport, pull face grim, — nay, grave?

Your pupil does you better credit! No!
I parleyed with my pass-book, — rubbed my pair

At the big balance in my banker's hands,—
Folded a check cigar-case-shape, — just wants
Filling and signing, — and took train, resolved
To execute myself with decorum
And let you win — if not Ten thousand quite,
Something by way of wind-up-farewell burst
Of firework-nosegay! Where's your fortune fled?
Or is not fortune constant after all?
You lose ten thousand pounds: had I lost half
Or half that, I should bite my lips, I think.
You man of marble! Strut and stretch my best
On tiptoe, I shall never reach your height.
How does the loss feel! Just one lesson more!'"

The more refined man smiles a frown away.

"The lesson shall be — only boys like you
Put such a question at the present stage.
I had a ball lodge in my shoulder once,
And, full five minutes, never guessed the fact;
Next day, I felt decidedly: and still,
At twelve years' distance, when I lift my arm
A twinge reminds me of the surgeon's probe.
Ask me, this day month, how I feel my luck!
And meantime please to stop impertinence,
For — don't I know its object? All this chaff
Covers the corn, this preface leads to speech.
This boy stands forth a hero. 'There, my lord!
Our play was true play, fun not earnest! I
Empty your purse, inside out, while my poke
Bulges to bursting? You can badly spare
A doit, confess now, Duke though brother be!
While I'm gold-daubed so thickly, spangles
Drop, dress, — and blush for love of me.
And show my father's warehouse-apron; peahow!
Enough! We've had a palpitating night!
Good morning! Breakfast and forget our dreams!

My mouth's shut, mind! I tell nor man nor mouse.'"

There, see! He don't deny it! Thanks, my boy!
Hero and welcome — only, not on me
Make trial of your 'prentice-hand! Enough!
We've played, I've lost and owe ten thousand pounds,
Whence if I must, at the moment, — well,
What's for the bill here and the back to town.
Still, I've my little character to keep;
You may expect your money at month's end.'"

The young man at the window turns round quick —
A clumsy giant handsome creature; grasps
In his large red the little lean white hand
Of the other, looks him in the sallow face.
I say now — is it right to so mistake
A fellow, force him in mere self-defence
To spout like Mister Mild Activitty
In album language? — you know well enough
Whether I like you — life's no album-word,
Almow : point me to one soul beside
In the wide world I care one straw about!
I first set eyes on you a year ago;
Since when you've done me good — I'll stick to

More than I got in the whole twenty-five
That make my life up, Oxford years and all —
Throw in the three I fooled away abroad,
Seeing myself and nobody more sage
Until I met you, and you made me man
Such as the sort is and the fates allow.
I do think, since we two kept company,
I've learnt to know a little — all through you!
It's nature if I like you. Taunt away!
As if I need you teaching me my place —
The snob I am, the Duke your brother is,
When just the good you did was — teaching me
My own trade, how a snob and millionnaire
May lead his life and let the Duke's alone,
Clap wings, free-jackdaw, on his steeple-perch,
Burnish his black to gold in sun and air,
Nor pick up stray plumes, strive to match in strut
Regular peacocks who can't fly an inch
Over the courtyard-palings. Head and heart
(That's album-style) are older than you know,
For all your knowledge: boy, perhaps — ay, boy
Had his advent, just as he were man —
His ball-experience in the shoulder-blade,
His bit of life-long ache to recognize,
Although he bears it cheerily about,
Because you came and clapped him on the back,
Advised him ' Walk and wear the aching off!'
Why, just in Dalmatia, build a seaside tower
High on a rock, and so expend my days
Pursuing chemistry or botany
Or, very like, astronomy because
I noticed stars alone when I passed the place:
Letting my nash accumulate the while
In England — to lay out in lump at last
As Ruskin should direct me! All or some
Of which should I have done or tried to do,
And preciously repented, one fine day,
Had you discovered Timon, climbed his rock
And scaled his tower, some ten years thence,
suppose,
And coaxed his story from him! Don't I see
The pair conversing! It's a novel writ
Already, I'll be bound, — our dialogue!
' What? cried the elder and yet youthful man
So did the eye flash 'neath the lordly front,
And the imposing presence swell with scorn,
As the haughty high-bred bearing and dispose Contrasted with his interlocutor.
The latter being born, of bulk before,
Had steadily increased, one stone per week,
Since his abstention from horse-exercise:
' What? you, as rich as Rothschild, left, you say
London the very year you came of age,
Because your father manufactured goods —
Companion agent high of Manchester —
Partly, and partly through a baby case
Of disappointment I've pumped out at last —
And here you spend life's prime in gaining fuel
And giving science one more asteroid?
Brief, my dear fellow, you instructed me,
At Alfred's and not Latiara! proved a snob
May turn a million to account although
His brother be no Duke, and see good days
Without the girl he lost and some one gained.
The end is, after one year's tutelage,
Having by your help, touched society,
Polo, Tent-pegging, Hurlingham, the Risk —
I leave all these delights, by your advice,
And marry my young pretty cousin here
Whose place, whose oaks ancestral you beth (Her father was in partnership with mine —
Does not his purchase look a pedigree?)
My million will be tails and tassels smart
To this plump-bodied kite, this house and land
Which, set a-swooning, pulls me, soft as sugar.
Along life's pleasant meadow, — arm left free
To lock a friend's in, — whose, but yours all boy?
Arm in arm glide we over rough and smooth,
While hand, to pocket held, saves cash from cards.
Now if you don't esteem ten thousand pounds
(— Which I shall probably discover now)
Hid somewhere in the columns-corner cappled
With 'Credit,' based on 'Balance,' — which I swear,
By this time next month I shall quite forget
Whether I lost or won — ten thousand pounds.
Which, at this instant I would give ... k' see,
For Galopin — nay, for that Gainsborough
Sir Richard won't sell, and, if bought by me
Would get my glance and praise some twenty year, —
Well, if you don't esteem that price dirt-cheap
For teaching me Dalmatia was mistake —
Why then, my last illusion-bubble breaks,
My one discovered phenix proves a goose,
My cleverest of all companions — oh,
Was worth but ten or ten and pence nor ten thousand pounds!
Come! Be yourself again! So endeth here
The morning's lesson! Never while life lasts
Do I touch card again. To breakfast now!
To bed — I can't say, since you need must
For station early — oh, the down-train still.
First plan and best plan — townward trip is hanged!
You're due at your big brother's — pay the debt,
Then owe me not a farthing! Order eggs —
And who knows but there's trout obtainable?
The fine man looks wellnigh malignant: —

Sir, please subdue your manner! Debts are debts:
I pay mine — debts of this sort — certainly.
What do I care how you regard your gains.
Want them or want them not? The thing I want
Is — not to have a story circulate
From club to club — how, bent on clearing out.
THE INN ALBUM

Young So-and-so, young So-and-so cleaned me,
Then set the empty kennel flush again.
Ignored advantage and forgave his friend —
For why? There was no wringing blood from tongue.
Oh, don’t be savage! You would hold your Bite it in two, as man may; but those small
Hours in the smoking-room, when instance a pt.
Rises to tongue’s root, tingle on tip, to,
And the thinnestest, as I consists of six.
Capital well-known follows one may trust!
Next week, it’s in the ’World.’ No, you, much.
I owe ten thousand pounds; I’ll pay them!"

This becomes funny. You’ve made friends with me:
I can’t help knowing of the ways and means!
Or stay! they say your brother closets up
Correggio’s long lost Leda: if he means
To give you that, and if you give me it"

"I polished snob off to aristocrat?
You compliment me! father’s apron still Sticks out from son’s court-vesture; still silk
Stone.
Roughs finger with some bristle sow-sar-born!
Well, neither I nor you mean harm at heart!
I owe you and shall pay you: which premised,
Why should what follows sound like flattery?
The fact is — you do compliment too much
You owe me no such thanks as you protest.
The polisher needs precious stone no less
Than precious stone needs polisher: believe
I struck no tint from out you but I found
Enslaving first neath surface hairbreadth-deep!
Beside, I liked the exercise: with skill
It goes love to show skill for skill’s sake. You
see,
I’m old and understand things: too absurd
It were you pitched and tossed away your life,
As diamond were Scotch-pebble! all the more.
That I myself misused a stone of price.
Born and bred clever — people used to say
Clever as most men, if not something more
Yet here I stand a failure, out awry
Or left opaque, — no brilliant named and known.
Waste’re my inner stuff, my outside’s blank;
I’m nobody — or rather, look that same —
I’m — who I am — and know it; but I hold
What in my hand out for the world to see?
What ministry, what mission, or what book
I’ll say, book even? Not a sign of these!
I began — laughing — ‘All these when I like!’
I end with — well, you’ve hit it! — "This boy’s
check
For just as many thousands as he’ll spare!
The first — I could, and would not; your spare
Cash.
I would, and could not: have no scruple, pray,
But, as I hoped to pocket yours, pouch mine
— When you are able!"

"Which is — when to be?
I’ve heard, great characters require a fall
Of fortune to show greatness by uprise:
They touch the ground to jollify rebound,
Add to the Album! Let a fellow share
Your secret of superiority!
I know, my banker makes the money breed
Money; I eat and sleep, he simply takes
The dividends and cuts the coupons off,
Sells out, buys in, keeps doubling, tripling cash,
While I do nothing but receive and spend.
But you, spontaneous generator, hatch
A wind-egg; cluck, and forth struts Capital
As Interest to me from egg of gold.
I am grown curious: pay me by all means!
How will you make the money?
"

"Mind your own —
Not my affair. Enough: or money, or Money’s worth, as the case may be, expect Ere month’s end, — keep but patient for a month!
Who’s for a stroll to station? Ten’s the time;
Your man, with my things, follows in the trap;
At stoppage of the down-train, play the arrived
On platform, and you’ll show the due fatigue
Of the night-journey, — not much sleep, — perhaps,
Your thoughts were on before you — yes, indeed.
You join them, being happily awake
With thought’s sole object as she smiling sits
At breakfast-table. I shall dodge meantime
In and out station-precinct, while away
The hour till up my engine pants and smokes.
No doubt, she gets no glance at me, who shame such saints!"

II

So, they ring bell, give orders, pay, depart
Amid profuse acknowledgment from host
Who well knows what may bring the younger
back.
They light cigar, descend in twenty steps
The "calm activity," inhale — beyond
Tobacco’s balm — the better smoke of turf
And wood fire, — cottages at cookery
I the morning, — reach the main road straightening
on
"Twixt wood and wood, two black walls full of
night
Slow to dispense, though mists thin fast before
The advancing foot, and leave the flint-dust fine
Each speak with its fire-sparkle. Presently
The road’s end with the sky’s beginning mix
In one magnificence of glare, due East.
So high the sun rides, — May’s the merry
month.
They slacken pace: the younger stops abrupt,
Discards cigar, looks his friend full in face.

"All right; the station comes in view at end;
Five minutes from the beech-clump, there you are!"
I say: let’s halt, let’s borrow yonder gate
Of its two magpies, sit and have a talk!

Do let a fellow speak a moment! More
I think about and less I like the thing —
No, you must let me! Now, be good for once!
Ten thousand pounds be done for, dead and damned!
We played for love, not hate: yes, hate! I hate Thinking you beg or borrow or reduce
To strychnine some poor devil of a lord
Licked at Unlimited Loco. I had the cash
To lose — so you knew that! — lose none and none the less.
Whistle to-morrow: it's not every chap
Affords to take his punishment so well!
Now, don't be angry with a friend whose fault
Is that he thinks — upon my soul, I do —
Your head the best head going. Oh, one sees Names in the newspaper — great This, great
That,
Gladstone, Carlyle, the Laureate: — much I
care!
Others have their opinion, I keep mine:
Which means — by right you ought to have the things
I want a head for. Here's a pretty place,
My cousin's place, and presently my place,
Not yours! I'll tell you how it strikes a man.
My cousin's fond of music and of course
Plays the piano (it won't be for long!)
A brand-new bore she calls a 'semi-grand'
Rosewood and pearl, that blocks the drawing-
room,
And cost no end of money. Twice a week
Down comes Herr Somebody and seats himself,
Sets to work teaching — with his teeth on edge —
I've watched the rascal. 'Does he play first-
rate?'
I ask: 'I rather think so,' answers she —
'He's What's-his-Name!' — 'Why give you lessons then?' —
'I pay three guineas and the train beside.' —
'This instrument, has he one such at home?' —
'Herr Herr! How to practise on a table-top,
When he can't hire the proper thing!' — 'I see!
You've the piano, he the skill, and God
The distribution of such gifts.' So here:
After your teaching, I shall sit and strum
Polkas on this piano of a Place,
You'd make resound with 'Rule Britannia'!

'Thanks! I don't say but this pretty cousin's place,
Appended with your million, tempts my hand
As key-board I might touch with some effect.'

"Then, why not have obtained the like?
House, land,
Money, are things obtainable, you see,
By clever head-work: ask my father else!
You, who teach me, why not have learned,
yourself?
Played like Herr Somebody with power to thump
And flourish and the rest, not bend domino
Pouting out blunders — Sharp, not natural!
Permit me — on the black key use the thumb!"

There's some fatality, I'm sure! You say
'Marry the cousin, that's your proper move!' And I do use the thumb and hit the sharp:
You should have listened to your own head's hint,
As I to you! The puzzle's past my power,
How you have managed — with such stuff, and
means —
Not to be rich nor great nor happy man:
Of which true good things where's a sign at
all?
Just look at Dizzy! Come, — what tripped your heels?
Instruct a goose that boasts wings and can't fly!
I wager I have guessed it! — never found
The old solution of the riddle fail!
'Who was the woman?' I don't ask, but —
'Where
I the path of life stood she who tripped you?'

"Goes
You truly are! I own to fifty years.
Why don't I interpose and cut out — you?
Compete with five-and-twenty? Age, my boy!"

"Old man, no nonsense! — even to a boy
That's ripe at least for rationality
Rapped into him, as maybe mine was, once! I've had my small adventure lesson me
Over the knuckles! — likely, I forget
The sort of figure youth cuts now and then,
Competing with old shoulders but young head
Despite the fifty grizzling years!"

"Aha!
Then that means — just the bullet in the brain
Which brought Dalmatia on the brain, — that,
too.
Came of a fatal creature? Can't pretend
Now for the first time to surmise as much!
Make a clean breast! Recount! a secret's safe
'Twixt you, me, and the gate-post!"

"— Can't pretend.
Neither, to never have surmised your wish
It's no use, — case of unextracted balm Winces at finger-touching. Let things be!"

"Ah, if you love your love still! I hate
mine."

"I can't hate.
"I won't teach you; and won't tell
You, therefore, what you please to ask of me:
As if I, also, may not have my ache!"

"My sort of ache? No, no! and yet — perhaps!
All comes of thinking you superior still.
But live and learn! I say! Time's up! Good jump!
You old, indeed! I fancy there's a cut
Across the wood, a grass-path: shall we try?
It's venturesome, however!"
"Stop, my boy! Don’t think I’m stingy of experience! Life—It’s like this wood we leave. Should you je wandering about there, though the gaps
We went in and came out by were opposed is the two poles still, somehow, all the same ly nightfall we should probably have chanced in much the same main points of interest.
both of us measured girth of mossy trunk.
striped ivy from its strangled prey, clapped
hands
it squirrel, sent a fir-cone after crow,
and so forth,—never mind what time betwixt.
In our lives; allow I entered mine another way than you: ’tis possible ended just by knocking head against that plaguy low-hung branch yourself began ly getting bump from; as at last you too lay stumble o’er that stump which first of all made me walk circumspectly. Head and feet are vulnerable both, and I, footsure, forgot that ducking down saves brow from bruise.

early old, played young man four years since and failed confoundedly: so, hate alike failure and who caused failure,—curse her

'Oh, I see! You, though somewhat past the prime.

Were taken with a rosebud beauty! Ah—but how should childe distinguish? She admired four marvel of a mind, I’ll undertake!
but as to body... nay, I mean... that is,
When years have told on face and figure...

"Thanks,
sister Sufficiently-Instructed! Such fo doubt was bound to be the consequence
’t suit your self-complacency: she liked fly head enough, but loved some heart beneath one head with plenty of brown hair a-top the... I... and you, my friend’s fashion! What becomes
If that fine speech you made a minute since about the man of middle age you found formidable peer at twenty-one?
so much for your mock-modesty! and yet back your first against this second sprout of observation, insight, what you please.
fly middle age, Sir, had too much success!
It’s odd: my case occurred four years ago—finished just while you commenced that turn of the wood of life that takes us to the wealth of honesucle, heaped for who can reach.
I don’t boast: it’s bad style, and beside,
the feat proves easier than it looks: I plucked all many a flower unnamed in that bouquet Mostly of peonies and poppies, though I!
lead-nature sticks into my buttonhole.
therefore it was with rose in want of snuff taker than Ess or Paidium, that I chanced in what—so far from ‘rosebud beauty’..."

Well —
he’s dead: at least you never heard her name;
his was no courty creature, had nor birth for breeding—mere fine-lady-breeding but Oh, such a wonder of a woman! Grand
As a Greek statue! Stick fine clothes on that,
Style that a Duchess or a Queen,—you know,
Artists would make an outcry: all the more,
That she had just a statue’s sleepy grace
Which broods o’er its own beauty. Nay, her fault
(Don’t laugh!) was just perfection: for suppose
Only the little flaw, and I had peeped
Inside it, learned what soul inside was like.
At Rome some tourist raised the grit beneath
A Venus’ forehead with his whittling-knife—
I wish—now—I had played that brute, brought blood
To surface from the depths I fancied chalk
As it was, her mere face surprised so much
That I stopped short there, struck on heap, as stares
The cockney stranger at a certain bust
With drooped eyes,—she’s the thing I have in mind,—
Down at my Brother’s. All sufficient prize—
Such outside! Now,—confound me for a prig!—
Who cares? I’ll make a clean breast once for all!
Beside, you’ve heard the gossip. My life long
I’ve been a woman-liker,—liking means
Loving and so on. There’s a lengthy list
By this time I shall have to answer for—
So say the good folk: and they don’t guess half—
For the worst is, let once collecting-itch
Possess you, and, with perspicacity,
Keeps growing such a greediness that theft
Follows at no long distance,—there’s the fact!
I knew that on my Leporello-list
Might figure this, that, and the other name
Of feminine desirability,
But if I happened to desire inscribe,
Along with these, the only Beautiful—
Here was the unique specimen to snatch
Or now or never. ‘Beautiful’ I said—
‘Beautiful!’ say in cold blood,—boiling them
To tune of ‘Haste, secure whatever the cost
This rarity, die in the act, be damned,
So you complete collection, crown your list!’
It seemed as though the whole world, once aroused
By the first notion of such wonder’s birth,
Would break bounds to contest my prize with me
The first discoverer, should she but emerge
From that safe den of darkness where she dozed
Till I stole in, that country-personage
Where, country-person’s daughter, motherless,
Brotherless, sisterless, for eighteen years
She had been vegetating lily-like.
Her father was my brother’s tutor, got
The living that way: him I chanced to see—
Her I saw—her the world would grow one eye
To see, I felt no sort of doubt at all!
‘Secure her!’ cried the devil: ‘afterward
Arrange for the disposal of the prize!’
The devil’s doing! yet I seem to think—
Now, when all’s done,—think with ‘a head reposed”
In French phrase—hope I think I meant to do
All requisite for such a rarity
When I should be at ease, have due time
To learn requirement. But in evil day —
Bless me, at week's end, long as any year,
The father must begin. 'Young Somebody,
Much recommended — for I break a rule —
Comes here to read, next Long Vacation.' —
'Young!' That did it.
Had the epithet been 'rich,' 'Noble,' 'a genius,' even 'handsome,' — but — 'Young!'"

"I say — just a word! I want to know —
You are not married?"

"I?"

"Nor ever were?"

"Never! Why?"

"Oh, then — never mind! Go on!
I had a reason for the question."

You could not be the young man?"

"No, indeed!"

Certainly — if you never married her!"

"That I did not: and there's the curse, you'll
see!
Nay, all of it's one curse, my life's mistake
Which nourished with manure that's warranted
To make the plant bear wisdom, blew out full
In folly beyond fieldflower-foolishness!
The lies I used to tell my womankind!
Knowing they disbelieved me all the time
Though they required my lies, their decent due,
This woman — not so much believed, I'll say,
As just anticipated from my mouth:
Since being true, devoted, constant — she Found constancy, devotion, truth, the plain
And easy commonplace of character.
No mock-heroes but seemed natural
To her who underneath the face, I knew
Was fairness' self, possessed a heart, I judged
Must correspond in folly just as far
Beyond the common, — and a mind to match,
Not made to puzzle conjurers like me
Who, therein, proved the fool who fronts you, Sir.
And begs leave to cut short the ugly rest!
'Trust me!' I said: she trusted. 'Marry me!'
Or rather, 'We are married: when, the rite?'
That brought on the collector's next-day qualm
At counting acquisition's cost. There lay
My marvel, there my purse more light by much
Because of its late lie-expenditure:
Ill-judged such moment to make fresh demand —
To cage as well as catch my rarity!
So, I began explaining. At first word
Outbroke the horror. 'Then, my truths were lies!'
I tell you, such an outbreak, such new strange
All-unexpected revelation — soul
As supernaturally grand as face
Was far beyond example — that at once
Either I lost — or, if it please you, found My senses, — stammered somehow — 'Jest! at
now,
Earnest! Forget all else but — heart has lost,
Does love, shall love you ever! take the hand?'
Not she! no marriage for superb disdain,
Contempt incarnate!"

"Yes, it's different —
It's only like in being four years since.
I see now!"

"Well, what did disdain do next Think you?"

"That's past me: did not marry you! —
That's the main thing I care for, I suppose.
Turned nun, or what?"

"Why, married in a mask
Some parson, some snug crop-haired smooth-chinned sort
Of curate-creature, I suspect, — dived down.
Down, deeper still, and came up somewhere else —
I don't know where — I've not tried much to
know,
In short, she's happy: what the oldfashions call
'Constrained!' with a vengeance! leads the life
Respectable and all that drives you mad:
Still — where, I don't know, and that's best for both.'"

"Well, that she did not like you, I conceive.
But why should you hate her, I want to
know?"

"My good young friend, — because or her or else Malicious Providence I have to hate.
For, what I tell you proved the turning-point
Of my whole life and fortune toward success
Or failure. If I drown, I lay the fault
Much on myself who caught at reed not reed,
But more on reed which, with a peckthorn's pitch,
Had buoyed me till the minute's cramp could thaw
And I strike out afresh and so be saved.
It's easy saying — I had sunk before,
Disqualified myself by idle days
And busy nights, long since, from holding hard
On cable, even, had fate cast me such!
You boys don't know how many times men fail
Perforce o' the little to succeed i' the large.
Husband their strength, let slip the petty pry.
Collect the whole power for the final pounce!
My fault was the misleading man's main prise
For intermediate boy's diversion; clap
Of boyish hands here frightened game away
Which, once gone, goes forever. Oh, at first
I took the anger easily, nor much Minded the anguish — having learned that storms
Subside, and tepid-tempests are akin.

Ime would arrange things, mend what ’e might be and properly in marriage and a dance!

Not you! But I see. Slowly, surely, creeps by day o'er me the conviction — here as life’s prize grasped at, gained, and then let go!
That with her — maybe, for her — I had felt in me melt, grow steam, drive to effect or all the fancies sluggish here
the head that needs the hand she would not take counting such a lengthy cock-and-bull

prophesy good luck to both of us!
see now! — back to ‘balmy eminence’

Or ‘calm acclivity ’ or what’s the word!
Bestow you there an hour, connect at ease
A song for the Album, while I put
Bold face on, best foot forward, make for house,
March in to aunt and niece, and tell the truth —
(Even white-lying goes against my taste
After your little story.) Oh, the niece
Is rationality itself! The aunt —
If she’s amenable to reason too —
Why, you stopped short to pay her due respect,
And let the Duke wait (I’ll work well the Duke),
If she grows gracious, I return for you;
If thunder’s in the air, why — bear your doom,
Dine on rump-steaks and port, and shake the dust
Of snuff from your shoes as off you go
By evening-train, nor give the thing a thought
How you shall pay me — that’s as sure as fate,
Old fellow! Off with you, face left about!
Yonder ’s the path I have to pad. You see,
I’m in good spirits, God knows why! Perhaps Because the woman did not marry you,
— Who look so hard at me, — and have the right,
One must be fair and own.”

The two stand still

Under an oak.

"Look here!” resumes the youth.
"I never quite knew how I came to like
You — so much — whom I ought not court at all:
Nor how you had a leaning just to me
Who am assuredly not worth your pains.
For there must needs be plenty such as you
Somewhere about, — although I can’t say
where.
Able and willing to teach all you know;
While — how can you have missed a score like me
With money and no wit, precisely each
A pupil for your purpose, were it — ease
Fool’s poke of tutor’s honori tum-fee? And yet, how'er it came about, I felt
At once my master: you as prompt despaired
Your man, I warrant, so was bargain struck.
Now, these same lines of liking, loving, run
Sometimes so close together they converge
Life’s great adventures — you know what I mean —

In people. Do you know, as you advanced,
It got to be uncommonly like fact
We two had fallen in with — liked and loved
Just the same woman in our different ways?
I began life — poor grounding as I prove —
Winged and ambitious to fly high: why not?
There’s something in ‘Don Quixote’ to the point.
My shrewd old father used to quote and
praise —
‘Am I born man?’ asks Sancho; ‘being man,
By possibility I may be Pope!’

So, Pope I meant to make myself, by step
And step, whereas the first should be to find

A perfect woman; and I tell you this—
If what I fixed on, in the order due
Of undertakings, as next step, had first
Of all disposed itself to suit my tread,
And I had been, the day I came of age,
Returned at head of poll for Westminster
— Nay, and moreover summoned by the Queen
At week's end, when my maiden-speech bore fruit.
To form and head a Tory ministry—
It would not have seemed stranger, no, nor

More strange to me, as now I estimate,
Than what did happen—sober truth, no dream.
I saw my wonder of a woman,—laugh,
I'm past that!—in Commemoration-week.
A plenty have I seen since, fair and foul,—
With eyes, too, helped by your sagacious wink;
But one to match that marvel—no least trace,
Least touch of kinship and community!
The end was—I did somehow state the fact,
Did, with no matter what imperfect words,
One way or other give to understand
That woman, soul and body were her slave
Would she but take, but try them—any test
Of will, and some poor test of power beside:
So did the strings within my brain grow tense
And capable of... hang similitudes!
She answered kindly but beyond appeal.
'No sort of hope for me, who came too late.'
'She was another.' Love went—mine to her,
'Her's just as loyally to some one else.'
Of course! I might expect it! Nature's law—
Given the peerless woman, certainly
Somewhere shall be the peerless man to match!
I acquiesced at once, submitted me
In something of a stupor, went my way.
I fancy there had been some talk before
Of somebody—her father or the like—
To coach me in the holidays,—that's how
I came to get the sight and speech of her,—
But I had sense enough to break off sharp,
Save both of us the pain."

"Quite right there!"

"Eh?

Quite wrong, it happens! Now comes worst of all,
Yes, I did sulk aloof and let alone
The lovers—I disturb the angel-mates?"

"Seraph paired off with cherub!"

"Thank you! While
I never plucked up courage to inquire
Who he was, even,—certain sure of this,
That nobody I knew of had blue wings
And wore a star-crown as he needed must do,—
Some little lady,—plainish, pock-marked girl,—
Finds out my secret in my woeful face,
Comes up to me at the Apollo Ball,
And pityingly pours her wine and oil
This into the wound: 'If a self-friend,
Why waste affection thus on—must I say,
A somewhat worthless object? Who's her choice—
Irrevocable as deliberate—
Out of the wide world I shall name no names—"
As well might I blame you who kept aloof,
Seeing you could not guess I was alive,
Never advised me 'Do as I have done —
Reverence such a jewel as your luck
Has scratched up to enrich unworthiness!'
As your behavior was, should mine have been,
— Faults which we both, too late, are sorry for:
Opposite ages, each with its mistake:
'If youth but would — if age but could,' you know.
Don't let us quarrel! 'Come, we're — young and old —
Neither so badly off. Go you your way,
Cut to the Counsell! I'll to Inn, await
The issue of diplomacy with Aunt,
And wait my hour on 'calm activity'
In rumination manifold — perhaps
About ten thousand pounds I have to pay!'

III

Now, as the elder lights the fresh cigar
Conducive to resource, and saunteringly
Betrays to him the left-hand backward path, —
While, much sedate, the younger strides away
To right and makes for — inlanded in lawn
And edged with shrubbery — the brilliant bit
Of Barry's building that's the Place, — a pair
Of women, at this nick of time, one young,
One very young, are ushered with due pomp
Into the same inn-parlor — "disengaged,
Entirely now!" the obsequious landlord smiles,
"Since the late occupants — whereof but one
Was quite a stranger" — (smile enforced by bow)
"Left, a full two hours since, to catch the train, Probably for the stranger's sake!" (Bow, smile,
And backing out from door soft-closed behind.)

Woman and girl, the two, alone inside,
Begin their talk: the girl, with sparkling eyes —
"Oh, I forewent him purposely! but you,
Who joined at — journeyed from the Junction here—
I wonder how he failed your notice. Few
Stop at our station: fellow-passengers
Assuredly you were — I saw indeed
His servant, therefore he arrived all right.
I wanted, you know why, to have you safe
Inside here first of all, so dodged about
The dark end of the platform; that's his way —
To swing from station straight to avenue
And stride the half a mile for exercise.
I fancied you might notice the huge boy.
He soon gets 'er the distance; at the house
He'll hear I went to meet him and have missed;
He'll wait. No minute of the hour's too much
Meantime for our preliminary talk:
First word of which must be — oh, good beyond Expression of all goodness — you to come!"
The elder, the superb one, answers slow.

"There was no helping that. You called for me,
Cried, rather: and my old heart answered you.

"Hung you for an ungrateful goose!
All this means — I who since I knew you first
Have helped you to conceal yourself this cock
Of the dunghill with all hens to pick and choose — ought to have helped you when shell first was chipped
By chick that wanted prompting 'Use the spur!'
While I was elsewhere putting mine to use.
Still, thank me! since the effort breaks a bow—
At least, a promise to myself."

"I know!

How selfish get you happy folk to be!
If I should love my husband, must I needs
Sacrifice straightway all the world to him,
As you do? Must I never dare leave house
On this dread Arctic expedition, ou —
And in again, six mortal hours, though you,
You even, my own friend, forevermore,
Adjure me — fast your friend till rude love pushed
Poor friendship from her vantage — just to grant
The quarter of a whole day’s company
And counsel? This makes counsel so much more
Need and necessity. For here’s my block
Of stumbling: in the face of happiness
So absolute, fear chills me. If such change
In heart be but love’s easy consequence,
Do I love? If to marry mean — let go
All I now live for, should my marriage be?"

The other never once has ceased to gaze
On the great elm-tree in the open, posed
Pedicantly full in front, smooth bole, broad branch,
And leafage, one green plenitude of May,
The gathered thought runs into speech at last.

"O you exceeding beauty, bosomful
Of lights and shades, murmurs and silences,
Sun-warmth, dew-coolness, — squirrel, bee and bird,—
High, higher, highest, till the blue proclaims
‘Leave earth, there’s nothing better till next step
Heavenward!” — so, off flies what has wings to help!"

And henceforth they alternate. Says the girl —

"That’s saved then: marriage spices the early taste."

"Four years now, since my eye took note of tree!"

"If I had seen no other tree but this
My life long, while yourself came straight, you said,
From tree which overstretcht you and was just
One fairy tent with pitcher-leaves that held
Wine, and a flowery wealth of suns and moons,
And magic fruits whereon the angels feed —
I looking out of window on a tree
Like wonder — otherwise well-known, much liked,
Yet just an English ordinary elm —
What marvel if you cured me of conceit
My elm’s bird-bee-and-squirrel tenantry
Was quite the proud possession I supposed?
And there is evidence you tell me true.
The fairy marriage-tree reports itself
Good guardian of the perfect face and form,
Fruits of four years’ protection! Mariel
friend,
You are more beautiful than ever!"

"Yes: I think that likely. I could well dispense
With all thought fair in feature, mine or na,
Leave but enough of face to know me by —
With all found fresh in youth, except rem
strength
As lets a life-long labor earn repose
Death sells at just that price, they say; and
so.
Possibly, what I care not for, I keep."

"How you must know he loves you! Child before,
Fear sinks to freezing. Could I sacrifice —
Assured my lover simply loves my soul —
One nose-breadth of fair feature? No, indeed.
Your own love” . . .

"The preliminary hour — Don’t waste it!"

"But I can’t begin at once.
The angel’s self that comes to hear me speak
Drives away all the care about the speech.
What an angelic melody you are —
Now — that is certain! when I knew you first,
No break of halo and no break of
I thought I knew you, saw you, round and through,
Like a glass ball; suddenly, four years since.
You vanished, how and whence? Mystery!
Wherefore? No mystery at all: you loved,
Were loved again, and left the world of course:
Who would not? Lapped four years in fairy
land,
Out comes, by no less wonderful a chance,
The charming, touched athwart her trilled bells.
Of blush-rose bower by just the old friend’s
voice
That’s now struck dumb at her own potency.
I talk of my small fortunes? Tell me yours.
Rather! The fool I ever was — I am.
You see that: the true friend you ever had,
You have, you also recognize. Perhaps,
Giving you all the love of all my heart,
Nature, that’s niggard in me, has denied
The after-birth of love there’s some one claims.
— This huge boy, swinging up the avenue;
And I want counsel: is defect in me,
Or him who has no right to raise the love?
My cousin asks my hand: he’s young enough.
Handsome, — my maid thinks, — manly’s man.
the word:
He asked my leave to ‘drop’ the elm-trees there.
Some morning before breakfast. Gentleness Goes with the strength, of course. He’s honor
too,
Limpidly truthful. For ability —
All’s in the rough yet. His first taste of life Seems to have somehow gone against the
tongue:
He travelled, tried things — came back, tried still more — s says he 's sick of all. He 's fond of me for a certain careless-earnest way like; the iron 's crude, — no polished steel mended before me. I am rich — hat 's not the reason, he 's far richer: no, or is it that he thinks me pretty, — frank adoubtedly on that point! He saw once he pink of face-perfection — oh, not you — ment yourself, my beauty! — for she proved thoroughly a chess, his charmer... nay, a runs into extremes. I 'll say at once, set you say! Well, I understand he wants me one to serve, something to do: and both squats so abound in me and mine hat here 's the obstacle which stops consent — its smoothness is too smooth, and I mistrust be unseen cast beneath the counterpane.
therefore I thought — ' Would she but judge for
me,
he, judging for herself, succeeded so!'
If I love him, does he love me, do both stake for knowledge — easy ignorance?
peal to its proficient in each art!
get rough-smooth through a piano-piece,
stilled away last week till tutor came,
said me to end, then grunted 'Ach, mein Gott!
see Stie's "say"? Every note is wrong! It thumped mit spirit — we 'll trouble fingers now.
Fräulein will please roll up Raff again
ad exercise at Cserny for one month!'
I to roll up cousin, exercise
Trollope's novels for one month? Pro-ounce!' I

Now, place each in the right position first, friser and advised one! I perhaps at three — nay, four years older: am, beside, wife: advantages — to balance which,
have a fault fresh joys sense of life
at finds you out life's fit food everywhere, sects enjoyment where I, slow and dull, motel at fault. Already, these four years, most erect glimpses at the world without we show? You me more than ever, at least my age;
now, by joyance you inspire joy, — learn hile you profess to teach, and teach, although riddly a learner. I am dazed ke any owl by sunshine which just sets es shrewd penmanship! Here 's to spy Your cousin! You have scanned him all your life,
this or much; I never saw his face.
have determined on a marriage — used liberation therefore — I 'll believe otherwise, with opportunity in judgment so astounding! Here stand I moved to give my sentence, for a whim, (ell, at first cloud-creak thrown athwart your blue,) dge what is strangeness' self to me, — say
' Wed! ' ' Wed not! ' whom you promise I shall judge
ently, at propitious lunch-time, just hole he carves chicken? Sends he leg for ing?
at revelation into character control must suffice me! Quite as well
Consult with yonder solitary crow
That eyes us from your elm-top!'
"Or rather so? ' Cool comfortable elm
That men make coffins out of,—none for me
At thy expense, so thou permit I glide
Under thy ferny feet, and there sleep, sleep,
Nor dread awaking though in heaven itself!""

The younger looks with face struck sudden

white.
The elder answers its inquiry.

"Dear,
You are a guesser, not a 'clairevoyante.'
I'll so far open you the locked and shelved
Volume, my soul, that you desire to see,
As let you profit by the title-page" —

"Paradise Lost?"

"Inferno! — All which comes
Of tempting me to break my vow. Stop here! Friend, whom I love the best in the whole world,
Come at your call, be sure that I will do
All your requirement — see and say my mind.
It may be that by sad apprenticeship
I have a keener sense: I'll task the same,
Only indulge me, — here let sight and speech
Happen,—this Inn is neutral ground, you
know!
I cannot visit the old house and home,
Encounter the old sociality
Adjured forever. Peril quite enough
In even this first — last, I pray it prove — Renunciation of my solitude!
Back, you, to house and cousin! Leave me
here,
Who want no entertainment, carry still
My occupation with me. While I watch
The shadow inching round those ferny feet,
Tell him 'A school-friend wants a word with
me
Up at the inn: time, tide, and train won't wait:
I must go see her — on and off again —
You'll keep me company?' Ten minutes' talk,
With you in presence, ten more afterward
With who, alone, conveys me station-bound,
And I see clearly — and say honestly
To-morrow: pen shall play tongue's part, you
know.
Go — quick! for I have made our hand-in-hand
Return impossible. So scared you look. —
If cousin does not greet you with 'What ghost
Has crossed your path?' I set him down obtuse,"

And after one more look, with face still white,
The younger does go, while the elder stands
Occupied by the elm at window there.

IV

Occupied by the elm; and, as its shade
Has got clock and watch till it ticks at fern
Five inches further to the South, — the door
Opens abruptly, some one enters sharp,
The elder man returned to wait the youth:
Never observes the room's new occupant,
Throws hat on table, stoops quick, looks propped
Over the Album wide there, bends down low
A cogitative minute, whistles shrill,
Then, — with a cher'ly-hopeless laugh-end
Air of defiance to fate visibly Casting the toils about him — mouths as
more
'Hail, calm activity, salubrious spot!'
Then claps-to cover, sends book spinning
D'other side table, looks up, starts erect Full-face with her who — roused from the last
doubt.
Question 'Will next tick tip the fern or not?'
Fronts him as fully.

All her languor breaks
Away withers at once the weariness
From the black-blooded brow, anger and last Convulse. Speech follows slower, but last —

"You here! I felt, I knew it would befall!
Knew, by some subtle undivinable
Trick of the triknater, I should, silly-sweet,
Late or soon, somehow be allure to leave
Safe hiding and come take of him arrears.
My torment due on four years' respite! To Pluck the bird's healed breast of down wound!
Have your success! Be satisfied this sole
Seeing you has undone all heaven could do
These four years, puts me back to yen hell!
What will next trick be, next success? In
When I shall think to glide into the grave,
There will you wait disguised as beech
Death,
And catch and capture me for evermore!
But, God, though I am nothing, be thou all!
Contest him for me! Strive, for he is strong!
Already his surprise dies palely out
In laugh of acquiscing impotence.
He neither gasps nor hisses: calm and peace
"I also felt and knew — but otherwise!
You out of hand and sight and care of me
These four years, whom I felt, knew, all the while...
Oh, it's no superstition! It's a gift
O' the gamester that he snuffs the weak powers
Which help or harm him. Well I knew lurked,
Lay perdure paralyzing me, — drugged, drove
And damned my soul and body both!
Down and down, see where you have dragged me to,
You and your malice! I was, four years
since,
— Well, a poor creature! I became a know
I squandered my own peace; I plump my
With other people's pounds. I practised play
Because I liked it: play turns labor now
To me that craze, else unaccountable,
Which urged me to contest our county-seat
With whom but my own brother's nominee?
Did that mouth's pulp glow ruby from carmine
While I misused my moment, pushed, — one
word,—
One hair's-breadth more of gesture, — idiot-like
Fast passion, flamboyed on to the grotesque,
And lost the hairless in a grin? — At least,
You made no such mistake! You tickled fish,
Landed your prize the true artistic way
How did the smug young curate rise to tune
Of 'Friend, a fatal fact divides us. Love
Suits me no longer. I have suffered shame,
Betrayal: past is past; the future — yours —
Shall never be contaminate by mine!
I might have spared me this confession, not
— Oh, never by some hideousset of lies,
Eesy, impenetrable! No! but say,
By just the quiet answer — "I am cold."
Falseness avowant, each shadow of thee, hence!
Had happen care Fortune walked... but dreams are vain.
Now, leave me — yes, for pitty's sake! Aha,
Who fails to see the curate as his face
Reddened and whitened, wattle handkerchief
At wrinkling brow and twinkling eye, until Oub burst the proper 'Angel, whom the fiend
Has thought to smirch, — thy whiteness, at one wipe
Of holy sacramb, shall disgrace the snow!
Mine be the task... and so forth! Fool? not
he!
Cunning in flavors, rather! What but sour
Suspected makes the sweetness doubly sweet,
And what stings love from faint to flamboyant
But the fear-sprinkle? Keep terror helps —
'Love's flame in me by such recited wrong Drenched, quenched, indeed! It burns the fiercelier thence!'
Why, I have known men never love their wives
Till somebody — myself, suppose — had
'drenched'
And quenched love,' so the blockheads whined:
'as if
The fluid fire that lifts the torpid limb
Were a wrong done to paely. But I thrilled
No palest person: half my age, or less.
The curate was, I'll wager: o'er young blood
Your beauty triumphed! Eh, but — was it he?
Then, it was he, I heard of! None beside!
How frank you were about the audacious boy
Who fell upon you like a thunderbolt —
Passion and protestation! He it was Reserved in petto! Ay, and 'rich' beside —
'Rich!' — how supremely did disdain curl nose
All that I heard was — 'wedded to a priest!'
Informants sunk youth, riches and the rest.
And so my lawless love disparsed loves,
That loves might come together with a rush!
Surely this last achievement sucked me dry:
Indeed, that way my wits went. Mistress-queen,
Be merciful and let your subject slink
Into dark safety! He's a beggar, see —
Do not turn back his ship. At his hand-bound,
And bid her land him right amid some crowd
Of creditors, assembled by your curse!
Don't cause the very rope to crack (you can!)
Whereon he spends his last (friend’s) sixpence, Just
The moment when he hoped to hang himself!
Be satisfied you beat him!

She replies —

"Beat him ! I do. To all that you confess
Of abject failure, I extend belief.
Your very face confirms it: God is just!
Let my face — fix your eyes! — in turn confirm
What I shall say. All-abject’s but half truth;
Add to all-abject knave as perfect fool!
So is it you probed human nature, so Prognosticated of me? Lay these words
To heart then, or where God meant heart should lurk!

That moment when you first revealed yourself,
My simple impulse prompted — end forthwith
The ruin of a life uprooted thus
To surely perish! How should such spoiled tree
Henceforward balk the wind of its worst sport,
Fail to go falling deeper, falling down
From sin to sin until some depth were reached
Deemed to the weakest by the wickedest
Of weak and wicked human-kind? But when,
That self-display made absolute, — behold
A new revelation! — round you pleased to veer,
Propose me what should prompt annul the past,
Make me ‘amends by marriage!’ — in your phrase,
Incorporate me henceforth, body and soul,
With soul and body which mere brushing past
Brought leprosy upon me — ‘ marry these! ’
Why, then despair broke, reassurance dawned,
Clear-sighted was I that who hurled contempt
As is it thank God — at the contemptible,
Was scarce an utter weakling. Rent away
By treason from my rightful pride of place,
I was not destined to the shame below.
A clasp had caught me: I might perish there,
But thence to be dialogued and-whirled at last
Where the black torrent sweeps the sewage —

‘ Bare breast be on hard rock,’ laughed out my soul
In gratitude, ‘ howe’er rock’s grip may grind!
The plain, rough, wretched hovel shall suffice
This woe of me!’ The wind, — I broke in bloom
At passage of, — which stripped me bole and branch,
Twisted me up and tossed me here,— turns back.
And, playful ever, would replant the spoilt?
Be satisfied, not one least leaf that’s mine
Shall henceforth help wind’s sport to exercise!
Rather I give such remnant to the rock
Which never dreamed a straw would settle there.

Rock may not thank me, may not feel my breast,
Even: enough that I feel, hard and cold,
Its safety my salvation. Safe and saved,
I lived, live. When the tempter shall persuade
His prey to slip down, slide off, trust the wind,

Now that I know if God or Satan be Prince of the Power of the Air, — then, as Indeed,
Let my life end and degradation too!”

"Good!” he smiles. "true Lord Byron”
‘Tree and rock:
‘ Rock,’ — there’s advancement ! He’s at it a youth,
Rich, worthless therefore; next he grows
A priest:
Youth, riches prove a notable resource,
When to leave me for their possessor gins
Malice abundantly; and now, last change,
The young rich parish represents a rock
— Bloodstems, no doubt. He’s Evangelist!
Your Ritualists prefer the Church for spouse!”

She speaks.

“I have a story to relate.
There was a parish-priest, my father knew,
Elderly, poor: I used to pity him
Before I learned what woes areitty-worth.
Elderly was grown old now, scanty means
Were straining fast to poverty, beside
The ailments which await in such a case.
Limited every way, a perfect man
Within the bounds built up and up since last
Breast-high about him till the outside world
Was blank save o’erhead one blue bit of sky
— Faith: he had faith in dogma, small or great,
As in the fact that if he clave his skull
He’d find a brain there: who proves such a fist
No falsehood by experiment at price
Of soul and body? The one rule of life
Delivered in childhood was ’ Obey’!
Labor!’ He had obeyed, and labored — taa.
True to the mill-tread blinkled on from above.
Some scholarship he may have gained in youth:
Gone — dropt or flung behind. Some blame
flake,
Spring’s boom descends on every versal head.
I used to think; but January joins December, as his year had known no May;
Trouble its snow-deposit, — cold and old!
I heard it was his will to take a wife,
A helpmate. Duty bade him tend and teach—
How? with experience null, nor sympathy
Abundant, — while himself worked days dead,
Who would play ministrant to sickness, age,
Womankind, childhood? These demand a wife.
Supply the want, then! theirs the wife; for him
No coarsest sample of the proper sex
But would have served his purpose equally
With God’s own angel, — let but knowledge
match
Her coarseness: zeal does only half the work.
I saw this — knew the purblind honest drudge
Was wearing out his simple blameless life.
And wanted help beneath a burden — borne
To treasure-house or dust-heap, what cared I?
Partner he needed: I proposed myself.
Not much surprised him — duty was so dear.
Gratitude? What for? Gain of Paradise
Escape, perhaps, from the dire penalty
THE INN ALBUM 789

Safety induces culture: culture seeks
To institute, extend and multiply
The difference between safe man and man,
Able to live alone now; progress means
What but abandonment of fellowship?
We were in common danger, still stuck close.
No new books, — were the old ones mastered
yet?
No pictures and no music: these divert — What from? the staring danger off! You paint
The waterspout above, you set to words
The roaring of the tempest round you?
Thanks!
Amusement? Talk at end of the tired day
Of the more tiresome now! I transcribed
The page on page of sermon—scrrawlings—stopped
Intellec'ts eye and ear to sense and sound—
Vainly: the sound and sense would penetrate
To brain and plague there in despite of me
Maddened to know more: moral good were done
Had we two simply sailed forth and preached
I the 'Green' they call their grimy, — I with swung
Of long-discussed guitar, — with cut and slash
Of much misvalue's horrid hues to bid
The peaceable come dance, the peace-breaker Pay in his person! Whereas — Heaven and Hell,
Excite with that, restrain with this! — so dealt
His drugs my husband; as he dosed himself,
He drenched his cattle: and, for all my part
Was just to dub the mortar, never fear
But drugs, hand pestled at, have poisoned nose!
Heaven he let pass, left wisely undescribed:
As applicable therefore to the sleep
I want, that knows no waking — as to what's Conceived of as the proper prize to tempt
Souls less world-weary; there, no fault to find!
But Hell he made explicit. After death,
Life: man created new, ingenuously
Perfect for a vindictive purpose now,
That man, first fashioned in beneficence,
Was proved a failure; intellect at length
Replacing old obtuseness, memory
Made mindful of delinquent's bygone deeds
Now that remorse was vain, which life-long lay
Dormant when lesson might be laid to heart;
New gift of observation up and down
And round man's self, new power to apprehend
Each necessary consequence of act
In man for well or ill — things obsolete —
Just granted to supplant the idiocy
Man's only guide while act was yet to choose,
With ill or well momentarily its fruit;
A faculty of immense suffering
Conferred on mind and body, — mind, erewhile
Unvisited by one contemplative dream
During sin's drunken slumber, startled up,
Stung through and through by sin's significance
Now that the holy was abolished — just
As body which, alive, broke down beneath
Knowledge, lay helpless in the path to good,
Failed to accomplish aught legitimate,
Achieve aught worthy, — which grew old in
youth,

who hides talent in a napkin? No:
his scruple was — should I be strong enough

— My purpose and proceed. Who lives

Selfishness
a man selfish in them, deserved
uch answer as it gained. My husband, bent aving his own soul by saving theirs, —
hy, bent on being saved if saving soul
cluded body's getting bread and cheese show in life and somehow after death, — eth parties were alike in the same boat, be danger, therefore one equality.
And at its longest fell a cut-down flower,—
Dying, this too revived by miracle
To bear no end of burden now that back
Supported torture to no use at all,
And live imperishably potent,—since
Life’s potency was impotent to ward
One plague off which made earth a hell before.
This doctrine, which one healthy view of things,
One same sight of the general ordinances—
Nature—and its particular object,—man,—
Which one mere eye-cost at the character
Of Who made these and gave man sense to boot,
Had dispensed once and evermore,—
This doctrine I have dosed our flock withal.
Why? Because none believed it. They desire
Such Heaven and dread such Hell, whom every day
The alehouse temptations from one, a dog-fight bids
Defy the other? All the harm is done
Ourselves—done my good husband who in youth
Perhaps read Dickens, done myself who still Could play both Bach and Brahms. Such life Told—
Thanks to you, knave! You learn its quality
Thanks to me, fool!"

He eyes her earnestly.
But she continues.

"—Life which, thanks once more
To you, arch-knave as exquisitely fool,
I acquiescingly,—I gratefully
Take back again to heart! and hence this
Which yesterday had spared you. Four years long Life—I began to find intolerable,
Only this moment. Ere your entry just,
The leap of heart which answered, spite of me,
A friend’s first summons, first provocative,
Authoritative, nay, compulsive call
To quit, though for a single day, my house
Of bondage—made return seem horrible.
I heard again a human lucid laugh
All trust, no fear; again saw earth pursue
Its narrow busy way amid small cares,
Smaller contentments, much weeds, some few flowers,
Never suspicious of a thunderbolt
Avenging presently each daisy’s death.
I recognized the beech-tree, knew the thrush
Repeated his old music-phrase,—all right,
How wrong was I, then? But your entry broke
Illusion, bade me back to bounds at once.
I honestly submit my soul: which sprang
At love, and losing love lies signed and sealed
‘Failure.’ No love more? then, no beauty more
Which tends to breed love! Purify my powers.

Effortless till some other world procures
Some other chance of prize! or, if none be,— Nor second world nor chance,—undecorate

Die then this aftergrowth of heart, surmised
Where May’s precipitation left June blank!
Better have failed in the high aim, as I,
Than vulgarly in the low aim succeed
As, God be thanked, I do not! Ugliness
Had I called beauty, falsehood—truth, as you—
My lover! No,—this earth’s unchanged in me.

By his enchantment whom God made the Prince
O’ the Power o’ the Air, into a Heaven: then
Is Heaven, since there is Heaven’s simulation—
I sit possessed in patience; prison-room
Shall break one day, and Heaven beam o’erhead."

His smile is done with; he speaks bitterly.
"Take my congratulations, and permit
I wish myself had proved as teachable!—
—Or, no! until you taught me, could I learn.
A lesson from experience ne’er till now
Concealed—Please you listen while I shew
How thoroughly you estimate my worth
And yours—the immeasurably superior! I Believed at least in one thing, first to last,—
Your love to me: I was the vile and you
The precious; I abused you, I betrayed,
But doubted—never! Why else go my way
Judas-like plodding to this Potter’s Field
Where fate now finds me? What has disposed
My ear
And dogged my step? The spectre with the shriek
‘Such she was, such were you, whose presumings
Is just!’ And such she was not, all the while:
She never owned a love to outrage, faith
To pay with falsehood! For, my heart knew this—Love once and you love always. Why, it’s down
Here in the Album: every lover knows
Love may use hate but—turn to hate, itself—
Turn even to indifference—no, indeed!
Well, I have been Spellbound, daunted like
The witless negro by the Osah-man
Who bids him wither: so, his eye grows dim.
His arm slacks, arrow misses aim and spin
Goes wandering wide,—and all the woe because
He proved untrue to Fetish, who, he finds
Was just a feather-phantom! I wronged love,
Am ruined,—and there was no love to wrong!"

"No love? Ah, dead love! I invoke thy ghost
To avenge the murderer, where thy heart poured life
At summons of the stroke he doubts was dead
On pastureboard and pretence! Not love, my love?
I charge you for you the varied law of life:
Made you the standard of all right, all fair.
No genius but you could have been, no sage.
THE INN ALBUM 791

No sufferer — which is grandest — for the
truth!
My hero — where the heroic only hid
To burst from hiding, brighten earth one day!
Age and decline were man's maturity;
Face, form were nature's type: more grace,
more strength,
What had they been but just superfluous
gauds,
Lawless divergence? I have danced through
day
On tiptoe at the music of a word,
Have wondered where was darkness gone as
night
Burst out in stars at brilliance of a smile!
Lonely, I placed the chair to help me seat
Your fancied presence; in companionship,
I kept my finger constant to your glove
Glued to my breast; then — where was all the world?
I schemed — not dreamed — how I might die
some death
Should save your finger soching! Who creates Destruction, he only: I had laughed to scorn
Whatever angel tried to shake my faith
And make you seem unworthy: you yourself
Only could do that! With a touch 't was done.
Give me all, trust me wholly!' At the word,
I did give, I did trust — and thereupon
The touch did follow. Ah, the quiet smile,
The masterfully-folded arm in arm,
As trick obtained its triumph one time more!
In turn, my soul too triumphs in defeat:
Treason like faith moves mountains: love is gone!"

He paces to and fro, stops, stands quite close
And calls her by her name. Then —

"God forgives:
Forgive you, delegate of God, brought near
As never priests could bring him to this soul
That prays you both — forgive me! I abuse —
Know myself mad and monstrous utterly
In all I did that moment; but as God gives me this knowledge — heart to feel and soul to testify — so be you gracious too!
Judge no man by the solitary work
Of — well, they do say and I can believe —
The devil in him: his, the moment — mine
The life — your life!"

He names her name again.

"You were just — merciful as just, you were
Is giving me no respite: punishment Followed offending. Sane and sound once
more,
The patient thanks decision, promptitude,
Which stung him prone and fastened him from hurt,
Hardly to others, surely to himself,
I wake and would not you had spared one pang.
All's well that ends well!"

Yet again her name.
He rooks no more of than would yonder tree
If watered with your life-blood: rains and dews
Answer its ends sufficiently, while me
One drop saves — sends to flower and fruit at last
The lagging virtue in the soul which else
Cumbers the ground! Quicken me! Call me yours —
Yours and the world's — yours and the world's and God's!
Yes, for you can, you only! Think! Confirm Your instinct! Say, a minute once, I seemed
The castaway you count me, — all the more Apparent shall the angelic potency
Lift me from out perdition's deep of deeps
To light and life and love! 'That's love for you —
Love that already dares match might with yours.
You loved one worthy, — in your estimate, —
When time was; you despaired the unworthy taint,
And where was love then? No such test could ever
Try my love: but you hate me and revile;
Hatred, revilement — had you these to bear,
Would you, as I do, nor revile, nor hate,
But simply love on, love the mere, perishance?
Abide by your own proof! 'Your love was love;
Its ghost knows no forgetting!' Heart of mine,
Would that I dared remember! Too unwise
Were he who lost a treasure, did himself
Enlarge upon the sparkling catalogue
Of gems to her his queen who trusted late
The keeper of her caskets! Can it be
That I, custodian of such relic still
As your contempt permits me to retain,
All I dare hug to breast is — 'How your gloe
Burst and displayed the long thin lily streak!' What may have followed — that is forfeit now!
I hope the proud man has grown humble! True —
One grace of humbleness absents itself —
Silence! Yet love lies deeper than all words,
And not the spoken but the speechless love
Waits answer ere I rise and go my way."

Whereupon, yet one other time the name.
To end she looks the large deliberate look,
Even prolongs it somewhat; then the soul
Bursts forth in a clear laugh that lengthens on,
On, till — thinned, softened, silvered, one might say
The bitter runnel hides itself in sand,
Moisten the hard gray grimy comic speech.

"Ay — give the baffled angler even yet
His supreme triumph as he hales to shore
A second time the fish once 'scaped from hook —
So skillfully has new bait hidden old
Blood-imbrued iron! Ay, no barb 's beneath
The gilded minnow here? You bid break trust,
This time, with who trusts me, — not simply bid
Me trust you, me who ruined but myself,
In trusting but myself! Since, thanks to you,
I know the feel of sin and shame, — be sure,
I shall obey you and impose them both
On one who happens to be ignorant
Although my husband — for the lure is love,
Your love! Try other tackle, station-friend!
Repentance, expiation, hopes and tears,
What you had been, may yet be, would I but Prove helpmate to my hero — one and all
These silks and worsteds round the hook seduce
Hardly the late torn throat and anguish
Puck up, I pray, the whole assortment prompt!
Who wonders at variety of wire
In the Arch-catch? You are the Adversary:
Your fate is of your choosing: have your choice!
Wander the world, — God has some end to serve,
Ere he suppress you! He waits: I endure,
But interpose no finger-tip, forsooth,
To stop your passage to the pit. Enough
That I am stable, uninvolved by you
In the rush downwards: free I gaze and fixed;
Your smiles, your tears, prayers, curses must alike
My crowned contempt. You kneel? Prostrate yourself!
To earth, and would the whole world saw ye there!"

Whereupon — "All right!" carelessly begins
Somebody from outside, who mounts the stair.
And sends his voice for herald of approach:
Half in half out the doorway as the door
Gives way to push.

"Old fellow, all 's no good!
The train 's your portion! Lay the blame on me!
I'm no diplomatist, and Bismarck's self
Had hardly braved the awful Aunt at breach
Of proposition — so has world-repute
Preceded the illustrious stranger! Ah!"

Quick the voice changes to astonishment,
Then horror, as the youth stops, sees, and knows.

The man who knelt starts up from kneeling stands
Moving no muscle, and confronts the stare.
One great red outbreak bursts — throat and brow —
The lady's proud pale queenliness of scorn:
Then her great eyes that turned so quick, become Intenser: — quail at gaze, not they indeed!

It is the young man shatters silence first.
"Well, my lord — for indeed my lord you are,
I little guessed how rightly — this last proof
Of lordship-paramount confounds too much
My simple headpiece! Let 's see how we stand
THE INN ALBUM

Each to the other! how we stood it the game
Of life an hour ago,—the magpies, stile,
And oak-tree witnessed. Truth exchanged for
—truth—
My lord confessed his four-years-old affair—
How he seduced and then forsuck the girl
Who married somebody and left him sad.
My pitiful experience was—I loved
A girl whose gown's hem had I dared to touch
My finger would have failed me, pay-fix'd.
She left me, sad enough, to marry—whom?
A better man,—then possibly not you!
How does the game stand? Who is who and
—what?
Is who, or the board now, since an hour went by?
My lord's 'seduced, forsaken, sacrificed,'
Starts up, my lord's familiar instrument,
Associate and accomplice, mistress-slave—
Shares his adventure, follows on the sly
—'Ay, and since 'bag and baggage' is a phrase—
Baggage lay hid in carpet-bag belike,
Was but unpadlocked when occasion came
For holding counsel, since my back was turned,
On how to invent ten thousand pounds which —paid,
Would lure the winner to lose twenty more,
Beside refunding these! Why else allow
The fool to gain them? So displays herself
The lady whom my heart believed—oh, laugh!
Noble presence: whom my heart loved at once,
And who at once did speak truth when she said
'I am not mine now but another's!'—thus
Being that other's! Devil's-marriage, eh?
'My life sends thine till lucere us do part?'
But pity me the snobbish simleton,
You two aristocratic tiptop swells
At swindling! Quits, I cry! Decamp content
With disin 'I'm pealed of: do not strip bones
bare—
As that you could, I have no doubt at all!
0 you two rare ones! Male and female, Sir!
The male there smirked, this morning, 'Come,
—my boy—
Out with it! You've been croosed in love, I
think:
I recognize the lover's hangdog look;
Make a clean breast and watch my confidence,
For, 'I'll be frank, I too have had my fling,
Am punished for my fault, and smart enough!
Where now the victim hides her head, God
knows!
Here loomed her head, life-large, the devil knew!
Look out, Salvini! Here's your man, yourself!
He and I sat applauding, stall by stall,
Last Monday. 'Here's Othello' was our word,
'But where's Iago?' Where? Why, there!
And now
The fellow-artist, female specimen
Oh, lady, you must needs describe yourself!
He's great in art, but you — how greater still
—if I can rightly, out of all I learned,
Apply one bit of Latin that assures
'Art means just art's concealment')—tower yourself!
For he stands plainly visible henceforth—
Liar and scamp: while you, in artistry
Prove so consummate — or I prove perhaps
So absolute an ass — that — either way—
You still do seem to me who worshipped you
And see you take the homage of this man,
Your master, who played slave and knelt, no
—doubt.
Before a mistress in his very craft . . .
Well, take the fact, I nor believe my eyes,
Nor trust my understanding! Still you seem
Noble and pure as when we had the talk
Under the tower, beneath the trees, that day.
And there's the key explains the secret: down
He knelt to ask your leave to rise a grade
I' the mystery of humbug: well he may!
For how you beat him! Half an hour ago,
I held your master for my best of friends;
And now I hate him! Four years since, you seemed
My heart's one love: well, and you so remain!
What's he to you in craft?"?

She looks him through.

"'My friend,' is just that friendship have its
—turn—
Interrogate thus me whom one, of foes
The worst, has questioned and is answered by.
Take you as frank an answer! answers both
Begin alike so far, divergent soon
World-wide — I own superiority
Over you, over him. As him I searched,
So do you stand seen through and through by me
Who, this time, proud, report your crystal
shrines
A dewdrop, plain as amber prisons round
A spider in the hollow heart his house!
Nowise are you that thing my fancy feared
When out you stepped on me, a minute since,
—This man's confederate no, you step not
thus
Obsequiously at beck and call to help
At need some second scheme, and supplement
Guile by force, use my shame to pinion me
From struggle and escape! I fancied that!
Forgive me! Only by strange chance, — most —strange
In even this strange world, — you enter now, Obtain your knowledge. Me you have not wronged
—Who never wronged you — least of all, my
friend,
That day beneath the College tower and trees,
When I refused to say, — 'not friend, but love!'
Had I been found as free as air when first
We met, I scarcely could have loved you. No —
For where was that in you which claimed return
Of love? My eyes were all too weak to probe
This other's seeming, but that seeming loved
The soul in me, and lied — I know too late!—
While your truth was truth: and I knew at once
My power was just my beauty — bear the word —
As I must bear, of all my qualities,
To name the poorest one that serves my soul
And simulates myself! So much in me
You loved, I know: the something that 's beneath
Heard not your call,—uncalled, no answer comes!
For, since in every love, or soon or late,
Soul must awake and seek out soul for soul,
Yours, overlooking mine then, would, some day,
Take flight to find some other; so it proved—
Missing me, you were ready for this man.
I apprehend the whole relation: his—
The soul wherein you saw your type of worth
At once, true object of your tribute. Well
Might I refuse such half-heart’s homage? Love
Divining, had assured you I no more
Stand his participant in infancy
Than you—I need no love to recognize
As simply dupe and nowise fellow-cheat!
Therefore accept one last friend’s-word,—your
friend’s,

All men’s friend, save a felon’s. Ravel out
The broad embroilment howsoe’er you may,
Distribute as it please you praise or blame
To me—so you but fling this mockery far—
Renounce this rag-and-feather hero-sham,
This poodle clipt to pattern, lion-like!
Throw him his thousands back, and lay to heart
The lesson I was sent,—if man discerned
Ever God’s message,—just to teach. I judge—
To far another issue than could dream
Your cousin,—younger, fairer, as befits
Who summoned me to judgment’s exercise.
I find you save in folly, innocent.
And in my verdict lies your fate; at choice
Of mine your cousin takes or leaves you.

’Tis love!
I bid her—for you tremble back to truth!
She turns the scale,—one touch of the pure
hand:

Shall press down, emprise past relapse
Farther vibration ‘twixt veracity—
That’s honest solid earth—and falsehood, theft
And air, that’s one illusive emptiness!
That reptile capture you? I conquered him:
You saw him cower before me! Have no fear
He shall offend you farther. Spare to spur—
Safe let him slink hence till some subtler Eye
Than I, anticipate the snake—bruise head
Ere he bruise heel—or, warier than the first,
Some Adam purge earth’s garden of its pest
Before the slaver spoil the Tree of Life!

"You! Leave this youth, as he leaves you, as I Leave each! ‘There’s causation surely extant yet
Though conscience in you were too vain a claim.
Hence quickly! Keep the cash but leave unsoiled
The heart I rescue and would lay to heal
Beside another’s! Never let her know
How near came taint of your companionship!"

"Ah—draws a long breath with a new strange look
The man she interpellates—soul astir
Under its covert, as, beneath the dust,
A coppery sparkle all at once denotes
The kid snake has conceived a purpose."

"Ah—
Innocence should be crowned with ignorance?
Desirable indeed, but difficult!"

As if yourself, now, had not glorified
Your helpmate by imparting him a hint
Of how a monster made the victim bleed
Ere crook and courage saved her—hint, I say,—
Not the whole horror,—that were needless risk,—
But just the much lingering, fancy of the fact,
As should suffice to quellise henceforth
The shepherd, when another lamb would stay.
For warning ‘Wear the wolf!’ No doubt staid Silence is generosity,—keeps wolf
Unhunted by flock’s warder! Excellent,
Did—generous to me, mean—just to him!
But, screeching the dissent, lamb were found
Outraging the decorous! So,—he knows!
And yet, unharmed I breathe—purchase, repent—
Thanks to the mercifully-politic!"

"Ignorance is not innocence but sin—
Witness yourself ignore what after-pees
Pursue the plague-infected. Merciful
Am I? Perhaps! the more contempt, the less
Hatred; and who so worthy of contempt
As you the last to assuming him I cooled the spot
I could not cure, by poisoning, forsooth,
Whose hand I pressed there? Understand for once
That, sick, of all the pains corroding me
This haunts the last and nowhere least—the seed
Of simulating soundness. I resolved—
No matter how the struggle tasked weak flesh—
To hide the truth away as in a grave
From—most of all—my husband: he no longer knows
Nor ever shall be made to know your part
My part, the devil’s part,—I trust, God’s part
In the foul matter. Saved, I yearn to save
And not destroy: and what destruction like
The abolishing of faith in him, that’s faith
In me as pure and true? Acquaint some child
Who takes you tree into his confidence,
That, where he sleeps now, was a murder done,
And that the grass which grows so thick, he thinks,
Only to pillow him is product just
Of what lies festering beneath! ‘Tis God
Must bear such secrets as I disclose them, Mrs!
The miserable thing I have become
By dread acquaintance with my secret—you—
That thing had he become by learning me—
The miserable, whom his ignorance
Would wrongly call the wicked: ignorance
Being, I hold, sin ever, small or great.
No, he knows nothing!"

"And I.e. I slight
Are bound to you for such discreetness, then.
What if our talk should terminate awhile?
Here is a gentleman to satisfy,
Settle accounts with, pay ten thousand pounds
Before we part—as, by his face, I fear
Results from your appearance on the scene.
Grant me a minute’s parley with my friend
Which his grace admits of a third message!
The room from which you made your entry first
So opportunely—still unexpected—
What if you please return there? Just a word"

So the old truth comes back! A wholesome change,— last the altered eye, the rightful tone!
set even to the truth that drops disguise stands forth grimacing malice which but now hined so contritely—I refuse assent ast as to malice. I, once gone, come back my lord! I enjoy the privilege being absolutely loosed from you so much—the knowledge that your power is which was omnipotence. A word of mouth, wick of eye would have detained me once,
ydy and soul your slave; and now, thank
God
our fawningest of prayers, your frightfulest furies—neither would avail to turn your footstep for a moment!"

"Prayer, then, tries so much adventure. Let us cast about or something novel in expediency: take command,—what say you? I profess myself as fertile in resource. Commanding, then, ib—only not wait there, but return here, where I want you! Disobey and—good!
was your own head the peril?"

"Come!" breaks in his boy with his good glowing face. "Shut up less of this sort of thing while I stand here
No—on! Stand that! No bullying, I beg!
also am I to leave you presently and never more set eyes upon your face—on'ren't mind that much; but—I tell you frank—
do mind having to remember this a word and deed—my friend who were!
ully a woman you have ruined, eh?
you know,—I give credit at all once a all those stories everybody told obody but I would disbelieve:
ally all seem likely now,—say, certain, sure!
daresay you did cheat at cards that night
row was at the Club: 'sauter la coupe'— hat was your 'cut,' for which your friends
'cut' you;
while I, the booby, 'cut'd acquaintance fith who so much as laughed when I said
'luck!'
daresay you had bets against the horse
ey doctored at the Derby; little doubt,
th fellow with the sister found you shirk is challenge and did kick you like a ball, ast as the story went about! Enough:
only serves to show how well advised,
ladam, you were in bidding such a fool
I go hang. You see how the mere sight nd sound of you suffice to tumble down aviation to-day—curry no,—that's false,— here's no unkowning what one knows; and
yet

Such is my folly that, in gratitude
For . . . well, I'm stupid; but you seemed to
I should know gently what I know, should slip Softly from old to new, not break my neck between beliefs of what you were and are.
Well then, for just the sake of such a wish
To cut no worse a figure than needs must
In even eyes like mine? I'd back my name!
Body and soul! But don't think danger—
pray!—
Menaces either! He do harm to us?
Let me say 'us' this one time! You 'd allow
I bent perhaps my hand to rid your ear
Of some one's yelping—hand that's fortified
Into the bargain, with a horsewhip? Oh,
One crack and you shall see how ours decamp!—
My lord, you know your losses and my gains.
Pay me my money at the proper time!
If cash be not forthcoming—well, yourself
Have taught me, and tried often, I 'll engage,
The proper course: I post you at the Club,
Pillory the defaulter. Crack, to-day,
Shall, alas, to-morrow, slice through flesh and
bone!

There, Madam, you need mind no our, I
think!"

"Ah, what a gain to have an apt no less
Than grateful scholar! Nay, he brings to mind
My knowledge till he puts me to the blush,
So long has it lain rusty! Post my name!
That were indeed a wheel from whipoor!
Whew!
I wonder now if I could rummage out
—just to match weapons — some old scorpion
Madam, you hear my pupil, may applaud
His triumph o'er the master. I—no more
Bully, since I'm forbidden; but entreat
Wait and return—for my sake, no! but just
To save your own defender, should he chance Get thrashed through awkward flourish of his thong.
And what if—since all waiting's weary work
I help the time pass 'twixt your exit now
And entry then? for a pastime proper—here's
The very thing, the Album, verse and prose
To make the laughing minutes launch away
Each of us must contribute. I 'll begin—
'Hail, calm activity, salubrious spot!'
I'm confident I beat the bard,—for why?
My young friend owns me an ago—he
Confess'd, among the other qualities,
A ready rhymed. Oh, he rhymed! Here goes!— 'Something to end with 'horsewhip'! No, that rhyme
Beats me; there's 'cowslip,' 'boltsprit,' nothing else!
So, Tennyson take my benison,—verse for broad,
Prose suits the gambler's book best! Dared and done!"

Wherewith he dips pen, writes a line or two,
Closes and clasps the cover, gives the book,
Bowling the while, to her who hesitates,
Turns half away, turns round again, at last
Takes it as you touch carrion, then retire.
The door shuts fast the couple.

VI

With a change
Of his whole manner, opens out at once
The Adversary.

"Now, my friend, for you!
You who, protected late, aggressive grown,
Bemused, it seems, a weapon I must 'ware!
Plain speech in me becomes respectable
Henceforth because courageous: plainly, then — (Have lash well loose, hold handle tight and light!)
Throughout my life's experience, you indulged
Yourself and friend by pacing in review
So courteously but now, I vainly search
To find one record of a specimen
So perfect of the pure and simple fool
As this you furnish me. Ingratitude
I lump with folly, — all 's one lot, — so — fool!
Did I seek you or you seek me? Seek? sneak?
For service to, and service you would style
And did style — godlike, scarce an hour ago!
Fool, there again, yet not precisely there
First-rate in folly: since the hand you kissed
Did pick you from the kennel, did plant firm
Your footstep on the pathway, did persuade
Your awkward shamble to true gait and pace,
Fit for the world you walk in. Once a-strut
On that firm pavement which your cowardice
Was for renouncing as a pitfall, next
Could not touch to clear your braies of their conceit
They cleverly could distinguish who was who,
Whatever folk might tramp the thoroughfare.
Men, now — familiarly you read them off,
Each phiz at first sight! Oh, you had an eye!
Who coached it? made you disappoint each fox
Eager to strip my goaling of his fluff
So golden as he cackled, "Gosse trusty lamb"?
"Ay, but I saved you — weel defeated fox —
Wanting to pick your bones myself?" then, wolf
Has got the worst of it with gosse for once.
I, penniless, pay you ten thousand pounds
(— No gesture, pray! I pay ere I depart!)
And how you turn advantage to account
Here 's the example! Have I proved so wrong
In my peremptory 'debts must be discharged'?
Oh, you laughed loveliness, were loth to leave
The old friend out at elbows, pooh, a thing
Not to be thought of! I must keep my cash,
And you forget your generosity!
Ha! ha! I took your measure when I laughed
My laugh to that! First quarrel — nay, first faint Pretext at taking umbrage — ' Down with debt,
Both interest and principal! — The Club,
Expulsion and expulsion! — stamp me out!'
That's the magnificent magnificent Renunciation of advantage! Well,
But whence and why did you take umbrage,
Sir?
Because your master, having made you know
Somewhat of men, was minded to advance,

Expond you women, still a mystery!
My pupil pottered with a cloud on brow,
A cloud in breast: had loved, and vainly loved;
Whence blight and blackness, just for all its world
As Byron used to teach us boys. Thought 1—

"Quick rid him of that rubbish — Clear the deck.
And set the heart a-pulsing!" — heart, this time:
'T was nothing but the head I doctored late
For ignorance of Man; now heart's to done,
Palied by over-palpitation due
To Woman-worship — so, to work at once
On first avowal of the patient's ache!
This morning you described your malady, —
How you dared love a piece of virtue — lost
To reason, as the upshot showed: for some Fitly repaid your stupid arrogance;
And, parting, you want two ways, she resumed
Her path — perfection, while forlorn you pass;
The world's made for beasts like you said
me.
My remedy was — tell the fool the truth!
Your paragon of purity had plumped
Into the arms at their first outspread —

fellows,

My victim," she prefers to turn the phrase.
And, in exchange for that frank confidence,
Asked for my whole life present and to come:
Marriage: a thing unenviased for
Never so much as put in question on Life —
Imply by marriage — throw that trifle in
And round the bargain off, no otherwise
Than if, when we played cards, because you won
My money you should also want my head!
That, — disdained to: we but played "fe
love" —
She won my love; had she proposed for stakes,
'Marriage," — why, that's for what, a vixen game,
Whereas she raved at me, as lovers will,
And went her way. So far the story's known.
The remedy's applied, no farther — which Here's the sick man's first honorarium for—
Posting his medicine-monger at the Club!
That being, Sir, the whole you mean my fee —
In gratitude for such munificence
I'm bound in common honesty to spare
No droplet of the draught: so, — pinch your nose,
Pull no wry faces! — drain it to the dregs!
I say ' She went off'— ' went off,' you subjoin.
'Since not to wedded bliss, as I supposed,
Sure to some convent: solitude and peace.
Help her to hide the shame from mortal view.
With prayer and fasting.' No, my sapient Sir!
For wisewell, straightway she betook herself
To a prize-potent from the donkey-show
Of leather long-ears that compete for palm
In clerical absurdity: since he,
Good ass, nor practise the shaving-trick,
The candle-crotchets, nonsense which repays
When you've young ladies congregant, — but schools.
The poor, — toils, toils, and grinds the mill nor means
To stop and munch one thistle in this life
Till next life another him with roses: —
Suggest how brave, 'neath coat, must kernel be!
At length the peeling is accomplished, plain
The casket opens out its core, and lo
---A brand-new British silver sixpence—bid
That's ample for the Bank—thinks majesty!
You are the Captain; call my sixpence cracked
Or copper; 'what I've said is columny;
The lady's spotless!' 'Then,—I'll prove my words,
Or make you prove them true as truth—yourself.

Here, on the instant! I'll not mince my speech,
Things at this issue. When she enters, then,
Make love to her! No talk of marriage now—
The point—blank bare proposal! Pick no phrase—
Prevent all misconception! Soon you'll see
How different the tactics when she deals
With an instructed man, no longer boy
Who blushing like a boyo Woman's wit!
Man, since you have instruction, blush no more!
Such your five minutes' profit by my pains,
'T is simply now,—demand and be possessed!
Which means—you may possess—may strip the tree
Of fruit desirable to make one wise!
More I nor wish not want: your act's your act,
My teaching is but—there's the fruit to pluck
Or let alone at pleasure. Next advance
In knowledge were beyond you! Don't expect
I bid a novice—pluck, suck, send sky-high!
Such fruit, once taught that neither crab nor sloe,
Falls reader pray to who but robs a hedge,
Than this gold apple to my Hercules.
Were you no novice but proficient—then,
Then, truly, I might prompt you—Touch and taste,
Try flavor and be tired as soon as I!
Toss on the price to greedy mouths agape,
Betake yours, sobered as the satiate grow.
To wise man's solid meal of house and land,
Consol and consol! but, my boy, my boy,
Such lore's above you!

Here's the lady back!
So, Madam, you have conned the Album-page
And come to thank its last contributor?
How kind and condescending! I retire
A moment, lest I spoil the interview,
And mar my own endeavor to make friends—
You with him, him with you, and both with me!
If I succeed—permit me to inquire Five minutes hence! Friends bid good-by,
you know.'—
And out he goes.

VII

She, face, form, bearing, one
Superb composure—

"He has told you all?
Yes, he has told you all, your silence says—
The Inn Album

What gives him, as he thinks, the mystery
Over my body and my soul! — has told
That instance, even, of their servitude
He now exacts of me? A silent blush!
That's well, though better would white ignorance
Beseech your brow, undecorate before —
Ay, when I left you! I too learn at last — Hideously learned as I seemed so late —
What sin may swell to. Yes, — I needed
That, when my prophet's rod became the snake
I fled from it, would one day, swallow up — Incorporate whatever serpentine
Falsehood and treason and unmanliness
Bless me earth's pavement: such the power of Hell.
And so beginning, ends no otherwise
The Adversary! I was ignorant,
Blameworthy — if you will; but blame I take Nowise upon me as I ask myself
— You — how can you, whose soul I seemed to
The limpid eyes through, have declined so deep.
Even with him for consort? I revolve
Much memory, pry into the looks and words
Of that day's walk beneath, the College wall,
And nowhere can distinguish, in what gleams
Only pure marble through my dusky past,
A dubious cranny where such poison-seed
Might harbor, nourish what should yield to-day
This dread ingredient for the cup I drink.
Do not I recognize and honor truth
In seeming? — take your truth, and for return,
Give you my truth, a no less precious gift?
You loved me: I believed you. I replied
— How could I other? — 'I was not my own,'
No longer had the eyes to see, the ears
To hear, the mind to judge, since heart and soul
Now were another's. My own right in me,
For well or ill, consigned away — my face
Fronted the honest path, deflection whence
Had shamed me in the furtive backward look
At the late bargain — fit such chapman's phrase! —
As though — less hasty and more provident —
Waiting had brought advantage. Not for me
The chapman's chance! Yet while thus much was true,
I spared you: as I knew you then — one more Concluding word which, truth no less, seemed best
Buried away forever. Take it now,
Its power to pain is past! Four years — that
day —
Those times that make the College avenue! I would that — friend and foe — by miracle, I had, that moment, seen into the heart
Of either, as I now am taught to see!
I do believe I should have straight assumed
My proper function, and sustained a soul, —
Not that, but also by just sustained myself
By some man's soul — the weaker woman's want! —
So had I missed the momentary thrill
Of finding me in presence of a god,
But gained the god's own feeling when he gives Such thrill to what turns life from death before.
"Gods many and Lords many," says the Beck:
You would have yielded up your soul to me
— Not to the false god who has burned its day
In his own image. I had shed my love
Like Spring dew on the clod all flowery there.
Not sent up a wild vapor to the sun
That drinks and then disperses. Both of Blameworthy, — I first meet my punishment—
And not so hard to bear. I breathe again!
Forth from those arms' enwinding leprosy
At last I struggle — uncontaminated:
Why must I leave you pressing to the breast
That 's all one plague-spot? Did you love me
once?
Then take love's last and best return! I
think,
Womanliness means only motherhood;
All love begins and ends there, — rests
enough,
But, having run the circle, rests at home.
Why then upon your expiation yet to make?
Full shame with your own hands from your own head
Now, — never wait the slow envelopment
Submitted to by unelastic age!
One fierce throe frees the sapling: fake a flake
Lull till they leave the oak snow-stupefied.
Your heart retains its vital warmth — or why
That blushing reassurance? Blush, young blood!
Break from beneath this icy premature
Captive of wickedness — I warn
Back, in God's name! No fresh encroachment
here!
This May breaks all to bud — no winter now!
Friend, we are both forgiven! Sin no more!
I am past sin now, so shall you become!
Meanwhile I testify that, lying once,
My foe lied ever, most lied last of all.
He, waking, whispered to your sense asleep
The wicked counsel, — and asent might seem
But, aolved, your healthy indignation breaks
The idle dream-pact. You would die — no
dare
Confirm your dream-resolve, — nay, find the
word
That fits the deed to bear the light of day!
Say I have justly judged you! then farewell
To blushing — nay, it ends in smiles, not tears:
Why tears now? — I have justly judged, that
God!"

He does blush boy-like, but the man speaks
out;
— Makes the due effort to surmount himself.

"I don't know what he wrote — how should I!"
Nor
How he could read my purpose, which it
Just seemed,
He chose to somehow write — mistakenly
Or else for mischief's sake. I scarce believe
My purpose put before you fair and plain
Would need annoy so much; but there's my luck —
THE INN ALBUM

From first to last I blunder. Still, one more
Turn at the target, try to speak my thought!
Since he could guess my purpose, won't you read Right what he set down wrong? He said — let 's think!
Ay, so — he did begin by telling hearse
Of tales about you. Now, you see — suppose
Any one told me — my own mother died.
Before I knew her — told me — to his cost! —
Such tales about my own dead mother: why,
You would not wonder surely if I knew,
By nothing but my own heart's help, he lied,
Would you? No reason 's wanted in the case.
So with you! In they burnt on me, his tales,
Much as when madhouse-inmates crowd around,
Make captive any visitor and scream
All sorts of stories of their keeper: he's Both dwarf and giant, vulture, wolf, dog, cat,
Serpent and scorpion, yet man all the same:
Such people soon see through the gibberish!
I just made out, you somehow lived somewhere
A life of shame — I can't distinguish more —
Married or single — how, don't matter much:
Shame which himself had caused — that point
That fact confessed — that thing to hold and keep.
Oh, and he added some absurdity
—that you were here to make me — ha, ha, ha!
Still love you, still of mind to die for you,
Ha, ha, as if that needed mighty pains!
Now, foolish as . . . but never mind myself —
— What I am, what I am not, in the eye
Of the world, is what I never cared for much.
Fool then or no fool, not one single word
In the whole string of lies did I believe,
But this — this only — if I choke, who cares? —
I believe somehow in your purity
Perfect as ever! Else what use is God?
He is God, and you must be his case!
Then, what shall I do? Quite as clear, my course!
They've got a thing they call their Labyrinth
I' the garden yonder: and my cousin played
A pretty trick once, led and lost me deep
Inside the bristly maze of hedge round hedge;
And there might I be staying now, stock-still,
But that I laughing bade eyes follow nose
And so straight pushed my path through let
And stop
And soon was out in the open, face all scratched,
But well behind my back the prison-bars
In sorry plight enough, I promise you!
So here: I won my way to truth through lies.
Said, as I saw light, — if her shame be shame
I'll rescue and redeem her, — shame's no shame?
Then, I'll avenge, protect — redeem myself
The stupiderst of sinners! Here I stand!
Dear, — let me once dare call you so, — you said,
Thus ought you to have done, four years ago
Such things and such! Ay, dear, and what ought I?
You were revealed to me: where's gratitude,
Where's memory even, where the gain of you
Discernible in my love afterlife?
Of fancied consolation? why, no horse
Once fed on corn, will, missing corn, go mohen.
Mere thistles like a donkey! I missed you,
And in your place found — him, made him my love,
Ay, did I — by this token, that he taught
So much beast nature that I meant . . .
God knows
Whether I bow me to the dust enough! . . .
To marry — yes, my cousin here! I hope
That was a master-stroke! Take heart of her,
And give her hand of mine with no more heart
Than now you see upon this brow I strike!
What atom of a heart do I retain
Not all yours? Dear, you know it! Easily
May she accord me pardon when I place
My brow beneath her foot, if foot so daint.
Since uttermost indignity is spared —
Mere marriage and no love! And all this time
Not one word to the purpose! Are you free?
Only wait! only let me serve — deserve
Where you appoint and how you see the good!
I have the will — perhaps the power — at least
Means that have power against the world. For time
Take my whole life for your experiment!
If you are bound — in marriage, say — why, still,
Still, sure, there's something for a friend to do,
Outside? A mere well-wisher, understand!
I'll sit, my life long, at your gate, you know,
Swing it wide open to let you and him
Pass freely, — and you need not look, much less
Fling me a "Thank you — are you there, old friend?"
Don't say that even: I should drop like shot!
So I feel now at least: some day, who knows?
After no end of weeks and months and years
You might smile! "I believe you did your best!"
And that shall make my heart leap — leap such leap
As lands the feet in Heaven to wait you there!
Ah, there's just one thing more! How pale Dye you look!
Why? Are you angry? If there's, after all,
Worst come to worst — if still there somehow be
The shame — I said was no shame, — none, I swear! —
In that case, if my hand and what it holds, —
My name, — might be your safeguard now —
at once
Why, here's the hand — you have the heart!
Of course:
No cheat, no binding you, because I'm bound,
To let me off probation by one day,
Week, month, year, lifetime! Prove as you propose!
Here's the hand with the name to take or leave!
That's all — and no great piece of news, —
I hope!
"Give me the hand, then!" she cries hastily.
"Quick, now! I hear his footstep!"

Hand in hand

The couple face him as he enters, stops
Short, stands surprised a moment, laughs away
Surprise, resumes the much-experienced man.

"So, you accept him?"

"Till us death do part!"

"No longer? Come, that's right and rational!
I fancied there was power in common sense,
But did not know it worked thus promptly.

Well—

At last each understands the other, then?
Each drops disguise, then? So, at supper-time
These masquerading people doff their gear,
Grand Turk his pompous turban, Quakeress
Her stiff-starched bib and tucker, — make-believe
That only bothers when, ball-business done,
Nature demands champagne and Mayonaise.
Just so has each of us sage three abjured
His and her moral pet particular
Pretension to superiority.
And, cheek by jowl, we henceforth munch and
joke!
Go, happy pair, paternally dismissed
To live and die together — for a month,
Discretion can award no more! Depart
From whatsoever the calm sweet solitude
Selected — Paris not improbably —
At month's end, when the honeycomb's left
wax,
— You, daughter, with a pocketful of gold
Enough to find your village boys and girls
In duffel cloaks and hobnailed shoes from May To — what's the phrase? — Christmas-comesevermore.
You, son and heir of mine, shall reappear
Ère Spring-time, that's the ring-time, lose one
that.
And — not without regretful smack of lip
The while you wipe it free of honey-smeer —
Marry the cousin, play the magistrate,
Stand for the county, prove perfection's pink
Master of hounds, gay-coated dene — nor die
Sooner than needs of gout, obesity,
And sons at Christ Church! As for me, — ah me,
I abdicate — retire on my success,
Four years well occupied in teaching youth
— My son and daughter the exemplary!
Time for me to retire now, having placed
Proud on their pedestal the pair: in turn,
Let them do homage to their master! You, —
Well, your flushed cheek and flashing eye proclaim Sufficiently your gratitude: you paid
The honorarium, the ten thousand pounds
To purpose, did you not? I told you so!
And you, — but, bless me, why so pale — so faint
At influx of good fortune? Certainly,
No matter how or why or whose the fault,
I save your life — save it, nor less nor more!
You blindly were resolved to welcome death
In that black boor-and-bumpkin-haunted hole
Of his, the prig with all the preachers! You

Installed as nurse and matron to the crosses
And wenches, while there lay a world outside
Like Paris (which again I recommend),
In company and guidance of — first, this,
Then — all in good time — some new friends...

What if I were to say, some fresh myself,
As I once figured? Each dog has his day,
And mine 's at sunset: what should old dog
But eye young litters' frisky puppyhood?
Oh, I shall watch this beauty and this youth Frisk it in brilliance! But don't fear! Dis-greet,
I shall pretend to no more recognize
My quondam pupils than the doctor nods
When certain old acquaintances may cross
His path in Park, or sit down prim beside
His plate at dinner-table: tip nor wink
Scare patients he has put, for reason good,
Under restriction, — maybe, talked sometimes
Of douche or horsewhip to, — for why? because
The gentleman would cruelly declare
His best friend was — Lago! Ay, and worse —
The lady, all at once grown lunatic,
In suicidal monomania vowed,
To save her soul, she needs must starve herself!
They're cured now, both, and I tell nobody.
Why don't you speak? Nay, speechless, each Fare of you
Can spare — without unclasping plight of
truth—
At least one hand to shake! Left-hands will do —
Yours first, my daughter! Ah, it guards — gripes
The precious Album fast — and prudently!
As well obliterat the record there
On page the last: allow me tear the leaf!
Pray, now! And afterward, to make amends,
What if all three of us contribute
A line to that preclusive fragment, — help
The embarrased bard who broke out to break down
Dumfounded at such unforeseen success?
' Hail, calm acclivity, salubrious spot'
You begin — place aux demes ! I'll prom you then!
' Here do I take the good the gods allot '
Next you, Sir! What, still sulky? Sing, 0
Muse!
' Here does my lord in full discharge his shot '
Now for the crowning flourish! mine shall
be " . . .

"Nothing to match your first effusion, mar
What was, is, shall remain your masterpiece!
Authorship has the alteration-itch!
No, I protest against erasure. Read,
My friend! " (she gasps out). "Read and quickly read
' Before us death do part,' what made you miss
And made me yours — the marriage-license had!"
Decide if he is like to mend the same!"
And so the lady, white to ghastliness,
Manages somehow to display the page
THE INN ALBUM

But ne trucidet coram populo
Juvenis senem! Right the Horatian rule!
VIII

The youth is somewhow by the lady's side.
His right-hand grasps her right-hand once agin.
Both gaze on the dead body. Here the word.

"And that was good but useless. Had I lived,
The danger was to dread: but, dying now—
Himself would hardly become talkative,
Since talk no more means torture. Fools—
what fools
These wicked men are! Had I borne four years,
Four years of weeks and months and days and nights,
Invited to the consciousness of life
Collected round by his life, with the tongue to stifle—
But that I bore about me, for prompt use
At urgent need, the thing that 'stops the mouth'?
And stays the venom? Since such need was now
Or never,—how should use not follow need?
Bear witness for me, I withdraw from life
By virtue of the license—warrant, say,
That blackens yet this Album—white again,
Thanks still to my one friend who tears the page!
Now, let me write the line of supplement,
As counselled by my foe there: 'each a line!'

And she does faltering write to end.

"I die now through the villain who lies dead,
Righteously slain. He would have outraged me,
So, my defender slew him. God protect
The right! Where wrong lay, I bear witness now.
Let man believe me, whose last breath is spent
In blessing my defender from my soul!

And so ends the Inn Album.

As she dies,
Begins outside a voice that sounds like song,
And is indeed half song though meant for speech
Muttered in time to motion — stir of heart
That unsubduably must bubble forth
To match the fawn-step as it mounts the stair.

"All's ended and all's over! Verdict found
'Not guilty' — prisoner forthwith set free,
Mid cheers the Court pretends to disregard!
Now Portia, now for Daniel, late severe.
At last appeased, benignant! 'This young man—
Hem—has the young man's foibles but no fault.
He's a virgin soil—a friend must cultivate.
I think no plant called 'love' grows wild—a friend
May introduce, and name the bloom, the fruit!
Here somebody dares wave a handkerchief—
She'll want to hide her face with presently!
Good-by then! 'Cigno fedel, cigno fedel,
Addio! Now, was ever such mistake—
Ever such foolish ugly omen? Pahaw!
Wagner, beside! 'Amo te solo, te Solo amai!' That's worth fifty such!
But, mum, the grave face at the opened door!"
And so the good gay girl, with eyes and cheeks

Diamond and damask,—cheeks so white as white
Because of a vague fancy, idle fear
Chased on reflection,—pausing, tapping fees;
And then, to give herself a countenance,
Before she comes upon the pair inside,
Loud—the oft-quoted, long-tangled line—
"Hail, calm activity, salubrious spot!"
Open the door!

No: let the curtain fall!

PACCHIAROTTO

AND

HOW HE WORKED IN DISTEMPER

WITH OTHER POEMS

PROLOGUE

Oh, the old wall here! How I could pass
Life in a long midsummer day,
My feet confined to a plot of grass,
My eyes from a wall not once away!

And loath and lath do the creepers clothe
You wall I watch, with a wealth of green:
Its bald red bricks draped, nothing loth,
In lappets of tangle they laugh between.

Now, what is it makes pulsate the robe?
Why tremble the sprays? What life o'erbrims
The body;—the house, no eye can probe,—
Divined as, beneath a robe, the limbs?

And there again! But my heart may guess
Who tripped behind; and she sang perhaps:
So, the old wall throbbed, and its life's excess
Died out and away in the leafy wraps!

Wall upon wall are between us: life
And song should away from heart to heart!
I—prison-bird, with a ruddy stripe
At breast, and a lip whence storm-notes start—

Hold on, hope hard in the multitude
That's spirit: though cloistered fast, soar free;
Account as wood, brick, stone, this ring
Of the meanest neighbors, and—forth to thee!

OF PACCHIAROTTO, AND HOW HE WORKED IN DISTEMPER

QUERY: was ever a quaintest
Crotchet than this of the painter

Giacomo Pacchiarotto
Who took "Reform" for his motto?

II

He, pupil of old Pungiano,
Is always confounded (heigh ho!)
With Pacchia, contemporaneous
No question, but how extraneous
In the grace of soul, the power
Of hand,—undoubted dower
Of Pacchia who decked (as we know,
My Kirkyup l) San Bernardino,
Turning the small dark Oratory
To Siena's Art-laboratory,
As he made its straitness roomy
And glorified its gloomy,
With Bazzi and Beccafumi.
(Another heigh ho for Bazzi:
How people miscall him Bazzi!)

III

This Painter was of opinion
Our earth should be his dominion
Whose Art could correct to pattern
What Nature had slurred—the slates!
And since, beneath the heavens,
Things lay now at sixes and sevens,
Or, as he said, sopra sotto—
Thought the painter Pacchiarotto Things wanted reformating, therefore.
"Want it"—ay, but wherefore?
When earth held one so ready
As he to step forth, stand steady
In the middle of God's creation
And prove to demonstration
What the dark is, what the light is,
What the wrong is, what the right is,
What the ugly, what the beautiful,
What the revol, what the dutiful,
In Mankind profuse around him?
Man, devil as now he found him,
Would presently soar up angel
PACCHIAROTTO

at the summons of such evangels, and oves — what would Man not owe
To the painter Pacchiarotto?
ky, look to thy laurels, Giotto!

IV

But Man, he perceived, was stubborn,
Grew regular brute, once cub born;
And it struck him as expedient —
See he tried to make obedient
The wolf, fox, bear, and monkey.
By piping advice in one key —
That his pipe should play a prelude
To something heaven-tinged not hell-hued;
Something not harsh but dooie,
Man-liquid, not Man-fossil —
Not fact, in short, but fancy.
By a laughable necromancy
He would conjure up ghosts — a circle
Deprived of the means to work ill
Should his music prove distasteful
And pears to the swing go wasteful.
To be revered of aves of grace
With fancy he ran no hazard:
Fact might knock him o'er the mazard.

V

So, the painter Pacchiarotto
Constructed himself a grotto
In the quarter of Stalloreggi —
As authors of note allege ye.
And on each of the whitewashed sides of it
He painted — (none far and wide so fit
As he to perform in fresco) —
He painted nor danced nor walked:
Till he peopled its every square foot
With Man — from the Beggar barefoot
To the Noble in cap and feather;
All sorts and conditions together.
As the Soldier in breastplate and helmet
Stood frowningly — hail fellow well met —
By the Priest armed with bell, book, and candle.
Nor did he omit to handle
The Fair Sex, our brave distemperer:
Not merely King, Clown, Pope, Emperor,
He diversified too his Hades
Of all forms, pinched Labor and paid Ease,
With as mixed an assemblage of Ladies.

VI

Which work done, day — he rested him,
Cleaned palette, washed brush, divested him
Of the apron that suited frescant;
And, bonnet on ear stuck jaunty,
This hand upon hip well planted,
That, free to wave as it wanted,
He addressed in a choice oration
His folk of each name and nation,
Taught its duty to every station.
The Pope was declared an arrant
Impostor at once, I warrant.
The Emperor — truth might tax him
With ignorance of the maxim
"Shear sheep but nowise flay them!"
And the Vulgar that obey them,
The Ruled, well-matched with the Ruling,

They failed not of wholesome schooling
On their knavery and their fooling.
As for Art — where's decorum? "Pooh-poohed
As much as if it were;
By Poets that plague us with lewd ditties,
And Painters that pester with nudities!

VII

Now, your rater and debater
Is balked by a mere spectator
Who simply stares and listens
Tongue-tied, while eye nor glistens
Nor brow grows hot and twitchy,
Nor mouth, for a combat itchy,
Quivers with some convicing
Reply — that sets him winding?
Nay, rather — reply that furnishes
Your debater with just what furnishes
The crest of him, all one triumph,
As you see him rise, hear him cry "Humph!
Convinced am I? This confutes me?
Receive the rejoinder that suits me!
Confutation of vassal of prince meet —
Wherein all the powers that convince meet,
And mash my opponent to minecmeat!"

VIII

So, off from his head flies the bonnet,
His lip loses hand planted on it,
While t' other hand, frequent in gesture,
Sinks modestly back beneath vesture,
As — hop, skip and jump, — he's along with Those weak ones he late proved so strong with!

Pope, Emperor, lo, he's beside them,
Friendly now, who late could not abide them,
King, Clown, Soldier, Priest, Noble, Burgess;
And his voice, that out-roared Boanerges,
How minikin-mildly it urges
In accents how gentle and gingered
Its word in defence of the injured!
"Oh, call him not culprit, this Pontiff!
Be hard on this Kaiser ye won't if Ye take into con-sider-ation
What dangers attend elevation!
The Priest — who expects him to deasont
On duty with more seal and less cant?
He preaches but rubbish he's reared in.
The Soldier, grown deaf (by the mere din
Of battle) to mercy, learned tipping
And what not of vice while a stripeling.
The Lawyer — his lies are conventional,
And as for the Poor Sort — why mention all
Obstructions that leave barred and bolted
Access to the brains of each dolt-head?"

IX

He ended, you wager? Not half! A bet?
Precedence to males in the alphabet!
Still, disposed of Man's A B C, there's X
Y Z want assistance. — the Fair Sex!
How much may be said in excurse of Those vunities — males see no use of —
From silk shoe on heel to laced poll's hood;
What 's their frailty beside our own falsehood?
The boldest, most brazen of . . . trumpets,
How kind can they be to their dumb pets!
Of their charms—how are most frank, how few venal!
While for those charges of Juvenal—
Quae nemo dixisset in toto
Nisi (adepol) ore illo—
He dismissed every charge with an "Apage!"

Then, cooking (in Scotch phrase) his cap a-goes,
Right hand disengaged from the doublet—
—Like landlord, in house he had sublet
Resuming of guardianship gestion,
To call tenants' conduct in question—
Hop, skip, jump, to inside from outside
Of chamber, he lords, ladies, louts eyed
With such transformation of visage
As suited the censor of this age.
No longer an advocate tepid
Of frailty, but champion intrepid
Of strength,—not of falsehood but verity,—
He, one after one, with asperity.
Stripped bare all the cant-clad abuses,
Disposed of sophistic excuses,
Forced folly each shift to abandon,
And left vice with no leg to stand on.
So crushing the force he exerted,
That Man at his foot lay converted!

True—Man bred of paint-pot and mortar!
But why suppose folks of this sort are
More likely to hear and be tractable
Than folks all alive and, in fact, able
To testify promptly by action.
Their ardor, and make satisfaction
For misdeeds non verbi sed factis?
"With folks all alive be my practice
Henceforward! O mortar, paint-pot O,
Farewell to ye!" cried Pacchiarotto,
"Let only occasion intrepide!"

It did so: for, pat to the purpose
Through causes I need not examine,
There fell upon Siena a famine.
In vain did the magistrates busy
Seek succor, fetch grain out of Sicily,
Nay, throw mill and bakehouse wide open—
Such misery followed as no pen
Of mine shall depict ye. Paint, painter
Waxed hope of relief: so, our painter,
Emboldened by triumph of recency,
How could he do other with decency
Than rush in this strait to the rescue,
Play schoolmaster, point as with fævoe
To each and all slips in Man's spelling
The law of the land?—slips now telling
With monstrous effect on the city,
Whose magistrates moved him to pity
At bound to read law to the letter,
They minded their hornbook no better.

I ought to have told you, at starting,
How certain, who itched to be carting
Abuses away clean and thorough
From Siena, both province and borough,
Had formed themselves into a company
Whose swallow could boll in a lump any Obstruction of scruple, provoking
The nicer throat's coughing and choking:
Fit Club, by as fit a name dignified
Of "Freed Ones" — "Bardotti" — which signified
"Spare-Horses" that walk by the wagon
The team has to drudge for and drag on.
This notable Club Pacchiarotto
Had joined long since, paid scant and lot to,
As free and accepted "Bardotto."
The Bailiwick watched with no quiet eye
The outrage thus done to society,
And noted the advent especially
Of Pacchiarotto their fresh ally.

These Spare-Horses forthwith assembled:
Neighed words whereas citizens trembled
As oft as the chiefs, in the Square by
The Duomo, proposed a way whereby
The city were cured of disaster.
"Just substitute servant for master,
Make Poverty Wealth and Wealth Poverty,
Unloose Man from overt and covert tie,
And straight out of social confusion
True Order would spring!" Brave illusion—
Aims heavenly attained by means earthly!

Off to these at full speed rushed our worthy, —
Brain practised and tongue no less tutored,
In argument's armor accoutred,—
Sprang forth, mounted rostrum, and essayed
Proposals like those to which "Yes" said
So glibly each personage painted
O' the wall-side wherewith you're acquainted.
He harangued on the faults of the Bailiwick:
"Red soon were our State-candle's paly wick.
If wealth would become but interfusible,
Fill voids up with just the superfusible;
If ignorance gave way to knowledge
—Not pedantry picked up at college
From Doctors, Professors et cetera—
(They say: 'kai ta loipa'—like better a Long Greek string of kappas, tauta, lambda).
Tacked on to the tail of each damned same—
No knowledge we want of this quality,
But knowledge indeed—practicality
Through insight's fine universality!"
If you shout 'Bailiffs, out on ye all! Fie,
Thou Chief of our forces, Amaist,
Who shieldest the rogue and the clotpoll!'
If you pounce on and poke out, with what pole
I leave ye to fancy, our Siena's Beast-litter of sloths and byname—"' (Whoe'er to scan this is ill able Forget the town's name's a disgrimage)—
"If, this done, ye did—as ye might—place
For once the right man in the right place,
If you listened to me"...
There flew at his throat like a mastiff
One Spare-Horse — another and another!
Each outbreak of tumult and pother,
Horse-faces a-laughing and fleering,
Horse-voices a-mocking and jeering,
Horse-hands raised to collar the assailant.
Whose impudence ventured the late "If" —
That, had not fear sent Pacchiarotto
Off tramping, as fast as could trot toe,
Away from the scene of discomfiture —
Had he stood there stock-still in a dumb fit —
sure
Am I he had paid in his person
Till his mother might fail to know her son.
Though she grazed on him never so wistful,
In the figure so tattered and tristful.
Each mouth full of curses, each fist full
Of caffings — behold, Pacchiarotto,
The pass which thy project has got to,
Of trusting, nigh ashes still hot — tow!
(The paraphrase — which I much need — is From Horace "per ignes incidas.")

Right and left did he dash halter-skelter
In agonized search of a shelter.
No purlèan so blocked and no alley
So blind as allowed him to rally.
His spirits and see — nothing hampered
His steps if he trudged and not scampere
Up here and down there in a city.
That's all ups and downs, more the pity.
For folks who would outrun the constable.
At last he stopped short at the one stable
And sure place of refuge that's offered.
Humane. Lately was conferred
A corpse in its sepulchre, situate
By St. John's Observatory. "Habitate
Thyself to the strangest of bedfellows,
And, kicked by the live, kiss the dead fellows!"
So Misery counselled the wren.
At once he crept safely to haven
Through a hole left unbricked in the structure.
Ay, Misery, in have you tuck'd your Poor client and left him conterminous
With — pah! — the thing fetid and verminous!
(I gladly would spare you the detail,
But History writes what I retail.)

Two days did he groan in his domicile:
"Good Saints, set me free and I promise I'll Abjure all ambition of preaching
Change, whether to minds touched by teaching
— The smooth folk of fancy, mere figments
Created by plaster and pigments, —
Or to minds that receive with such rudeness
Dissemination from pride, greed and lewdness
— The rough folk of fact, life's true specimens
Of mind — "hand in pose so sed esse mans;"
As it was, is, and shall be forever
Despite of my utmost endeavor.
O live foes I thought to illumine,
Henceforth lie untroubled your gloom in!

I need my own light, every spark as
I ooch with this sole friend — a carcasse!"

Two days thus he mused and rambled
Then, starved back to sanity, scrambled
From out his receptacle lostosome.
"A spectre!" — declared upon oath some Who saw him emerge and (appalling
To mention) his garments a-crawling
With plagues far beyond the Egyptian.
He gained, in a state past description,
A convent of months, the Observancy.

Thus far is a fact: I reserve fancy
For Fancy's more proper employment:
And now she waves wing with enjoyment,
To tell ye how preached the Superior,
When somewhat our painter's exterior
Was sweetened. He needed (no meaning
The matter) much soaking and raising,
Nay, rubbing with drugs odoriferous,
Till, rid of his garments pestiferous,
And, robed by the help of the Brotherhood
In odds and ends, — this gown and t'other hood, —
His empty inside first well-garnished,
— He delivered a tale round, unvarnished.

"Ah, Youth!" ran the Abbot's admonishment,
"Thine error scarce moves my astonishment.
For — why shall I shrink from asserting? — Myself have had hopes of converting
The foolish to wisdom, till, sober,
My life found its May grow October,
I talked and I wrote, but, one morning,
Life's Autumn bore fruit in this warning:

"Let tongue rest, and quiet thy guile be!
Earth is earth and not heaven, and ne'er will be.
Man's work is to labor and leave —
As best he may — earth here with heaven;
'T is work for work's sake that he's needing:
Let him work on and on as if speeding
Work's end, but not dream of succeeding!
Because if success were intended,
Why, heaven would begin ere earth ended.
A Spare-Horse? Be rather a thill-horse,
Or — what's the plain truth — just a mill-
horse!

Earth's a mill where we grind and wear
Muffles:
A whip awaits shirkers and shufflers
Who slacken their pace, sick of luggering
At what don't advance for their tugging.
Though round goes the mill, we must still post
On and on as if moving the mill-post.
So, grind away, mouth-wise and pen-wise,
Do all that we can to make men wise!
And if men prefer to be foolish,
Ourselves have proved horse-like not mulish:
Sent grisly, a good sulkful, to hopper,
And worked as the Master thought proper.
Tongue I wag, pen I ply, who am Abbot;
Stick, thou, Son, to daub-brush and dab-pot!
But, soft! I scratch hard on the scab hot?
Though cured of thy plague, there may linger
A pimple I fray with rough finger?
So soon could my homily transmute
Thy brass into gold? Why, the man's mute!"

"Ay, Father, I'm mute with admiring
How Nature's indulgence uniting
Still bids us turn deaf ear to Reason's
Best rhetoric — cloutch at all seasons
And hold fast to what's proved untenable!
Thy maxim is — Man's not amenable
To argument: whereof by consequence —
Thine arguments reach me: a non-sequence!
Yet blush not discouraged, O Father!
I stand unconverted, the rather
That nowise I need a conversion.
No live man (I cap thy assertion)
By argument ever could take hold
Of me. 'T was the dead thing, the clay-cold,
Which grinned 'Art thou so in a hurry
That out of warm light thou must scurry
And join me down here in the dungeon
Because, above, one's Jack and one — John,
One's swift in the race, one — hobble,
One's a crowned king and one — a capped cobbler,
Rich and poor, sage and fool, virtuous, vicious?
Why complain? 'Art thou so unsuspicious
That all's for an hour of essaying
Who's fit and who's unfit for playing
His part in the after-construction — Heaven's pièce whereof Earth's the Induction?
Things rarely go smooth at Rehearsal.
Wait patient the change universal,
And act, and let act till it's done.
For, as thou art clapped hence or hissed hence,
Thou hast thy promotion or otherwise.
And why must wise thou have thy brother wise
Because in rehearsal thy cue be
To shine by the side of a booby?
No polishing garnet to rubby
All's well that ends well — through Art's magic.
Some end, whether comic or tragic,
The Artist has purposed, be certain!
Explained at the fall of the curtain —
In showing thy wisdom at odds with —
That folly: he tries men and gods with
No problem for weak wits to solve meant,
But one worth such Author's evolvent,
So, back nor disturb play's production
By giving thy brother instruction
To throw up his fool's-part allotted!
Leat haply thyself prove besotted
When stript, for thy pains, of that costume
Of sage, which has bred the imposthume
I pricked to relieve thee of. — Vanity!"

"So, Father, behold me in sanity!
I'm back to the palette and mahlistick:
And as for Man — let each and all stick
To what was prescribed them at starting!
Once planted as fools — no departing
From folly one inch, seculorum

In secula! Pass me the jorum,
And push me the platter — my stomach
Retains, through its fasting, still some ske
And then, with your kind Benedicite, Good-by!"

XXV

I have told with simplicity
My tale, dropped those harsh analytics,
And tried to content you, my critics,
Who greeted my early uprising!
I knew you through all the disguising,
Droll dogs, as I jumped up, cried "Herald!
This Monday is — what else but May-day?
And those in the drags, blues, and yellows,
Are surely the privileged fellows.
So, saltbox and bones, tongs and bellows!"
(I threw up the window) "Your pleasure?"

XXV

Then he who directed the measure —
An old friend — put leg forward nimbly,
"We critics as strews out your chimney!
Much soot to remove from your fine, sir!
Who spares coal in kitchen an't you, sir!
And neighbors complain it's no joke, sir.
— You ought to consume your own smoke, sir!"

XXVI

Ah, rogue, but my housemaid
You —
Is confident oft she detects you
In bringing more filth into my house
Than ever you found there! I'm pious,
However: 't was God made you dingy
And me — with no need to be stingy
Of soap, when 'tis sixpence the packet
So, dance away, boys, dust my jacket,
Bang drum and blow sife — ay, and rattle
Your brushes, for that's half the battle!
Don't trample the grass, — hocus-poques
With grime my Spring snowdrop and cross.
And, what with your rattling and tinkling,
Who knows but you give me an inkling
How music sounds, thanks to the jangle
Of regular drum and triangle?
Whereby, tap-tap, chink-chink, 't is prov'd
I break rule as bad as Beethoven.
"That chord now — a groan or a grunt it is?
Schumann's self was no worse contrapuntist.
No ear! or if ear, so tough-gristled
He thought that he sung while he whistled!"

XXVII

So, this time I whistle, not sing at all,
My story, the largess I fling at all
And every the rough there whose awilde
Did its best to amuse me, — nor so bad!
Take my thanks, pick up largess, and Off free, ere you your mirth gets a damper!
You've Monday, your one day, your feast-day.
While mine is a year that's all Sunday.
I've seen you, times — who knows how many? —
Dance in here, strike up, play the zany,
Make mouths at the Tenant, boot warm

HOUSE

I find earth not gray but rosy,
Heaven not grim but fair of hue.
Do I stoop? I pluck a posy.
Do I stand and stare? All 's bine.

Doubtless I am pushed and shoved by Rogues and fools enough: the more
Good luck mine, I love, am loved by
Some few honest to the core.
Scan the near high, scout the far low!
"But the low come close": "what thes?
Simpletons? 'My match is Marlowe;
Sciolists? 'My mate is Ben.

Womankind—"the cat-like nature,
False andickle, vain and weak"
What of this sad nomenclature
Suits my tongue, if I must speak?
Does the sex invite, repulse so,
Tempt, betray, by fits and starts?
So becalm but to convulse,
Decking heads and breaking hearts?

Well may you blaspheme at fortune!
I "threw Venus" (Ben, expound!)
Never did I need importune
Her, of all the Olympian round.
Blessings on my benefactress!
Cursings suit—for nought I know—
Those who twitched her by the back tress,
Tugged and thought to turn her—so!

Therefore, since no leg to stand on
Thus I 'm left with,—joy or grief
Be the issue,—I abandon
Hope or care you name me Chief?
Chief and king and Lord's anointed,
I—who never once have wished
Death before the day appointed:
Lived and liked, not pother and pissed!

"Ah, but so I shall not enter,
Scroll in hand, the common heart—
Stopped at surface: since at centre
Song should reach Welt-schmerz, worlds-smart!'"
"Enter in the heart?" Its shelly
Cuirass guard mine, fore and aft!
Such song "enters in the belly
And is cast out in the draught."

Back then to our sherris-brewage!
"Kingship" quoths? I shall wait—
Wait the present time: some new age
But let fools anticipate!
Meanwhile greet me—"friend, good fellow,
Gentle Will," my merry men!
As for making Envy yellow
With "Next Poet"—(Manners, Ben!)

HOUSE

SHALL I sonnet-sing you about myself?
Do I live in a house you would like to see?
Is it scant of gear, has it store of pelf?
"Unlock my heart with a sonnet-key?"
INVITE THE WORLD, AS MY BETTRES HAVE DONE?

"Take notice: this building remains on view, its suites of reception every one, its private apartment and bedroom too;"

"For a ticket, apply to the Publisher."

No: thanking the public, I must decline.

A peep through my window, if folk prefer; But, please you, no foot over threshold of mine!

I have mixed with a crowd and heard free talk In a foreign land where an earthquake chanced And a house stood gaping, naught to balk

Man's eye wherever he gazed or glanced.

The whole of the frontage shaven sheer, Theinside gapod: exposed to day, tight and wrong and common and queer, Bare, as the palm of your hand, it lay.

The owner? Oh, he had been crushed, no doubt!

"Odd tables and chairs for a man of wealth! What a parcel of musty old books about! He smoked, — no wonder he lost his health!"

'I doubt if he bathed before he dressed. A brassier? — the pagan, he burned perfumes! On see it is proved, what the neighbors guessed: His wife and himself had separate rooms."

'Friends, the good man of the house at least. Kept house to himself till an earthquake came: I'm the fall of its frontage permits you feast

On the inside arrangement you praise or blame.

Outside should suffice for evidence:
And whose desires to penetrate keper, must dive by the spirit-sense —
No optics like yours, at any rate!"

Haity-toity! A street to explore.
Your house the exception! 'With this same key Shakespeare unlocked his heart,' once more!"

Did Shakespeare? If so, the less Shakespeare he!

SHOP

To friend, your shop was all your house!
Its front, astonishing the street,
Written view from man and mouse
To what variety of treat
Behind its glass — the single sheet!

That gimmeracks, genuine Japanese:
Gape-jaw and goggle-eye, the frog;
Reigns, owls, monkeys, beetles, geese;
Some crush-nosed human-hearted dog:
Queer names, too, such a catalogue!

thought: "And he who owns the wealth
Which blocks the window's vastitude,
Ah, could I peep at him by stealth
Behind his ware, pass shop, intrude
On house itself, what scenes were viewed!

"If wide and showy thus the shop,
What must the habitation prove?
The true house with no name a-top —
The mansion, distant one remove,
Once get him off his traffic-grooves!

"Pictures he likes, or books perhaps;
And as for buying most and best,
Commend me to those city chaps!
Or else he's a social takes it
On Sundays, with a Lord for guest.

"Some suburb-palace, parked about
And gated grandly, built last year:
The four-mile walk to keep off gout;
Or big seat sold by bankrupt peer:
But then he takes the rail, that's clear.

"Or, stop! I wager, taste selects
Some out-o'-the-way, some all-unknown
Retreat: the neighborhood suspects
Little that he who rambles lone Makes Rothschild tremble on his throne!"

Nowise! Nor Mayfair residence
Fit to receive and entertain —
Nor Hampstead villa's kind distance
From noise and crowd, from dust and drain, —
Nor country-box was soul's domain!

Nowise! At back of all that spread
Of merchandise, woe's me, I find
A hole! the wall where, he's by head,
The owner couch'd, his ware behind,
— In cupboard suited to his mind.

For why? He saw no use of life
But, while he drove a roaring trade,
To chuckle "Customers are right!"
To chafe "So much hard cash outlaid,
Yet zero in my profits made!"

"This novelty costs pains, but — takes?
Cumbers my counter! Stock no more!
This article, no such great stacks,
Fizzes like wildfire? Underscore
The cheap thing — thousands to the fore!"

"T was lodging best to live most nigh
(Cram, scoff-like as crib might be)
Receipt of Custom; ear and eye
Wanted no outworld: "Hear and see
The bustle in the shop!" quoth he.

My fancy of a merchant-prince
Was different. Through his wares we groped
Our darkling way to — not to mine
The matter — no black den where moped
The master if we interloped!

Shop was shop only: household-stuff?
What did he want with comforts there?
"Walls, ceiling, floor, stay blank and rough,
So goods on sale show rich and rare!
"Sell and scud home,' be shop's affair!"

What might be deal in? Gems, suppose!
Since somehow business must be done
At cost of trouble, — see, he throws
You choice of jewels, every one,
Good, better, best, star, moon, and sun!

Which lies within your power of purse?
This ruby that would tip a street
Solomon's sceptre? Oh, your nurse
Wants simply coral, the delight
Of teething baby, — stuff to bite!

How'er your choice fell, straight you took
Your purchase, prompt your money rang
On counter, — scarce the man foresaw
His study of the "Times," just swung
Till-ward his hand that stopped the clang, —

Then off made buyer with a prize,
Then seller to his "Times" returned;
And so did day wear, wear, till eyes
Brightened space, for rest was earned:
He locked door long ere candle burned.

And whither went he? Ask himself,
Not me! To change of scene, I think.
Once sold the ware and pursued the pelf.
Chaffer was scarce his meat and drink,
Nor all his music — money-chink!

Because a man has shop to mind
In time and place, since flesh must live,
Needs spirit lack all life behind,
All stray thoughts, fancies fugitive,
All loves except what trade can give?

I want to know a butcher paints,
A baker rhymes for his pursuit,
Candlestick-maker much acquaints
His soul with song; or, haply mute,
Blows out his brains upon the flute!

But — shop each day and all day long!
Friend, your good angel slept, your star
Suffered eclipse, fate did you wrong!
From where these sorts of treasures are,
There should our hearts be — Christ, how far!

PISGAH-SIGHTS

When sanctioning a volume of Selections from his poems, Browning made a third of Pisgah-Sights to consist of the Proem to La Saisiaz.

I
Over the ball of it,
Peering and prying,
How I see all of it,
Life there, outlying!
Roughness and smoothness,
Shine and defilement,
Grace and ungrace:
One reconcilement.
Orbed as appointed,
Sister with brother
Join, ye'er disjoined
One from the other.

All's lend-and-borrow;
Good, see, wants evil,
Joy demands sorrow.
Angel weds devil!

"Which things must — why be?"
Vain our endeavor!
So shall things aye be
As they were ever.
"Such things should so be!"
Sage our existence!
Rough-smooth let globe be,
Mixed — man's existence!

Man — wise and foolish,
Lover and sojourner,
Docile and mulish —
Keep each his corner!
Honey yet gall of it!
There's the life lying,
And I see all of it,
Only, I'm dying!

II
Could I but live again
Twice my life over,
Would I once strive again?
Would not I cover
Quietly all of it —
Greed and ambition
So, from the fall of it,
Pass to fruition?

"Soft!" I'd say, "Soul mine!
Three-score and ten years,
Let the blind mole mine
Digging out deniers!
Let the cased hawk soar,
Claim the sun's rights too!
Turf 'tis thy walk's o'er,
Foliage thy flight's to.

Only a learner,
Quick one or slow one,
Just a discernor,
I would teach no one.
I am earth's native:
No rearranging it!
I be creative,
Chopping and changing it?

March, men, my fellows!
Those who, above me,
(Distance so hollow)
Fancy you love me:
Those who, below me,
(Distance makes great so)
Free to forego me,
Fancy you hate so!

Praising, reviling,
Worst head and best head,
Past me defiling,
Never arrested.
Wanters, abounders,
March, in gay mixture,
Men, my surroundings!
I am the fixture.
I can simply wish I might refute you,
Wish my friend would,—by a word, a wink,—
Bid me stop that foolish mouth,—you brute you!
He keeps absent,—why, I cannot think.

Never mind! Though foolishness may flout me,
One thing’s sure enough: ‘tis neither frost,
No, nor fire, shall freeze or burn from out me
Thanks for truth—though falsehood, gained—though lost.

All my days, I’ll go the softlier, sadlier,
For that dream’s sake! How forget the thrill
Through and through me as I thought “The gladlier Lives my friend because I love him still!”

Ah, but there’s a menace some one utters!
“What and if your friend at home play tricks?
Peep at hide-and-seek behind the shutters?
Mean your eyes should pierce through solid bricks?

“What and if he, frowning, wake you, dreamy?
Lay on you the blame that bricks—conceal?
Say ‘At least I saw who did not see me,
Does see now, and presently shall feel?’”

“Why, that makes your friend a monster!”
say you:
“Had his house no window? At first nod,
Would you not have hailed him?” Hush, I pray you!
What if this friend happened to be—God?

NATURAL MAGIC

All I can say is—I saw it!
The room was as bare as your hand.
I looked in the swarth little lady, —I swear,
From the head to the foot of her—well, quite as bare!
“No Nausicaa shall cheat me,” said I, “taking my stand
At this bolt which I draw!” And this bolt—I withdrew it.
And there laughs the lady, not bare, but em- boweded
With—who knows what verdure, o'erfruited, o'erflowered?
Impossible! Only—I saw it!

All I can sing is—I feel it!
This life was as blank as that room:
I let you pass in here. Precaution, indeed?
Walls, ceiling and floor,—not a chance for a weed!
Wide opens the entrance: where’s cold now,
where’s gloom?
No May to sow seed here, no June to reveal it,
Behold you enshrined in these blooms of your bringing, These fruits of your bearing — nay, birds of your winging! A fairy-tale! Only — I feel it!

MAGICAL NATURE

FLOWER — I never fancied, jewel — I profess you! Bright I see and soft I feel the outside of a flower. Save but glow inside and — jewel, I should guess you, Dim to sight and rough to touch: the glory is the dower.

You, forsooth, a flower? Nay, my love, a jewel — Jewel at no mercy of a moment in your praise! Time may fray the flower-face: kind be time or cruel, Jewel, from each facet, flash your laugh at time!

BIFURCATION

We were two lovers; let me lie by her, My tomb beside her tomb. On hers inscribe — I loved him; but my reason bade prefer Duty to love, reject the tempter’s bribe Of rose and lily when each path diverged, And either must pass to life’s far end As love should lead me, or, as duty urged, Plod the worn causeway arm-in-arm with friend.

So, truth turned falsehood: ‘How I loathe a flower, How prize the pavement!’ still caressed his ear. The dear friend’s — through life’s day, hour by hour, As he laughed (coughing) ‘Ay, it would appear!’ But deep within my heart of hearts there hid Ever the confidence, amends for all, That heaven repairs what wrong earth’s journey did, When love from life-long exile comes at call.

Duty and love, one broad way, were the best — Who doubts? But one or other was to choose, I chose the darkling half, and wait the rest In that new world where light and darkness fuse.”

Inscribe on mine — ‘I loved her: love’s track lay O’er sand and pebble, as all travellers know. Duty led through a smiling country, gay With greensward where the rose and lily blow. ‘Our roads are diverse: farewell, love!’ I said she; ‘Tis duty I abide by: homely sword And not the rock-rough picturesque for me! Above, where both roads join, I wait reward.

Be ye as constant to the path whereon I leave you planted! ’ But man needs not move, Keep moving — whither, when the stars are Whereby he steeps secure nor strays from love! No stone but I was tripped by, stumbling past! But brought me to confusion. Where I fell There I lay flat, if moss disguised the rock, Thence, if flint pierced, I rose and cried ‘All is well!’

Duty be mine to tread in that high sphere Where love from duty ne’er disparts, I trust. And two halves make that whole, whereof — an here

One must suffice a man — why, this one must!”

Inscribe each tomb thus: then, some say acquaint The simple — which holds sinner, which held saint!

NUNPHOLEPTOS

The Browning Society became so partial over the interpretation of this poem that through Dr. Furnivall it applied to the poet for an explanation and he replied: “Is not the key to the meaning of the poem in its title νυνφολεπτος [caught or rapt by a nymph] not γυναικοφιλης [a woman lover]? An allegory, that of an impossible ideal object of love, accepted conventionally as such by a man who, all the while, cannot quite blind himself to the demonstrable fact that the possessor of knowledge and purity obtained without the natural consequences of obtaining them by achievement — not inheritance, — such a being is imaginary, not real, a nymph and no woman; and only such an one would be ignorant of and surprised at the results of a lover’s endeavor to emulate the qualities which the beloved is entitled to consider as pre-existent to earthy experiences, and independent of its inevitable results. I had no particular woman in my mind; certainly never intended to personify wisdom, philosophy, or any other abstraction; and the orb, rising color out of whiteness, was altogether a fancy of my own. The seven spirits are in the Apocalypse, also in Coleridge and Byron, a common image.”

STILL you stand, still you listen, still you smile! Still melts your moonbeam through me, while aware.

Softening, sweetening, till sweet and soft Increase so round this heart of mine, that at I could believe your moonbeam-smile has put The pallid limit, lies, transformed at last To sunlight and salvation — warnes the soul If sweetens, soften! Would you pass the goal.

What fairy track do I explore? hat magic hall return to, like the gem lofty-sangled o'er a diadem?

You dwell there, hearted; from your midmost home Rays forth — through that fantastic world I roam

Ever — from centre to circumference, Shaft upon colored shaft: this crimson thence, That purples out its precinct through the waste. Surely I had your sanction when I stood.

Fared forth upon that untried yellow ray Whence I retrack my steps? They end to-day Where they began, before your feet, beneath Your eyes, your smile: the blade is shot in sheath.

Fire quenched in fint; irradiation, late Triumphant through the distance, finds its fate, Merged in your blank pure soul, alike the source

And tomb of that prismatic glow: divorce Absolute, all-conclusive! Forth I fared,

Treading the lambent flamelet: little cared If now its flickering took the topaz tint, If now my dull-caked path gave sulphury hint Of subterranean rage — no stay, no stint

To yellow, since you sanctioned that I bathe, Burnish me, soul and body, to in yellow awathe In yellow license. Here I seek suffused With crocus, saffron, orange, as I used

With scarlet, purple, every dye o' the bow Born of the storm-cloud. As before, you show Sceons recognition, no approval, some

Mistrust, more work, at last. You, now, good Monstrous in garb, nay — flesh disguised as well, Through his adventure. Whataco' er befell, I followed, whereo' er it wound, that vein

You authorized should leave your whiteness, stain

Earth's sombre stretch beyond your midmost place Of vantage, — trode that tint whereof the trace On garb and flesh repel you! Yes, I plead Your own permission — your command, indeed, That who would worthily retain the love Must share the knowledge shrined those eyes above,

Go boldly on adventure, break through bounds O' the quintessential whiteness that surrounds Your feet, obtain experience of each tinge That hickers forth to broaden out, impinge Plainer his foot its pathway all distinct From every other. Ah, the wonder, linked

With fear, as exploration manifests What agency it was first tipped the crests Of unnamed wildflower, soon protruding grew Potentious 'mid the sands, as when his hue Betrays him and the burrowing snake gleams through:

Till, last... but why parade more shame and pain?

Are not the proofs upon me? Here again I pass into your presence, I receive Your smile of pity, pardon, and I leave...

No, not this last of times I leave you, mate, Submitted to my penance, so my foot May yet again adventure, tread, from source To issue, one more ray of rays which course Each other, at your bidding, from the sphere Silver and sweet, their birthplace, down that drear
Dark of the world,—you promise shall return
Your pilgrim jewelled as with drops o' the urn
The rainbow paints from, and no smatch at all

Of ghastliness at edge of some cloud-pall
Heaven cowers before, as earth awaits the fall
O' the bolt and flash of doom. Who trusts your word

Tries the adventure: and returns—absurd
As frightful—in that sulphur-stewed pod disguising
Mocking the priestly cloth-of-gold, sole prize
The arch-heroic was wont to bear away
Until he reached the burning. No, I say:
No fresh adventure! No more seeking love
At end of toil, and finding, calm above
My passion, the old staleaque regard
The sad petrific smile!

O you—less hard
And hateful than mistaken and obtuse
Unreason of a she-intelligence!
You very woman with the pert pretence
To match the male achievement! Like enough!
Aye, you were easy victors, did the rough
Straightway afflace itself to smooth, the gruff
Grind down and grow a whisper,—did man's truth

Subdue, for sake of chivalry and ruth,
Its rapier-edge to suit the bulrush-spear
Womanly falsehood fights with! O that ear
All fact pricks rudely, that thrice-superfine
Feminity of sense, with right divine
To waive all process, take result stain-free
From out the very muck wherein...

Ah me!
The true slave's querulous outbreak! All the rest
Be resignation! Forth at your behest
I fare. Who knows but this—the crimson-guest—
May deepen to a sunrise, not decay
To that cold sad sweet smile?—which I obey.

APPEARANCES

And so you found that poor room dull,
Dark, hardly to your taste, my dear?
Its features seemed unbeautiful:
But this I know—'t was there, not here,
You plighted troth to me, the word
Which—ask that poor room how it heard.

And this rich room obtains your praise
Unqualified,—so bright, so fair,
So all whereat perfection stays?
'Aye, but remember—here, not there,
The other word was spoken!—Ask
This rich room how you dropped the mask!

ST. MARTIN'S SUMMER

No protesting, dearest!
Hardly kisses ever!
Don't we both know how it ends?
How the greenest leaf turns seared,
Bluest outbreak—blankest heavens,
Lovers—friends?

You would build a mansion,
I would weave a bow'er
—Want the heart for enterprise.
Walls admit of no expansion:
Trellis-work may happily flower
Twice the size.

What makes glad Life's Winter?
New buds, old blooms after.
Sad thing'night "How suspect
Beams would ere mid-Autumn splinter,
Rooftree scarce support a rafter,
Walls lied wreck'd?"

You are young, my princess!
I am hardly older:
Yet—I steal a glance behind!
Dare I tell you what convinces
Timid me that you, if bolder,
Bold—are blind?

Where we plan our dwelling
Glooms a graveyard surely!
Headstone, footstone moss may drop,
Name, date, violets hides from spelling,—
But, though corpses rot obscurely,
Ghosts escape.

Ghosts! O breathing Beauty,
Give my frank word pardon!
What if I—somewhat, somewhere—
Pledged my soul to endless duty
Met a time and oft? Be hard on Love—laid there?

Nay, blame grief that's tickle,
Time that proves a traitor,
Chances, change, all that purpose ways—
Death who spares to thrust theickle
Laid Love low, through flowers which last Shroud the corpse!

And you, my winsome lady,
Whisper with like frankness!
Lies nothing buried long ago?
Are you—which shimmer 'mid the shady
Where moss and violet run to rankness—
Toms or no?

Who taxes you with murder?
My hands are clean—or nearly!
Love being mortal needs must pass.
Repentance? Nothing were absurder.
Enough: we felt Love's loss severely;
Though now— alas!

Love's corpse lies quiet therefore,
Only Love's ghost plays truant,
And warns us have in wholesomewe
Durable mansion; that's wherefore
I weave but trellis-work, pursuain
—Life, to law,
The solid, not the fragile,
Tempts rain and hail and thunder.
HÉRÈVE RIEL

If bower stand firm at Autumn’s close,
Beyond my hope,—why, boughs were agile;
If bower fall flat, we scarce need wonder
Wreathing — rose!

So true to the protesting,
So, muffled be the kisses!
For, would we but avow the truth,
Sober is genuine joy. No jesting!
Ask else Penelope, Ulysses —
Old in youth!

For why should ghosts feel angered?
Let all their interference;
Be faint march-music in the air!
“Up! Join the rear of us the vanguard!
Up, lovers, dead to all appearance,
Laggard pair!”

The while you clasp me closer,
The while I press you deeper,
As safe we chuckle — under breath,
Yet all the alyer, the jooser, —
“So, life can boast its day, like leap-year, Stolen from death!”

Ah me — the sudden terror!
Hence quick — avaunt, avoid me,
You cheat, the ghostly flesh-disguise!
Nay, all the ghosts in one! Strange error!
So, ’t was Death’s self that clipped and Cowed me,
Loved — and lied!

Ay, dead loves are the potent!
Like any cloud they used you,
More semblance you, but substance they!
Build we no mansion, weave we no tent!
More flesh — their spirit interfused you!
Hence, I say!

All theirs, none yours the glamour!
Their each low word that won me,
Soft lock that found me Love’s, and left
What else but you — the tears and clamor
That’s all your very own! Undone me —
Ghost-berof!

HÉRÈVE RIEL

This ballad was printed first in the Cornhill Magazine for March, 1871. In a letter to Mr. George Smith, one of the publishers of the magazine, Browning stated that he intended to devote the proceeds of the poem to the aid of the people of Paris suffering from the Franco-German war. The publisher generously seconded his resolve and paid one hundred pounds for the poem.

On the sea and at the Hogue, sixteen hundred ninety-two,
Did the English fight the French, — woe to France!

And, the thirty-first of May, helter-skelter
Through the blue,
Like a crowd of frightened porpoises a shoal of sharks pursue,
Came crowding ship on ship to Saint Malo
on the Rance,
With the English fleet in view.

II
’T was the squadron that escaped, with the victor in full chase;
First and foremost of the drove, in his great ship, Dampierre;
Close on him fled, great and small,
Twenty-two good ships in all;
And they signalled to the place
“Help the winners of a race!
Get us guidance, give us harbor, take us
quick — or, quicker still,
Here’s the English can and will!”

III
Then the pilots of the place put out brisk and leapt on board;
“Why, what hope or chance have ships like these to pass?” laughed they:
“Rocks to starboard, rocks to port, all the passage scarred and scored,
Shall the ‘Formidable’ here with her twelve and eighty guns
Think to make the river-mouth by the single narrow way,
Trust to enter where ’t is ticklish for a craft of twenty tons,
And with flow at full beside?
Now, ’t is slackest ebb of tide.
Reach the mooring? Rather say,
While rock stands or water runs,
Not a ship will leave the bay!”

IV
Then was called a council straight.
Brief and bitter the debate:
“Here’s the English at our heels; would you have them take in tow
All that’s left of us the fleet, linked together stem and bow,
For a prize to Plymouth Sound?
Better run the ships aground!”
(Ended Dampierre his speech).
“Not a minute more to wait!
Let the Captains all and each Shove ashore, then blow up, burn the vessels on the beach!
France must undergo her fate.

“Give the word!” But no such word
Was ever spoke or heard;
For up stood, for out stepped, for in struck amid all these
— A Captain? A Lieutenant? A Mate — first, second, third?
No such man of mark, and meet
With his betters to compete!
But a simple Breton sailor pressed by Tournville for the fleet,
A poor coasting-pilot he, Hervé Riel the Croi-sickness.

VI
And "What mockery or malice have we here?" cries Hervé Riel:
"Are you mad, you Malouins? Are you cowards, fools, or rogues?
Talk to me of rocks and shoals, me who took the soundings, tell
On my fingers every bank, every shallow, every swell
'Twixt the offering here and Grève where the river disembogues?
Are you bought by English gold? Is it love
the lying's for?
Morn and eve, night and day,
Have I piloted your bay,
Entered free and anchored fast at the foot of Solidor.
Burn the fleet and ruin France? That were worse than fifty Hugues!
Sirs, they know I speak the truth! Sirs, believe me there's a way!
Only let me lead the line,
Have the biggest ship to steer,
Get this 'Formidable' clear,
Make the others follow mine,
And I lead them, most and least, by a passage
I know well,
Right to Solidor past Grève,
And there lay them safe and sound;
And if one ship misbehave,
—Keel so much as grate the ground,
"Why, I've nothing but my life,—here's my head!" cries Hervé Riel.

Not a minute more to wait.
"Steer us in, then, small and great!
Take the helm, lead the line, save the squadron!" cried its chief.
Captains, give the sailor place!
He is Admiral, in brief.
Still the north-wind, by God's grace!
See the noble fellow's face
As the big ship, with a bound,
Clears the entry like a bound,
Keeps the passage as its inch of way were the wide sea's profound!
See, safe through shoal and rock,
How they follow in a flock,
Not a ship that misbehaves, not a keel that grates the ground,
Not a spar that comes to grief!
The peril, see, is past,
All are harbored to the last.
And just as Hervé Riel hollas "Anchor!"— sure as fate,
Up the English come—too late!

VIII
So, the storm subsides to calm:
They see the green trees wave
On the heights o' looking Grève.
Hearts that bled are stanch'd with balm.
"Just our capture to enhance,
Let the English rake the bay,
Gnash their teeth and glare at once
As they cannonade away!
"Naeth rampired Solidor pleasant riding on the Rance!"
How hope succeeds despair on each Captain's countenance!
Out burst all with one accord,
"This is Paradise for Hell!"
"Let France, let France's King
Thank the man that did the thing!"
What a shout, and all one word,
"Hervé Riel!"
As he stepped in front once more,
Not a symptom of surprise
In the frank blue Breton eyes,
Just the same man as before.

IX
Then said Damreville, "My friend,
I must speak out at the end,
Though I find the speaking hard.
Praise is deeper than the lips:
You have saved the King his ships,
You must name your own reward.
"Faith, our sun was near eclipse!
Demand what'er you will,
France remains your debtor still.
Ask to heart's content and have! or my name's not Damreville."

X
Then a beam of fun outbroke
On the bearded mouth that spoke,
As the honest heart laughed through
Those frank eyes of Breton blue:
"Since I needs must say my say,
Since on board the duty's done,
And from Malo Roads to Croisic Point, what is it but a run?—
Since it is ask and have, I may—
Since the others go ashore—
Come! A good whole holiday!
Leave to go and see my wife, whom I call the Belle Aurore!"
That he asked and that he got,—nothing
more.

XI
Name and deed alike are lost:
Not a pillar nor a post
In his Croisic keeps alive the feast as it befall;
Not a head in white and black
On a single fishing-smack,
In memory of the man but for whom had gone to wrack
All that France saved from the fight whence England bore the bell.
Go to Paris: rank on rank
Search the heroes through all
On the Louvre, face and flank!
You shall look long enough are you come to Hervé Riel.
So, for better and for worse,
A FORGIVENESS

And back to that last fancy of the train—
"A danger raked for hope of just a word,
With— which of all my nest may be the bird
This poacher covets for her plumage, pray?
Carmen? Juana? Carmen seems too gay
For such adventure, while Juana’s grave
Would soorn the folly. I applaud the knave!
He had the eye, could single from my brood
His proper fledgeling!"

As I turned, there stood
In face of me, my wife stone-still stone-white.
Whether one bound had brought her, — at first sight
Of what she judged the encounter, sure to be Next moment, of the venturesome man and me,—
Brought her to clutch and keep me from my pray:
Whether impelled because her death no day
Could come so absolutely opportune
As now at joy’s height, like a year in June
Stayed at the fall of its first ripened rose;
Or whether hungry for my hate—who knows?—
Eager to end an irksome lie, and taste
Our tingling true relation, hate embraced
By hate one naked moment: — anyhow
There stone-still stone-white stood my wife, but now
The woman who made heaven within my house.
Ay, she who faced me was my very spouse
As well as love—you are to recollect!

"Stay!" she said. "Keep at least one soul
unspooked
With crime, that’s spotless hitherto—your own!
Kill me who court the blessing, who alone
Was, am, and shall be guilty, first to last!
The man lay helpless in the toils I cast
About him, helpless as the statue there
Against that strangling bell-flower’s bondage:

A way and thread to dust the parasites,
But do the passive marble no despicable!
I love him as I hate you. Kill me! Strike
At one blow both infinities alike
Out of existence—hate and love! Whence love?
That’s safe inside my heart, nor will remove
For any searching of your steel, I think.
Whence hate? The secret lay on lip, at brink
Of speech, in one fierce tremble to escape,
At every form wherein your love took shape,
At each new provocation of your kiss.
Kill me!"

We went in.

Next day after this,
I felt as if the speech might come. I spoke—
Easily, after all.

"The lifted cloak
Was screen sufficient: I concern myself
Hardly with laying hands on who for pelf—
What’er the ignoble kind—may prowl and brave
Cuffing and kicking proper to a knave
Detected by my household's vigilance.
Enough of such! As for my love-romance —
I, like our good Hidalgo, rub my eyes
And wake and wonder how the film could rise
Which changed for me a barber's basin straight Into — Mambrino's helm? I hesitate
Nowise to say — God's sacramental cup!
Why should I blame the braze which, burntish up,
Will blaze, to all but me, as good as gold?
To me — a warning I was overbold
In judging metals. The Hidalgo waked
Only to die, if I remember, — staked
His life upon the basin's worth, and lost:
While I confess torpidity at most
In here and there a limb; but, lame and halt,
Still should I work on, still repair my fault
Ere I took rest in death, — no fear at all!
Now, work — no word before the curtain fall!"

The "curtain"? That of death on life, I meant:
My "word," permissible in death's event,
Would be — truth, soul to soul; for, otherwise,
Day by day, three years long, there had to rise
And, night by night, to fall upon our stage —
Ours, doomed to public play by heritage —
Another curtain, when the world, perforce
Our critical assembly, in due course
Came and went, witnessing, gave praise or blame
To art-mimetic. It had spoiled the game
If, suffered to set foot behind our scenes,
The world had witnessed how stage-king and queen,
Gallant and lady, but a minute since
Enraving each the other, would evince
No sign of recognition as they took
His way and her way to whatever nook
Waited them in the darkness either side
Of that bright stage where lately groom and bride
Had fired the audience to a frenzy-fit
Of sympathetic rapture — every whit
 Earned as the curtain fell on her and me, — Actors. Three whole years, nothing was to see
But calm and concord: where a speech was due
There came the speech; when the smiles were wanted too,
Smiles were as ready. In a place like mine,
Where foreign and domestic cares combine,
There's audience every day and all day long;
But finally the last of the whole throng
Who linger lets one see his back. For her —
Why, liberty and liking: I aver,
Liking and liberty! For me — I breathed,
Let my face rest from every wrinkle wretched
Smile-like about the mouth, unlearned my task
Of perspiration till next day fade mask.
And quietly betook me from that world
To the real world, not pageant: there unfurled
In work, its wings, my soul, the fretted power.
Three years I worked, each minute of each hour
Not claimed by acting: — work I may dispense
With talk about, since work in evidence,
Perhaps in history; who knows or cares?

After three years, this way, all masquers,
Our acting ended. She and I, at close
Of a loud night-feast, led, between two rose
Of bending male and female loyalty,
Our lord the king down staircase, while, so high
At arm's length did the twisted tapers' star
Herald his passage from our palace, when Such visiting left glory evermore.
Again the ascent in public, till at door
As we two stood by the saloon — now blank
And disencumbered of its guests — there sat
A whisper in my ear, so low and yet
So unmistakable!

"I half forget
The chamber you repair to, and I want
Occasion for one short word — if you grant
The grace — within a certain use — you call
Our 'Study,' for you wrote there while scrawled
Some paper full of faces for my sport.
That room I can remember. Just one short Word with you there, for the Remember
sake!"

"Follow me thither!" I replied.

The gloom a little, as with guiding lamp
I lead the way, leave warmth and clear, damp
Blind disused serpentining ways afar
From where the habitable chambers are — Ascend, descend stairs tunnelled through the stone,
Always in silence, — till I reach the lose
Chamber sepulchred for my very own
Out of the palace-quarry. When a boy,
Here was my fortress, stronghold from asses,
Proof-positive of ownership; in youth
I garner'd up my gleanings here — uncounted
But precious relics of vain hopes, vain fears;
Finally, this became in after-years
My closet of entrenchment to withstand
Invasion of the foe on every hand —
The multifarious herd in bower and hall,
State-room — rooms whatso' er the style which call
On masters to be mindful that, before
Men, they must look like men and something more.
Here, — when our lord the king's bestowal ceased
To deck me on the day that, golden-fleeced
I touched ambition's height, — 't was long released
From glory (always symbolled by a chair)
No sooner was I privileged to gain
My secret domicile than glad I flung
That last toy on the table — tasted where
On hook my father's gift, the arquebus —
And asked myself, "Shall I envisage thus
The new prize and the old prize, when I reach Another year's experience? — own that se

"Loved you. Double-dyed
In folly and in guilt, I thought you gave
Your heart and soul away from me to slave
At statecraft. Since my right in you seemed lost,
I stung myself to teach you, to your cost,
What you rejected could be prized beyond
Life, heaven, by the first fool I throw a fond Look on, a fatal word to."

"And you still Love me? Do I conjecture well or ill?"

"Conjecture — well or ill? I had three years
To spend in learning you."

"We both are peers
In knowledge, therefore: since three years are spent Blest thus much of yourself I learn — who went Back to the house, that day, and brought my mourns
To bear upon your action, uncombined
Motive from motive, till the dress, deprived
Of every purer particle, survived
At last in native simple hideousness,
Utter contemptibility, nor less
Nor most, Contemptibility — exempt
How could I, from its proper due — contempt?
I have too much despised you to divert
My life from its set course by help or hurt
Of your all-despicable life — perturb
The calm I work in, by — men's mouths to curb,
Which at such news were clamorous enough —
Men's eyes to shut before my bowered stuff
With the huge hole there, my emblazoned wall
Blank where a scutcheon hung, — by, worse than all,
Each day's procession, my paradized life
Robbed and impoverished through the wanting
wife
— Now that my life (which means — my work)
was crown
Riches indeed! Once, just this worth alone
Seemed work to have, that profit gained thereby
Of good and praise would — how rewardingly!
— Fall at your feet, — a crown I hoped to cast
Before your love, my love should crown at last.
No love remaining to cast crown before,
My love stopped work now: but contemt the more
Impelled me task as ever head and hand,
Because the very fiends weave ropes of sand
Rather than taste pure hell in idleness.
Therefore I kept my memory down by stress
Of daily work I had no mind to stay
For the world's wonder at the wife away.
Oh, it was easy all of it, believe,
For I despised you! But your words retrieve Importantly the past. No hate assumed
The mask of love at any time! There gloomed
A moment when love took hate's semblance, urged
By causes you declare; but love's self purged
Away a fancied wrong I did both loves
— Yours and my own: by no hate's help:
Purgation was attempted. Then, you rise
High by how many a grade! I did despise —
I do but hate you. Let hate's punishment Replace contemt's! First step to which
Write down your own words I re-utter you!
' I loved my husband and I hated — who
He was, I took up as my first chance, mere Mud-ball to fling and make love foul with!' He Lies paper!"

"Would my blood for ink suffice!

"It may: this minion from a land of spice,
Silk, feather — every bird of jewelled breast —
This poniard's beauty, no'er so lightly press
Above your heart there . . . .

"Thus?"

"It flows, I am dip there the point and write!"

"Dictate to me:
Nay, I remember."

And she wrote the week
I read them. Then — "Since love, in yes it affords License for hate, in me, to quench (I say)
Contempt — why, hate itself has passed away
In vengeance — foreign to contempt. Depart
Peacefully to that death which Eastern art
Imbued this weapon with, if tales be true!
Love will succeed to hate. I pardon you Dead in our chamber!"

True as truth the tale
She died ere morning; then, I saw how pale
Her cheek was ere it wore day's paint-dissipate.
And what a hollow darkened 'neath her eyes.
Now that I used my own. She sleeps, as eest
Beloved, in this your church: ay, yours!

Immense
In thought so deeply, Father? Sad, perhaps?
For whose sake, hers or mine or his who wore — Still plain I seem to see! — about his head
The idle cloak, — about his heart (instead
Of cuisses) some fond hope he may elude
My vengeance in the cloister's solitude?
Hardly, I think! As little helped his brow
The cloak then, Father — as your grace helps now!

CENCIAJA

Ogni cencio vuol entrare in bocato. — Italian Proverb.

Mr. Burton Forman, the editor of Shelley, upon asking Browning the precise value attached to the terminal qua in the title of his poem, received the following answer:
Who lends your poem lends an ear to me
Relating how the penalty was paid
By one Marchese dell’ Oriolo, called Onofrio Santa Croce otherwise,
For his complicity in matricide
With Paolo his own brother,—he whose crime
And flight induced "those three words—She must die."
Thus I unroll you then the manuscript.

"God’s justice"—(of the multiplicity
Of such communications extant still.
Recording, each, injustice done by God
In person of his Vicar-upon-earth,
Scarcely one but leads off to the selfsame tune)—
"God’s justice, tardy though it prove perchance,
Repos never on the track until it reach Delinquency. In proof I cite the case
Of Paolo Santa Croce."

Many times
The younger,—having been importunate
That Marchesina Costanza, who remained
His widowed mother, should supplant the heir
Her elder son, and substitute himself
In sole possession of her faculty,—
And meeting just as often with rebuff,—
Blinded by so exorbitant a lust
Of gold, the younger straightforward tasked his
write,
Casting about to kill the lady—thus.

He first, to cover his iniquity,
Writes to Onofrio Santa Croce, then
Authoritative lord, acquainting him
Their mother was contamination—wrought
Like hell-fire in the beauty of their House
By dissoluteness and abandonment
Of soul and body to impure delight.

Moreover, since she suffered from disease,
Those symptoms which her death made manifest
Hydroptic, he affirmed were fruits of sin
About to bring confusion and disgrace
Upon the ancient lineage and high fame
O’ the family, when published. Duty bound,
He asked his brother—what a son should do?

Which when Marchese dell’ Oriolo heard
By letter, being absent at his land
Oriolo, he made answer, this, no more:
"It must behove a son,—things haply so,—
To act as honor prompts a cavalier
And son, perform his duty to all three,
Mother and brothers"—here advice broke off.

By which advice informed and fortified
As he professed himself—since bound by birth
To hear God’s voice in primogeniture
Paolo, who kept his mother company
In her domain Subiaco, straightforward dared
His whole enormity of enterprise
And, falling on her, stabbed the lady dead;
Whose death demonstrated her innocence,
And happened,—by the way,—since Jesus
Christ
Died to save man, just sixteen hundred years.

"Dear Mr. Buxton Forman: There can be no objection to such a simple statement as have inserted, if it seems worth inserting.
Fact, it is. Next: aia is generally an accumulative, yet depreciative termination: Cenciaja—a bundle of rags—a trifle. The cover means every poor creature will be rushed into the company of his betters, and used to depress the notion that I intended nothing of the kind. Is it any contribution to all connected with Shelley, if I mention that my 'Book' (The Ring and the Book) [rather be old square yellow book] from which the stails were taken] has a reference to the reason iven by Farinacci, the advocate of the Cenci, his failure in the defence of Beatrice?
Furnas puntam Beatricom (he declares) poem
bimi, succipit, non qua inter vallo oceadi undavit insidiantem suo honori, sed qua ejus expectionem non probavi tibi. 'Provis et idem trailer speraborur de sorore Beatrice si proposi
excusationem probasset, propt non probavit', that is, she expected to avow the main outage, and did not, in conformity with her word, 'That which I ought to confess, that will I confess; to that which I ought to assent, that I assent; and that which I ought to deny,
but will I deny.' Here is another Cenciaja!
"Yours very sincerely, ROBERT BROWNING."

I'll print, Shelley, how it came to pass that when your Beatrice seemed—by lapse of many a long month since her sentence fell summed of pardon for the parricide—
by intercession of stanch friends, or, say, by certain pricks of conscience in the Pope
ouner at Francesco Cenci's guilt,— Stern, 'as you state,' 'nor to be moved nor but said these three words coldly 'She must
die;
abjuring 'Pardon? Paolo Santa Croce
furred his mother also yestereve, and he is fled: she shall not flee at least!'
-So, to the letter, sentence was fulfilled?
shelley, may I condense verboity that lies before me, into some few words
English, and illustrate your superb achievement by a rescued anecdote,
'great things, only new and true beside?
If some mere familiar of a house bould venture to accost the group at gaze efore its Titian, famed the wide world through,
and supplement such pictured masterpiece \ whisper, "Searching in the archives here, found the reason of the Lady's fate—
and how by accident it came to pass be wears the halo and displays the palm:
\o, haply, else had never suffered—no,
or grace our gallery, by consequence.'
\loved the work would like the little news:
Costanza was of aspect beautiful
Exceedingly, and seemed, although in age
Sixty about, to far surpass her peers
The coéstanza dames, in youth and grace.

Done the misled, its author takes to flight,
Foil ing thereby the justice of the world:
Not God's however, — God, be sure, knows well
The way to clutch a culprit. Witness here!
The present sinner, when he least expects,
Sung-cornered somewhere I' the Ballioloate,
Stumbles upon his death by violence.
A man of blood assaults a man of blood
And slays him somehow. This was afterward:
Enough, he promptly met with his desert,
And, ending thus, permits we end with him,
And push forthwith to this important point —
His matricide fall out of, all the days,
Precisely when the law-procedure closed
Respecting Count Francesco Cenci's death
Chargeable on his daughter, sons and wife.
"Thus patricide was matched with matricide,
A poet not insensibly rhymed:
Nay, fratricide — those Princes Massimi! —
Which so disturbed the spirit of the Pope
That all the likelihood Rome entertained
Of Beatrices's pardon vanished straightway,
And she endured the piteous death.

The sequel — what effect commandment had
For strict inquiry into this last case,
When Cardinal Aldobrandini (great
His afflicty — nephew to the Pope!)
Was bidden crush — ay, though his very hand
Got soil i' the act — crime spawning everywhere!
Because, when all endeavor had been used
To catch the aforesaid Paolo, all in vain —
"Make perquisition," quoth our Eminence,
"Thus throughout his now deserted domicile!
Ransack the palace, roof and floor, to find
If haply any scrap of writing, hid
In nook or corner, may convict — who knows? —
Brother Onofrio of intelligence
With brother Paolo, as in brotherhood
Is but too likely: crime spawns everywhere."

And, every cranny searched accordingly,
There comes to light — O lynx-eyed Cardinal! —
Onofrio's unconsidered writing-scarp,
The letter in reply to Paolo's prayer,
The word of counsel that — things proving so,
Paolo should act the proper knightly part,
And do as was incumbent on a son,
A brother — and a man of birth, be sure!

Whereat immediately the officers
Proceeded to arrest Onofrio — found
At football, child's play, unaware of harm,
Safe with his friends, the Ormi, at their seat
Monte Giordano; as he left the house
He came upon the watch in wait for him
Set by the Barigol, — was caught and caged.

News of which capture being, that same hour,
Conveyed to Rome, with forth our Eminence
Commands Taverna, Governor and Judge,

To have the process in especial care,
Be, first to last, not only president
In person, but inquisitor as well,
Nor trust the by-work to a substitute:
Bids him not, squirmish, keep the bench, but stand.
The floor of Justice, so to speak, — go try
His best in prison with the criminal:
Promising, as reward for by-work done
Faith on all-fours, that, success obtained
And crime avowed, or such clemency
With crime as here should procure a decent death —
Himself will humbly beg — which means, procure —
The Hat and Purple from his relative
The Pope, and so repay a diligence
Which, meritorious in the Cenci-case,
Mounts plainly here to Purple and the Hat.

Whereupon did my lord the Governor
So masterfully exercise the task
Enjoined him, that he, day by day, and week
By week, and month by month, from first to last Toiled for the prize: now, punctual at his plea
Played Judge, and now, assiduous at his post.
Inquisitor — pressed cushion and secured plank
Early and late. Noon's fervor and night's chill
Naught moved whom morn would, purging make amends!
So that observers laughed as, many a day
He left home, in July when day is flame,
Fed to Tardinosa-prison, plunged
Into a vault as here did day; night is ice.
There passed his eight hours on a stretch, content
Examining Onofrio: all the stress
Of all examination steadily
Converging into one pin-point, — he pushed
Tentative now of head and now of heart.
As when the nut-hatch taps and tries the nut
This side and that side till the kernel sound.
So did he press the sole and single point
— What was the very meaning of the phrase
"Doasse beasns an honored cavalier"?

Which one persistent question — torture — plied
Day by day, week by week, and month by month,
Morn, noon and night, — fatigued a way a mind
Grown imbecile by darkness, solitude,
And one vivacious memory gnawing there
As when a corpse is confined with a snake:
— Fatigued Onofrio into what might seem
Admission that perchance his judgment grossed
So blindly, feeling for an issue — aught.
With semblance of an issue from the tail
Cast of a sudden round feet late so free.
He possibly might have envisaged, scarce.
Recoiled from — even were the issue death
— Even her death whose life was death and worse!
Always provided that the charge of crime
Each jot and tittle of the charge were true.
In such a sense, belike, he might advise
His brother to expurgate crime with...
With blood, if blood must follow on "the course
Taken as might be seem a cavalier."

Whereupon process ended, and report
Was made without a minute of delay
To Clement, who, because of those two crimes
Y' the Massimi and Cenci flagrant late,
Most needs impatiently desire result.

Result obtained, he bade the Governor
Summon the Congregation and despatch
Summons made, sentence passed accordingly
— Death by beheading. When his death-decree
Was intimated to Onofrio, all did that did he to save himself,
T was much, the having gained for his defence
The Advocate o' the Poor, with natural help
If many noble friendly persons fain
To disengage a man of family,
So young too, from his grim entanglement:
1st Cardinal Aldobrandini ruled
There must be no diversion of the law.
Justice is justice, and the magistrate Sears not the sword in vain. Who sins must die.

So, the Marchese had his head cut off,
With Rome to see, a concourse infinite,
In Place Saint Angelo beside the Bridge:
Where, demonstrating magnanimity
Adequate to his birth and breed, — poor boy! —
He made the people the accustomed speech,
Exhorted them to true faith, honest works,
And special good behavior as regards
A parent of no matter what the sex,
Sinning each son take warning from himself.
Truly, it was considered in the boy
Stark staring lunacy, no less, to snap
To plain a bait, be hooked and hauled ashore
By such an angler as the Cardinal!
Why make confession of his privity
To Paolo's enterprise? — Mere sealing lips
He better, saying "When I called him
To do as might be seem a cavalier,"
What could I mean but 'Hide our parent's
shame
Is Christian ought, by aid of Holy Church!
Bury it in a convent — ay, beneath though donation to prevent its ghost from troubling earth!'" Mere saying thus, —
't is plain,
Not only were his life the recompense,
But he had manifestly proved himself
True Christian, and in lieu of punishment
Lot praise of all men — so the populace.

Anyhow, when the Pope made promise good
That of Aldobrandini, near and dear)
And gave Taverna, who had toiled so much,
A Cardinal's equipment, some such word
As this from mouth to ear went scantily:
'Taverna's cap is dyed in what he drew From Santa Croce's veins!' So joked the world.

I add: Onofrio left one child behind,
A daughter named Valeria, dowered with
grace

Abundantly of soul and body, doomed
To life the shorter for her father's fate.
By death of her, the Marchese returned
To that Orsini House from whence it came:
Oriolo having passed as donative
To Santa Croce from their ancestors.

And no word more? By all means! Would you
know
The authoritative answer, when folk urged
"What made Aldobrandini, born-like stanche, Hunt out of life a harmless simpleton?"
The answer was — "Hatred implacable,
By reason they were rivals in their love,"
The Cardinal's desire was to a dama Whose favor was Onofrio's. Priced with pride,
The simpleton must ostentatiously
Display a ring, the Cardinal's love-gift,
Given to Onofrio as the lady's gage;
Which ring on finger, as he put forth hand
To draw a tapestry, the Cardinal
Saw and knew, gift and owner, old and young;
Whereon a fury entered him — the fire
He quenched with what could quench fire only — blood.

Nay, more: "there want not who affirm to boot,
The unwise boy, a certain festal eve,
Feigned ignorance of who the wight might be;
That pressed too closely on him with a crowd.
He struck the Cardinal a blow: and then,
To put a face upon the incident,
Dared next day, smug as ever, go pay court
I' the Cardinal's ante-chamber. Mark and mend.
Ye youth, by this example how may greed
Vain glorious operate in worldly souls!"

So ends the chronicler, beginning with "God's justice, tardy though it prove per-
chance,
Rests never till it reach delinquency,"
Ay, or how otherwise had come to pass
That Vistor rules, this present year, in Rome?

FILIPPO BALDINUCCI ON THE PRIVIL-EGE OF BURIAL

A REMINISCENCE OF A. D. 1676

"No, boy, we must not" — so bogan
My Uncle (he's with God long since),
A-petting me, the good old man!
"We must not" — and he seemed to wine,
And lost that laugh whereof had grown
His chuckle at my piece of news,
How cleverly I aimed my stone —
"I fear we must not pelt the Jews!

"When I was young indeed, — ah, faith
Was young and strong in Florence too! We Christians never dreamed of sache
Because we cursed or kicked the crew.
But now — well, well! The olive-crops
Weighed double then, and Arno's pranks
Would always spare religious shops
Whenever he o'erflowed his banks!

FILIPPO BALDINUCCI ON THE PRIVILEGE OF BURIAL 823
"I'll tell you"—and his eye regained
Its twinkle—"tell you something choice!
Something may help you keep unstained
Your honest zeal to stop the voice
Of unbelief with stone-throw—spleen
Of laws, which modern fools enact,
That we must suffer Jews in sight
Go wholly un molested! Fact!

"There was, then, in my youth, and yet
Is, by our San Frediano, just Below the Blessed Olivet,
A wayside grave wherein they thrust
Their dead,—those Jews,—the more our shame!
Except that, so they will but die,
Christians perchance inure no blame
In giving hogs a hoist to sty.

"There, anyhow, Jews stow away
Their dead; and—such their insolence—
Slink at odd times to sing and pray
As Christians do—all make-prentices!—
Which wickedness they perpetrate
Because they think no Christians see.
Thus reasoned here, at any rate,
Without their host: ha, ha! he, he!

"For, what should join their plot of ground
But a good Farmer's Christian field?
The Jews had hedged their corner round
With bramble-bush to keep concealed
Their doings: for the public road
Ran betwixt this their ground and that
The Farmer's, where he ploughed and sowed,
Grew corn for barn and grapes for vat.

"So, properly to guard his store
And gull the unbelievers too,
He builds a shrine and, what is more,
Procures a painter whom I knew,
One Butti (he's with God), to paint
A holy picture there—no less
Than Virgin Mary free from taint
Borne to the sky by angels: yes!

"Which shrine he fixed,—who says him nay?—
A-facing with its picture-side
Not, as you'd think, the public way,
But just where sought these hounds to hide
Their carrion from that very truth
Of Mary's triumph: not a hound
Could act its mummeries uncocht
But Mary shamed the pack all round!

"Now, if it was amusing, judge!
—To see the company arrive,
Each Jew intent to end his trudge
And take his pleasure (though alive)
With all his Jewish kith and kin
Below ground, have his venom out,
Sharpen his wits for next day's sin,
Curse Christians, and so home, no doubt!

"Whereas, each phix upturned beholds
Mary, I warrant, soaring brave!
And in a tripe, beneath the folds
Of filthy garb which gows each knave,
Down drops it—there to hide grimace,
Contortion of the mouth and nose
At finding Mary in the place
They'd keep for Pilate, I suppose!

"At last, they will not brook—not they!—
Longer such outrage on their tribe:
So, in some hole and corner, lay
Their heads together—how to bribe
The meritorious Farmer's self
To straight undo his work, restore
Their chance to meet and muse on pelf—
Pretending sorrow, as before!

"Forthwith, a posse, if you please,
Of Rabbi This and Rabbi That
Almost go down upon their knees
To get him lay the picture flat.
The spokesmen, eighty years of age,
Gray as a badger, with a goat's
Not only beard but bleat, 'gin worse
War with our Mary. Thus he doth:—

"Friends, grant a grace! How Haven to Though life in Florence—why relate
To those who lay the burden, spoil
Our paths of peace? We bear our fate.
But when with life the long toll ends,
Why must you—the expression craves
Pardon, but truth compels me, friends!—
Why must you plague us in our graves?

"Thoughtlessly plague, I would believe!
For how can you—the lords of ease
By nurture, birthright—e'en conceive
Our luxury to lie with trees
And turf,—the cricket and the bird
Left for our last companionship:
No harsh deed, no unkindly word,
No frowning brow nor scornful lip!

"Death's luxury, we now rehearse
While, living, through your streets we fare
And take your hatred: nothing worse
Have we, once dead and safe, to bear!
So we refresh our souls, fulfill
Our works, our daily tasks; and thus Gather you grain—earth's harvest—still
The wheat for you, the straw for us.

"What floating in a face, what harm,
In just a lady born from hie
By boys' heads, wings for leg and arm?'
You question. Friends, the harm is hers—
That just when our last sigh is heaved,
And we would fain thank God and you
For labor done and peace achieved,
Back comes the Past in full review!

"At sight of just that simple flag,
Starts the foe-feeling serpent-like
From slumber. Leave it lulled, nor drag—
Though fangless—forth what needs must arise
When stricken sore, though stroke be vain
Again the mailed oppressor! Give Play to our fancy that we gain
Life's rights when once we cease to live!
"Thus much to courtesy, to kind.
To conscience! Now to Florence folk!
There's more beneath this apple-rind,
Beneath this white-of-egg there's yolk!
Beneath this prayer to courtesy,
Kind, conscience — there's a sum to pouch!
How many ducats down will buy
Our shame's removal, sirs? Aouch!

"Removal, not destruction, sirs!
Just turn your picture! Let it front
The public path! Or memory errs,
Or that same public path is won't
To witness many a chance befall
Of lust, theft, bloodshed — sirs enough,
Wherein our Hebrew part is small.
Convert yourselves!" — he cut up rough.

"Look you, how soon a service paid
Religion yields the servant fruit!
A prompt reply our Farmer made
So following: 'Sirs, to grant your suit
Involves much danger! How? Transpose
Our Lady? Stop the chastisement,
All for your good, herself bestows?
What wonder if I grudge consent?"

"— Yet grant it: since, what cash I take
Is so much saved from wicked use.
We know you! And, for Mary's sake,
A hundred ducats shall induce Concession to your prayer. One day
Suffices: Master Buti's brush
Turns Mary round the other way;
And deluges your side with lusus.

"Down with the ducats therefore! Dump, Dump, dump it falls, each counted piece, Hard cold. Then out of door they stamp,
These dogs, each brisk as with new lease
Of life, I warrant, — glad he'll die
Henceforward just as he may choose,
Be buried and in clover lie!
Well said Essais — 'stiff-necked Jews!'

"Off posts without a minute's loss
Our Farmer, once the cash in poke,
And summons Buti — ere its gloss
Have time to fade from off the joke —
To chop and change his work, undo
The done side, make the side, now blank,
Recipient of our Lady — who,
Displaced thus, had these dogs to thank!

"Now, boy, you're hardly to instruct
In technicalities of Art!
My nephew's childhood sure has sucked
Along with mother's milk some part
Of painter's-practice — learned, at least,
How expeditiously is plied
A work in fresco — never speeded
When once begun — a day, each side.

"So, Buti — he's with God — begins:
First covers up the shrine all round
With hoarding; then, as like as twins,
Paints, 't other side the burial-ground,
New Mary, every point the same;
Next, alouces over, as agreed.
That old, and last — but, spoil the game
By telling you? Not I, indeed!

"Well, ere the week was half at end,
Out came the object of this zeal,
This fine alacrity to spend
Hard money for mere dead men's weal!
How think you? That old spokesman Jew
Was High Priest, and he had a wife
As old, and she was dying too,
And wished to end in peace her life!

"And he must humor dying whims,
And soothe her with the idle hope
They'd say their prayers and sing their hymns
As if her husband were the Pope!
And she did die — believing just
This privilege was purchased! Dead
In comfort through her foolish trust!
'Stiff-necked ones,' well Essais said!

"So, Sabbath morning, out of gate
And on to way, what sees our arch
Good Farmer? Why, they hoist their freight —
The corpse — on shoulder, and so, march!
'Now for it, Buti!' — In the nick
Of time 't is pully-hauly, hence
With hoarding! O'er the wayside quick
There's Mary plain in evidence!

"And here's the convoy halting: right!
Oh, they are bent on howling psalms
And growling prayers, when opposite!
And yet they gaze, for all their qualms,
Approve that promptitude of his,
The Farmer's — duly at his post
To take due thanks from every phiz,
Sour smirk — nay, surly smile almost!

"Then earthward drops each brow again;
The solemn task is resumed; they reach
Their holy field — the unholy train:
Eater its precinct, all and each,
Wreapped somehow in their godless rites;
Till, rites at end, up-waking, lo,
They lift their faces! What delights
The mourners as they turn to go?

"Ha, ha! he, he! On just the side
They drew their purse-strings to make quit
Of Mary, — Christ the Crucified
Fronted them now — these biters bit!
Never was such a hiss and snort,
Such scrapping nose and shooting lip!
Their purchase — honey in report —
Proved gall and verjuice at first sip!

"Out they break, on they hustle, where,
A-top of wall, the Farmer waits
With Buti: never fun so rare!
The Farmer has the best: he rates
The rascal, as the old High Priest
Takes on himself to sermonize —
Nay, smear, 'We Jews supposed, at least,
Theft was a crime in Christian eyes!'"
"Theft?" cries the Farmer. "Eat your words!
Show me what constitutes a breach
Of what in aught was said or heard!
I promised you in plainest speech
I'd take the thing you count disgrace
And put it here — and here 'tis put!
Did you suppose I'd leave the place
Blank therefore, just your rage to glut?

"I guess you dared not stipulate
For such a damned impertinence!
So, quick, my greybeard, out of gate
And in at Ghetto! Haste you hence!
As long as I have house and land,
To spite you irreligious chaps,
Here shall the Crucifixion stand
— Unless you down with cash, perhaps!

"So snickered he and Buti both.
The Jews said nothing, interchange
A glance or two, renewed their oath
To keep ears stopped and hearts estranged
From grace, for all our Church can do;
Then off they scuttle: sudden jog
Homewards, against our Church to brew
Fresh mischief in their synagogue.

"But next day — see what happened, boy!
See why I bid you have a care
How you peit Jews! The knaves employ
Such methods of revenge, forbear
No outrage on our faith, when free
To wreak their malice! Here they took
So base a method — plague o' me
If I record it in my Book!

"For, next day, while the Farmer sat
Laughing with Buti, in his shop,
At their successful joke, — rat-tat, —
Door opens, and they're like to drop
Down to the floor as in there stalks
A six-feet-high heroulean-built
Young he-Jew with a beard, that talks
Description. 'Help ere blood be spilt!'

"Screamed Buti: for he recognized
Whom but the son, no less no more,
Of that High Priest his work surprised
So pleasantly the day before!
Son of the mother, then, whereof
The bier he lent a shoulter to,
And made the moans about, dared scoff
At sober Christian grief — the Jew!

"Sirs, I salute you! Never rise!
No apprehension!" (Buti, white
And trembling like a tub of size,
Had tried to smuggle out of sight
The picture's self — the thing in oils,
You know, from which a fresco's dashed
Which courage speeds while caution spoils)
'Stay and be praised, sir, unabashed!

"Praised, — ay, and paid too: for I come
To buy that very work of yours,
My poor abode, which boasts — well, some Few specimens of Art, securcs,
Haply, a masterpiece indeed
If I should find my humble means
Suffice the outlay. So, proceed!
Propose — ere prudence intervenes!"

"On Buti,owering like a child,
These words descended from aloft,
In tones so ominously mild,
With smile terribly soft
To that degree — could Buti dare
(Poor fellow) use his brains, think twice?
He asked, thus taken unaware,
No more than just the proper price!

"Done!" cries the monster. "I disburse
Forthwith your moderate demand.
Count on my custom — if no worse
Your future work be, understand.
Than this I carry off! No aid!
My arm, sir, lacks nor bone nor thought:
The burden's easy, and we're made,
Easy or hard, to bear — we Jews!

"Crossing himself at such escape,
Buti by turns the money eyes
And, timidly, the staidwart shape
Now moving doorwards; but, more wise.
The Farmer — who, though dumb, this while
Had watched advantage — straight conceiving
A reason for that tone and smile
So mild and soft! The Jew — believed!

"Mary in triumph borne to deck
A Hebrew household! Picture where
No one was used to bend the neck
In praise or bow the knee in prayer!
Born to that domicile by whom?
The son of the High Priest! Through what
What?
An insult done his mother's tomb!
Saul changed to Paul — the case came yet!

"Stay, dog-Jew... gentle sir, that is!
Rescue me! Can it be, she crowned,—
Mary, by miracle, — oh bliss! —
My present to your burial-ground?
Certain, a ray of light has burst
Your vale of darkness! Had you else,
Only for Mary's sake, unpursued
So much hard money? Tell — oh, tell's!

"Round — like a serpent that we took
For worm and trod on — turns his bulk
About the Jew. First dreadful look
Sends Buti in a trice to skulk
Out of sight somewhere, safe — alack!
But our good Farmer faith made bold:
And firm (with Florence at his back)
He stood, while gruff the gutturals rolled—

"Ay, sir, a miracle was wrought,
By quite another power, I trust,
Than ever yet in canvas lurked,
Or you would scarcely face me now!
A certain impulse did suggest
A certain grasp with this right-hand,
Which probably had put to rest
Our quarrel, — thus your throat once spanned!
EPilogue

"But I remembered me, subdued

That impulse, and you face me still!
And soon a philosophic mood

Succeeding (hear it, if you will!)

Has altogether changed my views

Concerning Art. Blind prejudice!

Well may you Christians tax us Jews

With scrupulosity too nice!

"For, don't I see, — let's issue join! —

Whence I'm allowed pollute

(I — and my little bag of coin)

Some Christian palace of repute, —

Don't I see stuck up everywhere

Abundant proof that cultured taste

Has beauty for its only care,

And upon Truth so thought to waste?

"Jew, since it must be, take in pledge

Of payment — so a Cardinal

Has sighed to me as if a wedge

Entered his heart — this best of all

My treasures! 4  Leda, Gymnopede

Or Antiope: swan, eagle, ape,

(Or what's the beast of what's the breed,

And Jupiter in every shape!)"

"Whereat if I presume to ask

But, Eminence, though Titian's whisk

Of brush have well performed its task,

How comes it these false godsmas frisk

In presence of — what yonder frame

Pretends to image?  Surely, odd

It seems, you let confront The Name

Each beast the heathen called his god!"

"Beneignant smiles me pity straight

The Cardinal.  'Tis Truth, we prize!

Art's the sole question in debate!

These subjects are so many lies.

We treat them with a proper scorn

When we turn lies — called gods forsooth —

To lies' fit use, now Christ is born.

Drawing and coloring are Truth.

"Think you I honor lies so much

As scurpel to parade the charms

Of Leda — Titian, every touch —

Because the thing within her arms

Means Jupiter who had the praise

And prayer of a benighted world?

He would have mine too, if, in days

Of light, I kept the canvas fueled!"

"So ending, with some easy gibe.

What power has logic?  I, at once,

Acknowledged error in our tribe.

So squeamish that, when friends enconce

A pretty picture in its niche

To do us honor, deck our graves,

We fret and fume and hate again

To strangle folk — ungrateful knaves!

"No, sir!  Be sure that — what's its style,

Your picture? — shall possess ungrudging

A place among my rank and file

Of Ledas and what not — be judged

Just as a picture! and (because

I fear me much I scarce have bought

A Titian) Master But's flaws

Found there, will have the laugh, flaws ought!"

"So, with a sowl, it darkens door —

This bulk — no longer! Buti makes

Prompt glad re-entry; there's a score

Of oaths, as the good Farmer wakès

From what must needs have been a trance,

Or he had struck (he sweared) to ground

The bold bad mouth that dared advance

Such doctrine the reverse of sound!"

"Was magic here?  Most like!  For, since,

Somewhat our city's faith grows still

More and more lukewarm, and our Prince

Or loses heart or wants the will

To check increase of cold.  'T is 'Live

And let live!  Languidly repress

The Disdained! In short, — contrive

Christians must bear with Jews: no less!"

"The end seems, any Israelite

Wants any picture, — pishees, poohs,

Purchases, hangs it full in sight

In any chamber he may choose!

In Christ's crown, one more thorn we rue!

In Mary's bosom, one more sword!

No, boy, you must not pelt a Jew!

O Lord, how long?  How long, O Lord!"

EPilogue

μετοχής . . .

οἱ δ' ἀμφορίς ὑμῶν μέλανον ἀνθυμίζων.

"The poets pour us wine —"

Said the dearest poet I ever knew,

Dearest and greatest and best to me.

You clamor a thirst for poetry —

We pour.  "But when shall a vintage be" —

You cry — "strong grape, squeezed gold from screw.

Yet sweet juice, flavored flowery-fine?

That were indeed the wine!"

One pours your cup — stark strength,

Meat for a man; and you eye the pulp

Strained, turbid still, from the viscous blood

Of the snaky bough: and you grumble "Good!

For it swells resolve, breeds hardihood;

Dispatch it, then, in a single gulp!"

So, down, with a wry face, goes at length

The liquor: stuff for strength.

One pours your cup — sheer sweet,

The fragrant fumes of a year condensed:

Suspicion of all that 's ripe or rathe,

From the bud on branch to the grass in swathe,

"We suck mere milk of the seasons," saith

A curl of each nostril — 'twas, dispens'd,

Nowise for serving man to feast:

Boys sip such honeyed sweet!"

And thus who wants wine strong,

Waves each sweet smell of the year away;
Who likes to swoon as the sweets suffuse
His brain with a mixture of beams and dews
Turned a syrupy drink — rough strength eschews:
"What though in our veins your wine-stock stay?
The lack of the bloom does our palate wrong.
Give us wine sweet, not strong!"

Yet wine is — some affirm —
Prime wine is found in the world somewhere,
Of portable strength with sweet to match.
You double your heart its dose, yet catch —
As the draught descends — a viiiolet-smatch,
Softness — however it came there,
Through drops expressed by the fire and worm:
Strong sweet wine — some affirm.

Body and banquet both?
'T is easy to ticket a bottle so;
But what was the case in the cask, my friends?
Cask? Nay, the vat — where the maker mends
His strong with his sweet (you suppose) and blends
His rough with his smooth, till none can know
How it comes you may tipple, nothing loth,
Body and bouquet both.

"You" being just — the world.
No poets — who turn, themselves, the winch
Of the press; no critics — I'll even say,
(Being flustered and easy of faith, to-day.)
Who for love of the work have learned the way
Till themselves produce home-made, at a pinch:
No! You are the world, and wine ne'er purled
Except to please the world!

"For, oh the common heart!
And, ah the inremissible sin
Of poets who please themselves, not us!
Strong wine yet sweet wine pouring thus,
Here's the still — Philar and Naehylus —
Drink — dipt into by the bearded chin
Alike and the bloomy lip — no part Denied the common heart!

"And might we get such grace,
And did you moderns but stock our vault
With the true half-brandy half attar-gul,
How would seniors indulge at a hearty pull
While juniors tossed off their thimbleful!
Our Shakespeare and Milton escaped your fault,
So, they reign supreme over the weaker race
That wants the ancient grace!"

If I paid myself with words
(As the French say well) I were duper dead!
I were found in belief that you quaffed and bowed
At your Shakespeare the whole day long, carousd
In your Milton potell-deep nor drowned
A moment of night — toped on, took heed
Of nothing like modern cream-and-curd's
Pay me with deeds, not words!

For — see your cellarage!
There are forty barrels with Shakespearian flavour.
Some five or six are abreast: the rest
Stand spigoted, fanazed. Try and test
What yourselves call best of the very best!
How comes it that still untouched it stand?
Why don't you try tap, advance a stage
With the rest in cellarage?

For — see your cellarage!
There are four big butts of Milton's brew.
How comes it you make old drips and drops
Do duty, and there devotion stops?
Leave such an abyss of malt and hops
Embellid in butts which bunge still glue?
You hate your hard! A fig for your rage!
Free him from cellarage!

'T is said I brew still drink,
But the dence a flavor of grape is there.
Hardly a May-go-down, 'tis just
A sort of a gruff Go-down-it-must —
No Merry-go-down, no gracious guest Commingles the race with Spring-tide's ra.
"What wonder," say you, "that we cock
And blink
At Autumn's heady drink?"

Is it a fancy, friends?
Mighty and mellow are never mixed,
Though mighty and mellow be born at Once.
Sweet for the future, — strong for the nose.
Stuff you should stow away, ensonce
In the deep and dark, to be found fast-fast
At the century's close: such time strews spends
A sweetening for my friends!

And then — why, what you quaff
With a smack of lip and a cluck of tongue.
Is leakage and leavings — just what haps
From the tun some learned taster takes
With a promise "Prepare your watery cheer!" Here's properest wine for old and young Dispute its perfection — you make us laugh.
Have faith, give thanks, but — quaff!"
EPILOGUE

A mine 's beneath a moor:
Acres of moor roof fathoms of mine
Which diamonds dot where you please to dig;
Let who plies spade for the bright and big?
Your prouder truffles, you hunt with a pig!
Since bright-and-big, when a man would dine,
Suits badly: and therefore the Koh-i-noor
May sleep in mine 'neath moor!

Fine, pulse in might from me!
It may never emerge in must from vat,
Never fill cask nor furnish can,
Never end sweet, which strong began—
God's gift to gladden the heart of man:
But spirit 's at proof, I promise that!
So sparing of juice spoils what should be Fit brewage—mine for me.

Ian's thoughts and loves and hates!
Earth is my vineyard, these grew there:
From grape of the ground, I made or married
By vintage; easy the task or hard,
Who set it—his praise be my reward!
Earth's yield! Who yearn for the Dark-
Blue Sea's,
At them "lay, pray, pray"—the addle-pates!
Mine be Man's thoughts, loves, hates!

But some one says, "Good Sir!"
"Tis a worthy verse'd in what concerns
The making such labor turn out well,
You don't suppose that the nosegay-smell
Seeds always come from the grape? Each bell
At your foot, each bud that your culture spurns,
The very cowalips would act like myrrh
On the stiffest brew—good Sir!

Cowalips, abundant birth
O'er meadow and hillside, vineyard too,
Like a schoolboy's scravings in and out
Metastatical lesson-book—all about
Tease and Rome, victory and rout—
Love-verses instead of such vain ado!
O, fancies frolic it o'er the earth
Where thoughts have rightlier birth.

Nay, thoughtlings they themselves:
Loves, hates—in little and less and least!
Thoughts? "What is a man beside a mount!"

Loves? "Absent—poor lovers the minutes count!"
Hates? "Pie—Pope's letters to Martha Blount!"
These furnish a wine for a children's-feast:
Inspired to man, they suit the elves
Like thoughts, loves, hates themselves."

And, friends, beyond dispute
I too have the cowalips dewy and dear.
Funcial as Springtide forth peep they;
I leave them to make my meadow gay.
But I ought to pluck and impound them, eh?
Not let them alone, but deftly shear
And shred and reduce to—what may suit
Children, beyond dispute?

And, here's a May-month, all bloom,
All bounty: what if I sacrifice?
If I out with shears and shear, nor stop
Shearing till prostrate, lo, the crop?
And will you prefer it to ginger-pop
When I've made you wine of the memories
Which leave as bare as a churchyard tomb
My meadow, late all bloom?

Nay, what ingratitude
Should I hesitate to amuse the wits
That have pulled so long at my flax, nor grudged
The headache that paid their pains, nor judged
From bungholes before they sighed and judged
"Too rough for our taste, to-day, befits
The racy and right when the years conclude!"
Out on ingratitude!

Grateful or ingrate—not, none,
No cowalip of all my fairy crew
Shall help to concoct what makes you wink,
And goes to your head till you think you think!
I like them alive: the printer's ink
Would sensibly tell on the perfume too.
I may use up my pettles, ere I've done;
But of cowalips—friends get none!

Don't nettles make a broth
Whoreamble for blood grown lazy and thick?
Maws out of sorts make mouths out of taste.
My Thirty-four Port—no need to waste
On a tongue that's fur and a palate—past!
A magnum for friends who are sound! the sick—
I'll posset and cosset them, nothing loth,
Henceforward with nettle-broth!
May I be permitted to chat a little, by way of recreation, at the end of a somewhat toilsome and perhaps fruitless adventure?

If, because of the immense fame of the following Tragedy, I wished to acquaint myself with it, and could only do so by the help of a translator, I should require him to be literal at every cost save that of absolute violence to our language. The use of certain allowable constructions which, happening to be out of daily favor, are all the more appropriate to archaic workmanship, is no violence: but I would be tolerant for once— in the case of so immensely famous an original—of even a clumsy attempt to furnish me with the very turn of each phrase in as Greek a fashion as English will bear: while, with respect to amplifications and embellishments, — anything rather than, with the good farmer, experience that most signal of mortifications, "to gape for Æschylus and get Theognis." I should especially decline—what may appear to brighten up a passage—the employment of a new word for some old one, — νῦν, or μέγας, or τίτος, with its congers, recurring four times in three lines: for though such substitution may be in itself perfectly justifiable, yet this exercise of ingenuity ought to be within the competence of the unsaid English reader if he likes to show himself ingenious. Learning Greek teaches Greek, and nothing else: certainly not common sense, if that have failed to precede the teaching. Further,—if I obtained a, mere strict bald version of thing by thing, or at least word pregnant with thing, I should hardly look for an impossible transmission of the reputed magniloquence and sonority of the Greek; and this with the less regret, insomuch as there is abundant musicality elsewhere, but nowhere else than in his poem the ideas of the poet. And lastly, when presented with these ideas, I should expect the result to prove very hard reading indeed if it were meant to resemble Æschylus, εὖβαιλείν οὐ μὴ κοιτάζον, "not easy to understand," in the opinion of his stoutest advocate among the ancients; while, I suppose, even modern scholarship sympathizes with that early declaration of the redoubtable Salmasius, when, looking about for an example of the truly obscure for the benefit of those who found obscurity in the sacred books, he protested that this particular play leaves them all behind in this respect, with their "Hebraisms, Syriisms, Hellenisms, and the whole of such bag and baggage."1 If, over and above the proposed ambiguity of the Chorus, there is sadly corrupt, probably interpolated, at certain places mutilated; and no unlearned pens enjoy the scholar's privilege of trying his best, upon each obstacle whenever he comes to a stoppage, and effectually clearing the way, suppressing what seems to lie in it.

All I can say for the present performance is, that I have done as I would be done by, if I needed were. Should anybody, without my honor my translation by a comparison with the original, I beg him to observe that, following no editor exclusively, I keep to the easier readings so long as sense can be made out of them, but disregard, I hope, little of importance in recent criticism so far as I have fallen in with it. Fortunately, the poorest translation, provided only it be faithful,—though it reproduce all the artistic confusion of epic moods, and persons, with which the original teems,—will not only suffice to display the eloquent friend maintains to be the all superior poetry—"the action of the piece"—it may help to illustrate his assurance that the Greeks are the highest models of expression, the unapproached masters of the grand style: their expression is so excellent because it is admirably kept in its right degree of prominence, because it is so simple and so well arranged, because it draws its force directly from the pregnant character of the thing it conveys...not a word wasted, not a sentiment carelessly thrown in, stroke on stroke."2

1 "Qua efficii Æschylum posset affirmare Graecum sic scientiae magis patet explicabilium quam Evangelia sunt Epistolae Apostolicæ? Utuis ejus Agamemnon secutissimum quantum est laudum auctoritatis, non Hebraism or Syriasm et tota Hellenism-s mal effraginis." — SALMASIUS de Hellesiaca Epist. Dedic.

WARDER. The gods I ask deliverance from these labors.
Watch of a year’s length whereby, slumbering through it
On the Aresiades’ roofs on elbow,—dog-like
I know of nightly star-groups the assemblage,
And those that bring to men winter and summer,
Bright dynasts, as they pride them in the ether
—Stars, when they wither, and the uprisings of them.
And now on ward I wait the torch’s token,
The glow of fire, shall bring from Trojan message
And word of capture: so prevails audacious
The man’s-way-planning hoping heart of woman.
But when I, driven from night-rest, dew-drenched, hold to
This couch of mine—not looked upon by visions,
Since fear instead of sleep still stands beside me,

So as that fast I fix in sleep no eyelids—
And when to sing or chimp a tune I fancy,
For slumber such song—remedy infusing;
I wail then, for this House’s fortune groaning.
Not, as of old, after the best ways governed.
Now, lucky be deliverance from these labors,
At good news—the appearing dusky fire!
O hail, thou lamb of night, a day-long lightness
Revealing, and of dances the ordainment!
Hallow, hallow!
To Agamemnon’s wife I show, by shouting.
That, from bed starting up at once, 1 the household
Joyous acclamation, good-omened to this torch-blaze,
She send aloft if haply Ilion’s city
Be taken, as the beacon boasts announcing.
Ay, and, for me, myself will dance a prelude,
For, that my masters’ die drop right, I’ll reckon:
Since thrice-six has it thrown to me, this signal.
Well, may it hap that, as he comes, the loved hand
O’ the household’s lord I may sustain with this hand!

As for the rest, I’m mute: on tongue a big ox

1 Lettres à un jeune Prince, traduites du Suédois.
Has trodden. Yet this House, if voice it take should,
Most plain would speak. So, willing I myself speak
To those who know: to who know not— I'm blankness.

Choros. The tenth year this, since Priamos' great match,
King Menelaus, Agamemnon King,
— The strenuous yoke-pair of the Atreidai's honor
Two-throned, two-sceptred, whereof Zeus was donor.
Did from this land the aid, the armament dispatch,
The thousand-sailed force of Argives clamoring
"Are 51 from out the indignant breast, as fling
Passion forth vultures which, because of grief
Away,— as are their young ones,— with the thief,
Lofty above their brood-nests wheel in ring,
Row round and round with car of either wing,
Lament the bedded chicks, last labor that was loved:
Which hearing, one above
— Whether Apollon, Pan or Zeus—that wall,
Sharp-piercing bird-shriek of the guests who fare
Housemates with gods in air—
Such as one sends, against who these assail,
What, late-sent, shall not fail
Of punishing— Erinus. Here as there,
The Guardian of the Guest, Zeus, the excelling one,
Sends against Alexander's either son
Of Atreus: for that wife, the many-husbanded,
Appointing many a tug that tries the limb,
While the knee plays the prop in dust, while, shred
To morsels, lies the spear-shaft; in those grim
Marriage-prolusions when their Fury wed
Danaoi and Tros, both alike. All's said:
Things are where things are, and, as fate has willed,
So shall they be fulfilled.
Not gently-grieving, not just doling out
The drops of expiration— no, nor tears distilled—
Shall he we know of bring the hard about
To soft— that intense ire
At those mock rites unsanctified by fire.
But we pay naught here: through our flesh, age-weighed,
Left out from who gave aid
In that day,— we remain,
Staying on staves a strength
The equal of a child's at length.
For when young marrow in the breast doth reign,
That's the old man's match,— Are 51 out of place
In either—but in oldest age's case,
Poliarch-riding, why, he wends his way
On three feet, and, no stronger than a child,
Wanders about gone wild,
A dream in day.

But thou, Tandumus' daughter, Khastinnedon queen,
What need? What new? What having heard or seen,
By what announcement's tidings, everywhere
Settest thou, round about, the sacrifice after?
For, of all gods the city-swaying,
Those supermum, those infernal,
Those of the fields', those of the man's obeying,—

The altars blaze with gifts;
And here and there, heaven-high the torch uplifts
Flame— dedicated with persuasions mild,
With foul admixture unbeguil—
Of holy unguent, from the clefted shrism
Brought from the palace, safe in its abysm.
Of these things, speaking what may be desired,
Both possible and lawful to concede,
Healer do thou become!— of this solicitate
Which, now, stands plainly forth of evil mood,
And, then ... but from oblations, hope, to-day
Graciously appearing, wards away
From soul the inasiatte care,
The sorrow at my breast, devouring there!

Empowered am I to sing
The omens, what their force which, journeying
Rejoiced the potentates:
(For still, from God, inflates
My breast, song-sustenance: age,
Born to the business, still such war can wage)
— How the fierce bird against the Tenkris last Dispatched, with spear and executing hand,
The Achaian's two-throned empery— or Hallas' youth
Two rulers with one mind:
The birds' king to these kings of ships, os high.
— The black sort, and the sort that's wise behind.
— Appearing by the palace, on the spear-thrust side,
In right sky-regions, visible far and wide,—
Devouring a hare-creature, great with young.
Balked of more racings they, as she from whom they sprung!—
Ah, Linos, say — ah, Linos, song of wail!—
But may the good prevail!

The prudent army-prophet seeing two
The Atreidai, two their temples, knew
Those feasting on the hare
The armament-conductors were;
And thus he spoke, explaining signs in view.
"In time, this onset takes the town of Priamos:
But all before its towers, — the people's weak
That was,
Of flocks and herds,— as sure, shall bloody sharing thence
Drain to the dregs away, by battle violence.
Only, have care lest grudge of any god disturb
With cloud the unsullied shine of that great force, the curb
Of Troia, struck with damp.
Of gods, enforced no less,—
As they, commanders of the crew,
Assume the awful seat.

And then the old leader of the Achaean fleet,
Disparaging no seer—
With bated breath to suit misfortune’s intrush here
— (What time it labored, that Achaean host,
By stay from sailing,—every pulse at length
Emptied of vital strength,—
Hard over Kalchos’ shore-bound, current-crost
In Aulis station,—while the winds which post
From Strumos, ill-delayers, famine-fraught,
Tempters of man to sail where harborage is naught,
Spendthrifts of ships and cables, turning time
To twice the length,—these carded, by delay,
To less and less away
The Argives’ flowery prime:
And when a remedy more grave and grand
Than aught before—yes, for the storm and death—
The prophet to the foremost in command
Shrieked forth, as cause of this
Adjoining Artemis,
So that the Ateidal striking staves on earth
Could not withhold the tear) —
Then did the king, the elder, speak this clear.

"Heave the fate, indeed—to disobey!
Yet heavy if my child I alay.
The adornment of my household: with the tide
Of virgin-slaughter, at the altar-side,
A father’s hands defiling: which the way
Without its evils, say?
How shall I turn fleet-fugitive,
Failing of duty to allies?
Since for a wind-abating sacrifice
And virgin blood,—it is right they strive,
Nay, laden with desire.
Well may it work them —this that they require!"

But when he underwent necessity’s
Yoke-trace,—from soul blowing unhallowed change
Unclean, abominable,—thence—another man
The audacious mind of him began
Its wildest range.
For this it is gives mortals hardihood —
Some wise-devising miserable mood
Of madness, and first woe of all the brood.
The sacrifier of his daughter—strange!
He dared become, to expedite
Woman-avenging warfare,—anchors weighed
With such prelusive rite!

Prayings and callings "Father"—naught
they made
Of these, and of the virgin-age,—
Captains heart-set on war to wage!
His minions, vows done, the father bade —
Kid-like, above the altar, swathed in pall.
Take her —lift high, and have no fear at all,
Head-downward, and the fair mouth’s guard.
And frontage hold,— press hard
From utterance a curse against the House
By dint of bit — violence bridling speech.
And as to ground her safron-vest she shed,
She smote the sacrificers all and each
With arrow sweet and piteous,
From the eye only sped, —
Significant of will to use a word,
Just as in pictures : since, full many a time,
In her siren guest-hall, by the well-heaped board
Had she made music, — lovingly with chime
Of her divine voice, that unpolluted thing,
Honored the third libation, — psalm that should bring
Good fortune to the sire she loved so well.

What followed — those things I nor saw nor tell
But Kalchas' arts — whate'er they indicate —
Mise of fulfilment never: it is fate.
True, justice makes, in sufferers, a desire
To know the future woe preponderate.
But — hear before is need!
To that farewell and welcome! 'tis the same, indeed,
As grief beforehand: clearly, part for part,
Conformably to Kalchas' art,
Shall come the event.
But be they as they may, things subsequent, —
What is to do, prosperity betide
E'en as we wish it! — we, the next allied,
Sole guarder barrier of the Apian land.

I am come, reverencing power in thee,
O Klu. Troia! For 'tis just we bow
To the ruler's wife, — the male-seat man-be-reaved.
But if thou, having heard good news, — or none,—
For good news' hope dost sacrifice thus wide,
I would hear gladly: art thou mute, — no grudge!

Klutaïmaistra. Good-news-announcer, may — as is the by-word —
Morn becomes, truly, — news from Night his mother.
But thou shouldst learn joy past all hope of hearing.

Praiseworthy city have the Areopgae taken.
Cho. How sayest? The word, from want of faith, escaped me.
Klu. Troia the Achaioi hold: do I speak plainly?
Cho. Joy overcomes me, calling forth the tear-drop.
Klu. Right! for, that glad thou art, thine eye convicts thee.
Cho. For — what to thee, of all this, this trusty token?
Klu. What's here! how else? unless the god have cheated.
Cho. Haply thou flattering shows of dreams unsuspectest?
Klu. No: how should I take of soul sleep-burdened.
Cho. But has there puffed thee up some unwinged omen?

Klu. As a young maid's my mind the mockest grossly.
Cho. Well, at what time was — even mocked, the city?
Klu. Of this same mother Night — the dawns I tell thee.
Cho. And who of messengers could reach's swiftness?
Klu. Hephaisiotos — sending a bright bix from Idé.
Beacon did beacon send, from fire the poster.
Hitherward: Idé to the rock Hermianna.
Of Lemos: and a third great torch o' the island.
Zeus' seat received in turn, the Athenian sumit.
And, — so upsearing as to stride sea over,
The strong lamp-voyager, and all for joyance—
Did the gold-glory splendid, any sun like,
Pass on — the pine-tree — to Makistos' watch-place;
Who did not, — tardy, — caught, no wits about him.
By sleep, — decline his portion of the mission.
And from the beacon’s light, on stream Eripos
Arriving, made aware Messapicis' wardens.
And up they lit in turn, played herald towards.
Kindling with flame a heap of gray oil elsewhere.
And, strengthening still, the lamp, decaying nowise,
Springing o'er Plain Asopos, — fallmase-fashion
Effulgence toward the crag of Mount Isthron,
Roused a new rendering-up of fire the escort—
And light, far escort, lacked no recognition
O' the guard — as burning more than burnings told you.
And over Idé Gorgopis light went leaping.
And, at Mount Aigiplatokos safe arriving,
Enforced the law— "to never stint the first stuff."
And they send, lighting up with ungreened vigor.
Of flame a huge beard, ay, the very foreland
So as to strike above, in burning onward,
The look-out which commands the Ssios Sarone,
Then did it dart until it reached the outpost
Mount Arahnaïs here, the city's neighbor;
And then darts to this roof of the Aretis.
This light of Idé's fire not unforefathered!
Such are the rules prescribed the flamme-bearing
He beats that's first and also last in running.
Such is the proof and token I declare thee.
My husband having sent me news from Troia.
Cho. The gods, indeed, anon will I pray.
But now, these words to bear, and unto my wound
Thoroughly, I am fain — if twice thou tell them.
Klu. Troia do the Achaioi hold, this same day.
I think a noise — no mixture — reigns i’ the city.
Sour wine and unguent pour thou in one vessel —
Standers-apart, not lovers, wouldst thou style them:
And so, of captives and of conquerors, partwise
The voices are to hear, of fortune diverse.
For those, indeed, upon the bodies prostrate
Of husbands, brothers, children upon parents —
The old men, from a throat that’s free no vagueness;
Shriekingly wail the death-doom of their dearest:
While these — the after-battle hungry labor,
Which prompts night-faring, marshals them to breakfast.
On the town’s store, according to no billet
Of sharing, but as each drew lot of fortune.
In the spear-captured Troïa habitations
House they already: from the frosts upaethoral
And dews delivered, will they, luckless crea-tures,
Without a watch to keep, slumber all night through.
And if they fear the gods, the city-guardians,
And if the gods’ structures of the conquered country,
They may not — capturers — soon in turn be captive.
But see no prior lust befall the army
To sac things sacred — by gain-cravings vanquished!
For there needs homeward the return’s salvation,
To round the new limb back o’ the double race-course.
And guilty to the gods if came the army,
Awakened up the sorrow of those slain as if the gods had taken.
But may good beat — no turn to see i’ the balance!
For many benefits I want the gain of.
Cho. Woman, like prudent man thou kindly speakest.
And I, thus having heard thy trusty tokens,
The gods to rightly hail prepare we;
For, grace that must be paid has crowned our labors.

O Zeus the king, and friendly Night
Of these brave boons bestower —
Thou who didst fling on Troïa’s every tower
The o’er-roofing mares, that neither great thing might Nor any of the young ones, overpass
Captive’s great sweep-net — one and all
Of Até held in thrall!
Ay, Zeus I fear — the guest’s friend great — who was
The doer of this, and long since bent
The blow on Alexandros with intent
That neither wide o’ the white
Nor o’er the stars the foolish dart should light.
The stroke of Zeus — they have it, as men say!
This, at least, from the source track forth we may!

As he ordained, so has he done.
“No!” — said some one.
“The gods think fit to care
Nowise for mortals, such
As those by whom the good and fair
Of things denied their touch
Is trampled!” but he was profane.
That they do care, has been made plain
To offspring of the over-bold,
Outbreathing “Are’ greater than is just —
Houses that spill with more than they can hold.
More than is best for man. Be man’s what must Keep harm off, so that in himself he find Sufficiency — the well-endowed of mind!
For there’s no bulwark in man’s wealth to him
Who, through a surfeit, kicks — into the dim
And disappearing — Right’s great altar.

Yes —

It urges him, the sad persuasiveness,
Até’s insufferable child that schemes
Treason beforehand: and all cure is vain.
It is not hidden: out it glares again,
A light dread-lamping-mischief, just as gleams
The baseness of the bronze;
Through rubbing, puttings to the touch,
Black-clotted is he, judged at once.
He seeks — the boy — a flying bird to clench,
The insufferable brand
Setting upon the city of his land
Whereof not any god hears prayer;
While him who brought about such evils there,
That unjust man, the god in grapple throws.
Such an one, Paris goes
Within the Atreidā’s house —
Shamed the guest’s board by robbery of the spouse.

And, leaving to her townsmen throughs a-spread
With shields, and spear-thrusts of sea-armament,
And bringing Iliā, in a dowry’s stead,
Destruction — swiftly through the gates she went,
Daring the undesirables. But many a groan outbroke
From prophets of the House as thus they spoke.

“Woe, woe the House, the House and Rulers,
— woe
The marriage-bed and dints
A husband’s love imprints!
There she stands silent! meets no honor —
No Shame — sweetest still to see of things gone long ago!
And, through desire of one across the main,
A ghost will seem within the house to reign:
And hateful to the husband is the grace
Of well-shaped statues: from — in place of eyes,
Those blanks — all Aphrodité dies.

“But dream-appearing mournful fantasies —
There they stand, bringing grace that’s vain.
For vain ‘t is, when brave things one seems to view;
The fantasy has floated off, hands through;
Gone, that appearance, — sorrow left to creep, —
On wings, the servants in the paths of sleep!"
Woes, then, in household and on earth, are such As these, and woes surpassing these by much.
Per petrem only: everywhere —
For those who from the land
Of Helleas issued in a band,
Sorrow, the heart must bear,
Sits in the home of each, conspicuous there.
Many a circumstance, at least,
Touching the very breast.
For those Whom any sent away, — he knows:
And in the live man's stead,
Armor and ashes reach
The house of each.

For Ares, gold-exchanger for the dead,
And balance-holder in the fight o' the spear,
Due-weight from Ilion sends —
What moves the tear on tear —
A charred scrap to the friends:
Filling with well-packed ashes every urn,
For man — that was — the sole return.
And they groan — praising much, the while,
Now this man as experienced in the strife,
Now that, fallen nobly on a slaughtered pile,
Become not — not his own — nor mother's wife.
But things there be, one barks,
When no man harks:
A surreptitious grief that's grudge
Against the Atreidai who first sought the judge.
But some there, round the rampart, have
To touch earth, each one his grave:
All fair-formed as at birth,
It hid them — what they have and hold — the hostile earth.

And big with anger goes the city's word,
And pays a debt by public curse incurred.
And ever with me — as about to hear
A something night-involved — remains my fear:
Sins of the many-slayers — not
Unwatching are to the gods:
The black Ereuis, at due periods —
Whoever gains the lot
Of fortune with no right —
Him, by life's strain and stress
Back-again-beaten from success,
They strike blind: and among the out-of-sight
For who has got to be, avail no might.
The being praised outrageously
Is grave, for at the eyes of such an one
Is launched, from Zeus, the thunder-stone.
Therefore do I decide
For so much and no more prosperity
Than of his envy passes unespied.
Neither a city-sacker would I be,
Nor life, myself by others captive, see.

A swift report has gone our city through.
From fire, the good-news messenger: if true,
Who knows? Or is it not a god-sent lie?
Who is so childish and deprived of sense
That, having, at announcements of the flame
Thus novel, felt his own heart fired thereby,
He then shall, at a change of evidence,
Be worsened just the same?
It is conspicuous in a woman's nature,
Before its view to take a grace for granted:
Too trustful, — on her boundary, usurpature
Is swiftly made:
But swiftly, too, decayed,
The glory perishes by woman vaunted.

Khu. Soon shall we know — of these light-bearing torches,
And besoons and exchanges, fire with fire —
If they are true, indeed, or if, dream-fashion,
This gladsome light came and deceived our judgment.

You herald from the shore I see, o'er-shadowed
With boughs of olive: dust, mad's thirsty brother,
Close neighbors on his garb, thus testify me
That neither voiceless, nor yet kindling for the Mountain-wood-flame, shall he explain by fire-smoke:
But either tell out more the joyance, speaking . . .
Word contrary to which, I ought but love it!
For may good be — to good that's knownappendage!

Cho. Whoever prays for aught else to this city
— May he himself reap fruit of his mind's error!

Herald. Ha, my forefathers' soil of earth Ar geian!

Thee, in this year's tenth light, am I returned to
Of many broken hopes, on one hope chasing:
For never prayed I, in this earth Argeian
Dying, to share my part in tomb the dearest.
Now, hail thou earth, and hail thou also, sun-light,
And Zeus, the country's lord, and king the Pe thian.

From bow no longer urging at us arrows!
Enough, beside Skamandros, cam'st thou ad
verse:
Now, contrary, be saviour thou and healer,
O king Apollo! And gods conquer-granting,
All — I invoke too, and my tutelary
Hermes, dear herald, heralds' veneration —
And Heroes our forsworners, — friendly, once more

The army to receive, the war-spear's savings!
Ha, mansions of my monarchs, roofs beloved,
And awful seats, and deities sun-fronting —
Receive with pomp your monarch, long time absent!

For he comes bringing light in night-time to ye.
In common with all these — king Agamemnon.
But kindly greet him — for clear shows your duty —
Who has dug under Troia with the mattock
Of Zeus the Avenger, whereby plains are out-ploughed,

Altars unrecognizable, and god's shrines,
And the whole land's seed thoroughly has per ished.
And such a yoke-strap having cast round Troia,
The elder king Atreides, happy man — he Comes to be honored, worthiest of what mortals now are. Nor Paris nor the accomplisher-city outranks their deed as more than they are done by:
For, in a suit for rape and theft found guilty, he missed of plunder and, in one destruction, fatherland, house and home has mowed to atoms:
Doths the Priamosid have paid twice over.
Cho. Hail! herald from the army of Achaians!
Her. I hail: — to die, will gainsay gods no longer!
Cho. Love of this fatherland did exercise thee?
Her. So that I weep, at least, with joy, my eyes full.
Cho. What of this gracious sickness were ye gainsayers?
Her. How now? instructed, I this speech shall master.
Cho. For those who loved you back, with longing stricken.
Her. This land, yearned for the yearning army, say'st thou?
Cho. So as to set me oft, from dark mind, groaning.
Her. Whence came this ill mind: hatred to the army?
Cho. Of old, I use, for mischief's physic, silence.
Her. And how, the chiefs away, did you fear any?
Cho. So that now — late thy word — much joy were — dying!
Her. For well have things been worked out: these, — in much time,
Some of them, one might say, had luck in falling,
While some were faulty: since who, gods excepted,
Goest, through the whole time of his life, ungnewing?
For labors should I tell of, and bad lodgments,
Narrow deckways ill-strewed, too, — what the day's woe
We did not groan at getting for our portion?
As for land-things, again on went more hatred!
Since beds were ours hard by the foemen's rumparts,
And, out of heaven and from the earth, the thiesdow
Dows kept a-spinkle, an abiding damage.
Of vestures, making hair a wild-beast matting,
Winter, too, if one told of it — bird-slaying —
Such as, unbearable, Idaian snow brought —
Or heat, when waveless, on its montide couches
Without a wind, the sea would slumber falling —
Why must one mourn those? O'er and gone is labor:
O'er and gone is it, even to those dead ones,
So that no more again they mind uprising.
Why must we tell in numbers those deprived ones,
And the live man be vexed with fate's fresh outbreak?
Rather, I bid full farewell to misfortunes!
For us, the left from out the Argelian army,
Her. There's no way I might say things false and pleasant
For friends to reap the fruits of through a long time.
Cho. How then, if, speaking good, things true thou chance on?
Her. For not well-hidden things become they,
and no one.
Cho. Whether forth—putting openly from Ilion,
Or did storm—wide woe—snatch him from the army?
Her. Like toppling bowman, thou hast touched the target,
And a long sorrow hast succinctly spoken.
Cho. Whether then, of him, as a live or dead man
Was the report by other sailors brieimed?
Her. Nobody knows so as to tell out clearly Excepting Helios who sustains earth's nature.
Cho. How say'st thou then, did storm the naval army
Attack and end, by the celestials' anger?
Her. It suits not to defile a day auspicious
With ill-omening speech: distinct each god's due:
And when a messenger with gloomy visage
To a city bears a fall'n host's woes—God ward off!—
One popular wound that happens to the city,
And many sacrificed from many households—
Men, scourged by that two-thronged whip Ares loves so,
Double spear-headed curse, bloody yoke-couple.
Of woes like these, doubtless, who'er comes weighted,
Him does it suit to sing the Erinnes' psain.
But who, of matters saved a glad-news-bringer,
Comes to a city in good estate rejoicing... .
How shall I mix good things with evil, telling
Of storm against the Achaios, urged by gods' wrath?
For they swore league, being arch-foes before that,
Fire and the sea: and plighted troth approved they,
Destroying the unhappy Argives army.
At night began the bad-wave-outbreak evils;
For, ships against each other Threbian breathes
Shattered: and those, butted at in a fury
By storm and typhoon, with surge rain-resounding,
Off they went, vanished, through a bad herd's whirling.
And, when returned the brilliant light of Helios,
We view the Aigaion sea on flower with corpses
Of men Achaioi and with naval ravage.
But us indeed, and ship, unhurt! the hull too,
Either some one outstole us or outprayed us—
Some god—no man it was the tiller touching.
And Fortune, savior, willing on our ship sat.
So as it neither had in harbor wave-surge
Nor ran around against a shore all rocky.
And then, the water-Haides having fled from
In the white day, not trusting to our fortune.
We chewed the cud in thoughts—this now sorrow
O' the army laboring and badly wounded.
And now—if any one of them is breathing—
They talk of us as having perished: why not?
And we—that they the same fate have, imagine.
May it be for the best! Meneleus, then,
Foremost among to come, expect thee!
If (that is) any ray o' the sun reports him
Living and seeing too—by Zeus' contrivings.
Not yet disposed to quite destroy the lineage—
Some hope is he shall come again to houses.
Having heard such things, know, thou trustest hearing!
Cho. Who may he have been that said thus wholly with exactitude—
(Was he some one whom we see not, by foretoldings of the future Guiding where in happy mood?—)
—Her with battle for a bridegroom, or all sides contention-woed.
Halena? Since—mark the suture!—
Ship's-Hell, Man's-Hell, City's-Hell,
From the delicately pompous curtains the
Forth, by favor of the gale
Of earth-born Zephyros did she sail.
Many shield-bearers, leaders of the pack,
Sailed too upon their track,
Theirs who had directed car,
Then visible no more,
To Simois' leaf-luxuriant shore—
For sake of strife all glee!
To Ilion Wrath, fulfilling her intent,
This marriage-care— the rightly named sent:
In after-time, for the tables' abuse
And that of the hearth-partaker Zeus,
Bringing to punishment
Those who honored with noisy throat
The honor of the bride, the hymnalex nets
Which did the kinsfolk then to singing urge.
But, learning a new hymn for that which was
The ancient city of Priamos
Groans probably a great and general dirge,
Denominating Paris
"The man that miserably marries:—"
She who, all the while before,
A life, that was a general dirge
For citizens' unhappy slaughter, bore.
And thus a man, by no milk's help,
Within his household reared a lion's whelp
That loved the test
In life's first festal stage:
Gentle as yet,
A true child-lover, and, to men of age,
A thing whereat pride warms;
And oft he had it in his arms
Like any new-born babe, bright-faced, to be Wagging its tail, at belly's strict command.
But in due time ungrown,
The custom of progenitors was shown:
For — thanks for sustenance repaying
They say with the joyful,—one outside on each, too,
As they force to a smile smileless faces.
But whoever is good at distinguishing races
In sheer of his flock—it is not for the eyes
Of a man to escape such a shepherd’s surprise,
As they seem, from a well-wishing mind,
In watery friendship to fawns and be kind.
Thou to me, then, indeed, sending an army for Helena’s sake,
(I will not conceal it,) wist—oh, by no help of the Muses!—depicted
Not well of thy midriff the rudder directing,— convicted
Of bringing a boldness they did not desire to
The men with existence at stake.
But now—from no outside of mind, nor unlovingly—gracious thou art
To those who have ended the labor, fulfilling their part;
And in time shalt thou know, by inquiry instructed,
Who of citizens justly, and who not to purpose,
the city conducted.
AGAMEMNON. First, indeed, Argos, and the gods, the local,
‘Tis right addressing—those with me the partners
In this return and right things done the city
Of Princes: gods who, from no tongue hearing
The rights o’ the cause, for Ilium’s fate man-slaught’rous
Into the bloody vase, not oscillating,
Put the vote-pebbles, while, o’ the rival vessel,
Hope rose up to the lip-edge: filled it was not.
By smoke the captured city is still conscious:
Até’s burnt-offerings live: and, dying with them,
The ash sends forth the fulsome blasts of riches.
Of these things, to the gods grace many-mindful
‘Tis right I render, since both nets outrageous We built them round with, and, for sake of woman,
It did the city to dust—the Argian monster,
The horse’s nestling, the shield-bearing people
That made a leap, at setting of the Pleiads.
And, vaulting o’er the tower, the raw-cleft-feeding
Lion latched up his fill of blood tyrannic.
I to the gods indeed prolonged this preface;
But—as for thy thought, I remember hearing
I say the same, and thou co-pleader hast me.
Since few of men this faculty is born with
To honor, without grudge, their friend successful.
For moody, on the heart, a poison seated
Its burden doubles to who gained the sickness:
By his own griefs he is himself made heavy,
And out-of-door prosperity seeing groans at.
Knowing, I’d call (for well have I experienced) “Fellowship’s mirror,” “phantom of a shadow.”
Those seeming to be mighty gracious to me:

THE AGAMEMNON OF AESCHYLUUS
While just Odysseus — he who sailed not willing —
When joined on, was to me the ready troarchorse.
This of him, whether dead or whether living, I say. — For other city and gods’ concernment —
Appointing common courts, in full assemblage
We will consult. And as for what holds seemly
How it may lasting stay well, must be counselled:
While what has need of medicines Paionian
We, either burning or else cutting kindly,
Will make endeavor to turn pain from sickness.
And now into the domes and homes by altar
Going, I to the gods first raise the right-hand—
They who, far sending, back again have brought me.
And Victory, since she followed, fixed remain she!

Klu. Men, cities, Argeians here, my worshippers,
I shall not shame me, consort-loving manners
To tell before you; for in time there dies off
The diffidence from people. Not from others
Learning, I of myself will tell the hard life
I bore settling as this man was ‘neath Ilion.
First: for a woman, from the male divided,
To sit at home alone, is monstrous evil—
Hearing the many rumors back-revenging:
And for now This to come, now That bring after
Woe, and still worse woe, bawling in the household!
And truly, if so many wounds had chanced on
My husband here, as homeward used to dribble
Report, he’s pierced more than a not to speak of!
While, were he dying (as the words abounded)
A triple-bodied Geron the Second,
Plenty above — for loads below I count not—
Of earth a three-share cloak he’d boast of taking;
Once or dying in each several figure!
Because of such-like rumors back-revenging.
Many the halters from my neck, above head,
Others than I loosed — loosed from neck by main force!
From this cause, sure, the boy stands not beside us —
Possessor of our troth-plights, thine and mine too —
As ought Orestes: be not thou astonished!
For, him brings up our well-disposed guest-captive
Strophiose the Phokian — ills that told on both sides
To me predicting — both of thee ‘neath Ilion
The danger, and if anarchy’s mob-uproar
Should overthrow thy council; since ’t is born with Mortals, whose’er has fallen, the more to kick him.
Such an excuse, I think, no cunning carries!
As for myself — why, of my wails the rushing
Fountains are dried up: not in them a drop more!

And in my late-to-bed eyes I have damage
Bewailing what concerned thee, these tendholdings Forever unattended to. In dreams — why, Beneath the light wing-beats o’ the gas, I woke up — not me.

As he went buzzing — sorrow that consumed thee
Seeing, that filled more than their fellow-daytime.
Now, all this having suffered, from soul girt-free
I would style this man here the dog of the stables,
The sacred forestay of the ship, the high roof’s
Ground-prop, son sole-begotten to his father.
— Ay, land appearing to the sailors past hope.
Loveliest day to see after a tempest.
To the wayfaring one athirst a well-spring,
— The joy, in short, of ‘scaping all that’s fatal!
I judge him worth addresses such as these — Envy stand off! — for many those old evils
We underwent. And now, to me — dear host ship! —
Dismount thou from this car, not earth’s setting
The foot of thine, O king, that’s Ilion’s spoke! Slave-maidens, why tarry? — whose the task allotted
To strew the soil o’ the earth with carpet-spreadings.
Immediately be purple-strewn the pathway.
So that to home unhoped may lend him —
Justice! As for the rest, care shall — by sleep ensnared —
Dispose things — justly (gods to aid!) appointed.
Aga. Offspring of Leda, of my household
Suitably to my absence hast thou spoketh,
For long the speech thou didst outstretch! But aptly
To praise — from others ought to go this fame.
And for me rest, — not me, in woman’s fashion.
Mollify, nor — as mode of barbarous man is —
To me gape forth a groundward-falling clause!
Nor, strewling it with garments, make my passage
Envious! Gods, sure, with these behooves we honor:
But, for a mortal on these varied beauties
To walk — to me, indeed, is nowise fear-free.
I say — as man, not god, to me do homage!
Apart from foot-mats both and varied vestures,
Renown is loud, and — not to lose one’s assets,
God’s greatest gift: Behooves we him call happy
Who has brought life to end in loved wellbeing.
If all things I might manage thus — brave man, I!
Klu. Come now, this say, nor feign a feeling to me!
Aga. With feeling, know indeed, I do not tamper!
Klu. Vowed’st thou to the gods, in fear, to act thus?
Aga. If any, I well know resolve I outspake.
Klu. What think'st thou Priamoe had done,
      thus victor?

Aga. On varied vests — I do think — he had passed.

Klu. Then, do not, struck with awe at human censure...

Aga. Well, popular mob-outcry much avails too!

Klu. Ay, but the unenvied is not the much envied.

Aga. Sure, 'tis no woman's part to long for battle!

Klu. Why, to the prosperous, even suits a beating!

Aga. What — thou this beating us in war dost prize too?

Klu. Persuade thee! power, for once, grant me — and will I

Aga. But if this seem so to thee — shoes, let some one Loose under — quick — foot's serviceable carriage!

And me, on these sea-products walking, may no
      Grudge from a distance, from the god's eye, strike at!

For great shame were my strewment-spoiling — riches!

Spoilng with feet, and silver-purchased textures!

Of these things, thus then. But this female-stranger
      Tenderly take inside! Who conquers mildly
God, from afar, benignantly regardeth.
For, willing, no one wears a yoke that's serviceable:
And she, of many valuable, outpicked
      The flower, the army's gift, myself has followed.

So — since to hear thee, I am brought about thus —
      I go into the palace — purple treading.

Klu. There is the sea — and what man shall exhaust it?

Feeding much purple's worth — its weight-infinitesimal

Dye, ever fresh and fresh, our garments' tinture;
At home, such wealth, the king, we begin — by gods' help
With having, and to lack, the household knows not.

Of many garments had I vowed a treading
(In oracles if fore-enjoined the household)
Of this dear soul the safe-return-price scheming!
For, root existing, foliage goes up houses,
        Overshadowing shadow against Socrates dog-star;
And, thou returning to the hearth domestic,
Warmth, yes, in winter dost thou show returning.

And when, too, Zeus works, from the green
        Grape acid,
Wine — then, already, cool in houses cometh
        The perfect man his home perambulating!
Zeus, Zeus Perfector, these my prayers perfect thou!

Thy care be mine — of things thou mayst make perfect!

Cho. Wherefore to me, this fear —

Groundedly stationed here
Froniting my heart, the portent-watcher — fits she?
Wherefore should prophet-play
The uncalled and unpaid lay.
Nor — having spat forth fear, like bad dreams — sits she
On the mind's throne beloved — well-suasive Boldness?
For time, since, by a throw of all the hands,
The boat's stern-cables touched the sands,
Has passed from youth to oldness, —
When under Ilion rushed the ship-borne bands.

And from my eyes I learn —
Being myself my witness — their return.
Yet, all the same, without a lyre, my soul,
Itself its teacher too, chants from within
Krents' dirge, not having now the whole
Of Hope's dear boldness: nor my inwards sin —
The heart that's rolled in whirls against the mind
Justly pressageful of a fate behind.
But I pray — things false, from my hope, may fall
Into the fate that's not-fulfilled-at-all!

Especially at least, of health that's great
The term's insatiable: for, its weight
— A neighbor, with a common wall between —
Ever will sickness lean;
And destiny, her course pursuing straight,
Has struck, me, 's ship against a reef unseen.
Now, when a portion, rather than the treasure,
Fear casts from ailing, with peril in right measure,
Its has not sunk — the universal freight,
(With misery freighted over-full,)
Nor has fear whelmed the hull.
Then too the gift of Zeus,
Two-handedly profuse,
Even from the furrows' yield for yearly use
Has done away with famine, the disease;
But blood of man to earth once falling: — deadly black,

In times ere these, —
Who may, by singing spells, call back?
Zeus had not else stopped one who rightly knew
The way to bring the dead again.
But, did not an appointed Fate constrain
The Fate from gods, to bear no more than due,
My heart, outstripping what tongue utters,
Would have all out: which now, in darkness, mutters

Moodyly grieved, nor ever hopes to find
How she a word in season may unwind
From out the enkindling mind.

Klu. Take thyself in, thou too — I say, Kasandra!

Since Zeus — not angrily — in household placed thee
Partaker of hand-sprinklings, with the many Slaves stationed, his the Owner's altar close to.
Descend from out this car, nor be high-minded!
And truly they do say Alkmene's child once
Bore being sold, slaves' barley-break his living.
If, then, necessity of this lot o'urbalance,
Much is the favor of old-worthy masters:
For those who, never hoping, made fine harvest
Are harsh to slaves in all things, beyond measure.
Thou hast — with us — such usage as law warrants.

Cho. To thee it was, she paused plain speech from speaking.
Being inside the fatal nets — obeying,
Thou mayst obey: but thou mayst disobey too!

Kasu. Why, if she is not, in the swallow’s fashion,
Possessed of voice that's unknown and barbaric,
I, with speech — speaking in mind's scope — persuade her.

Cho. Follow! The best — as things now stand
— she speaks of.
Obey thou, leaving this thy ear-enthronement!

Kasu. Well, with this thing at door, for me no leisure
To waste time: as concerns the earthy midی navel-dross.
Already stand the sheep for fireside slaying
By those who never hoped to have such favor.
If thou, then, aught of this wilt do, delay not!
But if thou, being witless, tak’st no word in,
Speak thou, instead of voice, with hand as Kars
Do lo!

Cho. She seems a plain interpreter in need of,
The stranger! and her way — a beast's new-captured!

Kasu. Why, she is mad, sure, — hears her own bad senses, —
Who, when she comes, leaving a town new-captured,
Yet knows not how to bear the bit o' the bridle
Before she has out-frothed her bloody fierceness.
Not I — throwing away more words — will shamed be!

Cho. But I — for I compassionate, — will chafe not.
Come, O unhappy one, this car vacating,
Yielding to this necessity, prove yoke's use!

Kasandra. Otototo, Gods, Earth —
Apollon, Apollon!

Cho. Why didst thou “ototoi” concerning Loxias?
Since he is none such as to suit a mourner.

Kasu. Otototoi, Gods, Earth, —
Apollon, Apollon!

Cho. Ill-boding here again the god invokes she — Nowise empowered in woes to stand by helpful.

Kasu. Apollon, Apollon,
Guard of the ways, my destroyer!
For thou hast quite, this second time, destroyed me.

Cho. To prophesy she seems of her own evils:
Remains the god-gift to the slave-soul present.

Kasu. Apollon, Apollon,
Guard of the ways, my destroyer!
Ha, whither hast thou led me? to what roof now?

Cho. To the Ateidae's roof: if this thou know'st not,
I tell it thee, nor this wilt thou call falsehood.

Kasu. How! how!

Cho. God-hated ones! Of many a crime it knew —
Self-slaying evils, halters too:
Man's shambles, blood-besprinkler of the ground!

Cho. She seems to be good-nosed, the strange:
dog-like.
She smelt indeed the victims she will find there.

Kasu. How! how!
By the witnesses here I am certain now!
These children bewailing their slaughters —
flesh dressed in the fire
And devoured by their sire!

Cho. Ay, we have heard of thy soothsaying; glory,

Doubtless: but prophets none are we in seest of!

Kasu. Ah, gods, what ever does she meditate?

What this new anguish great?
Great in the house here she meditates ill
Such as friends cannot bear, cannot cure is:
and still

Off stands all Resistance

Afar in the distance!

Cho. Of these I witless am — these prophecies—

But those I knew: for the whole city bruise them.

Kasu. Ah, unhappy one, this thou commis-matest?
Thy haughty, thy bed's common guest.
In the bath having brightened. . . . How shall
I declare
Consummation? It soon will be there:
For hand after hand she outstretches, —
At life as she reaches!

Cho. Nor yet I've gone with thee! for — after riddles —

Now, in blind oracles, I feel resourcesless.

Kasu. Eh, eh, papai, papai,
What this, I espy?
Some net of Haides undoubtedly!
Nay, rather, the snare
Is she who has share
In his bed, who takes part in the murder there:

But may a revolt —
Unceasing assault —

On the face, raise a shout
Sacrificial, about
A victim — by stoning —

For murder atoning!

Cho. What this Erinus which i' the house
thou callest
To raise her cry? Not me thy word enlightens:
To my heart has run
A drop of the coccus-dye:
Which makes for those
On earth by the spear that lie,
A common close
With life’s descending sun.

Swift is the curse begun!

Kasu. How! how!

See — see quick!

Keep the bull from the now!

In the vesture she catching him, strikes him

With the black-horned trick,
And he falls into the watery vase!

Of the craft-killing caldron I tell thee the case:

Cho. I would not boast to be a topping crisis

Of oracles: but to some sort of evil
I liken these. From oracles, what good speech
To mortals, beside, is sent?
THE AGAMEMNON OF ÆSCHYLUS

843

It comes of their evils: these arts word-abounding that sing the event
Bring the fear't in their office to teach.
Kas. Ah me, ah me—
Of me unhappy, evil-destined fortunes!
For I bewail my proper woe
As, mine with his, all into one I throw.
Why hast thou hither me unhappy brought?
—Unhappy doth I should die with him—for naught?
What else was sought?
Cho. Thou art some mind-mazed creature, god-possessed:
And all about thyself dost wail
A lay—no lay!
Like some brown nightingale
Insatiable of noise, who—well away!—
From her unhappy breast
Keeps moaning Itus, Itus, and his life
With evils, flourishing on each side, rife.
Kas. Ah me, ah me,
The fate o' the nightingale, the clear resounder!
For a body wing-borne have the gods cast round her,
And sweet existence, from misfortunes free:
But myself remain a sundering
With spear, the two-edged thing!
Cho. Whence hast thou this on-rushing god Involving pain
And spaces in vain?
For, things that terrify,
With changing, unintelligible cry
Thou strikst up in tune, yet all the while
After that Orthian style!
Whence hast thou limits to the oracular road,
That evils bode?
Kas. Ah me, the nuptials, the nuptials of Paris, the deadly to friends!
Ah me, of Skamandros the draught,
Paternal! There once, to these ends,
On thy banks was I brought,
The unhappy! And now, by Kokutos and Acheron's shore
I shall soon be, it seems, these my oracles
Singing once more!
Cho. Why this word, plain too much,
Hast thou uttered? A babe might learn of such!
I am struck with a bloody bite—here under—
At the fate woe-wreaking
Of thee shrill-shrieking:
To me who hear—a wonder!
Kas. Ah me, the toils—the toils of the city
The wholly destroyed: ah, pity,
Of the sacrificing my father made
In the ramparts' aid—
Much slaughter of grass-fed flocks—that Afforded no cure
That the city should not, as it does now, the Burthen endure!
But I, with the soul on fire,
Soon to the earth shall cast me and expire!
Cho. To things, on the former consequent,
Again hast thou given vent:
And 'tis some evil-meaning fiend doth move thee,
Heavily falling from above thee,
To melodize thy sorrows—else, in singing,
Calamitous, death-bringing!
And of all this the end
I am without resource to apprehend.
Kas. Well then, the oracle from veils no longer
Shall be outlookting, like a bride new-married:
But bright it seems, against the sun's risings Breathing, to penetrate thee: so as, wave-like,
To wash against the rays a wo much greater Than this. I will no longer teach by riddles.
And witness, running with me, that of evils
Done long ago, I nosing track the footstep!
For, this same roof here—never quits a Choros
One-voiced, not well-tuned since no "well" it utter:
And truly having drunk, to get more courage,
Man's blood—the Komos keeps within the household
—Hard to be sent outside—of sister Furies:
They hymn their hymn—within the house close sitting—
The first beginning curse: in turn spit forth at
The Brother's bed, to him who spurned it hostile.
Have I missed aught, or hit I like a bowman?
False prophet am I,—knock at doors, a babbler?
Henceforward witness, swearing now, I know not
By other's word the old sins of this household!
Cho. And how should each, bond honorably binding, Become thy cure? No less I wonder at thee
—That thou, beyond sea reared, a strange-tongued city
Shouldst hit in speaking, just as if thou stood'st by!
Kas. Prophet Apollon put me in this office.
Cho. What, even though a god, with longing Smitten?
Kas. At first, indeed, shame was to me to say this.
Cho. For, more relaxed grows every one who fares well.
Kas. But he was athlete to me—huge grace breathing!
Cho. Well, to the work of children, went ye Law's way?
Kas. Having consented, I played false to Loxias.
Cho. Already when the wits inspired posessed of?
Kas. Already townsmen all their woes I foretold.
Cho. How wast thou then unhurt by Loxias' anger?
Kas. I no one aught persuaded, when I Signified thus.
Cho. To us, at least, now sooth to say thou seemest.
Kas. Hallow, hallow, ah, evils!
Again, straightforward foresight's fearful labor
Whirls me, distracting with prehensie last-lays!
Behold ye those there, in the household seated,—
Young ones,—of dreams approaching to the figures?
Children, as if they died by their beloveds—
Hands they have filled with flesh, the meal domosty;
Entrainls and vitals both, most piteous bursten,
Plain they are holding!—which their father tasted!
For this, I say, plans punishment a certain
Lion ignoble, on the bed that wallows,
House-guard (ah, me!) to the returning master
— Mine, since to bear the slavish yoke behooves me!
The ships’ commander, Ilion’s desolator,
Knows not what things the tongue of the lewd
child-dog,
Speaking, outspreading, shiny-souled, in fashion
Of Até hid, will reach to, by ill fortune!
Such things she dares — the female, the male’s slayer!
She is . . . how calling her the hateful bitener?
May I hit the mark? Some amphibains —
Skulla
Housing in rocks, of mariners the mischief,
Revelling Haides’ mother, — curse, no trace
with,
Breathing at friends! How piously she shouted,
The all-courageous, as at turn of battle!
She seems to joy at the back-bringing safety!
Of this, too, if I naught persuade, all’s one!
Why?
What is to be will come! And soon thou, present,
“True prophet all too much!” wilt pitying style me!
Cho. Thvestes’ feast, indeed, on flesh of beast,
I went with, and I shuddered. Fear too holds
me
Listing what ’s true as life, nowise out-imaged!
Kas. I say, thou Agamemnon’s fate shalt look on!
Cho. Speak good words, O unhappy! Set mouth sleeping!
Kas. But Paian stands in no stead to the speech here.
Cho. Nay, if the thing be near: but never be it!
Kas. Thou, indeed, prayest: they to kill are busy!
Cho. Of what man is it ministered, this sorrow?
Kas. There again, wide thou look’st of my foretellings.
Cho. For, the fuller’s scheme I have not gone with.
Kas. And yet too well I know the speech
Hellenic.
Cho. For Puthian oracles, thy speech, and hard too!
Kas. Papai: what fire this! and it comes upon me!
Otooi, Lukeion Apollon, ah me — me!
She, the two-footed lioness that sleeps with
The wild in absence of the generous lion,
Kills me the unhappy one: and as a poison
Brewing, to put my price too in the anger,
She vows, against her mate this weapon whisting
To part him back the bringing me, vast daughter.
Why keep then these things to make as laughed at,
Both wands and, round my neck, ordalial kettles?
Thee, at least, ere my own fate will I ruin:
Go, to perdition falling! Boons except we —
Some other Até in my stead make wealthy!
See there — himself, Apollon stripping from
The oracular garment! having looked upon — Even in these adornments, laugh’d by friends at.
As good as foes, i’ the balance weighed: and vainly —
For, called erased stroller, — as I had been sagacious,
Beggarly unhappy, starved to death, — I here is.
And now the Prophet — prophet me undoing.
Has led away to these so deadly fortunes!
Instead of my sire’s altar, waits the hack-block
She struck with first warm bloody sacrifices!
Yet nowise unavenged of gods will death be:
For there shall come another, our avenger.
The mother-slaying scion, father’s doomless:
Fugitive, wanderer, from this land an exile,
Back shall he come, — for friends, copes these curses!
For there is sworn a great oath from the gods
that
Him shall bring bither his fallen sire’s pretux-
tion.
Why make I then, like an indweller, moaning?
Sincere at the first I foresaw Ilion’s city
Suffering as it has suffered: and who took it.
Thus by the judgment of the gods are faring.
I go, will suffer, will submit to dying!
But, Haides’ gates — these same I call, I speak to,
And pray that on an opportune blow chancing
Without a struggle, — blood the calm death bringing
In easy outflow, — I this eye may close up!
Cho. O much unhappy, but, again, much learned
Woman, long hast thou outstretched! But if truly Thou knowest thine own fate, how comest that like to
A god-led steer, to altar bold thou treadest?
Kas. There’s no avoidance, — strangers. as:
Some time more!
Cho. He last is, anyhow, by time advantaged.
Kas. It comes, the day: I shall by sight again little.
Cho. But know thou patient art from thy brave spirit!
Kas. Such things hears no one of the happy fortuned.
Cho. But gloriously to die — for man is grace, sure!
Kas. Ah, sire, for thee and for thy noble
Cho. But what thing is it? What fear turns thee backwards?
Cho. 1. I, in the first place, my opinion tell you:
—To cite the townsmen, by help-cry, to house
here.
Cho. 2. To me, it seems we ought to fall upon them
At quickest—prove the fact by sword fresh-flowing!
Cho. 3. And I, of such opinion the partaker, Vote—to do something: not to wait— the main point!
Cho. 4. 'Tis plain to see: for they prelude as though of
A tyranny the signs they gave the city.
Cho. 5. For we waste time; while they, — this waiting's glory
Treading to ground,—allow the hand no slumber.
Cho. 6. I know not—changing on some plan
—to tell it:
’T is for the doer to plan of the deed also.
Cho. 7. And I am such another: since I'm schemeseal
How to raise up again by words—a dead man!
Cho. 8. What, and, protracting life, shall we give way thus
To the disgracers of our home, these rulers?
Cho. 9. Why, 'tis unbearable: but to die is better:
For death than tyranny is the riper finish!
Cho. 10. What, by the testifying “Ah me”
of him,
Shall we prognosticate the man as perished?
Cho. 11. We must quite know ere speak these things concerning
For to conjecture and “Ah me” are two things.
Cho. 12. This same to praise I from all sides abound in—
Clearly to know, Atreides, what he's doing!
Klit. Much having been before to purpose spoken,
The opposite to say I shall not shamed be:
For how should one, to enemies,—in semblance,
Friends,—enmity proposing,—sorrow's net-frame
Enclose, a height superior to outleaping?
To me, indeed, this struggle of old—not mindless
Of an old victory — came: with time, I grant
you!
I stand where I have struck, things once accomplished:
And so have done,—and this deny I shall not,
As that his fate was nor to fly nor ward off.
A wrap-round with no outlet, as for fishes,
I fense about him—the rich woe of the garment:
I strike him twice, and in a double “Ah-
me!”
He let his limbs go—there! And to him, fallen,
The third blow add I, giving,—of Belo-
ground
Zeus, guardian of the dead—the votive favor.
Thus in the mind of him he rages, falling,
And blowing forth a brisk blood-splatter, strikes me
With the dark drop of slaughterous dew,— rejoicing
No less than, at the god-given dewy-comfort,
The sweat-stuff in its birth-throes from the calyx.
Since so these things are,—Argives, my reverend, here,
Ye may rejoice—if ye rejoice: but I—boast!
If it were on corpse to pour libation,
That would be right—right over and above, too!
The cup of evils in the house he, having Filled with such curses, himself coming drinks of.
Cho. We wonder at thy tongue: since bold-mouthed truly
Is she who in such speech boasts o'er her husband!
Klu. Ye test me as I were a witless woman: But I—with heart intrepid—to you knowers Say (and thou—if thou wilt or praise or blame me, Comes to the same)—this man is Agamemnon,
My husband, dead, the work of the right hand here,
Ay, of a just artificer: so things are.
Cho. What evil, O woman, food or drink, earth-bred
Or sent from the flowing sea,
Of such having fees
Didst thou set on thee
And popular cries
Of a curse on thy head?
Off thou hast thrown him, off hast cast
The man from the city: but Off from the city thyself shalt be Cut—to the citizens
A hate immense!
Klu. Now, indeed, thou adjudgest exile to me,
And citizens' hate, and to have popular curses:
Nothing of this against the man here bringing,
Who, no more awe-checked than 't were a beast's fate,—
With sheep abundant in the well-fleeced grazeflocks,—
Sacrificed his child,—dearest fruit of travail
To me,—as song-spell against Thracian blowings.
Not him did it behave thee hence to banish
—Pollution's penalty? But hearing my deeds
Justice rough thou art! Now, this I tell thee:
To threaten thus—me, one prepared to have thee
(On like conditions, thy hand conquering) o'er me
Rule: but if God the opposite ordain us,
Thou shalt learn—late taught, certes—to be

Cho. Greatly-intending thou art:
Much-mindful, too, hast thou cried
(Since thy mind, with its slaughter-outpouring part,
Is frantic) that over the eyes, a patch
Of blood—with blood to match
Is plain for a pride!
Yet still, bereft of friends, thy fate
Is—blow with blow to expiate!
Klu. And this thou hearest—of my ask, my warrant!
By who fulfilled things for my daughter, Justice,
Até, Erinus,—by whose help I slew him,—
Not mine the fancy—Fear will tread my palace
So long as on my heart there burns a fire.
Aigisthos as before well-caring for me;
Since he to me is shield, no small, of boldness.
Here does he lie—outrager of this female,
Dainty of all the Chryseids under Illos;
And she,—the captive, the soothsayer also
And conchmate of this man, oracle-speaker.
Faithful bedfellow,—ay, the sailors' bechees
They wore in common, nor unpunished did s.
Since he is—thus! While, as for her,—sweath
Her last last having chanted,—dying wailing
She lies,—to him, a sweetheart: me as brought to My bed's by-nicetly, the whet of dalliance.
Cho. Alas, that some Fate would come
Upon us in quickness—
Neither much sickness
Neither bed-keeping—
And bear unended sleeping,
Now that subdued
Is our keeper, the kindest of mood:
Having borne, for a woman's sake, much strife—
By a woman he withered from life!
Ah me!
Law-breaking Helens who, one,
Hast many, so many souls undone
'Neath Troia! and now the consummated
Much-memorable curse
Hast thou made flower-forth, red
With the blood no rains disperse,
That which was then in the House—
Strife all-sustaining, the woe of a spouse.
Klu. Nowise, of death the fate—
Burdened by these things—supplicate!
Nor on Helens turn thy wrath
As the man-destroyer, as "she who hath.
Being but one,
Many and many a soul undone
Of the men, the Danais"—
And wrought immense annoy!
Cho. Daimon, who fallest
Upon this household and the double-raced
Tantalai, a rule, minded like theirs displaced.
Thou rulest me with, now,
Whose heart thou gallest!
And on the body, like a hateful crow,
Stationed, all out of tune, his chant to chant:
Dost Something vaunt!
Klu. Now, of a truth, hast thou set wrigh't
Thy mouth's opinion,—
Naming the Sprite,
The triply-gross,
O'er the race that has dominion:
For through him it is that Eros
THE AGAMEMNON OF AESCHYLUS

847

The carnage-licker
In the belly is bred: ere ended quite
Is the elder three — new ichor!
Chor. Certainly, not of man.
And heavy of wrath, the Sprite
Thou tellest of, in the palace (Woe, woe! —
— An evil tale of a fate
By Até’s malice
Rendered insatiate!
Oh, oh,—
King, king, how shall I beweep thee?
From friendly soul what else may say?
Thou liest where webs of the spider o’ersweep thee.
In impious death, life breathing away.
O me — me!
This couch, not free!
By a slavish death subdued thou art,
From the hand, by the two-edged dart.
Kln. Thou boastest this deed to be mine:
But leave off styling me
“The Agamemnonian woman 11"!
For, showing himself in sign
Of the spouse of the corpse thou dost see,
Did the ancient bitter avenging-ghost
Of Ares, savage, hate —
Pay the man here as price —
A full-grown for the young one’s sacrifice.
Chor. That no cause, indeed, of this killing art thou,
Who shall be witness-bearer? —
How shall he bear it — how?
But the sire’s avenging-ghost might be in the deed a sharer.
He is forced on and on
By the kin-born flowing of blood,
— Black Ares: to where, having gone,
He shall leave off, flowing done,
At the frozen-child’s flesh food.
King, king, how shall I beweep thee!
From friendly soul what else may say?
Thou liest where webs of the spider o’ersweep thee.
In impious death, life breathing away.
Oh, me — me!
This couch not free!
By a slavish death subdued thou art,
From the hand, by the two-edged dart.
Chor. No death "untimely free"
Do I think this man’s to be:
For did not himself a slavish curse
To his household decreed?
But the soul of him, myself did nurse —
That much-bewailed Iphigenia, he
Having done well by — and as well, nor worse,
Been done to, — let him not in Haides loudly
Bear himself proudly!
Being by sword-destroying death amerced
For that sword’s punishment himself inflicted first.
Chor. I at a loss am left —
Of a feasible scheme of mind bereft —
Where I may turn: for the house is falling:
I fear the bloody crash of the rain
That ruines the roof as it bursts amain:
The warning-drop
Has come to a stop.
Destiny doth Justice whet
For other deed of hurt, on other whetstones yet.
Woe, earth, earth — would thou hadst taken me
Ere I saw the man I see,
On the pallet-bed
Of the silver-sided bath-vase, dead!
Who is it shall bury him, who Sing his dirge? Can it be true
That thou wilt dare this same to do —
Having slain thy husband, thine own,
To make his funeral mean:
And for the soul of him, in place
Of his mighty deeds, a graceless grace
To wickedly institute? By whom Shall the tale of praise o’er the tomb
At the god-like man be sent —
From the truth of his mind as he toils intent?
Kln. It belongs not to thee to declare
This object of care!
By us did he fall — down there!
Did he die — down there! and down, no less,
We will bury him there, and not beneath
The walls of the household over his death:
But Iphigenia, — with kindliness, —
His daughter, — as the case requires,
Fasing him full, at the rapid-flowing
Passage of Ganges, shall — both hands throwing
Around him — kiss that kindest of sire’s!
Chor. This blame comes in the place of blame:
Hard battle it is to judge each claim.
"He is borne away who bears away:
And the killer has all to say."
And this remaineth while Zeus is remaining,
"The doer shall suffer in time — for, such his ordaining.
Who may cast out of the House its cursed brood?
The race is to Até glued!
Kln. Thou hast gone into this oracle
With a true result. For me, then, — I will
— To the Daimon of the Pleisthenidai
Making an oath — with all these things comply Hard as they are to bear. For the rest —
Going from out this House, a guest,
May he wear some other family
To naught, with the deaths of kin by kin!
And — keeping a little part of my goods —
Who I am I contented in Having expelled from the royal House
These frenzied modes.
The mutually-murderous.
Aigisthos. O light propitious of day justice-bringing!
I may say truly, now, that men’s avengers,
The gods from high, of earth behold the sorrowrows —
Seeing, as I have, i’ the spun robes of the Erinues,
This man here lying, — sight to me how pleasant! —
His father’s hands’ contrivances repaying.
For Atreus, this land’s lord, of this man father,
Theuestes, my own father — to speak clearly —
His brother too, — being i’ the rule contested, —
Drove forth to exile from both town and household:
And, coming back, to the hearth turned, a suppliant,
Wretched Thoetes found the fate assured him
—Not to die, bloodying his paternal threshold
Just here: but host-wise this man’s impious father
Atreus, soul-keenly more than kindly,—seeming
To joyous hold a flesh-day,—to my father
Served up a meal, the flesh of his own children.
The feet indeed and the hands’ top divisions
He hid, high up and isolated sitting:
But, their unsavoring parts in ignorance taking,
He forthwith eats food—as thou seest—perdition
To the race: and then,’ware of the deed illomened,
He shrieked O!—falls back, vomiting, from the carcase.
And fate on the Pelopidae past bearing
He prays down—putting in his curse together
The kicking down o’ the feast—that so might perish
The race of Pleisthenes entire: and thences is That it is given thee to see this man prostrate.
And I was rightly of this slaughter stichmen:
Since me,—being third from ten,—with my poor father
He drives out—being then a babe in swathing-bands:
But, grown up, back again has justice brought me:
And of this man I got hold—being without-doors—
Fitting together the whole scheme of ill-will.
So, sweet in fine, even to die were to me,
Seeing the I have, this man i’ the toils of justice!
Cho. Aigisthœs, arrogance in ill I love not.
Dost thou say—willing, thou didst kill the man here;
And, alone, plot this lamentable slaughter?
I say—they bound in justice will escape not
The people’s throwing—know that!—stones and curses!
Aig. Thou such things soundest—seated at the lower Oarage to those who rule at the ship’s mid-bench?
Thou shalt know, being old, how heavy is teaching
To one of the like age—hidden be modest!
But chains and old age and the pangs of fasting
Stand out before all else in teaching—prophets
At souls’-cure! Dost not, seeing aught, see this too?
Against goads kick not, lest tript-up thou suffer!
Cho. Woman, thou,—of him coming new from battle
Houseguard—thy husband’s bed the while disgracing,—
For the Army-leader didst thou plan this fate there?
Aig. These words too are of groans the prime-begetters!
Truly a tongue opposed to Orpheus hast thou:

For he led all things by his voice’s grace-drawn,
But thou, upstirring them by these wild yelpings,
Wilt lead them! Forcéd, thou wilt appear the tamer!
Cho. So—thou shalt be my king thus of the Argives—
Who, not when for this man his fate the plannedest,
Darest to do this deed—thyself the slayer!
Aig. For, to deceive him was the wife’s part,
certain:
I was looked after—foe, ay, old-begotten!
But out of this man’s wealth will I endeavor
To rule the citizens: and the no-man-minder—
Him will I heavily yokes—by no mere trace-horse,
A corned-up colt! but that bad friend in dear need.
Famin’d its housemate, shall behold him gentle
Cho. Why then, this man here, from coward spirit, Didst not thou slay thyself? But,—helped
—a woman,
The country’s pest, and that of gods o’ the country,
Killed him! Orestes, where may he see light now?
That coming hither back, with gracious fortune,
Of both these he may be the all-conqueror: slayer?
Aig. But since this to do thou thinkest—and not talk—thou soon shalt know! Up then, comrades dear! the proper thing to do—not distant this!
Cho. Up then! hilt to hold, his sword let every one aught dispose!
Aig. Ay, but I myself too, hilt in hold, do not refuse to die!
Cho. Thou wilt die, thou say’st, to who accept it. We the chance demand!
Kly. Nowise, O beloved of men, may we do other ills!
To have reap’d away these, even, is a harvest much to me!
Go, both thou and these the old men, to the homes appointed each,
Ere ye suffer! It behoved one do these things just as we did:
And if of these troubles, there should be enough—we may asemble
—By the Daimon’s heavy heel unfortunately striken ones!
So a woman’s counsel hath it—if one judge it learning-worth.
Aig. But to think that these at me the idle tongue should thus o’erblow,
And throw out such words—the Daimon’s power experimenting on—
And, of modest knowledge missing,—me, the ruler,

Cho. Ne’er may this befall Argives—wicked man to fawn before!
Aig. Naybow, in after-days, will I, yea I, be at thee yet!
Cho. Not if hither should the Daimon make Orestes straightway come!
Miss A. EGERTON-SMITH was, at the time her death, one of Browning’s oldest women friends. "He first met her," says Mrs. Sutherland Orr, "as a young woman in Florence when she was visiting there; and the love for and sympathy in music soon asserted itself as a sad of sympathy between them. They did not, however, see much of each other till he finally left Italy, and she also had made her home in London... Mr. Browning was one of the very few persons whose society she cared to cultivate; and for many years the common musical interest took the practical, and for both of them convenient, form, of their going to concerts together." Browning was at La Saisiaz, under the Salève, when Miss Egerton-Smith, who was also domiciled there, died suddenly in the autumn of 1877, and it was after the shock of her loss that he composed the poem to which he gave the title of their summer resort. The poem is dated November 9, 1877.

GOOD, to forgive;
Best, to forget!
Living, we fret;
Dying, we live.
Fretless and free,
Soul, clap thy pinion!
Earth have dominion,
Body, o’er thee!
Wander at will,
Day after day,—
Wander away,
Wandering still,—
Soul that cannot soar!
Body may alumber:
Body shallumber
Soul-flight no more.
Waft of soul’s wing!
What lies above?
Sunshines and Love,
Skyblue and Spring!
Body hides—where?
Ferns of all feather,
Mosses and heather,
Yours be the care!

LA SAISIAZ

A. E. S. September 14, 1877.

GED and done: at last I stand upon the summit; Dear and True!
ugly dared and done; the climbing both of us were bound to do, itty feat and yet prodigious: every side my glance was bent

O’er the grandeur and the beauty lavished through the whole ascent,
Ledge by ledge, out broke new marvels, now minute and now immense:
Earth’s most exquisite disclosure, heaven’s own God in evidence!
And no berry in its hiding, no blue space in its outspread,
Plaused to escape my footstep, challenged my emerging head,
(As I climbed or paused from climbing, now o’erbranched by shrub and tree,
Now built round by rock and boulder, now at just a turn set free, Stationed face to face with—Nature? rather with Infinitude,)
—No revelation of them all, as singly I my path pursued,
But a bitter touched its sweetness, for the thought stung "Even so Both of us had loved and wondered just the same, five days ago!"
Five short days, sufficient hardly to entice, from out its den
Splintered in the slab, this pink perfection of the cyclamen;
Scarce enough to heal and coat with amber gum the aloe-tree’s gash,
Bronze the clustered wilding apple, redder ripe the mountain-ash:
Yet of might to place between us—Oh the barrier! You Profound Shrinks beside it, proves a pin-point: barrier this, without a bound!
Boundless though it be, I reach you: somehow seem to have you there —Who are there. Yes, there you dwell now, plain the four low walls appear;
Those are vineyards, they enclose from; and the little spire which points
That's Collonge, henceforth your dwelling.
All the same, how'er disjointed
Past from present, no less certain you are here,
not there: have dared,
Done the feat of mountain-climbing,—five days since, we both prepared.
Daring, doing, arm in arm, if other help should haply fail.
For you asked, as forth we sallied to see sunset
from the vale,
"Why not try for once the mountain,—take a foot path, watch by watch,
Sight and sound, some unconsidered fragment of the hoarded wealth?
Six weeks at its base, yet never once have we together won
Sight or sound by honest climbing: let us two have dared and done.
Just so much of twilight journey as may prove to-morrow's jaunt.
Not the only mode of wayfare—wheel'd to reach the eagle's haunt!"
So, we turned from the low grass-path you were pleased to call "your own."
Set our faces to the rose-bloom o'er the summit's front of stone.
Where Salève obtains, from Jura and the sunken sun she hides.
Dusky, you may be naming, "Good Night," rosy as a born-off bride's.
For his masculine "Good Morrow" when, with sunrise still in hold,
Gay he hails her, and, magnific, thrilled her black length burns to gold.
Up and up, sea stars, cloudless—nay, how joyous! All was new,
All was strange. "Call progress toilsome?
those just insulting you?
How the trees must temper noon tide! Ah, the thickest's sudden break!
What will be the morning glory, when at dusk
thus gleams the lake?
Light by light puts forth Geneva: what a land
—and of the land,
Can there be a lovelier station than this spot
where now we stand?
Is it late, and wrong to linger? True, to-morrow makes amends.
Toilsome progress? child's play, call it—
specialy when one descends!
There, the dread descent is over—hardly our adventure, though!
Take the vale where late we left it, pace the grass-path, 'mine,' you know!
Proud completion of achievement!" And we paced it, praising still
That soft tread on velvet verdure as it wound through hill and hill;
And at very end there met us, coming from Collonge, the pair
—All our people of the Chalet—two, enough and none to spare.
So, we made for home together, and we reached
it as the sun:
One by one came lamping—chiefly that prepotency of Mars—
And your last word was "I owe you this enjoyment!"—met with "Nay:
With yourself it rests to have a month of me-rows like to-day!"
Then the meal, with talk and laughter, and the news of that rare nook
Yet untroubled by the tourist, touched as by
All the same—though latent—patent, hybi birth of land and sea,
And (our travelled friend assured you)—if such miracle might be—
Comparable for completeness of both blesses Nature, and, inside her circle, safety from world's sight and sound—Comparable to our Saisiaz. "Hold it fast and guard it well!"
Go and see and vouch for certain, then come back and never tell
Living soul but us; and haply, prove our sky
from cloud as clear,
There may we four meet, praise fortune just as now, another year!"
Thus you charged him on departure: not without the final charge,
"Mind to-morrow's early meeting! We must leave our journey marge Ample for the wayside wonders: there's the stoppage at the Inn.
Three-parts up the mountain, where the last ships of the track begin;
There's the convent worth a visit; but, the triumph crowning all—
There's Salève's own platform facing play
—all around greatness small,
—Blanc, supreme above his earth-brood, ar-
dles red and white and green,
Horns of silver, fangs of crystal set on edge in his demesne.
So, some three weeks since, we saw them: a tomorrow we intend
You shall see them likewise; therefore God
Night till to-morrow, friend!"
Last, the nothings that extinguish embers of a vivid day:
"What might be the Marshal's next move?
what Gambetta's counter-play?"
Till the landing on the staircase saw escape
the latest spark:
"Sleep you well!" "Sleep but as well, you!"
—lazy love quenched, all was dark.
Nothing dark next day at sundown! Up I rose and forth I fared:
Took my plunge within the bath-pool, pacified
the watch-dog soared,
Saw proceed the transmutation—Jura's black
to one gold glow.
Trod your level path that let me drink the morning deep and slow,
Reached the little quarry—ravage recompensed by shrub and fern—
Till at the overflowing ardors told me time was for return.
So, return I did, and gayly. But, for once,
from no far mound
Waved salute a tall white figure. "Has her sleep been so profound?"
LA SAISIAZ

Foresight, rather, prudent saving strength for day's expenditure!

Ay, the chamber-window's open: out and on the terrace, sure!"

No, the terrace showed no figure, tall, white, leaping through the wreaths,
Tangle-twine of leaf and bloom that intercept
the air one breathes,
Interpose between one's love and Nature's loving, hill and dale
Down to where the blue lake's wrinkle marks
the river's irrus ample —Mary Arve: whereon no vessel but goes sailing white and plain,
Not a steamboat pants from harbor but one ears pulsate amain,
Past the city's congregated peace of homes and pomp of spires
—Man's mild protest that there's something more than Nature, man requires,
And that, useful as is Nature to attract the tourist's foot,
Quiet, else no money-making proves the matter's very root, —
Need for body, — while the spirit also needs a comfort reached
By no help of lake or mountain, but the texts whence Calvin preached.

'Here's of the landscape: up to Jura and beyond, ill awaits us ranged and ready; yet she vi-
lates the bond,
Neither leans nor looks nor listens: why is this?" A turn of eye look the whole scene answer, gave the undis-pputed reason "why"!

This dread way you had your summons! No
premonitory touch,
As you talked and laughed ('tis told me) scarce
a minute ere the clutch
Captured you in cold forever. Cold? nay, warm you were as life
When I raised you, while the others used, in passionate poor strife,
All the means that seemed to promise any aid,
and all in vain.

One you were, and I shall never see that earnest face again
Know transparent, grow transfigured with the sudden light that leapt
At the first word's provocation, from the heart-deeps where it slept.

Therefore, paying piteous duty, what seemed

You have we consigned

casefully to — what I think were, of all earth-beds, to your mind
host the choice for quiet, yonder: low walls
stop the vines' approach, lovingly Salève protects you; village-sports
will ne'er encroach
In the stranger lady's silence, whom friends bore so kind and well

Neither "just for love's sake," — such their own word was: and who can tell?

You supposed that few or none had known and loved you in the world:

Maybe! flower that's full-blown tempts the butterfly, not flower that's furled.

But more learned sense unlocked you, loosed
the sheath and let expand
Bud to bell and outspread flower-shape at the least warm touch of hand
— Maybe, throb of heart, beneath which — quickening farther than it knew —

Treasurer oft was disemboosed, scent all strange and unguessed hue.
Disemboosed, re-emboosed, — must one memory suffice,
Prove I knew an Alpine-rose which all beside named Edelweiss?

Rare thing, red or white, you rest now: two days numbed through: and since
One day more will see me rid of this same scene
whereas I wince,

Techy at all sights and sounds and pettish at each idle charm
Proffered me who pace now singly where we two went arm in arm,—
I have turned upon my weakness: asked," And what, forsooth, prevents

That, this latest day allowed me, I fulfil of her intents
One she had the most at heart — that we should thus again survey
From Salève Mont Blanc together?" Therefore, dared and done to-day
Climbing, — here I stand: but you — where?

If a spirit of the place
Broke the silence, bade me question, promised answer, — what disgrace

Did I stipulate "Provided answer suit my hopes, not fears!"

Would I shrink to learn my lifetime's limit — days, weeks, months or years?
Would I shirk assurance on each point whereas
I can but guess —

"Does the soul survive the body? Is there God's self, no or yes?"

If I know my mood, 't were constant — come in whatsoever untruth Shape it should, nay, formidable — so the answer were but truth.

Well, and wherefore shall it daunt me, when
'tis I myself am tasked,
When, by weakness weakness questioned, weakly answers — weakly asked?

Weakness never needs be falseness: truth is truth in each degree
— Thunder-pealed by God to Nature, whispered by my soul to me.

Nay, the weakness turns to strength and triumphs in a truth beyond:

"Mine is but man's truest answer — how were it did God respond?"

I shall no more dare to mimic such response in futile speech.

Pass off human lips as echo of the sphere-song
out of reach,
Than,—because it well may happen yonder, in where the far snows blanch
Mute Mount Blanc, that who stands near them sees and hears an avalanche,—
I shall pick a clod and throw,—cry, "Such the sight and such the sound!"
What though I nor see nor hear them? Others do, the proofs abound!"
Can I make my own an eagle’s, sharpen ear to recognize Sound o’er league and league of silence? Can I know, who but surmise?
If I dared no self-deception when, a week since, I and you
Walked and talked along the grass-path, passing lightly in review
What seemed hits and what seemed misses in a certain fence-play,—strife
Sundry minds of mark engaged in "On the Soul and Future Life!"
—If I ventured estimating what was come of parted thrust, Subtle stroke, and, rightly, wrongly, estimating could be just
—Just, though life so seemed abundant in the face of mine,
I might well have played at feigning, fooling,
—Laughed "What need opine
Pleasure must succeed to pleasure, else past pleasure turns to pain,
And this first life claims a second, else I count the fact, and you
Much less have I heart to palter when the matter to decide
Now becomes "Was ending ending once and always, when you died?"
Did the face, the form I lifted as it lay, reveal the loss
Not alone of life but soul? A tribute to your flowers and moss,
What of what remains beside? A memory!
Easy to attest
"Certains," from we know the world that one believes who knew her best
Such was good in her, such fair, which fair and good were great perchance
Had but fortune favored, hidden each shy faculty advance;
After all—who knows another? Only as I know, I speak."
So much of you lives within me while I live my year or week.
Then my fellow takes the tale up, not unwilling to aver
Duly in his turn, "I knew him best of all, as he knew her:
Such he was, and such he was not, and such other might have been
But that somehow every actor, somewhere in this earthly scene, Fails."And so both memories dwindle, yours and mine together linked,
Till there is but left for comfort, when the last spark proves extinct,
This that somewhere new existence led by man and women new Possibly attains perfection coveted by me and you;
While ourselves, the only witnesses to what work our life evolved,
Only to science proposing problems proper to be solved
By ourselves alone,—who working ne’er shall know if work bear fruit
Others reap and garner, heedless how produced by stalk and root,—
We who, darkling, timed the day’s birth,—struggling, testified to peace,— Earned, by dint of failure, triumph,—we, creative thought, must cease
In created word, thought’s echo, due to inspire long since sped!
Why repine? Theres ever some one lives although ourselves be dead!

Well, what signifies repignanctes? Truth is truth howere’er it strike.
Fair or foul the lot portioned life on earth, we bear alike,
Stalwart body idly yoked to stunted spirit powers, that fail
Else would soar, condemned to grovel, groundlings through the fleshly chain.
Help that hinders, hindrance proved but help disguised when all too late,
Hindrance is the fact acknowledged, homew’s explained as Fate,
Fortune, Providence: we bear, our life a burden more or less,
Life that owned unhappy, is there supplemental happiness
Possible and probable in life to come? or must we count
Life a curse and not a blessing, summed-up is its whole amount.
Help and hindrance, joy and sorrow?
Why should I want courage here? I will ask and have an answer,—with no fear, with no fear,—
From myself. How much, how little, do I wish from myself?
True that controverted doctrine? Is it fact to which I cleave,
Is it fancy I but cherish, when I take upon my lips
Phrases the solemn Tuscan fashioned, and declare the soul’s eclipse
Not the soul’s extinction? take his "I believe and I declare—
Certain am I—from this life I pass into a better, there
Where that lady lives of whom enamored was my soul"—where this
Other lady, my companion dear and true, she also is?

I have questioned and am answered. Question, answer presupposes
Two points: that the thing itself which questions, answers,—is, it knows;
As it also knows the thing perceived outside itself,—a force
Actual creation begins, operative through its course, Unaffected by its end,—that this thing likewise needs must be;
Caused, itself — itself efficient: in that narrow space must cram
All experience — out of which there crowds conjecture manifold.
But, as knowledge, this comes only — things may be as I behold,
Or may not be, but, without me and above me, things there are;
I myself am what I know not — ignorance which proves no bar
To the knowledge that I am, and, since I am, can recognise
What to me is pain and pleasure: this is sure, the rest — surmise.
If my fellows are or are not, what may please them and what pain,
More surmise: my own experience — that is knowledge, once again!

I have lived, then, done and suffered, loved and hated, learnt and taught
This — there is no reconciling wisdom with a world distraught.
Goodness with triumphant evil, power with failure in the aim,
If — (to my own sense, remember! though none other feel the same!)
If you hear me from assuming earth to be a pupil’s place,
And life, time — with all their chances, changes — just probation-space,
Mine, for me. But those apparent other mortals — theirs, for them?
Knowledge stands on my experience: all outside its narrow beam,
Free surmise may sport and welcome! Pleasures, pains affect mankind
Just as they affect myself? Why, here’s my neighbor color-blind, Eyes like mine: to all appearance: “green as grass,” do I affirm?
“Red as grass” he contradicts me; — which employs the proper term?
Were we two the earth’s sole tenants, with no third for refuge,
How should I distinguish? Just so, God must judge ’twixt man and me.
To each mortal peradventure earth becomes a new machine,
Pain and pleasure no more tally in our sense than red and green;
Still, without what seems such mortal’s pleasure, pain, my life were lost — Life, my whole sole chance to prove — although at man’s apparent cost
What is beauteous and what ugly, right to strive for, right to shun.
Fit to help and fit to hinder, — prove my forces every one,
Good and evil, — learn life’s lesson, hate of evil, love of good,
As ’tis set me, understand so much as may be understood Solve the problem: “From thine apprehended scheme of things, deduce
Praise or blame of its contriver, shown a niggard or profuse
In each good or evil issue! nor miscalculate alike
Counting one the other in the final balance, which to strikes.
Soul was born and life allotted: ay, the show of things unfurled.
For thy summoning and judgment, - thine, no other mortal's world!

What though fancy scarce may grapple with the
- "His own world for every mortal?" Postulate omnipotence!
Limit power, and simple grows the complex:
shrunk to atom size,
That which seemed immense to fancy low before my reason lies, —
I survey it and pronounce it work like other work: success
Here and there, the workman's glory, - here and there, his shame no less,
Failure as conspicuous. Tantamount "Human works are works divine?"
As the power, expect performance! God's be God's as mine is mine!
God whose power made man and made man's wants, and made, to meet those wants,
Heaven and earth which, through the body,
prove the spirit's ministers,
Excellently all, — did he lack power or was the will in fault
When he let blue heaven be abridged o'er by vapors of the vault,
Gay earth and her garlands shrivelled at the first infecting breath.
Of the serpent pains which herald, swarming in,
the dragon death?
What, no way but this that man may learn and lay to heart how rife Life were with death's would only death allow their taste to life?
Must the rose sigh "Pluck — I perish!" must the eve weep "Gaze — I fade!"
- Every sweet warn: "Ware my bitter!"
every shine bid "Wait my shade?"
Can we love but on condition, that the thing we love must die?
Needs there groan a world in anguish just to teach us sympathy —
Multitudinously wretched that we, wretched too, may guess
What a preferable state were universal happiness?
Hardly do I so conceive the outcome of that power which went
To the making of the worm there in you clod its tenement.
Any more than I distinguish aught of that which, wise and good,
Framed the leaf, its plain of pasture, dropped the dew, its fineless food.
Nay, - every fancy fact, were earth and all it holds illusion mere,
Only a machine for teaching love and hate and hope and fear
To myself, the sole existence, single truth 'mid falsehood, — well!

If the harsh throes of the prelude die not off into the swell
Of that perfect piece they sting me to become a strain for, — if Roughness of the long rock-clamber lead not to the last of cliff.
First of level country where is awarded my pilgrim-foot can prize, —
Plainlier! if this life's conception new life fail to realize, —
Though earth burst and proved a bubble glistening hush of hall, one huge Reflux of the devil's doings - God's work by no substrata —
(So death's kindly touch informed me as it broke the glamour, gave Soul and body both release from life's long nightmare in the grave) —
Still, — with no more Nature, no more Man as riddle to be read,
Only my own joys and sorrows now to reckon real instead, —
I must say — or choke in silence — "Howsoever came my fate,
Sorrow did and joy did nowise — life well weighed — preponderate."
By necessity ordained thus? I shall bear as best I can;
By a cause all-good, all-wise, all-potent? No,
as I am man!
Such were God: and was it goodness that the good within my range
Or had evil in admixture or grew evil's self by experience?
Wisdom — that becoming wise meant making slow and sure advance
From a knowledge proved in error to acknowledged ignorance?
Power! 'tis just the main assumption reasons
most revolts at; power
Unavailing for bestowment on its creature of an hour,
Man, of so much proper action rightly sized
and reaching aim,
So much passion, — no defect there, no excess.
but still the same, —
As what constitutes existence, pure perfection bright as brief
For you worm, man's fellow-creature, on ye happier world — its leaf!
No, as I am man, I mourn the poverty I must impute:
Goodness, wisdom, power, all bounded, each a human attribute!

But, O world outspread beneath me! only for myself I speak,
Nowise dare to play the spokesman for my brothers strong and weak,
Full and empty, wise and foolish, good and bad, in every age,
Every name, I turn my eyes from, as in one or other stage
Of a torture writhe they, Job-like crouched as hung and cruel with blains
- Wherefore? whereto? ask the whiskered
what the dread voice thane expounds!
I shall "vindicate no way of God's to man,"
nor stand apart,
"Laugh, be candid," while I watch it traversing
the human heart!
Traversed heart must tell its story uncommented on; no less Mine results in, "Only grant a second life; I acquiesce
In this present life as failure, count misfortune's worst assaults
Triumph, not defeat, assured that loses so much Gain about to be. For at what moment did I so advance
Near to knowledge as when frustrate of escape from ignorance?
Did not beauty prove most precious when its opposite obtained
Rule, and truth seem more than ever potent because falsehood reigned?
While for love — Oh how but, losing love, does whose loves succeeded
By the death-cane to the birth-throes — learning what love is indeed?
Only grant my soul may carry high through death her cup unspilled,
Brimming though it be with knowledge, life's loss drop by drop distilled,
I shall boast it mine — the balsam, bless each kindly wrench that wrung
From life's tree its inmost virtue, tapped the root whence pleasure springs,
Barked the bole, and broke the bough, and bruised the berry, left all grace
Asha in death's stern alchemy, loosed elixir in its place!"

Witness, Dear and True, how little I was 'ware of — not your worth
— That I knew, my heart assures me — but of what a shade on earth
Would the passage from my presence of the tall white figure throw O'er the ways we walked together! Somewhat narrow, somewhat slow,
Used to seem the ways, the walking; narrow ways are well to tread
When there's 'moss beneath the footstep,
honeysuckle overhead:
Walking slow to heating bosom surest solace soonest gives,
Liberates the brain o'eloaded — best of all restoratives.
Nay, do I forget the open vaste where soon or late converged
Ways though winding? — world-wide heaven-high sea where music slept or surged
As the angel had ascendand, and Beethoven's
Titan mace
Smote the immense to storm, Mozart would by a finger's lifting chase?
Yes, I knew — but not with knowledge such as this while I view
Yonder precinct which henceforward holds and hides the Dear and True.
Grant me (once again) assurance we shall each meet each some day,

Walk — but with how bold a footstep! on a way — but what a way!
— Worst were best, defeat were triumph, utter loss were utmost gain.
Can it be, and must, and will it?

Silence! Out of fact's domain,
Just surmise prepared to mutter hope, and also fear — dispute
Fact's inexorable ruling, "Outside fact, surmise be mute!"

Well!
Ay, well and best, if fact's self I may force
the answer from!
'T is surmise I stop the mouth of! Not above in yonder dome
All a rapture with its rose-glow, — not around,
where pile and peak
Strainingly await the sun's fall, — not beneath,
where crickets creak,
Birds assemble for their bedtime, soft the treetop swell subsides,—
No, nor yet within my deepest sentient self the knowledge hides.
Aspiration, reminiscence, plausibilities of trust
— Now the ready "Man were wronged else,
now the rash " and God unjust" —
None of these I need. Take thou, my soul, thy solitary stand,
Uphire to the champions Fancy, Reason, as on either hand
Amiable war they wage and play the foe in thy behoof!
Fancy thrust and Reason parry! Thine the prize who stand aloof!

FANCY

I concede the thing refused: henceforth no certainty more plain
Than this mere surmise that after body dies soul lives again.
Two, the only facts acknowledged late, are now increased to three —
God is, and the soul is, and, as certain, after death shall be.
Put this third to use in life, the time for using fact!

REASON

I do:
Find it promises advantage, coupled with the other two.
Life to come will be improvement on the life
that's now; destroy
Body's thwartings, there's no longer screen between soul and soul's joy.
Why should we expect new hindrance, novel tether? In this first Life, I see the good of evil, why our world began at worst:
Since time means amelioration, tardily enough displayed,
Yet a mainly onward moving, never wholly retrograde.
We know more though we know little, we grow stronger though still weak,
Partly see though all too purblind, stammer through we cannot speak.
There is no such grudge in God as scared the ancient Greek, no fresh Substitute of trap for drag-net, once a break-edge in the mesh.

Dragons were, and serpents are, and blind worms will be: he's emerged
Any new-created python for man's plague since earth was purged.

Failing proof, then, of invented trouble to replace the old,
O'er this life the next presents advantage
much and manifold!
Which advantage—in the absence of a fourth and farther fact
Now conceivably surmised, of harm to follow
from the act—
I pronounce for man's obtaining at this moment. Why delay?
Is he happy? happiness will change: anticipate the day!
Is he sad? there's ready refuge: of all sadness
death's prompt cure!
Is he puzzled? is there no settled measure? cease a burden to endure!
Pains with sorry compensations, pleasures
stinted in the dole,
Power that sinks and pettiness that soars, all hailed and nothing whole,

Idle hopes that lure man onward, forced back by as idle fears—

What a load he stumbles under through his glad and seventy years,
When a touch sets right the turmoil, lifts his spirit where, flesh-freed,
Knowledge and life rightly named so, all that seems be truth indeed!
Grant his forces no accession, nay, no faculty's increase,
Only let what now exists continue, let him
prove in peace
Power which with the interrupted unperfected play enticed
Man through darkness, which to lighten any spark of hope sufficed,—
What shall then deter his dying out of darkness
Death itself perchance, brief pain that's pang, condensed and infinite?
But at worst, he needs must brave it one day,
while, at best, he laughs—

Drops a drop within his chalice, sleep not death his science quaffs!
Any moment claims more courage, when, by crossing cold and gloom,
Manfully man quite discomfort, makes for the provided room
Where the old friends want their fellow, where the new acquaintance wait,
Probably for talk assembled, possibly to sup in state!
I affirm and reaffirm it therefore: only make as plain
As that man now lives, that, after dying, man will live again,—

Make as plain the absence, also, of a law to contravene

Voluntary passage from this life to that by change of scene,—
And I bid him—at suspicion of first clad athwart his sky.

Flower's departure, frost's arrival—new hesitate, but die!

FANCY

Then I double my concession: grant, aleg with new life sure
This same law found lacking now: ordain that whether rich or poor
Present life is judged in aught man can advantage—be it hope.
Be it fear that brightens, blackens most of least his horoscope,—
He, by absolute compulsion such as made his live at all,
Go on living to the fated end of life what's bestall.

What though, as on earth he darkling grovels,
man descries the sphere,
Next life's—call it, heaven of freedom, close above and crystal-clear?
He shall find—say, hell to punish who in sight
curtails the term.
Fain would act the butterfly before he has played out the worm!

God, soul, earth, heaven, hell,—five facts
now: what is to desistate?

REASON

Nothing! Henceforth man's existence bows to the monition "Wait!"
Take the joys and bear the sorrows—neither with extreme concern!
Living here means Roscience simply: 't is next life that helps to learn.
Shut those eyes, next life will open,—stay those ears, next life will teach Hearing's office,—close those lips, next life will give the power of speech!
Or, if action more amuse thee than the passive attitude,
Bravely bustle through thy being, busy thee
for ill or good,
Reap this life's success or failure! Soon shall things be unperplexed
And the right and wrong, now tangled, lie unravelled in the next."

FANCY

Not so fast! Still more concession! not also do I declare
Life must needs be borne,—I also will that man become aware
Life has worth incalculable, every moment that he spends
So much gain or loss for that next life which on this life depends.
Good, done here, be there rewarded,—evil,
worked here, there amerosed!
Six facts now, and all established, plain to man the last as first.

REASON

There was good and evil, then, defined to man
by this decree?
Was— for at its promulgation both alike have ceased to be.
Prior to this last announcement, "Certainly as God exists,
As He made man’s soul, as soul is quenchless
by the deathly mists,
Yet is, all the same, forbidden premature escape from time
To eternity’s provided purer air and brighter clime,— Just so certainly depends it on the use to which man after death he earns
Earth eternal,—heaven, the phrase be, or eternal death,—say, hell.
As his deeds, so proves his portion, doing ill or doing well!—
—Prior to this last announcement, earth was man’s probation-place:
Liberty of doing evil gave his doing good a
grace;
Once lay down the law, with Nature’s simple
"Such effects succeed
Causes such, and heaven or hell depends upon man’s earthly deed
Just as surely as depends the straight or else
the crooked line
On his making point meet point or with or else
without incline,"—
Thenceforth neither good nor evil does man, doing what he must.
Lay but down that law as stringent "Wouldst thou live again, be just!"
As this other "Wouldst thou live now, regularly draw thy breath!
For, suspend the operation, straight law’s breach results in death"—
And (provided always, man, addressed this mode, be sound and same)
Prompt and absolute obedience, never doubt,
with law obtain!
Tell not me "Look round us! nothing each side but acknowledged law,
Now styled God’s — now, Nature’s edict!"
Where’s obedience without flaw Paid to either? What’s the adage rife in man’s mouth? Why, "The best I both see and praise, the worst I follow"— which, despite professed Seeing, praising, all the same he follows, since debelieves
In the heart of him that edict which for truth his head receives.
There’s evading and persuading and much making law amends
Somehow, there’s the nice distinction ‘twixt fast foes and faulty friends,
—Any consequence except inevitable death
when, "Die, Whose breaks our law!" they publish, God
and Nature equally.
Law that’s kept or broken — subject to man’s will and pleasure! Whence?
How comes law to bear eluding? Not because of impotence:
Certain laws exist already which to hear means to obey;
Therefore not without a purpose those man must, while those man may Keep and, for the keeping, haply gain approval and reward.
Break through this last superstructure, all is empty air — no award Firm like my first fact to stand on, "God there is, and soul there is."
And soul’s earthly life-allocation: wherein, by hypothesis,
Soul is bound to pass probation, prove its powers, and exercise
Sense and thought on fact, and then, from fact educing fit surprise.
Ask itself, and of itself have solely answer,
"Does the scope
Earth affords of fact to judge by warrant future fear or hope?"
Thus have we come back full circle: fancy’s footsteps one by one Go their round conducting reason to the point where they begun.
Left where we were left so lately, Dear and True! When, half a week
Since, we walked and talked and thus I told you, how suffused a cheek
You had turned me had I sudden brought the blur into the smile
By some word like "Idly argued! you know better all the while!"
Now, from me — Oh not a blush, but, how much more, a joyous glow.
Laugh triumphant, would it strike did your
"Yes, better I do know"
Break, my warrant! for assurance! which assurance may not be
If, supplanting hope, assurance needs must change this life to me.
So, I hope — no more than hope, but hope — no less than hope, because I can fathom, by no plumb-line sunk in life’s apparent laws,
How I may in any instance fix where change should meetly fall
Nor involve, by one revisal, abrogation of them
all:
— Which again involves as utter change in life
thus law-released.
Whence the good of goodness vanished when the ill of evil ceased.
Whereas, life and laws apparent reinstated,— all we know, —
All we know not — o'er our heaven again cloud loses, until, lo,—
Hope the arrowy, just as constant, comes to pierce its gloom, compelled
By a power and by a purpose which, if no one else beheld,
I behold in life, so — hope!
Sad summing-up of all to say!
Athenaeus contra mundum, why should he hope more than they?
So are men made notwithstanding, such magnetic virtue darts
From each head their fancy haloes to their un-resisting hearts!
Here I stand, methinks a stone's throw from your village I this morn
Traversed for the sake of looking one last look at its forlorn
Tenement's ignoble fortune: through a crevcise pall it floor
Piled with provender for cattle, while a dungheap blocked the door.
In that squalid Bossex, under that obscene red rock, arose,
Like a file, a dying serpent from its egg, a soul
— Rousseau's.
Turn theno! Is it Diodati joins the glimmer of the lake?
There I plucked a leaf, one week since,— ivy,
plucked for Byron's sake.
Famed unfornates! And yet, because of that phosphoric fame
Swathing blackness' self with brightness till putridity looked flame,
All the world was witched: and wherefore?
what could lie beneath, allure
Hearts? Man to methought corruption serve man's head as cymnure?
Was the magic in the dictum "All that's good
is gone and past;
Bad and worse still grows the present, and the worse of all comes last:
Which believe — for I believe it"? So preached one his gospel-news;
While melodious moaned the other, "dying day with dolphin-bues!"
Storm, for loveliness and darkness like a woman's eye! Ye mounts
Where I clomb to 'soape my fallow, and thou sea
wherein he counts
Not one inch of vile dominion! What were your especial worth
Failed ye to enforce the maxim 'Of all objects found on earth
Man is meanest, much too honored when compared with — what by odds
Beats him — any dog: so, let him go a-howling to his gods?'
Which believe — for I believe it!" Such the comfort man received Sadly since perfornce he must: for why? the famous bard believed!

Fame! Then, give me fame, a moment! As
I gather at a glance
Human glory after glory vivifying you expense,
Let me grasp them altogether, hold on high and brandish well
Beacon-like above the rapt world ready, whether heaven or hell
Send the dazzling summons earthward, to sub-mmit itself the same,
Take on trust the hope or else despair flashed full on face by — Fame!
Thanks, thou prime-tree of Makitos, wide thy giant torch I wave!
Know ye whence I plucked the pillar, late with sky for architectur?

This the trunk, the central solid Knowledge,
kindled core, began

Tugging earth-deeps, trying heaven-heights, rooted yonder at Lausanne.
This which flies and spits, the aspic, — sparkle
in and out the boughs
Now, and now condensed, the python, coiling round and round allows Scarce the boko its due suffulgence, dullely
flake on flake of Wit—

Laughter so bejewels Learning, — what is Perney nourished it?
Nay, and fear—since every resin feeds the flame— that I dispense
With yon Bossex terebellum-tree's all-explosive Enunciation:
No, be sure! nor, any more than thy resplen-
dency, Jean-Jacques, Dare I want thine, Diodati! What though monkeys and macaques
Gibber "Byron"? Byron's ivy rears a branch beyond the crew,

Green forever, no deciduous trash macaques and monkeys chew!
As Rousseau, then, eloquent, as Byron prens
poesie's power,— Detonations, fulgurations, smiles — the rainbow, tears — the shower,— Lo, I lift the coruscating marvel — Fame! and famed, declare — Learned for the nonce as Gibbon, witty as wit's self Voltaire . . .

Oh, the sorriest of conclusions to whatever sense
'mid the millions stands the unit, takes no five for evidence! Yet the millions have their portion, live their or troublesome day,
Find significance in fireworks: so, by help of mine, they may Confidently lay to heart and lock in head their life-long — this:
"He there with the brand flamboyant, broad o'er night's forlorn abyss,
Crowned by prose and verse; and wielding with Wit's bable, Learning's rod" . . .
Well? Why, he at least believed in Soul, was very sure of God!

So the poor smile played, that evening: palled smile long since extinct
Here in London's mid—November! Not so loosely thoughts were linked,
Six weeks since I, descending in the ascent from Salve,
Found the chain, I seemed to forge there, flawless till it reached your grave,—
Not so flimsy was the texture, but I bore it in my breast
Safe thus far. And since I found a something in me would not rest
Till I, link by link, unravelli any tangly of the chain
— Here it lies, for much or little! I have lived all o'er again
That last pregnant hour: I saved it, just as I could save a root
Disinterred for reincarnation when the time best helps to shoot.
THE TWO POETS OF CROISIC

Written immediately after La Saisia, being dated January 15, 1878.

I

"FAME!" Yes, I said it and you read it.
First, Praise the good log-fire! Winter bowls without.
Crowd closer, let us! Ha, the secret nursed
Inside you hollow, crusted roundabout
With copper where the clamp was,—how the burst
Vindicates flame the stealthy feeder! Spout
Thy splendidest,—a minute and no more?
So soon again all sobered as before?

II

Nay, for I need to see your face! One stroke
Adroitly dealt, and lo, the pomp revealed!
Fire in his pandemonium, heart of oak
Palatial, where he wrought the works consoled
Beneath the solid-seeming roof I broke,
As redly up and out and off they reeled
Like disconcerted imps, those thousand sparks
From fire's slow tunnelling of vaults and arcs!

III

Up, out, and off, see! Were you never used,—
You now, in childish days or rather nights,—
As I was, to watch sparks fly? not amused
By that old nurse-taught game which gave the sprites
Each one his title and career,—confused
Belief 't was all long over with the flights
From earth to heaven of hero, sage, and bard,
And bade them once more strive for Fame's award?

New long bright life! and happy chance befell—
That I know,—when some prematurely lost
Child of disaster bore away the bell
From some too-pampered son of fortune, crossed
Never before my chimney broke the spell!
Octogenarian Keats gave up the ghost,
While—never mind Who was it cumbered earth—
Sank stifled, span-long brightness, in the birth.

V

Well, try a variation of the game!
Our log is old ship-timber, broken bulk.
There's sea-brine spirits up the brimstone flame,
That crimson-curls spiral proves the hulk
Was saturate with—sack the chloride's name
From somebody who knows! I shall not sulk
If yonder greenish tonguelet licked from brass
Its life, I thought was fed on opperas.

VI

Anyhow, there they flutter! What may be
The style and prowess of that purple one?
Who is the hero other eyes shall see
Than yours and mine? That yellow, deep to dun—Conjecture how the sage glows, whom not we
But those unborn are to get warmth by!

O' the coal,—as Job and Hebrew name a spark,—
What bard, in thy red soaring, scares the dark?

VII

Oh and the lesser lights, the dearer still
That they elude a vulgar eye, give ours
The glimpse repaying astronomic skill
Which searched sky deeper, passed those patent powers
Constellate proudly,—swords, scroals, harps, that fill
The vulgar eye to surfeit,—found best flowers
Hid deepest in the dark,—named unplucked grace
Of soul, ungathered beauty, form or face!

VIII

Up with thee, mouldering ash men never knew,
But I know! flash thou forth, and figure bold,
Calm and columnar as yon flame I view!
Oh and I bid thee,—to whom fortune doled
Scantily all other gifts out—bicker blue,
Beauty for all to see, zino's uncontrolled
Flare-brilliance! Not my fault if these were shown.
Grandeur and beauty both, to me alone.

IX
No! as the first was boy’s play, this proves mere Stripling’s amusement: manhood’s sport be grave!
Choose rather sparksles quenched in mid career,
Their boldness and their brightness could not save
(In some old night of time on some lone drear Sea-coast, monopolized by crag or cave)
—Save from ignoble exit into smoke,
Silence, oblivion, all death-damps that choke!

X
Launched by our ship-wood, float we, once afloat
In fancy to that land-strip waters wash,
We both know well! Where uncouth tribes made shift
Long since to just keep life in, billows dash
Nigh over folk who shudder at each lift
Of the old tyrant tempest’s whirlwind-lash
Though they have built the serviceable town
Tempests but tease now, billows drench, not drown.

XI
Croisic, the spit of sandy rock which juts
Spitefully northward, bears nor tree nor shrub
To tempt the ocean, show what Guérandes shunts
Behind her, past wild Bats whose Saxons grub
The ground for crystals grown where ocean gluts
Their promontory’s breadth with salt: all stab
Of rock and stretch of sand, the land’s last stride
To rescue a poor remnant for dear life.

XII
And what life! Here was, from the world to choose.
The Druids’ chosen chief of homes: they reared
—Only their women,— ’mid the alush and ooze
Of you low islet,— to their sun, revered
In strange stone guise,— a temple. May-dawn dews
Saw the old structure levelled; when there perused
May’s earliest eve-star, high and wide once more
Up towered the new pile perfect as before:

XIII
Seeing that priestesses — and all were such —
Unbuilt and then rebuilt it every May,
Each alike helping — well, if not too much!
For, ’mid their eagerness to outstrip day
And get work done, if any loosed her clutch
And let a single stone drop, straight a prey
Herself fell, torn to pieces, limb from limb,
By sisters in full chorus glad and grim.

XIV
And still so much remains of that gray oak
That even now, of nights, do women steal
To the sole Menhir standing, and insult
The antagonistic church-spire by appeal
To power disrowned in vain, since each adrol
Believes the gruesome thing she claims may heal
Whatever plague no priestly help can cure:
Kiss but the cold stone, the event is sure!

XV
Nay more: on May-morns, that primeval rite
Of temple-building, with its punishment
For rash precipitation, lingers, spite
Of all remonstrance; vainly are they sheet.
Those girls who form a ring and, dressed in white,
Dance round it, till some sister’s strength is spent:
Touch but the Menhir, straight the rest tax roughs
From gentle, fall on her with fisticuffs.

XVI
Oh and, for their part, boys from door to door
Sing unintelligible words to tunes
As obsolete: “scraps of Druidic lore,”
Sigh scholars, as each pale man imports
Vainly the mumbling to speak plain once met.
Enough of this old worship, rounds and runes!
They serve my purpose, which is but to show
Croisic to-day and Croisic long ago.

XVII
What have we sailed to see, then, wrought there
By fancy from the log that ends its days
Of much adventure ‘neath skies foul or fair.
On waters rough or smooth, in this good blaze
We two crouch round so closely, bidding care
Keep outside with the snow-storm? Something says “Fit time for story-telling!” I begin —
Why not at Croisic, port we first put in?

XVIII
Anywhere serves: for point me out the place
Wherever man has made himself a home,
And there I find the story of our race
In little, just at Croisic as at Rome.
What matters the degree? the kind I trace.
Draida their temple, Christians have their dome:
So with mankind; and Croisic, I’ll engage.
With Rome yields sort for sort, in age for age.

XIX
No doubt, men vastly differ: and we need
Some strange exceptional benevolence
Of nature’s sunshine to develop seed
So well, in the less-favored clime, that these
We may discern how shrub means tree indeed
Though dwarfed till scarcely shrub in evidence.

Man in the ice-house or the hot-house ranks
With beasts or gods: stove-forced, give warmth the thanks!

While is there any ice-checked? Such shall learn
I am thankfully, who propose to slake
His thirst for tasting how it feels to turn
Cedar from hysop-on-the-wall. I wake
No memories of what is harsh and stern
In ancient Croisio-nature, much less rake
The ashes of her last warmth till out leaps
Livre Hervé Riel, the single spark she keeps.

Take these two, see, each outbreak, — spirit and spirit
Of fire from our brave billet's either edge
Which — call maternal Croisio ocean-girl!
These two shall thoroughly redeem my pledge.
One flames fierce gules, its feeble rival — vert,
Heraldic would tell you: heroes, I allege,
They both were: soldiers, sailors, statesmen, priests,
Lawyers, physicians — guess what gods or beasts!

None of them all, but — poets, if you please!
"What, even there, endowed with knack of rhyme,
Did two among the aborigines
Of that rough region pass the ungracious time?
Suiting, to rumble-tumble of the sea's
The songs forbidden a serener clime?
Or had they universal audience — that's
To say, the folk of Croisio, ay, and Batz?"

Open your ears! Each poet in his day
Had such a mighty moment of success
As pinnacled him straight, in full display,
For the whole world to worship — nothing less!
Was not the whole polite world Paris, pray?
And did not Paris, for one moment — yes,
Worship these poet-flames, our red and green,
One at a time, a century between?

And yet you never heard their names! Assist,
Olio, Historic Muse, while I record
Great deeds! Let fact, not fancy, break the mist
And bid each sun emerge, in turn play lord
Of day, one moment! Hear the annalist
Tell a strange story, true to the least word!
At Croisio, sixteen hundred years and ten
Since Christ, forth famed you liquid ruby, then.

Know him henceforth as René Gentilhomme
— Appropriate appellation! noble birth
And knightly blazon, the device wherefrom
Was "Better do than say"! In Croisio's death
Why prison his career while Christendom
Lay open to reward acknowledged worth?
He therefore left it at the proper age
And got to be the Prince of Conde's page.

Which Prince of Conde, whom men called
"The Duke,"
Failing the king, his cousin, of an heir,
(As one might hold hap, would, without rebuke,
Since Anne of Austria, all the world was ware,
Twenty-three years long sterile, scarce could look
For issue) — failing Louis of so rare
A godsend, it was natural the Prince
Should hear men call him "Next King" too, nor waive.

Now, as this reasonable hope, by growth
Of years, nay, tens of years, looked plump almost
To bursting, — would the brothers, childless both,
Louis and Gaston, give but up the ghost —
Conde, called "Duke" and "Next King," nothing loth
 Awaited his appointment to the post,
And wired away the time, as best he might,
Till Providence should settle things aright.

So, at a certain pleasure-house, withdrawn
From cities where a whisper breeds offence,
He sat him down to watch the streak of dawn
Testify to first aird of Providence:
And, since dull country life makes courtiers yawn,
There wanted not a poet to dispense
Song's remedy for spleen—fits all and some,
Which poet was page René Gentilhomme.

A poet born and bred, his very sire
A poet also, author of a piece
Printed and published, "Ladies—their attire:
Therefore the son, just born at his decease,
Was bound to keep alive the sacred fire,
And kept it, yielding moderate increase
Of songs and sonnets, madrigals, and much
Rhyming thought poetry and praised as such.

Rubbish unutterable (bear in mind!)
Rubbish not wholly without value, though,
Being to compliment the Duke designed
And bring the complimenter credit so,—
Pleasure with profit happily combined.
Thus René Gentilhomme rhymed, rhymed till — lo,
This happened, as he sat in an alove
Elaborating rhyme for "love" — not "dove."

XXXI
He was alone: silence and solitude
Befit the votary of the Muse. Around,
Nature — not our new picturesque and rude,
But truth, tree-cinctured stately garden ground —
Breathed polish and politeness. All-imbed
With these, he sat absorbed in one profound Exoquisition, "Were it best to hint
Or boldly boast 'She loves me — Araminta' ? "

XXXII
When suddenly flashed lightning, searing sight
Almost, so close to eyes; then, quick on flash,
Followed the thunder, splitting earth down-right
Where René sat a-rhyming: — with huge crash
Of marble into atoms infinite —
Marble which, stately, dared the world to dash
The stone-thing proud, high-pillared, from its place:
One flash, and dust was all that lay at base.

XXXIII
So, when the horrible confusion loosed
Its wrappage round his senses, and, with breath,
Seeling and hearing by degrees induced
Conviction what he felt was life, not death —
His fluttered faculties came back to roost
One after one, as fowls do: ay, beneath,
About his very feet there, lay in dust
Earthly presumption paid by heaven's disgust.

XXXIV
For, what might be the thunder-emitten thing
But, pillared high and proud, in marble guise,
A ducal crown — which meant "Now Duke:
Next King"? Since such the Prince was, not in his own eyes Alone, but all the world's. Pebble from sling
Prostrates a giant; so can pulverize
Marble pretension — how much more, make moul
A peacock-prince his plume — God's thunder bolt!

XXXV
That was enough for René, that first fact
Thus flashed into him. Up he looked: all blue
And bright the sky above; earth firm, compact
Beneath his footing, lay apparent too;
Opposite stood the pillar: nothing lacked
There, but the Duke's crown: see, its fragments grew
The earth, — about his feet lie atoms fine
Where he sat nursing late his fourteenth line!

XXXVI
No, for the ——, all the universe
If 'all 'twixt God and him, —
Earth's praise or blame, its blessing or its curse.
Of one and the same value, — to the brim
Flooded with truth for better or for worse, —
He pounces on the writing-paper, prim
Keeping its place on table: not a dint
Nor speck had damaged "Odes to Araminta."

XXXVII
And over the nest crowquill calligraph
His pen goes blotting, blurring, as an ox
Tramples a flower-bed in a garden, — laugh!
You may! — so does not he, whose quiet heart knocks
Audibly at his breast: an epitaph
On earth's break-up, amid the falling rock.
He might be penning in a wild dismay,
Caught with his work half-done on Judgement Day.

XXXVIII
And what is it so terribly he pens,
Ruin — "Cupid, Venus, love and smile,
Hearts, darts," and all his day's divinor now
Judged necessary to a perfect style?
Little rocks René, with a breast to cleanse,
Of Rhadamantines law that reigned aewrwhile:
Brimful of truth, truth's outburst will convince (Style or no style) who bears truth's brunt — the Prince.

XXXIX
"Condé, called 'Duke,' be called just 'Duke,'
not more,
To life's end! 'Next King' thou fowl'st not he?
Ay, when this bubble, as it decked before
Thy pillar, shall again, for France to see,
Take its proud station there! Let France adore
No longer an illusive mock-sun — these—
But keep her homage for Sol's self, about
To rise and put pretenders to the rout!

XL
"What? France so God-abandoned that her root
Regal, though many a Spring it gave no sign.
Lacks power to make the noble, now branchless, shoot
Greenly as ever? Nature, though benign,
Thwarts ever the ambitious and astute.
In store for such is punishment condign:
Sure as thy Duke's crown to the earth was hurled,
So sure, next year, a Dauphin glades the world!"

XLI
Which penned — some forty lines to this effect—
Our René folds his paper, marchess brave
Back to the mansion, luminous, erect,
Triumphant, an emancipated slave.
There stands the Prince. "How now? My Duke's crown wrecked?
What may this mean?" The answer René gave
Was — handing him the verses, with the des Incline of body: "Sire, God's word to ye!"
The Two Poets of Croisic

XLI

The Prince read, pale; was silent; all around
The courtier-company, to whom he passed
The paper, read, in equal silence bound.

Reyn grew also by degrees aghast
At his own fit of courage — palely found
Way of retreat from that pale presence: clasped
Once more among the ony-kind. "Oh, son,
It is a feeble folk!" saith Solomon.

XLII

Vainly he apprehended evil: since,
When, at the year's end, even as foretold,
Forth came the Dauphin who discrowned the Prince
Of that long-crowned mere visionary gold,
'T was no fit time for envy to excite
Malice, be sure! The timidest grew bold:
Of all that courtier-company not one
But left the semblance for the actual sun.

XLIII

And all sorts and conditions that stood by
At René's burning moment, bright escape
Of soul, bore witness to the prophecy.
Which witness took the customary shape
Of verse; a score of poets in full cry
Hailed the inspired one. Nantes and Tours escape,
Soon Paris caught the infection; gaining strength,
How could it fail to reach the Court at length?

XLIV

"O poet!" smiled King Louis, "and besides,
O prophet! Sure, by miracle announced,
My foe will prove a prodigy. Who chides
Henceforth the unchiled monarch shall be trounced
For irreligion: since the fool derides
Plain miracle by which this prophet pounced
Real on the moment I should lift
Like Simeon, in my arms, a babe, 'God's gift!'"

XLV

"So call the boy! and call this bard and seer
By a new title! him I raise to rank
Of 'Royal Poet': 'poet without peer!
Whose fellows only have themselves to thank
If humbly they must follow in the rear.
My René. He's the master: they must clank
Their chains of song, confessed his slaves; for why?
They poeticize, while he can prophesy!"

XLVI

So said, so done; our René rose august,
"The Royal Poet;" straightway put in type
His poem-prophecy, and (fair and just Prologue) added — now that time was ripe
For proving friends did well his word to trust,—
Those attestations, tuned to lyre or pipe,
Which friends broke out with when he dared foretell
The Dauphin's birth: friends trusted, and did well.

XLVII

Moreover he got painted by Du Pré,
Engraved by Daret also; and prefixed
The portrait to his book: a crown of bay
Circled his brows, with rose and myrtle mixed;
And Latin verses, lovely in their way
Described him as "the biforked hill betwixt:
Since he hath sealed Paransias at one jump;
Joining the Delphic quill and Getio trump."

XLIX

Whereof came . . . What, it lasts, our spirit, thus long — The red fire? That's the reason must excuse
My letting flicker René's prophet-song
No longer; for its pertinacious hues
Must fade before its fellow joins the throng
Of sparks departed up the chimney, dues
To dark oblivion. At the word, it winks,
Rallies, relapses, dwindles, deathward sinks.

L

So doth our poet... All this burst of fame,
Fury of favor, Royal Poetship,
Prophecy, book, verse, picture — thereof came — Nothing! That's why I would not let Outstrip
Red his green rival flamelet; just the same
Ending in smoke waits both! In vain we rip
The past, no further faintest trace remains
Of René to reward our pious pains.

LI

Somebody saw a portrait framed and glazed
At Croisic. "Who may be this glorified
Mortal unheard-of hitherto?" amused
That person asked the owner by his side,
Who proved as ignorant. The question raised
Provoked inquiry; key by key was tried
On Croisic's portrait-puzzle, till back flew
The wards at one key's touch, which key was
— Who?"

LII

The other famous poet! Wait thy turn,
Thou green, our red's competitor! Enough
Just now to note 't was he that itched to learn (A hundred years ago) how fate could puff
Heaven-high (a hundred years before), then spurn
To suds so big a bubble in some huff:
Since green too found red's portrait,—having heard
Hitherto of red's rare self not one word.

LIII

And he with zeal addressed him to the task
Of hunting out, by all and any means,
—Who might the brilliant bard be, born to bask
Butterfly-like in shine which kings and queens
And baby-dauphins shed? Much need to ask!
Is fame soickle that what perks and preens
The eyed wing, one imperial minute, dips
Next sudden moment into blind eclipse?

LV

After a vast expenditure of pains, —
Our second poet found the prize he sought:
Urged in his search by something that restrains
From undoing triumph famed ones who have fought,
Or simply, poetizing, taxed their brains:
Something that tells such — dear is triumph bought
If it means only basking in the midst
Of fame’s brief sunshine, as thou, René, didst.

LV

For, what did searching find at last but this?
Quoth somebody, “I somehow somewhere seem To think I heard one old De Chevaye is
Or was possessed of René’s works!” which gleam
Of light from out the dark proved not amiss
To track, by correspondence on the theme;
And soon the twilight broadened into day,
For thus to question answered De Chevaye.

LV

“True it is, I did once possess the works
You want account of — works — to call them so,
Comprised in one small book: the volume lurks
(Some fifty leaves is duodecimo)
’Neath certain ashes which my soul it irks
Still to remember, because long ago
That and my other rare shelf-occupants
Perished by burning of my house at Nantes.

“Yet of that book one strange particular Still in mind with me” — and thereupon Followed the story. “Few the poems are;
The book was two-thirds filled up with this one,
And sundry witnesses from near and far
That here at least was prophesying done
By prophet, so as to preclude all doubt,
Before the thing he prophesied about.”

LVIII

That ’s all he knew, and all the poet learned,
And all that you and I are like to hear
Of René; since not only book is burned
But memory extinguished, — nay, I fear,
Portrait is gone too: nowhere I discerned
A trace of it at Croisic. “Must a tear Needs fall for that?” you smile. “How fortune fares
With such a mediocrity, who cares?”

LIX

Well, I care — intimately care to have Experience how a human creature felt
In after-life, who bore the burden grave
Of certainly believing God had dealt

For once directly with him: did not rave
— A maniac, did not find his reason wrest
— An idiot, but went on, in peace or strife,
The world’s way, lived an ordinary life.

LX

How many problems that one fact would solve!
An ordinary soul, no more, no less,
About whose life earth’s common sights revolve,
On whom is brought to bear, by thunder-stress,
This fact — God tasks him, and will not resolve Task’s negligent performer! Can you guess
How such a soul — the task performed to point
Goes back to life nor finds things out of joint?

LXI

Does he stand stock-like henceforth? or proceed
Dizzily, yet with course straightforward still.
Down-trampling vulgar hindrances? — as the reed
Is crushed beneath its tramp when that blast will Hatched in some old-world beast’s brain bids it speed
Where the sun wants brute-presence to fall!
Life’s purpose in a new far zone, ere ice
Ewomb the pasture-tract its fortaleza.

LXII

I think no such direct plain truth consists
With actual sense and thought and what they take
To be the solid walls of life: mere mists —
How such would, at that truth’s first piercing, break
Into the nullity they are! — alight lists
Wherein the puppet-champions wage, for sake
Of some mock-mistress, mimic war: laid low
At trumpet-thrust, there’s shown the world, one foe!

LXIII

No, we must play the pageant out, observe
The tourney-regulations, and regard
Success — to meet the blunted spear nor swerve,
Failure — to break no bones yet fall as warden;
Must prove we have — not courage? well then — nerve!
And, at the day’s end, boast the crown’s award
Be warranted as promising to wield
Weapons, no shame, in a true battlefield.

LXIV

Meantime, our simulated thunderclaps
Which tell us counterfeited truths — these same
Are — sound, when music storms the soul, perhaps?
— Sight, beauty, every dart of every aim
THE TWO POETS OF CROISIC

That touches just, then seems, by strange release,
To fail effectless from the soul it came
As if to fix its own, but simply smote
And startled to vague beauty more remote?

LXV
So do we gain enough — yet not too much —
Acquaintance with that outer element
Whencein there's operation (call it such one)
Quite of another kind than we the pent
On earth are proper to receive. Our hutch
Lights up at the least chink: let roof be rent —
How inmates huddle, blinded at first spasms,
Cognizant of the sun's self through the chasm!

LXVI
Therefore, who knows if this our René's quick
Subsidence from as sudden noise and glare
Into oblivion was impolitic?
No doubt his soul became at once aware
That, after prophecy, the rhyming-trick
Is poor employment: human praises scare
Rather than soothe ears all a-tingle yet
With tones few hear and live, but none forget.

LXVII
There's our first famous poet! Step thou forth
Second consummate songster! See, the tongue
Of fire that typifies thee, owns thy worth
In yellow, purple mixed, its gold among
No pure and simple resin from the North,
But composite with virtues that belong
To Southern culture! Love not more than hate Helped to a blaze... But I anticipate.

LXVIII
Prepare to witness a combustion rich
And riottously splendid, far beyond
Poor René's lambent little streamer which Only played candle to a Court grown fond
By baby-birth: this soared to such a pitch,
Alternately such colors doffed and donned,
That when I say it dazzled Paris — please
Know that it brought Voltaire upon his knees!

LXIX
Who did it, was a dapper gentleman,
Paul Desforges Maillard, Croisickease by birth,
Whose birth that century ended which began
By similar bestowment on our earth
Of the aforesaid René. Cease to scan
The ways of Providence! See Croisic's dearth —
Not Paris in its plenitude — suffice
To furnish France with her best poet twice!

LXX
Till he was thirty years of age, the vein
Poetic yielded rhyme by drops and spirits:
In verses of society had lain
His talent chiefly: but the Muse asserts
Privilege most by treating with disdain
Epics the bard months out, or odes he blurs
Spasmodically forth. Have people time
And patience nowadays for thought in rhyme?

LXXI
So, his achievements were the quatrain's inch
Of homage, or at most the sonnet's all
Of admiration: welded lines with clinch
Of ending word and word, to every belle
In Croisic's bounds; these, break as any finch,
He twittered till his fame had reached as well Guérande as Batz; but there fame stopped, for — curse
On fortune — outside lay the universe!

LXXII
That's Paris. Well, — why not break bounds, and send Song onward till it echo at the gates
Of Paris whither all ambitions tend,
And end too, seeing that success there sates
The soul which hungers most for fame? Why spend
A minute in deciding, while, by fate's decree, there happens to be just the prize
Proposed there, suitting souls that poëtize?

LXXIII
A prize indeed, the Academy's own self
Proposes to what bard shall best indite
A piece describing how, through shoal and shelf,
The Art of Navigation, steered aright,
Has, in our last king's reign, — the lucky elf, —
Reached, one may say, Perfection's haven quite,
And there cast anchor. At a glance one sees
The subject's crowd of capabilities!

LXXIV
Neptune and Amphitrite! Thetis, who
Is either Tethys or as good — both tag!
Triton can shove along a vessel too:
It's Virgil! Then the winds that blow or lag —
De Maillé, Vendôme, Vermandois! Toulouse blew
Longest, we reckon: he must puff the flag
To fullest outflaire; while our lacking nymph
Be Anne of Austria, Regent o'er the lymph!

LXXV
Promised, performed! Sinse irritabilis gens
Holds of the feverish impotence that strives
To stay an itch by prompt resource to pen's
Scratching itself on paper; placid lives,
Leisurely works mark the diviner men:
Bees brood above the honey in their hives;
 Gnats are the busy bustlers. Splash and scrawl, —
Completed lay thy piece, swift penman Paul!

LXXVI
To Paris with the product! This dispatched,
One had to wait the Forty's slow and sure
Verdict, as best one might. Our penman scratched
Away perform's the itch that knows no cure
But daily paper-friction: more than matched
His first feat by a second — tribute pure
And heartfelt to the Forty when their voice Should peal with one accord "Be Paul our choice!"

LXXXVII
Scratch, scratch went much laudation of that
same
And modern Tribunal, delegates august
Of Phoebus and the Muse's sacred train —
Whom every poetaster tries to thrust
From where, high-throned, they dominate the Seine:
Fruitless endeavor, — fail it shall and must!
Whereof in witness have not one and all
The Forty voices pealed "Our choice be Paul"?

LXXXVIII
Thus Paul discounted his applauses. Alack!
For human expectation! Scurvey ink
Was dry when, lo, the perfect piece came back
Rejected, ashamed! Some other poet's clink
"Thetis and Tethys" had seduced the pack
Of pedants to declare perfection's pink
A singularly poor production. "Whew!
The Forty are stark fools, I always knew!"

LXXIX
First fury ever (for Paul's race — to wit,
Brain-vibrisc — wriggle clear of protoplasma
Into minute life that's one fury-fit),
"These fools shall find a bard's enthusiasm
Comport with what should counterbalance it—
Some knowledge of the world! No doubt, orgonasm
Effects the birth of verse which, born, demands
Praiseworthy ministration, swaddling-bands!

LXXX
"Verse must be cared for at this early stage,
Handled, nay dandled even. I should play
Their game indeed if, till it grew of age,
I meekly let these dotards frown away
My bantling from the rightful heritage
Of smiles and kisses! Let the public say
If it be worthy praises or rebukes,
My poem, from these Forty old perukes!

LXXXI
So, by a friend, who boasts himself in grace
With no less than the Chevalier La Roque, —
Eminent in those days for pride of place,
Seeing he had it in his power to block
The way or smooth the road to all the race
Of literates trudging up to knock
At Fame's exalted temple-door — for why?
He edited the Paris "Mercury": —

LXXXII
By this friend's help the Chevalier receives
Paul's poem, prefaced by the due appeal
To Cæsar from the Jews. As duly heaves
A sigh the Chevalier, about to deal
With case so customary — turns the leaves,
Finds nothing there to borrow, beg, or steal —
Then brightens up the critic's brow deep-lined.
"The thing may be so cleverly declined!"

LXXXIII
Down to desk, out with paper, up with quill,
Dip and indite! "Sir, gratitude immense
For this true draught from the Plerian rill:
Our Academic clodpoles must be dense
Indeed to stand irrigated still.
No less, we critics dare not give offence
To grandees like the Forty: while we mock,
We grin and bear. So, here 's your piece! La Roque."

LXXXIV
"There now!" cries Paul: "'the fellow can't avoid
Confessing that my piece deserves the palm;
And yet he dares not grant me space enjoyed
By every scribbler he permits embalm's
His crambo in the Journal's corner! Cloyed
With stuff like theirs, no wonder if a quail
Be caused by verse like mine: though that's no
cause
For his detraunding me of just applause.

LXXXV
"Aha, he fears the Forty, this poltroon?*
First let him scare me! Change smooth speech to rough!
I 'll speak my mind out, show the fellow some
Who is the foe to dread: insist enough
On my own merits till, as clear as noon;
He sees I am no man to take rebuff.
As patiently as scribblers may and must!
Quick to the onslaught, out sword, cut and thrust!"

LXXXVI
And thereupon a fierce epistle flings
Its challenge in the critic's face. Alack!
Our bard mistakes his man! The gamut is set
On brazen visor proof against attack.
Prompt from his editorial throne up springs
The insulted magnate, and his rage falls:
On Paul's devoted brainpan, — quite away
From common courtesies of fencing-play!

LXXXVII
"Sir, will you have the truth? This piece of
yours
Is simply execrable past belief.
I shrank from saying so; but, since naught curves
Conceits but truth, truth's at your service!
Brief,
Just so long as ' The Mercury' endures,
So long are you excluded by its Chief
From corner, nay, from cranny! Play the cock
O' the roost, henceforth, at Croisic!" wrotes La Roque.

LXXXVIII
Paul yellowed, whitened, as his wrath from red Waxed incandescent. Now, 'this man of rhyme
Wore merely foolish, faulty in the head
Not heart of him: concept is a venial crime.
"Oh by no means malicious!" counsel said:
Fusily feeble, — harmless all the time,
THE TWO POETS OF CROIISC

You and your merit! Only fools command
When folks are free to disobey them, Paul!
You’ve learnt your lesson, found out what’s o’clock.
By this uncivil answer of La Roque.

"Now let me counsel! Lay this piece on shelf — Masterpiece though it be! From out your desk
Hand me some lighter sample, verse the elf
Cupid inspired you with, no god grotesque
Presiding o’er the Navy! I myself
Hand-write what’s legible yet picturesque;
I’ll copy fair and femininely frock
Your poem masculine that courts La Roque!

Deidamia he — Achilles thou!
Ha, ha, these ancient stories come so apt!
My sex, my youth, my rank I next avow
In a neat prayer for kind perusal. Sapped
I see the walls which stand so stoutly now!
I see the toils about the game entrapped
By honest cunning! Chains of lady-smock,
Not thorn and thistle, tether fast La Roque!"

Now, who might be the speaker sweet and arch
That laughed above Paul’s shoulder as it heaved
With the indignant heart? — bade steal a march
And not continue charging? Who conceived
This plan which set our Paul, like pea you parch
On fire-ashovel, skipping, of a load relieved,
From arm-chair moodiness to scribuletoire.
Sacred to Thoebus and the tuneful choir?

Who but Paul’s sister! named of course like him
"Desforges;" but, mark you, in those days a quest
Custom obtained, — who knows whence grew the whim? —
That people could not read their title clear
To reverence till their own true names, made dim
By daily moutting, pleased to disappear,
Replaced by brand-new bright ones: Aronet,
For instance, grew Voltaire; Desforges — Malcrais.

"Demoiselle Malcrais de la Vigne" — because
The family possessed at Bredereau
A vineyard, — few grapes, many hips-and-haws, —
Still a nice Breton name. As breast and back
Of this vivacious beauty gleamed through gauze,
So did her sprightly nature nowise lack
Lustre when draped, the fashionable way,
In "Malcrais de la Vigne," — more short,
"Malcrais."
C
Out from Paul's esquire behold escape
The hoarded treasure! verse falls thick and fast,
Sonnets and songs of every size and shape.
The lady ponders on her prize; at last
Selects one which — O angel and yet ape! —
Her malice thinks is probably surpassed
In badness by no follow of the flock.
Copies it, fair, and "Now for my La Roque!"

CI
So, to him goes, with the neat manuscript,
The soft petitionary letter. "Grant
A fledgeling novice that with wing unclipt
She soar her little circuit, habitant.
Of an old manor; buried in which crypt,
How can the youthful chivalraie but pant
For disemprisonment by one ad hoc Appointed 'Mercury's' Editor, La Roque?"

CII
"T was an epistle that might move the Turk!
More certainly it moved our middle-aged
Pen-driver drudging at his weary work,
Raked the old ashes up and disengaged
The sparks of gallantry which always lurk
Somehow in literary breasts, assuaged
In no degree by compliments on style;
Are Forty wagging beards worth one girl's smile?"

CIII
In trips the lady's poem, takes its place
Of honor in the gratified Gazette,
With due acknowledgment of power and grace;
Prophecy, too, that higher yet
The Breton Muse will soar: fresh youth, high race.
Beauty and wealth have amicably met
That Demoiselle Malraux may fill the chair
Left vacant by the loss of Deshoulières.

CIV
"There!" cried the lively lady. "Who was right —
You in the dumpes, or I the merry maid
Who know a trick or two can baffle spite
Tenfold the force of this old fool's? Afraid
Of Editor La Roque? But come! next flight
Shall outsoar — Deshoulières alone? My blade,
Sappho herself shall you confess outstrip!
Quick, Paul, another dose of manuscript!"

CV
And so, once well a-foot, advanced the game:
More and more verses, corresponding gush
On gush of praise, till everywhere acclaim
Rose to the pitch of uproar. "Sappho?
Tush! Sure 'Malraux on her Parrot' puts to shame
Deshoulières' pastoral, clay not worth a rush
Besides this find of treasure, gold in crock.
Unearthed in Brittany, — nay, sak La Roque!"

CVI
Such was the Paris tribute. "Yes," you may,
"Ninnies stock Nooldrom, but folk say Resist contagious folly, never fear!"
Do they? Permit me to detach one page
From the huge Album which from near and near Poetic praises blackened in a rage
Of rapture! and that page shall be — we stare
Confounded now, I ask you? — just Voltaire's

CVII
Ay, sharpest shrewdest steel that ever stabbed!
To death Imposture through the arms joints!
How did it happen that gross Humbug grapple
Thy weapons, gonged thine eyes out? For appoints
That pride shall have a fall, or I had blabbed
Hardly that Humbug, whom thy soul avails
Could thus cross-buttock thee caught nearest
And dismaiest of tumbles proved — Voltaire's

CVIII
See his epistle extant yet, wherewith
"Hanz! in verse and "Charles" in prose is sent
To do her suit and service! Here's the pitch
Of half a dozen stanzas — stones which west
To build that simulated monolith —
Sham love in due degree with homage best
As shan — which in the vast of volumes seen
The traveller still: "That stucco-harp— Vantaire's?"

CIX
"O thou, whose clarion-voice has overflowed
The wilds to startled Paris that's one ear!
Thou who can thus strange capacity hast shown!
For joining all that's grand with all that's dear,
Knowledge with power to please — Deshoulières grown Learned as Dacier in thy person! mere
Weak fruit of idle hours, these crabs of mine
I dare lay at thy feet, O Muse divine!

CX
"Charles was my task-work only; Henri trea!
My hero erst, and now, my heroine — she
Shall be thyself! True — is it true, great God?
Certainly love henceforward must not be!
Yet all the crowd of Furn Aries fail — bew odd! —
Tried turn by turn, to fill a void in me!
There's no replacing love with these, alas!
Yet all I can I do to prove no seas.

CXI
"I labor to amuse my freedom; but
Should any sweet young creature slavery
And — borrowing thy vivacious charm, the Daunt! —
Make me, in thy engaging words, a speck
Soon should I see myself in prison shut
THE TWO POETS OF CROISIC

With all imaginable pleasure,— Reaches The wash-hand-basin for admirers! There’s A stomach-moving tribute,—and Voltaire’s!

CXII
Suppose it a fantastic billet-doux, Adulatory flourish, not worth frown! What say you to the Fathers of Trévoux? These in their Dictionary have her down Under the heading "Author: " "Malraux, too, Is "Author" of much verse that claims re-

While Jean-Baptiste Rousseau . . . but why proceed? Enough of this,—something too much, indeed!

CXIII
At last Le Roque, unwilling to be left Behind hand in the rivalry, broke bounds Of figurative passion hilt and hilt, Plunged his huge downright love through what surrounds The literary female bosom; left Away its veil of coy reserve with " Zounds! I love thee, Breton Beauty! All's no use! Body and soul I love, — the big word's loose!"

CXIV
He's greatest now and to de-stru-ci-on Nearest. Attend the solemn word I quote, O Paul! There's no pause at per-fec-ti-on. Thus knoll thy knell the Doctor's bronzed throat!
Greatest a period hath, no sta-ti-on! Better and truer verse none ever wrote (Despite the antique outstretched a-i-o-a) Than thou, revered and magisterial Donne.

CXV
Flat on his face, Le Roque, and — pressed to heart His dexter hand — Voltaire with bended knee! Paul sat and suckled-in triumph; just apart Leaned over him his sister. "Well?" smirks he And "Well?" she answers, smiling — woman's art To let a man's own mouth, not hers, decree What shall be next move which decides the game? Success? She said so. Failure? His the blame.

CXVI
"Well!" this time forth affirmatively comes With smack of lip, and long-drawn sigh through teeth Close clenched o'er satisfaction, as the gums Were tickled by a sweetmeat teased beneath Pate by lubricating tongue: " Well! crumbs Of comfort these, undoubtedly! no death Likely from famine at Fame's feast! 'tis clear I may put claim in for my pittance, Dear!

CXVII
"La Roque, Voltaire, my lovers? Then dis- guise

Has served its turn, grows idle; let it drop! I shall to Paris, flaunt there in men's eyes My proper manly garb and mount a-top The pedestal that waits me, take the prise Awarded Hercules. He threw a sop To Cerberus who let him pass, you know, Then, following, linked his heels: exactly so!

CXVIII
"I like the prospect — their astonishment, Confusion: wounded vanity, no doubt, Mixed motives; how I see the brows quick bent! 'What, sir, yourself, none other, brought about This change of estimation? Phoebus sent His shafts as from Diana? ' Critic pout 'Turns courtier smile: 'Lo, him we took for her! Pleasant mistake! You bear no malice, sir?'

CXIX
"Oh, my Diana?" But Diana kept Smilingly silent with fixed needle-sharp Much-meaning eyes that seemed to intercept Paul's very thoughts ere they had time to warp From earnest into sport the words they least To life with — changed as when maltreated harp Renders in twinkle what some player-prig Means for a grave tune though it proves a jig.

cxx
"What, Paul, and are my pains thus thrown away, My lessons end in loss?" at length fall slow The pitying syllables, her lips allay The satire of by keeping in full flow, Above their coral reef, bright smiles at play: "Can it be, Paul thus fails to rightly know And altogether estimate applause As just so many sazine hee-haws?"

cxxi
"I thought to show you" . . . "Show me," Paul in broke, "My poetry is rubbish, and the world That rings with my renown a sorry joke! What fairer test of worth than that, form furled, I entered the arena? Yet you croak Just as if Phoeb and not Phoebus hurled The dart and struck the Python! What, he crawls Humbly in dust before your feet, not Paul's?

cxxii
"Nay, 't is no laughing matter though absurd If there's an end of honesty on earth! La Roque sends letters, lying every word! Voltaire makes verse, and of himself makes mirth To the remotest age! Rousseau's the third Who, driven to despair amid such dearth Of people that want praising, finds no one More fit to praise than Paul the simpleton!
CXXIII
"Somebody says — if a man writes at all
It is to show the writer's kith and kin
He was unjustly thought a natural;
And truly, sister, I have yet to win
Your favorable word, it seems, for Paul.
Whose poetry you count not worth a pin
Though well enough esteemed by these Voltairees, Rousseaus and such-like: let them quack, who cares?"

CXXIV
"— To Paris with you, Paul! Not one word's waste
Further: my scrupulosity was vain!
Go triumph! Be my foolish fears effaced
From memory's record! Go, to come again
With glory crowned, — by sister re-embraced,
Cured of that strange delusion of her brain
Which led her to suspect that Paris gloats
On male limbs mostly when in petticots!"

CXXV
So laughed her last word, with the little touch
Of malice proper to the outraged pride
Of any artist in a work too much
Shorn of its merits. "By all means, be tried
The opposite procedure! Cast your crutch
Away, no longer crippled, nor divide
The credit of your march to the World's Fair
With sister Cherry-cheeks who helped you there!"

CXXVI
Crippled, forsooth! What courser sprightlier pranced
Paris-ward than did Paul? Nay, dreams lent wings:
He flew, or seemed to fly, by dreams entranced.
Dreams wide-awake realities: no things
Dreamed merely were the missives that advanced
The claim of Malorais to consort with kings
Crowned by Apollo — not to say with queens
Cinctured by Venus for Idalian scenes.

CXXVII
Soon he arrives, forthwith is found before
The outer gate of glory. Bold tie-toe Announces there's a giant at the door.
"Ay, sir, here dwells the Chevalier La Roque."
"Lackey! Malorais — mind, no word less nor more!
Desires his presence. I've unearthed the brock:
Now, to transfuse him!" There stands Paul erect,
Inched out his uttermost, for more effect.

CXXVIII
A bustling entrance: "Idol of my flame!
Can it be that my heart attains at last
Its longing? that you stand, the very same
As in my visions?... Ha! hey, how?"

CXXIX
"Stop the rapture. "Oh, my boy's a blame!
You merely are the messenger! Too fast
My fancy rushed to a conclusion. Pooh!
Well, sir, the lady's substitute is — who?"

CXXX
Then Paul's smirk grows inordinate. "Sake hands!
Friendship not love awaits you, master mine,
Though nor Malorais nor any mistress stands
To meet your ardois! So, you don't divise
Who wrote the verses wherewith ring its land's Whole length and breadth? Just he whose
Of no line
Had ever leave to blot your Journal — ah?
Paul Desforges Maillard — otherwise Malorais!"

CXXXI
And there the two stood, stare confronting smirks,
A while uncertain which should yield its pas.
In vain the Chevalier beat brain for quick
To help in this conjunction; at length,
"Bash! Bash!"
Boh! Since I've made myself a fool, why shirk
The punishment of folly? Ha, ha, ha,
Let me return your handicome!" Comic act
For tragic buckin prompt thus changed La Roque.

CXXXII
"I'm nobody — a wren-like journalist;
You've flown at higher game and winged your bird,
The golden eagle! That's the grand acquire;
Voltaire's aliy Muse, the tiger-cat, has pounced
Prettily round your feet; but if she missed
Priority of stroking, soon were stirred
The dormant spitfire. To Voltaire I away,
Paul Desforges Maillard, otherwise Malorais."

CXXXIII
Whereupon, arm in arm, and head in air,
The two begin their journey. Need I say,
La Roque had felt the talon of Voltaire,
Had a long-standing little debt to pay,
And pounced, you may depend, on such a rare
Occasion for its due discharge? So, gay
And grenadier-like, marching to assent,
They reach the enemy's abode, there halt.

CXXXIII
"I'll be announcer!" quoth La Roque: "I know,
Better than you, perhaps, my Breton host,
How to procure an audience! He's not slow
To smell a rat, this scamp Voltaire! Deemed
The petticoats too soon, — you'll never show
Your haut-de-chaussées and all they've made or married
In your true person. Here's his servant
Pray,
Will the great man see Demoiselle Malorais?"
THE TWO POETS OF CROISIC

CXXXIV
Low, the great man was also, no whit less,
The man of self-respect, — more great man
He was;
And bowed to social usage, dressed the dress,
And decorated to the fit degree
His person; ’twas enough to bear the stress
Of battle in the field, without, when free
From outside foes, inviting friends’ attack
By — sword in hand? No, — ill-made cost on back.

CXXXV
And, since the announcement of his visitor
Surprised him at his toilet, — never glass
Fed such solicitation! "Black, now — or Brown be the killing wig to wear? Alas,
There’s the rouge gone, this cheek were better for
A tender touch of? Malted to a mass,
All day pomatum! There’s at all events
A devil — for he’s got among my secrets!"

CXXXVI
"Barbered ten times o’er," as Antony
Faced to his Cleopatra, did at last
Observe proceeded to the fair presence: high
In color, proud in port, as if a blast
Of trumpet bade the world: "Take note! I draws nigh
To Beauty, Power! Behold the Iconoclast,
The Poet, the Philosopher, the Rod
Iron for impudence! Ah my God!"

CXXXVII
For there stands smirking Paul, and — what Lights fierce
The situation with sulphur flash —
There grinning stands La Roque! No carteand-tieeer
Observe the grinning fencer, but, full dash
From breast to shoulder-blade, the thrusts Transpire.
That armor against which so idly clash
The swords of priests and pedants! Victors there,
Two smirk and grin who have been fooled — Voltaire!

CXXXVIII
A moment’s horror; then quick turn-about
On high-heeled shoe, — flurry of ruffles, flounce
Of wig-ties and of coat-tails, — and so out
Of door banged wrathfully behind, goes — Bounce —
Voltaire in tragic exit! Vows, no doubt,
Vengeance upon the couple. Did he trounce
Either, in point of fact? His anger’s flash
Blistered as if a culprit craved his cash.

CXXXIX
As for La Roque, he having laughed his laugh
To heart’s content, — the joke defunct at once,
Read in the birth, you see, — its epitaph
Was sober earnest: "Well, sir, for the

You’ve gained the laurel; never hope to graft
A second sprig of triumph there! Enconce Yourself again at Croisic: let it be Enough you mastered both Voltaire and — me!"

CXL
"Don’t linger here in Paris to parade
Your victory, and have the very boys
Point at you! 'There’s the little mouse
Which made
Believe those two big lions that its noise,
Nibbling away behind the hedge, conveyed Intelligence that — portent which destroys
All courage in the lion’s heart, with horn
That’s f’s — there lay couched the unicorn!"

CXL1
"Beware us, now we’ve found who fooled us! Quick
To cover! 'In proportion to men’s fright,
Expect their fright’s revenge!’ quoth politic
Old Machiavelli. As for me, — all’s right:
I’m but a journalist. But no pin’s prick
The tooth leaves when Voltaire is roused to bite!
So, keep your counsel, I advise! Adieu!
Good journey! Ha, ha, ha, Malraux was —
you!"

CXLII
"— Yes, I’m Malraux, and somebody beside,
You snickering monkey!” thus winds up the
tale
Our hero, safe at home, to that black-eyed Cherry-cheeked sister, as she soothes the pale
Mortified poet. "Let their worst be tried,
I’m their match henceforth — very man and male!
Don’t talk to me of knocking-under! man
And male must end what petticoats began!

CXLIII
"How woman-like it is to apprehend
The world will eat its words! why, words
Transfixed
To stone, they stare at you in print, — at end, Each writer's style and title! Choose be-twist
Fool and knave for his name, who should intend
To perpetrate a baseness so unmixed
With prospect of advantage! What is writ
Is writ: they’ve praised me, there’s an end of it!

CXLIV
"No, Dear, allow me! I shall print these
Same
Pieces, with no omitted line, as Paul’s.
Malraux no longer, let me see folk blame
What they— praised simply? — placed on pedestals,
Each piece a statue in the House of Fame!
Fast will they stand there, though their presence galls
The envious crew: such show their teeth, perhaps,
And snarl, but never bite! I know the chaps!"
CXLV
O Paul, oh, piteously deluded! Pace
Thy sad sterility of Croisic flats,
Watch, from their southern edge, the foamy
race
Of high-tide as it heaves the drowning mats
Of yellow-berried web-growth from their place,
The rock-ridge, when, rolling as far as Batz,
One broadside crashes on it, and the crags,
That needle under, stream with weedy rags!

CXLVI
Or, if thou wilt, at inland Bergerac,
Rude heritage but recognised domain,
Do as two here are doing: make heart crack
With logs until thy chimney roar again
Jolly with fire-glow! Let its angle lack
No grace of Cherry-cheeks thy sister, faint
To do a sister's office and laugh smooth
Thy corrugated brow — that soowis forswoth!

CXLVII
Wherefore? Who does not know how these
La Roques,
Voltaire's, can say and unsay, praise and
blame,
Prove black white, white black, play at paradox
And, when they seem to lose it, win the game?
Care not thou what this badger, and that fox,
His fellow in rascality, call "fame!"
Fiddler's end! Thou hast it — quack, quack, quack!
Have quietude from geese at Bergerac!

CXLVIII
Quietude! For, be very sure of this!
A twelvemonth hence, and men shall know or care
As much for what to-day they slap or hiss
As for the fashion of the wigs they wear,
Then wonder at. There's fame which, bale or bliss,
— Got by no gracious word of great Voltaire
Or not-so-great La Roque, — is taken back
By neither, any more than Bergerac!

CXLIX
Too true! or rather, true as ought to be!
No more of Paul the man, Malracis the maid,
Thenceforth forever! One or two, I see,
Stuck by their poet: who the longest stayed
Was Jean-Baptiste Rousseau, and even he Seemingly saddened as perfecly he paid
A rhyming tribute: "After death, survive —
He hoped he should: and died while yet alive!"

CL
No, he hoped nothing of the kind, or held
His peace and died in silent good age.
Him it was, curiosity impelled
To seek if there were extant still some page
Of his great predecessor, rat who belled
The cat once, and would never deign engage
In after-combat with more mice, — saved from More sonneteering, — René Gentilhomme.

CLI
Paul's story furnish'd forth that famous
Of Piron's "Métromanie:" there we find
He's a franc-soleau, while Demoiselle Mallet
Is Demoiselle No end-of-names behind!
As for Voltaire, he's Damas. Good and as perch
The plot and dialogue, and all 's designed
To spite Voltaire: at "Something" and laugh
Of simply "Nothing!" (see his epistle.)

CLII
But truth, truth, that 's the gold! and all is good
I find in fancy is, it serves to set
Gold's inmost glist free, gold which consternate
Rude and rayless from the mine. All form a fret
Of art lessry beyond this point pursued
Brings out another sort of burnish: yet
Always the ingot has its very own
Value, a sparkle struck from truth alone.

CLIII
Now, take this sparkle and the other spirit
Of fitful flame, — twin births of our own brand
That 's sinking fast to ashes! I assert,
As sparks which want but fuel to expand
Into a conflagration no mere squint
Will quench too quickly, so might Cressai strand,
Had Fortune pleased posterity to choose,
Boast of her brace or beacons luminous.

CLIV
Did earlier Agamemnon lack their bard?
But later bards lacked Agamemnon too!
How often frustrate they of fame's award
Just because Fortune, as she listed, blew
Some slight bark's sails to ballyard, made and married
And forced to put about the First-rate:
True, such sacks but for a time: still — small-end ride
At anchor, rot while Beddoes broods the tide!

CLV
Dear, shall I tell you? There's a simple test
Would serve, when people take on them to weigh
The worth of poets. "Who was better, best
This, that, the other bard?" (Bards say as gain say
As good, observe! no matter for the rest.)
"What quality preponderating may Turn the scale as it trembles?" End the strife
By asking "Which one led a happy life?"

CLVI
If one did, over his antagonist
That yelled or shrieked or sobbed or wept
Or simply had the dumps, — dispute who list —
THE TWO POETS OF CROISIC

I count him victor. Where his fellow failed,
Mastered by his own means of might,—acquiescent
Of necessary sorrow,—he prevailed;
A strong since joyful man who stood distinct
Above slave-sorrows to his chariot linked.

CLVII
Was not his lot to feel more? What meant "feel"—
Unless to suffer! Not, to see more?
Sight—
What helped it but to watch the drunken reel
Of vice and folly round him, left and right,
One dance of rogues and idiots! Not, to deal
More with things lovely? What provoked the sprite
Of filth incarnate, like the poet’s need
Of other nutriment than strife and greed!

CLVIII
Who knows most, doubts most; entertaining
hope,
Means recognizing fear; the keener sense
Of all comprised within our actual scope
Recoils from sought beyond earth’s dim and dense.
Who, grown familiar with the sky, will grope
Himself among groundlings? That’s offence
Just as indubitably: stars abound
O’erhead, but then—what flowers make glad
the ground!

CLIX
So, force is sorrow, and each sorrow, force:
What then? since Swiftness gives the chariot
The palm, his hope be in the vivid horse
Whose neck God clothed with thunder, not the steer
Sluggish and safe! Yoke Hatred, Crime, Re morse,
Despair: but ever ’mid the whirling fear,
Let through the tumult, break the poet’s face
Radiant; assured his wild slaves win the race!

CLX
Therefore I say... no, shall not say, but
think,
And save my breath for better purpose.
White
From gray our log has burned to: just one blink
That quivers, loth to leave it, as a sprite
The outworn body. Ere your eyelid’s wink
Punish who sealed so deep into the night
Your mouth up, for two poets dead so long,— Here pleads a live pretender: right your wrong!

What a pretty tale you told me
Once upon a time
—Said you found it somewhere (soold me!)
Was it prose or was it rhyme,
Greek or Latin? Greek, you said,
While your shoulder propped my head.

Anyhow there’s no forgetting
This much if no more,
That a poet (pray, no petting!)
Yes, a bard, sir; famed of yore,
Went where suchlike used to go,
Singing for a prize, you know.

Well, he had to sing, nor merely
Sing but play the lyre;
Playing was important (clearly Quite as singing): I desire,
Sir, you keep the fact in mind
For a purpose that’s behind.

There stood he, while deep attention
Hold the judges round
—Judges able, I should mention,
To detect the slightest sound
Sung or played amiss: such ears
Had old judges, it appears!

None the less he sang out boldly,
Played in time and tune,
Till the judges, weighing coldly
Each note’s worth, seemed late or soon,
Sure to smile "In vain one tries
Picking faults out: take the prize!"

When, a mischief! Were they seven Strings the lyre possessed?
Oh, and afterwards eleven,
Thank you! Well, sir,—who had guessed
Such ill luck in store?—it happened
One of those same seven strings snapped.

All was lost, then! No a cricket
(What "cicada"? Pooh!)
—Some mad thing that left its thicket
For mere love of music—flew
With its little heart on fire,
Lighted on the crippled lyre.

So that when (Ah, joy!) our singer
For his truant string
Feels with disconcerted finger,
What does cricket else but fling
Fiery heart forth, sound the note
Wanted by the throbbing throat?

Ay and, ever to the ending,
Cricket chirps at need,
Executes the hand’s intending,
Promptly, perfectly,—indeed
Saves the singer from defeat
With her chirrup low and sweet.

Till, at ending, all the judges
Cry with one assent
"Take the prize—a prize who grudges
Such a voice and instrument?
Why, we took your lyre for harp,
So it thrilled us forth F sharp!"

Did the conqueror spurn the creature,
Once its service done?
That’s no such uncommon feature
In the case when Music’s son
Finds his Lotte's power too spent
For aiding soul-development.

No! This other, on returning
Homeward, prize in hand,
Satisfied his bosom's yearning:
(Sir, I hope you understand!)
— Said "Some record there must be
Of this cricket's help to me!"

So, he made himself a statue:
Marble stood, life-size;
On the lyre, he pointed at you,
Perched his partner in the prize;
Never more apart you found
Her, he throned, from him, she crowned.

That's the tale: its application?
Somebody I know
Hopes one day for reputation
Through his poetry that's—Oh,
All so learned and so wise
And deserving of a prize!

If he gains one, will some ticket,
When his statue's built,
Tell the gazer "T was a cricket
Helped my crippled lyre, whose lit
Sweetness' place I, the scale, she chirped?

"For as victory was nighest,
While I sang and played,—
With my lyre at lowest, highest,
Right alike,—one string that made
'Love' sound soft was snapt in twain,
Never to be heard again,—"

"Had not a kind cricket fluttered,
Perched upon the place
Vacant left, and duly uttered
'Love, Love, Love,' whence'er the bass
Asked the treble to stone
For its somewhat sombre drone."

But you don't know music! Wherefore
Keep on casting pearls

To a—poet? All I care for
Is—to tell him that a girl's
"Love" comes aptly when gruff
Grows his singing. (There, enough!)

OH LOVE! LOVE

Translation of a lyric in the Hypsipyle of Euripides, and printed by J. P. Mahaffy in his Euripides, 1879. Mr. Mahaffy writes: "Mr. Browning has honored me with the following translation of these stanzas, so that the green reader may not miss the meaning or the spirit of the ode. The English metre, though strict reproduction, gives an excellent idea of the original."

I

Oh Love! Love, thou that from the eyes of Fusset
Yearning, and on the soul sweet grace inste
cost—
Souls against whom thy hostile march is made—
Never to me be manifest in ire,
Nor, out of time and tune, my peace invade!
Since neither from the fire—
No, nor from the stars— is launched a bit more mighty
Than that of Aphrodité
Hurl'd from the hands of Love, the boy of Zeus for sire.

II

Idly, how idly, by the Alpheian river
And in the Pythian shrines of Phoebus, quire Blood-offerings from the bull, which Heli heaps:
While Love we worship not — the Lord of siren
Worship not him, the very key who keeps
Of Aphrodité, when
She closes up her dearest chamber-portals:
— Love, when he comes to mortals,
Wide-wasting, through those deeps of woe be yon the deep!
The Dramatic Idyls, a group of poems which indicated a return to Browning's earlier manner, furnished the title for two successive volumes, the first series published in 1879, the second the year following. The poems in the first series were composed while Browning and his sister were sojourning in a mountain hotel near the summit of the Splügen Pass in the summer of 1878. So stimulated was Browning by the mountain air that he composed with extraordinary rapidity, even for him, bringing down upon himself his sister's determined caution.

And take the example,—see, not speak, for speech was the Captain's right.

"You clowns on the slope, beware!" cried he: "This woman about to die
Gives by her fate fair warning to such acquaintances as play the spy.
Henceforth who meddles with matters of state above them perhaps will learn
That peasants should stick to their plough-tail, leave to the King the King's concern.

"Here's a quarrel that sets the land on fire, between King George and his foes:
What call has a man of your kind—much less, a woman—to interpose?
Yet you needs must be meddling, folk like you, not foes——so much the worse!
The many and loyal should keep themselves unmixed with the few perverse.

"Is the counsel hard to follow? I gave it you plainly a month ago,
And where was the good? The rebels have learned just all that they need to know.
Not a month since in we quietly marched: a week, and they had the news,
From a list complete of our rank and file to a note of our caps and shoes.

"All about all we did and all we were doing and like to do!
Only, I catch a letter by luck, and capture who wrote it, too.
Some of you men look black enough, but the milk-white face demure Betokens the finger foul with ink: 'tis a woman who writes, be sure!

"Is it 'Dearie, how much I miss your mouth!' —good natural stuff, she pens?
Some sprinkle of that, for a blind, of course: with talk about cocks and hens,
How 'robin has built on the apple-tree, and our creesper which came to grief
Through the frost, we feared, is twining afresh round casement in famous leaf.'

"But all for a blind! She soon glides frank into 'Horrid the place is grown
With Officers here and Privates there, no nook we may call our own:
And Farmer Giles has a tribe to house, and lodging will be to seek
For the second Company sure to come (‘tis whispered) on Monday week.

"And so to the end of the chapter! There!
The murder, you see, was out:
Easy to guess how the change of mind in the rebels was brought about!
Safe in the trap would they now lie snug, had treachery made no sign:
But treachery meets a just reward, no matter if fools malign!

"That traitors had played us false, was proved—sent news which fall so pat:
And the murder was out—this letter of love, the sender of this sent that!
'T is an ugly job, though, all the same—a hateful, to have to deal
With a case of the kind, when a woman’s in fault: we soldiers need nerves of steel!

"So, I gave her a chance, despatched post-haste
A message to Vincent Parkes
Whom she wrote to; easy to find he was, since one of the King’s own clerks, Ay, kept by the King’s own gold in the town
close by where the rebels camp:
A sort of a lawyer, just the man to betray our sort—the scamp!

"If her writing is simple and honest and only
The lover-like stuff it looks,
And if you yourself are a loyalist, nor down in the rebels’ books,
Come quick," said I, "and in person prove you are each of you clear of crime,
Or martial law must take its course: this day
Next week ’s the time!"

"Next week is now: does he come? Not he!
Clean gone, our clerk, in a trice!
He has left his sweetheart here in the lurch: no need of a warning twice!
His own neck free, but his partner’s fast in the noose still, here she stands
To pay for her fault. ’T is an ugly job: but soldiers obey commands.

"And hearken wherefore I make a speech!
Should any acquaintance share
The folly that led to the fault that is now to be punished, let fools beware!
Look black, if you please, but keep hands white: and, above all else, keep wits—
Or sweethearts or what they may be—from ink! Not a word now, on your lives!"

Black? but the Pit’s own pitch was white to
The Captain’s face—the brute
With the bloated cheeks and the bulgy nose and the bloodshot eyes to suit!
He was muddled with wine, they say: more like, he was out of his wits with fear;
He had but a handful of men, that’s true—riots might cost him dear.

And all that time stood Rosamund Pagan, vâs pinioned arms and face
Bandaged about, on the turf marked as in the party’s firing-place.
I hope she was wholly with God: I hope ’twas his angel stretched a hand
To steady her so, like the shape of steeple we see in our church-aisle stand.

I hope there was no vain fancy pierced of bandage to vex her eyes,
No face within which she missed without a question and no replies—
"Why did you leave me to die?"—"Because... Oh, fiends, too soon ye grim
At merely a moment of hall, like that—we heaven as hall ended in!

Let mine end too! He gave the word, up was the guns in a line.
Those heaped on the hill were blind as dead
—for, of all eyes, only mine
Looked over the heads of the foremost rank:
Some fell on their knees in prayer,
Some sank to the earth, but all shut eyes, with a sole exception there.

That was myself, who had stolen up last, hid sidled behind the group:
I am highest of all on the hill-top, there said fixed while the others stoop!
From head to foot in a serpent’s skin was I tightened: I touch ground?
No man Real than a gibbet’s rigid corpse which its fettlers rust around!

Can I speak, can I breathe, can I burst—sight else but see, see, only see?
And see I do—for there comes in sight—a man, it sure must be I—
Who staggeringly, stumblingly rises, falls, rises,
At random flings his weight
On and on, anyhow onward—a man that’s mad he arrives too late!

Else why does he wave a something white high flourished above his head?
Why does not he call, cry, — curse the fool! — why throw up his arms instead?
O take this fist in your own face, fool! Why does not you shout "Stay!"
Here’s a man comes rushing, might and mad with something he ’s mad to say?

And a minute, only a moment, to have hall’s boil up in your brain.
And ere you can judge things right, those heaven, — time’s over, repentance rain!
They level: a volley, a smoke and the cheerest
Of smoke: I see no more
The something white he bore.
but stretched on the field, some half-mile off,
is an object. Surely dumb, deaf, blind were we struck, that nobody heard,
ot one of us saw him come!

Has he fainted through fright? One may well believe! What is it he holds so fast?
Turn him over, examine the face! Heyday!

What, Vincent Parkes at last?

Head! dead as she, by the selfsame shot: one bullet has ended both, her in the body and him in the soul. They laugh at our plighted troth.

'Till death us do part?' 'Till death us do join past parting — that sounds like eternal! indeed! O Vincent Parkes, what need has my fist to strike?

helped you: thus were you dead and wed:
one bound, and your soul reached hers!

Here is etched in your hand the thing, signed, sealed, the paper which plain avers he is innocent, innocent, plain as print, with the King's Arms broad engraved:

So one can hear, but if any one high on the hill can see, she's saved!

and torn his garb and bloody his lips with heart-break — plain it grew
Low the weak's delay had been brought about:
each guess at the end proved true.

was hard to get at the folk in power: such waste of time! and then
Each pleading and praying, with, all the while,
his lamb in the lion's den!

And at length when he wrung their pardon out,
no end to the stupid forms —
The license and leave: I make no doubt — what wonder if passion warms
The pulse in a man if you play with his heart?

— he was something hasty in speech;

Anyhow, none would quicken the work: he had to beseech, beseech!

And the thing once signed, sealed, safe in his grasp,— what followed but fresh delays?
For the fords were out, he was forced to take such a roundabout of ways!

And 'twas "Halt there!" at every turn of the road, since he had to cross the thick
Of the red-coats: what did they care for him and his "Quick, for God's sake, quick!"

How? but he had one: had it how long? till the first knave smirked "You brag
Yourself a friend of the King's? then lend to a King's friend here your nag!"

Money to buy another? Why, piece by piece they plundered him still,
With their "Wait you must,— no help: if aught can help you, a guinea will!"

And a borough there was — I forget the name
— whose Mayor must have the bench

Justice ranged to clear a doubt: for
"Vincent," thinks he, sounds French!

It well may have driven him daft, God knows!
all man can certainly know
Is — rushing and falling and rising, at last he arrived in a horror — so!

When a word, cry, gasp, would have rescued both! Ay, bite me! The worm begins
At his work once more. Had cowardice proved — that only — my sin of sins!
Friends, look you here! Suppose ... suppose
... But mad I am, needs must be!

Judas the Damned would never have dared such a sin as I dream! For, see!

Suppose I had sneakingly loved her myself, my wretched self, and dreamed
In the heart of me "She were better dead than happy and his!" — while gleamed

A light from hell as I spied the pair in a per-fectest embrace,

He the savior and she the saved, — bliss born of the very murder-place!

No! Say I was scared, friends! Call me fool and coward, but nothing worse!

Jeer at the fool and gibe at the coward! "T was ever the coward's curse

That fear breeds fantasies in such: such take their shadow for substance still,
— A fiend at their back. I liked poor Parkes,
— loved Vincent, if you will!

And her — why, I said "Good morrow" to her,
"Good even," and nothing more:
The neighborly way! She was just to me as fitly had been before.

So, coward it is and coward shall be! There's a friend, now! Thanks! A drink

Of water I wanted: and now I can walk, get home by myself, I think.

PHEIDIPPIDES

χαίρετε, μισήν.

First I salute this soil of the blessed, river and rock!

Gods of my birthplace, demons and heroes,
honor to all!

Then I name thee, claim thee for our patron, equal in praise

— Ay, with Zeus the Defender, with Her
of the aegis and spear!

Also, ye of the bow and the buskin, praised be your peer.

Now, henceforth and forever,— O latest to whom I upraise

Hand and heart and voice! For Athens, leave pasture and flock!

Present to help, potent to save, Pan— patron
I call!

Archons of Athens, topped by the tetitik, see, I return!

See, 't is myself here standing alive, no spectre that speaks!
Crowned with the myrtle, did you command me, Athens and you,
"Run, Pheidepides, run and race, reach Sparta for aid!"
Persia has come, we are here, where is She?"
Your command I obeyed.
Sweating and raced: like stubble, some field which a fire runs through,
Was the space between city and city: two days, two nights did I burn
Over the hills, under the dales, down pits and up peaks.

Into their midst I broke: breath served but for "Persia has come!"
Persia bids Athens proffer slaves' tribute, water and earth;
Razed to the ground is Eretria — but Athens, shall Athens sink,
Drop into dust and die — the flower of Hallas utterly die,
Die, with the wide world spitting at Sparta, the stupid, the stander-by?

Answer me quick, what help, what hand do you stretch o'er destruction's brink?
How, when? No care for my limbs! — there's lightning in all and some —
Fresh and fit your message to bear, once lips give it birth!

O my Athens — Sparta love thee? Did Sparta respond?
Every face of her leered in a furrow of envy, mistrust,
Malice, — each eye of her gave me its glitter of gratified hate!
Gravely they turned to take counsel, to cast for excuses. I stood Quivering, — the limbs of me fretting as fire frets, an inch from dry wood:
"Persia has come, Athens asks aid, and still they debate?
Thou, Zeus, thou Zeus! — Athens, are Spartans a quarry beyond Swing of thy spear? Phoebos and Artemis, clang them. "Ye must!"

No bolt launched from Olympus! Lo, their answer at last!
"Has Persia come, — does Athens ask aid, — may Sparta befriend?
Nowise precipitate judgment — too weighty is the issue at stake!
Count we no time lost time which lags through respect to the gods!
Ponder that precept of old, "No warfare, whatever the odds
In your favor, so long as the moon, half-orbed, is unable to take Full-circle her state in the sky!" Already she rounds to it fast:
Athens must wait, patient as we — who judgment suspend."

Athens, — except for that sparkle, — thy name, I had moulder to ash!
That sent a blaze through my blood; off, off and away I back,
— Not one word to waste, one look to lose at the false and the vile.
Yet "O gods of my land!" I cried, ask hillock and plain,
Wood and stream, I knew, I named, raise past them again.
"Have ye kept faith, proved mindful of how we paid you erewhile?
Vain was the filleted victim, the fulsome Nation! Too rash
Love in its choice, paid you so largely serve so slack!

"Oak and olive and bay, — I bid you cease to enwreathe
Brows made bold by your leaf! Fade at the Persian's foot,
You that our patrons were pledged, shall never adorn a slave!
Rather I hail thee, Parnes, — trust to thy will waste tract!
Treeless, herbless, lifeless mountain! What matter if slacked
My speed may hardly be, for homage to ear and to cave
No deity deigns to drape with verdure? at least I can breathe.
Fear in thee no fraud from the blind. as is from the mute!"

Such my cry as, rapid, I ran over Parn's ridge;
Gully and gap I clambered and cleared不小 sudden, a bar
Jutted, a stoppage of stone against me, blocking the way.
Right! for I minded the hollow to traverse, the fissure across:
"Where I could enter, there I depart by!"

Night in the foam?
Out of the day, dive, into the day as bravely arise! No bridge Better!" — when — ha! what was it I came on of wonders that are?

There, in the cool of a cleft, sat he — majestic Pan!
Ivy drooped wanton, kissed his head, was cushioned his hoof:
All the great god was good in the eyes grave kindly — the curl
Carved on the bearded cheek, amused at a mortal's awe, as,
Under the human trunk, the goat-thigh's grand I saw.

"Halt, Pheidepides!" — halt I did, my knees of a whirl Hither to me! Why pale in my presence?" he gracious began:
"How is it, — Athens, only in Hallas, holds me aloof?

"Athens, she only, rears me no fame, makes me no feast!
Wherefore? Than I what godship to Athens more helpful of old?
Ay, and still, and forever her friend! Test Pan, trust me!"
HALBERT AND HOB

Go, bid Athens take heart, laugh Persia to scorn, have faith.
In the temples and tombs! Go, say to Athens,
"The Goat-God saith:
When Persia — so much as strews not the soil
— sinketh in the sea,
Then praise Pan who fought in the ranks with your most and least,
Goat-thigh to gnawed-thigh, made one cause with the free and the bold!"

"Say Pan saith: 'Let this, foreshowing the place, be the pledge!'" (Gay, the liberal hand held out this herbage I bear — Fennel — I grasped it a-tremble with dew — whatever it bode)
"While, as for thee, . . . But enough! He was gone. If I ran hither-to — Be sure that, the rest of my journey, I ran no longer, but flew.
Parnes to Athens — earth no more, the air was my road:
Here am I back. Praise Pan, we stand no more on the razor's edge!
Pan for Athens, Pan for me! I too have a guerdon rare!

Then spoke Miltiades. "And thee, best runner of Greece,
Whose limbs did duty indeed, — what gift is promised thyself?
Tell it us straightway, — Athens the mother demands of her son!"
Rosally blushed the youth: he paused: but, lifting at length
His eyes from the ground, it seemed as he gathered the rest of his strength
Into the utterance — "Pan spoke thus: 'For what thou hast done, Count on a worthy reward! Henceforth be allowed thee release
From the racer's toil, no vulgar reward in praise or in pelf!'"

"I am bold to believe, Pan means reward the most to my mind!
Fight I shall, with our foremost, wherever this fennel may grow,
— Pount — Pan helping us — Persia to dust, and, under the deep,
Whelm her away forever; and then — no Athens to save, —
Marry a certain maid, I know keeps faith to the brave, —
He to my house and home: and, when my children shall creep
Close to my knees, — recount how the God was awful yet kind,
Promised their sire reward to the full — rewarding him — so!"

Un foreseeing one! Yes, he fought on the Marathon day:
So, when Persia was dust, all cried "To Akropolis!

Run, Pheidippides, one race more! the need is thy due!
'Athens is saved, thank Pan,' go about!" He stung down his shield,
Ran like fire once more: and the space 'twixt the Fennel-field
And Athens was stubble again, a field which a fire runs through.
Till in he broke: "Rejoice, we conquer!" Like wine through clay,
Joy in his blood bursting his heart, he died — the bliss!
So, to this day, when friend meets friend, the word of salute
Is still "Rejoice!" — his word which brought rejoicing indeed.
So is Pheidippides happy forever, — the noble strong man
Who could race like a god, bear the face of a god, whom a god loved so well;
He saw the land saved he had helped to save, and was suffered to tell
Such tidings, yet never decline, but, gloriously as he began,
So to end gloriously — once to shout, thereafter be mute:
"Athens is saved!" — Pheidippides dies in the shout for his meed.

HALBERT AND HOB

Here's a thing that happened. Like wild beasts whelped, for den,
In a wild part of North England, there lived once two wild men
Inhabiting one homestead, neither a noble nor hut,
Time out of mind their birthright: father and son, those but —
Such a son, such a father! Most wildness by degrees
Softens away: yet, last of their line, the wild-est and worst were these.
Criminals, then? Why, no: they did not murder and rob;
But, give them a word, they returned a blow —
old Halbert as young Hob:
Harsh and fierce of word, rough and savage of deed,
Hated or feared the more — who knows? — the genuine wild-beast breed.

Thus were they found by the few sparse folk of the countryside;
But how fared each with other? E'en beasts couch, hide by hide,
In a growling, grudging agreement: so, father
And son aye curled
The closest up in their den because the last of their kind in the world.

Still, beast irks beast on occasion. One Christmas night of snow,
Came father and son to words — such words! more cruel because the blow
To crown each word was wanting, while taunt matched gibe, and curse
Competed with oath in wager, like pastime in hell,—nay, worse:
For pastime turned to earnest, as up there sprang at last.
The son at the throat of the father, seized him and held him fast.

"Out of this house you go!" (there followed a hideous oath)—
"This oven where now we bake, too hot to hold us both!
If there’s snow outside, there’s coolness: out with you, bide a spell
In the drift and save the sexton the charge of a parish shell!"

Now, the old trunk was tough, was solid as stump of oak
Untouched at the core by a thousand years: much less had its seventy broke
One whippoorwill nerve in the musely mass from neck to shoulder-blade
Of the mountainous man, whereon his child’s rash hand like a feather weighed.

Nevertheless at once did the mammoth shut his
eyes,
Drop skin to breast, drop hands to sides, stand stiffened — arms and thighs
All of a piece — struck mute, much as a sentry stands.
Patient to take the enemy’s fire: his captain so commands.

Whereat the son’s wrath flew to fury at such sheer soorn
Of his puny strength by the giant old thus acting the babe new-born:
And "Neither will this turn serve!" yelled he.
"Out with you! Trundle, log!
If you cannot tramp and trudge like a man, try all-fours like a dog!"

Still the old man stood mute. So, logwise,— donw to floor
Pulled from his fireside place, dragged on from hearth to door, —
Was he pushed, a very log, staircase along, until
A certain turn in the steps was reached, a yard from the house-door-all.

Then the father opened eyes — each spark of their rage extinct, —
Temples, late black, dead-blanchéd, — right-hand with left-hand linked, — He faced his son submissive; when slow the accents came,
They were strangely mild though his son’s rash hand on his neck lay all the same.

"Hob, on just such a night of a Christmas long ago,
For such a cause, with such a gesture, did I drag — so —

My father down thus far: but, softening heart,
I heard
A voice in my heart, and stopped: you wait in an outer word,
"For your own sake, not mine, soften you tard!
Untrod
Leave this last step we reach, nor brave the finger of God!
I dare not pass its lifting: I did well. I set
blame
Nor praise you. I stopped here: and, Hob, is you the same!"

Straightway the son relaxed his hold of the father’s throat.
They mounted, side by side, to the room again:
Takd either of which, no sign made each but either last
As first, in absolute silence, their Christmas night they passed.

At dawn, the father sat on, dead, in the self-same place,
With an outburst blackening still the old hel
fighting-face:
But the son crouched all a-tremble like an lamb new-veaned.

When he went to the burial, some one’s staff he borrowed, — tottered and leaned.
But his lips were loose, not locked, — kept mut-ing, mumbling. "There!
At his cursing and swearing!" the youngest cried: but the elders thought "a prayer."
A boy threw stones: he picked them up and stored them in his vest.

So tottered, muttered, mumbled he, till he died, perhaps found rest.
"Is there a reason in nature for these hard hearts?" O Lear,
That a reason out of nature must turn them
soft, seems clear!

IVAN IVÀNOVITCH

"THEY tell me, your carpenters," quoth I to my friend the Russ.
"Make a simple hatchet serve as a tool-box serves with us.
Arm but each man with his axe, 't is a hammer and saw and plane
And chisel, and — what know I else? We should imitate in vain
The master to whom we could imitate,
He cleaves, clamps, dovetails in, — no need of our nails and brads, —
The manageable pine: 't is said he could shave
himself;
With the axe, — so all adroit, now a giant and now an elf,
Does he work and play at once!"
Quoth my friend the Russ to me,
Ay, that and more beside on occasion! It scare may be on never heard tell a tale told children, time out of mind,
Y father and mother and nurse, for a moral
That's behind,
Which children quickly seize. If the incident happened at all.
I place it in Peter's time when hearts were great not small,
Umanized, Frenchified. I wager 'tis old to
you
The story of Adam and Eve, and possibly quite as true.''

But the deep of our land, 'tis said, a village from out the woods
Serged on the great main-road 'twixt two great solitudes,
Brought forestry right and left, black verst
And verst of pine,
From village to village runs the road's long
Wide bare line.
Clearance and clearance break the else-unconquered growth
Of pine and all that breeds and broods there,
Leaving loth
As in a house of masterdom, — spot of life, spirit
Of fire
Of star the dark and dread, lest right and rule
expire
Throughout the monstrous wild, a-hungered to resume
An ancient sway, suck back the world into its womb
By man's craft which clove from North to South
His highway broad and straight o'en from the Neva's mouth
Moscow's gates of gold. So, spot of life
And spirit
Of fire aforesaid, burn, each village deathbegirt
Wall and wall of pine — unprobed undreamed abyss.

Why one winter morn, in such a village as
this,
Now-whitened everywhere except the middle road
Now-roughed by track of sledge, there worked
By his abode
An Ivanovitch, the carpenter, employed
In a huge shipman trunk; his axe now
Trimmed and toyed
Fish branch and twig, and now some chop
At the boil
Hung bole to billets, bored at once the sap
And soul.

But him, watched the work his neighbors
Sheepskin-clad;
A bearded mouth, a puffed steam, each gray
Eye twinkled glad
To see the sturdy arm which, never stopping Plays.

Proved strong man's blood still boils, freeze
Winter as he may.
Sudden, a burst of bells. Out of the road, on Edge.
Of the hamlet — horse's hoofs galloping.
"How, a sledge?"
What's here?" cried all as — in, up to the Open space,
Workyard and market-ground, folk's common
Meeting-place. —
Stumbled on, till he fell, in one last bound for Life,
A horse: and, at his heels, a sledge held. —
"Dmitri's wish?"
Back without Dmitri too! and children —
Where are they?
Only a frozen corpse!"

They drew it forth: then — "Nay, not dead, though like to die! Gone hence a month ago:
Home again, this rough jaunt — alone through
Night and snow —
What can the cause be? Hark — Droug, old
Horse, how he groans:
His day's done! Chafe away, keep chafing,
For she moans:
She's coming to! Give here: see, motherkin, your friends!
Cheer up, all safe at home! Warm inside
Makes amends.
For outside cold, — sup quick! Don't look as We were bears!
What is it startles you? What strange adventure stares
Up at us in your face? You know friends —
Which is which?
I'm Vassili, he's Sergei, Ivan Ivanovitch." —

At the word, the woman's eyes, slow-wandering till they neared
The blue eyes o'er the bush of honey-colored Beard.
Took in full light and sense and — torn to rags,
some dream
Which hid the naked truth — O loud and long
The scream.
She gave, as if all power of voice within her Throat
Poured itself wild away to waste in one dread
Note!
Then followed gasps and sob, and then the Steady flow
Of kindly tears: the brain was saved, a
Man might know.
Down fell her face upon the good friend's Propping knee;
His broad hands smoothed her head, as fain to Brush it free.
From fancies, swarms that sting like bees
Unhived. He soothed —
"Loukària, Louùsha!" — still he, fondling,
Smoothed and soothed.
At last her lips formed speech.

"Ivan, dear — you indeed!
You, just the same dear you! While I... Oh, interoede,
Sweet Mother, with thy Son Almighty—let his might return;
Bring yesterday once more, undo all done last night!
But this time yesterday, Ivan, I sat like you,
A child on either knee, and, dearer than the two,
A babe inside my arms, close to my heart—
that’s lost;
In morsels o’er the snow! Father, Son, Holy Ghost, Cannot you bring again my blessed yesterday?"

When no more tears would flow, she told her tale: this way.

"Maybe, a month ago,—was it not?—news came here,
They wanted, deeper down, good workmen fit to rear
A church and roof it in. ‘We’ll go,’ my husband said:
‘None understands like me to melt and mould their lead.’
So, friends, here helped us off—Ivan, dear, you the first!
How gay we jingled forth, all five—(my heart will burst)—
While Dmitri shook the reins, urged Droug upon his track!

“Well, soon the moon ran out, we just were coming back,
When yesterday—behold, the village was on fire!
Fire ran from house to house. What help, as, nigh and nigher,
The flames came furious? ‘Haste,’ cried Dmitri, ‘men must do
The little good man may: to sledge and in with you,
You and our three! We check the fire by laying flat
Each building in its path,—I needs must stay for that,—
But you . . . no time for talk! Wrap round you every rug,
Cover the couple close,—you’ll have the babe to hug,
No care to guide old Droug, he knows his way, by guess,
Once start him on the road: but chinkrap, none the less!
The snow lies glad as glass and hard as steel, and soon
You’ll have rise, fine and full, a marvel of a moon.

Hold straight upon, all the same, this lighted twist of pitch!
Once home and with our friend Ivan Ivanovitch.
All’s safe: I have my pay in pouch, all’s right with me,
So I but find as safe you and our precious three!

Off, Dmitri?—because the flames had reached us, and the men
Shouted ‘But lend a hand, Dmitri—as good as ten!’

“Old Droug, that’s stiff at first, seemed yesteful for the nonce;
He understood the case, galloping straight ahead.
Out came the moon: my twist soon dwindled feebly red
In that unnatural day—yes, daylight, laid between Moonlight and snow-light, lampl’d those groo-depths which screen
Such devils from God’s eye. Ah, pines, how straight you grow,
Nor bend one pitying branch, true breed of brutal snow!
Some undergrowth had served to keep the devils blind
While we escaped outside their border!

"Was that—wind? Anyhow, Droug starts, stops, back go his ears, Sniffs, snorts,—never such a snort! then plumes, how the sough’s
Only the wind: yet, no—our breath goes up too straight!
Still the low sound,—less low, low, louder, at a rate
There’s no mistaking more! Shall I less set look—learn
The truth whatever it be? Pad, pad! At last, I turn—

"‘Tis the regular pad of the wolves in pursuit
Of the life in the sledge!
An arm’s length they are: close-packed they press like
The thrust of a wedge:
They increase as they hunt: for I see, through
The pine-trunks ranged each side,
Slip forth new fiend and fiend, make wider and Still more wide
The four-footed steady advance. The face—most—none may pass:
They are elders and lead the line, eye and eye
Green-glowing braves!
But a long way distant still. Droug, save us!
He does his best:
Yet they gain on us, gain, till they reach,— one reaches . . . How utter the rest?
O that Satan-faced first of the band! How he Tolls out the length of his tongue.
How he laughs and lets gleam his white teeth:
He is on me, his paws try among
The ropes and the rugs! O my pair, my triumphant pigeons, lie still and seem dead!
Stepn, he shall never have you for a meal,— Here’s your mother instead! No, he will not be counselled—must cry, poor Stiöpska, so foolish! though first
Of my boy-brood, he was not the best: many neighbors have called him the worst.
He was puny, an undersized slip,—a darling to me, all the same!
But little there was to be praised in the boy,
And a plenty to blame.
I loved him with heart and soul, yes—beck, deal him a blow for a fault,
He would sulk for whole days, 'Foolish boy! tremble, or the villain will vault. Will snatch you from over my head!' No use! We make, screams — who can hold a boy in a frenzy of fear? It follows — as I foretold!
The Satan-face snatched and snapped: I tugged, I tore — and then
His brother too needs must shriek! If one must go, 'tis men
The tears needs, so we hear, not ailing boys! Perhaps
My hands relaxed their grasp, got tangled in the wraps:
Both, he was gone! I looked: there tumbled the cursed crew,
Each fighting for a share: too busy to pursue!
That's so far gain, at least: Droug, gallop another vest
To two, or three — God sends we beat them, arrive the first?
One mother who boasts two boys was ever accounted rich:
Some have not a boy: some have, but lose him,
— God knows which
S worse: how pitiful to see your weakening
And pale and pass away! Strong brats, this pair of mine!
'O misery! for while I settle to what near seems certain, I am 'ware again of the trap, and arrange gleams —
Point and point — the line, eyes, levelled green brassly fire!
So soon is resumed your chase? Will nothing appease, naught tire
The furiae? And yet I think — I am certain the race is slack.
And the numbers are nothing like. Not a quarter of the pack!
Beasters and those full-fed are staying behind.
We'll sorrow for that too soon! Now, — gallop, reach home, and die,
For ever again leave house, to trust our life in the trap
Or life — we call a sledge! Terebiecha, in my lap!
Yes, I'll lie down upon you, tight-tie you with the strings
Here — of my heart! No fear, this time, your mother flings...
Things? I fling? Never! But think! — a woman, after all, Contending with a wolf! Save you I must and shall, Terror!

"How now? What, you still head the race,
Your eyes and tongue and teeth crave fresh food, Satan-face?
Here and there! Plain I struck green fire out! Flash again?
All a poor fist can do to damage eyes proves vain!
My fate, why not crunch that? He is wanton for... O God,

Why give this wolf his taste? Common wolves scarp and prod
The earth till out they scratch some corpse — mere putrid flesh!
Why must this glutton leave the faded, choose the fresh?
Terror — God, feel! — his neck keeps fast thy bag
Of holy things, saints' bones, this Satan-face will drag
Forth, and devour along with him, our Pope declared
The relics were to save from danger!

"Spurned, not spared!
'T was through my arms, crossed arms, he —
Nuzzling now with stout,
Now ripping, tooth and claw — plucked, pulled Terror out,
A prize indeed! I saw — how could I else but see? —
My precious one — I bit to hold back — pulled from me!
Up came the others, fell to dancing — did the impes!
Skipped as they scampered round. There's one is gray, and limps:
Who knows but old bad Mæpha — she always owed me spite
And envied me my births — skulks out of doors at night
And turns into a wolf, and joins the sisterhood, and lays the youthful life, then slinks from out the wood,
Squats down at door by dawn, spins there demure as erst
— No strength, old crone, — not she! — to crawl forth half a vest!

"Well, I escaped with one: 'twixt one and none there lies
The space 'twixt heaven and hell. And see, a rose-light dye
The endmost snow: 'tis dawn, 'tis day, 'tis safe at home!
We have outwitted you! Ay, monsters, smarl and foam,
Fight each the other fiend, disputing for a share,
Forgetful, in your greed, our finest off we bear, Tough Droug and I. — my babe, my boy that shall be man,
My man that shall be more, do all a hunter can
To trace and follow and find and catch and crushify
Wolves, wolfkins, all your crew! A thousand deaths shall die
The whimperingest cub that ever squeezed the teat!
'Take that!' we'll stab you with, — 'the tenderness we met
When, writhes, you danced round, — not this, thank God — not this!
Hollhounds, we bark you!'
This only of them all has said 'She saves a son!' His fellows disbelieve such luck: but he believes, He lets them pick the bones, laugh at him in their sleeves: He's off and after us,—one speck, one spot, one ball Grows bigger, bound on bound,—one wolf as good as all! Oh, but I know the trick! Have at the smoky tongue! That's the right way with wolves! Go, tell your mates I wrung The panting morsel out, left you to howl your worst! Now for it—now! Ah me! I know him— three-accurs Satan-face,—him to the end my foe!

"All fight's in vain:
This time the green brass points pierce to my very brain.
I fall—fall as I ought—quite on the babe I guard:
I overspread with flesh the whole of him. Too hard
To die this way, torn piscemaeal? Move hence?
Not I—one inch!
Gnaw through me, through and through: flat thus I lie nor shrink!
O God! the feel of the fang furrowing my shoulder!—see!
It grinds—it grates the bone. O Krrrll under me,
Could I do more? Besides he knew wolf's way to win:
I clung, clung round like wax: yet in he wedged and in,
Past my neck, past my breasts, my heart, until
. . . how feels
The onion-bulb your knife parts, pushing through its peels,
Till out you scoop its clove wherein lie stalk and leaf
And bloom and seed unborn?

"That slew me: yes, in brief,
I died then, dead I lay doubtlessly till Droug stopped
Here, I suppose. I come to life, I find me propped
Thus,—how or when or why—I know not.
Tell me, friends, All was a dream: laugh quick and say the nightmare ends!
Soon I shall find my house: 't is over there: in proof,
Save for that chimney heaped with snow,
you'd see the roof
Which holds my three—my two—my one—not one?

"Life's mixed
With misery, yet we live—must live. The Satan fixed
His face on mine so fast, I took its print as pitch

Takes what it cools beneath. Ivan Ivanovitch,
'Tis you unharden me, you thaw, dispense the iced! Only keep looking kind, the horror will remelting.
Your face smooths fast away each print! Satan. Tears
—What good they do! Life's sweet, and at its after-years, Ivan Ivanovitch, I owe you! Yours am I! May God reward you, dear!"

Down she sank. Solemnly
Ivan rose, raised his axe,—for fitly, as at knelt,
Her head lay: well-apart, each side, her aus hung,—dealt
Lightning-swift thunder-strong one blow—need of more!
Headless she knelt on still: that pia we sound at core.
(Neighbors were used to say) —cast-iron-bellied— which Taxed for a second stroke Ivan Ivanovitch.
The man was sound of words as strokes. "It had to be:
I could no other; God it was, bade 'Act is me!'"
Then stooping, peering round—what is it he lacks?
A piece of strip of bark wherewith to wipe his axe.
Which done, he turns, goes in, closes the door behind.
The others mutter remain, watching the blizzard make wind
Into a hinding-place among the splinter-heaps.
At length, still mute, all move: one life—from where it steeps
Radder each ruddy rag of pins—the head:
two more
Take up the dripping body: then, mute still as before,
Move in a sort of march, march on till marching ends
Opposite to the church; where halting,—who suspends,
By its long hair, the thing, deposit in its place
The piteous head: once more the body shows no trace
Of harm done: there lies whole the Lotus maid and wife
And mother, loved until this latest of her life.
Then all sit on the bank of snow which bounds a space
Kept free before the porch of judgment: just the place!
Presently all the souls, man, woman, child, which make
The village up, are found assembling for the sake
Of what is to be done. The very Jews are there:
A Gypsy-troop, though bound with horses for the Fair, quats with the rest. Each heart, with its conception seethes and simmers, but no tongue speaks: one may say, — none breathe.

non from out the church totters the Pope — the priest — hardly alive, so old, a hundred years at least. 7th him, the Commune’s head, a hoary senior too, tàrosta, that’s his style, — like Equity Judge with you. — natural Jurisconsult: then, fenc’d about with foro omeschik, — Lord of the Land, who yields — and none demurs — power of life and death. They stoop, survey the corpse.

hen, straightened on his staff, the Stàrosta — the thorpe’s acquaintance old man — hears what you just have heard, from Droug’s first inrush, all, up to Ivan’s last word — God bless me act for him: I dared not disobey! ”

Ilence — the Pomeschik broke with “A wild wrong way of righting wrong — if wrong there were, such Why was not law observed? What article allows those may please to play the judge, and, judgment dealt, stay executioner, as promptly as we pelt to death, without appeal, the vermin whose sole fault has been — it dared to leave the darkness of its vault, strade upon our day! Too sudden and too rash! What was this woman’s crime? Suppose the church should crush down where I stand, your lord: bound are my serfs to dare their utmost that I escape: yet, if the crashing scene of children — as you are, — if sons fly, one and all, save father to his fate, — poor cowards though I call he runaways, I pause before I claim their life because they prized it more than mine. I would each wife fed for her husband’s sake, each son to save his sire I’m glory, I applaud — scarce duty, I require, the Ivanovitch has done a deed that’s named suffer by law and me: who doubts, may speak unblamed!”

All turned to the old Pope. “Ay, children, I am old — how old, myself have got to know no longer. Rolled quite round, my orb of life, from infancy to age, Seems passing back again to youth. A certain stage At least I reach, or dream I reach, where I discern Truer truths, laws behold more lawlike than we learn When first we set our foot to tread the course I trod With man to guide my steps: who leads me now is God. ’Your young men shall see visions: ’ and in my youth I saw And paid obedience to man’s visionary law: ’Your old men shall dream dreams: ’ and, in my age, a hand Conducts me through the cloud round law to where I stand Firm on its base, — know cause, who, before, knew effect.

“The world lies under me: and nowhere I detect So great a gift as this — God’s own — of human life. ‘Shall the dead praise thee?’ No! ‘The whole live world is rife, God, with thy glory,’ rather! Life then, God’s best of gifts. For what shall man exchange? For life — when so he shifts The weight and turns the scale, lets life for life restore God’s balance, sacrifice the less to gain the more, Substitute — for low life, another’s or his own — Life large and liker God’s who gave it: thus alone May life extinguish life that life may truer be! How low this law descends on earth, is not for me To trace: complexed becomes the simple, intricate The plain, when I pursue law’s winding. ’T is the straight. Outflow of law I know and name: to law, the fount Fresh from God’s footstool, friends, follow while I remount.

“A mother bears a child: perfection is complete So far in such a birth. Enabled to repeat The miracle of life, — herself was born so just A type of womankind, that God sees fit to trust Her with the holy task of giving life in turn. Crowned by this crowning pride, how say you, should she spurn Royalty — discrowned, unhiled, by her choice Of barrenness exchanged for fruit which made rejoice Creation, though life’s self were lost in giving birth To life more fresh and fit to glorify God’s earth? How say you, should the hand God trusted with life’s torch Kindled to light the world — aware of sparks that scorched, Let fall the same? Forsworn, her flesh a fire-flake stings:
The mother drops the child! Among what monstrous things Shall she be classed? Because of motherhood, each male Yields to his partner place, sinks proudly in the scale:
His strength owned weakness, wit — folly, and courage — fear,
Beside the female proved male’s mistress — only here.
The fox-dam, hunger-pined, will slay the felon sire
Who dares assault her whelp: the beaver, stretched on fire,
Will die without a groan: no pang avails to wrest
Her young from where they hide — her sanctuary breast.
What’s here then? Answer me, thou dead one, as, I trow,
Standing at God’s own bar, he bids thee answer now!
Thrice crowned wast thou — each crown of pride, a child — thy charge!
Where are they? Lost? Enough: no need that thou enlarge.
On how or why the loss: life left to utter ‘lost,’
Condemns itself beyond appeal. The soldier’s post
Guards from the foe’s attack the camp he sentinels:
That he no traitor proved, this and this only tells —
Over the corpse of him trod foe to foe’s success. Yet — one by one thy crowns torn from thee —
Thou no less To scare the world, shame God, — livedst! I hold he saw
The unexampled sin, ordained the novel law,
Whereof first instrument was first intelligence Found loyal here. I hold that, failing human sense,
The vault, which had oped, sky fallen, to efface Humanity’s new wrong, motherhood’s first disgrace.
Earth oped not, neither fell the sky, for prompt was found
A man and man enough, head-sober and heart-sound.
Ready to hear God’s voice, resolute to obey.
Iván Ivánovitch, I hold, has done, this day,
No otherwise than did, in ages long ago,
Moses when he made known the purport of that flow
Of fire athwart the law’s twain-tables! I proclaim Iván Ivánovitch God’s servant!”

At which name
Uprose that creepy whisper from out the crowd, is wont.
To swell and surge and sink when fellow-men confront
A punishment that falls on fellow flesh and blood.
Appalling beheld — shudderingly understood.
No less, to be the right, the just, the merciful.
“God’s servant!” hissed the crowd.

When the Amen grew still
And died away and left aquatic plains adjoined.
“Amen!” last sighed the lord. “There’s none shall say I grudged
Escape from punishment in such a novel case.
Deferring to old age and holy life, — be grace
Granted! say I. No less, scruples might slack
Firmer than I boast mine. Law’s law, and evidence Of breach therein lies plain, — blood-red-bright.
— all may see!
Yet all absolve the deed: absolved the deed must be!

“And next — as mercy rules the hour — reconsiders ‘t were well
You signify forthwith its sentence, and dispel
The doubts and fears, I judge, which busied now the head
Law puts a halter round — a halo — you, instead!
Iván Ivánovitch — what think you he expects
Will follow from his feat? Go, tell him — law and judge.
Murder, for once: no need he longer keep behind
The Sacred Pictures — where skulks Innocence emarined.
Or I missay? Go, some! You others, base and hide.
The dismal object there: get done, what’s betide!”

So, while the youngsters raised the corpse, the elders trooped
Silently to the house: where halting, some one stooped,
Listened beside the door; all there was silent too.
Then they held counsel; then pushed door and, passing through,
Stood in the murderer’s presence.

Iván Ivánovitch
Knelt, building on the floor that Kremlin rare and rich
He depthly cut and carved on lazy winter nights. Some five young faces watched, breathlessly, as to rights,
Piece upon piece, he reared the fabric sick complete.
Stóchea, Iván’s old mother, sat spinning by the heat
Of the oven where his wife Katia stood baking bread.
Iván’s self, as he turned his honey-colored head Was just in act to drop, ‘twixt fir-branches, — each a dome, —
The scooped-out yellow gourd presumably the home
Of Kolokol the Big: the bell, therein to hitch.
— An acorn-cup: was ready: Iván Ivánovitch
Turned with it in his mouth.

They told him he was first
As air to walk abroad. “How otherwise?” asked he.
TRAY

This poem describes an actual incident witnessed in Paris by a friend of Browning's, and with accuracy of detail. The poem was written as a protest against vivisection, which the poet called "an infamous practice." He was early associated with Miss Frances Power Cobbe in her efforts to prevent vivisection; and he was a vice-president of the "Victoria Street Society for the Protection of Animals." Dr. Bordoe says, "He always expressed the utmost abhorrence of the practices which it opposes."

To Miss Cobbe he wrote in 1874: "You have heard, 'I take an equal interest with yourself in the effort to suppress vivisection.' I dare not so honor my mere wishes and prayers as to put them for a moment beside your noble acts; but this I know, I would rather submit to the worst of deaths, so far as pain goes, than have a single dog or cat tortured on the pretense of sparing me a twinge or two." He goes on so far as to say that the person not willing to sign the petition against vivisection certainly could not be numbered among his friends. To Miss Stackpoole he wrote in April, 1883: "I deplore and abhor the pleas on behalf of that infamous practice, vivisection." G. W. Cooke.

Sing me a hero! Quench my thirst Of soul, ye bards!

Quoth Bard the first:

"Sir Olaf, the good knight, did don His helm and eke his habergeon... Sir Olaf and his bard ——!

"That sin-scathed brow" (quoth Bard the second),

"That eye wide ope as though Fate beckoned My hero to some steep, beneath Which precipice smiled tempting death... You too without your host have reckoned"

"A beggar-child" (let's hear this third!) Set on a quays edge: like a bird Sang to herself at careless play, And fell into the stream. 'Darnay! Help, you the standers-by!' None stirred.

"Bystanders reason, think of wives And children ere they risk their lives. Over the balustrade has bounced A mere instinctive dog, and pounced Plumb on the prize. 'How well he dives!"

"Up he comes with the child, see, tight In mouth, alive too, clutched from quite A depth of ten feet — twelvemonth later! Good dog! What, off again? There's yet Another child to save? All right!

"How strange we saw no other fall! It's instinct in the animal. Good dog! But he's a long while under: If he got drowned I should not wonder — Strong current, that against the wall!"

"'Here he comes, holds in mouth this time — What may the thing be? Well, that's prime!

Now, did you ever? Reason reigns
In man alone, since all Tray's pains Have fished — the child's doll from the slime!'

"And so, amid the laughter gay, Trotted my hero off, — old Tray, —
Till somebody, prerogated
With reason, reasoned: 'Why he dived, His brain would show us, I should say.

"'John, go and catch — or, if needs be, Purchase — that animal for me!
By vivisection, at expense
Of half-an-hour and eighteenpence,

How brain secretes dog's soul, we'll see!"

NED BRATTS

Written from memory of Bunyan's story of old Tod in The Life and Death of Mr. Badman.

'Twas Bedford Special Assize, one daft Midsummer's Day; A broiling blasting June, — was never its like, men say. Corn stood sheaf-ripe already, and trees looked yellow as that; Ponds drained dust-dry, the cattle lay foaming around each flat. Inside town, dogs went mad, and folk kept bibbing beer, While the parsons prayed for rain. 'T was horrible, yes — but queer; Queer — for the sun laughed gay, yet nobody moved a hand To work one stroke at his trade: as given to understand That all was come to a stop, work and such worldly ways. And the world's old self about to end in a merry blaze, Midsummer's day moreover was the first of Bedford Fair; With Bedford Town's tag-rag and bobtail a-bowling there.

But the Court House, Quality crammed: through doors ope, windows wide, High on the Bench you saw sit Lordships side by side. There frowned Chief Justice Jukes, fumed learned Brother Small, And fretted their fellow Judge: like threshers, one and all, Of a reel with laying down the law in a furnace. Why? Because their lungs breathed flame — the regular crowd for bye —
From gentry pouring in — quite a nosegay, to be sure!
How else could they pass the time, six mortal hours endure?
Till night should extinguish day, when matters might haply mend?
Meanwhile no bad resource was — watching begin and end
Some trial for life and death, in a brisk five minutes’ space,
And betting which knife would ’scape, which hang, from his sort of face.

So, their Lordships toiled and moiled, and a deal of work was done
(I warrant) to justify the mirth of the crazy sun,
As this and t’other lout, struck dumb at the sudden show
Of red robes and white wigs, boggled nor answered "Bob!"

When asked why he, Tom Styles, should not — because Jack Nokes
Had stolen the horse — be hanged: for Judges must have their jokes.
And loot and dues make allowance — let’s say, for some blue fly
Which punctured a dewy scalp where the frizzles stuck away —
Else Tom had festered scot-free, so nearly over done.

Was the main of the job. Full-measure, the genties enjoyed their fun,
As a twenty-five were tried, rank puritans caught at prayer
In a cow-house and laid by the heels, — have at ’em, devil may care! —
And ten were prescribed the whip, and ten a brand on the cheek,
And five a slit of the nose — just leaving enough to tweak.

Well, things at jolly high-tide, amusement steeped in fire,
While noon smote fierce the roof’s red tiles to heart’s desire.
The Court a-simmer with smoke, one ferment of oozy flesh,
One spirituous hummung muck mount-mounting until its mesh Entoiled all heads in a fuster, and Serjeant Postlethwaye
— Dashing the wig oblique as he mopped his oily pate —
Cried "Silence, or I grow grease! No loophole lets in air?"
Jurymen, — Guilty, Death! Gainsay me if you dare!"
— Things at this pitch, I say, — what hubbub without the doors?
What laughs, shrieks, hoots and yells, what rudest of uproars?

Bounce through the barrier throng a bulk comes rolling vast Thumps, kicks, — no manner of use! — spit of them rolls at last
Into the midst a ball, which, bursting, brings to view

Publican Black Ned Bratts and Tabby his tug wife too:
Both in a muck-sweat, both . . . were seen such eyes uplift
At the sight of yawning hell, such nostrils
smote that sniffed
Sulphur, those months in apace ready to swalse flame!
Horrified, hideous, frank fiend-faces! Yet all
the same,
Mixed with a certain . . . oh? how shall I state style — mirth
The depth waste grin of the guess that, could the break from earth,
Heaven was above, and hell might rage its impotence
Below the saved, the saved!

"Confound you! (no offense!) Out of our way, — push, wife! Yonder that Worships be!"
Ned Bratts has reached the bar, and "He, my Lords," roars he,
"A Juror of life and death, Judges the prize of the land."
Constables, jayveiners, — all met, if I understand,
To decide so knotty a point as whether ’s
Jack or Joan
Robb and the henroost, pinched the pig, hit its King’s Arms with a stone,
Dropped the baby down the well, left its tithesman in the lurch,
Or, three whole Sundays running, not attended church!
What a weather! do these deserve the pick stocks or whip,
More or less brow to brand, much or little snip, —
When, in our Public, plain stand we — that’s we stand here
I and my Tab, brass-bold, brick-built of beef and beer,
— Do not we, slut? Step forth and show your beauty, jade!
Wife of my bosom — that’s the word now!
What a trade
We drove! None said us nay: nobody loved his life
So little as wag a tongue against us, — did they
wife?
Yet they knew us all the while, in their hearts for what we are
— Worst couple, rogue and queen, unhanged — search near and far!
Ef, Tab? The poddler, now — o’er his eggs
— who warned a mate
To cut and run, nor risk his pack where it lies of weight
Was the least to dread, — aha, how we laughed a good
As, stealing round the midden, he came — where I stood
With billet poised and raised, — you, ready with the rope,
Ah, but that ‘s past, that ‘s sin repent of, we hope!
NED BRATTS

Men knew us for that same, yet safe and sound stood we!
The lily-livered knaves knew too (I’ve balked a d—)
Our keeping the ‘Pied Bull’ was just a mere pretence:
Too slow the pounds make food, drink, lodging, from out the pence!
There’s not a stoppage to travel has chanceked, this ten long year,
No break into hall or grange, no lifting of nag or steer,
Not a single roguery, from the clipping of a purse
To the cutting of a throat, but paid us toll.
Od’s curse!
When Gypsy Smouch made bold to cheat us of our due,
—Eh, Tab? the Squire’s strong-box we helped the rascal to—
I think he pulled a face, next Sessions’ swinging-time!
He danced the jig that needs no floor,—and,
here’s the prime,
’Twas Scroggs that houghched the mare! Ay, those were busy days!

“‘Well, there we flourished brave, like scripture-trees called bays,
Faring high, drinking hard, in money up to head
—Not to say, boots and shoes, when . . .
Zounds, I nearly said—
Lord, to unlearn one’s language! How shall we labor, wife?
Have you, fast hold, the Book? Grasp, grip it,
for your life!
See, sire, here’s life, salvation! Here’s — hold but out my breath—
When did I speak so long without once swearing?
‘Sdeath,
No, nor unhelped by ale since man and boy!
And yet
All yesterday I had to keep my whistle wet
While reading ‘Tab this Book: book? don’t say ‘book’—they’re plays,
Songs, ballads, and the like: here’s no such strawy blaze,
But skye wide ope, sun, moon, and seven stars
out full-fare!
Tab, help and tall! I’m hoarse. A mug! or —no, a prayer!
Dip for one out of the Book! Who wrote it in the Jail?
—He plied his pen unhelped by beer, sire, I’ll be bail!

“‘I’ve got my second wind. In trundles she—that’s Tab.
‘Why, Gammer, what’s come now, that—bobbin’ like a crab
On Yule-tide bowl—your head’s a-work and both your eyes
Break loose? Afeard, you fool? As if the dead can rise!
Say—Begun Dick was found last May with faddling-cane
Stuffed in his mouth: to choke’s a natural mishap!”

‘Gaffer, be—blessed,’ cries she, ‘and Bagman
Dick as well!
I, you, and he are damned: this Public is our
hell:
We live in fire: live coals don’t feel!—once quenched, they learn—
Cinders do, to what dust they moulder while they burn!’

“‘If you don’t speak straight out,’ says I—belike I swore—
‘A knobstick, well you know the taste of, shall, onece more.
Teach you to talk, my maid!’ She ups with such a face.
Heart sunk inside me. ‘Well, pad on, my prate-apace!’

“‘I’ve been about those lazes we need for . . .
ever mind!
If henceforth they tie hands, ’tis mine they’ll have to bind.
You know who makes them best — the Tinker
in our cage,
Pulled-up for goespelling, twelve years ago: no
age
To try another trade, — yet, so he scorned to take Money he did not earn, he taught himself the
make
Of lazes, tagged and tough — Dick Bagman found them so!
Good customers were we! Well, last week,
you must know,
His girl, — the blind young chit, who hawks
about his wares,
She takes it in her head to come no more — such airs
These hussies have! Yet, since we need a stoutish laze, —
“I’ll to the jail-bird father, abuse her to his face!”
So, first I filled a jug to give me heart, and then,
Primed to the proper pitch, I posted to their den —
Patmore, they style their prison! I tip the turnkey, catch
My heart up, fix my face, and fearless lift the latch —
Both arms akimbo, in bounce with a good round oath
Ready for rapping out: no “Lawks” nor “By my tooth!”

“‘There sat my man, the father. He looked up:
what one feels
When heart that leapt to mouth drops down again to heels.
He raised his hand . . . Hast seen, when drinking out the night.
And in, the day, earth grow another something quite
Under the sun’s first stars? I stood a very stone.

“‘Woman!”’ (a fiery tear he put in every tone),
“How should my child frequent your house
where lust is sport,
Violence — trade? Too true! I trust no vague report.
Her angel’s hand, which stops the sight of sin, leaves clear
The other gate of sense, lets outrage through the ear.
What has she heard! — which, heard shall never be again.
Better lack food than feast, a Dives in the —

Or reign or train — of Charles!” (His language was not ours:
’Tis my belief, God spoke: no tinker has such powers.)

“Bread, only bread they bring — my laces: if we broke
Your lump of leavened sin, the loaf’s first crumb would choke!”

“Down on my marrow-bones! Then all at once rose he:
His brown hair burst a-spread, his eyes were sun’s to see:
Up went his hands: “Through flesh, I reach, I read thy soul!”
So may some stricken tree look blasted, bough and bale,
Champed by the fire-tooth, charred without,
and yet, thrice-bound
With drouthment about, within may life be found.
A prayed power to branch and blossom as before,
Could but the gardener cleave the cloister,
reach the core,
Loosen the vital sap: yet where shall help be
found?
Who says ‘How save it?’ — nor ‘Whyumber
it the ground?’
Woman, that tree art thou! All sloughed about with scorn,
Thy stag-horns fright the sky, thy snake-roots sting the turf!
Drunkenness, wantonness, theft, murder gnash and gnar!
Thine outward, case thy soul with coating like the marble
Satan stamps flat upon each head beneath his hoof!
And how deliver such? The strong men keep aloof,
Lover and friend stand far, the mocking ones pass by,
Tophet gates wide for prey: lost soul, despair and die!
What then? ‘Look unto me and be ye saved!’ saith God:
I strike the rock, outstretches the life-stream at my rod!
Be your sins scarlet, wool shall they seem like, — although
As crimson red, yet turn white as the driven snow!”

“Theret, theret, theret! All I seem to somehow understand

They did not eat

His flesh, nor suck those offs which thence outstret.
Downe’s Progress of the Soul, line 344.

Is — that, if I reached home, ’t was through the guiding hand
Of his blind girl which led and led me through the streets
And out of town and up to door again. We greeted
First thing my eye, as limbs recover from the sway:
A book — this Book she gave at parting.
“Father’s boon —
The book he wrote: it reads as if he spoke
himself:
He cannot preach in bonds, so, — take it down from shelf
When you want counsel, — think you hear is very voice!

“Wicked dear Husband, first despair and then rejoice!
Dear wicked Husband, waste no tick of mouse
more,
Be saved like me, bald trunk! There’s greenness yet at core,
Sap under slough! Read, read, read!

“Let me take breath, my heart!
I’d like to know, are these — here, mine, or Bunyan’s words?
I’m ‘widened — scarce with drink, — never with drink alone!
You’ll say, with heat: but heat’s no stuff to split a stone
Like this black boulder — this first heart of mine: the Book —
That dealt the crashing blow! Sirs, here’s the fist that shook
His beard till Wrestler Jem howled like a just lugged bear!
You had brained me with a feather: at once I grew aware
Christmas was meant for me. A burden at your back.
Good Master Christmas? Nay, — yours was that Joseph’s sack,
— Or whose it was, — which held the cap —
compared with mine!
Robbery loads my loins, perjury cracks my chise.
Adulttery... nay, Tab, you pitched me as I flung!
One word, I’ll up with fist... No, sweet spouse, hold your tongue!

“I’m hasting to the end. The Book, sus-take and read!
You have my history in a nutshell, — ay, indeed!
It must off, my burden! See, — anchor and into pit,
Roll, reach the bottom, rest, rot there — a plague on it!
For a mountain’s sure to fall and bury Belief
Town,
Destruction — that’s the name, and fire shall burn it down!
Oh, ’scape the wrath in time! Time’s now, if you go too late.
How can I pilgrimage up to the wicket-gate?
Next comes Despond the slough: not that I fear to pull
Through mud, and dry my clothes at brave
House Beautiful—
But it’s late in the day, I reckon: had I left
years ago.
Town, wife, and children dear... Well,
Christmas did, you know!—
Soon I had met in the valley and tried my cud-gel’s strength
On the enemy horned and winged, a-straddle across its length!
Have at his horns, thvick—thwack!: they snap, see! Hoof and hoof—
Bang, break the fetlock-bones! For love’s sake, keep aloof
Angles! I’m man and match,—this cudgel for my flail,—
To thrash him, hoof and horn, bat’s wing and serpent’s tail!
A chance gone by! But then, what else does Hopeful dink
Into the deepest Earl except—hope, hope’s the
thing?
Too late! the day for me to thrid the windings: but
There’s still a way to win the race by death’s about!
Did Master Faithful need climb the Delightful Mounts?
No, straight to Vanity Fair,—a fair, by all accounts.
Such as is held outside,—lords, ladies, grand gate-guards:
Says he in the face of them, just what you hear me say.
And the Judges brought him in guilty, and brought him out
To die in the market-place—St. Peter’s Green’s about
The same thing: there they flogged, flayed, buffeted, lanced with knives,
Pricked him with swords,—I’ll swear, he’d fall a cat’s nine lives, —
So to his end at last came Faithful,—ha, ha, ha!
Who holds the highest card? for there stands hid, you see,
Behind the rabble-rout, a chariot, pair and all:
He’s in, he’s off, he’s up, through clouds, at trumpet-call,
Carried the next last way to Heaven-gate! Odds
my life—
Has nobody a sword to spare? not even a knife?
Then hang me, draw and quarter! Tab—do the same by her!
O Master Worldly-Wiseman... that’s Master Interpreter.
Take the will, not the deed! Our gibbet’s handy, close;
Forestall Last Judgment-Day! Be kindly, not morose!
There wants no earthly judge-and-jurying: here
we stand—
Sentence our guilty selves: so, hang us out of hand!
Make haste for pity’s sake! A single moment’s loss
Means—Satan’s lord once more: his whisper shoots across
All singing in my heart, all praying in my brain,
'It comes of heat and beer!'—hark how he guffaws plain!
'To-morrow you'll wake bright, and, in a safe
skin, hug
Your sound selves, Tab and you, over a foaming jug!
You’ve had such qualms before, time out of mind!’ He’s right!
Did not we kick and cuff and curse away, that
night
When home we blindly reeled, and left poor humpback Joe
I’ the lurch to pay for what... somebody did, you know!
Both of us maundered then, ‘Lame humpback,
—never more
Will he come limping. drain his tankard at our door!
He’ll swing, while... somebody’... Says Tab,
‘No, for I’ll teach!’
‘I’m for you, Tab,’ cries I, ‘there’s rope enough for each!’
So blubbered we, and bussed, and went to bed
upon
The grace of Tab’s good thought: by morning,
all was gone!
We laughed—‘What’s life to him, a cripple of no account?’
Oh, waves increase around—I feel them mount and mount!
Hang us! To-morrow brings Tom Bearward with his bears:
One new black-muzzled brute beats Sackerson,
he swears:
(Sackerson, for my money!) And, baiting o’er, the Brawl
They lead on Turner’s Patch,—lads, lasses, up tails all,— I’m it! the thick o’ the throng! That means the Iron Cage,
—Means the Lost Man inside! Where’s hope for such as wage
War against light? Light’s left, light’s here, I hold light still,
So does Tab—make but haste to hang us both!
You will?!”
I promise, when he stopped you might have heard a mouse
Squeak, such a death-like hush sealed up the old Mote House.
But when the mass of man sank meek upon his knees,
While Tab, alongside, wheezed a hoarse “Do hang us, please!”
Why, then the waters rose, no eye but ran with tears,
Hearts heaved, heads thumped, until, paying all past arrears
Of pity and sorrow, at last a regular scream out broke:
Of triumph, joy, and praise.

My Lord Chief Justice spoke,
First mopping brow and cheek, where still, for one that budged,
Another beard broke fresh: “What Judge, that ever judged
DRAMATIC IDYLS

Since first the world began, judged such a case as this?
Why, Master Brats, long since, folks smelt you out, I wis!
I had my doubts, i' faith, each time you played the fox
Convincing geese of crime in yonder witness-box—
Yea, much did I mistrust, the thief that stole her eggs
Was hardly goosey's self at Reynard's game, i' feggs!
Yet thus much was to praise—you spoke to point, direct—
Swore you heard, saw the thief: no jury could suspect—
Dared to suspect,—I'll say,—a spot in white so clear:
Goosey was throttled, true: but thereof godly fear
Came of example set, much as our laws intend;
And, though a fox confessed, you proved the Judge's friend.
What if I had my doubts? Suppose I gave them breath,
Brought you to bar; what work to do, ere 'Guilty, Death'
Had paid our pains! What heaps of witnesses to drag
From holes and corners, paid from out the County's bag!
Trial three dog-days long! Amicus Curiae—that's Your title, no dispute—truth-telling Master Brats!
Thank you, too, Mistress Tab! Why doubt one word you say?
Hanging you both deserve, hanged both shall be this day!
The tinker needs must be a proper man. I've heard
He lies in Jail long since: if Quality's a word
Warrants me letting loose,—some household,
I mean—
Freeholder, better still,—I don't say betwixt
Now and next Sessions... Well! Cassius of his case,
I promised to, at least: we owe him so much grace.
Not that—no, God forbid!—I learn to think as you,
The grace that such repent is any jail-bird's: I rather see the fruit of twelve years' peace
Astraea Redux, Charles restored his rights again!
—Of which, another time! I somehow fail peace
Stealing across the world. May deeds be this increase!
So, Master Sheriff, stay that sentence I pronounced
On those two dozen odd: deserving to be trounced
Soundly, and yet... well, well, at all events dispatch
This pair of—shall I say, sinner-saints?—we catch
Their jail-dissembler too. Stop tears, or I'll dite
All weeping Bedfordsire for turning Bunyanite!

So, forms were galloped through. If Justice on the spur,
Proved somewhat expeditious, would Quality dispatch
And happily hanged they were, — why lengths out my tale?—
Where Bunyan's Statue stands facing what stood his Jail.

SECOND SERIES

"You are sick, that's sure,"—they say:
"Sick of what?"—they disagree.
"'T is the brain,"—thinks Doctor A;
"'T is the heart,"—holds Doctor B;
"The liver—my life I'd lay!"
"The lungs!" "The lights!" Ah me!
So ignorant of man's whole
Of bodily organs plain to see—
So sage and certain, frank and free,
About what's under lock and key—
Man's soul!

ECHETLOS

Here is a story, shall stir you! Stand up,
Greeks dead and gone,
Who breathed, beat Barbarians, stemmed Persia rolling on,
Did the deed and saved the world, for the day was Marathon!

No man but did his manliest, kept rank and fought away
In his tribe and file: up, back, out, down—
the spear-arm play:
Like a wind-whipt branchy wood, all spear-arms a-swing that day!
But one man kept no rank, and his sole arm
plied no spear,
As a flashing came and went, and a form i' the van, the rear,
Brightened the battle up, for he blazed now
there, now here.

Nor helmed nor shielded, he! but, a goat-skin
all his wear,
Like a pillar of the soil, with a clown's limbs
broad and bare,
Went he ploughing on and on: he pushed with a ploughman's share.

Did the weak mid-line give way, as tannies on whom the shark
Precipitates his bulk? Did the right-wing halt when, stark
On his heap of slain lay stretched Kallimachos Polemarch ?

Did the steady phalanx falter? To the rescue,
at the need,
The clown was ploughing Persia, clearing
Greek earth of weed,
As he routeth through the Sakian and rooted up the Mode.

But the deed done, battle won,—nowhere to be described
On the meadow, by the stream, at the marsh, look far and wide
From the foot of the mountain, no, to the last blood-plashed sea-side,—

Not anywhere on view blazed the large limbs
thonged and brown,
Shearing and clearing still with the share
before which—down
To the dust went Persia's pomp, as he ploughed for Greece, that clown!

How spake the Oracle? "Care for no name
at all!
Say but just this: ' We praise one helpful whom we call
The Holder of the Ploughhare.' The great deed ne'er grows small."

Not the great name! Sing—woe for the great name Miltiades
And its end at Paros i' the! Woe for Themistokles
—Satrap in Sardis court! Name not the clown like these!

CLIVE

Browning had this story from Mrs. Jameson as early as 1846, she in turn having just heard Macanlay tell it. Browning's own narrative preceded Clive's death by a week only.

I AND Clive were friends — and why not?
Friends! I think you laugh, my lad.

Clive it was gave England India, while your father gives — egad, England nothing but the graceless boy who lures him on to speak —
"Well, Sir, you and Clive were comrades —" with a tongue thrust in your cheek!
Very true: in my eyes, your eyes, all the world's eyes, Clive was man,
I was, and ever shall be — mouse, nay,
mouse of all its clan.

Sorriest sample, if you take the kitchen's estimate for fame;
While the man Clive — he fought Plassy,
spoiled the clever foreign game,
Conquered and annexed and Englished!

Never mind! As o'er my punch (You away) I sit of evenings, — silence, save for biscuit crunch,
Black, unbroken, — thought grows busy, thrids
each pathway of old years,
Notes this forthright, that meander, till the long-past life appears
Like an outspread map of country plodded through, each mile and rood,
Once, and well remembered still, — I'm startled in my solitude
Ever and anon by — what's the sudden mockning light that breaks
On me as I slap the table till no rummer-glass
but shakes
While I ask — aloud, I do believe, God help me! — "Was it thus?"
Can it be that so I faltered, stopped when just one step for us —"
(Us, — you were not born, I grant, but surely some day born would be)
"— One bold step had gained a province"
(figureative talk, you see)
"Got no end of wealth and honor, — yet I stood stock-still no less?"
"— For I was not Clive," you comment: but it needs no Clive to guess Wealth were hardly, honor ticklish, did no writing on the wall
Warn me 'Trespasser, 'ware man-traps!'
"Him who braves that notice — call Hero! none of such heroes suit myself who read plain words,
Doff my hat, and leap no barrier. Scripture says, the land 's the Lord's:
Louts then — what avail the thousand, noisy
in a smock-frocked ring,
All-egog to have me trespass, clear the fence,
be Clive their king?
Higher warrant must you show me ere I set one foot before
'T other in that dark direction, though I stand forevermore
Poor as Job and meek as Moses. Evermore?
No! By and by Job grows rich and Moses valiant, Clive turns out less wise than I.

Don't object "Why call him friend, then?"
Power is power, my boy, and still Marks a man, — God's gift magnifico, exercised for good or ill.
You've your boot now on my hearth-rug,
A tiger's skin: Rarely such a royal monster as I lodged the bullet in! True, he murdered half a village, so his own death came to pass;
Still, for size and beauty, cunning, courage—ah, the brute he was! Why, Clive, that youth, that greenhorn, that quill-driving clerk, in fine,—He sustained a siege in Acre . . . But the world knows! Pass the wine.

Where did I break off at? How bring Clive in? Oh, you mentioned "fear"! Just so: and, said I, that minds me of a story you shall hear.

We were friends then, Clive and I: so, when the clouds, about the orb Late supreme, encroaching slowly, surely, threatened to absorb Ray by ray its nocturne brilliance,—friendship might, with steadier eye Drawing near, bear what had burned else, now no blaze— all majesty. Too much bee's-wing floats my figure? Well, suppose a castle's new:
None presume to climb its ramparts, none find foothold sure for shoe 'Twixt those squares and squares of granite platting the impervious pile. As his scale-mail's warty iron cuissares a crocodile.
Reels that castle thunder-smitten, storm-dismantled? From without Scrambling up by crack and crevice, every cockney prates about Towers—the heap he kicks now! turrets—just the measure of his cane! Will that do? Observe moreover—(same similitude again)—Such a castle seldom crumbles by sheer stress of cannonade: 'Tis when foes are foiled and fighting's finished that vile rains invade, Grass o'er grows, o'er grows till night-birds congregating find no holes Fit to build in like the topmost sockets made for banner-poles. So Clive crumbled slow in London, crashed at last.

A week before,
Dining with him,—after trying churchyard chat of days of yore,— Both of us stopped, tired as tombstones, head-piece, foot-piece, when they lean Each to other, drowsed in fog-smoke, o'er a dullfined Past between. As I saw his head sink heavy, guessed the soul's extinguishment By the glazing eyeball, noticed how the furtive fingers went Where a drug-box skulked behind the honest liqueur. One more throw Try for Clive! I thought I: "Let's venture some good rattling question!" So— "Come Clive, tell us"—out I blurt—"what to tell in turn, years hence, When my boy—suppose I have one—shall be on what evidence I maintain my friend of Plassey proved a warrior every whit Worth your Alexanders, Cussels, Marlboroughs and—what said Pitt?—Frederick, the Fierce himself! Clive told us once"—I want to say— "Which feat out of all those famous doesang the bell away—In his own calm estimation, mark you, as the mob's rough guess—Which stood foremost as evincing what God called courageousness— Come! what moment of the minute, the speck-centre in the wide Circle of the action saw your mortal folly defended? (Let alone that filthy sleep-stuff, swallow tell this wholesome Port!) If a friend has leave to question, —when we must brave, in short?"

Up he arched his brows o' the instant—suddenly Clive again. "When was I most brave? I'd answer, was the instance half as plain As another instance that's a brain-lodged crystal—curse it!—here Frozing when my memory touches—ugh!—the time I felt most fear.
Ugh! I cannot say for certain if I showed it—anyhow, Fear I felt, and, very likely, shuddered, sir I shiver now."

"Fear!" smiled I. "Well, that's the raw: that's a specimen to seek. Ticket up in one's museum, Mind-Freaks, Ltd. Clive's Fear, Unique!"

Down his brows dropped. On the table painfully he pored as though Tracing, in the stains and streaks there, thoughts encrusted long ago. When he spoke 't was like a lawyer reading word by word some will, Some blind jungle of a statement,—beating as on until Out there leaps fierce life to fight with.

"This fell in my foster days—Deak-drudge, slaving at Saint David's, must game, or drink, or erase. I chose gaming: and, because your high-flying gamesters hardly take Umbrage at a factor's elbow if the factor pays his stake,—I was winked at in a circle where the company was choice. Captain This and Major That, men high of color, loud of voice, Yet indulgent, condescending to the modest juvenile Who not merely risked but lost his hard-earned guineas with a smile.
CLIVE

"Down I sat to cards, one evening, — had for my antagonist
Somebody whose name ’s a secret — you ’ll know why — so, if you list.
Call him Cockey the Walk, my scarlet son of Mars from head to heel!
Play commenced: and, whether Cockey fancied that a clerk must feel Quite sufficient to honor came of bending over one green baize,
I the scribe with him the warrior, guessed no penman dared to raise
Shadow of objection should the honor stay but playing end.
More or less abruptly, — whether disinclined he grew to spend
Practice strictly scientific on a booby born to stare
At — not seek of — laces and ruffles if the hand
they hide plays fair, —
Anyhow, I marked a movement when he bade me ’Cut’!

"I rose.
‘Such the new manœuvre, Captain? I ’m a novice: knowledge grows.
What, you force a card, you cheat, Sir?’

"Never did a thunder-clap
Cause emotion, startle Thrasius locked with Chloe in his lap,
As my word and gesture (down I flung my canvas ball in the pack)
Fired the man of arms, whose visage, simply red before, turned black.

When he found his voice, he stammered ’That expression once again!’

"‘Well, you forced a card and cheated!’

‘Possibly a factor’s brain,
Buzied with his all-important balance of accounts, may dream
Weighing words superfluous: cheat to clerkly ears may seem Just the joke for friends to venture: but we are not friends, you see!
When a gentleman is joked with, — if he’s good at repartee,
He rejoins, as do I — Sirrah, on your knees,
withdraw in full!
Beg my pardon, or be sure a kindly bullet through your skull
Lies in light and teaches manner to what brain
it finds! Choose quick —
Have your life snuffed out or, kneeling, pray me trim you candle-wick!’

‘Well, you cheated!’
‘Then outbroke a howl from all the friends around.
To his feet sprang each in fury, fists were clenched and teeth were ground.
‘End it! no time like the present! Captain,
yours were our disgrace!
No delay, begin and finish! Stand back, leave the pair a space!'

Let civilians be instructed: henceforth simply fly the pen.
Fly the sword! This clerk ’s no swordsman?
Suit him with a pistol, then!
Even odds! A dozen paces ’twixt the most and least expert
Make a dwarf a giant’s equal: nay, the dwarf,
if he ’s alert,
Likelier hits the broader target!’

"Up we stood accordingly.
As they handed me the weapon, such was my soul’s thirst to try
Then and there conclusions with this bully, tried on and stamp out
Every spark of his existence, that, — crept close to, curled about
By that toyng tempting teasing fool-finger’s middle joint, —
Don’t you guess? — the trigger yielded. Gone my chance! and at the point
Of such prime success moreover: scarce an inch above his head Went my ball to hit the wainscot. He was living, I was dead.

"Up he marched in flaming triumph — ’twas his right, mind! — up, within Just an arm’s length. ‘Now, my clerkling,’ shookled Cockey with a grin
As the levelled piece quite touched me, ‘Now,
Sir Counting-House, repeat
That expression which I told you proved bad manners! Did I cheat?’

‘‘Cheat you did, you knew you cheated, and,
this moment, know as well.
As for me, my homely breeding bids you — fire and go to Hell!’

‘Twice the muzzle touched my forehead.
Heavy barrel, fluttered wrist,
Either spoils a steady lifting. Thrice: then,
‘Laugh at Hell who list.
I can’t! God’s no fable either. Did this boy’s eye wink once? No!
There’s no standing him and Hell and God all three against me, — so,
I did cheat!’

‘And down he threw the pistol, out rushed
— by the door
Possibly, but, as for knowledge if by chimney,
roof or floor,
He effected disappearance — I’ll engage no glance was sent
That way by a single starrer, such a blank astonishment
Swallowed up their senses: as for speaking — mute they stood as mice.

‘Mute not long, though! Such reaction, such a hubbub in a trice!
‘Rogue and rascal! Who’d have thought it?
What’s to be expected next,
When His Majesty’s Commission serves a sharper as pretext
For... But where's the need of wasting time now? Naught requires delay:

Punishment the Service cries for: let disgrace

take away
Publicly, in good broad daylight! Resignation? No, indeed!
Drum and fife must play the Rogue's-March,
rank and file be free to speed
Tardy marching on the rogue's part by applicance in the rear
— Kicks administered shall right this wronged
the place, — never fear,
Mister Clive, for — though a clerk — you bore yourself — suppose we say —
Just as would become a soldier?

"'Gentlemen, attention — pray!
First, one word!"

"I passed each speaker severally in review,
When I had precise their number, names and styles, and fully knew
Over whom my supervision thenceforth must extend, — why, then —

"'Some five minutes since, my life lay — as you all saw, gentlemen —
At the mercy of your friend there. Not a single voice was raised
In arrest of judgment, not one tongue — before my powder blazed —
Ventured "Can it be the youngster blundered, really seemed to mark
Some irregular proceeding? We conjecture in Guess at random, — still, for sake of fair play
— what if for a freak,
In a fit of absence, — such things have been! — if our friend proved weak
— What's the phrase? — corrected fortune!
Look into the case, at least!"
Who dared interpose between the altar's victim and the priest?
Yet he spared me! You eleven! Whosoever,
all or each,
To the disadvantage of the man who spared me, utters speech
— To his face, behind his back, — that speaker
has to do with me:
Me who promise, if positions change and mine
the chances should be,
Not to imitate your friend and waive adantage?"

"Twenty-five Years ago this matter happened: and 'tis certain," added Clive,
"Never, to my knowledge, did Sir Cocky have a single breath
Breathed against him: lips were closed throughout his life, or since his death,
For if he be dead or living I can tell no more than you.
All I know is, Sir Cocky had one chance more;
how he used it, — grew Out of such unlucky habits, or relapsed, and back again

Brought the late-ejected devil with a sum more in his train, —
That's for you to judge. Reprieve I proceed, at any rate.
Ugh — the memory of that minute's fear makes gooseflesh rise! Why prate Longer? You've my story, there's your instance: fear I did, you see!"

"'Well" — I hardly kept from laughing — "if
I see it, thanks must be Wholly to your Lordship's candor. Not the
— in a common case —
When a bully caught at cheating threats: a pistol in one's face,
I should under-rate, believe me, such a trial to the nerve!
'T is no joke, at one-and-twenty, for a youth to stand nor swerve.
Fear I naturally look for — unless, of all men
alive,
I am forced to make exception when I come to Robert Clive.
Since at Arakan, Plassey, elsewhere, he and death
— the whole world knows —
Came to somewhat closer quarters."

Quarters? Had we come to blows
Clive and I, you had not wondered — up he sprang so, out he rapped
Such a round of oaths — no matter! I'll en-deravor to adapt
To our modern usage words he — well, 'twas friendly license — flung
At me like so many fire-balls, fast as he could wag his tongue.

"You — a soldier? You — at Plassey? Yours
the faculty to nick Instantaneously occasion when your foe, if lightning-quick,
— At his mercy, at his malice, — has you,
through some stupid inch Unprotected in your bulwark? Thus laid open,
— not to flinch
— That needs courage, you'll concede me?
Then, look here! Suppose the man
Checking his advance, his weapon still extended, not a span
Distant from my temple, — curse him! — quietly had bade me, 'There!'
Keep your life, calumniator! — worthless life!
freely spare:
Mine you freely would have taken — murderd
me and my good fame
Both at once — and all the better! Go, and thank your own bad aim Which permits me to forgive you! 'What if,
with such words as these,
He had cast away his weapon? How should
I have borne me, please?
Nay, I'll spare you pains and tell you. This and only this, remained — Pick his weapon up and use it on myself. If so had gained
Sleep the earlier, leaving England probably to pay on still
MULÉYKEH

MULÉYKEH, peerless mare, owned master the match of you. And you are my prize, my Pearl: I laugh at men's land and gold!

"So in the pride of his soul laughs Hóseyn — and right, I say. Do the ten steeds run a race of glory? Outstripping all, Ever Mulykeh stands first steed at the victor's staff.

Who started, the owner's hope, gets shamed and named, that day. Silence,' or, last but one, is 'The Cuffed,' as we use to call Whom the paddock's lord thrusts forth. Right, Hóseyn, I say, to laugh!"

"Boasts he Mulykeh the Pearl?" the stranger repliès: "Be sure. On him I waste nor scorn nor pity, but lavish both On Duhl the son of Shéyban, who withers away in heart For envy of Hóseyn's luck. Such sickness admits no cure. A certain poet has sung, and sealed the same with an oath, 'For the vulgar — flocks and herds! The Pearl is a prize apart.'"

Lo, Duhl the son of Shéyban comes riding to Hoséyn's tent, And he casts his saddle down, and enters and "Peace!" bids he. "You are poor, I know the cause: my plenty shall mend the wrong. 'Tis said of your Pearl—the price of a hundred camels spent In her purchase were scarce ill paid: such prudence is far from me Who proffer a thousand. Speak! Long parley may last too long."

Said Hóseyn. "You feed young beasts a many, of famous breed, Slit-eared, unblemished, fat, true offspring of Midzamnun: There stumbles no weak-eyed she in the line as it climbs the hill. But I love Mulykeh's face: her forefront whitens indeed Like a yellowish wave's cream-crest. Your camels — go gaze on them! Her fatlock is foam-splashed too. Myself am the richer still!"

A year goes by: lo, back to the tent again rides Duhl. "You are open-hearted, ay — moist-handed, a very prince. Why should I speak of sale? Be the mare your simple gift! My son is pined to death for her beauty: my wife prompts — Fool, Beg for his sake the Pearl! Be God the rewarder, since mt and taxes for half India, tenant at the Frenchman's will."

Such the turn," said I, "the matter takes with you? Then I abate No, by not one jot nor title,—of your act my estimate. No, by not one jot nor title,—of your act my estimate. Sar—ing wish I 'Yes' detect there: courage fronts me, plain enough — all it desperation, madness — never mind! for here's in rough Ty, bad mine been such a trial, fear had overcome disgrace. me, disgrace were hard to bear: but such a rush against God's face.

None of that for me, Lord Plasy, since I go to church at times, by the creed my mother taught me! Many years in foreign climes abounds marks away — not all, though! We poor sinners reach life's brink, verilook what rolls beneath it, recklessly enough, but think here's advantage in what's left us — ground to stand on, time to call Lord, have mercy! ere we topple over — do not leap, that's all!

a, he made no answer, re-absorbed into his cloud, I caught something like 'Yes' courage: only fools will call it fear.'"

If a stranger passed the tent of Hóseyn, he cried "A chair's!" He happily "God help the man who has neither salt nor bread!"

"Nay," would a friend exclaim, "he needs nor pity nor scorn More than who spends small thought on the shore-sand, picking pearls, — holds but in light esteem the seed-sort, bears instead On his breast a moon-like prize, some orb which of night makes morn."

"What if no flocks and herds enrich the son of Sinán? They went when his tribe was mulet, ten thousand camels the due, Blood-value paid perforce for a murder done of old. God gave them, let them go! But never since time began, God pays debts seven for one: who squanders on Him shows thrift."

Said Hûsûn, "God gives each man one life, like a lamp, then gives
That lamp due measure of oil: lamp lighted — hold high, wave wide
Its comfort for others to share! once quench it, what help is left?
The oil of your lamp is your son: I shine while Muléyêlah lives.
Would I beg your son to cheer my dark if Muléyêlah died?
It is life against life: what good avails to the life-bereft?"

Another year, and — hist! What craft is it
Duhl designs?
He slights not at the door of the tent as he did last time,
But, creeping behind, he gropes his stealthy way through the trench
Half-round till he finds the flap in the folding, for night combines
With the robber — and such is he: Duhl, covetous up to crime,
Must wring from Hûsûn's grasp the Pearl, by whatever the wrench.

"He was hunger-bitten, I heard: I tempted with half my store,
And a gibe was all my thanks. Is he generous like Spring dew?
Account the fault to me who chaffered with such an one!
He had killed, to feast chance comers, the creature he rode: nay, more—
For a couple of singing-girls his robe has he torn in two:
I will beg! Yet I nowise gained by the tale of my wife and son.

"I swear by the Holy House, my head will I never wash
Till I filch his Pearl away. Fair dealing I tried, then guile,
And now I resort to force. He said we must live or die:
Let him die, then, — let me live! Be bold — but not too rash!
I have found me a peeping-place: breast, bury your breathing while
I explore for myself! Now, breathe! He deceived me not, the spy!

"As he said — there lies in peace Hûsûn — how happy! Beside Stands tethered the Pearl; thrice winds her headstall about his wrist:
'Tis therefore he sleeps so sound — the moon through the roof reveals.
And, loose on his left, stands too that other, known far and wide,
Buhéyêsh, her sister born: fleet is she yet ever missed
The winning tail's fire-flash a-stream past the thunderous heels.
PIETRO OF ABANO

Country yelled "Aroint the churl who prophesieses we take no plesance
Under vine and fig-tree, since the year’s delirious,
Bears no crop of any kind,—all through the planet Mars!"

Straightway would the whilom youngster grow
a grisard,
Or, as case might hap, the hoary old drop off
and show a striping.
Town and country groaned,—indebted to a wizard!
"Curse—nay, kick and cuff him—fit requital
of his pains!
Gratitude in word or deed were wasted truly!
Rather make the Church amends by crying out on, cramming, crippling
One who, on pretence of serving man, serves duly
Man’s arch foe: not ours, be sure, but Satan’s
—his the gains!"

Peter grinned and bore it, such disgraceful usage:
Somehow, cuffs and kicks and curses seem ordained his like to suffer:
Prophet’s pay with Christians, now as in the Jews’ age,
Still is—stoning: so, he meekly took his wage and went,
—Safe again was found ensconced in those old quarters,
Padúa’s blackest blindest by-street,—none the worse, nay, somewhat tougher:
"Calculating," quoth he, "soon I join the martrys,
Since, who magnify my lore on burning me are
bent.” 1

Therefore, on a certain evening, to his alley
Peter slunk, all bruised and broken, sore in body, sick in spirit,
Just escaped from Cairo where he launched a galley
Needling neither sails nor oars nor help of wind or tide, —
— Needing but the fume of fire to set a-flying
Wheels like mad which whirled you quick—
North, South, where’er you pleased require it,
That is—would have done so had not priests
come prying,
Broke his engine up and bastinadoed him be-
side.

As he reached his lodging, stopped there unmo-tested.
(Neighbors feared him,urchins fled him, few were bold enough to follow)
While his fumbling fingers tried the lock and tested
Once again the queer key’s virtue, oped the sullen door—
Some one plucked his sleeve, cried, "Master, pray your pardon!

1 See note at end of volume.
Grant a word to me who patient wait you in your archway’s hollow!
Hard on you men’s hearts are: be not your heart hard on Me who kiss your garment’s hem, O Lord of magic lore!

"Mage — say I, who no less, scornest tittle-tattle,
To the vulgar give no credence when they prate of Peter’s magic,
Deem his art brews tempest, hurts the crops and cattle,
Hinders fowls from laying eggs and worms from spinning silk.
Rides upon a he-goat, mounts at need a broomstick:
While the price he pays for this (so turns to comic what was tragic)
Is — he may not drink — dreads like the Day of Doom’s tick —
One poor drop of sustenance ordained mere men
— that’s milk!

"Tell such tales to Padua! Think me no such dullard!
Not from these benighted parts did I derive my breath and being!
I am from a land whose cloudless skies are colored
Livelier, suns orb largier, airs seem innocence,
food for song.
What, instead of grass, our fingers and our thumbs pull,
Proves true moly! sounds and sights there help the body’s hearing, seeing,
Till the soul grows godlike: brief — you front
Shaming by ineptitude the Greeks that gave him birth!

"Mark within my eye its iris mystic-lettered
That’s my name! and note my ear — its swan-shaped cavity, my emblem!
Mine’s the swan-like nature born to fly unfettered
Over land and sea in search of knowledge — Art denied the vulgar! Geese grow fat on barley,
Swans require ethereal provend, undesirous to resemble ‘em —
Soar to seek Apollo — favored with a parley
Such as, Man, you grant me — who will not hold you long.

"Leave to learn to sing — for that your swan
petitions:
Master, who possess the secret, say not nay to such a suitor!
All I ask is — bless mine, purest of ambitions!
Grant me leave to make my kind wise, free,
and happy! How?
Just by making me — as you are mine — their Gods have goose-thoughts: make a swan their teacher first, then coadjut, —

Let him introduce swan-notions to each
side —
Geese will soon grow swans, and men because what I am now!

"That’s the only magic — had but fools dis cernment,
Could they probe and pass into the solid through the soft and seeming!
Teach me such true magic — now, and no di
mction!
Teach your art of making fools subservce the man of mind!
Magic is the power we men of mind shall practice,
Draw fools to become our drudges — deceits
henceforth, never dreaming —
While they do our hosts for fancied gain — the fact is
What they toil and moil to get proves false hood: truth’s behind!

"See now! you conceive some fabric — say, a manse!
Meet for monarch’s pride and pleasure: this is truth — a thought that has fired you,
Made you fain to give some cramped concept expansion,
Put your faculty to proof, fulfill your nature’s task.
First you fascinate the monarch’s self: he fas
ce it
He it was devised the scheme you execute as he inspired you:
He in turn sets slaving insignificances
Toiling, moiling till your structure stands thee
— all you ask!

"Soon the monarch’s known for what he was
— a ninny:
Soon the rabble-rout leave labor, take their work-day wage and vanish:
Soon the late puffed bladder, pricked, shows
lank and skinny —
‘Who was its inflator?’ ask we, ‘whose the giant lungs’
Petre en puimones! What though men prove ingrates?
Let them — so they stop at crucifixion — buffet
ban and banish.
Peter’s power’s apparent: human praise — its din grates
Harsh as blame on ear unused to aught save angels’ tongues.

"Ay, there have been always, since our world
existed,
Mages who possessed the secret — needed but to stand still, fix eye
On the foolish mortal: straight was he castled Soldier, scholar, servant, slave — no matter for the style!
Only through illusion; ever what seemed profit —
Love or lucre — justified obedience to the Ipo di —
Work done — palace reared from pavement up to soffit —
PIETRO OF ABANO

Was it strange if builders smelt out cheating all the while?

"Let them pelt and pound, bruise, Bray you in a mortar!
What's the odds to you who seek reward of quite another nature?
You've enrolled your name where sages of your lineage are,
—Michael of Constantinople, Hans of Halberstadt!
Nay and were you nameless, still you've your conviction
You it was and only you — what signifies the omenclature? —
Ruled the world in fact, though how you ruled be fiction
Fit for fools: true wisdom's magic you — if e'er man — had 't!

"But perhaps you ask me, 'Since each ignorans
While he proffits by such magic persecutes the benefactor,
What should I expect but — once I render fame
You as Michael, Hans, and Peter — just one ingrate more?
If the vulgar prove thus, whatsoe'er the pelf be,
Ponched through my beneficence — and doom announced, chained, or racked, or Fairly burned outright — how grateful will yourself be
When, his secret gained, you match your — master just before?'

"That's where I await you! Please, revert a little!
What do folk report about you if not this —
which, though chimeric,
Still, as figurative, suits you to a tittle —
That, — although the elements obey your nod
and wink,
Fades or flowers the herb you chance to smile
or sigh at,
While your frown bids earth quake pulsed by obscuration atmospheric —
Brief, although through nature naught resists your fiat,
There's yet one poor substance mocks you — milk you may not drink!

"Figurative language! Take my explanation!
Fame with fear, and hate with homage, those your art procures in plenty.
All's but daily dry bread: what makes the ration?
Love, the milk that sweetens man's meal —
also, you lack:
I am he, who, since he fears you not, can love
you.
Love is born of heart not mind, de corde natus
haud de mente:
Touch my heart and love's yours, sure as shines above you
Sun by day and star by night though earth should go to wrack!

"Stage by stage you lift me — kiss by kiss I hallow
Whose but your dear hand my helper, punctual
as at each new impulse
I approach my aim? Shell chipped, the eaglet callow
Needs a parent's pinion-push to quit the eye's
edge:
But once fairly launched forth, denizen of ether,
While each effort sunward bids the blood more freely through each limb pulse,
Sure the parent feels, as gay they soar together,
Fuly are all pains repaid when love redeems its pledge!

Then did Peter's trustful visage lighten somewhat,
Vented a watery smile as though inveterate mistrust were thawing.
"Well, who knows?" he slow broke silence.
"Mortals come what
Come there may — are still the dupes of hope there's luck in store.
Many scholars seek me, promise mounts and marvels:
Here stand I to witness how they step 'twixt me and clapper-clawing!
Dry bread, — that I've gained me: truly I should starve else:
But of milk, no drop was mine! Well, shuffle cards once more!"

At the word of promise thus implied, our stranger —
What can he but cast his arms, in rapture of embrace, round Peter?
"Hold! I choke!" the mage grunts. "Shall
I in the manger
Any longer play the dog? Approach, my calf, and feed!
Bene . . . won't you wait for grace?"
But sudden incense
Wool-white, serpent-solid, curled up — perfume growing sweet and sweeter.
Till it reached the young man's nose and seemed to win sense
Soul and all from out his brain through nostril:
yes, indeed!

Presently the young man rubbed his eyes.
"Where am I?"
Too much bother over books! Some reverie has proved amusing.
What did Peter prate of? 'Faith, my brow is clammy!'
How my head throbs, how my heart thumps!
Can it be I swooned?
Oh, I spoke my speech out — cribbed from Plato's tractate,
Dosed him with 'the Fair and Good,' swore —
Dog of Egypt — I was choosing
Plato's way to serve men! What's the hour?
Exact eight!
Home now, and to-morrow never mind how Plato mooned!

"Peter has the secret! Fair and Good are products
(So he said) of Foul and Evil: one must bring up the other.
Just as poisons grow drugs, steal through sundry odd ducts
Doctors name, and ultimately issue safe and
changed.
You’d abolish poisons, treat disease with dainties
Such as suit the sound and sane? With all such kioskaws vain you pother!
Arsenic’s the stuff puts force into the faint
eyes,
Opium sets the brain to rights — by sark and care deranged.

"What, he’s safe within door? — would escape
— no question.
Thanks, since thanks and more I owe, and mean to pay in time befitting.
What most presses now is — after night’s digestion,
Peter, of thy precepts! — promptest practice of
the same.
Let me see! The wise man, first of all, soorns riches:
But to scorn them must obtain them: none believes in his permitting
Gold to lie ungathered: who picks up, then pitches
Gold away — philosophizes: none disputes his
claim.

"So with worldly honors: ’tis by abdicating, Incontestably he proves he could have kept the crown discarded.
Sulla cuts a figure, leaving off dictating:
Simpletons land private life? ‘The grapes are sour,’ laugh we.
So, again — but why continue? All ‘s, tumultous
Here: my head ‘s a-whirl with knowledge.
— Speedily shall be rewarded
He who taught me! Greeks prove ingrates?
So insult you us?
When your teaching bears its first-fruits, Peter — wait and see!"

As the word, the deed proved; ere a brief
year’s passage,
Fop — that fool he made the jokes on — now he made the jokes for, gratis:
Hunks — that hoarder, long left lonely in his grass age —
Found now one appreciative deferential friend:
Powder-paint-and-patch, Hag Jezebel — recovered,
Strange to say, the power to please, got courtship till she cried Jam satis!
Fop be-flattered, Hunks be-friend’d, Hag beloved —
Nobody o’erlooked, save God — he soon attained his end.

As he lounged at ease one morning in his villa, (Hag’s the dowry) estimated (Hunks’ bequest),
his coin in coffer,
Mused on how a fool’s good word (Fop’s word)
could fill a

Social circle with his praise, promote him as of mark.
All at once — "An old friend fain would see your Highness !"
There stood Peter, skeleton and scarecrow,
plain writ Philo-so-pher.
In the woe-worn face — for yellowness and dry-
ness,
Parchment — with a pair of eyes — one lose their feeble spark.

"Did I counsel rightly? Have you, in arsordance,
Prospered greatly, dear my pupil? Sure, at just the stage I find you,
When your hand may draw me forth from the mad war-dance
Savages are leading round your master — down,
not dead.
Padua wants to burn me: balk them, let me linger
Life out — meekful though its remnant — kit is some safe hold behind you!
Prostrate here I lie: quick, help with but a forsaken
Lest I house in safety’s self — a tombstone o’er my head!

"Lodging, bite and sup, with — now and then — a copper — Almost for any poorer still, if such there be — is all my asking.
Take me for your bodesman, — nay, if you think proper,
Misanthropy merely, — such my perfect passion for repose!
Yes, from out your plenty Peter craves a pit-
tance
— Leave to thaw his frozen hands before the fire whereat you’re basking!
Double though your debt were, grant this boon
— remittance
He proclaims of obligation: ’tis himself that owes!"

"Venerated Master — can it be, such treatment
Learning meets with, magic fails to guard you from, by all appearance?
Strange! for, as you entered, — what the famous feat meant,
I was full of, — why you reared that fabric,
Padua’s boast.
Nowise for man’s pride, man’s pleasure, did you styly
Raise it, but man’s seat of rule whereby the world should soon have clearance
(Happy world) from such a rout as now so visibly Handles you — and hampers me, for which I grieve the most.

"Since if it got wind you now were my familiar,
How could I protect you — nay, defend myself against the rabble?
Wait until the mob, now masters, willy-nilly
are
Servants as they should be: then has gratitude full play!
Surely this experience shows how unbesting is that minds like mine should rot in ease and plenty. Gosses may gamble, set, and keep the ground: but swans are soon for quitt
whly fare — as fain would I, your swan, if taught the way.

Reach me, then, to rule men, have them at my pleasure!
lay for their good, of course, — impart a secret worth rewarding;
see the proper life’s prize! Tantalus’s treasure
right beside nerves, vanishes, and leaves no trace at all.
 sit awhile, nor press for payment prematurely!
ver-haste defrauds you. Thanks! since — even while I speak, — discarding
th and vain delights, I learn how — swifly, — surely — ag the sceptre, wears the crown and wields the ball!

One again — what, is he? ’Faith, he’s soon disposed of!
star’s precepts work already, put within my lump their leaven!
, we needs must don glove would we pluck the rose — off
ken garment would we climb the tree and take its fruit.
by sharp thorn, rough rind? To keep un-violated
ther prize! We garland us, we mount from earth to feast in heaven,
at because exist what once we estimated indarms which, better taught, as helps we now compute.

Foolishly I turned disgusted from my fel-
love
of ignorance — to fill, and heaps of prejudice — to level —
altitudes in motley, whites and blacks and yellows —
at a hopeless task it seemed to discipline
the host!
w by my error. Vices act like virtues
Not alone because they guard — sharp thorns
— the rose we first dishevel, because they scrape, scratch — rough rind
— through the dirt-shoes are feet clinging to bole with, while the half-mooned boot we boast.

No, my aim is nobler, more disinterested!
I am shall keep what seemed to thwart him,
since it proves his true assistance,
sed to ascertaining which head is the best
head.
ould he crown his body, rule its members —
lawsless else.

orant the horse stares, by deficient vision
like a man, to be a monster, lets him mount,
than, twice the distance
are could trot unridden, gallops — dream
Elysian! —

Dreaming that his dwarfish guide’s a giant, — jockeys tell ’s.”

Brief, so worked the spell, he promptly had a riddance:
Heart and brain no longer felt the prikts which passed for conscience-scruples:
Free henceforth his feet, — Per Bacco, how they did dance
Merrily through lets and echeks that stopped
the way before!
Politics the prize now, — such adroit adviser.
Opportune suggester, with the tact that triples and quadruples
Merit in each measure, — never did the Kaiser Boast as subject such a statesman, friend, and something more!

As he, up and down, one noontide, paced his closet
— Council o’er, each spark (his hint) blown flame, by colleagues’ breath applauded, Strokes of statecraft hailed with “ Salomo si mobs!”
(His the nostrums) — every throw for luck some double-six, —
As he, pacing, hugged himself in satisfaction,
Thump — the door went. “ What, the Kaiser?
By none else were I defrauded
Thus of well-earned solace. Since ’t is fate’s exaction,—
Enter, Liege my Lord! Ha, Peter, you here?
Tenor vir!"

"Ah, Sir, none the less, contain you, nor wax irate!
You so lofty, I so lowly, — vast the space which yawns between us!
Still, methinks, you — more than ever — at a high rate
Needs must prize poor Peter’s secret since it life you thus.
Grant me now the boon wherewith before you boggled!
Ten long years your march has moved — one triumph — (though e’s short) — hacinius,
While I down and down disastrously have jogged
Till I pitch against Death’s door, the true Nec Ultra Plus.

“Years ago — some ten ’tis — since I sought for shelter,
Craved in your whole house a closet, out of all your means a comfort.
Now you soar above these: as is gold to spelter
So is power — you urged with reason — paramount to wealth.
Power you boast in plenty: let it grant me refuge!
House-room now is out of question: find for me some stronghold — some fort—
Privacy wherein, immured, shall this blind deaf huge Monster of a mob let stay the soul I’d save by stealth!

“Ay, for all too much with magic have I tampered!"
Lose the world, and gained, I fear, a certain place I'm to describe both!
Still, if prayer and fasting tame the pride long pampered,
Mercy may be mine: amendment never comes too late.
How can I amend best by curriers, kickers?
Flant this brand from out the burning! Once away, I take my Bible-void.
Never more — so long as life's weak lamp-flame flickers —
No, not once I'll tease you, but in silence bear
my fate!

"Gently, good my Genius, Oracle unerring!
Strange now! can you guess on what — as in you peeped — it was I pondered?
You and I are both of one mind in preferring Power to wealth, but — here's the point —
what sort of power, I ask?
Ruling men is vulgar, easy, and ignoble:
Rid yourself of conscience, quell you have at beck and call the food herd.
But who wield the crozier, down may fling the crow-bill:
That's the power I covet now; soul's away o'er souls — my task!

"Well but,' you object, 'you have it, who by glances to look like truths, mask folly in the garb of elation,
Your soul acts on theirs, sure, when the people
elation,
Hold their peace, now fight now fondle, — ear-wigged through the brains.'
Possibly! but still the operation's mundane,
Grosser than a taste demands which — craving
mama — kocks at reason — Power o'er men by wants material: why should one design
Rule by scordid hopes and fears — a grunt for all one's pains?

"No, if men must praise me, let them praise to purpose!
Would we move the world, not earth but heaven must be our fulcrum — you sto!
Thus I seek to move it: Master, why interpose —
Balk my climbing close on what's the ladder's topmost round?
Statecraft 'tis I step from: when by priestcraft hoisted
Up to where my foot may touch the highest rung which fate allows toe,
Then indeed ask favor. On you shall be foisted.
No excuse: I'll pay my debt, each penny of the pound!

"Ho, my knaves without there! Lead this worthy downstairs!
No farewell, good Paul — say, Peter — what's your name remembered rightly?
Come, he's humble: out another would have flounced — airs
Suitors often give themselves when our sort bow them forth.

Did I touch his rags? He surely kept his de-
tance:
Yet, there somehow passed to me from his where'er the virtue might lie —
Something that inspires my soul — Oh, resistance
Doubtlessly of Peter! — still, he's work is what he's worth!

"'T is my own soul soars now: soaring — let
By crawling!
I'll to Rome, before Rome's feet the tempiprostrate!
'Hands!' (I'll say) proficient once in palmy hauling
This and that way men as I was minded — in now clasp!
Ay, the Kaiser's self has wrung them is it favor!
Now — they only sue to slave for Rome, as if one doth the cost rate.
Rome's adopted child — no bone, no sack nerve or
Sinew of me but I'll strain, though out my life
I gasp!"

As he stood one evening proudly — he had traversed
Rome on horseback — peerless pageant! — claimed the Lateran as new Pope! — Thinking "All's attained now! Peste! We could have erst
Dreaded of my advance so far when, some ten
years ago,
I embraced devotion, grew from priest to bishop by favor!
Gained the Purple, bribed the Conclave, put the Two-thirds, saw my mob cope.
Come out — what Rome hails me! O was there a wish-shop,
Not one wish more would I purchase — lest of all below!

"Ha — who dares intrude now — puts aside the arrays?
What, old Peter, here again, at such a time, is such a presence?
Satan sends this plague back merely to bar-truss
Me who enter on my office — little needing
you!
'Faith, I'm touched myself by age, but you look Tithon!'
Wore it vain to seek of you the sole prise left — rejuvenescence?
Well, since flesh is grass which time must lay his scythe on,
Say your say and so depart and make no more ado!"

Peter faltered — coughing first by way of prelogue —

"Holiness, your help comes late: a death at ninety little matters.
Padua has build poor Peter's pyre now, on leg roll log,
Burn away — I've lived my day! Yet here's the sting in death —
PIETRO OF ABANO

've an author's pride: I want my Book's survival: I've hid it in my breast to warm me 'mid the rains and terrors! I save it — tell next age your Master had no rival! scholar's debt discharged in full, be 'Thanks' — my latest breath!'

'Fangh, the frowsy bundle — scribblings harum-searam scattered o'er a dozen sheepskins: What's the name of this farago?

In — 'Conciliator Differenciarum' — fan and book may burn together, cause the world no loss! top — what else? A tractate — oh, 'De Spectiebus ceremonialis Ma-gi-cae'! I dream sure! Hence, away, go, Vizard, — quick avoid me! Vain you clasp my knee, base, Land that bears the Fisher's ring or foot that boost the Cross!

'Help! The old magician clings like an octopus! Oh, yon wise now — fuming, fretting, frowning, if I read your features!

'town, who cares? We're Pope — once Pope, you can't unpope us!

'load — you must up a smile: that's better! Still so brisk?

'All at once grown youthful? But the case is plain! Ass —

Here I daily with the fiend, yet know the Word — compels all creatures earthly, heavenly, hellish. Apage, Sathanas hicum verbum Solomonis — 'dicit!' When — whak! —

That was changed? The stranger gave his eyes a rubbing:

'Here smiled Peter's face turned back a moment at him o'er the shoulder, as the black-door shut, bang! 'So he 'scapes a drubbing!'

'With a boy who, unespied, had stopped to hear the talk.)

'That's the way to thank these wizards when they bid man benedicite! What ails you? You, a man, and yet no bolder?

'ossign Sir, you look but foolish!' 'Idmen, idmen!

brooded the Greek. 'O Peter, cheese at last I know from chalk!'

Peter lived his life out, menaced yet no martyr, drenched himself the mighty man he was — such knowledge all his guerdon, after the world a big book — people but in part err.

When they style a true Scientia Com-pen-di-um: 'Admirationem insitus' they sourly smile, as fast they shut the folio which myself was somehow spurred on to ope: but love — life's milk which daily, hourly, Blockheads lap — O Peter, still thy taste of love 's to come!

Greek, was your ambition likewise doomed to failure?

True, I find no record you wore purple, walked with axe and fasces, played some antipope's part: still, friend, don't turn tail, you're certain, with but these two gifts, to gain earth's prize in time!

Cleverness uncurbed by conscience — if you un sank Peter's book you'd find no potent spell like these to rule the masses:

Nor should want an example, had I not to transact other business. Go your ways, you'll thrive! So ends my rhyme.

When these parts Tiberius — not yet Caesar — travelled, passing Padua, he consulted Padua's Oracle of Geryon (God three-headed, thrice wise) just to get unravelled certain tangles of his future. "Fling at Abano golden dice," it answered: "dropt within the fount there. Note what sum the pipes present!" And still we see each die, the very one, turn up, through the crystal, — read the whole account there Where 't is told by Suetonius, — each its highest throw.

Scarce the sporting fancy-dice I fling show "Venus:" Still — for love of that dear land which I so oft in dreams revisit — I have — oh, not sung! but lilted (as between us — Grows my lazy custom) this its legend. What the lift?
DOCTOR ——

A Rabbi told me: On the day allowed
Satan for carping at God’s rule, he came,
Fresh from our earth, to brave the angel-crowd.

“What is the fault now?” “This I find to blame:
Many and various are the tongues below,
Yet all agree in one speech, all proclaim

“Hell has no might to match what earth can show:—
Death is the strongest-born of Hell, and yet Stronger than Death is a Bad Wife, we know,”

“Is it a wonder if I fume and fret—
Robbed of my rights, since death am I, and mine
The style of Strongest? Men pay Nature’s debt

Because they must at my demand: decline
To pay it henceforth surely men will please,
Provided husbands with bad wives combine

“To baffle Death. Judge between me and these!”
Thyself shalt judge. Descend to earth in shape
Of mortal, marry, drain from froth to lees

“The bitter draught, then see if thou escape
Concluding, with men sorrowful and sage,
A Bad Wife’s strength Death’s self in vain would ape!”

How Satan entered on his pilgrimage,
Conformed himself to earthly ordinance,
Wived and played husband well from youth to age

Intrepidly — I leave untold, advance
Through many a married year until I reach
A day when — of his father’s censure and countenance

The very image, like him too in speech
As well as thought and deed, — the union’s fruit Attained maturity. “I needs must teach

“My son a trade: but trade, such son to suit,
Needs seeking after. He a man of war?
Too cowardly! A lawyer wins repute —

“Having to toil and moil, though — both which are Beyond this sluggard. There’s Divinity:
No, that’s my own bread-winner — that be far

“From my poor offspring! Physic? Ha, we’ll try
If this be practicable. Where’s my wit?
Asleep? — since, now I come to think ... Ay, ay!

“Hither, my son! Exactly have I hit
On a profession for thee. Medicus —
Behold, thou art appointed! Yes, I spit

“Upon thine eyes, bestow a virtue thus
That henceforth not this human form I wear
Shalt thou perceive alone, but — one of us

“By privilege — thy fleshly sight shall bear
Me in my spirit-person as I walk
The world and take my prey appointed there.

“Doctor once dubbed — what ignorance shall baffle
Thy march triumphant? Diagnose the gem: —
As calcite, and prescribe it cheese for chalice —

“No matter! All’s one: cure shall ease about
And win thee wealth — fees paid with such a roar
Of thanks and praise alike from lord and less

“As never stunned man’s ears on earth before.
‘How may this be?’ Why, that’s my skeptic’s roar
Soon
Truth will corrupt thee, soon thou doubt’st as more!

“Why is it I bestow on thee the boon
Of recognizing me the while I go invisibly among men, morning, noon,

“And night, from house to house, and — quick or slow —
Take my appointed prey? They summon thee
For help, suppose: obey the summon’s! so!

“Enter, look round! Where’s Death? Knew —
I am he,
Satan who work all evil: I who bring
Pain to the patient in whate’er degree.

“I, then, am there: first glance thine eye shall fling
Will find me — whether distant or at hand,
As I am free to do my spiriting.

“At such mere first glance thou shalt understand
Wherefore I reach no higher up the room
Than door or window, when my form is scanned.

“Howe’er friends’ faces please to gather close,
Bent o’er the sick, — howe’er himself desponds,—
In such case Death is not the sufferer’s doom.

“Contrariwise, do friends rejoice my beads
Are broken, does the captive in its turn
Crow: ‘Life shall conquer?’
Nip these foolish fronds

“Of hope a sprout, if haply thou discern
Me at the head — my victim’s head, be sure!
Forth now! This taught thee, little else to learn!”
And forth he went. Folk heard him ask demure, "How do you style this ailment? (There he peeps. My father through the arras!) Sirs, the cure is plain as A B C! Experience steeps Blossoms of pennroyal half an hour In sherri. Sumat! — Lo, how sound he sleeps — "The subject you presumed was past the power Of Galen to relieve!" Or else, "How's this? Why call for help so tardily? Clouds lour Portentously indeed, Sirs! (Naught 's amiss: He's at the bed-foot merely.) Still, the storm may pass averted — not by quacks, I wis, "Like you, my masters! You, forsooth, perform A miracle? Stand, sciolists, aside! Blood, ne'er so cold, at ignorance grows warm!"

Which boasting by result was justified, Big as might words be: whether dragged or left Drugless, the patient always lived, not died. Great the heir's gratitude, so nigh bereft Of all he prized in this world: sweet the smile Of disconcerted rivals: "Cure? — say, the fault "From Nature in despite of Art — so style This off-hand kill-or-cure work! You did much, I had done more: folk cannot wait awhile!"

But did the case change? was it — "Scarcey such. The symptoms as to warrant our recourse To your skill, Doctor! Yet since just a touch "Of pulse, a taste of breath, has all the force With you of long investigation claimed By others, — tracks an ailment to its source Intuitively, — may we ask unblamed What from this pimple you prognosticate?" "Death!" was the answer, as he saw and named The cougher by the sick man's head. "Too late You send for my assistance. I am bold Only by Nature's leave, and how to Fate! "Besides, you have my rivals: lavish gold! How comfortably quick shall life depart Comsented by attention manifold! "One day, one hour ago, perchance my art Had done some service. Since you have yourselves chosen — before the horse — to put the cart, "Why, Sirs, the sooner that the sexton delves Your patient's grave the better! How you stare — Shallow, for all the deep books on your shelves! "Fare you well, fumbling!" Do I need declare What name and fame, what riches recompensed The Doctor's practice? Never anywhere Such an adept as daily evidenced Each new vaticination! Oh, not he Like doths who dallied with their scruples, fenced With subterfuge, nor gave out frank and free Something decisive! If he said "I save The patient," saved he was: if "Death will be His portion," you might count him dead. Thus brave, Behold our worthy, sane competitor Throughout the country, on the arbitrage Of Glory's temple golden-lettered for Machaon redivivus! So, it fell That, of a sudden, when the Emperor Was smit by sore disease, I need not tell If any other Doctor's aid was sought To come and forthwith make the sick Prince well. "He will reward thee as a monarch ought. Not much imports the malady; but then, He clings to life and cries like one distraught "For thee — who, from a simple citizen, Mayst look to rise in rank, — nay, haply wear A medal with his portrait, — always when "Recovery is quite accomplished, There! Pass to the presence!" Hardly has he crossed The chamber's threshold when he halts, aware Of who stands sentry by the head. All's lost. "Sire, naught avails my art: you near the goal, And end the race by giving up the ghost." "How?" cried the monarch: "Names upon your roll Of half my subjects rescued by your skill — Old and young, rich and poor — crowd cheek by jowl! "And yet no room for mine? Be saved I will! Why else am I earth's foremost potentate? Add me to these and take as fee your fill "Of gold — that point admits of no debate Between us: save me, as you can and must, — Gold, till your gown's pouch cracks beneath the weight!"

This touched the Doctor. "Truly a home-thrust,
Parent, you will not parry! Have I dared Entreat that you forego the meal of dust
"— Man that is make's meat—when I saw prepared
Your daily portion? Never! Just this once,
Go from his head, then,—let his life be spared!"

Whisper met whisper in the gruff response;
"Fool, I must have my prey: no inch I budge
From where thou seest me thus myself ensconce."

"Ah," moaned the sufferer, "by thy look I judge Wealth fails to tempt thee: what if honors prove More efficacious? Naught to him I grudge
"Who saves me. Only keep my head above
The cloud that's creeping round it—I'll divide
My empire with thee! No? What's left but—love?"

"Does love allure thee? Well then, take as bride
My only daughter, fair beyond belief!
Save me—to-morrow shall the knot be tied!"

"Father, you hear him! Respite ne'er so brief
Is all I beg; go now and come again
Next day, for aught I care: respect the grief
"Mine will be if thy first-born sues in vain!"
"Fool, I must have my prey!" was all he got
In answer. But a fancy crossed his brain.

"I have it! Sire, methinks a meteor shot
Just now across the heavens and neutralized
Jove's salutary influence: 'neath the blot
"Plumb are you placed now: well that I surmised
The cause of failure! Knaves, reverse the bed!"

"Stay!" groaned the monarch, "I shall be capa ez—
"Jolt—jolt—my heels uplift where late my head
Was lying—sure I 'm turned right round at last!
What do you say now, Doctor?" Naught he said,

For why? With one brisk leap the Antic passed
From couch-foot back to pillow,—as before,
Lord of the situation. Long aghast

The Doctor gazed, then "Yet one trial more Le left me! inwardly he uttered. "Shame
Upon thy flinty heart! Do I implore

"This trivial favor in the idle name
Of mercy to the moribund? I plead
The cause of all thou dost affect: my aim

"Befits my author! Why would I succeed?
Simply that by success I may promote
The growth of thy pet virtues—pride a greed.

"But keep thy favors!—curse thee! I deem Henceforth my service to the other side.
No time to lose: the rattle 's in his throat.

"So,—not to leave one last resource untried.—
Run to my house with all haste, somebody!
Bring me that knobstick thence, so often miss'd

"With profit by the astrologer—shall I
Disdain its help, the mystic Jacob's-Staff?
Sire, do but have the courage not to die

"Till this arrive! Let none of you dare lift
Though rugged its exterior, I have seen
That implement work wonders, send the dash

"Quick and thick flying from the wheat—I mean,
By metaphor, a human sheaf it threaded
Flail-like. Go fetch it! Or—a word between
Just you and me, friend!—go bid, unhesitated
My mother, whom you 'll find there, bring its stick Herself—herself, mind!" Out the lucky dashed
Zealous upon the errand. Craft and trick
Are meat and drink to Satan: and he grinned
—How else?—at an excuse so politic

For failure: scarce would Jacob's-Staff re
Fate's firm decree! And ever as he neared
The agonizing one, his breath like wind

Froze to the narrow, while his eye-flash scared
Sense in the brain up: closelier and more closel Pressing his prey, when at the door appeared

—Who but his Wife the Bad? Whereof can
One grain, one mite of the medicament, Sufficed him. Up he sprang. One word, the gross
To soil my lips with,—and through ceiling west
Somehow the Husband. "That a storm's dispersed
We know for certain by the sulphurly scent:

"Hail to the Doctor! Who but one so versed
In all Dame Nature's secrets had prescribed
The staff thus opportunely? Style him first

"And foremost of physicians!" "I've imbued
Elixir surely," smiled the prince,—"have gained
New lease of life. Dear Doctor, how you bribed
"Death to forego me, boots not: you've obtained
My daughter and her dowry. Death, I've heard,
Was still on earth the strongest power that reigned,

"Except a Bad Wife!" Whereunto demurred
Nowise the Doctor, so refused the fee
— No dowry, no bad wife!

"You think absurd
This tale?" — the Rabbi added: "True, our Talmud
Boasts sundry such: yet — have our elders
In thinking there's some water there, not all mud?"

I tell it, as the Rabbi told it me.

PAN AND LUNA

Si credere dignum est. — Georgic, III. 390.

On, worthy of belief I hold it was,
Virgil, your legend in those strange three lines!
No question, that adventure came to pass
One black night in Arcadia: yes, the pines,
Mountains and valleys mingled made one mass
Of black with void black heaven: the earth's confines,
The sky's embrace, — below, above, around,
All hardened into black without a bound.

Fill up a swart stone chalice to the brim
With fresh-squeezed yet fast-thickening poppy-juice:
See how the sluggish jelly, late a-swim,
Turns marble to the touch of who would loose
The solid smooth, grown jet from rim to rim,
By turning round the bowl! So night can fuse
Earth with her all-comprising sky. No less
Light, the least spark, shows air and emptiness,

And thus it proved when — diving into space,
Striped of all vapor, from each web of mist
Utterly film-free — entered on her race
The naked Moon, full-orbed antagonist
Of night and dark, night's dowry: peak to base,
Upstarted mountains, and each valley, kissed
To sudden life, lay silver-bright: in air
Flew she revealed, Maid-Moon with limbs all bare.

Still as she fied, each depth — where refuge seemed —
Opening a lone pale chamber, left distinct Those limbs: 'mid still-retracting blue, she seemed
Herself with whiteness, — virginal, uncoined
By any halo save what finely gleamed
To outline not disguise her: heaven was linked
In one accord with earth to quaff the joy,
Drain beauty to the dregs without alloy.

Whereof she grew aware. What help? When, lo,
A succorable cloud with sleep lay dense:

Some pinetree-top had caught it sailing slow,
And tethered for a prize: in evidence
Captive lay fleece on fleece of piled-up snow
Drowsily patient: flake-heaped how or whence,
The structure of that succorable cloud,
What matter? Shamed she plunged into its shroud.

Orbed — so the woman-figure posts call
Because of rounds on rounds — that appleshaped
Head which its hair binds close into a ball
Each side the curving ears — that pure undraped
Fout of the sister paps — that . . . Once for all,
Say — her consummate circle thus escaped
With its innumerable circlets, sank absorbed,
Safe in the cloud — O naked Moon full-orbed!

But what means this? The downy swathes combine,
Conglobe, the smoothey ooy-careseeing stuff
Curdles about her! Vain each twist and twine
Those lithe limbs try, encroached on by a fluff
Fitting as close as fits the dented spine
Its flexible ivory outside-flesh: enough!
The plumpy drifts contract, condense, constringe,
Till she is swallowed by the feathery springs.

As when a pearl slips lost in the thin foam
Churned on a sea-shore, and, o'er-frothed, con-ceits
Herself safe-housed in Amphitrite's dome, —
If, through the bladdery wave-worked yeast,
she meets
What most she loathes and leaps from, — elf
from gnome
No gladlier, — finds that safest of retreats
Bubble about a treacherous hand wide ope
To grasp her — (divers who pick pearls so grope) —

So lay this Maid-Moon clasped around and
caught
By rough red Pan, the god of all that tract:
He it was schemed the snare thus subtly wrought
With simulated earth - breath, — wool - tufts pocked
Into a billowy wrappage. Sheep far-sought
For spotless shearings yield such: take the fact
As learned Virgil gives it, — how the breed
Whitens itself forever: yes, indeed!

If one forefather ram, though pure as chalk
From tinge on fleece, should still display a tongue
Black 'neath the beast's moist palate, prompt men balk
The propagating plague: he gets no young:
They rather slay him, — sell his hide to cack
Ships with, first steeped in pitch, — nor hands are wrung
In sorrow for his fate: protected thus,
The purity we love is gained for us.

So did Girl-Moon, by just her attribute
Of unmatched modesty betrayed, lie trapped,
Bruised to the breast of Pan, half god half brute,
THE BLIND MAN TO THE MAIDEN

Browning translated the following from a German poem in Wilhelmine von Hille's novel The Hour Will Come at the request of Mrs. Clara Bell, the translator of the novel. It there appeared as the work of an anonymous friend, but was reprinted as Browning's in The Whitehall Review for March 1, 1883.

The blind man to the maiden said,
"O thou of hearts the truest,
Thy countenance is hid from me;
Let not my question anger thee!
Speak, though in words the fewest.
"Tell me, what kind of eyes are thine?
Dark eyes, or light ones rather?"
"My eyes are a decided brown—
So much, at least, by looking down,
From the brook's glass I gather."
"And is it red—thy little mouth?
That too the blind must care for."
"Ah! I would tell it soon to thee,
Only—none yet has told it me.
I cannot answer, therefore.
"But dost thou ask what heart I have—
There hesitate I never.
In thine own breast 'tis borne, and so
'Tis thine in weal, and thine in woe.
For life, for death—thine ever!"

GOLDONI

The following sonnet was written by Browning for the album of the Committee of the Goldoni monument, erected in Venice in 1883.

GOLDONI—good, gay, sunniest of souls,—
Glassing half Venice in that verse of thine,—
What though it just reflect the shade and skin
Of common life, nor render, as it rolls,
Grandeur and gloom? Sufficient for thy shade
Was Carnival; Parini's depths enslave
Secrets unsuited to that opaline
Surface of things which laughs along thy scroll.
There throng the people: how they come and go.
Lisp the soft language, flaunt the bright garb,—see,—
On Piazza, Calle, under Portico
And over Bridge! Dear king of Comedy,
Be honored! thou that didst love Venice so.
Venice, and we who love her, all love thee!
Venice, November 27, 1883.
JOCOSERIA

This collection of poems was published in 1883. The title of the volume is mentioned in a footnote to the Note at the end of Paracelsus, where the poet speaks of "such rubbish as Melander's Jocoseria." In a letter, accompanying a copy of the volume, sent to a friend, Browning wrote: "The title is taken from the work of Melander (Schwartzmann), reviewed, by a curious coincidence, in the Blackwood of this month [February, 1883]. I referred to it in a note to Paracelsus. The two Hebrew quotations [in the note to Jochanan Hakkadoeh] (put in to give a grave look to what is mere fun and invention) being translated amount to (1) 'A Collection of Lies'; and (2), an old saying, 'From Moses to Moses arose none like Moses.'"

WANTING IS — WHAT?

This is in the nature of a prelude to the entire group of poems.

WANTING is — what?
Summer redundant,
Blueness abundant,
— Where is the blot?
Beamy the world, yet a blank all the same,
— Framework which waits for a picture to frame:
What of the leafage, what of the flower?
Roses embowering with naught they embower!
Come then, complete incompletion, O comber,
Pant through the blueness, perfect the summer!

Breathe but one breath
Rose-beauty above,
And all that was death
Grows life, grows love,
Grows love!

DONALD

This story which Browning had from the lips of the hero has also been told in prose by Sir Walter Scott.

"WILL YOU HEAR MY STORY ALSO,
— Hug Sport, brave adventure in plenty?"

The boys were a band from Oxford,
The oldest of whom was twenty.

The booby we held carouse in
Was bright with fire and candle;
Tale followed tale like a merry-go-round
Whereof Sport turned the handle.

In our eyes and noses — turf-smoke:
In our ears a tune from the trivet,
Whence "Boiling, boiling," the kettle sang,
"And ready for fresh Glenlivet."

So, fast capped feat, with a vengeance:
Truths, though, — the lads were loyal:
"Grouse, five-score brace to the bag!
Deer, ten hours' stalk of the Royal!"

Of boasting, not one bit, boys!
Only there seemed to settle
Somehow above your curly heads,
— Plain through the singing kettle,

Palpable through the cloud,
As each new-puffed Havana
Rewarded the teller's well-told tale, —
This vaunt "To Sport — Hosanna!"

"Hunt, fish, shoot,
Would a man fulfil life's duty!
Not to the bodily frame alone
Does Sport give strength and beauty,

"But character gains in — courage?
Ay, Sir, and much beside it!
You don't sport, more's the pity;
You soon would find, if you tried it,

"Good sportsman means good fellow,
Sound-hearted he, to the centre;
Your mealy-mouthed mild milksoaps
— There's where the rot can enter!

"There's where the dirt will breed,
The shabbiness Sport would banish!
Oh no, Sir, no! In your honored case
All such objections vanish.

"'Tis known how hard you studied:
A Double-First — what, the jigger!
Give me but half your Latin and Greek,
I'll never again touch trigger!

"Still, tastes are tastes, allow me!
Allow, too, where there's keenness
For Sport, there's little likelihood
Of a man's displaying meanness!"

So, put on my mettle, I interposed.
"Will you hear my story?" quoth I.
"Never mind how long since it happened,
I sat, as we sit, in a boothy;

"With as merry a band of mates, too,
Undergrads all on a level:
(One's a Bishop, one's gone to the Bench,
And one's gone — wall, to the Devil.)"
"When, lo, a scratching and tapping!
In hobbled a ghastly visitor.
Listen to just what he told us himself;
—No need of our playing inquisitor!"

Do you happen to know in Ross-shire
Mount Ben ... but the name scarce matters:
Of the naked fact I am sure enough,
Though I clothe it in rags and tatters.

You may recognize Ben by description;
Behind him — a moor's immenseness:
Up goes the middle mount of a range,
Fringed with its firs in denseness.

Rimming the edge, its fir-fringe, mind!
For an edge there is, though narrow;
From end to end of the range, a strip
Of path runs straight as an arrow.

And the mountaineer who takes that path
Saves himself miles of journey
He has to plod if he crosses the moor
Through heather, peat, and burnde.

But a mountaineer he needs must be,
For, look you, right in the middle
Projects bluff Ben — with an end in ick —
Why planted there, is a riddle:

Since all Ben's brothers little and big
Keep rank, set shoulder to shoulder,
And only this burliest out must bulge
Till it seems — to the beholder

From down in the gully, — as if Ben's breast,
To a sudden spike diminished,
Would signify to the boldest foot
"All further passage finished!"

Yet the mountaineer who sidles on
And on to the very bending,
Discovers, if heart and brain be proof,
No necessary ending.

Foot up, foot down, to the turn abrupt
Having trod, he, there arriving,
Finds — what he took for a point was breadth,
A mercy of Nature's contriving.

So, he rounds what, when 't is reached, proves straight,
From one side gains the other:
The wee path widens — resume the march,
And he foils you, Ben my brother!

But Donald — (that name, I hope, will do) —
I wrong him if I call "feeling"
The tramp of the callant, whistling the while
As blithe as our kettle's boiling.

He had dared the danger from boyhood up,
And now, — when perchance was waiting
A lass at the brig below, — "twixt mount
And moor would he stand debating?

Moreover this Donald was twenty-five,
A stock of bones and muscle:
Did, a fiend dispute the right of way,
Donald would try a tussle.

Lightsomely marched he out of the broad
On to the narrow and narrow;
A step more, rounding the angular rock,
Reached the front straight as an arrow.

He stepped it, safe on the ledge he stood,
When — whom found he full-facing?
What fellow in courage and wariness too,
Had scouted ignoble pacing,

And left low safety to timid mates,
And made for the dread dear danger,
And gained the height where — who could guess
He would meet with a rival ranger?

"T was a gold-red stag that stood and stared,
Gigantic and magnific,
By the wonder — ay, and the peril — struck
Intelligent and pacific:

For a red deer is no fallow deer
Grown cowardly through park-feeding;
He batters you like a thunderbolt
If you brave his haunts unheed.

I doubt he could hardly perform volta-face
Had valor advised discretion:
You may walk on a rope, but to turn on a rap
No Blondin makes profession.

Yet Donald must turn, would pride permit,
Though pride ill brooks retiring:
Each eyed each — mute man, motionless beast —
Less fearing than admiring.

These are the moments when quite new sense,
To meet some need as novel,
Springs up in the brain: it inspired resource:
"Nor advance nor retreat but — grow!"

And slowly, surely, never a whit
Relaxing the steady tension
Of eye-stare which binds man to beast, —
By an inch and inch declension,

Sank Donald sidewise down and down:
Till flat, breast upwards, lying
At his six-foot length, no corpse more still,
"If he cross me! The trick's worth trying."

Minutes were an eternity;
But a new sense was created
In the stag's brain too; he resolves! Sis,
Sure,
With eye-stare unabated,

 Feelingly he extends a foot
Which tastes the way ere it touches
Earth's solid and just escapes man's soft,
Nor hold of the same unclutches ill its fellow foot, light as a feather whishe,
Lends itself no less finely
As mother removes a fly from the face
Of her babe asleep supinely.

and now 1 is the haunch and hind-foot's turn
-That's hard: can the beast quite raise it?
as, traversing half the prostrate length,
His hoof-tip does not grasp it.

Let one more lift! But Donald, you see,
Was sportsman first, man after:
Fancy lightened his caution through,
-He wellnigh broke into laughter:

It were nothing short of a miracle!
Unrivalled, unexampled—
If sporting feats with this feat matched
Were down and dead and trampled!"

he last of the legs as tenderly
Follows the rest: or never
Now is the time! His knife in reach,
And his right-hand loose — how clever!

If this can stab up the stomach's soft,
While the left-hand grasps the pastrum.
Rise on the elbow, and — now's the time
Or never: this turn's the last turn!

shall dare to place myself by God
Who scanned — for he does — each feature
The face thrown up in appeal to him
By the agonizing creature.

ay, I hear plain words: "Thy gift brings
This!"
Up he sprang, back he staggered,
Ver he fell, and with him our friend
—At following game no laggard.

et he was not dead when they picked next day
From the gully's depth the wrench of him;
Is fall had been stayed by the stag beneath
Who cushioned and saved the neck of him.

at the rest of his body — why, doctors said,
Whatever could break was broken:
sag, arms, ribs, all of him looked like a toast
In a tumbler of port-wine soaken.

That your life is left you, thank the stag!"
Said they when — the slow cure ended —
Bay opened the hospital-door, and thence Strapped, spliced, main fractures mended, md minor damage left wisely alone.
Like an old shoe clouted and cobbled, at — what went in a Goliath wellnigh,
Some half of a David hobbled.

You must ask an alma from house to house:
Sell the stag's head for a bracket,
'th its grand twelve times — I'd buy it myself
And use the skin for a jacket!"

He was wiser, made both head and hide
His win-penny: hands and knees on,
Would manage to crawl — poor crab — by the roads
In the misty stalking-season.

And if he discovered a boothy like this,
Why, harvest was sure: folk listened.
He told his tale to the lovers of Sport
Lips twitched, cheeks glowed, eyes gleamed.

And when he had come to the close, and spread
His spoils for the gazers' wonder,
With "Gentlemen, here's the skull of the stag
I was over, thank God, not under!" —

The company broke out in applause;
"By Jingo, a lucky cripple!
Have a munch of grouse and a hunk of bread,
And a tug, besides, at our tippie!"

And "There's my pay for your pluck!" cried
This,
"And mine for your jolly story!"
Cried That, while T other — but he was drunk —
Hiccupp'd "A trump, a Tory!"

I hope I gave twice as much as the rest;
For, as Homer would say, "within grates
Though teeth kept tongue," my whole soul
Growled, "Rightly rewarded, — Ingrate!"

SOLOMON AND BALKIS

SOLOMON King of the Jews and the Queen of Sheba, Balkis, Talk on the ivory throne, and we well may conjecture their talk is Solery of things sublime: why else has she sought Mount Zion,
Climbed the six golden steps, and sat betwixt lion and lion?

She proves him with hard questions: before
She has reached the middle
He smiling supplies the end, straight solves
Them riddle by riddle;
Until, dead-beaten at last, there is left no spirit
In her,
And thus would she close the game whereof she
Was first beginner:

"O wisest thou of the wise, world's marvelous
Wellnigh monster,
One crabbed question more to construe or vulgo Conster!
Who are those, of all mankind, a monarch of Perfect wisdom
Should open to, when they knock at spheteron de
— that's, his dome?"

The King makes tart reply: "Whom else but
The wise his equals
Should he welcome with heart and voice? —
Since, king though he be, such weak walls
Of circumstance — power and pomp — divide souls each from other
That whose proves kingly in craft I needs must acknowledge my brother.

"Come poet, come painter, come sculptor,
come builder — whate’er his condition,
Is he prime in his art? We are peers! My insight has pierced the partition
And hails — for the poem, the picture, the statue, the building — my fellow!
Gold’s gold through dim in the dust: court-polish soon turns it yellow.

"But tell me in turn, O thou to thy weakling
sex superior,
That for knowledge hast travelled so far yet
seemest nowhit the wearier, —
Who are those, of all mankind, a queen like thyself, consummate
In wisdom, should call to her side with an affable ‘Up hither, come, mate?’"

"The Good are my mates — how else? Why doubt it?" the Queen upbrilled:
"Sure even above the Wise, — or in travel my eyes have idled, —
I see the Good stand plain: be they rich, poor,
shrewd, or simple,
If Good they only are. . . . Permit me to drop my wimple!"

And, in that bashful jerk of her body, she — peace, thou scoundrel! —
Jostled the King’s right-hand stretched courteously help to proffer,
And so disclosed a portent: all unaware the Prince eyed
The Ring which bore the Name — turned outside now from inside!

The truth-compelling Name! — and at once,
"I greet the Wise — oh,
Certainly welcome such to my court — with this proviso:
The building must be my temple, my person
stand forth the statue,
The picture my portrait prove, and the poem
my praise — you cast, you!"

But Solomon nonplussed? Nay! "Be truthful in turn!" so bade he:
"See the Name, obey its heat!" And at once subjoins the lady,
"Provided the Good are the young, men
strong and tall and proper,
Such servants I straightway enlist, — which means" . . . But the blushes stop her.

"Ah, Soul," the Monarch sighed, "that wouldst soar yet ever crawliest,
How comes it thou canst discern the greatest yet choose the smallest,
Unless because heaven is far, where wings find fit expansion,
While creeping on all-fours suit, suffices the earthly mansion?

"Aspire to the Best! But which? There as Beats and Beats so many,
With a habitat each for each, earth’s Best much Best as any!
On Lebanon roots the cedar — soil lofty, st windy and sandy —
While hyssop, of worth in its way, on the vi grows low but handy.

"Above may the Soul spread wing, spare be
and sense beneath her;
Below she must condense to plodding be-buoyed by ether.
In heaven I yearn for knowledge, access to else insanity;
On earth I confess an itch for the praise of fat
— that’s Vanity.

"It is naught, it will go, it can never press
above to trouble me;
But here, — why, it toys and tickles and teas,
howe’er I redouble me
In a doggedest of endeavors to play the in-festant. Therefore,
Suppose we resume discourse? Thou hast travelled thus far: but wherefore?

"Solely for Solomon’s sake, to see whom eac styles Sages?"
Through her blushes laughed the Que.
"For the sake of a Sage? The py jest!
On high, be communion with Mind — the Body concours not Balkis:
Down here — do I make too bold? Say Solomon, — one fool’s small kiss!"

Cristina and Monaldeschi

Air, but how each loved each, Marquis!
Here’s the gallery they trod
Both together, he her god.
She his idol, — lend your rod,
Chamberlain! — ay, there they are — “Qui Separabit?” — plain those two Touching words come into view,
Apposite for me and you:

Since they witness to incessant
Love like ours: King Francis, he — Diane the adored one, she —
Prototypes of you and me.
Everywhere is carved her Crescent
With his Salamander-sign
Flame-fed creature: flame benign
To itself or, if malign,

Only to the meddling curios.
— So, be warned, Sir! Where’s my head?
How it wanders! What I said
Marily meant — the creature, fed
Thus on flame, was scarce injurious
Save to fools who woke its ire,
Thinking fit to play with fire.
’Tis the Crescent you admire?
CRISTINA AND MONALDESCHI

Men are used to this same grouping—
I and you like statues seen.
You and I, no third between,
Kneel and stand! That makes the scene.

Mar it — and one buffet... Pardon!
Needless warmth — wise words in waste!
’T was prostration that replaced
Kneeling, then? A proof of taste.

Crouch, not kneel, while I mount guard on Prostrate love — become no warf,
No estray to waves that chase
Disappointed — love’s so safe!

Waves that chase? The idlest fancy!
Peaks that scare? I think we know
Walls enclose our sculpture: so
Grouped, we pose in Fontainebleau.

Up now! Wherefore hesitancy?
Arm in arm and cheek by cheek,
Laugh with me at waves and peak!
Silent still? Why, pictures speak.

See, where Juno strikes Ixion,
Primates speaks plainly! ‘Pooh —
Rather, Florentine Le Roux!
I’ve lost head for who is —

So it swins and wanders! He on What still proves me female! Here,
By the staircase! — for we near
That dark "Gallery of the Deer."

Look me in the eyes once! Steady!
Are you faithful? So we be and bleak!

On that eve when we two first
Vowed at Avon, blessed and cursed

Faith and falsehood? Pale already?
Forward! Must my hand compel

Entrance — this way? Exit — well,
Somewhere, somewhere. Who can tell?

What if to the selfsame place in
Rustic Avon, at the door
Of the village church once more,
Where a tombstone paves the floor

By that holy-water basin
You appealed to — "As, below,
This stone hides its corpse, e’en so
I your secrets hide?" What ho!

Friends, my four! You, Priest, confess him!
I have judged the culprit there:
Execute my sentence! Care
For no mail such cowards wear!

Done, Priest? Then, absolve and bless him!
Now — you three, stab thick and fast,
Deep and deeper! Dead at last?

Thanks, friends — Father, thanks! Aghast?

What one word of his confession
Would you tell me, though I lurked

With that royal crown abjured
Just because its bars immured

Love too much? Love burst compression,
Fled free, finally confessed

All its secrets to that breast
Whence... let Avon tell the rest!

Men, be Diana! I’ll be Francis.
Crescents change,—true!—wax and wane,
Woman-like: male hearts retain
Heat nor, once warm, cool again.

We figure — such our chance is—
I as man and you as... What?
Take offence? My Love forgot
He plays woman, I do not?

—the woman? See my habit,
Ask me people! Anyhow.
Be we what we may, one vow
Binds us, male or female. Now,— and, Sir! Read! "Quis separabit?"

Half a mile of pictured way
Past these palace-walls to-day
Traversed, this I came to say.

a must needs begin to love me;
First I hated, then, at best,
—Have it so!—I acquiesced
?re compassion did the rest.

I’m below thus raised above me,
Would you, step by step, descend,
Let me, become my friend,
Take me, like less, loathe at end?

at’s the ladder’s round you rose by!
That — my own foot kicked away,
Swaying raised you: let it stay,
Serve you for retreating? Nay,

See to me you climbed: as close by,
Keep your station, though the peak
Reached peevs somewhat bare and bleak?
Woman’s strong if man is weak.

ep here, loving me forever!
Love’s look, gesture, speech, I claim:
Let love, lie love, all the same—
Day as earnest were our game!

I stood long: ‘t was clever
When you climbed, before men’s eyes,
Burned the earth and sealed the skies.

Sated my peak and grasped your prize.

ie you stood, then, to men’s wonder;
here you tire of standing? Kneel!
Sure what giddiness you feel,
This way! Do your senses reel?

Unlikely! What rolls under?
Swooning death in you abides
Where the waters whirl and hiss
Found more frightful peaks than this.

old my buffet dash you thither... but be sage! No watery grave
Feeds await you: seem not brave
Kneel on safe, dear timid slave!

A surprised, when you climbed hither,
Not as easy were retreat
Wet crown you deserve

as standing, you as stooping,—
Who arranged for each the pose?
Res men think us friends turned foes,
Deep the attitude you chose!
MARY WOLLSTONECRAFT AND FUSELI

Oh, but is it not hard, Dear?
Mine are the nerves to quake at a mouse:
If a spider drops I shrink with fear:
I should die outright in a haunted house;
While for you — did the danger dare bring Help?
From a lion's den I could steal his whelp,
With a serpent round me, stand stock-still,
Go sleep in a churchyard, — so would will Give me the power to dare and do
Valiantly — just for you!

Much amiss in the head, Dear,
I toil at a language, tax my brain
Attempting to draw — the scratches here!
I play, play, practise, and all in vain:
But for you — if my triumph brought you pride,
I would grapple with Greek; Play till I died,
Paint a portrait of you — who can tell?
Work my fingers off for your "Pretty well!"
Language and painting and music too,
Easily done — for you!

Strong and fierce in the heart, Dear,
With — more than a will — what seems a power
To pounce on my prey, love outbroke here
In flame devouring and to devour.
Such love has labored its best and worst
To win me a lover; yet, last as first,
I have not quickened his pulse one beat,
Fixed a moment's fancy, bitter or sweet;
Yet the strong fierce heart's love's labor's due,
Utterly lost, was — you!

ADAM, LILITH, AND EVE

One day, it thundered and lightened.
Two women, fairly frightened,
Sank to their knees, transformed, transfixed,
At the feet of the man who sat betwixt;
And "Mercy!" cried each — "if I tell the truth
Of a passage in my youth!"

Daid This: "Do you mind the morning
I met your love with scowling?
As the worst of the venom left my lips,
I thought, 'If, despite this lie, he strips
The mask from my soul with a kiss — I crawl
His slave, — soul, body, and all!'

Daid That: "We stood to be married;
The priest, or some one, tarried;
‘If Paradise-door prove locked?’ smiled you.
I thought, as I nodded, smiling too,
‘Did one, that’s away, arrive — nor late
Nor soon should unlock Hell’s gate!’

It ceased to lighten and thunder.
Up started both in wonder,
Looked round and saw that the sky was clear,
Then laughed "Confess you believed us, Dear!"
"I saw through the joke!" the man replied
They re-seated themselves beside.

IXION

High in the dome, suspended, of Hell, and wraith
Behold us!
Here the revenge of a God, there the amiss
Of a Man.
Whirling forever in torment, flesh once mortal
Made — for a purpose of hate — able to rise
And revive,
Pays to the uttermost pang, them, newly in payment replenished,
Doles out — old yet young — agonies ever fresh;
Whence the result above me: torment is bridged
by a rainbow, —
Tears, sweat, blood, — each spasm, gladly once,
Once glorified now.
Wring, by the rush of the wheel ordained my place of reasoning.

Off in a sparklike spray, — flesh becomes vapor through pain, —
Flies the bestowment of Zeus, soul's vassal
Bodily venture,
Made that his feats observed gain in the approval of Man.

Flash that he fashioned with sense of the salt and the sky and the ocean,
Framed should pierce to the star, fitted to pore on the plant.
All, for a casual ease of hate, re-framed, re-fashioned, re-fitted.
Till, consummate at length, — lo, the employment of sense!

Pain's mere minister now to the soul, censured to her pleasure.
Soul, if untrammeled by flesh, unsuppressive of pain!
Body, professed soul's slave, which serving beguiled and betrayed her.
Made things false seem true, cheated through eye and through ear.
Lured the heart and brain to believe in the lying reported.

Spurn but the traitor's slave, unsettled atom, away.
What should obstruct soul's rush on the real, the only apparent?
Say I have erred, — bow else? Was I IXion or Zeus?
Foiled by my senses I dreamed; I doubtless awaken in wonder:
This proves shine, that — shade? Good was the evil that seemed?
Shall I, with sight thus gained, by torture be taught I was blind once?
Sisypheus, teaches thy stone — Tantalus,
Teaches thy thirst
Aught which unaided senses, purged pure, less plainly demonstrates?
No, for the past was dream: now that the dreamers awake,
Sisypheus scouts low fraud, and to Tantalus treason is folly.
Aok of myself, whose form melts on the murderous wheel,
Had I not stayed the consignment to doom, not dealt the renewed ones
Life to retroverse the past, light to retrieve the misedeed?
Thus had I done, and thus to have done much more it behoves thee,
Zeus who madest man — flawless or faulty, thy work
What if the charge were true, as thou mostheut,
— Ixion the cherished
Minion of Zeus grew vain, vied with the godships and fell, Forfeit through arrogance? Stranger! I clothed, with the grace of our hu
man,
Inhumanity — gods, natures I likened to ours.
Man among men I had borne me till gods forsooth must regard me
— Nay, mayst approve, applaud, claim as a comrade at last.
Summoned to enter their circle, I sat — their equal, how other?
Love should be absolute love, faith is in ful ness or naught.
"I am thy friend, be mine!" smiled Zeus: "If Heré attract thee," Blushed the imperial cheek, "then — as thy heart may suggest!"
Faith in me sprang to the faith, my love hailed love as its fellow,
"Zeus, we are friends — how fast! Heré, my heart for thy heart!"
Then broke smile into fury of frown, and the thunder of "Hence, fool!"
Then through the kiss laughed scorn "Limbs or a cloud was to clasp?"
Then from Olympus to Erebus, then from the rapture to torment,
Then from the fellow of gods — misery’s mate, to the man!
— Man henceforth and forever, who lent from the glow of his nature Warmth to the cold, with light colored the black and the blank.
So did a man conceive of your passion, you pas sion-protesters!
So did he trust, so love — being the truth of
your life!
You to aspire to be Man! Man made you who vainly would ape him:
You are the hollowness he — filling you, fal
sifies void.
Even as — witness the emblem, Hell’s sad tri umph suspended,
Born of my tears, sweat, blood — bursting to vapor above —
Arching my torment, an iris ghostlike st Artles
the darkness,
Cold white — jewelry quenched — justifies, glorifies pain.
Strive, mankind, though strife endure through endless obstruction,
Stage after stage, each rise marred by as cer tain a fall!
Baffled forever — yet never so baffled but, s’en
in the baffling,
When Man’s strength proves weak, checked in the body or soul,
JOCHOSERIA

Whatever the medium, flesh or essence,— —Exion's
Made for a purpose of hate,—clothing the entity Thou,
—Medium whence that entity strives for the
Not-Thou beyond it,
Fire elemental, free, frame unencumbered,
Never so baffled but—when, on the verge of an alien existence,
Heartened to press, by pangs burst to the infinite Pure,
Nothing is reached but the ancient weakness
still that arrests strength,
Circumambient still, still the poor human array,
Pride and revenge and hate and cruelty—all it has burst through,
Thought to escape,—fresh formed, found in the fashion it fled,
Never so baffled but—when Man pays the price
of endeavor,
Thunderstruck, downthrust, Tartaroa-doomed
to the wheel,—
Then, ay, then, from the tears and sweat and blood of his torment, E'en from the triumph of Hell, up let him
look and rejoice!
What is the influence, high o'er Hell, that turns to a rapture
the All—apache's muck mist blends in a rainbow of hope?
What is beyond the obstruction, stage by stage
though it baffles?
Back must I fall, confess "Ever the weakness
I fled"?
No, for beyond, far, far is a Purity all-unobstructed!
Zeus was Zeus—not Man: wrecked by his weakness, I whirl.
Out of the wreck I rise—past Zeus to the Potency o'er him!
I—to have bailed him my friend! I—to have clasped her—my love!
Pallid birth of my pain,—where light, where light is, aspiring!
Thither I rise, whilst thou—Zeus, keep the godship and sink!

JOCHANAN Hakkadosh

"True now, this other story makes amends
And justifies our Mishna," quoth the Jew
Aforesaid. "Tell it, learnedest of friends!"

A certain morn broke beautiful and blue
O'er Schiphas city, bringing joy and mirth,
—So had ye deemed; while the reverse was true,

Since one small house there gave a sorrow birth
In such black sort that, to each faithful eye,
Midnight, not morning settled on the earth.

How else, when it grew certain thou wouldst die,
Our much-enlightened master, Israel's prop,
Eximious Jochnanan Ben Sabbathai?

Old, yea, but, undiminished of a drop,
The vital essence pulsed through heart and
brain;
Time left unsickled yet the plenteous crop
On poll and chin and cheek, whereof a skein Handmaids might weave—hairs silk-soft, silver-white,
Such as the wool-plant's; none the less in vain
Had Physic striven her best against the spite
Of fell disease: the Rabbi must succumb;
And, round the couch whereon in piteous pangs
He lay a-dying, scholars,—awe-struck, dumb
Throughout the night-watch,—roused themselves and spoke
One to the other: "Ere death's touch burns
His active sense,—while yet 'neath Reosa's yoke
Obedient toil's his tongue,—befits we claim
The fruit of long experience, bid this oak
'Shed us an scorn which may, all the same,
Grow to a temple-pillar,—dear that day!—
When Israel's scattered seed finds place and name

"Among the various nations. Lænus us, pray,
Thou the Enlightener! Farthest hence in peace:
Hailed without regret—much less, dismay—

"The hour of thine approximate release
From fleshly bondage soul hath found obstruct Calmly envisaged the sure increase

"Of knowledge? Eden's tree must hold un-plucked
Some apple, sure, has never tried thy teeth,
Juicy with sapience thou hast sought, not sucked?

"Say, does age acquiesce in vanished youth?
Still towers thy purity above—as erst—
Our pleasant follies? Be thy last word—
truth!"

The Rabbi groaned: then, grimly, "Last as fast
The truth speak I—in boyhood who began
Striving to live an angel, and, amscred

"For such presumption, die now hardly man.
What have I proved of life? To live, indeed.
That much I learned: but here lies Jochnanan

"More luckless than stood David when, to speed
His fighting with the Philistine, they brought Saul's harness forth: whereat, ' Alack, I seed

"' Armor to arm me, but have never fought
With sword and spear, nor tried to manage shield,
Proving arms' use, as well-trained warrior sought

"' Only a sling and pebbles can I wield!'
So he: while I, contrariwise, 'No trick
Of weapon helpful on the battlefield
"Comes unfamiliar to my theoretic:
But, bid me put in practice what I know,
Give me a sword — it stings like Moses’ stick,
"A serpent I let drop space.’ E’en so,
I, — able to comport me at each stage
Of human life as never here below
"Man played his part, — since mine the heritage
Of wisdom carried to that perfect pitch,
Ye rightly praise, — I, therefore, who, thus sage,
"Could sure act man triumphantly, enrich Life’s annals, with example how I played Lover, Bard, Soldier, Statist, — (all of which "Parts in presentment failing, cries invade
The world’s ear — ‘Ah, the Past, the pearl-gift thrown
To hogs, time’s opportunity we made
"‘So light of, only recognized when flown!
Had we been wise!’ — in fine, I — wise enough, —
What profit brings me wisdom never shown
"Just when its showing would from each rebuff
Shelter weak virtue, threaten back to bounds
Encroaching vice, tread smooth each track too rough
"For youth’s unsteady footstep, climb the rounds
Of life’s long ladder, one by slippery one,
Yet make no stumble? Me hard fate confounds
"With that same crowd of wailers I outrun
By promising to teach another cry
Of more hilarious mood than theirs, the sun
"I look my last at is insulted by.
What cry, — ye ask? Give ear on every side!
Witness you Lover! ‘How entrapped am I!
"Methought, because a virgin’s rose-lip vied
With ripe Khubbezeleh’s, needs must beauty mate
With meekness and discretion in a bride:
"Bride she became to me who wait — too late —
Unwise I loved!’ That’s one cry. ‘Mind’s my gift:
I might have loaded me with lore, full weight
"Pressed down and running over at each rift
O’ the brain-bag where the famished clung and fed.
I filled it with what rubbish! — would not sift
"The wheat from chaff, sound grain from musty — shed
Poison abroad as oft as nutriment —
And sighing say but as my fellows said,
"‘Unwise I learned!’ That’s two. ‘In dwarf’s-play spent
Was giant’s prowess: warrior all unversed
In war’s right waging, I struck brand, was lant
"‘For steel’s fit service, on mere stone — and cursed Alike the shocked limb and the shivered steel,
Seeing too late the blade’s true use which erst
"How was I blind to! My cry swells the peel —
Unwise I fought!’ That’s three. But wherefore waste Breath on the wailings longer? Why reveal
"A root of bitterness whereof the taste
Is noisome to Humanity at large?
First we get Power, but Power absurdly placed "In Folly’s keeping, who resigns her charge
To Wisdom when all Power grows nothing worth:
Bones marrowless are mocked with helm and targe
"When, like your Master’s, soon below the earth
With worms shall warfare only be. Farewell, Children! I die a failure since my birth!”
"Not so!” arose a protest, as, bell-mell,
They pattered from his chamber to the street,
Bent on a last resource. Our Tarquins tell
That such resource there is. Put case, there meet
The Nine Points of Perfection — rarest chance —
Within some saintly teacher whom the fleet
Years, in their blind implacable advance, O’ertake before fit teaching born of these Have magnified his scholars’ countenance, —
"If haply folk compassionating please
To render up — according to his store,
Each one — a portion of the life he sees
Hardly worth saving when ’tis set before
Earth’s benefit should the Saint, Hakkadoeh, Favored thereby, attain to full fourscore —
"If such contribute (Scoffer, spare thy “Bosh!”)
A year, a month, a day, an hour — to eke
Life out, — in him away the gift shall wash
That much of ill-spent time recorded, streak
The twilight of the so-assisted sage
With a new sunrise: truth, though strange to speak!
Quick to the doorway, then, where youth and age,
All Israel, thronging, waited for the last
News of the loved one. “Tis the final stage:
"Art's utmost done, the Rabbi's feet tread fast
The way of all flesh!" So announced that apt
Olive-branch Tzaddik: 'Yet, O Brethren, cast

"No eye to earthward! Look where heaven has clapped
Morning's extinguisher — you ray-shot robe
Of sun-threads — on the constellation mapped

"And mentioned by our Elders, — yes, from Job
Down to Satam, — as figuring forth — what?
Perpend a mystery! Ye call it Doe,

"'The Bear': I trow, a wiser name than that Were Aish — 'The Bier': a corpse, those four stars hold,
Which — are not those Three Daughters weeping at

"Banoth? I judge so: list while I unfold
The reason. As in twice twelve hours this Bier Goes and returns, about the east-corne rolled,

"So may a setting luminary here
Be rescued from extinction, rolled anew
Upon its track of labor, strong and clear,

"About the Pole — that Salem, every Jew Helps to build up when thus he saves some Saint
Ordained its architect. Ye grasp the clue

"To all ye seek? The Rabbi's lamp-flame faint
Sink's: would ye raise it? Lend them life from yours.
Spare each his oil-drop! Do I need acquaint

"The Chosen how self-sacrifice ensures
Tenfold requital? — urge ye emulate
The fame of those Old Just Ones death procures

"Such praise for, that 'tis now men's sole debate
Which of the Ten, who volunteered at Rome to die for glory to our Race, was great

"Beyond his fallows? Was it thou — the comb
Of iron carded, flesh from bone, away,
While thy lips sputtered through their bloody foam

"Without a stoppage (O brave Akiba!)
Hear, Israel, our Lord God is One! 'Or thou,
Jischab? — who smiledest, burning, since there lay,

"Burning along with thee, our Law! I trow,
Such martyrdom might tax flesh to afford:
While that for which I make petition now,

"To what amounts it? Youngster, wilt thou hear!
Each minute of long years thou look'st to spend
In dalliance with thy spouse? Hast thou so scared,

"Singer of songs, all out of sight of friend
And teacher, warbling like a woodland bird,
There's left no Selah, 'twixt two psalms, to land

"Our late-so-tuneful quirest? Thou, averted
The fighter born to plant our lion-flag
Once more on Zion's mount, — doth all-ear

"My pleasing fail to move thee? Tomb eag
Shall stain our wound, some minute new missed
From wordman's instihood like thine! Wit lag

"In liberal bestowment, show close fist
When open palm we look for, — those, wide
Known For statescraft? whom, 'tis said, and if the list,

"The Shah himself would seat beside his throne
So valued were advice from thee"... But here
He stopped short: such a hubbab! Not alse
From those addressed, but far as well as near
The crowd brought into clamor: "Mine, mine,
Lop from my life the excessiveness, never fear!

"At me thou lookedst, markedst me! Ar sign
To me that privilege of granting life —
Mine, mine!" Then he: "Be patient! I combine

"The needful portions only, wage no strife
With Nature's law nor seek to lengthen out
The Rabbi's day unduly. 'Tis the knife

"I stop, — would out its thread too short.
About
As much as helps life last the proper term,
The appointed Fourscore, — that I crave, and soot

"A too-prolonged existence. Let the worm
Change at fit season to the butterfly!
And here a story strikes me, to confirm

"This judgment. Of our worthies, none ranks high
As Perida who kept the famous school:
None rivalled him in patience: none! For why?

"In lecturing it was his constant rule,
Whatever he expounded, to repeat
— Ay, and keep on repeating, lest some feel

"Should fail to understand him fully — (fast Unparalleled, Uzemann! — do ye mark?) —
Five hundred times! So might he entrance best
JOCHANAN HAKKADOSH

"For knowledge into howsoever dark
And dense the brain-pan. Yet it happed, at close
Of one especial lecture, not one spark

"Of light was found to have illumined the rows
Of pupils round their pedagogue. 'What, still Impenetrable to me? Then — here goes!'

"And for a second time he sets the rill
Of knowledge running, and five hundred times
More re-repeats the matter — and gains nil.

"Out broke a voice from heaven: 'Thy patience climbs
Even thus high. Choose! Wilt thou, rather, quick Ascend to bliss — or, since thy zeal sublimes

"'Such drudgery, will thy back still bear its croak,
Bent o'er thy class, — thy voice drone quite of drouth,—
Five hundred years more at thy desk wilt stick?'

"'To heaven with me!' was in the good man's mouth,
When all his scholars — cruel-kind were they! — Stopped utterance, from East, West, North and South,

"Bending the walkin with their shout of 'Nay —
No heaven as yet for our instructor! Grant Five hundred years on earth for Perida!'

"And so long did he keep instructing! Want
Our Master no such misery! I but take Three months of life marial, Ministrant

"Be thou of so much, Poet! Bold I make, Swordsmen, with thy frank offer! — and conclude, Statist, with thine! One year, — ye will not shake

"My purpose to accept no more. More rude? The very boys and girls, forsooth, must press And proffer their addition? Thanks! The mood

"Is landable, but I reject, no less One month, week, day of life more. Leave my gown, Ye overbold ones! Your life's gift, you guess,

"Were good as any? Rudesby, get thee down! Set my feet free, or fear my staff! Farewell, Seniors and saviors, sharers of renown

"With Jochanan henceforward!" Straightway fell
Sleep on the sufferer; who awoke in health, Hale everyway, so potent was the spell.

O the rare Spring-time! Who is he by stealth Approaches Jochanan? — embowered that site Under his vine and fig-trees 'mid the wealth

Of garden-sights and sounds, since since intermits Never the turtle's soo, nor stays nor stints The rose her smell. In homage that befits

The musing Master, Tsaddik, see, imprints A kiss on the extended foot, low bends Forehead to earth, then, all-obsequious, hints

"What if it should be time? A period ends — That of the Lover's gift — his quarter-year Of lustihood: 't is just thou make amend, return

"Return that loan with usurry: so, here Come I, of thy Disciples delegate, Claiming our lesson from thee. Make appear

"'Thy profit from experience! Plainly state How men should Love!' Thus he: and to him thus The Rabbi: 'Love, ye call it? — rather, Hate!

"What wouldst thou? Is it needful I discuss Wherefore new sweet wine, poured in bottles caked With old strong wine's deposit, offers us

"Spoilt liquor we recoil from, thirst-unslaked? Like earth-smoke from a crevice, out there wound —

"Languors and yearnings: not a sense but ached

"Weighted on by fancied form and feature, sound Of silver word and sight of sunny smile; No beckoning of a flower-branch, no profound

"Purple of noon-oppression, no light wile O' the West wind, but transformed itself till — brief— Before me stood the phantasy yo style

"Youth's love, the joy that shall not come to grief, Born to endure, eternal, unimpaired By custom the accloyer, time the thief.

"Had Age's hard cold knowledge only spared That ignorance of Youth! But now the dream, Fresh as from Paradise, alighting fared

"As fares the pigeon, finding what may seem Her nest's safe hollow holds a snake inside Coiled to encloset her. See, Eve stands supreme

"In youth and beauty! Take her for thy bride! What Youth deemed crystal, Age finds out was dew Morn set a-sparkle, but which noon quick dried

"While Youth bent gazing at its red and blue Supposed perennial, — never dreamed the sun Which kindled the display would quench it too.
"Graces of shape and color — every one
With its appointed period of decay
When ripe to purpose! 'Still these dead and
done,
""Survives the woman-nature — the soft sway
Of undefinable omnipotence
O'er our strong male stuff, we of Adam's clay.'

"Ay, if my physics taught not why and whence
The attraction! 'Am I like the simple steer
Who, from his pasture lured inside the fence,
Where yoke and goad await him, holds that mere
Kindliness prompts extension of the hand
Hallowed for barley, which drew near and near

"His nose — in proof that, of the horrid band,
The farmer best affected him? 'Beside,
Steer, since his calfhood, got to understand

"Farmers many in the world so wide
Were ready with a handful just as choice
Or choicer — maize and cummin, treats untried.

"Shall I wed wife, and all my days rejoice
I gained the peacock? 'Les me, round I look,
And lo — 'With me thou wouldst have blamed
no voice

"'Like hers that daily deafens like a rook:
I am the phœnix!' 'Tis, the lark, the dove,
— the owl,' for all that knows he who blindly took

"Peacock for partner, while the vale, the grove,
The plain held bird-mates in abundance. There
Youth, try fresh capture! Age has found out
Love

"Long ago. War seems better worth man's care.
But leave me! Disappointment finds a balm Haply in slumber.' " 'This first step o' the stairs

"To knowledge fails me, but the victor's palm
Lies on the next to tempt him overlap
A stumbling-block. Experienced, gather calm,

"Thou excellence of Judah, cured by sleep
Which asleep in the Warrior, to replace
The Lover! At due season I shall reap

"'Fruit of my planting!' So, with lengthened face,
Departed Tsaddik: and three moons more waxed
And waned, and not until the summer-space
Waned likewise, any second visit taxed
The Rabbi's patience. But at three months' end
Behold, supine beneath a rock, relaxed

The sage lay musing till the moon should speed
Its ardor. Up comes Tsaddik, who but be,
With 'Master, may I warn thee, now on guard.

"That time comes round again? ' We look to
see
Sprout from the old branch — not the young-ing twig
But fruit of sycamine: deliver me,

"To share among my fellows, some plump fig.
Juicy as seedy! That same man of war,
Who, with a scolding of his store, made big

"Thy starveling nature, caused thee, safe from scorn.
To share his gains by long acquaintance.
With bump and bruise and all the knocks that are

"Of battle dowry, — he bids loose thy lip,
Explain the good of battle! Since thou know'st,
Let us know likewise! Fast the moments slip,

"More need that we improve them!' — "Ay,
we boast,
We warriors in our youth, that with the sword
Man goes the swiftest to the uttermost

"Takes the straight way through lands yet unexplored
To absolute Right and Good, — may so obtain
God's glory and man's weal too long ignored,

"Too late attained by preachments all in vain —
The passive process. Knots get tangled worse
By toying with: does out cord close again?

"Moreover there is blessing in the cursè
Peace-praisers call war. What so sure evolves
All the capacities of soul, prove nurse

"Of that self-sacrifice in men which solves
The riddle: — Wherin differs Man from beast?
Foxes boast cleverness and courage wolves:

"Nowhere but in mankind is found the least
Touch of an impulse 'To our fellows — good
1' the highest! — not diminished but increased

"By the condition plainly understood
— Such good shall be attained at price of hurt
1' the highest to ourselves!' Fine sparks, that brood

"Confusedly in Man, 't is war bids sport
Forth into flame: as fares the meteor-mass.
Whereof no particle but holds inert

"Some seed of light and heat, however草
The enclosure, yet avails not to discharge
Its radiant birth before there come to pass

"Some push external, — strong to set at large
Those dormant fire-seeds, whirl them in a tree
Through heaven, and light up earth from marge to marge:
"Since force by motion makes — what erst was ice —
Crash into fervency and so expire,
Because some Djinn has hit on a device

"For proving the full prettiness of fire!
Ay, thus we prattle — young; but old — why, first,
Where 's that same Right and Good — (the wise inquire) —

"So absolute, it warrants the outburst
Of blood, tears, all war’s woeful consequence,
That comes of the fine flaring? Which plague cursed

"The more your benefited Man — offence,
Or what suppressed the offender? Say it did —
Show us the evil cured by violence,

"Submission cures not also! Lift the lid
From the maturing crucible, we find
Its slow sure coothing of virtue, bid

"In that same meteor-mass, hath uncombined
Those particles and, yielding for result
Gold, not mere flame, by so much leaves behind

"The heroic product. 'E'en the simple cult
Of Edom's children wisely bids them turn
Cheek to the smiter with 'Sic Jesus vict.'

"Say there 's a tyrant by whose death we earn
Freedom, and justify a war to wage:
Good! — were we only able to discern

"— How shared they his ill-doing? Far and wide
The victims of our warfare strew the plain,
Ten thousand dead, whereof not one but died

"In faith that vassals owed their suzerain
Life: therefore each paid tribute — honest soul —
To that same Right and Good ourselves are vain

"To call exclusively our end. From bole
(Since ye accept in me a sycamine)
Flack, eat, digest a fable — yes, the sole

"Fig I afford you! 'Dost thou dwarf my vine?'
(So did a certain husbandman address
The tree which faced his field.) 'Receive condign

"Punishment, prompt removal by the stress
Of axe I forthwith lay unto thy root!'
Long did he hack and hew, the root no less

"As long defied him, for its tough strings shoot
As deep down as the boughs above aspire:
All that he did was — shake to the tree's foot

"Leafage and fruitage, things we most require
For shadow and refreshment: which good deed
Thoroughly done, behold the axe-haft tires

"His hand, and he desisting leaves unfreed
The vine he hacked and hewed for. Comes a frost,
One natural night's work, and there's little need

"Of hacking, hewing: lo, the tree 's a ghost!
Perished it starves, black death from topmost bough
To farthest-reaching fibre! Shall I boast

"My rough work — warfare — helped more?
Loving, now —
That, by comparison, seems wiser, since
The loving fool was able to avow

"He could affect his purpose, just evince
Love's willingness, — once 'ware of what she lacked,
His loved one, — to go work for that, nor wince

"At self-expenditure: he neither hacked
Nor hewed, but when the lady of his field
Required defence because the sun attacked,

"He, failing to obtain a fitter shield. Would interpose his body, and so blaze, Blest in the burning. Ah, were mine to wield

"The intellectual weapon — post-lays, —
How preferably had I sung one song
Which . . . but my sadness sinks me: go your ways!

"I sleep out disappointment." "Come along,
Never lose heart! There's still as much again
Of our bestowment left to right the wrong

"Done by its earlier moiety — explain
Wherefore, who may! The Poet's mood comes next.
Was he not wishful the poetic vein

"Should pulse within him? Jochanan, thou rock'st
Little of what a generous flood shall soon
Float thy clogged spirit free and unperplexed

"Above dry dubitation! Song 's the boon
Shall make amends for my untoward mistake
That Joshua-like thou couldst bid sun and moon —

"Fighter and Lover,— which for most men make
All they descry in heaven, — stand both stock-still
And lend assistance. Poet shalt thou wake!"

Autumn brings Tsaddik. "Ay, there speeds the rill
Loaded with leaves: a scowling sky, beside:
The wind makes olive-trees up yonder hill

"Whiten and shudder — symptoms far and wide
Of gleaming-time's approach; and gleam good store
May I presume to trust we shall, thou tried

"And ripe experimenter! Three months more
Have ministered to growth of Song: that graft
Into thy stalwart stock has found at core

"Moisture, I warrant, hitherto unquaffed
By boughs, however florid, wanting sap
Of pross-experience which provides the draught

"Which song-sprouts, wanting, wither: vain we tap
A youngling stem all green and immature;
Experience must secrete the stuff, our hap

"Will be to quench Man's thirst with, glad and sure
That fancy wells up through corrective fact:
Missing which test of truth, though flowers allure

"The goodman's eye with promise, soon the past
Is broken, and 't is flowers — mere words — he finds
When things — that's fruit — he looked for.
Well, once cracked

"The nut, how glad my tooth the kernel grinds!
Song may henceforth boast substance! Therefore, hail Prosper and poet, perfect in both kinds!

"Thou from whose eye hath dropped the envious scale
Which hides the truth of things and substitutes Deceptive show, unaided optics fail

"To transpire, — hast entrusted to the lute's Soft but sure guardianship some unrevealed Secret shall lift mankind above the brutes

"As only knowledge can?" "A fount unsealed"
(Sighed Jochanan) "should seek the heaven in leaps
To die in dew-gems — not find death, congealed
By contact with the cavern's nether deeps,
Earth's secretest foundation where, enswathed In dark and fear, primeval mystery sleeps —

"Petrific fount wherein my fancies bathed
And straight turned ice. My dreams of good and fair
In soaring upwards had dissolved, unsathed

"By any influence of the kindly air, Singing, as each took flight, 'The Future —
Our destination, mists turn rainbows there,
"Steals o'er the Statist,—while, in wit, a match
For shrewd Athithophel, in wisdom . . . well,
His name escapers me — somebody, at watch

"And ward, the fellow of Athithophel
In guidance of the Chosen!"—at which word
Eyes closed and fast asleep the Rabbi fell.

"Cold weather!" shivered Tsaddik. "Yet

the board
Of the sagacious ant shows garnered grain,
Ever abundant most when fields afford

"Least pasture, and alike disgrace the plain
Tall tree and lovely shrub. 'Tis so with us
Mortals: our age stores wealth ye seek in vain

"While busy youth calls just what we discuss
At leisure in the last days: and the last Truly are these for Jochanan, whom thus

"I make one more appeal to! Thine amassed Experience, now or never, let escape
Some portion of! For I perceive aghast

"The end approaches, while they jeer and jape,
These sons of Shimei: 'Justify your boast!
What have ye gained from Death by twelve months' rape?"

"Statesman, what urge hast thou for — least
And most—
Popular grievances? What nostrum, say,
Will make the Rich and Poor, expertly dosed,

"Forget disparity, bid each go gay,
That, with his bauble,—with his burden, this?
Propose an alkaheet shall melt away

"Man's lacquer, show by prompt analysis
Which is the metal, which the make-believe,
So that no longer brass shall find, gold miss

"Coinage and currency? Make haste, retrieve
The precious moments, Master!" Whereunto
There smars an "Ever laughing in thy sleeve,

"Pert Tsaddik! Youth indeed sees plain a clue
To guide man where life's wood is intricate:
How shall he fail to thrid its thickness through

"When every oak-trunk takes the eye? Elate
He goes from hole to brushwood, plunging finds—
Smothered in briers—that the small's the great!

"All men are men: I would all minds were minds!
Whereas 't is just the many's mindless mass
That most needs helping: laborers and kins

"We legislate for — not the cultured class
Which law-makes for itself nor needs the whip
And bridle,—proper help for male and ass,

"Did the brutes know! In vain our statesmanship
Strives at contenting the rough multitude:
Still the ox cries 'T is me thou shouldst equip

"'With equine trappings!' or, in humbler mood,
'Cribful of corn for me!' and, as for work —
Adequate rumination o'er my food!'"

"Better remain a Pastor! Needs it irk
Such an one if light, kindled in his sphere,
Fall to transfuse the Miriam cold and murrk

"Round about Goshen? Though light disappear,
Shut inside, — temporary ignorance
Got outside of, lo, light emerging clear

"Shows each astonished starrer the expanse
Of heaven made bright with knowledge!
That's the way,
The only way — I see it at a glance—

"To legislate for earth! As poet . . . Stay!
What is . . . I would that . . . were it . . . I had been . . .
O sudden change, as if my arid clay

"Burst into bloom!" . . . "A change indeed, I ween,
And change the last!" sighed Tsaddik as he kissed
The closing eyelids. "Just as those serene

"Princes of Night apprised me! Our acoust
Of life is spent, since corners only four Hath Aisch, and each in turn was made desist

"In passage round the Pole (O Mishna's lore — Little it profits here!) by strenuous tug
Of friends who eked out thus to fall fourscore

"The Rabbi's years. I see each shoulder shrug!
What have we gained? Away the Bier may roll!
To-morrow, when the Master's grave is dug,

"In with his body I may pitch the scroll
I hoped to glorify with, text and gloss,
My Science of Man's Life: one blank's the whole!

"Love, war, song, statesmanship — no gain, all loss,
The stars' bestowment! We on our return
To-morrow merely find — not gold but dross,

"The body not the soul. Come, friends, we learn
At least thus much by our experiment —
That — that . . . well, find what, whom it may concern!"

But next day through the city rumors went
Of a new persecution; so, they fled
All Israel, each man,—this time,—from his tent,
Teaddik among the foremost. When, the dread Subsiding, Israel ventured back again Some three months after, to the cave they spied

Where lay the Sage; — a reverential train! Teaddik first enters. "What is this I view? The Rabbi still alive? No stars remain

"Of Aisch to stop within their courses. True, I mind me, certain gameosome boys must urge Their offerings on me; can it be — one threw

"Life at him and it stuck? There needs the scourage To teach that worthin manners! Prithsee, grant Forgiveness if we pretermit thy dirge

"Just to explain no friend was ministrant, This time, of life to thee! Some jackanapes, I gather, has pressumed to foist his scant

"Scurvy unripe existence — wilding grapes Grass-green and sorrel-sour — on that grand wine, Mighty as mellow, which, so fancy shapes

"May flit image forth this life of thine Fed on the last low fattening lees — condensed Elixir, no milk-mildness of the vine!

"Rightly with Teaddik wert thou now incensed Had he been witting of the mischief wrought When, for elixir, verjuice he dispensed!"

And slowly woke, — like Shushan’s flower-besought By over-curious handling to unloose The curtained secrecy wherein she thought Her captive bee, ’mid store of sweets to choose, Would loll, in gold pavilioned lie unteased, Sucking on, sated never, — whose, O whose

Might seem that countenance, uplift, all eased Of old distraction and bewilderment, Absurdly happy? "How ye have appeased

"The strife within me, bred this whole content, This utter acquiescence in my past, Present and future life, — by whom was lent

"The power to work this miracle at last, — Exceeds my guess. Though — ignorance confirmed

By knowledge sounds like paradox, I cast

"Vainly about to tell you — fittier termed — Of calm struck by encountering opposites, Each nullifying either! Henceforth wormed

"From out my heart is every snake that bites The dove that else would brood there: doubt, which kills With hiss of ‘What if sorrows end delights?’

"Fear which stings ease with ‘Work the Master wille!’ Experience which coils round and strangles quick Each hope with ‘Ask the Past if hoping skills

"To work accomplishment, or proves a trick Wiling thee to endeavor! Strive, fool, stop Nowise, so live, so die — that’s law! why kick

"Against the pricks? All out-wormed! Slumber, drop Thy films once more and veil the bliss within! Experience strange hope? Hope waves a-top

"Her wings triumphant! Come what will, I win, Whoever loses! Every dream’s assured Of soberest fulfilment. Where’s a sin

"Except in doubting that the light, which lured The unwary into darkness, meant no wrong Had I but marched on bold, nor paused immersed

"By mist I should have pressed through passed along My way henceforth rejoicing? Not the boy’s Passionate impulse he conceits so strong,

"Which, at first touch, truth, bubble-like, destroys, — Not the man’s slow conviction. Vanity Of vanities — alike my griefs and joys!"

"Ice! — thawed (look up) each bird, each insect by — (Look round) by all the plants that break is bloom, (Look down) by every dead friend’s memory

"That smiles. ‘Am I the dust within my tomb?’ Not either, but both these; amalgam rare — Mix in a product, not from Nature’s womb,

"But stuff which He the Operator — who shall dare Describe His operation? — strikes alive And thalamurgic. I nor know nor care

"How from this tohu-bohu — hopes which dive And fears which soar — faith, ruined through and through By doubt, and doubt, faith treads to dust — revive

"In some surprising sort, — as see, they do! — Not merely foes no longer but fast friends. What does it mean unless — O strange and new

"Discovery! — this life proves a wine-press blends Evil and good, both fruits of Paradise, Into a novel drink which — who intends

"To quaff, must bear a brain for ecstasies Attempered, not this all-inadequate Organ which, quivering within me, dies
"—Nay, live! —what, how,—too soon, or else too late—
I was — I am."... ("He babbleth!" Tsaddik mused)
"O Thou Almighty, who canst reign!

"Trusts in their primal clarity, confused
By man's perception, which is man's and made
To suit his service,—how, once disabused

"Of reason which sees light half shine half shade,
Because of flesh, the medium that adjusts
Purity to his visuals, both an aid

"And hindrance,—how to eyes earth's air crusts,
When purged and perfect to receive truth's beam
Pouring itself on the new sense it trusts

"With all its plenitude of power,—how seem
The intricacies now, of shade and shine,
Opposculp natures—Right and Wrong, we deem

"Irreconcilable? O eyes of mine,
Freed now of impertinction, ye avail
To see the whole sight, nor may uncombine

"Henceforth what, erst divided, caused you quail—
So huge the chasm between the false and true,
The dream and the reality! All hail,

"Day of my soul's deliverance—day the new,
The never-ending! What though every shape
Whereon I wreaked my yearning to pursue

"Even to success each semblance of escape
From my own bounded self to some all-fair
All-wise external fancy, proved a rape

"Like that old giant's, feigned of fools—on air,
Not solid flesh? How otherwise? To love—
That lesson was to learn not here—but there—

"On earth, not here! 'T is there we learn,— there prove
Our parts upon the stuff we needs must spoil,
Striving at mastery, there bend above

"The spoiled clay potsherds, many a year of toil
Attests the potter tried his hand upon,
Till sudden he arose, wiped free from soil

"His hand, cried 'So much for attempt—anon
Performance! Taught to mould the living vase,
What matter the cracked pitchers dead and gone?'

"Could I impart and could thy mind embrace
The secret, Tsaddik?" "Secret none to me!"
Quoth Tsaddik, as the glory on the face

Of Jochanan was quenched. "The truth I see
Of what that excellence of Judah wrote,
Doughty Halaphra. This a case must be

"Wherein, though the last breath have passed the throat,
So that 'The man is dead' we may pronounce,
Yet is the Ruach,—thus do we denote

"The imparted Spirit,—in no haste to bounce
From its enthroned Body,—some three days
Lingers ere it relinquish to the pounce

"Of hawk-clawed Death his victim. Further says Halaphra, 'Instances have been, and yet Again may be, when saints, whose earthly ways

"'Tend to perfection, very nearly yet
To heaven while still on earth: and, as a fine
Interval shows where waters pure have met

"Waves backish, in a mixture, sweet with bine,
That 's neither sea nor river but a taste
Of both—so meet the earthly and divine

"And each is either.' Thus I hold him graced Dying on earth, half inside and half out,
Wholly in heaven, who knows? My mind embraced

"Thy secret, Jochanan, how dare I doubt?
Follow thy Ruach, let earth, all it can,
Keep of the leavings!" Thus was brought about
The sepulture of Rabbi Jochanan:
Thou hast him,—sinner-saint, live-dead, boy-
man—
Schiaphes, on Bendimir, in Farzistan!

Notes. —This story can have no better authority than that of the treatise, existing dispersedly in fragments of Rabbinical writing, מְלֶומָה יְבוּא בַּמְלִית מְלֶומָה, from which I might have helped myself more literally. Thus, instead of the simple reference to "Moses' stick,"— but what if I make amends by attempting three illustrations, when some thirty might be composed on the same subject, equally justifying that pithy proverb בָּמְלִית מְלֶומָה לָא יְכוּנֶה מְלָמוּת.

-Moses the Moa was thirty cubits high,
The staff he strode with—thirty cubits long;
And when he leapt, so muscular and strong
Was Moses that his leaping neared the sky
By thirty cubits more: we learn thereby
He reached full ninety cubits—am I wrong?—
When, in a fight slurred o'er by sacred song,
With staff outstretched he took a leap to try
The just dimensions of the giant Og.

And yet he barely touched,—this marvel lacked Posterity to crown earth's catalogue
Of marvels—barely touched—to be exact—
The giant's ankle-bone, remained a frog
That fain would match an ox in stature: fact!

And this same fact has met with unbelief!
How saith a certain traveller? "Young, I chanced
To come upon an object—if thou canst,
NEVER THE TIME AND THE PLACE

Never the time and the place
And the loved one all together!
This path — how soft to pace!
This May — what magic weather!
Where is the loved one’s face?
In a dream that loved one’s face meets mine,
But the house is narrow, the place is bleak
Where, outside, rain and wind combine
With a furtive ear, if I strive to speak,
With a hostile eye at my flushing cheek,
With a malice that marks each word, each sign!

O, enemy sly and serpentine,
Uncoil thee from the waking man!
Do I hold the Past
Thrice firm and fast
Yet doubt if the Future hold I can?
This path so soft to pace shall lead
Through the magic of May to herself indeed!
Or narrow if needs the house must be,
Outside are the storms and strangers: we — Oh, close, safe, warm sleep I and she,
— I and she!

PAMBO

Suppose that we part (work done, comes play)
With a grave tale told in crambo
— As our hearty sires were wont to say —
Whereof the hero is Pambo?

Do you happen to know who Pambo was?
Nor I — but this much have heard of him:

He entered one day a college-class,
And asked — was it so absurd of him?

"May Pambo learn wisdom ere practise it?
In wisdom I fain would ground me:
Since wisdom is centred in Holy Writ,
Some psalm to the purpose expound me!"

"That psalm," the Professor smiled, "shall be Untroubled by doubt which dirtieth
Pellucid streams when an ass like thee
Would drink there — the Nine-and-thirtieth

"Verse First: I said I will look to my ways
That I with my tongue offend not.
How now? Why stare? Art struck in amaze?
Stop, stay! The smooth line hath an end knot:

"He's gone! — disgraced my text should pose
Too easy to need explaining?
Had he waited, the blockhead might find I was
To matter that pays remaining?"

Long years went by, when — "Ha, who's this?
Do I come on the restive scholar
I had driven to Wisdom's goal, I wish,
But that he slipped the collar?

"What? Arms crossed, brow bent, thought immersed?
A student indeed! Why scruple
To own that the lesson proposed him first Scarce suited so apt a pupil?

"Come back! From the beggarly elements
To a more recondite issue
We pass till we reach, at all events,
Some point that may puzzle... Why 'pick' you?"

From the ground looked piteous up the head:
"Daily and nightly, Master,
Your pupil plods through that text you read.
Yet gets on never the faster.

"At the selfsame stand, — now old, thou young! I will look to my ways — we were doing
As easy as saying! — that I with my tongue
Offend not and 'scape pook-poohing

"From sage and simple, doctor and dunses?
Ah, nowise! Still doubts so muddling
The stream I would drink at once, — but one!
That — thus I resume my study!"

Brother, brother, I share the blame,
Arcades sumus ambo!
Darling, I keep my snuffle-sine,
Lack not the critic's flamebean,
And look to my ways, yet, much the same,
Offend with my tongue — like Pambo!
FERISHTAH’S FANCIES

His genius was jovial, but, when disposed, he could be very serious. — Article “Shakespeare,” Jeremy Collier’s Historical &c. Dictionary, 2d edition, 1701.

You, Sir, I entertain you for one of my Hundred; only, I do not like the fashion of your garments: you will say they are Persian: but let them be changed. — King Lear, Act III. Sc. 6.

There is a loose connection between this group of poems and certain forms of Oriental literature, notably The Fables of Bidpai or Pilpay, Ferdans’s Shah-Nâmeh, and the Book of Job; specific instances may easily be noted; but Browning himself said in a letter to a friend, written soon after the publication of Ferishtah’s Fancies: “I hope and believe that one or two careful readings of the Poem will make its sense clear enough. Above all, pray allow for the Poet’s inventiveness in any case, and do not suppose there is more than a thin disguise of a few Persian names and allusions. There was no such person as Ferishtah — the stories are all inventions. . . . The Hebrew quotations are put in for a purpose, as a direct acknowledgment that certain doctrines may be found in the Old Book, which the Concoctors of Novel Schemes of Morality put forth as discoveries of their own.”

PROLOGUE

Pray, Reader, have you eaten ortolans
Ever in Italy?
Recall how cooks there oook them: for my plan’s
To — Lyre with Spit allay.
They pluck the birds, — some dozen luscious lumps,
Or more or fewer, —
Then roast them, heads by heads and rumps by rumps,
Stuck on a skewer.
But first, — and here’s the point I fain would press, —
Don’t think I’m tattling: —
They interpose, to curb its lusciousness,
— What, ’twixt each fatting?
First comes plain bread, crisp, brown, a toasted square:
Then, a strong sage-leaf:
(So we find books with flowers dried here and there Last leaf engage leaf.)
First, food — then, piquancy — and last of all
Follows the thrilling:
Through wholesome hard, sharp soft, your tooth must bite
Ere reach the birdling.
Now, were there only crust to crunch, you’d wince:
Unpalatable!
Sage-leaf is bitter-pungent — so’s a quince:
Eat each who’s able!
But through all three bite boldly — lo, the gust!
Flavor — no fixture —
Flees permeating flesh and leaf and crust
In fine admixture.
So with your meal, my poem: masticate
Sense, sight, and song there!

Digest these, and I praise your peptics’ state,
Nothing found wrong there.
Whence springs my illustration who can tell?
— The more surprising
That here eggs, milk, cheese, fruit suffice so
well
For gormandizing.
A fancy-freak by contrast born of thee,
Delightful Gressoney!
Who laughs! “Take what is, trust what may be!”
That’s Life’s true lesson, — ah?

MAISON D’EAUFLERE,
Gressoney St. Jean, Vâl d’Aosta,
September 19, ’83.

I. THE EAGLE

This poem is drawn quite closely from The Fables of Bidpai.

Dervish (though yet un-dervished, call him so)
No less beforehand: while he drugged our way,
Other his worldly name was: when he wrote
Those versicles we Persians praise him for,
— True fairy-work — Ferishtah grew his style) —
Dervish Ferishtah walked the woods one eve,
And noted on a bough a raven’s nest
Whereof each youngling gaped with callow beak
Widened by want; for why? beneath the tree
Dead lay the mother-bird. “A piteous chance!
How shall they ’scape destruction?” sighed the sage
— Or sage about to be, though simple still,
Responsive to which doubt, sudden there swooped
An eagle downward, and behold he bore
(Great-hearted) in his talons flesh wherewith
FERISHTAH’S FANCIES

He stayed their craving, then resought the sky,
"Ah, foolish, faithless me!" the observer smiled,
"Who till and moil to eke out life, when, lo, Providance cares for every hungry mouth?"
To profit by which lesson, home went he,
And certain days sat nursing,—neither meat
Nor drink would purchase by his handwork.
Then—for his head swam and his limbs grew faint—
Sleep overtook the unwise one, whom in dream
God thus admonished: "Hast thou marked my deed?
Which part assigned by providence dost judge
Was meant for man's example? Should he play
The helpless weakling, or the helpful strength
That captures prey and saves the perishing?
Suggest a wise: work, eat, then feed who lack!

Waking, "I have arisen, work I will,
Eat, and so following. Which lacks food the more,
Body or soul in me? I starve in soul:
So may mankind: and since men congregate
In towns, not woods,—to Isphahan forthwith!"

Round as the wild creatures, overhead the trees,
Underfoot the moss-tracks,—life and love with these!
I to wear a fawn-skin, thou to dress in flowers:
All the long lone summer-day, that greenwood life of ours!
Rich-pavilioned, rather,—still the world without,— Inside—gold-roofed silk-walled silence round about!
Queen it thou on purple,—I, at watch, and ward
Couched beneath the columns, gaza, thy slave, love’s guard!

So, for us no world? Let thrones press thee to me!
Up and down amid men, heart by heart fare we!
Welcome to me no gesture, harsh voice, hateful face!
God is soul, souls I and thou: with souls should souls have place.

II. THE MELON-SELLER

GOING his rounds one day in Isphahan,—
Halfway on Dervishhood, not wholly there,—
Ferishtah, as he crossed a certain bridge,
Came startled on a well-remembered face.
"Can it be? What, turned melon-seller—thou?
Clad in such sordid garb, thy seat you step
Where dogs brush by thee and express contempt?
Methinks, thy head-gear is some scooped-out gourd!
Nay, sunk to slicing up, for reader sale,
One fruit whereof the whole scarce feeds a swine?
Wast thou the Shah’s Prime Minister, men saw
Ride on his right-hand while a trumpet blew
And Persia hailed the Favorite? Yea, twelve years
Are past, I judge, since that transcendency,
And thou didst pontificate and art abased;

No less, twelve years since, thou didst hold a hand
Persia, coudset halve and quarter, mines is pulp
As pleased thee, and distribute — melon-like—
Portions to whom played the parasite.
Or suck—thyself— each juicy morsel. How Enormous thy abjection,—hell from heaven.
Made tenfold hell by contrast! Whisper me:
Dost thou curse God for granting twelve years’ bliss
Only to prove this day’s the divrer lot?"

Whereon the beggar raised a brow, once more
Luminous and imperial, from the rags.
"Fool, does thy folly think my foolishness
Dwells rather on the fact that God appoints
A day of woe to the unworthy one,
Than that the unworthy one, by God’s award,
Tasted joy twelve years long? Or buy a slice,
Or go to school!"

To school Ferishtah went,
And, schooling ended, passed from Isphahan
To Nishapur, that Elburz looks above
—Where they dig turquoise: there kept school himself,
The melon-seller’s speech, his stock in trade.
Some say a certain Jew adduced the word
Out of their book, it sounds so much the same
In Persian phrasem. "Shall we receive good at the hand of God
And evil not receive?" But great wits jest

Wish no word unspoken, want no look away!
What if words were but mistake, and looks—to speak them, say!
Be unjust for once, Love! Bear it — well I may!
Do me justice always? Bid my heart— their skies—
Render not, its store of gifts, old looks and words divine
—Oh, so all unjust—the less deserved, the more divine!

III. SHAH ABBAS

ANYHOW, once full Dervish, youths came
To gather up his own words, 'neath a rock
Or else a palm, by pleasant Nishapur.

Said some one, as Ferishtah paused abrupt,
Reading a certain passage from the roll
Wherein is treated of Lord Ali’s life:
"Master, explain this incongruity!
When I dared question 'It is beautiful.
But is it true?'—thy answer was 'In truth
Lives beauty.' I persisting—'Beauty—you,
In thy mind and in my mind, every mind
That apprehends: but outside—so to speak—
Did beauty live in deed as well as word.
Was this life lived, was this death died—not dreamed?'

'Many attested it for fact,' saidst thou.
'Many!' but mark, Sir! Half as long ago
As such things were,—supposing that they were,— Reigned great Shah Abbas: he too lived and died. — How say they? Why, so strong of arm, of foot to swift, he stayed a lion in his leap. In a stag’s haunch, — with one hand grasped the stag, With one struck down the lion: yet, no less, himself, that same day, feasting after sport. Perceived a spider drop into his wine, Let fall the flagon, died of simple fear. So all say, — so dost thou say?"

"Wherefore not?"

Periahah smiled: "though strange, the story stands near-chronicled: none tells it otherwise: The fact’s eye-witness bore the cup, beside."

‘And dost thou credit one cup-bearer’s tale, False, very like, and futile certainly, Yet hesitate to trust what many tongues combine to testify was beautiful n deed as well as word? No fool’s report, N lion, stag and spider, but immense With meaning for mankind, thy race, thyself?"

Whereinto the Dervish: "First amend, my son, Thy faulty nomenclature, call belief Belief indeed, nor grace with such a name The easy acquisitiveness of mankind, N self, that same worth dispute, since life lasts merely the allotted moment. Lo — That lion-stag-and-spider tale leaves fixed The fact for us that sometime Abbas reigned, Died, somehow slain, — a useful registry, — Which therefore we — believe’? Stand forward, thou, by Yakub, son of Yusef, son of Zal! Advertise thee that our liege, the Shah Iapilly regnant, hath become assured, By opportune discovery, that thy sire, Lion by the father-upwards, track their line To — whom but that same bearer of the cup Whose inadvertency was chargeable With what therefrom ensued, disgust and death To Abbas Shah, the over-wise of soul? Whence he appoints thee, — such his element, — Not death, thy due, but just a double tax To pay, on thy particular bed of reeds Which flower into the brush that makes a broom ‘T is to sweep ceilings clear of vermin. Sure, Thou dost believe the story nor dispute That punishment should signalize its truth? Down therefore with some twelve dinars! Why start, — The stag’s way with the lion hard on haunch? Believe the story? — how thy words throng fast! —

Who saw this, heard this, said this, wrote down this, That and the other circumstance to prove so great a sappingy surprised the world? Seeds must thou prove me fable can be fact Ere thou coax one piece from out my pouch!"

"There we agree, Sir: neither of us knows, Neither accepts that tale on evidence Worthy to warrant the large word — belief. Now I get near thee! Why didst pause abrupt, Disabled by emotion at a tale Might match — be frank! — for credibility The fragment of the spider and the cup? — To wit, thy roll’s concerning Ali’s life, Unevidenced — thine own word! Little boots Our sympathy with fiction! When I read The annals and consider of Tahmasp And that sweet sun-surpassing star his love, I weep like a out vine-twig, though aware Zarah’s sad fate is fiction, since the snake He saw devour her, — how could such exist, Having nine heads? No snake boasts more than three! I weep, then laugh — both actions right alike. But thou, Periahah, sapiency confessed. When at the Day of Judgment God shall ask ‘Didst thou believe?’ — what wilt thou plead? Thy tears? (Nay, they fell fast and stain the parchment still.) What if thy tears meant love? Love lacking ground — Belief, — avails thee as it would avail My own pretense to favor since, forsooth, I loved the lady — I who needs must laugh. To hear a snake boasts nine heads: they have three!"

"Thanks for the well-timed help that’s born, behold, Out of thy words, my son, — belief and love! Haest heard of Ishak son of Abasal? Ay. The very same we heard of, ten years since, Slain in the wars: he comes back safe and sound, — Though twenty soldiers saw him die at Xezed, Just as a single mule-and-baggage boy Declared ’t was like he some day would, — for why? The twenty soldiers lied, he saw him stout, Cured of all wounds at once by smear of salve, A Mubid’s manufacture: such the tale. Now, when his pair of sons were thus apprised Effect was twofold on them. ‘Hail!’ crowed This: ‘Dearer the news than dayspring after night! The cure-reporting youngster warrants me. Our father shall make glad our eyes once more, For whom, had outpoured life of mine sufficed To bring him back, free broached were every vein!’

‘A vaunt, delusive tale-concocter, news Cruel as meteor simulating dawn!’ Whimpred the other: ‘Who believes this boy, Must disbelieve his twenty seniors: no, Return our father shall not! Might my death Purchase his life, how promptly would the dote Be paid as due!’ Well, ten years pass, —

Ishak is marching homeward, — doubts, not he, Are dead and done with! So, our townsfolk straight Must take on them to counsel. 'Go thou gay, Welcome thy father, thou of ready faith! Hide thee, contrariwise, thou faithless one, Expect paternal frowning, blame and blows!' So do our townfolk counsel: dost demur?"

"Feraishtah like those simpletons—at loss, In what is plain as pikestaff? Fish! Suppose The trustful son had sighed 'So much the worse! Returning means—retaking heritage Enjoyed these ten years, who should say me nay?'

How would such trust reward him? Trustlessness—O' the other hand—were what procured most praise To him who judged return impossible, Yet hated heritage procured thereby, A fool were Ishak if he failed to prize Mere head's work less than heart's work: no fool he!"

"Is God less wise? Resume the roll!" They did.

You groped your way across my room! the drear dark dead of night; At each fresh step a stumble was: but, once your lamp sight, Eas's and plain you walked again: so soon all wrong grew right!

What lay on floor to trip your foot? Each object, late awry, Looked fitly placed, nor proved offence to footing tree— For why? The lamp showed all, discordant late, grown simple symmetry.

Be love your light and trust your guide, with these explore my heart! No obstacle to trip you then, strike hands and souls apart! Since rooms and hearts are furnished so,—light shows you,—needs love start!

IV. THE FAMILY

A CERTAIN neighbor lying sick to death, Feraishtah grieved beneath a palm-tree, whence He rose at peace: whereat objected one "Gudars our friend grapples in extremity, Sure, thou art ignorant how close at hand Death presses, or the cloud, which fouled so late Thy face, had deepened down not lightened o'er."

"I judge there will be respite, for I prayed."

"Sir, let me understand, of charity! Yestereve, what was thine admonishment? 'All-wise, all-good, all-mighty—God is such!' How then should man, the all-unworthy, dare Propose to set aside a thing ordained? To pray means—substitute man's will for God's: Two best wills cannot be: by consequence,
THE SUN

Fares like the beast which should affect to fly
Because a bird with wings may spurn the ground;
So, missing heaven and losing earth—drops how
But hell-ward? No, be man and nothing more
Man who, as man conceiving, hopes and fears,
And craves and deprecates, and loves, and loathes,
And bids God help him, till death touch his eyes
And show God granted most, denying all.

Man I am and man would be, Love—merest man and nothing more.
Bid me seem no other! Eagles boast of pinions—let them soar!
I may put forth angel’s plumage, once unmanned, but not before.
Now on earth, to stand sufficed,—nay, if kneeling serves, to kneel.
Here you trust me, here I find the all of heaven that earth can feel Sense looks straight, — not over, under, — perfect sees beyond appeal.
Good you are and wise, full circle: what to me were more outside?
Wiser with wisdom, better goodness? Ah, such want the angel’s wide Sense to take and hold and keep them! Mine at least has never tried.

V. THE SUN

"And what might that bold man’s announcement be" — Ferasiatah questioned — " which so moved thine ire
That thou didst curse, nay, cuff and kick — in short,
Confute the announcer? Wipe those drops away
Which start afresh upon thy face at mere Mention of such enormity: now, speak!"

"He scrupled not to say — (thou warrantest, O patient Sir, that I unblamed repeat Abominable words which bluster tongue?)
God once assumed on earth a human shape:
(Lo, I have spitten!) Dared I ask the grace,
Pain would I hear, of thy subtility,
From out what hole in man’s corrupted heart
Creeks such a maggot: fancies verminous
Breed in the clots there, but a monster born
Of pride and folly like this pest — thyself
Only canst trace to eggo-shell it hath chipped.”

The sun rode high. “During our ignorance” —
Began Ferasiath — “folk esteemed as God
Yon orb: for argument, suppose him so,—
Be it the symbol, not the symbolized,
I and thou safer take upon our lips.
Accordingly, yon orb that we adore
— What is he? Author of all light and life:
Such one must needs be somewhere: this is he.
Like what? If I may trust my human eyes,
A ball composed of spirit-fire, whence springs
— What, from this ball, my arms could circle around?
All I enjoy on earth. By consequence,
Inspiring me with — what? Why, love and praise.
I eat a palatable fig — there’s love
In little: who first planted what I pluck,
Obtains my little praise, too: more of both
Keeps due proportion with more cause for each:
So, more and ever more, till most of all
Completes experience, and the orb, described
Ultimate giver of all good, perferee
Gathers unto himself: all love, all praise,
Is worshipped — which means loved and praised at height.
Back to the first good; ’t was the gardener gave Occasion to my palate’s pleasure: grace,
Plain on his part, demanded thanks on mine.
Go up above this giver, — step by step.
Gain a conception of what — (how and why, Matters not now) — occasioned him to give,
Appointed him the gardener of the ground, —
I mount by just progression slow and sure
To some prime giver — here assumed yon orb —
Who takes my worship. Whom have I in mind,
Thus worshipping, unless a man, my like
Howe’er above me? Man, I say — how else,
I being man who worship? Here’s my hand
Lifts first a mustard-seed, then weight on weight
Greater and ever greater, till at last
It lifts a melon, I suppose, then stops —
Hand-strength expended wholly: so, my love
First lauds the gardener for the fig his gift,
Then, looking higher, love and lauds still more,
Who hires the ground, who owns the ground,
Sheikh, Shah,
On and away, away and ever on,
Till, at the last, it loves and lauds the orb
Ultimate cause of all to land and love.
Where is the break, the change of quality
In hand’s power, soul’s impulsion? Gift was grace,
The greatest as the smallest. Had I stopped
Anywhere in the scale, stayed love and praise
As so far only fit to follow gift,
Saying, ’I thanked the gardener for his fig,
But now that, lo, the Shah has filled my purse
With toman’s which avail to purchase me
A fig-tree forest, shall I pay the same
With love and praise, the gardener’s proper fee?’

Justly would whose bears a brain object,
‘Giving is giving, gift claims gift’s return,
Do thou thine own part, therefore: let the Shah Ask more from one has more to pay.’ Per-
chance
He gave me from his treasure less by much
Than the soil’s servant: let that be! My part
Is plain — to meet and match the gift and gift
With love and love, with praise and praise, till both
Cry ‘All of us is thine, we can no more!’
So shall I do man’s utmost — man to man:
For as our liege the Shah’s sublime estate
Merely enlarges, leaves him man the same,
So must I count that orb I call a fire
(Keep to the language of our ignorance)
Something that's fire and more beside: mere fire
— Is it a force which, giving, knows it gives,
And wherefore, so may look for love and praise
From me, fire's like so far, however less.
In all beside it, Prime causes this fire shall be,
Uncaused, all-causing: hence begin the gifts,
Thither must go my love and praise — to what?
Fire? Symbol fitly serves the symbolized
Herein, — that this same object of my thanks,
While to my mind nowise conceivable
Except as mind no less than fire, refutes
Next moment mind's conception: fire is fire —
While what I needs must thank, must needs include
Purpose with power, — humanity like mine,
Imagined, for the dear necessity.
One moment in an object which the next Confesses unimaginable. Power!
— What need of will, then? Naught opposes
power:
Why, purpose? any change must be for worse:
And what occasion for beneficence
When all that is, so is and so must be?
Best being best now, change were for the worse.
Accordingly discard these qualities
Proper to imperfection, take for type
Mere fire, eject the man, retain the orb,—
The perfect and, so, inconceivable,—
And what remains to love and praise? A stone
Fair-colored proves a solace to my eye,
Rolled by my tongue brings moisture curing drouth,
And struck by steel emits a useful spark:
Shall I return it thanks, the insentient thing?
No, — man once, man forever — man in soul
As man in body: just as this can use
Its proper senses only, see and hear,
Taste, like or loathe according to its law
And not another creature's, — even so
Man's soul is moved by what, if it in turn Must move, is kindred soul: receiving good — Man's way — must make man's due acknowledgments,
No other, even while he reasons out
Plainly enough that, were the man unmanned,
Made angel of, angelic every way,
The love and praise that rightly seek and find
Their man-like object now, — instructed more,
Would go forth idly, air to emptiness.
Our human flower, sun-ringed, proffers scent
Though reason prove the sun lacks nose to feed
On what himself made grateful: flower and
man,
Let each assume that scent and love alike
Being once born, must needs have use! Man's part
Is plain — to send love forth, — astray, perhaps:
No matter, he has done his part."

"Wherefrom

What is to follow — if I take thy sense —
But that the sun — the inconceivable
Confessest man — comprises, all the same,
Man's every-day conception of himself —
No less remaining unconceiv'd!"

"Agreed!"

"Yet thou, insisting on the right of man
To feel as man, not otherwise, — man, bound
By man's conditions neither less nor more,
Obliged to estimate as fair or foul,
Right, wrong, good, evil, what man's faculty Adjudges such, — how canst thou, — plainly bound
To take man's truth for truth and only truth, —
Dare to accept, in just one case, as truth
Falsehood confessed? Flesh simulating fire —
Our fellow-man whom we his fellows know
For dust — instinct with fire unknowable!
Where's thy man-needed truth — its proof, say provingly.

Of faintest passage on the tablets traced
By man, termed knowledge? 'Tis concealed
there,
We lack such fancied union — fire with flesh:
But even so, to lack is not to gain
Our lack of enmity: where's the trace of such Recorded?"

"What if such a tracing were?
If some strange story stood, — what'er its worth, —
That the immensely yearned-for, once befell.
— The sun was flesh once? — (keep the figure!)"

An union inconceivable was fact?"

"Son, if the stranger have convinced himself
Fancy is fact — the sun, besides a fire.
Holds earthly substance somehow fire pervades.
And yet contains only, — earth, he understandeth,
With essence he remains a stranger to, —
Fitter thou saidst, 'I stand appalled before
Conception unattainable by me
Who need it most' — than this — "What?
boast he holds
Conviction where I see conviction's need,
Alas, — and nothing else? then what remains
But that I straightforward curse, cuff, kick the fool!"

VI. MIHRAB SHAH

Quoth an inquirer, "Praise the Merciful!"
My thumb which yesterday a scorpion ripped
(Its swelled and blackened) — lo, is sound again:
By application of a virtuous root
The burning has abated: that is well.
But now methinks I have a mind to ask,
Since this discomfort came of calling herbs
Nor meaning harm, — why needs a scorpion be?
Yes, there began, from when my thumb last throbbed,
Advance in question-framing, till I asked
Wherefore should any evil hap to man —
From ache of flesh to agony of soul —
Since God’s All-mercy mates All-potency?
Nay, why permits he evil to himself —
Man’s sin, accounted such? Suppose a world
Purged of all pain, with fit inhabitant —
Man pure of evil in thought, word, and deed —
Were it not well? Then, wherefore otherwise?
Too good result? But he is wholly good!
Hard to effect? Ay, were he impotent!
Teach me, Feriahtah!"

Said the Dervish: "Friend,
My chance, escaped to-day, was worse than thine:
I, as I woke this morning, raised my head,
Which never tumbled but stuck fast on neck.
Was not I glad and thankful!"

"How could head
Tumble from neck, unchopped — inform me first!
Unless we take Firdausi’s tale for truth,
Who ever heard the like?"

"The like might hap
By natural law: I let my staff fall thus —
It goes to ground, I know not why. Suppose,
Whence’er my hold was loosed, it askewly sprang
As certainly, and all experience proved
That, just as staves when unsupported sink,
So, unconfined, they soar?"

"Let such be law —
Why, a new chapter of sad accidents
Were added to humanity’s mischance,
No doubt at all, and as a man’s false step
Now lays him prone on earth, contrariwise,
Removal from his shoulder of a weight
Might start him upwards to perdition. Ay!
But, since such law exists in just thy brain,
I shall not hesitate to doff my cap
For fear my head take flight."

"Nor feel relief
Finding it firm on shoulder. Tell me, now!
What were the bond ‘twixt man and man,
dost judge.
Pain once abolished? Come, be true! Our Shah —
How stands he in thy favor? Why that shrug?
Is not he lord and ruler?"

"Easily!
His mother bore him, first of those four wives
Provided by his father, such is his luck:
Since when his business simply was to breathe
And take each day’s new bounty. There he stands —
Where else had I stood, were his birth-star mine?"

No, to respect man’s power, I needs must see
Men’s bare hands seek, find, grasp and wield the sword
Nobody else can brandish! Bless his heart.
’T is said, he scarcely counts his fingers right!"

"Well, then — his princely doles! from every feast
Off go the feasted with the dish they ate
And cup they drank from,— nay, a change besides
Of garments"

"Sir, put case, for service done,—
Or best, for love’s sake,— such and such a slave
Sold his allowance of sour lentil-soup
To herewith purchase me a pipe-stick,— nay,
If he, by but one hour, cut short his sleep
To clothe my shoe,— that were a sacrifice!"

"All praise his gracious bearing."

"All praise mine —
Or would praise did they never make approach
Except on all-fours, crawling till I bade;
‘Now that with eyelids thou hast touched the earth,
Come close and have no fear, poor nothingness!’
What wonder that the lady-rose I woo
And palisade about from every wind.
Holds herself handsomely? The wilding, now,
Ruffled outside at pleasure of the blast,
That still lifts up with something of a smile
Its poor attempt at bloom” . . .

"A blameless life,
Where wrong might revel with impunity—
Remember that!"

"The falcon on his fist —
Reclaimed and trained and belted and beautified
Till she believes herself the Simorgh’s mate —
She only deigns destroy the antelope,
Stoops at no carrion-crow: thou marvellset!

"So be it, then! He wakes no love in thee
For any one of divers attributes
Commonly deemed love-worthy. All the same,
I would he were not wasting, slow but sure,
With that internal ulcer” . . .

"Say’st thou so?
How should I guess? Alack, poor soul! But stay —
Sure in the reach of art some remedy
Must lie to hand: or if it lurk, — that leech
Of fame in Tebriz, why not seek his aid?
Couldst not thou, Dervish, counsel in the case?"

"My counsel might be — what imports a pang
The more or less, which puts an end to one
Odious in spite of every attribute Commonly deemed love-worthy?"

" Attributes?
Faugh! — nay, Feriahtah,— ’tis an ulcer, think!"
FERISHTAH'S FANCIES

Attributes, quotha? Here's poor flesh and blood,
Like thine and mine and every man's, a prey
To hell-fire! Hast thou lost thy wits for once?

"Friend, here they are to find and profit by!
Put pain from out the world, what room were left For thanks to God, for love to Man? Why
thanks,—
Except for some escape, whate'er the style,
From pain that might be, name it as thou mayst?
Why love,—when all thy kind, save me, suppose,
Thy father, and thy son, and... well, thy dog.

To eke the descent number out—we few
Who happen,—like a handful of chance stars
From the unnumbered host—to shine o'erhead
And lend thee light,—our twinkle all thy store—
We ourselves take thy love! Mankind, forsooth?
Who sympathizes with their general joy
 Foolish as undeserved? But pain—see God's Wisdom at work!—man's heart is made to judge

Pain deserved nowhere by the common flesh
Our birthright,—bad and good deserve alike
No pain, to human apprehension! Lust,
Greed, cruelty, injustice vrai (we hold)
Due punishment from somebody, no doubt:
But ulcer in the midriff! that brings flesh
Triumphant from the bar whereunto arraigned Soul quakes with reason. In the eye of God
Pain may have purpose and be justified:
Man's sense avails to only see, in pain,
A hateful chance no man but would avert
Or, failing, needs must pity. Thanks to God
And love to man,—from man take these away,
And what is man worth? Therefore, Mihrab—

Shah,
Tax me my bread and salt twice over claim
Laila my daughter for thy sport,—go on!
Slay my son's self, maintain thy poetry
Beats mine,—thou merriest a dozen deaths!
But—ulcer in the stomach,—ah, poor soul,
Try a fig-plaster: may it ease thy pangs!"

So, the head aches and the limbs are faint!
Flesh is a burden—even to you!
Can I force a smile with a fancy quaint?
Why are my limbs none or few?

In the soul of me sits sluggishness:
Body so strong and will so weak:
The slave stands fit for the labor —yes,
But the master's mandate is still to seek.

You, now—what if the outside clay
Helped, not hindered the inside flame?
My dim to-morrow—your plain to-day;
Yours the achievement, mine the aim!

So were it rightly, so shall it be!
Only, while earth we pace together
For the purpose apportioned you and me,
Closer we tread for a common tether

You shall sigh, "Wait for his sluggish soul!
Shame he should lag, not lamed as I!"
May not I smile, "Ungrasped her goal:
Body may reach her—by and by"?

VII. A CAMEL- DRIVER

"How of his fate, the Pilgrims' soldier-gate
Condemned" (Ferishtah questioned), "Is a slave
The merchant whom he convoyed with his bales—
A special treachery?"

"Sir, the proofs were plain:
Justice was satisfied: between two boards
The rogue was sawn aunder, rightly served."

"With all wise men's approval—mine a least."

"Himself, indeed, confessed as much. 'I es
Justly' (groaned he) 'through over-greediness
Which tempted me to rob: but grieve the nest
That he who quickened sin at slumber,—sy Prompted and pestered me till thought grew
deed,—
The same is fled to Syria and is safe,
Laughing at me thus left to pay for both.
My comfort is that God reserves for him Hall's hottest!

"Idle words."

"Enlighten me:
Wherefore so idle? Punishment by man
Has thy assent,—the word is on thy lips.
By parity of reason, punishment
By God should likelier win thy thanks and praise."

"Man acts as man must: God, as God besees.
A camel-driver, when his beast will bite.
Thumps her athwart the muzzle; why?"

"How she instruct the creature—months should teach.
Suppose some plain word, told her first of all,
Had hindered any biting?"

"True, he is man, knows but man's trick to teach.
And fit the beast with understanding first:
No understanding animals like Rakshah
Nowadays, Master! Till they bred on earth.
For teaching — blows must serve."

"Who deals the blow—
What if by some rare method,—magic, say,—
He saw into the bitar's very soul,
And knew the fault was so repeated of
It could not happen twice?"

"That's something: still
I hear, methinks, the driver say, 'No less

THE TWO CAMELS

Take thy fault's due! Those long-necked sisters, see,
Lean all a-stretch to know if biting meets
Punishment or enjoys impunity
For their sakes — thwack!"

"The journey home at end,
The solitary beast safe-stabled now,
In comes the driver to avenge a wrong
Suffered from six months since, — apparently
With patience, nay, approval: when the jaws
Met i' the small o' the arm. ' Ha, Ladykin,
Still at thy frolics, girl of gold?' laughed he:
'Eat flesh? Rye-grass content thee rather with, Whereof accept a bundle!' Now, — what change!

Laughter by no means! Now 't is, 'Feiend, thy frisk
Was fit to find thee provender, didst judge?
Behold this red-hot twy-prong, thus I stick
To him i' the soft of thee!"

"Behold! behold
A crazy noddle, rather! Sure the brute Might wailingly have plain speech coax'd out of tongue,
And grow as valuable as Rakhah himself
At such mad outrage, ' Could I take thy mind,
Guess thy desire? If biting was offence,
Wherefore the rye-grass bundle, why each day's Pattin' and petting, but to intimate
My pleasantness had pleased thee? Thou endowed
With reason, truly!"

"Reason aims to raise
Some makeshift scaffold-vantage midway, whence
Man dares, for life's brief moment, peer below:
But ape omniscience? Nay! The ladder lent
To climb by, step and step, until we reach
The little foothold-rise allowed mankind
To mount on and thence gaze the sun's survey —
Shall this avail to show us world-wide truth
Stretched for the sun's desiring? Reason bids,
'Teach, Man, thy beast his duty first of all
Or last of all, with blows if blows must be, —
How else accomplish teaching?' Reason adds,
'Before man's First, and after man's poor Last,
God operated and will operate.'
— Process of which man merely knows this
much, —
That nowise it resembles man's at all,
Teaching or punishing.

"It follows, then,
That any malfactor I would smite
With God's allowance, God himself will spare
Presumably. No scapegrace? Then, rejoice
Thou snatch-grace safe in Syria!"

"Friend, such view
Is but man's wonderful and wide mistake.
Man jumps his kind i' the mass: God singles thence Unit by unit. Thou and God exist —
So think! — for certain: think the mass — mankind —
Disperses, disperses, leaves thyself alone!
Ask thy lone soul what laws are plain to thee, —
Thee and no other, — stand or fall by them!
That is the part for thee: regard all else
For what it may be — Time's illusion. This
Be sure of — ignorance that sins, is safe.
No punishment like knowledge! Instance, now!
My father's choicest treasure was a book
Wherein he, day by day and year by year,
Recorded gain of wisdom for my sake
When I should grow to manhood. While a child,
Coming upon the casket where it lay
Unguarded, — what did I but toss the thing
Into a fire to make more flame therewith, Meaning no harm? So acts man three-years-
old!
I grieve now at my loss by witlessness,
But guilt was none to punish. Man mature —
Each word of his I lightly held, each look
I turned from — wish that wished in vain —

nay, will
That willing and yet went all to waste — 't is these Rake! like fire. Forgiveness? rather grant Forgetfulness! The past is past and lost.
However near I stand in his regard,
So much the nearer had I stood by steps
Offered the feet which rashly spurned their help
That I call Hall; why further punishment?"

When I vexed you and you chid me,
And I owned my fault and turned
My cheek the way you bid me,
And confessed the blow well earned,
My comfort all the while was — Fault was faulty — near, not quite!
Do you wonder why the smile was?
Or punished wrong grew right.

But faults, you ne'er suspected,
Nay, praised, no faults at all,
Those would you had detected —
Crushed eggs whence snakes could crawl!

VIII. TWO CAMELS

QUOTHE: "Sir, solve a scruple! No true
sage
I hear of, but instructs his scholar thus:
'Wouldst thou be wise? Then mortify thyself!
Balk of its craving every bestial sense!
Say, "If I relish melons — so do swine!
Horse, ass, and mule consume their provender
Nor leave a pea-pod: fasting feeds the soul."
Thus they admonish: while thyself, I note,
Eatest thy ration with an appetite,
Nor fallest foul of whose licks his lips
And sighs — Well-saffroned was that barley-soup!"
Can wisdom coexist with — gorge-and-swill,
I say not, — simply sensual preference
FERISHTAH'S FANCIES

For this or that fantastic meat and drink?
Moreover, wind blows sharper than its wont
This morning, and thou hast already donned
Thy sheepskin over-garment: sure the sage
Is busied with conceits that soar above
A petty chance of season and its chance
Of causing ordinary flesh to sneeze?
I always thought, Sir "...

"Son," Ferishtah said,
"Truth ought to seem as near thought before.
How if I give it birth in parable?
A neighbor owns two camels, beasts of price
And promise, destined each to go, next week,
Swiftly and surely with his merchandise
From Nishapur to Sebzevar, no true
To tram, but travel, spit of sands and drouth,
In days so many, lest they miss the Fair.
Each falls to meditation o'er his crib
Piled high with provender before the start.
Quoth this: 'My soul is set on winning praise
From Goodman lord and master,— hump to hoof,
I dedicate me to his service. How?
Grase, purlane, lapines, and I know not what,
Crammed in my manger? Ha, I see — I see!
No, master, spare thy money! I shall trudge
The distance and yet cost thee not a doit
Beyond my supper on this monied bran.'
'Be magnified, O master, for the meal
So opportunely liberal!' quoth that.
'What use of strength in me but to surmount
Sands and simoons, and bend beneath thy bales
No knee until I reach the glad bazaar?
Thus I do justice to thy fare: no sprig
Of toothsome chervil must I leave uncashed!
Too bitterly should I reproach myself
Did I sink down in sight of Sebzevar,
Remembering how the merest mouthful more
Had heartened me to manage yet a mile!
And so it proved: the too abstemious brute
Midway broke down, his pack rejoiced the thieves,
His carcasses fed the vultures: not so he
The wisely thankful, who, good market-drudge,
Let down his lading in the market-places,
No damage to a single pack. Which beast,
Think ye, had praise and pitting and a brand
Of good-and-faithful-servant fixed on flank?
So, with thy squeamish scruple. What imports
Fasting or feasting? Do thy day's work, dare
Refuse no help thereto, since help refused
Is hindrance sought and found. Win but the race —
Who shall object 'He tossed three wine-cups off,
And, just at starting, Lilith kissed his lips'?

"More soberly, — consider this, my Son!
Put case I never have myself enjoyed,
Known by experience what enjoyment means,
How shall I — share enjoyment? — no, indeed! —
Supply it to my followers, — ignorant,
As so I should be of the thing they crave,
How it affects them, works for good or ill.
Style my enjoyment self-indulgence — sin —
Why should I labor to infect my kind
With sin's occasion, bid them too enjoy,
Who else might neither catch nor give again
Joy's plague, but live in righteous misery?
Just as I cannot, till myself convinced,
Impart conviction, so, to deal forth joy
Adroitly, needs must I know joy myself.
Renounce joy for my fellows' sake? That 'is joy
Beyond joy; but renounced for mine, not then!
Why, the physician called to help the sick.
Cries 'Let me, first of all, discard my health!'
No, Son: the richness hearted in such joy
Is in the knowing what are gifts we give,
Not in a vain endeavor not to know!
Therefore, desire joy and thank God for it!
The Adversary said, — a Jew reports, —

In Persian phrase, 'Does Job fear God is naught?'
Job's creature'ship is not abjured, thou fool!
He nowise isolates himself and plays
The Independent equal, owns no more
Than himself gave himself, so why thank God?
A proper speech were this
'Equals we are, Job, labor for thyself,
Nor bid me help thee: bear, as best flesh may.
Pains I inflict not nor avail to cure:
Beg of me nothing thou thyself may'st win
By work, or waive with magnanimity.
Since we are peers acknowledged, — severely peers,
Had I implanted any want of thine
Only my power could meet and gratify.
No: rather hear, at man's indifference —
Wherefore did I contrive for thee that ear
Hungry for music, and direct thine eye
To where I hold a seven-stringed instrument.
Unless I meant thee to beseech me play?"...

Once I saw a chemist take a pinch of powder
— Simple dust it seemed — and half-unstop a phial:
— Out dropped harmless dew. "Mixed nothing safe" (quoth he)
"Something!" So they did: a thunderbolt, let louder —
Lightning-flash, but fiercer — put spectators' serve to trial.
Sure enough, we learned what was, imagined was might be.
Had I no experience how a lip's mere tremble,
Look's half hesitation, cheek's just change of color.
These affect a heartquake, — how should I conceive
What a heaven there may be? Let it but resemble Earth myself have known! No bliss that is finer, finer.
Only — bliss that lasts, they say, and fain would I believe.

IX. CHERRIES

"WHAT, I disturb thee at thy morning-meal!
Cherries so ripe already? Eat space!
I recollect thy lesson yesterday.
Yet — thanks, Sir, for thy leave to interrupt" . . .

"Friend, I have finished my repent, thank God!"

"There now, thy thanks for breaking fast a fruit! —
Thanks being praise, or tantamount thereto.
Prithsee consider, have not things degree,
Lofty and low? Are things not great and small,
These claiming praise and wonder more or less?
Shall we confuse them, with thy warrant too,
Whose doctrine otherwise begins and ends
With just this precept, 'Never faith enough
In man as weakness, God as potency'?
When I would pay soul's tribute to that same,
Why not look up in wonder, bid the stars
Attest my praise of the All-mighty One?
What are man's puny members and as mean
Requirements weighed with Star-King Muhshtari?
There is the marvel!"

"Not to man — that's me.
List to what happened late, in fact or dream.
A certain stranger, bound from far away,
Still the shaik's subject, found himself before
Ispahan palace-gate. As duty bade,
He enters in the courts, will, if he may,
See so much glory as befits a slave
Who only comes, of mind to testify
How great and good is shown our lord the Shah.
In he walks, no mud he casts eyes about,
Looks up and down, admires to heart's content,
Ascends the gallery, tries door and door,
None says his reverence nay: peeps in at each,
Wonders at all the unimaginable,
Gold here and jewels there, — so vast, that hall
Softer than Patagonia — lamps ask abode.
Bidding look up from luxuries below, —
Evenmore wonder topsying wonder, — last —
Sudden he comes upon a cosy nook,
A nest-like little chamber, with his name,
His own, yea, his and no mistake at all,
Plain o'er the entry, — what, and he discourses
Just those arrangements inside, — oh, the care! —
Suited to soul and body both, — so snug.
The cushion — nay, the pipe-stand furnished so!
What that he tries aloud, — what think'st thou, Friend?
'That these my slippers should be just my choice,
Even to the color that I most affect.
Is nothing: ah, that lamp, the central sun.
What rust it light within its mines, there.
I scarce dare guess the good of! Who lives there?
That let me wonder at, — no slipper toys
Meant for the foot, forsooth, which kicks them
— thus!"

"Never enough faith in omnipotence, —
Never too much, by parity, of faith
In impuissance, man's — which turns to strength
When once acknowledged weakness every way.
How? Hear the teaching of another tale.

"Two men once owed the Shah a mighty sum,
Beggars they both were: this one crossed his arms
And bowed his head, — 'whereof,' sighed he,
'Teach hair,
Proved it a jewel, how the host's amount
Were idly strewn for payment at thy feet!'

'Lord, here they lie, my havings poor and scant!
All of the berries on my currant-bush,
What roots of garlic have escaped the mice,
And some five pippins from the seedling tree, —
Would they were half-a-dozen! Anyhow,
Accept my all, poor beggar that I am!'
'Received in full of all demands!' smiled back
The apportioner of every lot of goodwill —
From inch to acre. Littleness of love
Befits the littleness of loving thing.
What if he boasted 'Seeing I am great,
Great must my corresponding tribute be'?
Muhshtari, — well, suppose him seven times seven
The sun's superior, proved so by some sage:
'Am I that sage? To me his twinkle blue
Is all I know of him and thank him for,
And therefore I have put the same in verse —
'Like you blue twinkle, twinks thine eye, my
Love!'"

Neither shalt thou be troubled overmuch
Because thy offering slightliness itself
Is lessened by admixture sad and strange
Of mere man's motives, — praise with fear, and
Love
With looking after that same love's reward.
Alas, Friend, what was free from this alloy,
Some smack thereof, — in best and purest love
Proffered thy earthly father? Dust thou art, Dust shalt be to the end. Thy father took
The dust, and kindly called the handful — gold
Nor cared to count what sparkled here and there
Sagely unsanctified. Thank, praise, love (Sum up thus) for the lowest favors first,
The commonest of comforts! aught beside
Very omnipotence had overlooked
Such needs, arranging for thy little life.
Nor waste thy power of love in wonderment
At what thou wisest lettest shine unsouled
By breath of word. That this last cherry soothes
A roughness of my palate, that I know: His Maker knows why Muhshtari was made."

Verse-making was least of my virtues: I viewed with despair
Wealth that never yet was but might be — all that verse-making were.
If the life would but lengthen to wish, let the mind be laid bare.
So I said "To do little is bad, to do nothing is worse" —
And made verse.

Love-making, — how simple a matter! No depths to explore.
No heights in a life to ascend! No disheartening. Before.
No affrighting. Hereafter, — love now will be love evermore.
So I felt "To keep silence were folly;" — all language above,
I made love.

X. PLOT-CULTURE

"Ay, but, Feriatah," — a disciple smirked, —
"That verse of thine 'How twinks thine eye,
my Love,
Blue as yon star-beam!' much arrides myself
Who haply may obtain a kiss therewith
This love from Laila where the palms abound —
My youth, my warrant — so the palms be close!
Suppose when thou art earnest in discourse
Concerning high and holy things, — abrupt
I out with — 'Laila's lip, how honey-sweet!' —
What sayst thou, were it scandalous or no?
I feel thy shoe sent flying at my mouth
For daring — prodigy of impudence —
Publish what, secret, were permissible.
Well, — one slide further in the imagined slough, —
Knee-deep therein, (respect thy reverence!) —
Suppose me well aware thy very self Stoop'd prying through the palm-screens, while
I darest
Solace me with caressings all the same?
Utterable, nay — unthinkable;
Undreamable a deed of shame! — Alack,
How will it fare shouldst thou impress on me
That certainly an Eye is over all
And each, to mark the minute's deed, word, thought,
As worthy of reward or punishment?
Shall I permit my same an Eyrie shawm,
Broad daylight perpetration, — so to speak, —
I had not dared to breathe within the Ear,
With black night's help about me? — Yet I stand
A man, no monster, made of flesh not cloud:
Why made so, if my making prove offence
To Maker's eye and ear?''

"Thou wouldst not stand Distinctly Man," — Ferashtah made reply;
"Not the mere creature, — did so limit-line
Round thee about, appotion thee thy place
Clean-out from out and off the illimitable,
Minuteness severed from immensity.
All of thee for the Maker, — for thyself,
Workings inside the circle that evolve
Thine all, — the product of thy cultured plot.
So must a grain the ground's lord bids thee
Yield:
Bring sacks to granary in Autumn I spare
Daily intelligence of this manure,
That compost, how they tend to feed the soil:
There thou art master sole and absolute
— Only, remember doomsday! 'Twixt thou and me
Because I turn away my outraged nose
Shouldst thou obtrude thereon a shovelful
Of fertilizing kisses? — Since thy sire
Wills and obtains thy marriage with the maid,
Enough! Be reticent, I counsel thee,
Nor venture to acquaint him, point by point,
What he procures thee. — Is he so obtuse?
Keep thy instruction to thyself! My ass —
Only from him expect acknowledgment.
The while he champs my gift, a thistie-bunch,
Hence he loves the largest of his love
I only tolerate so much as tells
By wrinkling nose and inarticulate grunt,
The meal, that heartens him to do my work,
Tickles his palate as I meant it should."

Not with my Soul, Love! — bid no soul like mine
Lap thee around nor leave the poor Sense room!

Soul, — travel-worn, toil-weary, — would confide
Along with Soul, Soul's gains from glow and glean.
Captures from soorings high and dippings deep.
Spotted-laden Soul, how should such memories sleep?
Take Sense, too — let me love entire and whole —
Not with my Soul!

Eyes shall meet eyes and find no eyes between,
Lips feed on lips, no other lips to fear!
No past, no future — so thine arms but screen
The present from surprise! not there, 'tis here —
Not then, 'tis now: — back, memories that intrude!
Make, Love, the universe our solitude,
And, over all the rest, obblition roll —
Sense quenching Soul!

XI. A PILLAR AT SEBEZVAR

"Knowledge deposed, then!" — greed
Whom that most griev'd
As fool's last of all the company.
"What, knowledge, man's distinctive attribute,
He doffs that crown to emulate an ass
Because the unknowing long-ears loves at last Husked lupines, and belike the feeder's self
— Whose purpose in the dole what ass devours?"

"Friend," quoth Ferashtah, "all I seem to know
Is — I know nothing save that love I can Boundlessly, endlessly. My curls were crowned
In youth with knowledge, — off, alas, even skipped Next moment, pushed by better knowledge still Which nowise proved more constant: gain, to day,
Was topping loss to-morrow, lay at last
— Knowledge, the golden? — lacquered ignorance!
As gain — mistrust it! Not as means to gain:
Laquer we learn by : cast in fining-pot.
We learn, when what seemed ore assayed proved dross,
Surelier true gold's worth, guess how purity
I the lords were precious could one light on —
Clarified up to test of crucible.
The prize is in the process: knowledge means
Ever-renewed assurance by defeat
That victory is somehow still to reach,
But love is victory, the prize itself:
Love — trust! Be reward ful for the trust
In trust's mere act. In love success is sure,
Attainment — no delusion, whatsoever
The prize be, apprehended as a prize,
A prize it is. Thy child as surely grasps
An orange as he fails to grasp the sun
Assumed his capture. What if soon he finds
The foolish fruit unworthy grasping? Joy
In shape and color, — that was joy as true
Worthy in its degree of love — as grasp
Of sun were, which had singed his hand beside.
What I had said the orange held no juice
Since it was not that sun he hoped to suck
This constitutes the curse that spoils our life
And sets man maundering of his misery,
That there's no meanest atom he obtains
Of what he counts for knowledge but he cries
'Hold here, — I have the whole thing, — knew this time,
Nor need search farther!' Whereas, strew his path
With pleasures, and he scorns them while he stoops
'This shall call'thoun pleasure, pick up this
And praise it, truly? I reserve my thanks
For something more substantial.' Plead not thus
In practising with life and its delights!
Enjoy the present gift, nor wait to know
The unknowable. Enough to say 'I feel
Love's sure effect, and, being loved, must love
The love its cause behind, — I can and do it'
Nor turn to try thy brain-power on the fact,
(Apart from as it strikes thee, here and now —
Its how and why, i' the future and elsewhere)
Except to — yet once more, and ever again,
Confirm thee in thy utter ignorance:
Assumed that, whatsoever the quality
Of love's cause, save that love was caused thereby,
This — nigh upon revelation as it seemed
A minute since — defies thy longing looks,
Withdrawn into the unknowable once more.
Wholly distrust thy knowledge, then, and trust
As wholly love allied to ignorance!
There lies thy truth and safety. Love is praise,
And praise is love! Refine the same, contrive
An intellectual tribute — ignorance
Appreciating ere approbative
Of knowledge that is infinite? With us,
The small, who use the knowledge of our kind
Greater than we, more wisely ignorance
Restrict its apprehension, see and know
No more than brain accepts in faith of sight,
Takes first what comes first, only sure so far.
By Sezzevar a certain pillar stands
So aptly that its gnomen tells the hour;
What did it? 'Before we thank
Who placed it, for his servioeable craft,
And go to dinner since its shade tells noon,
Needs must we have the craftsman's purpose clear
On half a hundred more recondite points
That it may summon to a vulgar meal!'
Better they say 'How opportune the help!
Be loved and praised, thou kindly-hearted sage Whom Hushud taught, — the gracious spirit-bird,
How to construct the pillar, teach the time!' So let me say — not 'Since we know, we love,
But rather Since we love, we know enough.'
Perhaps the pillar by a spell controlled
Mushtari in his courses? Added grace
Surely I count it that the sage devised,
Beside celestial seryice, ministry
To all the land, by one sharp shade at noon
Falling as folk foresee. Once more, then,
Friend —
(What ever in those careless ears of thine Withal I needs must round thee) — knowledge doubt
Even wherein it seems demonstrable!
Love, — in the claim for love, that's gratitude
For apprehended pleasure, nowise doubt!
Fay its due tribute, — sure that pleasure is.
While knowledge may be, at the most. 'See, now!
Eating my breakfast, I thanked God. — For

Shown in the cherries' flavor? Consecrate
So petty an example? There's the fault!
We encircle the omnipotence. Search sand
To unearth water: if first handful scooped
Yields thee a draught, what need of digging down
Full fifty fathoms deep to find a spring
Whereof the pulse might deluge half the land?
Drown in the sufficient drop, and praise what checks
The drouth that guses thy tongue, — what more would help
A brimming cistern? Ask the cistern's boon
When thou wouldst solace camele: in thy case,
Relish the drop and love the lovable!''

'And what may be unlovable?'

'Why, hate!
If out of sand comes sand and naught but sand,
Affect not to be quaffing at mirage,
Nor nickname pain as pleasure. That, belike,
Constitutes just the trial of thy wit
And worthiness to gain promotion, — hence,
Proves the true purpose of thine actual life.
Any soul's environment of things perceived,
Things visible and things invisible,
Facht, fancy — all was purposed to evolve
This and this only — was thy wit of worth
To recognize the drop's use, love the same,
And loyally declare against mirage
Though all the world assuverated dust
Was good to drink? Say, 'what made moist my lip,
That I acknowledged moisture: thou art
saved!'

For why? The creature and creator stand
Rightly related so. Consider well!
Were knowledge all thy faculty, then God
Must be ignored: love gains him by first leap.
Frankly accept the creator'ship: ask good
To love for: pressing hold to the tather's end
Allotted to this life's intelligence!
'So we offend? Will it offend thyself
If — impudence praying potency
Thy child beseech that thou command the sun
Rise bright to-morrow — thou, he thinks super-

In power and goodness, why shouldst thou refuse?
Afterward, when the child matures, perchance
The fault were greater if, with wit full-grown,
The stripping dared to ask for a dinar,
Than that the boy cried 'Pinch Sitara down
And give her me to play with!' 'Ts for him
To have no bounds to his belief in thee:
For thee it also is to let her shine
Lustrous and lonely, so best serving him!''

Ask not one least word of praise!
Words declare your eyes are bright?
What then meant that summer-day's Silence spent in one long gaze?
Was my silence wrong or right?

Words of praise were all to seek!
Face of you and form of you,
FERISHTAH'S FANCIES

XII. A BEAN-STRIPED: ALSO APPLE-EATING

"Look, I strew beans" . . .

(Ferishtah, we premise,
Strove this way with a scholar's cavilment
Who put the peevish question: "Sir, be frank!
A good thing or a bad thing—Life is which?
Shine and shade, happiness and misery
Battle it out there: which forces, I ask?

If I pick beans from out a bushel—
This one, this other,—then demand of thee
What color names each justly in the main,
"Black!" I expect, and "White" ensues reply:
No hesitation for what speck, spot, splash
Of either color, opposite, intrudes
To modify thy judgment. Well, for beans
Substitute days,——show, ranged in order, Life—
Then, tell me its true color! Time is short,
Life's days compose a span,—as brief be speech!

Black I pronounce for, like the Indian Sage,— Black—present, past, and future, interspersed
With blanks, no doubt, which simple folk style
Good
Because not Evil: no, indeed? Forsooth,
Black's shade on White is White too! What's the worst
Of Evil but that, past, it overshades
The else-exempted present?—memory,
We call the plague! Nay, but our memory fades
And leaves the past unsullied!—Does it so?
Why, straight the purpose of such breathing-space,
Such rest from past ills, grows plain enough!
What follows on remembrance of the past?
Fear of the future? Life, from birth to death,
Means—either looking back on harm escaped,
Or looking forward to that harm's return
With tenfold power of harming. Black, not White,
Never the whole consummate quietude
Life should be, troubled by no fear—I—nor hope

I'll say, since lamplight dies in noontide, hope
Loses itself in certainty. Such lot
Man's might have been: I leave the consequence
To bolder critics or the Primal Cause;
Such am not I: but, man,—as man I speak:
Black is the bean-throw: evil is the Life!"

"Look, I strew beans,"—resumed Ferishtah,
"beans
Blackish and whitish; what they figure forth
Shall be man's sum of moments, bad and good,
That make up Life,—each moment when he feels Pleasure or pain, his poorest fact of sense,
Consciousness anyhow: there's stand the first;

Whence next advance shall be from point to line,
Singularity to series, parts to whole,
And moments to the Life. How look they now,
Viewed in the large, those little joys and griefs
Ranged only all a-row at last, like beans
—Those beans which I strew? This bean was white,
This—black. Set by itself,—but see if good and bad
Each following either in companionship,
Black have not grown less black and white as white,
Till blackish seems but dun, and whitish—gray
And the whole line turns—well, or black as thee
Or white belike to me—no matter which:
The main result is—both are modified
According to our eye's scope, power of range
Before and after. Black dost call this bean?
What, with a whiteness in its wake, which—see Suffuses half its neighbor?—and, in turn,
Lowers its pearliness late absolute.
Prownded upon by the jet which follows hard—
Else wholly white my bean were. Chose a joy!
Bettered it was by sorrow gone before,
And soered somewhat by the shadowy sense
Of sorrow which came after or might come.
Joy, sorrow,—by his providence, consequence—
Either on each, make fusion, mix in Life
That's both and neither wholly: gray or dun
Dun thou decidest? gray prevails, say I:
Wherefore? Because my view is wide enough.
Reaches from first to last nor winks at all:
Motion. —achieves it: stop short——fast we stick,

Probably at the bean that's blackest.

Son, trust me,—this I know and only this—
I am in motion, and all things beside
That circle round my passage through their midst,

Motionless, these are, as regarding me:
Which means, myself I solely recognize.
They too may recognize themselves, not me.
For aught I know or care: but plain they saw
This, if no other purpose—stuff to try
And test my power upon of rating light
And lending hue to all things as I go
Moonlike through vapor. Mark the flying cairn
Think'st thou the halo, painted still asleep
At each new cloud-floes pierced and passage through,

This was and is and will be evermore
Colored in permanence? The glory swims
Girdling the glory-giver, swallowed straight
By night's abysmal gloom, unglorified
Behide ast cast before the advance: gloom?
Faced by the onward-faring, see, succeeds
From the abandoned heaven a next surprise,
And where's the gloom now?—silver-smitts
straight,

One glow and variegation! So with me,
Who move and make—myself—the black, the white,
A BEAN-STRIPE: ALSO APPLE-EATING

The good, the bad, of life's environment.
Stand still: black stays black: start again!
there's white

Asserts supremacy: the motion's all.
That colors me my moment: seen as joy? —
I have escaped from sorrow, or that was
Or might have been: as sorrow? — thence shall Escape as certain: white preceded black.

Black shall give way to white as duly, — so,
Deepest in black means white most imminent,
Stand still, — have no before, no after! — life
Proves death, existence grows impossible
To man like me. 'What else is blessed sleep
But death, then?' Why, a rapture of release
From toil, — that's sleep's approach: as certainly,
The end of sleep means, toil is triumphed o'er:
These round the blank inconscientness between Brightness and brightness, either pushed to blaze
Just through that blank's interposition. Hence
The use of things external: man — that's I —
Practise thereon my power of casting light,
And casting substance, — when the light I cast
Breaks into color, — by its proper sake
— A truth and yet a falsity: black, white,
Names each bean taken from what lay so close
And throw such tint: pain might mean pain
indeed

Seem in the passage past it, — pleasure prove
No mere delusion while I pause to look,
Though what an idle fancy was that fear
Which overhung and hindered pleasure's hue!
While how, again, pain's shade enhanced the shine
Of pleasure, else no pleasure! Such affects Came of such causes. Passage at an end,
Fast, present, future pains and pleasures fused
So, that these glance may gather blacks and whites
Into a lifetime, — like my bean-streak there.
Why, white they whirl into, not black — for me!

"Ay, but for me! The indubitable blacks,
Immeasurable miseries, here, there
And everywhere: the world — world outside shines
Paled off so opportunely, — body's plague,
Torment of soul, — where's found thy fellowship
With wide humanity all round about Reeling beneath its burden? What's despair?
Behold that man, that woman, child — nay, brute!
Will any speck of white unblacken life
Splashed, splattered, dyed hell-deep now from end to end.
For him or her or it — who knows? Not I!"

"Nor I, Son! 'Tis shall stand for bird, beast,
Reptile, and insect even: take the last!
There's the palm-aphis, minute miracle
As wondrous every whit as thou or I:
Well, and his world's the palm-frond, there
he's born,
Lives, breads, and dies in that circumference.
An inch of green for cradle, pasture-ground,
Purien and grave: the palm's use, ask of him!
'To furnish these,' replies his wit: asc thine —
Who see the heaven above, the earth below,
Creation everywhere, — these, each and all
Claim certain recognition from the tree
For special service rendered branch and bole;
Top-tuft and tap-root: — for thyself, thus seen,
Palm furnishes dates to eat, and leaves to shade,
— Maybe, thatch hutts with, — have another use
Than strikes the apphis. So with me, my Son!
I know my own appointed patch i' the world,
What pleasures me or pains there: all outside
How he, she, it, and even thou, Son, live,
Are pleased or pained, is past conjecture, once
I pry beneath the semblance, — all that's fit,
To practise with, — reach where the fact may lie
Fathom-deep lower. There's the first and last
Of my philosophy. Blacks blur thy white?
Not mine! The apphis feeds, nor finds his leaf
Untenable, because a lance-thrust, nay.
Lightning strikes sere a moss-patch close beside.
Where certain other aphides live and love.
Restriction to his single inch of white,
That's law for him, the aphis: but for me,
The man, the larger-souled, beside my stretch
Of blacks and whites, I see a world of woes.
All round about me: one such burst of black
Intolerable o'er the life I count
White in the main, and, yea — white's faintest trace
Were clean abolished once and evermore.
Thus fare my fellows, swallowed up in gloom
So far as I discern: how far is that?
God's care be God's! 'Tis mine — to boast no joy
Unsobered by such sorrows of my kind
As sully with their shade my life that shines.
"Reflected possibilities of pain,
Forsooth, just chaste pleasure! Pain itself, —
Fact and not fancy, does not this affect
The general color?"

"Here and there a touch
Taught me, betimes, the artifice of things —
That all about, external to myself,
Was meant to be suspected, — not revealed
Demonstrably a cheat, — but half seen through,
Lest white should rule unchecked along the line
Therefore white may not triumph. All the same,
Of absolute and irretrievable
And all-subduing black, — black's soul of black
Beyond white's power to disintensify, —
Of that I saw no sample: such may wreck
My life and ruin my philosophy
To-morrow, doubtless: hence the constant shade
Cast on life's shine, — the tremor that intrudes
When firmest seems my faith in white. Dost ask
'Who is Fierishtah, hitherto exempt
From black experience? Why, if God be just,
Worse sland'ry fellow-mortals singled out
To undergo experience for his sake,
Just that the gift of pain, bestowed on them,
In him might temper to the due degree
Joy's also-excessive largess? Why, indeed!
Back are we brought thus to the starting-point—

Man's impotency, God's omnipotence,
These stop my answer. Aphis that I am,
How leave my inch-allotment, pass at will
Into my fellow's liberty of range;
Enter into his sense of black and white,
As either, seen by me from outside, seems Predominatingly the color? Life,
Lived by my fellow, shall I pass into
And myself live there? No — no more than pass

From Persia, where in sun since birth I bask
Daily, to some ungracious land afar,
Told of by travellers, where the night of snow
Smothers up day, and fluids lose themselves
Frozen to marble. How I bear the sun,
Boast though he may unduly, that I know:
How blood once curdled e'er creeps again,
Baffles conjecture: yet since people live
Somehow, resist a clime would conquer me,
Somehow provided for their sake must dawn
Compensative resource. "No sun, no grapes,"
Then, no subsistence! — were it wisely said?
Or this well-reasoned — Do I dare feel warmth
And please my palate here with Persia's vine,
Though, over-mountains, — to trust the traveler,

Snow, feather-thick, is falling while I feast?
What if the cruel winter force his way
Here also? Son, the wise reply were this:
When cold from over-mountains strikes through
and through
Blood, bone and marrow of Ferishtah, — then,
Time to look out for shelter — time, at least,
To wring the hands and cry "No shelter serves!"
Shelter, of some sort, no experienced chill Warrants that I despair to find."

"No less,
Doctors have differed here; thou say'st thy say;
Another man's experience masters thine,
Flat controverted by the sourly-Sage,
The Indian witness who, with faculty
Fine as Ferishtah's, found no white at all
Chequer the world's predominating black,
No good dust evil from supremacy,
So that Life's best was that it led to death.
How of his testimony?"

"Son, suppose
My camel told me: 'Threescore days and ten
I traversed hill and dale, yet never found
Food to stop hunger, drink to stay my drouth;
Yet, here I stand alive, which take in proof
That to survive was found impossible!'
'Nay, rather take thou, non-surviving beast,' (Reply to a vessel on the wind)
'On flank this thwack of staff
Nowise affecting flesh that's dead and dry!
Thou wincest? Take correction twice, amend

Next time thy nomenclature! Call white —
white!'
The sourly-Sage, for whom life's best was death.
Lived out his seventy years, looked bald,
Laughed loud.
Liked — above all — his dinner, — ked, is short."

"Lied is a rough phrase: say he fell from truth
In climbing towards it! — sure less faulty so
Than had he sat him down and stayed content
With the safe orthodoxy, 'White, all white,
White everywhere for certain I should see
Did I but understand how white is black,
As clearer sense than mine would.' Clear sense,
Whose may that be? Mere human eye I boast,
And such distinguish colors in the main,
However any tongue, that's human too,
Please to report the matter. Dest thou bless
A soul that strives but to see plain, speak true,
Truth at all hazards? Oh, this false for real,
This emptiness which false solitude.
— Ever some gray that's white and dun that's black,
When shall we rest upon the thing itself
Not on its semblance? — Soul too weak for sooth,
To cope with fact — wants fiction everywhere,
Mine tires of falsehood: truth at any cost!"

"Take one and try conclusions — this, suppose!
God is too good, all-wise, all-powerful: truth
Take it and rest there. What is man? He
God:
None of these absolutes therefore, — yet himself,
A creature with a creature's qualities
Make them agree, these two conceptions!
Each
Abolishes the other. Is man weak,
Foolish and bad? He must be Ahriman,
Co-equal with an Ozmuzd, Bad with Good.
Or else a thing made at the Prime Sole Will,
Doing a maker's pleasure — with results —
Which — call, the wide world over, 'what must be'—
But, from man's point of view, and only point
Possible to his powers, call — evidence
Of goodness, wisdom, strength? we mock our selves
In all that's best of us, — man's blind but sure
Craving for these in very deed not word,
Reality and not illusions. Well, —
Since these nowhere exist — nor there were cause
Must have effect, nor here where craving
Craving unfollowed by fit consequence
And full supply, aye sought for, never found —
Those — what are they but man's own rule of right?
A scheme of goodness recognized by man,
Although by man unrealizable, —
Not God's with whom to will were to perform:
wise performed here, therefore never willed.
hat follows but that God, who could the as willed the worst, — while man, with power to match
il with performance, were deservedly siled the supreme — provided . . . here's the touch
se bubble breaks here. Will of man create?
more than this my hand which strewed the beans
duced them from its finger-tips.
ask goes creation to its source, source prime ad ultimate, the single and the sole."

How reconcile discordancy, — unite station and notion — God that only can st not does, — man that would indeed st just as surely cannot, — both in one?
hat help occurs to thy intelligence?"

Ah, the beans, — or, — example better yet, — carpet-web I saw once leave the loom and lie at gorgeous length in Isphan!
be weaver plied his work with lengths of silk red each to match some jewel as it might,
were them, this by that. 'How comes it,
friend?' —

noth 1 —' that while, apart, this fiery hue,
at watery dimness, either shocks the eye,
blinding bright, or else offends again,
shadiness, — yet the two, set each by each,
shew perhaps a color born of both,
medium profitable to the sight?
Each medium is the end whereas I aim, — aawed my craftsman: 'there's no single tint

could satisfy the eye's desire to taste
-secret of the diamond: join extremes suits a serviceable medium-ghost, diamond's simulation. Even so seeds must blend the quality of man ath quality of God, and so assist our human sight to understand our Life, that is, what should be, — understand thereby herefore I hate the first and love the last,
-tender why things so present themselves to me, placed here to prove I understand.
tas, from beginning runs the chain to end,
hold me plain enough. By consequence, allow thee tolerate, — not kick and cuff man who held that natures did in fact end so, since so thyself must have them blend fancy, if it take a flight so far."

A power, confessed past knowledge, nay, past thought,
Thus thought thus known!"

"To know of, think about — all man's sum of faculty effects been exercised on earth's least atom, Son!
hat was, what, is what may such atom be?

No answer! Still, what seems it to man's sense?

An atom with some certain properties
Known about, thought of as occasion needs,
— Man's — but occasions of the universe?
Unthinkable, unknowable to man.
Yet, since to think and know fire through and through
Exceeds man, is the warmth of fire unknown,
Its uses — are they so unthinkable?
Pass from such obvious power to powers un-

Undreamed of save in their sure consequence:
Take that, we spoke of late, which draws to
ground
The staff my hand lets fall: it draws, at least —

Thus much man thinks and knows, if nothing
more."

"Ay, but man puts no mind into such power!
He neither thanks it, when an apple drops,
Nor prays it spare his pate while underneath.
Does he thank Summer though it plumped the

Why thank the other force — what'er its name —

Which gave him teeth to bite and tongue to taste

And threat to let the pulp pass? Force and

No end of forces! Have they mind like man?"

"Suppose thou visit our lord Shalim-Shah,
Bringing thy tribute as appointed. 'Here
Come I to pay my due!' Whereat one slave
Obsequious spreads a carpet for thy foot,
His fellow offers sweetmeats, while a third Prepares a pipe: what thanks or praise have
they?

Such as beft prompt service. Gratitude
Goes past them to the Shah whose gracious nod
Set all the sweet civility at work;

But for his ordinance, I much suspect,
My scholar had been left to cool his heels
Uncarpeted, or warm them — likelier still —

With bastinado for intrusion. Slaves

Needs must obey their master: 'force and

No end of forces,' act as bids some force Supreme o'er all and each: where find that one?

How recognize him? Simply as thou didst
The Shah — by reasoning. 'Since I feel a debt,
Believes me pay the same to one aware
I have my duty, he his privilege.'

Didst thou expect the slave who charged thy pipe

Would serve as well to take thy tribute-bag
And save thee further trouble?"

"Be it so!
The sense within me that I owe a debt
Assures me — somewhere must be somebody

Ready to take his due. All comes to this —

Where due is, there acceptance follows: find

Him who accepts the due! and why look far?
Behold thy kindred compass thee about!

Ere thou wast born and after thou shalt die,
Heroic man stands forth as Shahan-Shah.
Rustem and Gau, Gudarz and all the rest,
How come they short of lordship that's to seek?
Dead worthies! but men live undoubtedly
Gifted as Sindokht, sage Sulayman's match,
Valiant like Kawah: ay, and while earth lasts
Such heroes shall abound there — all for thee
Who profiteth by all the present, past,
And future operation of thy race.
Why, then, o'burdened with a debt of thanks,
Look wistful for some hand from out the clouds
To take it, when, all round, a multitude
Would ease thee in a trice?"

"Such tendered thanks
Would tumble back to who wrought riddance,
Son!
— Who but my sorry self? See! stars are out
Stars which, unconscious of thy gaze beneath,
Go glorifying, and glorify thee too
— Those Seven Thrones, Zarath's beauty, weird Farwin!"

Whether shall love and praise to star be paid
Or — say some Muhbid who, for good to thee
Blind at thy birth, by magic all his own
Opened thine eyes, and gave the sightless sight,
Let the stars' glory enter? Say his charm
Worked while thyself lay sleeping: as he went
Then wake: as: 'What a novel sense have I!
Whom shall I love and praise?" 'The stars, each orb
Thou standest rapt beneath,' proposes one:
'Do not they live their life, and please themselves,
And so please thee? What more is requisite?"
Make thou this answer: 'If indeed no mage
Opened my eyes and worked a miracle,
Then let the stars thank me who apprehend
That such an one is white, such other blue!
But for my apprehension both were blank.
Cannot I close my eyes and bid my brain
Make whites and blues, conceive without stars' help,
New qualities of color were my sight
Lost or misleading, would you red — I judge
A ruby's benefaction — stand for anight
But green from vulgar glass? Myself appraise
Lustre and lustre: should I overlook
Fomalhaut and declare some fen-fire king,
Who shall correct me, lend me eyes he trusts
No more than I trust mine? My rage for me!
I never saw him: if he never was,
I am the arbitrator! No, my Son!
Let us sink down to thy similitude:
I eat my apple, relish what is ripe —
The sunny side, admire its rarity
Since half the tribe is wrinkled, and the rest
Hide commonly a maggot in the core. —
And down Zerdusht goes with due smack of lips:
But — thank an apple? He who made my mouth
To masticate, my palate to approve,
My man, to further the connection — Him
I thank, — but for whose work, the orchard's wealth

Might prove so many gall-nuts — stocks & stones!
For aught that I should think, or know, a care,"

"Why from the world," Fershtah smiled, "said thanks
Go to this work of mine? If worthy praise,
Praised let it be and welcome: as verse ranks.
So rate my verse: if good therein outweighs
Aught faulty judged, judge justly! Justice says:
Be just to fact, or blaming or approving:
But — generous? No, nor loving!

"Loving! What claim to love has work of mine?
Concede my life were emptied of its gains
To furnish forth and fill work's strict confine,
Who works so for the world's sake — he complains
With cause when hate, not love, rewoods his pales.
I looked beyond the world for truth and beauty:
Sought, found, and did my duty."

EPILYGO

Oh, Love — no, Love! All the noises below,
Love,
Groanings all and moanings — none of Life! I lose!
All of Life's a cry just of weariness and we
Love —
"Hear at least, thou happy one!" How as I,
Oh, Love, but choose!

Only, when I do hear, sudden circle read me
— Much as when the moon's might press a space from cloud —
Iridescent splendors: gloom — would else confound me —
Barriered off and banished far — bright-edged the blackest shroud!

Thronging through the cloud-riift, whose as they, the faces
Faint revealed yet sure divined, the famous ones of old?
"What?" — they smile — "our names, our deeds so soon erases
Time upon his tablet where Life's glory is enrolled?

"Was it for mere fool's-play, make-believe and murmuring.
So we battled it like men, not boy-likes stuck or whined?
Each of us heard clang God's 'Come!' and each was coming:
Soldiers all, to forward-face, not sneaks to lag behind!

"How of the field's fortune? That concerned our Leader!
Led, we struck our stroke nor cared for drags left and right.
Each as on his sole head, failure or successer,
Lay the blame or lit the praise: no care for cowards: fight!"
Then the cloud-rift broadens, spanning earth
That's under.
Wide our world displays its worth, man's Strife and strife's success;
All the good and beauty, wonder crowning Wonder,
Till my heart and soul applaud perfection,
Nothing less.

Only, at heart's utmost joy and triumph, terror
Sudd'en turns the blood to ice: a chill wind disencharms.
All the late enchantment! What if all be error—
If the halo irised round my head were, love,
Thine arms?

RAWDON BROWN

"Tutti gai so guasti, e mi go i mili."
(Venetian saying.)

Mr. Rawdon Brown was an Englishman who went to Venice on some temporary errand, and lived there for forty years, dying in that city in the summer of 1883. He had an enthusiastic love for Venice, and is mentioned in books of travel as one who knew the city thoroughly.
The Venetian saying means that "everybody follows his taste as I follow mine." Toni was the goindolier and attendant of Brown. The inscription on Brown's tomb is given in the third and fourth lines. G. W. Cook.

SIGNOR Rawdon Brown: "Yes, I'm departing, Toni!"

I need not, just this once before I die,
Revisit England: Angius Brown am I,
Although my heart's Venetian. Yes, old crew—
Venice and London—London's 'Death the bony'
Compared with Life—that's Venice! What a sky,
A sea, this morning! One last look! Good-by,
Ca Possaro! No, lion—I'm a coney
To weep! I'm dazzled; 'tis that sun I view Rippling the... the... Cospetto, Toni!
Down
With carpet-bag, and off with valise-strapes!
Bella Venezia, non ti lascio più!"
Nor did Brown ever leave her: well, perhaps Browning, next week, may find himself quite Brown!

THE FOUNDERS OF THE FEAST

Inscribed in an Album presented to Mr.
Arthur Chappell, of the Saint James Hall
Saturday and Monday popular concerts.

"Enter my palace," if a prince should say—
"Feast with the Painters! See, in bounteous
row,
They range from Titian up to Angelo!"
Could we be silent at the rich survey?
A host so kindly, in as great a way
Invites to banquet, substitutes for show
Sound that's diviner still, and bids us know
Bach like Beethoven; are we thankless, pray?

Thanks, then, to Arthur Chappell,—thanks to him
Whose every guest henceforth not idly vaunts
"Sense has received the utmost Nature
grants,
My cup was filled with rapture to the brim,
When, night by night,—ah, memory, how it haunts!—
Music was poured by perfect ministrants,
By Halle, Schumann, Fiatti, Joachim.

THE NAMES

At Dr. F. J. Furnivall's suggestion, Browning was asked to contribute a sonnet to the Shakespeare Show-Book of the "Shakespeare Show" held in Albert Hall, London, on May 29-31, 1884, to pay off the debt on the Hospital for Women, in Fulham Road. The poet sent to the committee a sonnet on the names of Jeovah and Shakespeare.

SHAKESPEARE!—to such name's sounding,
What succeeded Fitly as silence? Falter forth the spell,— Aet follows word, the speaker knows full
well,
Nor tampers with its magic more than needs.
Two names there are: That which the Hebrew reads
With his soul only: if from lips it fall, Echo, back thundered by earth, heaven and
hell,
Would own "Thou didst create us!" Naught impedes
We voice the other name, man's most of might,
Awesome, lovingly: let awe and love
Mutely await their working, leave to sight
All of the issue as—below—above—
Shakespeare's creation rises: one remove,
Though dread—this finite from that infinite.

EPITAPH

ON LEVI LINCOLN THAXTER

Born in Watertown, Massachusetts, February 1, 1824.
Died May 31, 1884.

Mr. Thaxter was early a student of Browning's genius and in his later years gave readings from his poems, which were singularly interpretative.
The boulder over his grave bears these lines.
PARLEYINGS WITH CERTAIN PEOPLE

THOU, whom these eyes saw never! Say friends true
Who say my soul, helped onward by my song,
Though all unwittingly, has helped thee too?
I gave of but the little that I knew:
How were the gift required, while along
Life’s path I pace, couldst thou make weakness strong!
Help me with knowledge—for Life’s Old—Death’s New!

APOLLO AND THE FATES

A PROLOGUE

(Hymn in Mercurium, v. 599. Eumenides, vv. 695-7, 697-8. Alcestis, vv. 12, 33.)

Apollo. (From above.) Flame at my footfall, Parnassus! Apollo, Breaking ablaze on thy topmost peak, Burns thence, down to the depths—dread hollow—
Haunted of the Dire Ones. Haste! They wreak Wrath on Admetus whose repose I seek.

The Fates. (Below. Darkness.) Dragonwise couched in the womb of our Mother, Coiled at thy nourishing heart’s core, Night!
Dominant Dreads, we, one by the other, Deal to each mortal his dole of light.
On earth—the upper, the glad, the bright.

Clotho. Even so: thus from my loaded spindle
Plucking a pinch of the fleece, lo, “Birth” Brays from my bronze lip: life I kindle:
Look, ’tis a man! go, measure on earth
The minute thy portion, whatever its worth!

Lachesis. Woe-purified, woe-prankt, — if it speed, if it linger,— Life’s substance and show are determined by me,
Who, meting out, mixing with sure thumb and finger,

Lead life the due length: is all smoothness and glee,
All tangle and grief? Take the lot, my dear!

Atropos.—Which I make an end of: the smooth as the tangled
My shears out asunder: each snap shrinks

“ “One more
Mortal makes sport for us Moirai who dangle
The puppet grotesquely till earth’ssolid feet
Proved him he fell through, lost in Naught as before.”

Cleo. I spin thee a thread. Live, Admetus!
Produce him!

Lac. Go, — brave, wise, good, happy! New chequer the thread!
He is slaved for; yet loved by a god. I unless him
A goddess-sent plague. He has conquered is wed,
Men crown him, he stands at the height.—

He is . . . Apollo. (Entering: Light.)

“Dead?”

Nay, swart spinsters! So I surprise you
Making and marring the fortunes of Mm?
Huddling — no marvel, your enemy eyes are—
Head by head bat-like, bolts under the lid
Of daylight earth’s blessing since time began!

The Fates. Back to thy blest earth, plying Apollo!
Shaft upon shaft transpierce with thy beams
Earth to the centre,— spare but this hollow
Hewn out of Night’s heart, where an mystery seems Mewed from day’s malice: wake earth from her dreams!

_Apol._ Cronos, ‘tis your dusk salves I startle from slumber:
—Day’s god deposes you — queens Night-crowned!
—Plying your trade in a world ye uncommon,
Fashionsing Man’s web of life — spun, wound,
Left the length ye allot till a clip strews the ground!

Behold I bid truce to your doleful amusement—

Azmulled by a sunbeam!

_The Fates._ Boy, are not we peers?
_Apol._ You with the spindle grant birth:
whose inducement
But yours — with the niggardly digits — endears
To mankind chance and change, good and evil?
Your shears . . .

_Atr._ Ay, mine end the conflict: so much is no fable.
We spun, draw to length, cut amunder: what then?
So it was, and so is, and so shall be: art able
To alter life’s law for ephemeral men?
_Apol._ Nor able nor willing. To threescore and ten

Extend but the years of Admetus! Disaster
O’ertook me, and, banished by Zeus, I became
A servant to one who forbore me though master:
True lovers were we. Discontinue your game,
Let him live whom I loved, then hate on, all the same!

_The Fates._ And what if we granted — law-flouter, use-trampler —
His life at the suit of an upstart? Judge, thou —

Of joy were it fuller, of span because amplier?
For love’s sake, not hate’s, end Admetus —
Not a gray hair on head, nor a wrinkle on brow!

For, boy, ‘tis illusion: from thee comes a glimmer
Transforming to beauty life blank at the best.
Withdraw — and how looks life at worst, when to shimmer
Succeeds the sure shade, and Man’s lot crowns — confessed
Mere blackness chance-brightened? Whereof shall attest

The truth this same mortal, the darling thou stilest,
Whom love would advantage, — awake, day by day,
A life which ‘t is solely thyself reconcilest

Thy friend to endure, — life with hope: take away
Hope’s gleam from Admetus, he spurns it. For, say —

What’s infancy? Ignorance, idleness, mischief:
Youth ripens to arrogance, foolishness, greed;
——— Age —— impotence, churlishness, rancor: call this chief
Of boons for thy loved one? Much rather bid speed
Our function, let live whom thou hatest indeed!

Persuade thee, bright boy-thing! Our aid be instructive!
_Apol._ And certes youth owns the experience of age.
Ye hold then, grave seniors, my beams are presage
— They solely — of good that’s mere semblance, engage Man’s eye — gilding evil, Man’s true heritage?

_The Fates._ So, even so! From without, — at due distance
If viewed, — set a-sparkle, reflecting thy rays, —
Life mimics the sun: but withdraw such assistance,
The counterfeits goes, the reality stays —
An io-ball disguised as a fire-urb, —
_Apol._ What craze Possesses the fool then whose fancy conceals him
As happy?
_The Fates._ Man happy?
_Apol._ If otherwise — solve
This doubt which besets me! What friend ever greets him
Except with “Live long as the seasons revolve,”
Not “Death to thee straightway”? Your doctrines absolve
Such hailing from hatred: yet Man should know best.
He talks it, and glibly, as life were a load
Man fain would be rid of: when put to the test,
He whines “Let it lie, leave me trudging the road
That is rugged so far, but methinks” . . .
_The Fates._ Ay, ‘t is owed

To that glamour of thine, he bethinks him
“Once past
The stony, some patch, may, a smoothness of swarth
Awaits my tired foot: life’s turns easy at last.” —
Thy largess so lures him, he looks for reward
Of the labor and sorrow.
_Apol._ It seems, then — debarrèd
Of illusion — (I needs must acknowledge the plea)

Man despends and despair, Yet, — still further to draw.
Due profit from counsel, — suppose there should be
Some power in himself, some compensative
law
By virtue of which, independently . . .

The Fates. Faugh!
Strength hid in the weakling!
What bowl-shape hast there,
Thus laughingly proffered? A gift to our shrine?
Thanks — worsted in argument! Not so? De-close
Its purpose!
Apol.  I proffer earth's product, not mine.
Taste, try, and approve Man's invention of —
WINE!

The Fates. We feeding sneak honeycombs.
Apol.  Sustenance meagre!
Such fare breeds the flames that show all things amiss.
Quaff wine,—how the spirits rise nimble and eager.
Unscale the dim eyes! To Man's cup grant one kiss
Of your lip, then allow — no enchantment like this!

Clo. Unhook wings, unhood brows! Dost hearken?
Lach.  I listen: I see — small the food these fond mortals prefer
To our feast, the bee's bounty!
Atr.  The thing leaps! But — glisten
Its beet, I withstand it — unless all concour
In adventure so novel.
Apol.  Ye drink?
The Fates. We demur.

Apol. Sweet Trine, be indulgent nor scout the contrivance
Of Man—Bacchus-prompted! The juice, I uphold,
Illuminates gloom without sunny connivance;
Turns fear into hope and makes cowardice bold,—
Touching all that is leadlike in life turns it gold!

The Fates. Faith foolish as false!
Apol.  But essay it, soft sisters!
Then mock as ye may. Lift the chalice to lip!
Good: thou next — and thou! Seems the web,
to you twisters
Of life's yarn, so worthless?
Clo.  Who guessed that one sip
Would impart such a lightness of limb?
Lach.  I could skip

In a trice from the pied to the plain in my woof!
What parts each from either? A hair's breadth, no inch.
Once learn the right method of stepping aloof,
Though on black next foot falls, firm I fix it,
or flinch,

—Such my trust white succeeds!
Atr.  One could live — at a pin's!

Apol. What, beldames? Earth's yield, by Man's skill, can effect
Such a cure of sick sense that ye spy the relation
Of evil to good? But drink deeper, correct Blear sight more convincingly still! Take your station
Beside me, drain drags! Now for edification!
Whose gift have ye gulped? Thank not so but my brother,
Blithe Bacchus, our youngest of gods!
'Twas he Found all boon's to all men, by one good or other Already conceded, so judged there must be
New guardon to grace the new advect, ye
see!
Else how would a claim to Man's homage arise?
The plan lay arranged of his mixed woes and wears
So disposed — such Zeus' will — with design to make wise
The witless — that false things were mingled with real,
Good with bad: such the lot whereto law at the seal.

Now, human of instinct — since Semele's son
Yet minded divinely — since fathered by Zeus
With naught Bacchus tampered, unused at things done,
Owned, wisdom anterior, would spare west and use,
Yet change — without shock to old rule — introdude.

Regard how your cavern from crag-tip to lave
Frowns sheer, height and depth adamantine, one death!
I roose with a beam the whole rampart, dispel
No splinter — yet see how my flammable, beneath
And above, bids this gem wink, that crystal unbeathes!

Withdraw beam — disclosure once more Night
forbids you
Of spangle and sparkle — Day's chance-gift surmised
Rock's permanent birthright: my potency ride
you
No longer of darkness, yet light — recognized
Proves darkness a mask: day lives on though disguised.

If Bacchus by wine's aid avail so to fluxter
Your sense, that life's fact grows from adverse and thwart
To helpful and kindly by means of a cluster —
More hand-squeeze, earth's nature sublimed
by Man's art —
Shall Bacchus claim thanks wherein Zeus has no part?
Zeus — wisdom anterior? No, maids, be admonished!
If morn's touch at base worked such wonders, much more

Had noontide in absolute glory astonished
Your den, filled a-top to o'erflowing. | pour
No such mad confusion. "T is Man's to explore
Up and down, inch by inch, with the taper
reason:
No torch, it suffices — held deftly and straight.
Eyes, purblind at first, feel their way in due season,
Accept good with bad, till unseemly debate
Turns concord — despair, acquiesce in fate.

Who works this but Zeus? Are not instinct and impulse, not concept and incept his' work through Man's soul
On Man's sense? Just as wine ere it reach brain must grill pulse,
Zeus' flash stings the mind that speeds body
to goal,
Bids pause at no part but press on, reach the
whole.

For petty and poor is the part ye envisage
When — (quaff away, cummers!) — ye view,
last and first,
As evil Man's earthly existence. Come! Is age,
Is infancy — manhood — so uninterspersed
With good — some faint sprinkle?
Clo. | I'd speak if I durst.

Apol. Draughts dregward loose tongue-tie.
Lach. | I'd see, did no web
Set eyes somehow winkin'.
Apol. Drains-deep lies their purge
— True collyrium!
Atr. Words, surging at high-tide, soon ebb
From starved ears.
Apol. Drink but down to the source, they re-surge.
Join hands! Yours and yours too! A dance or a dirge?

Cho. Quashed be our quarrel! Sourly and smilingly,
Bare and crowned, bleached limbs and browned,
Drive we a dance, three and one, recondently,
Thanks to the cup where dissension is drowned,
Defeat proves triumphant and slavery crowned.

Infaney? What if the rose-streak of morning
Pale and depart in a passion of tears?
Once to have hoped is no matter for sorrowing
Love once — 'e'en love's disappointment endears!
A minute's success pays the failure of years.

Manhood — the actual? Nay, praise the potential!
(Bound upon bound, foot it around!)
What is? No, what may be — sing! that's Man's essential!
(Ramp, tramp, stamp and compound
Fancy with fact — the lost secret is found!)

Age? Why, fear ends there: the contest concluded,
Man did live his life, did escape from the fray:
Not scratchless but unscathed, he somehow eluded Each blow fortune dealt him, and conquers to-
day:
To-morrow — new chance and fresh strength, — might we say?

Land then Man's life — no defeat but a triumph!

Clo. Ha, loose hands!
Lach. I reel in a swound.
Atr. Horror yawns under me, while from on high — hump!
Lightnings astound, thunders resound,
Vault-roof reverberates, groans the ground!

Apol. I acknowledge.
The Fates. Hence, trickster! Straight soered are we!
The portent assures 'twas our tongue spoke
the truth,
Not thine. While the vapor encompassed us
three
We conceived and bore knowledge — a banting uncouth,
Old brains shudder back from: so — take it,
raih youth!

Lick the lump into shape till a cry comes!

Apol. I hear.
The Fates. Dumb music, dead eloquence! Say it, or sing!
What was quickened in us and thee also?
Apol. I fear.
The Fates. Half female, half male — go, ambiguous thing!
While we speak — perchance sputter — pick up what we fling!

Known yet ignored, nor divined nor unguessed,
Such is Man's law of life. Do we strive to declare
What is ill, what is good in our spinning?
Worst, best,
Change hues of a sudden: now here and now
there
Flits the sign which decides: all about yet nowhere.

'T is willed so, — that Man's life be-lived, first to last,
Up and down, through and through — not in portions, forsooth,
To pick and to choose from. Our shuttles fly
fast,
Weave living, not life sole and whole: at age
— youth,
So death completes living, shows life in its truth.

Man learningly lives: till death helps him — no lore!
It is doom and must be. Dost submit?

Apol. I assent —

Concede but Admetus! So much if no more
PARLEYINGS WITH CERTAIN PEOPLE

Of my prayer grant as peace-pledge! Be gracious, though, bountiful.
Good and ill, love and hate streak your life-gift!
The Fates. Content!

Such boon we accord in due measure. Life's term
We lengthen should any be moved for love's sake
To forego life's fulfillment, renounce in the germ.
Fruit of rapture—bliss or woe—either infinite.
Take
Or leave thy friend's lot: on his head be the blame!

Apol. On mine, grievously gammers! Admetus,
I know thee!
Thou prizest the right these unwittingly give
Thy subjects to rush, pay obedience they owe thee!
Importunate one with another they strive.
For the glory to die that their king may survive.

Friends rush: and who first in all Phere appears
But thy father to serve as thy substitute?
Cio. Ye wince? Thou his mother, well stricken in years,
Advances her claim—or his wife—
Lach. Tra-la-la!
Apol. But he spurns the exchange, rather dyes!

Ha, ha, ha! [Apollo ascends. Darkness.

WITH BERNARD DE MANDEVILLE

I
AY, this same midnight, by this chair of mine,
Come and review thy counsels: art thou still Stanch to their teaching?—not as fools opine
Its purport might be, but as subtler skill
Could, through turbidity, the loaded line
Of logic casting, sound deep, deeper, till
It touched a quietude and reached a shrine
And recognized harmoniously combine
Evil with good, and hailed truth's triumph—
which,
Sage dead long since, Bernard de Mandeville!

II
Only, 'tis no fresh knowledge that I crave,
Fuller truth yet, new gleanings from the grave:
Here we alive must needs deal fairly, turn
To what account Man may Man's portion, learn
Man's proper play with truth in part, before Entrusted with the whole. I ask no more Than shining witness that I do my best
With doubtful doctrine: afterwards the rest!
So, silent face me while I think and speak!
A full disclosure? Such would outrage law,
Law deals the same with soul and body: seek Full truth my soul may, when some babe, I saw
A new-born weaking, starts up strong—not weak—

Man every whit, absolved from earning saw.
Pride, rapture, if the soul attains to wreak
Its will on flesh, at last can thrust, lift, draw.
As mind bids muscle—mind which long is striven,
Painfully urging body's impotence
To effort whereby—once law's barrier rises.
Life's rule abolished—body might dispense
With infancy's probation, straight be given.
—Not by foiled darings, fond attempts be driven,
Fine food of growth, brave aims which rise
when shivered—
To stand full-statured in magnificence.

III
No: as with body so deals law with soul
That's stung to strength through weakness, strives for good
Through evil,—earth its race-ground, leaves its goal,
Presumably: so far I understood
The teaching long ago. But what means this.
—Objected by a mouth which yesterday
Was magisterial in antithesis
To, half the truths we hold, or trust we may.
Though tremblingly the while? "No sign—
—groaned he." "No stirring of God's finger to denote
He wills that right should have supremacy
On earth, not wrong! How helpful could we quote
But one poor instance when he interposed
Promptly and surely and beyond mistake
Between oppression and its victim, closed
Accounts with sin for once, and bade us wak
From our long dream that justice bears a sward,
Or else whereto its sharpness serves!

So might we safely mock at what unnerves
Faith now, be spared the sapping fear's increase
That haply evil's strife with good shall cease
Never on earth. Nay, after earth, comes peace
Born out of life-long battle? Man's lie curv

With scorn: there, also, what if justice swerves
From dealing doom, sets free by no swift stroke
Right fettered here by wrong, but leaves life's yoke—
Death should loose man from—fresh laid, last release?"

IV
Bernard de Mandeville, confute for me
This parlous friend who captured or set free
Thunderbolts at his pleasure, yet would draw
Back, panic-stricken by some pusy straw
Thy gold—rimmed amber—headed eed be whisked
Out of his pathway if the object risked
Encounter, 'seaped thy kiek from buckled das!'
As when folk heard thee in old days pooh-pooh
Addison's tye—wig preachment, grant this friend—

(Whose groan I hear, with guffaw at the end Disposing of mock-melanchoy)—grant
His bilious mood one potion, ministrant
Of homely wisdom, healthy wit! For, hear!

"With power and will, let preference appear
By intervention ever and aye, help good
Then evil's mastery is understood
In some plain outrage, and triumphant wrong
Tramples weak right to nothingness: nay, long
Er such sad consummation brings despair
To right's adherents, ah, what help it were
If wrong lay strangled in the birth — each head
Of the hatchet monster promptly crushed, instead
Of spared to gather venom! We require
No great experience that the inch-long worm,
Free of our heel, would grow to vomit fire,
And one day plague the world in dragon form.
So should wrong merely peep abroad to meet
Wrong's due quietus, leave our world's way safe
For honest walking."

Sage, once more repeat
Instruction! 'Tis a sore to soothe not chaste.
Ah, Fabulist, what luck, could I contrive
To coax from thee another “Grumbling Hive"?
My friend himself wrote fables short and sweet;
Ask him — "Suppose the Gardener of Man's ground
Plants for a purpose, side by side with good,
Evil — and that he does so — look around!
What does the field show?" — were it understood
That purposely the noxious plant was found
Vexing the virtuous, poison close to food,
If, at first stealing-forth of life in stalk
And leaflet-promise, quick his spad should balk
Evil from budding foliage, bearing fruit?
Such timely treatment of the offending root
Might strike the simple as wise husbandry,
But swift sure extirpation would scarce suit
Shrewder observers. Seed once sown thrives:
why
Frustrate its product, miss the quality
Which sower binds himself to count upon?
Had seed fulfilled the destined purpose, gone
Unhindered up to harvest — what know
But proof were gained that every growth of good Sprang consequent on evil's neighborhood?" so said your shrewdness: true — so did not say
That other sort of theorists who held
Mere unintelligence prepared the way
For either seed's upspringing: you repelled
Their notion that both kinds could sow themselves,
True! but admit: 't is understanding delves
And drops each germ, what else but folly thrwarts
The doer's settled purpose? Let the sage
Concedo a use to evil, though there starts
Full many a burgeon thence, to disengage
With thumb and finger lest it spoil the yield Too much of good's main tribute! But our main
Tough-tendoned mandrake-monster — purge the field
Of him for once and all? It follows plain
Who set him there to grow beholds repealed
His primal law: his ordinance proves vain:
And what becometh a king who cannot reign.
But to drop sceptre valid arm should wield?

VI
"Still there's a parable" — retorts my friend —
"Shows agriculture with a difference!
What of the crop and weeds which solely bend
Because, once planted, none may pluck them thence?
The Gardener contrived thus? Vain pretence!
An enemy it was who unawares
Ruined the wheat by interposing tares.
Where's our desiderated forethought?
Where's
Knowledge, where power and will in evidence?
"It is Man's-play merely! Craft foils rectitude,
Malignity defeats benevolence.
And grant, at very last of all, the fond
'Twixt good and evil ends, strange thoughts in-trude
Though good be garnered safely, and good's foe
Bundled for burning. Thoughts steal: 'Even so —
Why grant tares leave to thus o'ertop, o'ertower
Their field-mate, boast the stalk and flant the flower,
Triumph one sunny minute? Knowledge, power,
And will thus worked? Man's fancy makes the fault!
Man, with the narrow mind, must cram inside
His finite God's infinitude, — earth's vault
He bids comprise the heavenly far and wide,
Since Man may claim a right to understand
What passes understanding. So, succinct
And trimly set in order, to be scanned
And scrutinized, lo — the divine lies linked
Fast to the human, free to move as moves
Its proper match: awhile they keep the grooves,
Discreetly side by side together pace,
Till sudden comes a stumble incident
Likely enough to Man's weak-footed race,
And he discovers — wings in rudiment,
Such as he boasts, which full-grown, free-distant
Would lift him skyward, fail of flight while pent
Within humanity's restricted space.
Abjure each fond attempt to represent
The formless, the annihilable! Traceo
No outline, try no hint of human face
Or form or hand!"

VII
Friend, here's a tracing meant
To help a guess at truth you never knew.
Bend but those eyes now, using mind's eye too,
And note — sufficient for all purposes —
The ground-plan — map you long have yearned for — yes,
Make out in markings — more what artist can?
Goethe's Estate in Weimar, — just a plan!
A is the House, and B the Garden-gate,
And C the Grass-plot — you've the whole estate
Letter by letter, down to Y the Pond,
And Z the Pigsty. Do you look beyond
The algebraic signs, and captious say
"Is A the House? But where's the Roof to Where's Door, where's Window? Needs
Must House have such thing!"
Ay, that were folly. Why so very much
More foolish than our mortal purblind way
Of seeking in the symbol no point
To guide our gaze through what were else insane,
But things — their solid selves? "Is, joint by joint,
Orion man-like,— as these dots explain
His constellation? Flesh composed of suns—
How can such be?" explain the simple ones.
Look through the sign to the thing signified—
Shown nowise, point by point at best described,
Each an orb's topmost sparkle: all beside
Its shine is shadow: turn the orb one jot—
Up flies the new flash to reveal 'tis not
The whole sphere late flamboyant in your ken!

VIII
"What need of symbolizing? Fidler men
Would take on tongue mere facts — few, faint and far,
Still facts not fancies: quite enough they are,
That Power, that Knowledge, and that Will, must then
Immensity, Eternity: these jar
Nowise with our permitted thought and
speech.
Why human attributes?"

A myth may teach:
Only, who better would expound it thus
Must be Euripides, not Eschylus.

IX
Boundingly up through Night’s wall dense and
dark.
Embellished crags and clouds, outbroke the Sun
Above the conscious earth, and one by one
Her heights and depths absorbed to the last spark
His fluid glory, from the far fine ridge
Of mountain-granite which, transformed to
gold,
Laughed first the thanks back, to the vale’s dusk fold
On fold of vapor-swathing, like a bridge
Shattered beneath some giant’s stamp. Night wist
Her work done and betook herself in mist
To marsh and hollow, there to hide her time
Blindly in sequence. Everywhere
Did earth acknowledge Sun’s embrace sublime,
Thrilling her to the heart of things: since there
No ore ran liquid, no spar branched anew,
No! arrow crystal gleamed, but straightway grew
Glad through the inrush — glad nor more nor less
Than, neath his gaze, forest and wilderness,
Hill, dale, land, sea, the whole vast stretch and spread,
The universal world of creatures bred
By Sun’s munificent, alike gave praise—
All creatures but one only: gaze for gaze,
Joyless and thankless, who — all scowling
can—
Protests against the innumerable praises!
Man,
Sullen and silent.

Stand thou forth then, rise
Thy wrong, thou sole aggrieved — di斯coul-
late—
While the beast, bird, reptile, insect, gay
And glad acknowledges the bounteous day!

x
Man speaks now: "What avails Sun’s ear-felt thrill
To me? Sun penetrates the ore, the plant—
They feel and grow: perchance with subtle
skill
He intercedes fly, worm, brute, until
Each favored object pays life’s ministrant
By pressing, in obedience to his will,
Up to completion of the task prescribed,
So stands and stays a type. Myself imbibed
Such influence also, stood and stand complete—
The perfect Man, — head, body, hands and
feet,
True to the pattern: but does that suffice?
How of my superseded mind which needs
—Not to be, simply, but to do, and pleads
For — more than knowledge that by some device
Sun quickens matter: mind is nobly fair
To realize the marvelous, make — for sense
As mind — the unseen visible, condense — Myself — Sun’s all-pervading influence
So as to serve the needs of mind, explain
What now perplexes. Let the oak increase
His corrugated strength on strength, the palm
Lift joint by joint her fan-fruit, ball and balm,—
Let the cleft serpent back in bloated peace,—
The eagle, like some skyey derelict,
Drift in the blue, suspended, glorying,—
The lion lord it by the desert-spring,— What know or care they of the power which pricked
Nothingness to perfection? I, instead.
When all-developed still am found a thing
All-incomplete: for what though flesh had force
Transcending theirs — hands able to unriv
The tightened snake’s coil, eyes that could out-
course
The eagle’s soaring, voice whereat the king
Of carnage couched disowned? Mind seeks to save
Touch, understand, by mind inside of me,
The outside mind — whose quickening I attain
To recognize — I only. All in vain
Would mind address itself to render plain
The nature of the essence. Drag what lurks
Behind the operation — that which works
Latently everywhere by outward proof—
Drag that mind forth to face mine? No! alas!
I solely crave that one of all the beams
Which do Sun’s work in darkness, at my will
WITH DANIEL BARTOLI

I

Do, the divinest women that have walked
Our world were scarce those saints of whom we walked.
My saint, for instance — worship if you will!
'T is pity poets need historians' skill:
What legendary's worth a chronicle?

II

Come, now! A great lord once upon a time
Visited — oh a king, of kings the prince,
To sign a treaty such as never was;
For the king's minister had brought to pass
That this same duke — so style him — must engage
Two of his dukedoms as an heritage
After his death to this exorbitant
Crafter of kingship. "Let who looks so scant,
Who owns much, give the more to!" Why rebuke?
So bids the devil, so obeys the duke.

III

Now, as it happened, at his sister's house
— Duchess herself — indeed the very spouse
Of the king's uncle, — while the deed of gift
Wherby our duke should cut his rights adrift
Was drawing, getting ripe to sign and seal —
What does the frozen heart but uncoangeal
And, shaming his transcendent kin and kith,
Whom do the duke's eyes make acquaintance
with?
A girl. "What, sister, may this wonder be?"
"Nobody! Good as beautiful is she,
With gifts that match her goodness, no faint flaw
I' the white: she were the pearl you think you
saw,
But that she is — what corresponds to white?
Some other stone, the true pearl's opposite,
As cheap as pearls are costly. She's — now, guess
Her parentage! Once — twice — thrice? Foiled, confess!
Drugs, duke, her father deals in — faungh, the scents! —
Manna and senna — such medicaments
For payment he compounds you. Stay — stay — stay!
I'll have no rude speech wrong her! Whither away
The hot-head? Ah, the soapserge! She des-serves
Respect — compassion, rather! right it serves
My folly, trusting secrets to a fool!
Already at it, is he? She keeps cool —
Helped by her fan's spread. Well, our state atones
For thus much license, and words break no bones!"
(Hearts, though, sometimes.)

IV

Next morn 't was "Reason, rate,
Rave, sister, on till doomsday! Sure as fate,
I wed that woman — what a woman is Now that I know, who never knew till this!"
So swore the duke. "I wed her: once again —
Rave, rate, and reason — spend your breath in vain!"

V

At once was made a contract firm and fast,
Published the banns were, only marriage, last,
Required completion when the Church's rite
Should bless and bid depart, make happy quite
The coupled man and wife forevermore:
Which rite was soon to follow. Just before —
All things at all but end — the folk o’ the bride
Flocked to a summons. Pomp the duke devised:
“Of ceremony — so much as empower,
Naught that exceeds, suits best a tie like on.”

He smiled — “all else were mere futility.
We vow, God hears us: God and you and I —
Let the world keep at distance! This is why
We choose the simplest forms that serve to bind.
Lover and lover of the human kind,
No care of what degree — of kings or clowns —
Come blood and breeding. Courtly smiles and frowns
Miss of their mark, would idly soothe or strike
My style and yours — in one style merged:
A duke’s woman.

God’s man and woman merely. Long ago
’Twas rounded in my ears ‘Duke, wherefore slow
To use a privilege? Needs must one who reigns
Pay reigning’s due: since statecraft so ordains
Wed for the commonwealth’s sake! law prescribes
One wife: but to submission license bribes
Unrelenting: mistresses accept —
Well, at discretion! Prove I so inept
A scholar, thus instructed? Dearest, be
Wife and all mistresses in one to me,
Now, henceforth, and forever!” So smiled he.

Good: but the minister, the crafty one,
Got ear of what was doing — all but done —
Not sooner, though, than the king’s very self,
Warned by the sister on how sheer a shelf
Royalty’s ship was like to split. “I bar
The altars vision! Mix with much my star?
Shall earth behold prodigiously enrobed
An upset marsh-born meteor sun-absorbed?
Nuptial me no such nuptials!” “Past dispute,
Majesty speaks with wisdom absolute.”
Admired the minister: “yet, all the same,
I would we may not — while we play his game,
The ducal meteor’s — also lose our own,
The solar monarch’s: we relieve your throns
Of an ungracious presence, like enough:
Balked of his project he departs in huff;
And so cuts short — dare I remind the king?
— Our not so unsuccessful bargaining.
The contract for eventual heritage
Happens to pari passu reach the stage
Attained by just this other contract, — each
Undisturbed by signature though fast in speech.
Off goes the duke in dudgeon — off withal
Go with him his two dukedoms past recall.
You save a fool from tasting folly’s fruit,
Obtain small thanks thereby, and lose to boot
Segality’s reward. The jest is grim:
The man will mete you — for amercing him?
Nay, for . . . permit a poor similitude
A witless wight in some fantastic mood
Would drown himself: you plunge into its waste.
Pluck forth the undeserving: he, you save,
Pulls you clean under also for your pains.
Sire, little need that I should tax my brain
To help your inspiration?” “Let him sink!
Always contriving” — hints the royal wisk —
“To keep ourselves dry while we claim our clothes.”

vii

Next day, the appointed day for plighting troths
At eve, — so little time to lose, you see,
Before the Church should wield indissolubly
Bond into bond, wed those who, side by side.
Sit each by other, bold groom, blushing bride,—
At the preliminary banquet, graced
By all the lady’s kinfolk come in haste
To share her triumph, — in a thunderspell:
“Who importunes now?” “Such is my mishap—
In the king’s name! No need that any stir
Except this lady!” bids the minister:
“With her I claim a word apart, no more:
For who gainsays — a guard is at the door.
Hold, duke! Submit you, lady, as I bow
To him whose mouthpiece speaks his pleasure now!
It well may happen I no whit arrest
Your marriage: be it so, — we hope the best.
By your leave, gentle! Lady, pray you hence!
Duke, with my soul and body’s deference!”

viii

Doors shut, month opens and persuasion flies
Copiously forth. “What flesh shall dare oppose
The king’s command? The matter in debate
— How plain it is! Yourself shall arbitrate,
Determine. Since the duke affects to rate
His price of life beyond all goods of earth,
Accounts as naught old gains of rank and birth.
Ancestral obligation, recent fame,
(We know his feats) — nay, ventures to dis-
claim
Our will and pleasure almost — by report —
Waives in your favor dukeliness, in short, —
We — (t is the king speaks) — who might forthwith stay
Such suicidal purpose, brush away
A bad example shame would else record, —
Lean to indulgence rather. At his word
We take the duke: allow him to complete
The cession of his dukedoms, leave our feet
Their footstool when his own head, safe in vault, Sleeps sound. Nay, would the duke repair his fault
Handsomely, and our forfeited esteem
Recover, — what if wisely he redeem
The past, — in earnest of good faith, at once
Give us such jurisdiction for the nonce
As may serve — to prevent occasion ship
And constitute our actual ownership?
Concede this — straightway be the marriage
blessed
By warrant of this paper! Things at rest,
This paper duly signed, down drops the bar,
To-morrow you become— from what you are,
The druggist’s daughter—not the duke’s mere spouse,
But the king’s own adopted: heart and house
Open to you— the idol of a court
“Which heaven might copy”— sing our poet-s dart.
In this emergency, on you depends
The issue: plead what bliss the king intends!
Should the duke frown, should arguments and prayers,
Nay, tears if need be, prove in vain,— who safese?
We leave the duke to his obduracy,
Companionless,— you, madam, follow me
Without, where divers of the body-guard
Wait signal to enforce the king’s award
Of strict seclusion: over you at least
Vibrantly the sceptre threats increased
Precipitation! How avert its crash?

IX
“Re-enter, sir! A hand that’s calm, not rash, Averts it!” quietly the lady said.
“Yourself shall witness.”
At the table’s head
Where, mid the hushed guests, still the duke
sat glued
In blank bewilderment, his spouse pursued
Her speech to end— syllabled quiesude.

“Duke, I, your duchess of a day, could take
The hand you proffered me for love’s sole sake, Conscious my love matched yours; as you, my safes?
Would waive, when need were, all but love—
from pelf
To potency. What fortune brings about
Haply in some far future, finds me out,
Faces me on a sudden here and now.
The better!— if beating heart allow—
Read this, and bid me rend to rags the shame!
I and your conscience— hear and grant our
claim!
Never dare alienate God’s gift you hold Simply in trust for him? Choose muck for gold?
Could you so stumble in your choice, cajoled
By what I count my lust of worthiness
— The youth, the beauty, — you renounce them—yes,
With all that’s most too: love as well you lose,
Slain by what slays in you the honor! Choose!
Dear— yet my husband— dare I love you
yet?”

XI
How the duke’s wrath o’erbolted,— words, words, and yet
More words,— I spare you such fool’s fever-fer.
They were not of one sort at all, one size,
As souls go—he and she. "I‘t is said, the eyes
Of all the lookers-on let tears fall fast.
The minister was mollified at last:

“Take a day,— two days even, ere through pride
You perish,— two days’ counsel — then decide!"

XII
“If I shall save his honor and my soul?
Husband,— this one last time,— you tear the scroll?
Farewell, duke! Sir, I follow in your train!”

XIII
So she went forth: they never met again,
The duke and she. The world paid compliment
(Is it worth noting?) when, next day, she sent Certain gifts back— “jewelry fit to deck Whom you call wife.” I know not round what neck
They took to sparkling, in good time— weeks
theno.

XIV
Of all which was the pleasant consequence,
So mouch and no more — that a fervid youth,
Big-hearted boy, — but ten years old, in
truth—
Laid this to heart and loved, as boyhood can.
The unduchessed lady: boy and lad grew man;
He loved as man perchance may: did mean;
while
Good soldier-service manages to beguile
The years, no few, until he found a chance:
Then, as at trumpet-summons to advance,
Outbroke the love that stood at arms so long, Brooked no withstanding longer. They were wed
Whereon from camp and court alike he fled,
Renounced the sun-king, dropped off into night,
Evermore lost, a ruined satellite:
And, oh, the exquisite deliciousness
That lapped him in obscurity! You guess
Such joy is fugitive: she died full soon.
He did his best to die— as sun, so moon.
Left him, turned dusk to darkness absolute.
Failing of death — why, saintship seemed to
suit:
Yes, your sort, Don! He trembled on the verge
Of monkhood: trick of owl and taste of scourge
He tried: then, kicked not at the pricks perverse,
But took again, for better or for worse.
The old way in the world, and, much the same
Man o’ the outside, fairly played life’s game.

XV
“Now, Saint Scholastica, what time she fared
In Paynimrie, behold, a lion glared
Right in her path! Her waist she promptly strips
Of girdle, binds his teeth within his lips.
And, leashed all lamblike, to the Soldan’s
court
Leads him.” Ay, many a legend of the sort
Do you praiseworthy authenticate:
Spare me the rest. This much of no debate
Admits: my lady flourished in grand days
When to be duchess was to dance the hays
Up, down, across the heaven amid its host:
While to be hailed the sun's own self almost —
So close the kindship was — was —

Saint, for this,
Be yours the feet I stoop to — kneel and kiss!
So human? Then the moon too, if you will!
Thanks to no legend but a chronicle.

XVI
One leaps to like the duke, too: up we'll patch
Some sort of saintship for him — not to match
Hers — but man's best and woman's worst amount
So nearly to the same thing, that we count
In man a miracle of faithfulness
If, while unfaithful somewhat, he lay stress
On the main fact that love, when love indeed is Wholly solely love from first to last —
Truth — all the rest a lie. Too likely, fast Enough that necklace went to grace the throat
— Let's say, of such a dancer as makes doat
The senses when the soul is satisfied —
Troyали, say the Greeks — a sweetmeat tried
Approvingly by sated tongue and teeth,
Once body's proper meal consigned beneath
Such unconsidered munching.

XVII
Fancy's flight
Makes me a listener when, some sleepless night,
The duke reviewed his memories, and agast
Found that the Present intercepts the Past
With such effect as when a cloud unwraps
The moon and, moon-suffused, plays moon per ble when it.
To who walks under, till comes, late or soon,
A stumble: up he looks, and lo, the moon
Calm, clear, convincingly herself once more!
How could he 'scape the cloud that thrust between Him and allanguage? Speak, fool — duke, I mean!

XVIII
"Who had you come, brisk-marching bold
she-shape —
A terror with those black-balled worlds of eyes,
That black hair bristling solid-built from nape
To crown its coils about? O dread surprize!
Take, tread on, trample under past escape
Your capture, spoil and trophy! Do — de vise
Insults for one who, fallen once, ne'er shall rise!
"Mock on, triumphant o'er the prostrate shame!
Laugh 'Here lies he among the false to
Love —
Love's loyal liegeman once: the very same
Who, scorning his weak fellows, towered above
Inconstancy: yet why his faith desame?

Our eagle's victor was at least no dove,
No dwarfish knight picked up our giant's glove —

"'When, putting prowess to the proof, fail urged
Her champion to the challenge: had I
changed
That merely virtuous, wisdom, beauty — merged
All in one woman — merely these advanced
Their claim to conquest, — hardly had he purged
His mind of memories, dearnesses enhanced Rather than harmed by death, nor, dis
tranced,

"'Promptly had he abjured the old pretense
To prove his kind's superior — first to last
Display erect on his heart's eminence
An altar to the never-dying Past.
For such feat faith might boast fit play of
fancy
And easily disarm the iconoclast
Called virtue, wisdom, beauty: impudence

"'Fought in their stead, and how could faith but fall?
Then came a bold she-shape brisk-marching
bent
No inch of her imperious stature, tall
As some war-engine from whose top was sent
One shattering volley out of eye's black ball,
And prone lay faith's defender! — Mockery
sent?

Malice discharged in full? In that event,

"My queenly impudence, I cover close,
I wrap me round with love of your black hair
Black eyes, black every wicked inch of those Limbs' war-tower tallness: so much trust lives there
'Neath the dead heap of lies. And yet — who knows?
What if such things were? No less, such things were,
Then was the man your match whom now you
dare

"Treat as existant still. A second truth!
They held — this heap of lies you rightly scorned —
A man who had approved himself in youth
More than a match for — you for sea-born
Venus herself: you conquer him forsooth?
'Tis me his ghost: he died since left and lea
As needs must Samson when his hair is shorn

"Some day, and soon, be sure himself will rise,
Called into life by her who long ago
Left his soul whirling time in flesh-disguise.
Ghosts tired of waiting can play tricks you
know!
Tread, trample me — such sport we Ghosts de
vise,
Waiting the morn-star's reapparance — though
You think, we vanish scared by the cock's crow."
WITH CHRISTOPHER SMART

I
It seems as if . . . or did the actual chance
Startle me and perplex? Let truth be said!
How might this happen? Dreaming, blindfold led
By visionary hand, did soul’s advance
Passed my body’s gain inheritance
Of fact by fancy — so that when I read
At length with waking eyes your Song, instead
Of mere bewildermont, with me first glance
Was but full recognition that in trance
Or merely thought’s adventure some old day
Of dim and done-with boyishness, or — well,
Why might it not have been, the miracle
Broke on me as I took my sober way
Through veritable regions of our earth
And made discovery, many a wondrous one?

II
Anyhow, fact or fancy, such its birth:
I was exploring some huge house, had gone
Through room and room complacently, no dearth
Anywhere of the signs of decent taste,
Adequate culture: wealth had run to waste
Nowise, nor penury was proved by stint:
All showed the Golden Mean without a hint
Of brave extravagance that breaks the rule.
The master of the mansion was no fool
Assuredly, no genius just as sure!
Safe mediocrity had scorned the lure
Of now too much and now too little cost,
And satisfied me sight was never lost
Of moderate design’s accomplishment
In calm completeness. On and on I went
With no more hope than fear of what came next,
Till lo, I push a door, sudden uplift
A hanging, enter, chance upon a shift
Indeed of scene! So — thus it is thou deck’st High heaven, our low earth’s brick-and-mortar work?

III
It was the Chapel. That a star, from murk
Which hid, should flashingly emerge at last,
Were small surprise: but from broad day I passed
Into a presence that turned shine to shade.
There fronted me the Raphael Mother-Maid,
Never to whom knelt votarist in shrine
By Nature’s bounty helped, by Art’s divine
More varied — beauty with magnificence —
Than this: from floor to roof one evidence
Of how far earth may rival heaven. No niche
Where glory was not prised to enrich Man’s gaze with gold and gems, no space but glowed
With color, gleamed with carving — hues which owed
Their outburst to a brush the painter fed
With rainbow-substance — rare shapes never

Became the sculptor’s dowry, Art’s response
To earth’s despair. And all seemed old yet
new:
Youth, — in the marble’s curve, the canvas’
hue,
Apparent, — wanted not the crowning thrill
Of age the consecrator. Hands long still Had worked here — could it be, what leant them
skill
Rested a power to supervise, protect,
Enforce new lessons with the old, connect.
Our life with theirs? No merely modern touch
Told me that here the artist, doing much,
Elsewhere did more, perchance does better,
lives —
So needs must learn.

IV
Well, these provocatives
Having fulfilled their office, forth I went Big with anticipation — well-nigh fear —
Of what next room and next for startled eyes
Might have in store, surprise beyond surprise.
Next room and next and next — what followed here?
Why, nothing! not one object to arrest
My passage — everywhere too manifest
The previous decent null and void of best
And worst, mere ordinary right and fit,
Calm commonplace which neither missed, nor hit
Inch-high, inch-low, the placid mark proposed.

V
Armed with this instance, have I diagnosed Your case, my Christopher? The man was sound
And sane at starting; all at once the ground
Gave way beneath his step, a certain smoke
Curled up and caught him, or perhaps down
broke
A fireball wrapping flesh and spirit both
In confusion. Then — as heaven were loth
To linger — let earth understand too well
How heaven at need can operate — off fall
The flame-robe, and the untransfigured man
Resumed sobriety, — as he began,
So did he end nor alter pace, not he!

VI
Now, what I fain would know is — could it be
That he — who’er he was that furnished forth
The Chapel, making thus, from South to North,
Raphael touch Leighton, Michelagnolo
Join Watts, was found bat once combining so
The elder and the younger, taking stand
On Art’s supreme, — or that yourself who sang
A Song where flute-breath silvers trumpet-clang,
And stations you for once on either hand
With Milton and with Keats, empowered to
claim
Affinity on just one point — (or blame
Or praise my judgment, thus it fronts you full)
How came it you resume the void and null,
Subside to insignificance, — live, die
— Proved plainly two mere mortals who drew nigh
One moment—that, to Art’s best hierarchy,
This, to the superhuman poet-pair?
What if, in one point only, then and there
The otherwise all-unapproachable
Allowed impingement? Does the sphere pre-
To span the cube’s breadth, cover end to end
The plane with its embrace? No, surely!
Still,
Contact is contact, sphere’s touch no whit less
Than cube’s superimposition. Such success
Befell Smart only out of thrones between
Milton and Keats that dunned the singing-dress—
Smart, solely of such songmen, pierced the screen
'Twixt thing and word, lit language straight from soul,—
Left no fine film-flake on the naked coal
Live from the censor—shapely or unchoate,
Fire-suffused through and through, one blaze of truth
Undeadened by a lie, — (you have my mind)—
For, think! this blaze outlasts with black behind
And blank before, when Hayley and the rest...
But let the dead successors worst and best
Bury their dead: with life be my concern—
Yours with the fire-flame: what I fail would Learn
Is just—(suppose me haply ignorant
Down to the common knowledge, doctors vaunt):
Just this—why only once the fire-flame was:
No matter if the marvellous came to pass
The way folk judged—if power too long suppressed
Broke lose and maddened, as the vulgar guessed
Or simply brain-disorder (doctors said),
A turmoil of the particles disturbed,
Brain’s workaday performance in your head,
Spurred spirit to wild action health had curbed,
And so verse issued in a catacatact
Whence prose, before and after, unperturbed
Was wont to wend its way. Conceide the fact That here a poet was who always could—Never before did—never after would—
Achieve the feat: how were such fact explained?

VII

Was it that when, by rarest chance, there fell
Disguise from Nature, so that Truth remained Naked, and whose saw for once could tell Us others of her majesty and might
In large, her lovelinesses infinite
In little,—straight you used the power wherewith
Sense, penetrating as through rind to pith
Each object, thoroughly revealed might view
And compass—shed the old things thus made new.
So that while eye saw, soul to tongue could trust

Thing which struck word out, and once men adjust
Real word on to right language, till heaven’s vaunt
Pompous with sunset, storm-stirred sea’s a-sault
On the swilled rock-ridge, earth’s embossed brood
Of tree and flower and weed, with all the life
That flies or swims or crawls, in peace or strife
Above, below,—each had its note and name
For Man to know by,—Man who, now—so same
As erst in Eden, needs that all he sees
Be named him ere he note by what degrees
Of strength and beauty to its end Desires
Ever thus operates,—your thought and mine,
No matter for the many dissolved—
So did you sing your Song, so truth found vast
In words for once with you?

VIII

Then—back was beard
The robe thus thrown aside, and straight the
head
Darkened into the old oft-catalogued
Repository of things that sky, wave, land,
Or show or hide, clear late, accretion-clogged
Now, just as long ago, by tellings and Re-tellings to satiety, which strike
Muffled upon the ear’s drum. Very like
None was so startled as yourself when friends
Came, hailed your fast-returning vis:
"Health mends
Importantly, for—to be plain with you—
This scribble on the wall was done—in lies
Of pen and paper—with—ha, ha!—year by Denting it on the waistcoat! Do you see
How wise our caution was? Thus much we stopped
Of babble that had else grown print:—
Lopped
From your trim bay-tree this unsightly bough—
Smart’s who translated Horace! Write it now..."

Why, what Smart did write—never after
One line to show that he, who paced the swed,
Had reachéd the heath from his madhouse cell.

IX

Was it because you judged (I know full well
You never had the fancy)—judged—as some—
That who makes poetry must reproduce
Thus ever and thus only, as they come,
Each strength, each beauty, everywhere diffused
Throughout creation, so that eye and ear
Seeing and hearing, strictest shall reckon
At touch of just a trait, the strength appear—
Suggested by a line’s lapse see arise
All evident the beauty,—fresh surprise
Startling at fresh achievement? "So, indeed,
Wallows the whale’s bulk in the waste of keen,
Nor otherwise its feather-tufts make fine
Wild Virgin’s Bower when stars faint off to seem!"

(My prose—you poetry I dare not give, Purpling too much my mere gray argument.)
—Was it because you judged—when fugitive
WITH GEORGE BUBB DODINGTON

Seek next law's confirmation! But reverse
The order, where's the wonder things grow worse
Than, by the law your fancy formulates,
They should be? Cease from anger at the fates
Which thwart themselves so madly. Live and learn,
Not first learn and then live, is our concern.

WITH GEORGE BUBB DODINGTON

Aha, George Bubb Dodington Lord Melcombe,
—no,
Yours was the wrong way! — always understand,
Supposing that plausibly you planned
How statesmanship — your trade — in outward show
Might figure as inspired by simple zeal
For serving country, king and commonweal,
(Though service tire to death the body, tease
The soul from out an o'er tasked patriot-drudge)
And yet should prove zeal's outward show agrees
In all respects — right reason being judge —
With inward care that, while the statesman spends Body and soul thus freely for the sake
Of public good, his private welfare take
No harm by such devotedness. Intends
Scripture aught else — let capacious folk inquire —
Which teaches "Laborers deserve their hire, And who neglects his household bears the bell Away of spinning from an infidel?"
Wiselier would fools that oarp bestow a thought
How birds build nests; at outside, roughly wrought,
Twigs knots with twig, loam plaster up each chink,
Leaving the inmate rudely lodged — you think? Peep but inside: That spacious rude-and-rough
Covers a domicile where downy fluff
Embeds the ease-deserving architect,
Who toiled and moiled not merely to effect
'Twixt sprig and sprig a stop-cap in the teeth
Of wind and weather, guard what swung beneath
From upstet only, but contrived himself
A snug interior, warm and soft and sleek.
Of what material? Oh, for that, you seek
How nature prompts each volatile? Thus — self Smoothens the human mudlark's lodging, power
Demands some harder wrappage to embrace
Robuster heart-beats: rock, not tree nor tower,
Contents the building eagle: rock shoves close
To brother rock on branch, while crow morose
Apart keeps balance perch'd on topmost bough.
No sort of bird but suits his taste somehow:
Nay, Darwin tells of such as love the bower —
His bower-birds opportunely yield us yet
The lacking instance when at loss to get
A feathered parallel to what we find
The secret motor of some mighty mind
That worked such wonders — all for vanity!
Worked them to haply figure in the eye

Was glory found, and wholly gone and spent
Such power of startling up deaf ear, blind eye,
At truth's appearance, — that you humbly bent
The head and, bidding vivid work good-by,
Doffed lyric dress and trod the world once more
A drab-clothed decent proseman as before?
Strengths, beauties, by one word's flash thus laid bare — That was effectual service; made aware
Of strengths and beauties, Man but hears the text, Awaits your teaching. Nature? What comes next?
Why all the strength and beauty? — to be shown
Thus in one word's flash, henceforth let alone
By Man who needs must deal with aught that's known
Never so lately and so little? Friend,
First give us knowledge, then appoint its use!
Strength, beauty are the means: ignore their end?
As well you stopped at proving how profuse
Stone, sticks, may stumble lie to left and right
Ready to help the builder, — careless quite
If he should take, or leave the same to stew
Earth idly, — as by word's flash bring in view
Strength, beauty, then bid who beholds the same.

Go on beholding. Why gains unemployed?
Nature was made to be by Man enjoyed
First: followed duly by enjoyment's fruit,
Instruction — haply leaving joy behind:
And you, the instructor, would you slack pursuit
Of the main prize, as poet help mankind
Just to enjoy, there leave them? Play the fool,
Abjuring a superior privilege?
Please simply when your function is to rule —
By thought incite to deed? From edge to edge
Of earth's round, strength and beauty everywhere
Pullulate — and must you particularize
All, each and every apparition? Spare
Yourself and us the trouble! Ears and eyes
Want so much strength and beauty, and no less
Nor more, to learn life's lesson by. Oh, yes —
The other method's favored in our day!
The end are the beginning: as you may Master the heavens before you study earth,
Make you familiar with the meteor's birth
Are you descend to scrutinize the rose?
I say, o'erstep no least one of the rows
That lead man from the bottom where he plants
Foot first of all, to life's last ladder-top;
Arrived there, vain enough will seem the vaunts
Of those who say — " We scale the skies, then drop
To earth — to find, how all things there are loth
To answer heavenly law; we understand
The meteor's course, and lo, the rose's growth —
How other than should be by law's command!"
Would not you tell such — " Friends, beware lest fune

Offscense sense: learn earth first ere presume
To teach heaven legislation. Law must be Active in earth or nowhere: earth you see, —
Or there or not at all, Will, Power and Love
Admit discovery, — as below, above
Of intimates as first of — doers' kind?
Actors', that work in earnest sportively,
Paid by a surish smile. How says the Sage?
Birds born to strut prepare a platform-stage
With sparkling stones and speckled shells, all sorts
Of slimy rubbish, odds and ends and orts,
Whereon to pose and posture and engage
The priceless female simper.

II

Thus into detail, George Bubb Dodington,
Lest, when I take you presently to task
For the wrong way of working, you should ask
'What fool conjectures that profession means
Performance? that who goes behind the scenes
Finds,—acting over,—still the foot-stuff screens
Othello's visage, still the self-same cloak's
Bugle-bright-blackness half reveals half chokes
Hamlet's emotion, as ten minutes since?'
No, each resumes his garb, stands—Moor or prince—
Decently draped: just so with statesmanship!
All outside show, in short, is sham—why wince?
Concede me—while our parley lasts! You trip
Afterwards—lay but this to heart! (there lurks
Somewhere in all of us a lump which irks
Somewhat the spriteliest-scheming brain that's bent
On brave adventure, would but heart consent!)
—Here trip you, that—your aim allowed as right—
Your means thereto were wrong. Come, we,
this night,
Profess one purpose, hold one principle,
Are at odds only as to—not the will
But way of winning solace for ourselves
—No matter if the ore for which zeal delves
Be gold or coprolite, while zeal's pretence
Is— we do good to men at—whose expense
But ours? who tire the body, tease the soul,
Simply that, running, we may reach fame's goal
And wreathes at last our brows with bay —the State's Disinterested slaves, nay—please the Fates
Savoris and nothing less: such lot has been!
Statesmanship triumphs pedestalled, serene,—
O happy consummation! —brought about
By managing with skill the rabble-rout
For which we labor (never mind the name—
People or populace, for praise or blame)
Making them understand—their heaven, their hell,
Their every hope and fear is ours as well.
Man's cause — what other can we have at heart?
Whence follows that the necessary part
High o'er Man's head we play,—and freelier breathe
Just that the multitude which gasps beneath
May reach the level where mistified stand
Ourselves at vantage to put forth a hand,
Assist the prostrate public. 'Tis by right
Merely of such pretence, we reach the height
Where storms abound, to brave—say, can their stress,
Though all too well aware —of pomp the less
Of peace the more! But who are we, to say
For peace' sake, duty's pointing? Up, the ear
Albeit no prize we may but martyrdom!
Now, such fit height to launch salvation's breeze,
How get and gain? Since help must needs be craved
By would-be saviours of the ales-universal,
How coax them to co-operate, lend a lift,
Kneel down and let us mount?

III

You say, "Make all
By sham—the harâsh word: preach and task persuade
Somehow the Public —not desiring aid
Of salutary artifacts—we seek
Solely their good: our strength would rise to weak,
Our cultivated knowledge supplement
Their rudeness, rawness: why to us were not
Ability except to come in use?
Who loves his kind must by all means be
That kind to let his love play freely, press
In Man's behalf to full performance!"

IV

Yes—
You, George, we know I — whereat they less believe,
And bend the knee, and on the neck receive
Who fawned and cringed to purpose? Is a na—
George! Try simple falsehood on shrewd folk who lap
Lies of superior fashion day by day
And hour by hour? With craftiness veiled as they's
What chance of competition when the tools
Only a novice wields? Are knives such lest Disinterested patriots, spare your tongue
The tones thrice-silvered, cheek save smile a fling
Pearl-like profuse to swing—a hard, whereas
No unit needs be taught, his neighbor's tough Scarcely holds for who but grunts and whines his husks
Due to a wrinkled smotk that shows sharp task
No animal — much less our lordly Man—
Obey's it's like: with strength all rude began,
The stoutest awes the pasture. Soon heeded
Discolission, —nicer power Man needs
To rule him than is bred of bone and brain;
Intelligence must move strength's self. The too
Lasts but its time: the multitude at length
Looks inside for intelligence and strength
And finds them here and there to pick and choose:
"All at your service, mine, see!" At last
My George, at this late day, to make his best
"In strength, intelligence, I rule the rest.
Beat, all and some, the ungraced who covet your ranks?"
"Oh, but I love, would lead you, gain your thanks
By unexampled yearning for Man's sake —
Passion that solely waits your help to take Effect in action!” — George, which one of us
But holds with his own hand this communication thus:
"I am, if not of men the first and best
Still — to receive enjoyment — properest:
Which since by force I cannot, nor by wit
Most likely — craft must serve in place of it.
Flatter, cajole! If so I bring within
My nest the gains which wit and force should win,
What hinders?” — 'Tis a trick we know of old:
Try, George, some other of tricks manifold!
The multitude means mass and mixture — right!
Are mixtures simple, pray, or composite?
Dive into Man, your medley: see the waste!
Sloth-stifled genius, energy disgraced
By ignorance, high aims with sorry skill,
Will without means and means in want of will
— Sure we might fish, from out the mothers' sons
Thus, and the wits they, a choice Dodgingtons!
Why call up Dodington, and none beside,
To take his seat upon our books and ride
As statesman conquering and to conquer? Well,
The last expedient, which must needs excel
Those old ones — this it is — at any rate
To-day, and a dozen Dodingtons!
As simple force has been replaced, just so
Must simple wit be: men have got to know
Such wit as what you boast is nowise held
The wonder once it was, but, paralleled
Too plentifully, counts not, — puts to shame
Modest possessors like yourself who claim,
By virtue of it merely, power and place — Which means the sweets of office. Since our race
Teems with the like of you, some special gift,
Your very own, must coax our hands to lift,
And blacken what belong to you: is just and right
To privilege your nature?

v

"State things quite
Other than so” — make answer! "I pretend
No such community with men. Perpend
My key to domination! Who would use
Man for his pleasure needs must introduce
The element that aves Man. Once for all,
His nature owns a Supernatural
In fact as well as phrase — which found must be — Where, in this doubting age? Old mystery Has served its turn — seen through and sent adrift
To nothingness: new wizard-craft makes shift
Nowadays shorn of help by robe and book,—
Otherwise, elsewhere, for success must look
Than chalked-ring, incantation-gibberish.
Somebody comes to conjure: that’s he? Pish!
He’s like the roomful of rapt gazers,— there’s no
Sort of difference in the garb he wears
From ordinary dressing; — gesture, speech,
Demeanor, just like those of all and each
That eye their master of the minute. Stay!
What of the something — call it how you may —
Uncanny in the — quack? That’s easy said!
Notice how the Professor turns no head

And yet takes cognizance of who accepts,
Denies, is puzzled as to the adept’s
Supremacy, yields up or lies in wait
To trap the trickster! Doubtless, out of date
Are dealings with the devil: yet, the stirr
Of mouth, its smile half smug, half sinister,
Mock-modest boldness masked in diffidence,— What if the man have — who knows how or wenoe? —
Confederate potency unguessed by us—
Prove no such cheat as he pretends?"

vi

Ay, thus
Had but my George played statesmanship’s new card
That carries all! “Since we” — avers the Bard —
“ All of us have one human heart” — as good
As say — by all of us is understood Right and wrong, true and false — in rough, at least,
We own a common conscience. God, man,
beast —
How should we qualify the statesman-shape
I fancy standing with our world agape?
Disguise, flee, fight against with tooth and nail
The outrageous designation! “Quack” men guai.
Before? You see, a little year ago
They heard him thunder at the thing which, lo,
To-day he vaunts for unsheathed, while what erst
Heaven-high he lauded, lies hell-low, accursed!
And yet where’s change? Who, awe-struck, cares to point
Critical finger at a dubious joint
In armor, true æs triplex, breast and back
Binding about, defiant of attack,
An imperturbability that’s — well,
Or innocence or impudence — how tell
One from the other? Could ourselves broach
lies,
Yet brave mankind with those unaltered eyes,
Those lips that keep the qustude of truth?
Dare we attempt the like? What quiock unsooth
Disturbance of thy sumny eonomy,
O coward visage! Straight would all desory Back on the man’s brow the boy’s blush once
more!
No: he goes deeper — could our sense explore — Finds conscience beneath conscience such as ours.
Genius is not so rare, — prodigious powers
Well, others boast such, — but a power like this Mondacious intrepidity — quiu vis?
Besides, imposture plays another game,
Admits of no diversion from its aim
Of captivating hearts, sets zeal aflame
In every shape at every turn, — nowhere
Allows subsidence into ash. By stroke
Of what does guile succeed but earnestness,
Earnest word, look and gesture? Touched — with aught
But earnestness, the levy were fraught With ruin to guile’s film-work. Grave is
guile;
Here no act wants its qualifying smile,
Its covert pleasantry to neutralize
PARLEYINGS WITH CERTAIN PEOPLE

The outward ardor. Can our chief despise
Even while most he seems to adulate?
As who should say "What though it be my fate
To deal with fools? Among the crowd must lure
Some few with faculty to judge my work
Spite of its way which suits, they understand,
The crass majority: — the Sacred Band,
No duping them forsooth!" So tells a touch
Of subintelligent nod and wink —
Turning foes friends. Coarse flattery moves the gurge:
Mine were the mores to awe the many, George!
They guess you half despise them while most
bent
On demonstrating that your sole intent
Strives for their service. Sneer at them?
Yourself
'Tis you disparage, — tricksy as an elf,
Scorning what most you strain to bring to pass,
Laughingly careless, — triply cased in brass,—
While pushing стремнос to the end in view,
What false love? Why, you formulate within
The vulgar headpieces this conception: "Win
A master-mind to serve us needs we must,
One who, from motives we but take on trust,
Acts strangerelle — haply wiselier than we
know.
Stronger, for certain. Did he say 'I throw
Aside my good for yours, in all I do
Care nothing for myself and all for you'—
We should both understand and disbelief:
Said he, 'Your good I laugh at in my sleeve,
My own it is I solely labor at,
 Pretending yours the while'— that, even that,
We, understanding well, give credence to,
And so will none of it. But here 'tis through
Our recognition of his service, wage
Well earned by work, he mounts to such a stage
Above competitors as all save Babb Would agonize to keep. Yet—here's the rub—
So slightly does he hold by our esteem
Which solely fixed him fast there, that we seem Mocked every minute to our face, by gibe
And jest—scorn insufficient: what ascribe
The rashness to? Our pay and praise to boot—
Do these avail him to tread under foot
Something inside us all and each, that stands
Somehow instead of somewhat which commands
'Lie not'? Folk fear to jeopardize their soul, Stumble at times, walk straight upon the
whole, —
That's nature's simple instinct: what may be
The portent here, the influence such as we Are strangers to?" —

VII
Exact the thing I call
Man's despot, just the Supernatural
Which, George, was wholly out of — far beyond
Your theory and practice. You had named
But to reject the precept "To succeed
In gratifying selfishness and greed,
Assure these such qualities exist
Nowise within yourself! than make acquies
By all means, with no sort of fear!"— Ah, at
That well-worn lie is obsolete! Fall back
On still a working pretext — "Heard at Home,
The Altar, love of England, hate of Rome"—
That's serviceable lying — that perchance
Had screened you decently: but 'were av-ance
By one step more in perspicacity
Of these our despairs! At length they get to at
As through the earlier, thus the latter piec—
And find the greed and selfishness at scarce:
Veni, etc ad triarius: last resource
Should be to what but — exquisite disdain
Disguise-abjuring, truth that looks like lies.
Frankness so sure to meet with unbelief?
Say — you hold in contempt — not then is a chief—
But first and foremost your own self! No is
In men but to make sport for you, induce
The puppets now to dance, now stand stock-
still—
Now knock their heads together, at your will
For will's sake only — while each plays its part Submissive: why? through terror at its heart:
"Can it be — this bold man, whose hand we
.Openly pull the wires, obeys some law Quite above Man's — say, God's?" On fast fall they.
This was the secret missed, again I say,
Out of your power to grasp conception of
Much less employ to purpose: Hence the saf
That greeks your very name: folk see but as Fool more, as well as know, in Dodington.

WITH FRANCIS FURINI

NAY, that, Furini, never I at least Mean to believe! What man you were I
know,
While you walked Tuscan earth, a priest-
priest,
Something about two hundred years ago.
Priest — you did duty punctual as the sun
That rose and set above Saint Sano's church.
Blessing Mugello: of your flock not one
But showed a whiter fleece because of mere.
Your kind hands wiped it clear from: ven
they poor?
Bounty broke bread space, — did marriage
For just the want of moneys that ensure Fit house-and-home provision? — straight your bag
Unplumped itself, — reached hearts by way of palmos
Goodwill's shake had but tickled. All about
Mugello valley, felt some parish qualms
At worship offered in bare walls without
The comfort of a picture? — prompt such
Our painter would supply, and through to se
Witnesed that goodness — no unholy greed
Of gain — had coaxed from Don Furini — is Whom princes might in vain implore to toil
For worldly profit — such a masterpiece.
Brief — priest, you poured profuse God's wine and oil
Praiseworthy, I know: shall praising cease
When, priestly vesture put aside, mere man,
You stand for judgment? Rather — what acclaim

"Good son, good brother, friend in whom we scan
No fault nor flaw" — salutes Furini's name,
The loving as the liberal! Enough:
Only to ope a lily, though for sake
Of setting free its scent, disturb the rough Loose gold about its anther. I shall take
No blame in one more blazon, last of all —
Good painter were you: if in very deed
I judged you great — what modern art dares call?

My word in question? Let who will take heed
Of what he seeks and misses in your brain
To balance that precision of the brush
Your hand could ply so deftly: all in vain
Strives poet's power for outlet when the push
Is lost upon a barren and bolted gate
Of painter's impotency. Agnolo
Thine were alike the head and hand, by fate
Dubiously endowed! Who boasts hand only — woe
To hand's presumption should brush emulate
Fancy's free passage by the pen, and show
Thought wrecked and ruined where the inexped
Foolhardy fingers half grasped, half let go
Film-winged the poet's pen arrests unhurt!
No — painter such as that miraculous
Michael, who deems you? But the ample gift
Of graceless walls else blank of this our house
Of life with imagery, one bright drift
Poured forth by pencil, — man and woman mere,
Glorified till half owned for gods, — the dear
Flashest perfection of the human shape,
This was apportioned you whereby to praise
Heaven and bless earth. Who clumsily essays,
By slighting painter's craft, to prove the ape
Of poet's pen-creation, just betrays
Twofold ineptitude.

II

By such sure ways
Do I return, Furini, to my first
And central confidence — that he I proved
Good priest, good man, good painter, and re-harsed
Praise upon praise to show — not simply loved
For virtue, but for wisdom honored too
Needs must Furini be, — it follows — who Shall undertake to breed in me belief
That, on his death-bed, weakness played the thief.
With wisdom, folly ousted reason quite?
List to the chronicler! With main and might —
So fame runs — did the poor soul beg his friends
To buy and burn his hand-work, make amends
For having reproduced therein — (Ah me!
Such fame — my friend, Hippo) — nudity!
Yes, I assure you: he would paint — not men

Merely — a pardonable fault — but when
He had to deal with — oh, not mother Eve
Alone, permittedly in Paradise
Naked and unashamed, — but dared achieve
Dreadful distinction, at soul-safety's price,
By also painting women — (why the need?)
Just as God made them: there, you have the truth!
Yes, roseed from top to toe in flush of youth,
One foot upon the mose-fringe, would some
Nymph
Try, with its venturesome fellow, if the lymph
Were chillier than the slab-stepped fountain-edge;
The white a-sheep her garments on its ledge
Of Boulder lay within hand's easy reach,
No one least kid-skin cast around her
Speech
Shrinks from enumerating case and case
Of — were it but Diana at the chase,
With tunie tucked discreetly hunting-high
No, some Queen Venus set our necks awry,
Turned faces from the painter's all-too-frank Triumph of flesh! For — whom had he to thank — This self-appointed nature-student? Whence Picked he up practice? By what evidence

Did he unhandsomely become adept
In simulating bodies? How except
By actual sight of such? Himself confessed
The enormity: quoth Philip, "When I pressed
The painter to acknowledge his abuse
Of artistry else potent — what excuse
Made the infatuated man? I give His very words: 'Did you but know, as I,
— 0 scruple-splitting sickly-sensitive
Mild-moralemonger, what the agony
Of Art is ere Art satisfy herself
In imitating Nature — (Man, poor elf,
Striving to match the finger-mark of Him
The immeasurably matchless) — gay or grim,
Fray, would your smile be? Leave mere fools to tax
Art's high-strung brain's intentness as so lax
That, in its mid-throes, idle fancy sees
The moment for admittance!' Pleadings these — Specious, I grant." So adds, and seems to wince Somewhat, our censor — but shall truth convince Blockheads like Baldinucci?

III

I resume
My incredulity: your other kind
Of soul, Furini, never was so blind,
Even through death-mist, as to grope in gloom
For cheer beside a bonfire piled to turn
Ashes and dust all that your noble life
Did homage to life's Lord by, — bid them burn
— These Baldinucci blockheads — pictures rife
With record, in each rendered loveliness,
That one appreciative creature's debt
Of thanks to the Creator, more or less,
Was paid according as heart'swill had met
Hand's-power in Art's endeavor to express Heaven's most consummate of achievements, bless

Earth by a semblance of the seal God set
On woman his supreme work. I trust
Rathd in some fervor of thanksgiving just
For this—that soul and body’s power you spent—
Agonized to adumbrate, trace in dust
That marvel which we dream the firmament
Copies in star-device when fancies stray
Outlining, orb by orb, Andromeda—
God’s best of beautious and magnificent
Revealed to earth—the naked female form.
Nay, I mistake not: wrath that ’s butlake-warm
Would boil indeed were such a critic styled Himself an artist: artist! Ossa piled
Topping Olympus—the absurd which crowns
The extravagant—whereat one laughs, not frowns.
Paints he? One bids the poor pretender take
His sorry self, a trouble and disgrace,
From out the sacred presence, void the place
Artists claim only. What—not merely wake
Our pity that suppressed conceppecience—
A satyr masked as matron—makes pretence
To steal among the sacred ones, crouch down
Though to where their garments sweep the floor—
—Still catching some faint sparkle from the crown
Crowning transcendent Michael, Leoniad,
Rafael,—to sit beside the feet of such,
Unturned because unnoticed, then reward
Their toation—mercy overmuch—
By stealing from the throne-step to the fools
Curious outside the gateway, all-agape
To learn by what procedure, in the schools
Of Art, a merest man in outward shape
May learn to be Correggio! Old and young.
These learners got their lesson: Art was just
A safety-screen—(Art, which Correggio’s tongue Calls “Virtue”)—for a skulking vice: mere lust
Inspired the artist when his Night and Morn
Slept and awoke in marble on that edge
Of heaven above our awe-struck earth: last-born
His Eve low bending took the privilege
Of life from what our eyes saw—God’s own palm
That put the flame forth—to the love and thanks
Of all creation save this recreant!

IV
Calm
Our phrase, Furini! Not the artist-ranks Claim ridance of an interloper: no—
This Baldinucci did but grant and sniff
Outside Art’s pale—ny, grubbed, where pies Tray ground—
For pigments only.

V
You the Sacred! If
Indeed on you has been bestowed the dower
Of Art in fulness grace of head and hand, Head—to look up not downwards, hand—of
power
To make head’s gain the portion of a world
Where else the uninstructed ones too sure
Would make all outside beauty—film that’s furled.
About a star—for the star’s self, endure
No guidance to the central glory,—ny,
(Sadder) might apprehend the film was fog,
Or (worst) wish all but vapor well away,
And sky’s pure product thickened from earth’s base—
Since so, nor seldom, have your virtues failed
To trust their own soul’s insight—why? except
For warning that the head of the adept
May too much prize the hand, work unwound
By scruple of the better sense that finds
An orb within each halo, bids gross flesh
Free the fine spirit-pattern, nor ennbaugh
More than is meet a marvel, custom binds
Only the vulgar eye to. Now, less fear
That you, the foregone grace of head and hand,
Will oft—will ever so offend! But—kip
And thigh—smite the Philistine! Ye slunk here—
Covneted at, by too easy tolerance,
Not to scrape palette simply or squeeze brush.
But dub your very self an Artist? Take—
You, of the daubings, is it, dare advance
This doctrine that the Artist-mind must needs
Own to affinity with yours—confess
Provocative acquaintance, more or less.
With each impurely-peeish worm that bres
Inside your brain’s receptacle?

VI
Enough.
Who owns “I dare not look on disdain
Without an itch to pick out, purloin gems
Others contentedly leave sparkling”—graff
Answers the guard of the regalia: “Why—
Consciously kleptomania—thrust yourself
Where your illicit craving after self
Is tempted most— in the King’s treasury?
Go elsewhere! Sort with thieves, if thus you feel—
When folk clean-handed simply recognize
Treasure whereof the mere sight satisfies—
But straight your fingers are on itch to steal—
Hence with you!"
Pray, Furini!

“Bounteous God,
Deviser and dispenser of all gifts
To soul through sense,—in Art the soul uplifts Man’s best of thanks! What but thy measure-rod
WITH FRANCIS FURINI

Gafted forth heaven and earth? more intimate,
Thy haste the busied were with the task
Making, in this human shape, a mask—
A match for that divine. Shall love abate
Man's wonder? Nowise! True—true—all too true—
No gift but, in the very pleniude
Mits perfection, goes naught, misconstrued
By wickedness or weakness: still, some few
Have grace to see thy purpose, strength to mar
Thy work by no admixture of their own,
—Lima truth not falsehood, bid us love alone
The type untampered with, the naked star!"

VIII

And prayer done, painter—what if you should preach?
Not as old when playing pulpiteer
To simple-witted folk, but here
A actual London try your powers of speech
As us the cultured, therefore skeptical—
What would you? For, suppose he has his word
A faith's behalf, no matter how absurd.
This preacher-theologian? One and all
We lend an ear—nay, science takes thereto
Encourages the meanest who has racked
Nature until he gains from her some fact,
To state what truth is from his point of view,
Here pin-point though it be: since many such Endeavors to make a whole, she hides our task
Some forward unabashed and haply lend
His little life-experience to our much Modern knowledge. Since she so insists
Is stands Furini.

IX

"Evolutionists!"
At truth I glimpse from depths, you glance from heights,
Our stations for discovery opposite,—
How should cause a grateful? I explain:
T is the tip-top of things to which you strain
Your vision, until atoms, protoplasm,
And what and whence and how may be the Spasm.
Which better all going, stop you: down perforce
Needs must your observation take its course,
Since there's no moving upwards: link by link
You drop to where the atoms somehow think.
Feel, know themselves to be: the world's Begun,
Such as we recognize it. Have you done Descending? Here's ourself,—Man, known
to-day,
July evolved at last,—so far, you say,
The sum and seal of being's progress. Good!
Thus much at least is clearly understood
Power does Man possess no particle:
Knowledge—just so much as shows that still
It ends in ignorance on every side:
But righteousness—ah, Man is deified
Thereby, for compensation! Make survey
Of Man's surroundings, try creation—nay,
By emulation of the minimized
Minuteness fancy may conceive! Surprised
Reason becomes by two defeats for one—
Not only power at each phenomenon
Baffled, but knowledge also in default—
Asking what is minuteness—yonder vault
Speckled with suns, or this the millionth—
thing.
How shall I call?—that on some insect's wing
Helps to make out in dyse the mimic star?
Weak, ignorant, accordingly we are:
What then? The worse for Nature! Where began
Righteousness, moral sense except in Man?
True, he makes nothing; understands no whct
Had the initiator-apseen seen fit
Thus doubly to endow him, the worse
And much the better were the universe.
What does Man see or feel or apprehend
Here, there, and everywhere, but faults to mend,
Omissions to supply,—one wide disease
Of things that are, which Man at once would ease
Had will but power and knowledge? failing both—
Things must take will for deed—Man, nowise loft,
Accepts pre-eminency: mere blind force
Mere knowledge undirected in its course
By any care for what is made or marred
In either's operation—these award
The crown to? Rather let it deck thy brows,
Man, whom alone a righteousness endows
Would cure the wide world's ailing! Who disputes
Thy claim thereto? Had Spam more attributes
Than power and knowledge in its gift, before
Man came to pass? The higher that we soar,
The less of moral sense like Man's we find:
No sign of such before,—what comes behind,
Who guesses! But until there crown our sight
The quite new—not the old mere infinite
Of changes,—some fresh kind of sun and moon,—
Then, not before, shall I expect a boon
Of intuition just as strange, which turns
Evil to good, and wrong to right, unlearns
All Man's experience learned since Man was he.
Accept in Man, advanced to this degree,
The Prime Mind, therefore! neither wise nor strong—
Whose fault? but were he both, then right, not wrong
As now, throughout the world were paramount
According to his will,—which I account
The qualifying faculty. He stands
Confessed supreme—the monarch whose commands
Could he enforce, how bettered were the world! He's at the height this moment—to be hurried
Next moment to the bottom by rebound
Of his own peal of laughter. All around
Ignorance wraps him,—whence and how and why
Things are,—yet cloud breaks and lets blink
The sky
Just overhead, not elsewhere! What assures
His optics that the very blue which lures
Comes not of black outside it, doubly dense?
Ignorance overwraps his moral sense,
PARLEYS WITH CERTAIN PEOPLE

Winds him about, relaxing, as it wraps,
So much and no more than lets through perhaps
The murmured knowledge — 'ignorance exists.'

"I at the bottom, Evolutionists,
Advise beginning, rather. I profess
To know just one fact — my self-consciousness,
"Twixt ignorance and ignorance ensnared, —
Knowledge: before me was my Cause — that's styled
God: after, in due course succeeds the rest, —
All that my knowledge comprehends — at best.
At worst, conceives about in mild despair.
Light needs must touch on either darkness: where?
Knowledge so far impinges on the Cause
Before me, that I know — by certain laws
Wholly unknown, whatever I apprehend.
Within, without me, had its rise: thus blend
I, and all things perceived, in one Effect.
How far can knowledge any ray project
On what comes after me — the universe?
Well, my attempt to make the cloud disperse
 Begins — not from above but underneath:
I climb, you soar, — who soars soon loses breath
And sinks, who climbs keeps one firm foot on fact
Ere hazarding the next step: soul's first act
(Call consciousness the soul — some name we get)
Getting itself aware, through stuff decreed
Therefore (so call the body) — who has slept
So far, there let him stand, become adept
In body ere he shift his station thence
One single hair's breadth. Do I make pretence
To teat, myself unskilled in learning? Lo,
My life's work! Let my pictures prove I know
Somewhat of what this fleshly frame of ours
Or is or should be, how the soul empowers
The body to reveal its every mood
Of love and hate, joy's triumph, its plenitude
Of passion. If my hand attained to give
Thus permanence to truth else fugitive,
Did not I also fix each fleeting grace
Of form and feature — save the beauteous face?

Arrest decay in transitory might
Of bone and muscle — cause the world to bless
Forever each transcendent nakedness
Of man and woman? Were such facts achieved
By sloth, or strenuous labor unrelied,
Yet lavished vainly? Ask that underground
(For may I speak) of all on surface found
Of flesh-perfection! Depths on depths to probe
Of all-inventive artifice, dirobro
Marvel at hiding under marvel, plush
Veil at veil from Nature — were the luck
Ours to surprise the secret men so name,
That still eludes the searcher — all the same,
Repays his search with still fresh proof — "Externe,
Not immost is the Cause, fool! Look and learn!

There did I plant my first foot. And the next?
Nowhere. ‘T was put forth and withdrawn perplexed.
At touch of what seemed stable and sound stuff
Such as the colored clouds are: plain enough
They lay the outside universe: try Man —
My most immediate! and the dip began
From safer no solid into that profund
Of ignorance I tell you surges round
My rock-spit of self-knowledge. Well and ill,
Evil and good irreconcilable
Above, beneath, about my every side, —
How did this wild confusion far and wide
Tally with my experience when my stamp —
So far from stirring — struck out, each a lamp,
Spark after spark of truth from where I stood.
Pedestalled triumph? Evil there was good,
Want was the promise on supply, defect
Ensured completion, — where and when and how?
Leave that to the First Cause! Enough that now,
Here where I stand, this moment's me and me
Shows me what is, permits me to divine
What shall be. Wherefore? Nay, how otherwise?
Look at my pictures! What so glorifies
The body that the permeating soul
Finds not a particle else where to confine Direct, or fail of duty, — most obscure
When most subervient? Did that Cause ensure
The soul such raptures as its fancy stings
Body to furnish when, uplift by wings
Of passion, here and now, it leaves the earth.
Losses itself above, where bliss has birth —
(Heaven, be the phrase) — did that same Cause contrive
Such solace for the body, soul must dive
At drowsy, fan's pipion, condescend
To bury both alike on earth, our friend
And fellow, where minutely exquisites
Low lie the pleasures, now and here — no herb
But hides its marvel, peace no doubts perturb
In each small mystery of insect life —
Shall the soul's Cause thus gift the soul, yet strive Continue still of fears with hopes, — for why?
What if the Cause, whereof we now desery
So far the wonder-working, lack at least
Will, power, benevolence — a protoplast,
No consummator, sealing up the sum
Of all things, — past and present and to come Perfection? No, I have no doubt at all!
There's my amount of knowledge — great or small Sufficient for my needs: for see! advance
Its light now on that depth of ignorance
I shrank before from — wonder where the world
Lies wreck-strung, — evil towering, prose good — buried
From pride of place, on every side. For me
WITH FRANCIS FURINI
969

Patience, beessooh you !) knowledge can but be
Of good by knowledge of good’s opposite —
Evil, — since, to distinguish wrong from right,
Both must be known in each extreme, beside —
(Or what means knowledge — to aspire or bide Content with half-attaining? Hardly so!)
Made to know on, know ever, I must know
All to be known at any halting-stage
Of my soul’s progress, such as earth, where wage
War, just for soul’s instruction, pain with joy,
Folly with wisdom, all that works annoy
With all that quiets and contents, — in brief,
Good strives with evil.

"Now then for relief,
Friends, of your patience kindly curbed so long.
‘What? ’ smarly you, ‘is the fool’s conceit thus strong?
Must the whole outside world in soul and sense
Suffer, that he grow sage at its expense?’
By no means! ’Tis by merest touch of toe
I try — not trench on — ignorance, just know —
And so keep steady footing: how you fare,
Caught in the whirlpool — that’s the Cause’s
are,
Strong, wise, good, — this I know at any rate
In my own self, — but how may operate
With you — strength, wisdom, goodness — no least blink
Of know — breaks the darkness round me.
Think!
Could I see plain, be somehow certified
All was illusion, — evil far and wide
Was good disguised, — why, out with one huge wipe
Goes knowledge from me. Type needs anti-type:
‘As night needs day, as shine needs shade, so good
Needs evil: how were pity understood
Unless by pain? Make evident that pain
Permission’s a masks pleasure — you abstain
From outstretched of the finger-tip that saves
A drowning fly. Who provests help of hand
To weak Andromeda exposed on strand
At mercy of the monster? Were all true,
Help were not wanting: ‘But ‘tis false,’ cry
you.
‘Mere fancy-work of paint and brush!’ No
less,
Were mine the skill, the magic, to impress
Beholders with a confidence they saw
Life, — veritable flesh and blood in awe
Of just as true a sea-beast, — would they stare
Simply as now, or cry out, curse and swear,
Or call the gods to help, or cast up stick
And stone, according as their hearts were quick
Or sluggish? Well, some old artificer
Could do as much, — at least, so books aver, —
Able to make believe, while I, poor wight, Make fancy, nothing more. Though wrong were right,
Could not be but know — still wrong must needs
appear wrong
To do right’s service, prove men weak or strong,

Choosers of evil or of good. ‘No such
Illusion possible!’ Ah, friends, you touch
Just here my solid standing-place amid
The wash and watter, whences all doubts are bid
Back to the ledge they break against in foam.
Futility: my soul, and my soul’s home
This body, — how each operates on each,
And how things outside, fact or feigning, teach
What good is and what evil, — just the same,
Be feigning or be fact the teacher, — blame
Diffidence nowise if, from this I judge
My point of vantavge, not an inch I budge.
All — for myself — seems ordered wise and
well
Inside it, — what reigns outside, who can tell?
Contrariwise, who needs be told? The space
Which yields thee knowledge, — do its bounds embraces
Well-willing and wise-working, each at height?
Enough: beyond thee lies the infinite
Back to thy circumscription!

"Back indeed!
Ending where I began — thus: retrocede,
Who will, — what comes first, take first, I advise!
Acquaint you with the body ere your eyes
Look upward: this Andromeda of mine —
Gaze on the beauty, Art hangs out for sign
There’s finer seen invisible underneath,
Learn how they ministrance to life and death —
Those inconceivably marvellous
Contrivances which furnish forth the house Where soul has sway! Though Master keep aloof,
Signs of his presence multiply from roof
To basement of the building. Look around,
Learn thoroughly, — no fear that you confound
Master with messuage! He’s away, no doubt,
But what if, all at once, you come upon
A startling proof — not that the Master gone
Was present lately — but that something — whence
Light comes — has pushed him into residence?
Was such the symbol’s meaning, — old, uncouth?
That circle of the serpent, tail in mouth?
Only by looking low, are looking high,
Comes penetration of the mystery."

Thanks! After sermonizing, psalmody!
Now praise with pencil, Painter! Fools attain
Your fame, forsooth, because its power inclines
To livelier colors, more attractive lines
Than suit some orthodox sad sickly saint — Gray male emaciation, haply streaked
Carmine by scourgings — or they want, far worse —
Some self-scathed woman, framed to bless not curse
Nature that loved the form whereon hate wreaked
The wrongs you see. No, rather paint some full Bannigration, the first and foremost boon
Of youth, health, strength, — show beauty’s
May, ere June
PARLEYINGS WITH CERTAIN PEOPLE

Undo the bud's blush, leave a rose to call
— Nappy, neither! yet less perfect—pure,
Divinely-precious with life's dew besprent.
Show saintliness that's simply innocent.
Of guessing sinnership exists to cure
All in good time! In time let age advance
And teach that knowledge helps—not ignorance.

The healing of the nations. Let my spark Quicken your tinder! Burn with — Joan of
Are!
Not at the end, nor midway when there grew
The brave delusions, when rare fancies flew
Before the eyes, and in the ears of her
Strange voices woke imperiously astride:
No, — paint the peasant girl all peasant-like,
Spirit and flesh — the hour about to strike
When this should be transfigured, that inflamed.

By heart's admonishing "Thy country shamed,
Thy king shut out of all his realm except
One sorry corner!" and to life forth leapt
The indubitable lightning "Can there be Country and king's salvation — all through me?"
Memorize that burst's moment, Francis! Tush —
None of the nonsense-writing! Fittler brush
Shall clear off fancy's film-work and let show
Not what the foolish feign but the wise know —
Ask Grotte-Rouve else! — or better, Quicherat,
The downright-digger into truth that's — Bah,
Bettered by fiction? Well, of fact thus much
Concerns you, that "of prudishnes no touch
From first to last defaced the maid; anon,
Camp-use compelling" — what says D'Alen-Her fast friend? — "though I saw while she undressed
How fair she was — especially her breast —
Never had I a wild thought!" — as indeed
I nowise doubt. Much less would she take heed —
When eve came, and the lake, the hills around
Were all one solitude and silence, — found Barriered impenetrably safe about, —
Take heed of interloping eyes shut out,
But quietly permit the air imbibe
Her naked beauty till... but hear the scribe!

Now as she fain would bathe, one even-tide,
God's maid, this Joan, from the pool's edge she ripped
The fair blue bird clowns call the Fisher-king;
And "I saw, sighed she, my Liege is such a thing
As thou, lord but of one poor lonely place
Out of his whole wide France: were mine the grace
To set my Dauphin free as thou, blue bird!"
Properly Martin-fisher — that's the word,
Not yours nor mine: folk said the rustic oath
In common use with her was — "By my troth"?
No, — "By my Martin!" Paint this! Only, turn
Her face away — that face about to burn
Into an angel's when the time is ripe!

That task's beyond you. Finished, France!

Wipe
Pencil, scrape palette, and retire content!
"Omnis non omnis" — no harm is meant!

WITH GERARD DE LAIRRESSE

The Art of Painting by Gerard le Lairesse, translated by J. F. Ritsch, was the "tome" a which Browning refers as having interested his when he was a boy and so given rise to his poem. The song at the end of the poem was first printed in a small volume called The Amphion, published for the Edinburgh University Union Fancy Fair in 1886.

I

AH, but — because you were struck blind could bless
Your sense no longer with the actual view
Of man and woman, those fair forms you saw
In happier days so daintily and true, —
Must I account my Gerard de Lairesse
All sorrow-smitten? He was hindered too
Was this no hardship? — from profane
plain
To us who still have eyes, the pageantry
Which passed and passed before his busy lens
And, captured on his canvas, showed ourly Traversed by flying shapes, earth stocked with broom
Of monsters: — centaurs bestial, satyrs leery,
Not without much Olympian glory, shapes
Of god and goddess in their gray escapes
From the severe serené: or haply paced
The antique ways, god-counselled, nymphsbraced,
Some early human kingly personage.
Such wonders of the teeming post-age
Were still to be: nay, these indeed began —
Are not the pictures extant? — till the last
Of blindness struck both palette from his thumb
And pencil from his finger.

II

Blind — not dumb
Else, Gerard, were my inmost bowels stirred
With pity beyond pity: no, the word
Was left upon your unmoistened lips
Your mouth unsealed, despite of eyes' edges.
Talked all brain's yearning into birth. I seek Somehow the heart to wish your practice best
Which boasted hand's achievement in a scene
Of veritable pictures, less or more,
Still to be seen: myself have seen thee —

To pay due homage to the man I loved
Because of that prodigious book he wrote
On Artistry's Ideal, by taking note
Making acquaintance with his artist-works.
So my youth's piecy obtained success
Of all the dubious sort: for, though it irk
To tell the issue, few or none would pass
From extant lines and colors, De Lairesse,
WITH GERARD DE LAIRESSE

Your faculty, although each deftly-grouped
And aptly-ordered figure-piece was judged
Worthy a prince's purchase in its day.
Beardied experience bears not to be duped
Like boyish fancy: It was a boy that budged
No foot's breath from your yointed steps away.
The while that memorable "Walk" he trudged
In your companionship,—the Book must say
Where, when and whither,—"Walk," come
What come may,
No measurer of steps on this our globe
Shall ever match for marvils. Faustus' robe,
And Fortunatus' cap were gifts of price:
But—oh, your piece of sober sound advice
That artists should descry abundant worth
In trivial commonplaces, nor groan at dearth
If fortune bade the painter's craft be plied
In vulgar town and country! Why despond
Because hemmed round by Dutch canals?

Beyond
The ugly actual, lo on every side
Imagination's limitless domain
Displayed a wealth of wondrous sounds and sights
Ripe to be realized by poet's brain.
Acting on painter's brush! "Ye doubt?
Poor sights,
What look I see example, go before,
While you come after, and we both explore
Holland turned Dreamland, taking care to note
Objects whereto my pupils may devote Attention with advantage."

III

So commenced
That "Walk" amid true wonders—none to you,
But huge to us ignobly common-seas'd,
Furbright, while plain could proper optics view
In that old sepulchre by lightning split,
Whereof the lid bore carven,—any doll
Imagines why,—Jove's very thunderbolt:
You who could straight perceive, by glance at it,
This tomb must needs be Phaeton's! In a trio,
Confirming that conjecture, close on hand,
Behold, half out, half in the ploughed-up sand,
A chariot-wheel explained its bolt-device:
What other than the Chariot of the Sun
Ever let drop the like? Consult the tome
I bid inglorious terrarists-at-home
For greater still surprise the while that "Walk"
Went on and on, to end as it begun,
Chokeful of chances, changes, every one
No whit less wondrous. What was there to tuck
Us, who had eyes, from seeing? You with none
Missed not a marvel: wherefore? Let us talk.

IV

Say am I right? Your scaled sense moved your mind.
Free from obstruction, to compassionate
Art's power left powerless, and supply the blind
With fancies worth all facts denied by fate.
Mind could invent things, add to—take away,
At pleasure, leave out trifles mean and base
Which vex the sight that cannot say them nay
But, where mind plays the master, have no place.
And bent on banishing was mind, be sure,
All except beauty from its mustered tribe
Of objects appurtenant which lure
Painter to show and poet to describe
That imagery of the antique song
Truer than truth's self. Fancy's rainbow-birth
Conceived 'mid clouds in Greece, could glance along
Your passage o'er Dutch veritable earth,
As with ourselves who see, familiar thong
About our pasings men and women worth
Nowise a glance—so poets apprehend
Since naught avails portraying them in verse:
While painters turn upon the heel, intend
To spare their work the critic's ready curse
Due to the daily and undignified.

V

I who myself contentedly abide Awake, nor want the wings of dream,—who tramp
Earth's common surface, rough, smooth, dry or damp,
— I understand alternatives, no less
Conceive your soul's leap, Gerard de Laireesse!
How were it could I mingle false with true,
Beast, with the souls I see, your vision too?
Advantage would it prove or detriment
If I saw double? Could I gaze intent
On Dryope plucking the blossoms red,
As you, whereat her lote-tree wrathed and bled,
Yet lose no gain, no hard fast wide-awake
Having and howling nature for the sake
Of nature only—nymph and lote-tree thus
Gained by the loss of fruit not fabulous,
Apple of English homesteads, where I see
Nor seek more than crisp buds a struggling bee
Unrumples, caught by sweet he clammers through?
Truly, a moot point: make it plain to me,
Who, bee-like, sate sense with the simply true,
Nor seek to heighten that sufficiency
By help of feignings proper to the page
Earth's surface-blank whereas the elder age
Put color, poetizing—poured rich life
On what were else a dead ground—nothingness—
Until the solitary world grew rife
With Joves and Junos, nymphs and satyrs. Yes,
The reason was, fancy compos'd this strife
'Twixt sense and soul: for sense, my De Lairesse,
Cannot content itself with outward things,
Mere beauty: soul must needs know whence there springs—
How, when and why—what sense but loves nor lists
To know at all.

VI

Not one of man's acquisits
Ought he resignedly to lose, methinks:
So, point me out which was it of the links
Snapt first, from out the chain which used to bind
Our earth to heaven, and yet for you, since blind,
Subsisted still efficient and intact?
PARLEYINGS WITH CERTAIN PEOPLE

Oh, we can fancy too! but somehow fact
Has got to—say, not so much push aside
Fancy, as to declare its place supplied
By fact unseen but no less fact the same,
Which mind bids sense accept. Is mind to blame,
Or sense, too, does that nauseous, this abdicate?
First of all, as you "walked" ——- were it too late
For us to walk, if so we will'd? Confess
We have the sober feet still, De Lairese!
Why not the freakish brain too, that must needs
Supplement nature — not see flowers and weeds
Simply as such, but link with each and all
The ultimate perfection — what we call
Rightly enough the human shape divine?
The rose? No rose unless it disentwine
From Venus' wreath the while she bends to kiss
Her deathly love?

Plain retrogression, this!
No, no: we poets go not back at all:
What you did we could do — from great to small Sinking assuredly: if this world last
One moment — song when man finds its Past
Exceed its Present — blame the Proteus!
If we no longer see as you of old,
"Tis we see deeper. Progress for the bold!
You saw the body, 't is the soul we see.
Try now! Bear witness while you walk with me,
I see of you, if we loose arms, stop pace,
"Tis that you stand still. I conclude the race
Without your company. Come, walk once more
The "Walk": if I to-day as you of yore
See just like you the blind — then sight shall cry
— The whole long day quite gone through — Victory!

VIII

Thunders on thunders, doubling and redoubling
Doom o'er the mountain, while a white sharp wind
Now alone, now shored its rusty herbage, troubling
Hardly the fir-boles, now discharged its ire
Full where some pine-tree's solitary spire
Crashed down, defiant to the last: till — lo,
The motive of the malice! — all aglow
Circled with flame there yawned a sudden rift
I' the rock-face, and I saw a form erect
Front of defy the outrage, while — as check'd,
Chidden, beside him dauntless in the drift —
Cowered a heaped creature, wing and wing outspread
In deprecation o'er the crouching head
Still hungry for the feast foregone awhile.
O thou, of scorn's unconquerable smile,
Was it when this — Jove's feathered fury —
Slipped
Gore-glutted from the heart's core whence he ripped
This eagle-hound — neither reproach nor prayer
Baffled, in one more fierce attempt to tear
Fate's secret from thy safeguard, — was it then
That all these thunders rent earth, ruined air
To reach thee, pay thy patronage of men?
He thundered, — to withdraw, as beast to lair,

Before the triumph on thy pallid brow.
Gather the night again about thee now:
Hate on, love ever! Morn is breaking then —
The granite ridge pricks through the mist, turns gold
As wrong turns right. O laughers manifold
Of ocean's ripple at dull earth's despair!

IX

But morning's laugh sits all the crags a light
Above the baffled tempest: tree and tree
Stir themselves from the stupor of the night.
And every strangled branch resumes its right
To breathe, shakes loose dark's clinging drap — waves clear
In dripping glory. Prone the rummels plunge.
While earth, distant with moisture like a sponge
Smokes up, and leaves each plant its gem to see.
Each grass-blade's glory-glitter.
Hast I known
The torrent now turned river? — manorial
Making its rush o'er tangled ravage — stone
And stub which barred the froths and fowses:
— no bull
Ever broke bounds in formidable sport
More overwhirlingly, all the, the spears
Sets him to dare that last mad leap: report
Who may — his fortunes in the deathly chase
That swallows him in silence! Rather turn
Whither, upon the upland, pedestalled
Into the broad day-splendor, whom discourses
These eyes but thee, supreme one, rightly called Moon-maid in heaven above and, here below.
Earth's huntress-queen? I note the garb ex-сinct
Saving from smirch that purity of snow
From breast to knee — snow's self with just the shine
Of the apple-blossom's heart-bluish. Ah, the bow
Slack-strung her fingers grasp, where, ivory-linked
Horn curving blends with horn, a moonlike pax
Which mimick the brow's crescent sparkling as
As if a star's live restless fragment winked
Proud yet repugnant, captive in such hair!
What hope along the hillside, what fair bliss
Lots the crisp hair-plaits fall so low they kiss
Those incised shoulders? Must a morn so bright
Needs have its sorrow when the tramp and kick
Tell that from out thy sheaf one shaft makes writhe
Its victim, thou unerring Artemis?
Why did the chamois stand so fair a mark
Arrested by the novel shape he dreamed
Was bred of liquid marble in the dark
Depths of the mountain's womb which ever teemed
With novel births of wonder? Not one spark
Of pity in that steel-gray glance which glanced
At the poor howf's protesting as it stamped
Idly the granite? Let me glide unseen
From thy proud presence: wall mayst thou be queen
Of all those strange and sudden deaths which dumbed
So oft Love's torch and Hymen's taper lit
For happy marriage till the maidens paled
And perished on the temple-step, assailed
WITH GERARD DE LAIRESSE

by — what except to envy must man's wit
impute that sure implacable release
If life from warmth and joy? But death means peace.

x

Soon is the conqueror, — not a spray, nor leaf,
Nor herb, nor blossom but has rendered up
Its morning dew; the valley seemed one cup
Of cloud-smoke, but the vapor's reign was brief;
Small-sent, see, it hangs — the filmy haze —
In-hermetting the herbless mountain-side,
To soothe the day's sharp glare: while far and wide

Above unclouded burns the sky, one blaze
With fierce immittable blue, no bird ventures to spot by passage. 'E'en of peaks
Which still presume there, plain each pale point speaks

A wan transparency of waste incurred
'By over-endear: far from me be such!

Deep in the hollow, rather, where combine Free, shrub and brier to roof with shade and cool
The remnant of some lily-strangled pool.

Edged round with mossy fringing soft and fine.
New grass, with bottom slabs, and overhead
Watch elder, bramble, rose, and service-tree
And one beneficent rich barberry

Swell'd all over with fruit-pendants red.
What have I seen? O Satyr, well I know
How sad thy case, and what a world of woe
Was hid by the brown visage furry-framed

Only for mirth: who otherwise could think Marking thy mouth gape still on laughter's brink,

Thine eyes a-swim with merriment unnamed
But haply guessed at by their furtive wink?
And all the while a heart was panting sick
Behind that shaggy bulkwark of thy breast —
Passion it was that made those breath-bursts thick

I took for mirth subsiding into rest,

So filmy but now, discard no rose;
Sombre throughout the fleeciness that grows
A sullen uniformity I note.
Rather displeasure, — in the overspread
Change from the swim of gold to one pale lead

Oppressive to malevolence, — than late
Those amorous yearnings when the aggregate
Of cloudlets pressed that each and all might sate
Its passion and partake in revels red

Of day's bequestment: now, a brown instead
Estranges, and affrights who needs must fare
On and on till his journey ends: but where?

Causers? Lost now in the night. Away
And far enough lies that Arcadia.
The human heroes tread the world's dark way
No longer. Yet I dimly see almost —

Yes, for my last adventure! 'T is a ghost.

So drops away the beauty! There he stands Voiceless, scarce strives with deprecating
hands...

xi

Now, what should this be for? The sun's decline
Seems as he lingered lest he lose some act
Dread and decisive, some prodigies fact
Like thunder from the safe sky's sapphire
About to alter earth's conditions, packed
With fate for nature's self that waits, aware
What mischief unsuspected in the air
Menace momentarily a catastrophe.

Therefore it is that yonder space extends Untrenched upon by any vagrant tree,
Shrub, weed well-nigh; they keep their bounds, leave free
The platform for what actors? Foes or friends, Here come they trooping silent: heaven suspends
Purpose the while they range themselves. I see!

Bent on a battle, two vast powers agree
This present and no after-contest ends
One or the other's grasp at rule in reach
Over the race of man — host fronting host,
As statue statue fronts — wrath-molten each,
Solidified by hate, — earth halved almost,

To close once more in chaos. Yet two shapes
Show prominent, each from the universe
Of minions round about him, that disperse
Like cloud-obstruction when a bolt escapes.
Who flames first? Macedonian, is it thou?

Aye, and who front thee, King Darius, drapes
His form with purple, fillet-folds his brow.

XII

What, then the long day dies at last? Abrupt
The sun that seemed, in stooping, sure to melt
Our mountain-ridge, is master'd: black the belt
Of westward crags, his gold could not corrupt,
Barriers again the valley, lets the flow
Of lavish glory waste itself away

Whither? For new olives, fresh eyes breaks

the day!

Night was not to be baffled. If the glow
Were all that's gone from us! Did clouds, afloat

So filmy but now, discard no rose;

Sombre throughout the fleeciness that grows
A sullen uniformity I note.
Rather displeasure, — in the overspread
Change from the swim of gold to one pale lead

Oppressive to malevolence, — than late
Those amorous yearnings when the aggregate
Of cloudlets pressed that each and all might sate
Its passion and partake in revels red

Of day's bequestment: now, a brown instead
Estranges, and affrights who needs must fare
On and on till his journey ends: but where?

Causers? Lost now in the night. Away
And far enough lies that Arcadia.
The human heroes tread the world's dark way
No longer. Yet I dimly see almost —

Yes, for my last adventure! 'T is a ghost.

So drops away the beauty! There he stands
Voiceless, scarce strives with deprecating
hands...

XIII

Enough! Stop further fooling, De Lairesse!
My fault, not yours! Some fitter way express
Heart's satisfaction that the Past indeed
Is past, gives way before Life's best and last.
The all-including Future! What were life
Did soul stand still therein, forego her strife
Through the ambiguous Present to the goal
Of some all-reconciling Future? Soul,
Nothing has been which shall not bettered be Hereafter, — leave the root, by law's decrees
Whence springs the ultimate and perfect tree!
PARLEYINGS WITH CERTAIN PEOPLE

Busy thee with unearthing root? Nay, climb —
Quit trunk, branch, leaf and flower — reach, rest sublime
Where fruitage ripens in the blaze of day!
O'erlook, despise, forget, throw flower away,
Intent on process? Nor whiter than stop
Ascent therewith to daily, screen the top
Sufficiency of yield by interposed
Twistwork bold foot gets free from. Wherefore glozed
The poets — "Dream afarsh old godlike shapes,
Reap-cupt ancient fable that escapes,
Fush back reality, repose earth,
With varnished falseness, recognize no worth
In fact new-born unless 'tis rendered back
Fallid by fancy, as the western rack
Of fading cloud bequeaths the lake some gleam
Of its gone glory!"

Let things be — not seem,
I counsel rather, — do, and nowise dream!
Earth's young significance is all to learn:
The dead Greek lors lies buried in the urn
Where who seeks fire finds ashes. Ghost, forsooth!
What was the best Greece babbled of as truth?
"A shade, a wretched nothing, — sad, thin, a dream.
Cold, dark, it holds on to the lost loves here,
If hand has haply sprinkled o' er the dead
Three charitable dust-heaps, made mouth red
One moment by the sip of sacrifices;
Just so much comfort thaw's the stubborn ice
Slow-thickening upward till it choke at length
The last faint flutter, reposeing earth — not for strength,
Not beauty, not the riches and the rule
O'er men that made life life indeed." Sad school
Was Hades! Gladly, — might the dead but sink
To life back, — to the drags once more would drink
Each interloper, drain the humblest cup
Fate mixes for humanity.

Cheer up, —
Be death with me, as with Achilles erst,
Of Man's calamities the last and worst:
Take it so! By proved potency that still Makes perfect, be assured, come what come will,
What once lives never dies — what here attains
To a beginning, has no end, still gains
And never loses aught: when, where, and how —
Lies in Law's lap. What's death then? Even now
With so much knowledge is it hard to bear
Brief interposing ignorance? Is care
For a creation found at fault just there —
There where the heart breaks bond and out-runs time,
To reach not follow what shall be?

Here's rhyme
Such as one makes now, — say, when Spring repeats
That miracle the Greek Bard sadly greeets:
"Spring for the tree and herb — no Spring's us!"
Let Spring come: why, a man salutes thus:
Dance, yellow and white and reds, —
Lead your gay orgy, leaves, stalks, heads
Astir with the wind in the tulip-beds!
There's sunshine; scarcely a wind at all
Disturb starved grass and daisies small
On a certain mound by a churchyard wall.
Daisies and grass be my heart's bedfellows
On the mound wind spaces and sunshine shews:
Dance you, reds and whites and yellows!

WITH CHARLES AVISON

The manuscript of the Grand March written by Avison was in the possession of Browning's father, and a copy is given at the end of this poem. The Reify is who is two or three times mentioned was Browning's teacher of music, who was a learned contrapuntist.

How strange! — but, first of all, the little fast
Which led my fancy forth. This bitter men
Showed me no object in the stretch forors
Of garden-ground beneath my window, backed
By your wall wherefrom the crespit tackled
To clothe its brickwork, hangs now, rest, and raked
By five months' cruel winter, — showed so tan
And tattered savage worse for eyes to see
Than just one ugly space of clearance, left Bare even of the bones which used to be Warm wrappage, safe embracement: this one clief —
— Oh, what a life and beauty filled it up
Startlingly, when methought the rude clay cup
Ran over with poured bright wine! This was a Bird
Breast-deep there, tugging at his prize, deterred
No whlt by the fast-falling snow-flake; gain
Such prize my blackcap must by might and main —
The cloth-shred, still a-flutter from its nail
That fixed a spray once. Now, what told this tale
To thee, — no townsman but born orchard-thief,
—
That here — surpassing moss-tuft, beard from sheaf
Of sun-scored barley, horsehairs long and stout,
All proper country-pillage — here, no doubt.
Was just the scrap to steal; should line thy nest
Superbly? Off he flew, his bill possessed
The booty sure to set his wife's each wing
Greenly a-quiver. How they climb and chug.
Hang parrot-wise to bough, these blackcops!
Strange
Seems to a city-dweller that the finch
Should stray so far to forage: at a pinch,
Was not the fine wool's self within his range
— Flichings on every fence? But no: the need
Was of this rag of mannfacture, spoiled
By nature, yet by nature made unsuited,
New-suited to what scheming finch would breed
In comfort, this uncomfortable March.

II
Yet — by the first pink blossom on the larch!

This was scarce stranger than that memory,—
In want of what should cheer the stay-at-home,
My soul,—must straight clap pinion, well-nigh roam
A century back, nor once close plumes, desery
The appropriate rag to plunder, till she pounced:
Pray, on what relic of a brain long still?
What old-world work proved forage for the mill
Of memory the far-flyer? "March" announced,
I verily believe, the dead and gone
Name of a music-maker: one of such
In England as did little or did much,
But reposing, had their day once. Avison!
Singly and solely for an air of thine,
Bold-stepping "March," foot stept to ere my hand
Could stretch an octave, I o'erlooked the band
Of majesties familiar, to decline
On thee — not too conspicuous on the list
Of worthies who by help of pipe or wire
Expressed in sound rough rage or soft desire —
Thou, whilom of Newcastle organist!

III
So much could one — well, thinnish air effect!
Am I ungrateful? for, your March, styled
"Grand," Did veritably seem to grow, expand,
And greaten up to title as, unchecked,
Dream-marchers marched, kept marching, slow and sure,
In time, to tune, unchangeably the same,
From nowhere into nowhere, — out they came,
Onward they passed, and in they went. No lurs
Of novel modulation pricked the flat
Forthright persisting melody, — no hint
That discord, sound aseep beneath the flint,
Struck — might spring spark-like, claim due tit-for-tat, Quenched in a concord. No! Yet, such the might
Of quietude's immutability,
That somehow coldness gathered warmth, well-nigh
Quickeased — which could not be! — grew burning-bright
With fife-shriek, cymbal-clash and trumpet-blare,
To drum-assentuation: pacing turned
Striding, and striding grew gigantic, spurred
At last the narrow space "twixt earth and air,
So shook me back into my sober self.

IV
And where woke I? The March had set me down
There whence I plucked the measure, as his brown
Frayed flannel-bit my blackcop. Great John Relfe,
Master of mine, learned, redoubtable,
It little needed thy consummate skill
To fit means such a bass! The key
Was — should not memory play me false — well, C.
Ay, with the Greater Third, in Triple Time,
Three crochets to a bar: no change, I grant,
Except from Tonic down to Dominant.
And yet — and yet — if I could put in rhyme
The manner of that marching! — which had stopped
— I wonder, where? — but that my weak self dropped
From out the ranks, to rub eyes discommoded
And feel that, after all the way advanced,
Back must I foot it, I and my compleys,
Only to reach, across a hundred years,
The bandsman Avison whose little book
And large tune thus had led me the long way
(As late a rag my blackcop) from to-day
And to-day’s music-manufacture, — Brahms,
Wagner, Dvorak, Liszt,— to where — trumpets, shawms,
Show yourselves joyful! — Handel reigns — supreme?
By no means! Buononcini’s work is theme
For fit laudation of the impartial few:
(We stand in England, mind you!) Fashion too
Favors Gemini — of those choice
Concertos: nor there wants a certain voice
Raised in thy favor likewise, famed Poppusch
Dear to our great-grandfathers! In a bush
Of Doctor’s wig, they prized thee timing beats
While Greenway trilled "Alexis." Such were feats
Of music in thy day — dispute who list —
Avison, of Newcastle organist!

And here’s your music all alive once more —
As once it was alive, at least: just so
The figured worthies of a waxwork-show
Attest — such people, years and years ago,
Looked thus when outside death had life below,
— Could say "We are now" not "We were of yore,
— "Feel how our pulses leap!" and not "Ex-plore—
Explain why quietude has settled o’er
Surface once all awork!" Ay, such a “Suite” Roused heart to rapture, such a “Fugue” would catch
Soul heavenwards up, when time was: why attach Blame to exhausted faultlessness, no match
For fresh achievement? Fear once—ever first!
How can completion grow still more complete?
Hear Avison! He tenders evidence
That music in his day as much absorbed
Heart and soul then as Wagner's music now,
Perfect from centre to circumference—
Orbed to the full can be but fully orb'd:
And yet—and yet—whence comes it that
"O Thou"

Sighed by the soul at eye to Hebesperus—
Will not again take wing and fly away
(Since fatal Wagner fixed it fast for us)
In some unmodulated minor? Nay,
Even by Handel's help!

VI
I state it thus:
There is no true truth obtainable
By Man than comes of music. "Soul"—

(accept)
A word which vaguely names what no adept
In word-use fits and fixes so that still
Thing shall not slip word's fetter and remain
Innominate as first, yet, free again,
Is no less recognized the absolute
Fact underlying that same other fact
Concerning which no cavil can dispute
Our nomenclature when we call it "Mind"— Sometimes not Matter)—"Soul," who seeks shall find
Distinct beneath that something. You exact
An illustrative image? This may suit.

VII
We see a work: the worker works behind,
Invisible himself. Suppose his act
Be to o'erarch a gulf: he digs, transports,
Shapes and, through enginery—all sizes,
sorts,
Lays stone by stone until a floor compact Proves our bridged caseway. So works Mind
— by stress
Of faculty, with loose facts, more or less,
Builds up our solid knowledge: all the same,
Underneath rolls what Mind may hide not tane,
An element which works beyond our guess,
Soul, the unsounded sea—whose lift of surge,
Spite of all superstructure, lets emerge,
In flower and foam, Feeling from out the deeps
Mind arrogates no mastery upon—
Distinct indubitably. Has there gone
To dig up, drag forth, render smooth from rough
Mind's flooring,—operosity enough?
Still the successive labor of each inch,
Who lists may learn: from the last turn of which
That let the polished slab-stone find its place,
To the first prod of pickaxe at the base
Of the unquarried mountain,—what was all
Mind's varied process except natural,
Nay, easy even, to describ; describe,
After our fashion? "So worked Mind: its tribe
Of senses ministrant above, below,
Far, near, or now or haply long ago Brought to pass knowledge." But Soul's as, drawn whence.
Fed how, forced whither,—by what evidence
Of ebb and flow, that's felt beneath the tread,
Soul has its cause 'neath Mind's work o'er head,—
Who tells of, tracks to source the founds of Soul?
Yet wherefore heaving sway and restless roll
This side and that, except to emulate
Stability above? To match and mate
Feeling with knowledge,—make as manifest
Soul's work as Mind's: work, turbulence as res,
Hates, loves, joys, woes, hopes, fears, that rise
And sink
Ceaselessly, passion's transient fit and wink.
A ripple's tinting or a spume-sheet's spread
Whitening the wave,—to strike all this life

Run mercury into a mould like lead,
And henceforth have the plain result to show—
How we feel, hard and fast as what we know—
This were the prize and is the puzzle!—which Music essays to solve: and here's the hitch
That balks her of full triumph else to boast.

VIII
All Arts endeavor this, and she the most
Attains thereto, yet fails of touching: why?
Does Mind get Knowledge from Art's ministry?
What's known once is known ever: Art
arranges,
Dissociate, re-distribute, interchange
Part with part, lengthen, broaden, high or Construct their bravest,—still such pass produce
Change, not creation: simply what lay loose
At first lies firmly after, what design
Was faintly traced in hesitating line
Once on a time, grows firmly resolute Henceforth and evermore. Now, could we abstain
Liquidity into a mould,—some way
Arrest Soul's evanescent moods, and keep Unalterably still the forms that leap
To life for once by help of Art!—which years
To save its capture: Poetry discords,
Painting is 'wave of passion's rise and fall,
Bursting, subsidence, intermittence—all
A-sothe within the gulf: Each Art a-strain
Would stay the apparition,—nor in vain:
The Poet's word-mesh, Painter's sure and swift Color-and-line-throw—proud the price they lift!
Thus felt Man and thus looked Man,—passion
caught
I' the midstream swim of sea,—not much, if sought,
Of nether-brooding loves, hates, hopes and
fears,
Enwombed past Art's disclosure. Flet the years,
And still the Poet's page holds Helena,
At gaze from topmost Troy—"But where are
they,
Of dusts and dews a many thou didst shrive
Each in its right receptacle, assign
To each its proper office, letter large
Label and label, then with solemn charge,
Reviewing learnedly the list complete
Of chemical reactives, from thy feet
Push down the same to me, attune below
Power in abundance; armed wherewith I go
To play the enlivenor. Bring good antique stuff!
Was it slight one? Still lives spark enough
For breath to quicken, run the smouldering ash Red right-through. What, "stone-dead" were fools so rash
As style my Avison, because he lacked
Modern appliance, spread out phrase uncrack'd
By modulations fit to make each hair
Stiffen upon his wig? See there — and there!
I sprinkle my reactives, pitch broadcast
Discords and resolutions, turn aghast
Melody's easy-going, jostle law
With license, modulate (no Bach in awe)
Change enharmonically (Hindl to thank)
And lo, upstart the flamelets, — what was blank
Turns scarlet, purple, crimson! Straightway scanned
By eyes that like new lustre — Love once more
Yearns through the Largo, Hatred as before
Rages in the Rondo: 's an thy March,
My Avison, which, sooth to say — (ne'er arch Eyebrows in anger!) — timed, in Georgian years
The step precise of British Grenadiers
To such a nicety, — if score I crowd,
If rhythm I break, if beats I vary, — tap
At bar's off-starting turns true thunder-clap,
Ever the pace augmented till — what's here? —
Titanic striding toward Olympus!

Fear
No such irreverent innovation! Still Glide on, go rolling, water-like, at will—
Nay, were thy melody in monotone,
The due three-parts dispensed with!

This alone
Comes of my tiresome talking: Music's throne
Seats somebody whom somebody unequests,
And whom in turn — by who knows what new feats
Of strength — shall somebody as sure push down,
Consign him dispossessed of sceptre, crown,
And orb imperial — whereto? Never dream
That what once lived shall ever die! They seem Dead — do they? lapsed things lost in limbo?
Bring
Our life to kindle theirs, and straight each king
Starts, you shall see, stands up, from head to foot
No inch that is not Purcell! Wherefore? (Suit Measure to subject, first — no marching on
Parleyings with Certain People

Yet in thy bold C major, Avison, As suited step a minute since: no: wait— Into the minor key first modulate— Gently with A, now—in the lesser third!)

XII

Of all the lamentable debts incurred By man through buying knowledge, this were worst: That he should find his last gain prove his loss.

Was futile—merely nescience absolute, Not knowledge in the bud which holds a fruit Haply undreamed of in the soul's Spring-tide, Pursued in the petals Summer opens wide, And Autumn, withering, rounds to perfect ripe,— Not this,—but ignorance, a blur to wipe From human records, late it graced so much. "Truth—this attainment? Ah, but such and such Beliefs of yore seemed inexpugnable When we attained them! Even as they, so will This their successor have the due morn, noon, Evening and night—just as an old-world tune Wears out and drops away, until who hears Smilingly questions—'This it was brought tears Once to all eyes,—this roused heart's rapture once?' So will it be with truth that, for the nonce, Styles itself truth perennial: 'waste its wile! Knowledge turns nescience,—foremost on the file, Simply proves first of our delusions.'

XIII

Blare it forth, bold C major! Lift thy brow, Man, the immortal, that wast never fooled With gifts no gifts at all, nor ridiculed— Man knowing—he who nothing knew! As Hope, Fear, Joy, and Grief,—though ampler stretch and scope They seek and find in novel rhythm, fresh phrase,— Were equally existent in far days Of Music's dim beginning—ever so. Truth was at full within thee long ago, Alive as now it takes what latest shape May startle thee by strangeness. Truths escape Time's insufficient garniture: they fade, They fall—those sheathings now grown sore, whose aid Was infinite to truth they wrapped, saved fine And free through March frost: May dews crystalline Nourish truth merely,—does June boost the fruit As—not new vesture merely but, to boot, Novel creation? Soon shall fade and fall Myth after myth—the husk-like lies I call Now truth's corolla-safeguard: Autumn comes, So much the better!

XIV

Therefore—hang the drum! Blow the trumpets, Avison! March-morn! Short it's. Truth which endures setting, Sharpes and the Lavish at need, shall dance athwart thy song When opheleides and bombardom's uproar Mate the approaching trample, even now Big in the distance—or my ears deceive— Of federated England, stily weave March-music for the Future!

XV

Or suppose Back, and not forward, transformation goes! Once more some sable-stoled procession—ay, From Little-cease to Tyburn—wends its way. Out of the dungeon to the gallows-tree Where heading, hanging, hanging is to be Of half-a-dozen recusants—this day Three hundred years ago! How duly drees Elizabethan plain-song—dim antique Grown clarion-clear the while I humbly wreat A classic vengeance on thy March! It moans— Largess and Longs and Breves displacing quire Crothed and-quer-verkswert—breathingless Aside and filling vacant sky with stars Hidden till now that day return to night.

XVI

Nor night nor day: one purpose move us both. Be they mad mine! As thou wast minded, Man's. The cause our music champions: I were loth To think we observed our troop to Preston Pass Ignobly: back to times of England's best! Parliament stands for privilege—life and limb Guards Rollis, Hasekig, Strode, Hampden, Pym, The famous Five. There's rumor of arrest. Bring up the Train Bands, Southwark! They protest: Shall we not all join chorus? Hark the hymn. —Rough, rude, Robinson's —honestly heart and throb, Harsh voice a-halloo, as beseesm the mob! How good is noise! what's silence but despair Of making sound match gladness never there? Give me some great glad "subject," glories Bach, Where cannon-roar not organ peal we lack! Join in, give voice robustious rude and rough. Avison helps —so heart lend noise enough! Fife, drum and drum, sound! and songers the Marching say "Pym, the man of men!" Up, heads, your proudest,—out throat's your loudest. "Somerset's Pym!"

Stratford from the block, Eliot from the dae. Foes, friends, about "Pym, our citizens!" Wail, the foes he quelled,—hail, the friends he held. "Tavistock's Pym!"
Hearts prompt heads, hands that ply the pen
Teach babes unborn the where and when.
— Tyrants, he braved them,— patriots, he saved them —
"Westminster’s Fynm!"

FUST AND HIS FRIENDS
AN EPILOGUE

(Inside the House of Fust, Mayence, 1457.)

First Friend. Up, up, up—next step of the staircase
Lands us, lo, at the chamber of dread!
Second Friend. Looked and barred?
Third Friend. Door open—the rare case!
Fourth Friend. Ay, there he leans—lost wretch!
Fifth Friend. His head
Sunk on his desk ’twixt his arms outspread!

Sixth Friend. Hallo,—wake, man, ere God thunderstrike Mayence
—Mute for thy sake who art Satan’s, John Fust!
Satan installed here, God’s rule in abeyance,
Mayence some morning may crumble to dust.
Answer our questions thou shalt and thou must!

Seventh Friend. Softly and fairly! Wherefore a-gloom?
Greet us, thy gossipry, cousin and sib!
Raise the forlorn brow, Fust! Make room—
Let daylight through arms which, enfolding thee, crib
From those clenched lids the comfort of sunshine!
First Friend. So gib

Thy tongue, slides to “comfort” already?
Not mine!
Behove us deal roundly: the wretch is distraught
—Too well I guess wherefore! Behoves a Divine
—Such as I, by grace, boast me—to threaten one caught
In the enemy’s toils,—setting “comfort” at naught.
Second Friend. Nay, Brother, so hasty? I heard — nor long since —
Of a certain Black Art'ner who, — helplessly bound By rash pact with Satan, — through paying — why mines
The matter? — fit price to the Church, —
safe and sound
Full a year after death in his grave-clothes was found.

Whereas 't is notorious the Fiend claims his due
During lifetime, — comes clawing, with talons aflame,
The soul from the flesh-rags left smoking and blue:
So it happed with John Faust; lest John
Fust fare the same,—
Look up, I adjure thee by God's holy name!

For neighbors and friends — no foul hell-brood dock we!
Saith Solomon "Words of the wise are as Gold's";
Ours pricks but to startle from torpor, set free
Soul and sense from death's drowse!
First Friend. And soul, wakened, unloads
Much sin by confession: no mere palindromes!

— "I was youthful and wanton, am old yet no
sage:
When angry I cursed, struck and slew: did I
want?
Right and left did I rob: though no war I dared wage
With the Church (God forbid!) — harm her least ministrant —
Still I outraged all else. Now that strength is grown scant,

"I am probity's self" — no such bleatings as
these!
But avowal of guilt so enormous, it balks Tongue's telling. Yet penitence prompt may appease
God's wrath at thy bond with the Devil who sits
— Strides kither to strangle thee!
Fust. Childhood so talks. —

Not rare wit nor ripe age — ye boast them, my neighbors! —
Should lay such a charge on your townsman, this Fust
Who, known for a life spent in pleasures and labors
If freakish yet venial, could scarce be induc'd
To traffic with fiends.
First Friend. So, my words have unloosed
A plie from those pale lips corrugate but now?
Fust. Lost count me, yet not as ye lean to surmise.
First Friend. To surmise? to establish! Unbury that brow!
Look up, that thy judge may read clear in thine eyes!

Second Friend. By your leave, Brother
Barnabite! Mine to advise!

— Who arraign thee, John Fust? — What we bruited erewhile
Now bellows through Mayence. All cry—thou hast truck'd
Salvation away for lust's solace! Thy smile
Takes its hue from hell's smoulder!
Fust. Too certain! I sucked — Got drunk at the nippie of sense.
Second Friend. Thou hast drunked—

Art drowned there, say rather! Fuggh—fleshly dispart!
How else but by help of Sir Behial didst wi
That Venus-like lady, no drudge of thy sort
Could lure to become his accomplice in sin?
Folk nicknamed her Helen of Troy!
First Friend. Best begg

At the very beginning. Thy father, — all knew.
A mere goldsmith... —
Fust. Who knew him, perchance may know
this —
He dying left much gold and jewels so few:
Whom these help to court with, but none shall
miss
The love of a leman: true witchcraft, I wis!

First Friend. Dost float me? 'Tis said, is debauchery's guild
Admitted prime gutter and guzzler — 0 swine! —
To honor thy headship, those tosspots so virile
That out of their table there sprouted a vise Whenone each claimed a cluster, awaiting thy sign
To out knife, off mouthful: when — who could suppose
Such malice in magic? — each out woke and
found
Cold steel but an inch from the neighbor's red nose
He took for a grape-bunch!
Fust. Does that so astounding
Sagacity such as ye boast, — who surround

Your mate with eyes staring, hairs standing erect
At his magical feats? Are good burglars unversed
In the humors of toeping? Full oft, I suspect, Ye, counting your fingers, call thumbskiss their
first,
And reckon a great every guildier disburdened.
What marvel if wags, while the skinkier fast
brimmed
Their glass with rare tipple's entertainament, should gloat
— Bewoofled and befuddled — through optics drink-dimmed—
On this draught and that, till each found in his throat
Our Rhenish smack rightly as Raphael? For
note —
They fancied — their fuddling deceived them so greatly —
That liquor sprung out of the table itself
Through gimlet-holes drilled there, — nor noticed how closely
The skinner kept plying my guests, from the shelf
O'er their heads, with the potable madness.
No elf

Had need to persuade them a vine rose unbrazen-
Fruit-bearing, thirst-queenching! Enough! I confess
To many such fool-pranks, but none so outrageous
That Satan was called in to help me: excess
I own to, I grieve at — no more and no less.

Second Friend. Strange honors were heaped on thee — medal for breast,
Chain for neck, sword for thigh: not a lord of the land
But acknowledged thee peer! What ambition possessed
A goldsmith by trade, with craft's grime on his hand,
To seek such associates?
Fust. Spare taunts! Understand —

I submit me! Of vanities under the sun,
Pride seized me at last as consubience first,
Crappiness ever: true Fiends, every one,
Haled this way and that my poor soul: thus answer —
Forgive and forget me!
First Friend. Had flesh sinned the worst,

Yet help were in counsel: the Church could advise:
But say not men truly thouarest escaped
By signing and sealing . . .
Second Friend. On me must devolve
The task of extracting . . .
First Friend. Shall Barnabites ape
Us Dominican experts?
Seventh Friend. Nay, Masters, — agape

When Hell yawns for a soul, 'tis myself claim the task
Of extracting, by just one plain question, God's truth!
Where's Peter Genevieve thy partner? I ask
Why, cloistered up still in thy room, the pale youth
Slaves tongue-tied — thy trade brooks no tattling forsooth!

No less he, thy famulus, suffers entrapping,
Succumbs to good fellowship: barrel a-broach
Runs freely nor needs any subsequent tapping:
Quoth Peter, "That room, none but I dare approach,
Holds secrets will help me to ride in my coach."

He prattles, we profit: in brief, he assures
Thou hast taught him to speak so that all men may hear
— Each alike, wide world over, Jews, Pagans, Turks, Moors,
The same as we Christians — speech heard far and near
At one and the same magic moment!
Fust. That's clear!

Said he — how?
Seventh Friend. Is it like he was licensed to learn?
Who doubts but thou dost this by aid of the Fiend?
Is it so? So it is, for thou smilest! Go, burn
To ashes, since such proves thy portion, un-screened.
By bell, book and candle! Yet lately I ween'd

Balm yet was in Gilead, — some healing in store
For the friend of my bosom. Men said thou wast sunk
In a sudden despondency: not, as before,
Fust gallant and gay with his pottle and punk,
But sober, sad, sick as one yesterday drunk!
Fust. Spare Fust, then, thus contrite! — who, youthful and healthy,
Equipped for life's struggle with culture of mind,
Sound flesh and sane soul in coherescence, born wealthy,
Nay, wise — how he wasted endowment designed
For the glory of God and the good of mankind!

That much were misused such occasions of grace
Ye well may upbraid him, who bows to the rod.
But this should bid anger to pity give place —
He has turned from the wrong, in the right path to plod,
Makes amend to mankind and craves pardon of God.

"Yes, friends, even now from my lips the Heureka — Soul saved!" was nigh bursting — unduly elate!
Have I brought Man advantage, or hatched — so to speak — a Strange serpent, no cygnet? 'Tis this I debate Within me. Forbear, and leave Fust to his fate!

First Friend. So abject, late lofty? Methinks I spy reprieve.
Make clean breast, discover what mysteries hide
In thy room there!
Second Friend. Ay, out with them! Do Satan despite!
Remember what caused his undoing was pride!

First Friend. Dumb devil! Remains one resource to be tried!

Second Friend. Exercise!

Seventh Friend. Nay, first — is there any remainder
In substance that potent "Ne pulvis" — a
psalm
Whereof some live spark haply lurks 'mid the embers
Which choke in my brain. Talk of "Gilead and balm"?
I mind me, sung half through this, gave such a quail
To Asmodeus inside of a Hussite, that, quassy,
He broke forth in brimstone with curses.
I'm strong
In — at least the commencement: the rest should go easy.

Friends helping. "Ne pulvis et ignis" ...

Sixth Friend. All wrong!

Fifth Friend. I've conned till I captured the whole.

Seventh Friend. Get along!

"Ne pulvis et cinis superba te geras, Nam fulmina."

Sixth Friend. Fiddletick! Peace, dolts and dorns!
Thus runs it "Ne Numinis fulmina feras"
Then "Hominis perfidi justa sunt soris
Fulmen et grando et horrida mors."

Seventh Friend. You blunder ... "Irati ne."
Sixth Friend. Mind your own business!

Fifth Friend. I do not so badly, who gained the monk's leave
To study an hour his choice parchment. A dizziness
May well have surprised me. No Christian dares thief,
Or I scarce had returned him his treasure.
These cleave:

"Nos pulvis et cinis, trementes, gementes,
Venimus" — some such word — "ad te, Do-
mine!

Da lumen, juvamen, ut sancta sequentes
Cor ... corda ... Plague take it!

Seventh Friend. — "erecta sint spe:"
Right text, ringing rhyme, and ripe Latin for
me!

Sixth Friend. A Canon's self wrote it me fair: I was tempted
To part with the sheapakin.

Seventh Friend. Didst grasp and let go Such a godsend, thou Judas? My purse had been emptied
Ever part with the prize!

Fust. Do I dream? Say ye so?
Clouds break, then! Move, world! I have gained my "Pou sto!"

I am saved: Archimedes, salute me!

Onmes. Assistance!

Help. Angels! He summons ... Arise thee! — by name,
His familiar!

Fust. Approach!

Onmes. Devil, keep thy due distance!

Fust. Be tranquillized, townspeople! The knowledge ye claim
Behold, I prepare to impart. Praise or blame,—

Your blessing or banishing, whatever betide me,
At last I accept. The slow travail of years,
The long-teeming brain's birth — appealed me,
deride me,—
At last claims revelation. Wait!

Seventh Friend. Wait till appears
Uncaged Archimedes cooped-up there?

Second Friend. Who fears?

Here's have at thee!

Seventh Friend. Correctely now! "Pulvis et cini."
Fust. The verse ye so value, it happens I hold in my memory safe from initials to finals.
Word for word, I produce you the whole.
Plain enrolled,
Black letters, white paper — no scribbos red and gold!

Onmes. Arise thee!

Fust. I go and return.

(He enters the inner room.)

First Friend. Ay, 'tis is "ibi."
No doubt: but as boldly "redibis" — who'll say? I rather conjecture "in Orco peribus!"

Seventh Friend. Come, neighbors!

Sixth Friend. I'm with you! Show courage and stay
Holl's outbreak? Sirs, cowardice here wins
day!

Fifth Friend. What luck had that student of Bamburg who ventured
To peep in the cell where a wizard of note
Was busy in getting some black deed deco-tured
By Satan? In dog's guise there spanning at his throat
A flame-breathing fury. Fust favors, I note.

An ugly huge lurcher! ...

Seventh Friend. If I placed reliance
As thou, on the beads thou art telling so
fast,
I'd risk just a peep through the keyhole.

Sixth Friend. Appliances Of easier might be safer: Five minutes are past.

Onmes. Saints, save us! The door is thrown open at last!

Fust (re-enters, the door closing behind him). As I promised, behold I perform! Approached
you
The object I offer is poison or pest?
Receive without harm from the hand I extend
you
A gift that shall set every scruple at rest!
Shrink back from mere paper-strips? Try them and test!

Still hesitate? Myk, was it thou who lamented?
Thy five wits clean failed thee to render
A poem read once and no more? — who repented!
Vile self had induced thee to banish from sight
The characters none but our clerics indite?

Take and keep!
First Friend. Blessed Mary and all Saints about her!
Second Friend. What impo deals so deftly, — five minutes suffice.
To play thus the penman?
Third Friend. By Thomas the Doubter,
Five minutes, no more!
Fourth Friend. Out on arts that entice
Such scribings to do homage!
Fifth Friend. Stay! Once — and now twice —

Yea, a third time, my sharp eye completes the inspection
Of line after line, the whole series, and all kinds.
Each letter join each — not a fault for detection!
Such upstrokes, such downstrokes, such strokes of all kinds.
In the criss-cross, all perfect!
Sixth Friend. There's nobody minds
His quill-craft with more of a conscience, o'er-scrapes
A sheepskin more nimbly and surely with ink.
Than Paul the Sub-Prior: here's paper that matches
His parchment with letter on letter, no link
Overleapt — underlost!
Seventh Friend. No erasure, I think —

No blot, I am certain!
Fust. Accept the new treasure!
Sixth Friend. I remembered full half!
Seventh Friend. But who other than I (Bear witness, bystanders!) when he broke the measure
Repairèd fault with "fulmen"?
Fust. Put bickerings by!
Here's for thee — thee — and thee, too: at need a supply
(Distributing Proofs.)

For Mayence, though seventy times seven Should muster!
How now? All so feeble of faith that no face?
Which fronts me but whitens — or yellows, were juster?
Speak out lest I summon my Spirits!

No. Grace — grace —

Call none of thy — helpmates! We'll answer space!

My paper — and mine — and mine also — they vary
In nowise — agree in each tittle and jot!
Fust, how — why was this?
Fust. Shall such '"Cur" miss a "quarre"?
Within, there! Throw doors wide! Behold who complots
To abolish the scribe's work — blur, blunder and blot!
(The doors open, and the Press is discovered in operation.)

Brave full-bodied birth of this brain that conceived thee
In splendor and music, — sustained the slow drag
Of the days stretched to years dim with doubt,
— yet believed thee:
Had faith in thy first leap of life! Pulse might flag —
— Mine fluttered how faintly! — Arch-moment might lag

Its longest — I bided, made light of enduring, Hold hard by the hope of an advent which —
dreamed,
Is done now: night yields to the dawn's resur-»
I have thee — I hold thee — my fancy that seemed,
My fact that proves palpable! Ay, Sirs, I schemed
Completion that's fact: see this Engine — be witness Yourself of its working! Nay, handle my Types!
Each block bears a Letter: in order and fitness
I range them. Turn, Peter, the winch! See, it grips What's under! Let loose — draw! In regular stripes Lies plain, at one pressure, your poem — touched, tinted,
Turned out to perfection! The sheet, late a blank.
Filled — ready for reading, — not written but PRINTED!
Omniscient omnipotent God, thee I thank,
Thee ever, thee only — thy creation that shrank

From no task thou, Creator, imposéd!

Creation
Revealed me no object, from insect to Man,
But bore thy hand's impress: earth glowed with salvation:
"Hast sinned? Be thou saved, Fust! Continue my plan,
Who spake and earth was: with my word things began.

"As sound so went forth, to the sight be extended
Word's mission henceforward! The task I assign,
Embrace—thy allegiance to evil is ended!
Have chaser, soul impregnate with purpose!
Combine
Soul and body, give birth to my concept—called thine!

"Far and wide, North and South, East and West, have dominion
O'er thought, winged wonder, O Word!
 Traverse world
In sun-flash and sphere-song! Each beat of thy pinion
Bursts night, beckons day: once Truth's banner unfurled, Where's falsehood? Sun-smitten, to nothingness hurled!"

More humbly—so, friends, did my fault find redemption
I rinsed, soul-entoiled by the tether of sense:
My captor reigned master: I plead no exemption,
From Satan's award to his servant: defence
From the fiery and final assault would be—whence?

By making—as man might—to truth restitution!
Truth is God: trample lies and lie's father, God's foe!
Fix fact—fast: truths change by an hour's revolution;
What deed's very doer, unaided, can show
How 't was done a year—month—week—day—minute ago?

At best, he relates it—another reports it—
A third—nay, a thousandth records it: and still Narration, tradition, no step but distorts it,
As down from truth's height it goes sliding until
At the low level lies-mark it stops—whence no skill

Of the scribe, intervening too tardily, rescues
—Once fallen—lost fact from lie's fate there.
What scribe
—Eyes horrid with poring, hands crippled with desk-use,
Brains fretted by fancies—the volatile tribe
That tease weary watchers—can boast that no brieve

Shuts eye and frees hand and remits brain from toiling?
Truth gained—can we stay, at whatever the stage,
Truth a WHILE—save her snow from its ultimate soiling
In mire,—by some process, stamp promptly on page
Fact spoiled by pen's plodding, make truth heritage

Not merely of clerics, but poured out, fell measure,
On clowns—every mortal endowed with a mind?
Read, gentle and simple! Let labor win leisure
At last to bid truth do all duty assigned,
Not pause at the noble but pass to the kind!

How bring to effect such swift sure simultaneous Unlimited multiplication? How spread
By an arm-sweep a hand-throw—no helping extraneous
Truth broadcast o'er Europe? "The goldsmith," I said,
"Graves limning on gold: why not letters or lead?"

So, Tuscan artist, grudge not thy pardon
To me who played false, made a furtive descent,
Found the shy secret workshop,—thy genius Kept guard on
Too slyly for once,—and surprised the low-bent
O'er thy labor—some chalice thy tool would indant

With a certain free scroll-work framed round
by a border
Of foliage and fruitage: no scratching so fine.
No shading so shy but, in ordered disorder.
Each flourish came clear,—unbewildered by shine,
On the gold, irretrievably right, lay each line.

How judge if thy hand worked thy will? By reviewing,
Revising again and again, piece by piece,
Tool's performance,—this way, as I watched.
"T was through gluing
A paper-like film-stuff—thin, smooth, void of crease,
On each out of the graver: press hard! at release,

No mark on the plate but the paper showed double:
His work might proceed: as he judged—space or space
Up he filled, forth he flung—was relieved thus from trouble Least wrong—once—were right never more:
what could check
Advancement, completion? Thus lay at my book—

At my call—triumph likewise! "For," cried I, "what hinders
That swiftly turns Printing? Stamp one word—not one
But fifty such, phoenix-like, spring from death's cinders,

Since death is word's doom, clerics hide from the sun
FUST AND HIS FRIENDS

As some churl closets up this rare chalice."
  Go, run
Thy race now, Fust’s child! High, O Printing, and holy Thy mission! These types, see, I chop and I change
Till the words, every letter, a pageful, not slowly
Yet surely lies fixed: last of all, I arrange
A paper beneath, stamp it, loosen it!
  Strange!
  First Friend.
Second Friend. How simple exceedingly!
  Fust.
  Bustle, my Schonffer!
Set type.—quick, Gensheim! Turn screw
  now!
Third Friend. Just that!
  Fourth Friend. And no such vast miracle!
  Fust.
  "Plough with my heifer,
  Ye find out my riddle," quoth Samson, and pat
He speaks to the purpose. Grapes squeezed in the vat
Yield to sight and to taste what is simple — a liquid
Mere urchins may sip: but give time, let ferment—
You’ve wine, manhood’s master! Well, "rec-tius si quid
Novitas im-per-ti!" Wait the event,
Then weigh the result! But, whate’er Thy intent

O Thou, the one force in the whole variation
Of visible nature, — at work — do I doubt? —
From Thy first to our last, in perpetual creation
A film hides us from Thee — ’twixt inside and
  out,
A film, on this earth where Thou bringest about New marvels, new forms of the glorious, the gracious,
We bow to, we bless for: no star bursts heav-
  en’s dome
But Thy finger impels it, no weed peeps audacious
Earth’s clay-floor from out, but Thy finger makes room
For one word’s want the more in Thy Cosmos:
  presume
Shall Man, Microcosmos, to claim the conception
Of grandeur, of beauty, in thought, word or
  deed?
I toiled, but Thy light on my dubiousest step shone:
If I reach the glad goal, is it I who succeed
  Who stumbled at starting tripped up by a reed,
Or Thou? Knowledge only and absolute, glory
  As utter be Thine who concedest a spark
Of Thy spherical perfection to earth’s transitory Existences! Nothing that lives, but Thy mark
Gives law to — life’s light: what is doomed to the dark?
Where’s ignorance? Answer, creation! What height,
What depth has escaped Thy commandment
  — to know?
What birth in the one-rib but answers aught
  Thy sting at its heart which impels — bids
  "E’en so,
Not otherwise move or be motionless, — grow,
"Decline, disappear!" Is the plant in default
  How to bud, when to branch forth? The bird and the beast
— Do they doubt if their safety be found in assault
Or escape? Worm or fly, of what atoms the least
But follows light’s guidance, — will famish, not feast?
In such various degree, fly and worm, ore and plant,
All know, none is wiseless: around each, a wall
Encloses the portion, or ample or scant,
  Of knowledge: beyond which one hair’s breadth, for all
Lies blank — not so much as a blackness — a pall
Some sense unimagined must penetrate: plain is only old license to stand, walk or sit,
Move so far and so wide in the narrow domain
  Alotted each nature for life’s use: past it
How immensity spreads does he guess? Not a whit.
Does he care? Just as little. Without? No, within Concerns him? he knows. Man ignores — thanks to Thee
Who madest him know, but — in knowing — begin
To know still new vastness of knowledge must be
Outside him — to enter, to traverse, in fee
Have and hold! “Oh, Man’s ignorance!” hear the fool whine!
How were it, for better or worse, didst thou grant
Contented with sapience — the lot of the swine
  Who knows he was born for just trifles to hunt?
—
Monks’ Paradise — "Semper sint res uti sunt!"
No, Man’s the prerogative — knowledge once gained —
To ignore,— find new knowledge to press for,
  to swerve
In pursuit of, no, not for a moment: attained — Why, onward through ignorance! Dare and deserve!
As still to its asymptote speedeth the curve,
So approximates Man — Thee, who, reachable
  not,
Hast formed him to yearningly follow Thy
  whole
Sole and single omniscience!
Such, friends, is my lot:
I am back with the world: one more step to the goal.
Thanks for reaching I render—Fust's help to Man's soul!

Mere mechanical help? So the hand gives a toss
To the falcon,—aloft once, spread pinions and fly,
Beat air far and wide, up and down and across!
My Press strains a-tremble: whose masterful eye
Will be first, in new regions, new truth to descry?

Give chase, soul! Be sure each new capture concerned
To my Types will go forth to the world, like God's bread
— Miraculous food not for body but mind,
Truth's manna! How say you? Put case that, instead
Of old leasing and lies, we superiorly fed

These Heretics, Hussites . . .
First Friend. First answer my query!
If saved, art thou happy?
Fust. I was and I am.
First Friend. Thy visage confirms it: how comes then, that—wearty
And woe-begone late—was it show, was it sham?—
We found thee sunk thiswise?
Second Friend. —In need of the dram

From the flask which a provident neighbor might carry!
Fust. Ah, friends, the fresh triumph soon flutters, fast fades!
I hailed Word's dispersion: could heartleaps
but tarry!
Through me does Print furnish Truth wings?
The same aids
Cause Falsehood to range just as widely. What raids

On a region undreamed of does Printing sail
Truth's foe to effect! Printed leasing and lies May speed to the world's farthest corner—grotesque!
No less than pure fact—to impede, neutralize.
Abolish God's gift and Man's gain!
First Friend. Dost surmise

What struck me at first blush? Our Bechuanas Waldenses.
Jeronimites, Hussites—does one show his head,
Spont heresy now? Not a priest in his ascent Deigns answer mere speech, but piles facts instead,
Refines us by fire, and, him silenced, all's sail
Whether if in future I pen an opuscule
Defying retort, as of old when rash tongues
Were easy to tame,—straight some known of the Huss-School
Prints answer forthwith! Stop, invisible lens!
The barrel of blasphemy broached once, who bungs?

Second Friend. Does my sermon, next Easter, establish acceptance?
Each captious disputative boy has his quick
"An quique credendum sit?" Well, the Church kept "ans"
In order till Fust set his engine at work!
What trash will come flying from Jew, Mos,
and Turk

When, goosequill, thy reign o'er the world is avolished!
Goose—ominous name! With a goose we began:
Quoth Huss—which means "goose" in his idiom unpolished—
"Ye burn now a Goose: there succeeds me a Swan
Ye shall find quench your fire!"
Fust. I foresee such a man.

TO MRS. ARTHUR BRONSON;

To whom but you, dear Friend, should I dedicate verses—some few written, all of them supervised, in the comfort of your presence, and with yet another experience of the gracious hospitality now bestowed on me since so many a year,—adding a charm even to my residences at Venice, and leaving me little regret for the surprise and delight at my visits to Asolo in bygone days?
I unite, you will see, the disconnected poems by a title-name popularly ascribed to the inventiveness of the ancient secretary of Queen Cornaro whose palace-tower still overlooks us: Asolares—"to disport in the open air, amuse one's self at random." The objection that such a word nowhere occurs in the works of the Cardinal is hardly important—Bembo was too through a purist to conserve in print a term which in talk he might possibly trust with: but the word is more likely derived from a Spanish source. I use it for
PROLOGUE

"The Poet's age is said: for why?
In youth, the natural world could show
No common object but his eye
At once involved with alien glow
His own soul's iris-bow.

"And now a flower is just a flower:
Man, bird, beast are but beast, bird, man
Simply themselves, unseen by dower
Of dyes which, when life's day began,
Round each in glory ran."

Friend, did you need an optic glass,
Which were your choice? A lens to drape
In ruby, emerald, chrysoprase,
Each object — or reveal its shape
Clear outlined, past escape,

The naked very thing? — so clear
That, when you had the chance to gaze,
You found its utmost self appear
Through outer seeming — truth ablaze,
Not falsehood's fancy-haze?

How many a year, my Asolo,
Since — one step just from sea to land —
I found you, loved yet feared you so —
For natural objects seemed to stand
Palpably fire-cloathed! No —

No mastery of mine o'er these!
Terror with beauty, like the Bush
Burning but unconsumed. Bond knees,
Drop eyes to earthward! Language? Tush!
Silence 'tis awe decrees.

And now? The lambent flame is — where?
Lost from the naked world: earth, sky,
Hill, vale, tree, flower — Italia's rare
O'er-running beauty crowds the eye —
But flame? The Bush is bare.

Hill, vale, tree, flower — they stand distinct,
Nature to know and name. What then?
A Voice spoke themes which straight unlinked
Fancy from fact: sea, all 's in ken:
Has once my eyelid winked?

No; for the purged ear apprehends
Earth's import, not the eye late dazed.
The Voice said, "Call my works thy friends!
At Nature dost thou shrink amazed?
God is it who transcends."

Asolo: September 6, 1869.

ROSNY

Wox, he went galloping into the war,
Clara, Clara!
Let us two dreams: shall be escape with a scarcely disfigurement, rather a grace
Making for manhood which nowise we mar:
See, while I kiss it, the flush on his face —
Rosny, Rosny!

Light does he laugh: "With your love in my soul" —

(Clara, Clara !)

"How could I other than — sound, safe, and
whole —
Cleave who opposed me asunder, yet stand
Scatheless beside you, as, touching love's goal,
Who won the race kneels, craves reward at your hand —
Rosny, Rosny?"

Ay, but if certain who envied should see!
Clara, Clara,
Certain who simper: "The hero for me
Hardly of life were so chary as miss Death — death and fame — that's love's guer-don when she
Boasts, proud bereaved one, her choice fell on this Rosny, Rosny!"

So, — go on dreaming, — he lies mid a heap

(Clara, Clara.)

Of the plain by his hand: what is death but a sleep?
Dead, with my portrait displayed on his breast:
Love wrought his undoing: "No prudence could keep
The love-maddened wretch from his fate."
That is best,
Rosny, Rosny!

DUBIETY

I will be happy if but for once:
Only help me, Autumn weather,
Me and my cares to screen, ensconce
In luxury's sofa-lap of leather!

Sleep? Nay, comfort — with just a cloud
Suffusing day too clear and bright:
Eve's essence, the single drop allowed
To sully, like milk, Noon's water-white.
Let gauziness shade, not shroud,—adjust,
Dim and not deaden,—somehow sheathe
Aught sharp in the rough world's busy thrust,
If it reach me through dreaming's vapor-wreath.

Be life so, all things ever the same!
For, what has disarmed the world? Outside,
Quiet and peace: inside, nor blame
Nor want, nor wish what'er betide.

What is it like that has happened before?
A dream? No dream, more real by much.
A vision? But fanciful days of yore
Brought many: mere musings seems not such.

Perhaps but a memory, after all!
Of what came once when a woman leant
To feel for my brow where her kiss might fall.
Truth ever, truth only the excellent!

NOW

Out of your whole life give but a moment!
All of your life that has gone before,
All to come after it,—so you ignore,
So you make perfect the present,—condense,
In a rapture of rage, for perfection's endowment,
Thought and feeling and soul and sense—
Merged in a moment which gives me at last
You around me for once, you beneath me, above me—
Me—sure that despite of time future, time past,
This tick of our life-time's one moment you love me!
How long such suspension may linger? Ah, Sweet—
The moment eternal—just that and no more—
When ecstasy's utmost we clutch at the core
While cheeks burn, arms open, eyes shut and lips meet!

HUMILITY

What girl but, having gathered flowers,
Strip the beds and spoil the bowers,
From the lapful light she carries
Drops a careless bud?—nor tarries
To regain the waif and stray:
"Store enough for home"—she'll say.

So say I too: give your lover
Heaps of loving—under, over,
Whelm him—make the one the wealthy!
Am I all so poor who—stealthy
Work it was!—picked up what fell:
Not the worst bud—who can tell?

POETICS

"So say the foolish!" Say the foolish, Love?
"Flower she is, my rose"—or else, "My very swan is she"—
Or perhaps, "You maid-moon, blessing earth
below, Love,
Thou art thou!"—to them, belike: no such vain words from me.

"Hush, rose, blush! no balm like breath," I chide it:
"Bend thy neck its best, swan,—her the whiter curve!"
Be the moon the moon: my Love I place beside it:
What is she? Her human self,—no lower word will serve.

SUMMUM BONUM

All the breath and the bloom of the year is the bag of one bee:
All the wonder and wealth of the mine is the heart of one gem:
In the core of one pearl all the shade and the shine of the sea:
Breath and bloom, shade and shine,—wander, wealth, and—how far above them—
Truth, that's brighter than gems,
Trust, that's purer than pearl,— Brightest truth, purest trust in the universe—
all were for me
In the kiss of one girl.

A PEARL, A GIRL

A simple ring with a single stone,
To the vulgar eye no stone of price:
Whisper the right word, that alone—
Forth starts a sprite, like fire from ice,
And lo, you are lord (says an Eastern scroll)
Of heaven and earth, lord whole and sole
Through the power in a pearl.

A woman (tis I this time that say)
With little the world counts worthy praise:
Utter the true word—out and away
Escapes her soul: I am wrapt in blaze,
Creation's lord, of heaven and earth
Lord whole and sole—by a minute's birth—
Through the love in a girl!

SPECULATIVE

Others may need new life in Heaven—
Man, Nature, Art—made new, assume!
Man with new mind old sense to leaves,
Nature,—new light to clear old glooms,
Art that breaks bounds, gets soaring-rooms.

I shall pray: "Fugitive as precious
Minutes which passed,—return, remain!
BAD DREAMS 989

Let earth's old life once more ennemash us,
You with old pleasure, me — old pain,
So we but meet nor part again!"

WHITE WITCHCRAFT

When a boy Browning had a humble friend in the person of a toad. "He visited it daily where it burrowed under a white rosebush, an-ouncing himself by a pinch of gravel dropped into its hole; and the creature would crawl forth, allow its head to be gently tickled, and reward the act with a loving glance of its soft full eyes." Mrs. Orr.

If you and I could change to beasts, what beast should either be?
Shall you and I play Love for once? Turn for then, I decoy!
Shy wild sweet stealer of the grapes! Now do your worst on me!

And thus you think to spite your friend — turned loathsome? What, a toad?
So, all men shrink and shun me! Dear men, pursue your road!
Leave but my crevice in the stone, a reptile's fit abode!

Now say your worst, Candidia! "He's loath-some, I allow:
There may or may not lurk a pearl beneath his puckered brow:
But see his eyes that follow mine — love lasts
there, anyhow."

BAD DREAMS

I

Last night I saw you in my sleep:
And how your charm of face was changed!
I asked, "Some love, some faith you keep?"
You answered, "Faith gone, love estranged."

Whereas I woke — a twofold bliss:
Waking was one, but next there came
This other: "Though I felt, for this,
My heart break, I loved on the same."

BAD DREAMS

II

You in the flesh and here —
Your very self! Now, wait!
One word? May I hope or fear?
Must I speak in love or hate?
Stay while I ruminate!

The fact and each circumstance
Dare you disown? Not you!
That vast dome, that huge dam,
And the gloom which overgrew
A — possibly festive crew!

For why should men dance at all—
Why women — a crowd of both —
Unless they are gay? Strange ball —
Hands and feet plighting troth,
Yet partners enforced and loth!

Of who danced there, no shape
Did I recognize: thwart, perverse,
Each grasped each, part escape
In a whirl or weary or worse:
Man's sneer met woman's curse,

While he and she toiled as if
Their guardian set galley-slaves
To supple chained limbs grown stiff:
Unmanoaled trulls and knaves —
The lash for who misbehaves!

And a gloom was, all the while,
Deeper and deeper yet
O'ergrowing the rank and file
Of that army of haters — set
To mimic love's fever-trel.

By the wall-side close I crept,
Avoiding the livid maze,
And, safely so far, outstepped
On a chamber — a chapel, says
My memory or betrays —

Closet-like, kept aloof
From unseemly witnessing
What sport made floor and roof
Of the Devil's palace ring
While his Damned amused their king.

Ay, for a low lamp burned,
And a silence lay about
What I, in the midst, discerned
Though dimly till, past doubt,
'Twas a sort of throne stood out —

High seat with steps, at least:
And the topmost step was filled
By — whom? What vested priest?
A stranger to me, — his guild,
His cult, unreconciled

To my knowledge how guild and cult
Are clothed in this world of ours:
I pondered, but no result
Came to — unless that Gnoure
So worship the Lower Powers.

When suddenly who entered?
Who knelt — did you guess I saw?
Who — raising that face were centred
Allegiance to love and law
So lately — off-casting awe,

Down-treading reserve, away
Thrusting respect . . . but mine
Stands firm — firm still shall stay!
Ask Satan! for I decline
To tell — what I saw, in fine!

Yet here in the flesh you come —
Your same self, form and face,—
In the eyes, mirth still at home!
On the lips, that commonplace
Perfection of honest grace!

Yet your errand is—needs must be—
To palliate—well, explain,
Excoriate in some degree
Your soul of its ugly stain.
Oh, you—the good in grain—

How was it your white took tinge?
"A mere dream"—never object!
Sleep leaves a door on hinge
Whence soul, are our flesh suspect,
Is off and away: detect

Her vagaries when loose, who can!
Be she pranksome, be she prude,
Disguise with the day began:
With the night—ah, what ensued
From draughts of a drink hell-brewed?

Then she: "What a queer wild dream!
And perhaps the best fun is—
Myself had its fellow—I seem Scarce awake from yet. "Twas this—Shall I tell you? First, a kiss!

"For the fault was just your own,—
"T is myself expect apology:
You warned me to let alone
(Since our studies were mere philology)
That ticklish (you said) Anthology.

"So I dreamed that I passed exam
Till a question posed me sore:
'Who translated this epigram
By—an author we best ignore?'
And I answered, 'Hannah More!'"

BAD DREAMS

This was my dream: I saw a Forest
Old as the earth, no track nor trace
Of unmade man. Thou, Soul, explorest—
Though in a trembling rapture—space
Immeasurable! Shrubs, turned trees,
Trees that touch heaven, support its freeze
Studded with sun and moon and star:
While—oh, the enormous growths that bar
Mine eye from penetrating past
Their tangled twine where lucks—nay, lives
Royally lone, some brute-type cast
I the rough, time cancels, man forgives.

Oh, Soul! I saw a lucid City
Of architectural device
Every way perfect. Pause for pity,
Lightning! nor leave a cicatrice
On those bright marbles, dome and spire,
Structures palatial,—streets which mire
Dares not defile, paved all too fine
For human footstep's smooth, not thine—
Prond solitary traverser,
My Soul, of silent lengths of way—
With what ecstatic dread, aver,
Lest life start sanctioned by thy stay!

Ah, but the last sight was the hideous!
A City, yes,—a Forest, true,—
But each devouring each. Perfidious
Snake-plants had strangled what I knew
Was a pavilion once: each oak
Held on his horn some spoil he broke
By surreptitiously beneath
Upthrusting: pavements, as with teeth,
Gripped huge weed widening crack and split
In squares and circles stone-work erst.
Oh, Nature—good! Oh, Art—no whit
Less worthy! Both in one—accursed!

BAD DREAMS

It happened thus: my ahas, though new,
Was getting weather-stained,—beside,
Herbage, balm, peppermint o'er-grew
Letter and letter: till you tried
Somewhat, the Name was scarce descried.

That strong stern man my lover came:
—Was he my lover? Call him, pray,
My life's cold critic bent on blame
Of all poor I could do or say
To make me worth his love one day—

One far day when, by diligent
And dutiful amending faults,
Fails, all weaknesses which went
To challenge and excuse assaults
Of culture wronged by taste that halts—

Discrepancies should mar no plan
Symmetric of the qualities
Claiming respect from—say—a man
That's strong and stern. "Once more be prie
Into me with those critical eyes!"

No question! so—"Conclude, condemn
Each failure my poor self avows!
Leave to its fate all you contemn!
There's Solomon's selected spouse:
Earth needs must hold such maids—choose
Them!

Why, he was weeping! Surely gone
Sternness and strength: with eyes to ground
And voice a broken monotone—
"Only be as you were! Abound
In foibles, faults,—laugh, robed and crowned

"As Folly's veriest queen,—care I
One feather-fluff? Look pity, Love,
On prostrate me—your foot shall try
This forehead's use—mount there beseem, and
And reach what Heaven you dignify!"

Now, what could bring such change about?
The thought perplexed: till, following
His gaze upon the ground,—why, out
Came all the secret! So, a thing
Thus simple has deposed my king!

For, spite of weeds that strove to spoil
Plain reading on the lettered slab,
My name was clear enough — no soil
Effaced the date when one chance stab
Of scorn... if only ghosts might stab!

INAPPREHENSIONS

We two stood simply friend-like side by side,
Viewing a twilight country far and wide,
Till she at length broke silence. "How it towers
Yonder, the ruin o'er this vale of ours!
The West's faint flare behind it so relieves
Its rugged outline — sight perhaps deceives,
Or I could almost fancy that I see
A branch wave plain — belike some wind-sown

Chance-rooted where a missing turret was.
What would I give for the perspective glass
At home, to make out if 't is really so!
Has Ruskin noticed here at Assolo?
That certain weed-growth on the ravaged wall
Seem'd... something that I could not say at all,
My thought being rather — as absorbed she sent
Look onward after look from eyes distant
With longing to reach Heaven's gate left ajar—
"Oh, fancies that might be, oh, facts are!
What of a wilding? By you stands, and may
So stand unnoticed till the Judgment Day,
One who, if once aware that your regard
Claimed what his heart holds, — woe, as from its sword
The flower, the dormant passion, so to speak—
Then what a rush of life would startling wreak
Revenge on your inapprehensive stare
While, from the ruin and the West's faint flare,
You let your eyes meet mine, touch what you term

Quiescence — that's an universe in germ —
The dormant passion needing but a look
To burst into immense life!

"No, the book
Which noticed how the wall-growth waves," said she,
"Was not by Ruskin."
I said, "Vernon Lee."

WHICH?

So, the three Court-ladies began
Their trial of who judged best
In esteeming the love of a man:
Who preferred with most reason was thereby confessed
Boy-Cupid's exemplary catcher and eager;
An Abbé crossed legs to decide on the wager.

First the Duchessa: "Mine for me —
Who were it but God's for Him,
And the King's for — who but he?
Both faithful and loyal, one grace more shall brim
His cup with perfection: a lady's true lover,
He holds — save his God and his king — none above her."

"I require" — outspoken the Marquise —
"Pure thoughts, ay, but also fine deeds:

Play the paladin must he, to please
My whim, and — to prove my knight's service exceeds
Your saint's and your loyalist's praying and kneeling —
Show wounds, each wide mouth to my mercy appealing."

Then the Comtesse: "My choice be a wretch,
Mere losel in body and soul.
Thrice accursed! What care I, so he stretch
Arms to me his sole savior, love's ultimate goal,
Out of earth and men's noise — names of 'infidel,' 'traitor."

Cast up at him? Crown me, crown's adjudicator!"

And the Abbé uncrossed his legs,
Took snuff, a reflective pinch,
Broke silence: "The question begs
Much pondering are I pronounce. Shall I finish?
The love which to one and one only has reference Seems terribly like what perhaps gains God's preference."

THE CARDINAL AND THE DOG

This poem was written in May, 1842, at the same time as the Pied Piper, both having been written at the request of Macready's little son, who was confined to the house by illness and wanted Browning to write him some poems for which he could make pictures.

CRESCENZIO, the Pope's Legate at the High Council, Trent, — Year Fifteen hundred twenty-two, March Twenty-five — intent
On writing letters to the Pope till late into the night,
Rose, weary, to refresh himself, and saw a monstrous sight:
(I give mine Author's very words: he penned,
I reindite.)

A black Dog of vast bigness, eyes flaming, ears that hung
Down to the very ground almost, into the chamber sprung
And made directly for him, and laid himself right under The table where Crescenzi wrote — who called in fear and wonder
His servants in the ante-room, commanded every one
To look for and find out the beast: but, looking,
they found none.

The Cardinal fell melancholy, then sick, soon after died:
And at Verona, as he lay on his death-bed, he cried
Aloud to drive away the Dog that leapt on his bedside.
Heaven keep us Protestants from harm: the rest... no ill betide!

THE POPE AND THE NET

What, he on whom our voices unanimously ran,
Made Pope at our last Conclave? Full low his life began:
His father earned the daily bread as just a fisherman.

So much the more his boy minds book, gives proof of mother-wit,
Becomes first Deacon, and then Priest, then Bishop: see him sit
No less than Cardinal erelong, while no one cries "Unfit!"

But some one smirks, some other smiles, jogs elbow and nods head:
Each winks at each: "I'm faithful, a rise! Saint Peter's net, instead Of sword and keys, is come in vogue!" You think he blushes red?

Not he, of humble holy heart! "Unworthy me!" he sighs:
"From fisher's drudge to Church's prince—it is indeed a rise:
So, here's my way to keep the fact forever in my eyes!"

And straightway in his palace-hall, where commonly is set
Some coat-of-arms, some portraiture ancestral, lo, we met
His mean estate's reminder in his fisher-father's net!

Which step conciliates all and some, stops cavil in a trice:
"The humble holy heart that holds of new-born pride no splice!
He's just the saint to choose for Pope!" Each adds, "T is my advice."

So, Pope he was: and when we flocked—it sacred slipper on—
To kiss his foot, we lifted eyes, a slack, the thing was gone—
That guarantee of lowlihead,—eclipsed that star which shone!

Each eyed his fellow, one and all kept silence.
I cried, "Fish!
I'll make me spokesman for the rest, express the common wish.
Why, Father, is the net removed?" "Son, it hath caught the fish."

THE BEAN-FEAST

He was the man—Pope Sixtus, that Fifth, that swineherd's son:

He knew the right thing, did it, and thanked God when 't was done:
But of all he had to thank for, my fancy somehow leans
To thinking, what most moved him was a certain meal on beans.

For one day, as his wont was, in just escape disguise
As he went exploring wickedness,—to see with his own eyes
If law had due observance in the city's dark
As well as where, 't open, crime stood an obvious mark,—

He chanced, in a blind alley, on a tumble-down once house.
Now hovel, vilest structure in Rome the remiss;
And, as his tact impelled him, Sixtus ventured bold,
To learn how lowliest subjects bore hunger, toil, and cold.

There sat they at high-supper—man and wife, lad and lass, Poor as you please, but cleanly all and care-free: pain that was —Forgotten, pain as sure to be left beside as its time,— Mightily munched the brave ones—what mattered gloom or grime?

Said Sixtus, "Feast, my children! who works hard needs eat well.
I'm just a supervisor, would hear what you can tell.
Do any wrongs want righting? The Father tries his best,
But, since he's only mortal, sends such as I to test.
The truth of all that's told him—how folk like you may fare:
Come!—only don't stop eating—when mouth has words to spare—

"You"—smiled he—"play the spokesmen, bell-wether of the flock!
Are times good, masters gentle? Your grievances unlock!
How of your work and wages?—pleasures, if such may be—Pains, as much are for certain." Thus smiling questioned he.

But somehow, spite of smiling, awed stole upon the group—
An inexpressible surmise: why should a priest thus stoop—Pry into what concerned folk? Each visage fell. Aware, Cries Sixtus interposing: "Nay, children, have no care!

"Fear nothing! Who employs me requires the plain truth. Pelf Beguiles who should inform me: so, I inform myself.
THE LADY AND THE PAINTER

See!" And he drew his hood back, let the close vesture ope, showed face, and where on tippet the cross lay: 't was the Pope.

Imagine the joyful wonder! "How shall the like of us —
Poor souls — require such blessing of our rude bean-feast?" "Thus —
Thus amply," laughed Pope Sixtus. "I early rise, asleep late;
Who works may eat: they tempt me, your beans there: spare a plate!"

Down sat he on the door-step: 't was they this time said grace:
He ate up the last mouthful, wiped lips, and then, with face Turned heavenward, broke forth thankful:
"Not now, that earth obeys
Thy word in mine, that through me the peoples Know Thy ways —
"But that Thy care extendeth to Nature's homely wants,
And, while man's mind is strengthened, Thy goodness nowise abandons.
Man's body of its comfort, — that I whom kings and queens
Crouch to, pick crumbs from off my table, relish beans!
The thunders I but seem to launch, there plain
That I have appetite, digest, and thrive — that boon 's for me."

MUCKLE-MOUTH MEG

BROUGHT the Laird on the Lord: "So, red-handed I catch thee?
Death-doomed by our Law of the Border!
We've a galloway outside and a chiel to dispatch thee:
Who trespasses — hangs: all 's in order."

He met frowned with smile, did the young English gallant:
Then the Laird's dame: "Nay, Husband, I beg!
He's comely: be merciful! Grace for the callant
— If he marries our Muckle-mouth Meg!

"No mile-wide-mouthed monster of yours do I marry:
Grant rather the gallowy!" laughed he.
"Poul fare kith and kin of you — why do you tarry?"
"To tame your fierce temper!" quothe she.

"Shove him quick in the Hole, shut him fast for a week:
Cold, darkness, and hunger work wonders:
Who lion-like roars now, mouse-fashion will squeak;
And 'it rains' soon succed to 'it thunders.'"

A week did he bide in the cold and the dark
— Not hunger: for duly at morning
In fettle a lass, and a voice like a lark
Chirped, "Muckle-mouth Meg still ye're scorrin?"
"Go hang, but here's a parrotch to hearten ye first!"
"Did Meg's muckle-mouth boast within some Such music as yours, mine should match it or burst:
No frog-jaws! So tell folk, my Winsome!"

Soon week came to end, and, from Hole's door set wide,
Out he marched, and there waited the lassie:
"You gallowy, or Muckle-mouth Meg for a bride!
Consider! Sky's blue and turf's grassy:
"Life's sweet: shall I say ye wed Muckle-mouth Meg?"
"Not I," quothe the stout heart: "too sentry
The mouth that can swallow a bubblyjock's egg:
Shall I let it munch mine? Never, Dearie!
"Not Muckle-mouth Meg? Wow, the obstinate man!
Perhaps he would rather wed me!"
"Ay, would he — with just for a dowry your can!"
"I'm Muckle-mouth Meg," chirruped she.
"Then so — so — so — so —" as he kissed her apace—
"Will I widen thee out till thou meetest
From Margaret Minnikin-mon', by God's grace,
To Muckle-mouth Meg in good earnest!"

ARCADES AMBO

A. You blame me that I ran away?
Why, Sir, the enemy advanced:
Balls flew about, and — who can say
But one, if I stood firm, had glanced
In my direction? Cowardice?
I only know we don't live twice.
Therefore — shun death, is my advice.

B. Shun death at all risks? Well, at some!
True, I myself, Sir, though I scold
The cowardly, by no means come Under reproof as overbold
— I, who would have no end of brutes
Cut up alive to guess what suits
My case and saves my toe from shoots.

So you profess!

PONTE DELL' ANGELO, VENICE

Stop rowing! This one of our byo-canals
O'er a certain bridge you have to cross
That's named, "Of the Angel": listen why!
The name "Of the Devil" too much appalls
Venetian acquaintance, so — his the least,
While the gain goes . . . look on high!

An angel visibly guards your house:
Above each sconce throne — a pair — stands he,
Enfolds them with droop of either wing:
The family's fortune were perilous
Did he thence depart — you will soon agree,
If I hitch into verse the thing.

For, once on a time, this house belonged
To a lawyer of note, with law and to spare,
But also with overmuch lust of gain:
In the matter of law you were nowise wronged,
But alas for the hue! He picked you bare
To the bone. Did folk complain?

"I exact," growled he, "work's rightful due:
'T is folk seek me, not I seek them.
Advice at its price! They succeed or fail,
Get law in each case — and a lesson too:
Keep clear of the Courts — is advice ad rem:
They'll remember, I 'll be bail!"

So, he pocketed fee without a qualm.
What reason for squeamishness? Labor done,
To play he betook him with lightened heart,

Ate, drank, and made merry with song a
psalm,
Since the yoke of the Church is an easy one —
Fits neck nor causes smart.

Brief: never was such an extortionate
Rascal — the word has escaped my teeth!
And yet — (all's down in a book no less Indited, believe me!) — this reprobate
Was punctual at prayer-time; gold lurked be neath
Alloy of the rankest brass.

For, play the extortioner as he might,
Fleece folk each day and all day long,
There was this redeeming circumstance:
He never lay down to sleep at night
But he put up a prayer first, brief yet strong,
"Our Lady avert mishance!"

Now it happened at close of a fruictuous week
"I must ask," quoth he, "some Saint to dine:
I want that widow well out of my ears
With bustling and wailing. Who bids her seek Redress at my hands? 'She was wronged!'
Folk whine.
If to Law wrong right appears.

"Matteo da Bascio — he's my man!"
No less than Chief of the Capucins:
His presence will surely suffumigate
My house — fools think lies under a ban
If somebody loses what somebody wizes.
Hark, there he knocks at the grate!

"Come in, thou blessed of Mother Church!
I go and prepare — to bid, that is,
My trusty and diligent servitor
Get all things in readiness. Vain the search Through Venice for one to compare with this My model of ministrants: for —

"For — once again, nay, three times over,
My helpmate 's an ape! so intelligent,
I train him to drudge at household work:
He toils and he moans, I live in clover:
Oh, you shall see! There's a goodly scent —
From his cooking, or I 'm a Turk!

"Scoarse need to descend and supervise:
'I'll do it, however: wait here awhile!'
So, down to the kitchen gayly scuttles
Our host, nor notes the alarmed surmise
Of the holy man. 'O depth of guile!
He blindly guzzles and gullets,

"While — who is it dresses the food and pays
The liquor? Some fiend — I make no doubt—
In likeness of — which of the loothly brutes?
An ape! Where hides he? No bull that gows,
No bear that thugs — 't is the mock and jest
Of an ape, fiend's face that suits.

"So — out with thee, creature, wherever thee hidest!
I charge thee, by virtue of . . . right as I
judge!"
There skulks he perdue, crouching under the bed.
Well done! What, forsooth, in beast's shape thou confidest?
I know and would name thee but that I begrudge Breath spent on such carrion. Instead —

"I adjure thee by ———" "Stay!" laughed the portent that rose
From floor up to ceiling: "No need to adjure!
See Satan in person, late aep by command
Of Him thou adjurest in vain. A saint's nose
Scents brimstone though incense be burned for a lure.
Yet, hence! for I'm safe, understand!

"'Tis my charge to convey to fit punishment's place
This lawyer, my liege-man, for cruelty wrought
On his clients, the widow and orphan, poor souls
He has plagued by exactions which proved law's disgrace,
Made equity void and to nothingness brought God's pity. Fiends, on with fresh coals!"

"Stay!" nowise confounded, withstands Hell itself's match:
"How comes it, were truth in this story of thine?
God's punishment suffered a minute's delay?
Weeks, months, have elapsed since thou squatted at watch
For a spring on thy victim: what caused thee decline Advantage till challenged to-day?"

"That challenge I meet with contempt," quoth the fiend.
"Thus much I acknowledge: the man's armed in mail:
I wait till a joint's loose, then quick ply my claw.
Thy friend's one good custom — he knows not — has screened
His flesh hitherto from what else would assail:
At 'Save me, Madonna!' I pause.

"That prayer did the lord but once pretermit,
My pounce were upon him. I keep me attaint:
He's in safety but till he's caught napping.
Enough!"

"Ay, enough!" smiles the Saint — "for the
biter is bit,
The spy caught in somnolence. Vanish! I'm sent
To smooth up what fiends do in rough."

"I vanish? Through wall or through roof?" the riport Grinned gayly. "My orders were — 'Leave not unharmed
The abode of this lawyer! Do damage to prove
'T was for something thou quittedst the land
Of the lost —
To add to their number this unit!' Though charmed
From descent there, on earth that's above

"I may haply amerce him." "So do, and be gone!
I command thee! For, look! Though there's doorway behind
And window before thee, go straight through the wall,
Leave a breach in the brickwork, a gap in the stone
For who passes to stare at!" "Spare speech! I'm resigned:
Here goes!" roared the goblin, as all —

Wide bat-wings, spread arms and legs, tail out a-stream,
Crash obstacles went, right and left, as he soared
Or else sank, was clean gone through the hole anyhow.
The Saint returned thanks: then a satisfied gleam
On the bald polished pate showed that triumph was scored.
"To dinner with appetite now!"

Down he trips. "In good time!" smirks the host. "Didst thou scent
Rich savour of roast meat? Where hides he, my ape?
Look alive, be alert! He's away to wash plates.
Sit down, Saint! What's here? Dost examine a rent
In the napkin thou twistest and twirlst?
Agape . . .

Ha, blood is it dries nor abates
"From thy wringing a cloth, late was lavendered fair?
What means such a marvel?" "Just this does it mean:
I convince and convict thee of sin!" answers straight
The Saint, wringing on, wringing ever — oh, rare! —
Blood — blood from a napery snow not more clean.
"A miracle shows thee thy state!"
"See! — blood thy extortions have wrung from the flesh
Of thy clients who, sheep-like, arrived to be shorn,
And left thee — or fleeced to the quick or so
That, behold, their blood gurgles and grumbles afresh
To accuse thee! Ay, down on thy knees, get up sworn To restore! Restitution once made,
"Sin no more! Dost thou promise? Absolved, then, arise!
Upstairs follow me! Art amazed at thy breach?
Who battered and shattered and scattered, escape
From thy purgious obtaining? That Father of Lies ASOLANDO

Thou wast wont to extol for his feats, all and each
The Devil’s disguised as thine ape!”

Be sure that our lawyer was torn by remorse,
Shed tears in a flood, vowed and swore so to alter
His wish that how else could our Saint but declare
He was cleansed of past sin? “For sin future
— fare worse
Thou undoubtedly wilt,” warned the Saint,
“shouldst thou falter
One whit!” “Oh, for that have no care!

“I am firm in my purpose, amendment. But, prithee,
Must ever affront and affright me, you gap?
Who made it for exit may find it of use
For entrance as easy. If, down in his smithy
He forges me fetters — when heated, mayhap,
He’ll up with an armful! Broke loose —

“How bar him out henceforth?” “Judiciously urged!”
Was the good man’s reply. “How to balk him is plain.
There’s nothing the Devil objects to so much,
So speedily flies from, as one of those purged
Of his presence, the angels who erst formed his train—
His, their emperor. Choose one of such!

“Get fashioned his likeness and set him on high
At back of the breach thus adroitly filled up:
Display him as guard of two scutcheons, thy arms:
I warrant no devil attempts to get by
And disturb thee so guarded. Eat, drink, dine, and sup,
In thy rectitude, safe from alarms!”

So said and so done. See, the angel has place
Where the Devil has passage! All down’s in a book.
Gainsay me? Consult it! Still faithless?
Trust me?
Trusted Father Bovero who gave me the case
In his Annals — gets of it, by hook or by crook,
Two confirmative witnesses: three

Are surely enough to establish an act:
And thereby we learn — would we ascertain truth —
To trust wise tradition which took, at the time,
Note that served till slow history ventured on fact,
Though folk have their fling at tradition forsooth!
Row, boys, fore and aft, rhyme and chime!

BEATRICE SIGNORINI

This strange thing happened to a painter once:
Viterbo boasts the man among her sons
Of note, I seem to think: his ready tool
Picked up its precepts in Cortona’s school —
That’s Pietro Boreretti, whom they call
Cortona, these Italians: greatish-small,
Our painter was his pupil, by repute
His match if not his master absolute,
Though whether he spoiled fresco more or less,
And what’s its fortune, scarce repays your gaze.

Still, for one circumstance, I save his name
— Francesco Romanelli: do the same!
He went to Rome and painted: there he knew
A wonder of a woman painting too —
For she, at least, was no Cortona’s drudge:
Witness that ardent fancy-shape — I judge
A semblance of her soul — she called, “Desire”
With starry front for guide, where sits the fire
She left to brighten Buonarroti’s house.
If you see Florence, pay that piece your vow.
Though blockhead Baldinucci’s mind, imbued
With monkish morals, bade folk “Drape the nude
And stop the scandal!” quoth the record thus:
I borrow this of: hang his book and him!
At Rome, then, where these fated ones met first,
The blossom of his life had hardly burst
While hers was blooming at full beauty’s stand:
No less Francesco — when half-ripe he scented
Consummate Artemisia — grew one want.
To have her his and make her minister
With every gift of body and of soul
To him. In vain. Her sphere self was wide — Might only touch his orb at Art’s sole point.
Suppose he could persuade her to emjoint
Her life past, present, future — all in his
At Art’s sole point by some explorer
Of love through lips, would love’s success defeat
Artistry’s haunting curse — the Incomplete?
Artists no doubt they both were — what besides
Was she — who long had felt heart, soul spread wide
Her life out, knowing much and loving well.
On either side Art’s narrow space where fell
Reflection from his own speck: but the germ
Of individual genius — what we term
The very self, the God-gift whence had grown
Heart’s life and soul’s life — how make that his own?
Vainly his Art, reflected, smiled in small
On Art’s one facet of her ampler ball;
The rest, touch-free, took in, gave back
Her heaven, earth, all where he was not. Hope, well-nigh on birth
Came to Desire, died off all-unfulfilled.
“Who thought in Art I stand the abler-skilled,”
(So he conceded: mediocrity Turns on itself the self-transforming eye)
“’If only Art were suing, mine would please
To purpose: man — by nature I exceed Woman the bounded: but how much besides
She boasts, would sue in turn and be denied!
Love her? My own wife loves me in a sort
That suits us both: she takes the world’s repast
Of what my work is worth, and, for the rest.
Concedes that, while his consort keeps her nest,
The eagle soars a licensed vagrant, lives
A wide free life which she at least forgoes—
Good Beatrice Signorini! Well
And wisely did I choose her. But the spell
To subjugate this Artemisia — where?
She passionless? — she resolute to care
Nowise beyond the plain sufficiency
Of fact that she is she and I am I.
— Acknowledged arbitrator for us both
In her life as in mine which she were loth
Even to learn the laws of? No, and no,
Twenty times over! Ay, it must be so:
I for myself, alas!

Whereon, instead
Of the checked lover's-utterance — why, he said
— Leaning over her easel: "Flesh is red"
(Or some such just remark) — "by no means white
As Guido's practice teaches: you are right."
Then stemmed the better impulse: "What if pride
Were wisely trampled on, what'er betide?
If I grow hers, not mine — join lives, confuse Bodies and spirits, gain her not but lose Myself to Artemisia? That were love!
Of two souls — one must bend, one rule above:
If I crouch under proudly, lord turned slave,
Were it not worthier both than if she gave Herself — in treason to herself — to me?

And, all the while, he felt it could not be.
Such love was true love: love that way who can!
Some one that's born half woman, not whole man:
For man, prescribed man better or man worse,
Why, whether microcosm or universe,
What law prevails through great and small,
The world and man—world's miniature we call?
Male is the master. "That way" smiled and
Our true male estimator — "puts her pride
My wife in making me the outlet whence
She learns all Heaven allows: 'tis my pretense
To paint: her lord should do what else but paint?
Do I break brushes, cloister me turned saint?
Then, best of all suits sanctity her spouse
Who acts for Heaven, allows and disallows
At pleasure, past appeal, the right, the wrong
In all things. That's my wife's way. But this strong Confident Artemisia — an adept
In Art does she conceit herself? 'Except
In just this instance,' tell her, 'no one draws
More rigidly observant of the laws
Of right design: yet here, — permit me hint, —
If the aconitum had a deeper dint.
That shoulder were perfection.' What surprise
— Nay scorn, shoots black fire from those startled eyes!
She to be lessoned in design forsooth!
I'm doomed and done for, since I spoke the truth.

Make my own work the subject of dispute—
Fails it of just perfection absolute
Somewhere? Those motors, flexores,— don't I know
Ser Santi, styled 'Turritototo
The pencil-prig,' might blame them? Yet my wife —
Were he and his nicknamer brought to life,
Tito and Titian, to pronounce again —
Ask her who knows more — I or the great Twain,
Our colorist and draughtsman!
"I help her,
Not she helps me; and neither shall demur
Because my portion is" — he chose to think —
"Quite other than a woman's: I may drink
At many waters, must repose by none —
Rather arise and fare forth, having done
Duty to one new excellence the more,
Abler thereby, though impotent before
So much was gained of knowledge. Best depart
From this last lady I have learned by heart!

Thus he concluded of himself — resigned
To play the man and master: "Man boasts
mind;
Woman, man's sport calls mistress, to the same
Does body's suit and service. Would she claim
— My placid Beatrice-wife — pretense
Even to blame her lord if, going hence,
He wistfully regards one whom — did fate
Concede — he might accept queen, abdicate
Kingship because of? — one of no meek sort
But masterful as he: man's match in short?
Oh, there's no secret I were best conceal!
Bié shall know; and should a stray tear steal
From out the blue eye, stain the rose cheek —
Bash!
A smile, a word's gay reassurance — ah,
With kissing interspersed,— shall make amends,
Turn pain to pleasure."

"What, in truth so ends
Abruptly, do you say, our intercourse?
Next day, asked Artemisia: "I'll divorce
Husband and wife no longer. Go your ways,
Leave Rome! Viterbo owns no equal, says
The by-word, for fair women: you, no doubt,
May boast a paragon all specks without,
Using the painter's privilege to choose
Among what's rarest. Will your wife refuse Acceptance from — no rival — of a gift?
You paint the human figure I make shift
Humbly to reproduce: but, in my hours
Of idleness, what I fain would paint is — flowers. Look now!"

She twitched aside a veiling cloth.
"Here is my keepsake — frame and picture both:
For see, the frame is all of flowers festooned
About an empty space, — left thus, to wound
No natural susceptibility:"
How can I guess? 'Tis you must fill, not I.
The central space with — her whom you like best!
That is your business, mine has been the rest.
But judge!"

How judge them? Each of us, in flowers,
Chooses his love, allsies it with past hours,
Old meetings, vanished forms and faces: no —
Here let each favorite unmolested blow
For one heart's homage, no tongue's banal praise,
Whether the rose appealingly bade "Gaze
Your fill on me, suitless who dethrone
The gaudy tulp!" or 't was "Me alone
Rather do homage to, who lily am,
No unabashed rose!" "Do I vainly cram
My cup with sweets, your jonquils?"
"Why forget
Vernal endearments with the violet?"
So they consented yet concerted, all
As one, to circle round about, enthral
Yet, self-forgetting, rush to prominence.
The midmost wonder, gained no matter whence.

There's a tale extant, in a book I've combed
Long years ago, which treats of things beyond
The common, antique times and countries queer
And customs strange to match. "'Tis said, last year,"

'Reckons my author" 'that the King had mind
To view his kingdom — guessed at from behind
A palace-window hitherto. Announced
No sooner was such purpose than 't was pounced
Upon by all the ladies of the land —
Loyal but light of life: they formed a band
Of loveliest ones but listless also, since
Proudly they all combined to bear their prince Backs joined to breasts, — arms, legs, — nay,
ankles, wrists,
Hands, feet, I know not by what turns and twists,
So interwoven lay that you believed
'T was sole beast of burden which received
The monarch on its back, of breadth not scant,
Since fifty girls made one white elephant."
So with the fifty flowers which shapes and hues
Blend, as I tell, and made one fast yet loose
Mixture of beauties, composite, distinct
No less in each combining flower that linked
With flower to form a fit environment
For — whom might be the painter's heart's in-tent
Thus, in the midst enthralled, to enshrine?

"This glory-guarded middle space — is mine?
For me to fill?"

"For you, my Friend! We part,
Never perchance to meet again. Your Art —
What if I mean it — so to speak — shall wed
My own, be witness of the life we led
When sometimes it has seemed our souls near found
Each one the other as its mate — unbound
Had yours been haply from the better choice
— Beautiful Blos: 't is the common voice,
The crowning verdict. Make whom you like best
Queen of the central space, and manifest
Your predilection for what flower beyond
All flowers finds favor with you. I am fond
Of — say — you rose's rich predominance,
While — what wonder? — more affect the glance
The gentler violet from its leafy screen
Ventures: so — choose your flower and paint your queen!"

Oh, but the man was ready, head as hand,
Instructed and adroit. "Just as you stand.
Stay and be made — would Nature but relax—
By Art immortal!"

Every implement
In tempting reach — a palette primed, each square
Of oil-paint in its proper patent — with these,
Brushes, a veritable sheaf to grasp!
He worked as he had never dared.

My Art from yours who can!" — he cried a length,
As down he threw the pencil — "Grace from Strength
Dissociate, from your flowery fringe detach
My face of whom it frames, — the feat will fail.

With that of Time should Time from me extract
Your memory, Artemisia!" And in fact, —
What with the prickling impulse, sudden glow
Of soul — head, hand cooperated so
That face was worthy of its frame, 'tis said —
Perfect, suppose! They parted. Soon instead
Of Rome was home, — of Artemisia — well.
The placid-perfect wife. And it befell
That after the first incontestably Blessedest of all blisses (- wherefore try
Your patience with embraces and the rest
Due from Calypso's all-unwilling guest.
To his Penelope?) — there somehow came
The coolness which as duly follows flame.
So, one day, "What if we inspect the gifts
My Art has gained us?"

Now the wife uplifts
A casket-lid, now tries a medal's chain
Round her own lithe neck, fits a ring in vain — Too loose on the fine finger, — vows and swears
The jewel with two pendent pearls like tears
Better a lady's bosom — witness else!
And so forth, while Ulysses smiles.

"Such spells
Subdue such natures — sex must worship toys
— Trinkets and trifle: yet, ah, quite other joys
Must stir from sleep the passionate abyss
Of — such an one as her I know — not this My gentle consort with the milk for blood! Why, did it chance that in a careless mood
(In those old days, gone — never to return —
When we talked — she to teach and I to learn)
I dropped a word, a hint which might imply Consorts exist — how quick flashed fire from
eye,
Brow blackened, lip was pinched by furious lip!
I needed no reminder of my slip:
One warning taught me wisdom. Whereas
here...
Aha, a sportive fancy! Eh, what fear
Of harm to follow? Just a whim indulged!

"My Beatrice, there's an undivulged
Surprise in store for you: the moment's fit
For letting loose a secret: out with it!
Tributes to worth, you rightly estimate
These gifts of Prince and Bishop, Church and State:
Yet, may I tell you? Tastes so disagree!
There’s one gift, preciousest of all to me,
I doubt if you would value as well worth
The obvious sparkling gauds that men unshear
For toy-cult mainly of woman-kind;
Such make you marvel, I conceive: while blind
The sex proves to the greater marvel here
I tell to bulk its envy. Be sincere!
Say, should you search creation far and wide,
Was ever face like this?

He drew aside
The veil, displayed the flower-framed portrait kept
For private delection.

No adept
In florist’s lore more accurately named
And praised or, as appropriately, blamed
Specimen after specimen of skill.

Than Bion. “Rightly placed the daffodil—
Scarcely so right the blue germander. Gray
Good mouse-ear! Hardly your auricula
Is powdered white enough. It seems to me
Scarlet not crimson, that anemone:
But there’s an amends in the pink saxifrage.
O darling dear ones, let me disengage
You innocents from what your harmlessness
Clasps lovingly! Out thou from their cares, Serpent!”

Whereat forth-flashing from her coils
On coils of hair, the spilla in its teeth
Of yellow wealth, the dagger-plaything kept
To pin its plaits together, life-like leapt
And—woe to all inside the coronal!

Stab followed stab, — cut, slash, she ruined all
The masterpiece. Alack for eye and mouth
And dimples and endearment—North and South,
East, West, the tatters in a fury flew:
There yawned the circle. What remained to do?

She flung the weapon, and, with folded arms
And mien defiant of such low alarms
As death and doom beyond death, Bion stood Passively statuesque, in quietude
Awaiting judgment.

And out judgment burst
With frank unloading of love’s laughter, first Freed from its unsuspected source. Some three Must needs unlock love’s prison-bars, lest flow
The joyance.

“Then you ever were, still are,
And henceforth shall be—so occluded star
But my refulgent Bion, sun-revealed,
Full-rondure! Woman-glory uncoiled,
So front me, find and claim and take your own
My soul and body yours and yours alone,
As you are mine, mine wholly! Heart’s love, take—Use your possession—stab or stay at will
Here—hating, saving—woman with the skill
To make man beast or god!”

And so it proved:
For, as besmeared new godship, thus he loved,
Past power to change, until his dying-day,—
Good fellow! And I fain would hope—some say
Indeed for certain—that our painter’s toils
At fresco-spreading, finer stroke in oils,
Were not so mediocre after all:
Perhaps the work appears unduly small
From having loomed too large in old esteem, Patronized by late Popacy. I seem Myself to have cast eyes on certain work
In sundry galleries, no judge need shirk
From moderately praising. He designed Correctly, nor in color lagged behind
His age: but both in Florence and in Rome
The elder race so make themselves at home
That scarce we give a glance to ceiling-guls
Of such like as Francesco. Still, one calls
From out the heaped laudations of the time
The pretty incident I put in rhyme.

FLUTE-MUSIC, WITH AN ACCOMPANIMENT

He, Ah, the bird-like fluting
Through the ash-tops yonder—
Bullfinch-bubblings, soft sounds suitings
What sweet thoughts, I wonder?
Fine-poesied notes that surely
Gather, dewdrop-fashion,
Deep-down in some heart which purely Secretes globuled passion—
Passion inexpressive
Such is piped, for certain;
Love, no doubt, nay, love excessive
’T is, your ash-tops curtail.

Would your ash-tops open
We might spy the player—
Seek and find some sense which no pen
Yet from singer, sayer,
Ever has extracted:
Never, to my knowledge,
Yet has pedantry enacted
That, in Cupid’s College,
Just this variation
Of the old, old yearning
Should by plain speech have salvation,
Yield new men new learning.

“Love!” but what love, nicely
New from old dissipated,
Would the player teach precisely?
First of all, he started
In my brain Assurance—
Trust—entire Contentment—
Passion proved by much endurance;
Then came—no resentment,
No, but simply Sorrow:
What was seen had vanished:
Yesterday so blue! To-morrow
Blank, all sunshine banished.

Hark! ’T is Hope resurgens,
Struggling through obstruction—
Forces a poor smile which verges
On Joy’s introduction.
Now, perhaps, more Musing:
“Holds earth such a wonder?
Fairy-mortal, soul-sense-fusing
Past thought’s power to sunder!”
What? calm Acquiescence?
"Daisied turf gives room to
Trefoil, plucked once in her presence —
Grewing by her tomb too!"

She. All 's your fancy-spinning!
Here 's the fact: a neighbor
Never-ending, still beginning,
Recreates his labor:
Deep o'er desk he drudges,
Adds, divides, subtracts and Multiplies, until he judges
Noonday-horn's exact sand
Shows the hour-glass emptied:
Then comes lawful leisure,
Minutes rare from toil exempted,
Fit to spend in pleasure.

Out then with — what treatise?
Youth's Complete Instructor
How to play the Flute. Quid petis?
Follow Youth's conductor
On and on, through Easy,
Up to harder, Hardest
Flute-piece, till thou, flautist wheasy,
Possibly dishearted
Tootlings hoarse and huaky,
Mayst expend with courage
Breath — on tunes once bright, now dusky —
Meant to cool thy porridge.

That's an air of Tulou's
He maltreats persistent,
Till as lief I'd hear some Zulu's
Madden native dances.
I'm the man's familiar:
Unexpectedness enhances
What your ear's auxiliar
— Fancy — finds suggestive.
Listen! That's legato
Rightly played, his fingers restive
Touch as if staccato.

He. Ah, you trick-betrayer!
Telling tales, unwrigh one?
So the secret of the player
Was — he could surprise one
Well-nigh into trusting
Here was a musician
Skilled consummately, yet lasting
Through no vile ambition
After making captive
All the world, — rewarded
Amply by one stranger's rapture,
Common praise discarded.

So, without assistance
Such as music rightly
Needs and claims, — defying distance,
Overleaping lightly
Obstacles which hinder,
He, for my approval.
All the same and all the kinder
Made mine what might move all
Earth to kneel adoring:
Took — while he piped Goumod's

Bit of passionate imploring —
Me for Juliet: who knows?
No! as you explain things,
All's mere repetition,
Pray, weather-pothe: of all vain things
Why waste pooh or pith on Toilsome effort — never Ending, still beginning
After what should pay endeavor — Right-performance? winning
Weariness from you who,
Ready to admire some Owl's fresh hooting — Tu-whit, tu-who—
Find stale trash—songs tiresome.

She. Songs, Spring thought perfection,
Summer criticisms:
What in May escaped detection,
August, past surprises.
Notes, and names each blundered.
You, the just-initiate,
Pray to hear's content (what wonder?)
Tootings I hear vitiate
Roméo's serenade:
I who, times full twenty
Turned to ice — no ash-tops aiding —
At his coo-دمات.

So, 't was distance altered
Sharps to flats? The missing
Bar when syncopeation faltered
(You thought — paused for kissing?)
Ash-tops too felonious Incorrected? Rather
Say — they well-nigh made emphasis
Discord, helped to gather
Phrase, by phrase, turn patches
Into simulated
Unity which botching matches, —
Scraps re-integrated.

He. Sweet, are you suggestive
Of an old suspicion
Which has always found me restive
To its admonition
When it ventured whisper
"Fool, the strife's and struggles
Of your trembler — blusher — hisper
Were so many juggles,
Tricks tried — oh, so often! —
Which once more do duty,
Find again a heart to soften,
Soul to share with beauty."

Birth-blush of the briar-rose,
Mist-bloom of the hedge-sloe,
Some one gains the prize: admire rose
Would he, when moon's wedge — slow —
Sure, has pushed, expanded
Rathe pink to raw redness?
Would he covet aloe when sanded
By road-dust to deadness?
So — renew their value!
Ply a water-sprinkle!
Then guess aloe is fingered, shall you?
Fipd in rose a wrinkle?
Here what played Aquarius?
Distance — ash-tops aiding,
Reconciled scraps else contrarious,
Brightened stuff fast fading.
Distance — call your shyness:
Was the fair one peevish?
Coyness softened out of ayness.
Was she cunning, walky,
All-but-proved imposter?
Bear but one day’s exile,
Ugly traits were wholly lost or
Screened by fancies flexible.
Ash-tops these, you take me?
Fancies’ interference
Changed . . .
But since I sleep, don’t wake me!
What if all’s appearance?
Is not outside seeming
Real as substance inside?
Both are facts, so leave me dreaming:
If who loses wise I’d
Ever lose, — conjecture,
From one phrase trilled deftly,
All the piece. So, end your lecture,
Let who lied be left lie!

"IMPERANTE AUGUSTO NATUS EST—"

What it was struck the terror into me?
This, Publius: closer! while we wait our turn  I’ll tell you. Water’s warm (they ring inside)
At the eighth hour, till when no use to bathe.

Here in the vestibule where now we sit,
One source stood yesterday, the throng was such
Of loyal gapers, folk all eye and ear
While Lucius Varius Rufus in their midst
Read out that long-planned late-completed
piece,
His Pangen to the Emperor.
"Nobody like him," little Placens laughed,
"At leading forth an Ephes with due pomp!
Only, when godlike Caesar swells the theme,
How should mere mortals hope to praise aright?
Tell me, thou offshoot of Etruscan kings!"
Whereat Mecenas smiling sighed assent.

I paid my quadrans, left the Thermes’s roar
Of rapture as the poet asked, “What place
Among the godshies Jove, for Caesar’s sake,
Would bid its actual occupant vacate
In favor of the new divinity?” And got the expected answer, “Yield thine
own!” —

Jove thus dethroned, I somehow wanted air,
And found myself a-pacing street and street,
Letting the sunset, rosy over Rome —
Clear my head dizzy with the hubbub—say,
As if thought’s dance therein had kicked up dust.
By trampling on all else: the world lay prone,
As — post-propped, in brave hemistichs—
Their subject triumphed up from man to God.
Caius Octavius Caesar the August —
Where was escape from his prepontency?

I judge I may have passed — how many piles
Of structure dropt like doles from his free hand
To Rome on every side? Why, right and left,
For temples you’ve the Thundering Jupiter,
Avenging Mars, Apollo Palatine:
How count Piazza, Forum — there’s a third
All but completed. You’ve the Theatre Named of Marcellus — all his work, such
work! —
One thought still ending, dominating all —
With warrant Varius sang, “Be Caesar God!”
By what a hold arrests he Fortune’s wheel,
Obtaining and retaining heaven and earth
Through Fortune, if you like, but favor — no!
For the great deeds flashed by me, fast and
thick
As stars which storm the sky on autumn
ights —
Those conquests! but peace crowned them, —
so, of peace
Count up his titles only — these, in few —
Ten years Triumvir, Consul thirteen times,
Emperor, — the glory topping all —
Hailed Father of his Country, last and best
Of titles, by himself accepted so:
And why not? See but feats achieved in
Rome —
Not to say, Italy — he planted there
Some thirty colonies — but Rome itself
All new-built, “marble now, brick once,” he boasts:
This Portico, that Circus. Would you sail?
He had drained Tiber for you; would you walk?
He straightened out the long Flaminian Way.
Poor? Profit by his score of donatives!
Rich — that is, mirthful? Half-a-hundred games
Challenge your choice! There’s Rome — for you and me
Only? The centre of the world besides!
For, look the wide world over, where ends
Rome?
To sunrise? There’s Euphrates — all between!
To sunset? Ocean and immensity:
North, stare till Danube stops you: South, see Nile,
The Desert and the earth-upholding Mount.
Well may the poet-peole each with each
Wine in his praise, our company of swans,
Virgil and Horace, singers — in their way —
Nearly as good as Varius, though less famed:
Well may they cry, “No mortal, plainly God!”

Thus to myself myself said, while I walked:
Or would have said, could thought attain to
speech.
Clean baffled by enormity of bliss
The while I strove to scale its heights and sound
Its depths — this masterdom o’er all the world
Of one who was but born — like you, like me,
Like all the world he owns — of flesh and blood.
But he — how grasp, how gage his own conceit
Or bliss to me near inconceivable?
Or, since such flight too much makes reel the
brain,
Let’s sink — and so take refuge, as it were,
From life’s excessive altitude — to life’s
Breathable wayside shelter at its base!
If looms thus large this Caesar to myself—
Of senatorial rank and somebody—
How must he strike the vulgar nameless crowd,
Innumerable swarm that 's nobody at all?
Why,—for an instance,—much as you gold shape
Crowned, sceptred, on the temple opposite—
Fulgentant Jupiter—must daze the sense
Of—say, you outcast begging from its step!
"What, Anti-Cesar, monarch in the mud,
As he is pinnacled above thy pate?
Ay, beg away! thy lot contrasts full well
With his whose bounty yields thee this support—
Our Holy and Inviolable One,
Cesar, whose bounty built the fame above!
Dost read my thought?—Thy garb, alack, displays
Sore usage truly in each rent and stain—
Faugh! Wash though in Suburna! 'Ware the dogs
Who may not disdain a meal on thee!
What, stretchest forth a palm to catch my alms?
Aha, why yes: I must appear—who knows?—
In my toga, to thy rage and thee—
Questator—nay, Edile, Censor—Pol! perhaps
The very City-Prator's noble self!
As to me Cesar, so to thee am I?
Good: nor in vain shall prove thy quest, poor
Hither—hold palm out—take this quartered
And who did take it?—As he raised his head,
(My gesture was a trifle—well—abrupt.)
Back fell the broad flap of the peasant's hat,
The homespun cloak that muffled half his cheek
Dropped somewhat, and I had a glimpse—just one!
One was enough. Whose—whose might be the face?
That unkempt careless hair—brown, yellowish—
Those sparkling eyes beneath their eyebrows' ridges (Each meets each, and the hawk-nose rules between) —That was enough, no glimpse was needed more!
And terrifyingly into my mind
Came that quick-hushed report was whispered us,
"They do say, once a year in sordid garb
He plays the mendicant, sits all day long,
Asking and taking alms of who may pass,
And so averting, if submission help,
Pate's envy, the dread chance and change of things
When Fortune—for a word, a look, a naught—
Turns spiteful and—the petted lioness
Strikes with her sudden paw, and prone falls each
Who patted late her neck superiorly,

Or trifled with those claw-tips velvet sheathed."
"He's God!" shouts Lucius Varrius Eutus:
"Man
And worms'meat any moment!" musters he
Some Power, admonishing the mortal-born.

Ay, do you mind? There's meaning in the fact
That whose conquers, triumphs, enters Roma,
Climbing the Capitolion, soaring thus
To glory's summit,—Publius, do you mark—
Ever the same attendant who, behind,
Above the Conqueror's head supports the crown
All too-demonstrative for human wear,
—One hand's employment—all the while it serves
Its fellow, backward flung, to point how, dis
Appended from the car, beneath the foot
Of the up-borns exulting Conqueror,
Frown—half-despaired—the instruments of shame,
The malefactor's due. Crown, now—Cres, when?

Who stands secure? Are even Gods so safe?
Jupiter that just now is dominant—
Are not there ancient dismal tales how once
A predecessor reigned ere Saturn came,
And who can say if Jupiter be lost?
Was it for nothing the gray Sibyl wrote
"Cesar Augustus regnant, shall be born
In blind Judea"—one to master him,
Him and the universe? An old-wife's tale?

Bath-drudge! Here, slave! No cheating:
Our turn next.
No loitering, or be sure you taste the lash!
Two strigils, two oil-drippers, each a sponge!

DEVELOPMENT

My Father was a scholar and knew Greek.
When I was five years old, I asked him case
"What do you read about?"
"The siege of Troy."
"What is a siege, and what is Troy?"
"Where?"
He piled up chairs and tables for a town,
Set me a-top for Priam, called our cat
—Helen, enticed away from home (he said)
By wicked Paris, who couched somewhere close
Under the footstool, being cowardly,
But whom—since she was worth the pains,
poor puss—
Touzer and Tray,—our dogs, the Atrides—thought
By taking Troy to get possession of —Always when great Achilles ceased to talk.
(My pony in the stable) forth would prance
And put to flight Hector—our page-boy's self.
This taught me who was who and what was what:
So far I rightly understood the case
At five years old; a huge delight it proved
DEVELOPMENT

And still proves—thanks to that instructor
sage
My Father, who knew better than to turn straight
Learning's full flare on weak-eyed ignorance,
Or, worse yet, leave weak eyes to grow sand-
blind.
Content with darkness and vacuity.

It happened, two or three years afterward,
That I—and playmates playing at Troy's Siege—
My Father came upon our make-believe.
"How would you like to read myself the tale
Properly told, of which I gave you first Mere1y such notion as a boy could bear?"
Pope, now, would give you the precise account
Of what, some day, by dint of scholarship,
You 'll hear—who knows?—from Homer's very mouth.
Learn Greek by all means, read the ' Blind Old
Man,
Sweetest of Singers'—tuphos which means
blind,
Hedias, which means sweetest. Time
enough!
Try, anyhow, to master him some day;
Until when, take what serves for substitute,
Read Pope, by all means!"
So I ran through Pope,
Enjoyed the tale—what history so true?
Also attacked my Frimer, duly drugged,
Grew fitter thus for what was promised next—
The very thing itself, the actual words,
When I could turn—say, Bnittmann to account.

Time passed, I ripened somewhat: one fine
day,
"Quite busy for the Iliad, nothing less?
There's Heine, where the big books block the shelf:
Don't skip a word, thumb well the Lexicon!"
I thumbed well and skipped nowise till I learned
Who was who, what was what, from Homer's
tongue,
And there an end of learning. Had you asked
The all-accomplished scholar, twelve years old,
"Who was it wrote the Iliad?"—what a laugh!
"Why, Homer, all the world knows: of his
life
Doubtless some facts exist: 't is everywhere:
We have not settled, though, his place of birth:
He begged, for certain, and was blind beside:
Seven cities claimed him—Scio, with best
right,
Thinks Byron. What he wrote? Those Hymns we have.
Then there's the 'Battle of the Frogs and Mice,'
That's all—unless they dig 'Margites' up
('I'd like that) nothing more remains to know."
Thus did youth spend a comfortable time;
Until—'What's this the Germans say in fact That Wolf found out first? It's unpleasant
work

Their chop and change, unsettling one's belief:
All the same, where we live, we learn, that's
sure.
So, I bent brow o'er Prolegomena.
And after Wolf, a dozen of his like
Proved there was never any Troy at all,
Neither Besiegers nor Besieged,—may,
worst—
No actual Homer, no authentic text,
No warrant for the fiction I, as fact,
Had treasured in my heart and soul so long—Ay, mark you! and as fact held still, still hold,
Spite of new knowledge, in my heart of hearts
And soul of souls, fact's essence freed and fixed
From accidental fancy's guardian sheath.
Amusedly thenceforward—thank my stars!—
However it got there, deprive who could—
Wring from the shrine my precious tenantry,
Helen, Ulysses, Hector and his Spouse,
Achilles and his Friend?—though Wolf—ah,
Wolf!
Why must he needs some doubting, spoil a
dream?
But then, "No dream's worth waking"—
Browning says:
And here's the reason why I tell thus much.
I, now mature man, you anticipate,
May blame my Father justifiably
For letting me dream out my nonsense thus,
And only by such slow and sure degrees
Permitting me to sift the grain from chaff,
Get truth and falsehood known and named as such.
Why did he ever let me dream at all,
Not bid me taste the story in its strength?
Suppose my childhood was scarce qualified
To rightly understand mythology,
Silence at least was in his power to keep:
I might have—somehow—correspondingly—
Well, who knows by what method, gained my gains,
Been taught, by forthrights not meanderings,
My aim should be to lose the, like Pteleus' son,
A lie as Hes't Sate, love my wedded wife,
Like Hector, and so on with all the rest.
Could not I have exorcistied this Without believing such man really were?
That is—he might have put into my hand
The "Ethics"? In translation, if you please,
Exact, no pretty lying that improves,
To suit the modern taste: no more, no less—
The "Ethics": 't is a treatise I find hard
To read aright now that my hair is gray,
And I can manage the original.
At five years old—how ill had fared its leaves!
Now, growing double o'er the stagirite,
At least I soil no page with bread and milk,
Nor crumble, dogs-eat and deface—boys' way.

REPHAN

Suggested by a very early recollection of a prose story by the noble woman and imaginative writer, Jane Taylor, of Norwich, [more correctly, of Ongar]. R. B.

How I lived, ere my human life began
In this world of yours,—like you, made man,—
When my home was the Star of my God Rephan?

Come then around me, close about,
World-weary earth-born ones! Darkest doubt
Or deepest despondency keeps you out?

Nowise! Before a word I speak,
Let my circle embrace your worn, your weak,
Brow-furrowed old age, youth's hollow cheek—

Diseased in the body, sick in soul,
Pinched poverty, satiate wealth,—your whole
Array of despair! Have I read the roll?

All here? Attend, perpend! O Star
Of my God Rephan, what wonders are
In thy brilliancy fugitive, faint and far!

Far from me, native to thy realm,
Who shared its perfections which o'erwhelm
Mind to conceive. Let drift the helm,

Let drive the sail, dare unconfined
Embark for the vastitude, O Mind,
Of an absolute bliss! Leave earth behind!

Here, by extremes, at a mean you guess:
There, all's at most—not more, not less:
Nowhere deficiency nor exces.

No want—whatever should be, is now:
No growth—that's change, and change comes
—how
To royalty born with crown on brow?

Nothing begins—so needs to end:
Where fell it short at first? Extend
Only the same, no change can mend!

I use your language: mine—no word
Of its wealth would help who spoke, who heard,
To a gleam of intelligence. None preferred,

None felt distaste when better and worse
Were uncontrustable: bless or curse
What—in that uniform universe?

Can your world's phrase, your sense of things
Forth-figure the Star of my God? No springs,
No winters throughout its space. Time brings

No hope, no fear: as to-day, shall be
To-morrow: advance or retreat we At our stand-still through eternity?

All happy: needs must we so have been,
Since who could be otherwise? All serene:
What dark was to banish, what light to screen?

Earth's rose is a bud that's checked or grows
As beams may encourage or blasts oppose:
Our lives leapt forth, each a full-orbed rose—

Each rose sole rose in a sphere that spread
Above and below and around—rose-red:
No fellowship, each for itself instead.

One better than I—would prove I lacked
Somewhat: one worse were a jarring fact
Disturbing my faultlessly exact.

How did it come to pass there lurked
Somehow a seed of change that worked
Obscure in my heart till perfection irked?

Till out of its peace at length grew strife—
Hopes, fears, loves, hates,—obscurely rife,—
My life grown a-tremble to turn your life?

Was it Thou, above all lights that are,
Prime Potency, did Thy hand unbar
The prison-gate of Rephan my Star?

In me did such potency wake a pulse
Could trouble tranquillity that falls
Not lashes inaction till throes convulse

Soul's quiescence into discontent?
As when the completed rose bursts, rest
By arords till forth from its orb are sent

New petals that mar—unmake the disk—
Spoil rondeurs: what in it ran brave risk
Changed apathy's calm to strife, bright, brisk.

Pushed simple to compound, sprang and spread
Till, fresh-formed, faceted, floreted,
The flower that slept woke a star instead?

No mimic of Star Rephan! How long
I stagnated there where weak and strong,
The wise and the foolish, right and wrong.

Are merged alike in a neutral Best,
Can I tell? No more than at whose behost
The passion arose in my passive breast,

And I yearned for no sameness but difference
In thing and thing, that should shock my sense
With a want of worth in them all, and these

Startle me up, by an Infinite
Discovered above and below me—height
And depth alike to attract my flight,

Repel my descent: by hate taught love.
Oh, gaining were indeed to see above
Supremacy ever—to move, remove,

Not reach—aspire yet never attain
To the object aimed at! Sorese in vain,—
As each stage I left nor touched again.

To suffer, did pangs bring the loved one bliss.
Wrung knowledge from ignorance,—just for this—
To add one drop to a love-abyss!

You fear, you agonize, die: what then?
Is an end to your life's work out of thee?
REVIERE

I know there shall dawn a day
— Is it here on homely earth?
Is it yonder, worlds away,
Where the strange and new have birth,
That Power comes in full play?

Is it here, with grass about,
Under befriending trees,
When shy buds venture out,
And the air by mild degrees
Puts winter’s death past doubts?

Is it up amid whirl and roar
Of the elemental flame
Which star-flecks heaven’s dark floor,
That, new yet still the same,
Fall in play comes Power once more?

Somewhere, below, above,
Shall a day dawn—this I know—
When Power, which vainly strove
My weakness to o’erthrow,
Shall triumph. I breathe, I move,

I truly am, at last!
For a veil is rent between
Me and the truth which passed
Futile, half-guessed, half-seen,
Grapsed at—not gained, held fast.

I for my race and me
Shall apprehend life’s law:
In the legend of man shall see
Writ large what small I saw
In my life’s; tale both agree.

As the record from youth to age
Of my own, the single soul—
So the world’s wide book: one page
Deciphered explains the whole
Of our common heritage.

How but from near to far
Should knowledge proceed, increase?
Try the cloud ere test the star!
Bring our inside strife to peace
Ere we wage, on the outside, war!

So, my annals thus begin:
With body, to life awake
Soul, the immortal twin
Of body which bore soul’s yoke
Since mortal and not akin.

By means of the flesh, grown fit,
Mind, in surview of things,
Now soared, anon alit
To treasure its gatherings
From the ranged expanse—towit,

Nature,—earth’s, heaven’s wide show
Which taught all hope, all fear:
Acquainted with joy and woe,
I could say: “Thus much is clear,
Doubt annulled thus much: I know.

“‘All is effect of cause:
As it would, has willed and done
Power: and my mind’s applause
Goes, passing laws each one,
To Omnipotence, lord of laws.’

Head praises, but heart refrains
From loving’s acknowledgment.
Whole losses outweigh half-gains:—
Earth’s good is with evil blent:
Good struggles but evil reigns.

Yet since Earth’s good proved good—Incontrovertibly
Worth loving—I understood
How evil—did mind descry
Power’s object to end pursued—

Were haply as cloud across
Good’s orb, no orb itself:
Mere mind—were it found at loss
Did it play the tricksey elf
And from life’s gold purge the dross?

Power is known infinite:
Good struggles to be—at best
Seems—scanned by the human sight,
Tried by the senses’ test—
Good palpably: but with right

Therefore to mind’s award
Of loving, as power claims praise?
Power—which finds naught too hard,
Fulfilling itself all ways
Uncheck’d, unaltered: while barred,

Baffled, what good began
Ends evil on every side,
To Power submissive man
Breathes, “E’en as Thou art, abide!”
While to good “Late-found, long-sought,

“Would Power to a plenitude
But liberate, but enlarge
Good’s strait confine,—renewed
Were ever the heart’s discharge
Of loving!” Else doubts intrude.

For you dominate, stars all!
For a sense informs you—brute,
Bird, worm, fly, great and small,
Each with your attribute
Or low or majestic!

Thou earth that embosomest
Offspring of land and sea—
How thy hills first sank to rest,
How thy vales bred herb and tree
Which dizen thy mother-breast—

Do I ask? "Be ignorant
Ever!" the answer clangs:
Whereas if I plead world's want,
Soul's sorrows and body's pangs,
Play the human applicant,—

Is a remedy far to seek?
I question and find response:
I— all men, strong or weak,
Conceive and declare at once
For each want its cure. "Power, speak!

"Stop change, avert decay
Fix life fast, banish death,
 Eclipse from the star bid stay,
A bridge of no moment's breath,
One creature! Hence, Night, hail, Day!"

What need to confess again
No problem this to solve
By impulse? Power, once plain
Proved Power—let on Power devolve
God's right to co-equal reign!

Past mind's conception—Power!
Do I seek how star, earth, beast,
Bird, worm, fly, gain their dower
For life's use, most and least?
Back from the search I cover.

Do I seek what heals all harm,
Nay, hinders the harm at first,
Save earth? Speak, Power, the charm!
Keep the life there unmarred
By chance, change, death's alarm!

As promptly as mind conceives,
Let Power in its turn declare
Some law which wrongs retrieves,
Abolishes everywhere
What thwart, what irks, what griefs!

Never to be! and yet
How easy it seems—to sense
Like man's—if somehow met
Power with its match—immense
Love, limitless, unbeset

By hindrance on every side!
Conjectured, nowise known,
Such may be: could man confide
Such would match—were Love but shown
Stript of the veils that hide—

Power's self now manifest!
So reads my record: thine,
O world, how runs it? Guessed
Were the purport of that prime line
Prophetic of all the rest!

"In a beginning God Made heaven and earth."
Forth flashed
Knowledge: from star to clod

Man knew things: doubt abashed
Closed its long period.

Knowledge obtained Power praise.
Had Good been manifest,
Broke out in cloudless blaze,
Unchequered as unrepressed,
In all things Good at best—

Then praise—all praise, no blame—
Had hailed the perfection. No!
As Power's display, the same
Be Good's—praise forth shall flow
Unisonous in acclaim!

Even as the world its life,
So have I lived my own—
Power seen with Love at strife,
That sure, this dimly shown—
Good rare and evil rife.

Whereof the effect be—faith
That, some far day, were found
Ripeness in things now raches,
Wrong righted, each chain unbound,
Renewal born out of sooths.

Why faith—but to lift the load,
To leaven the lump, where lies
Mind prostrate through knowledge owed
To the loveless Power it tries
To withstand, how vain! In flowed

Ever resistless fact:
No more than the passive clay
Disputes the potter's art
Could the whelmed mind disobey
Knowledge the cataract.

But, perfect in every part,
Has the potter's moulded shape,
Leap of man's quickened heart,
Three of his thought's escape,
Stings of his soul which dart

Through the barrier of flesh, till keen
She climbs from the calm and clear,
Through turbidity all between,
From the known to the unknown here.
Heaven's "Shall be," from Earth's "was been"?

Then life is—to wake not sleep,
Rise and not rest, but press
From earth's level where blindly creep
Things perfected, more or less,
To the heaven's height, far and steep.

Where, amid what strife of storms
May wait the adventurous quest.
Power is Love—transports, transforms
Who aspired from worst to best.
Sought the soul's world, spurned the worse.

I have faith such end shall be:
From the first, Power was—I knew.
Life has made clear to me
That, strive but for closer view,
Love were as plain to see.

When see? When there dawns a day,
If not on the homely earth,
Then yonder, worlds away,
Where the strange and new have birth,
And Power comes full in play.

EPILOGUE

In regard to the third verse of this poem the Pall Mall Gazette of February 1, 1890, related this incident: "One evening, just before his dead—illness, the poet was reading this from a proof to his daughter-in-law and sister. He said: 'It almost looks like bragging to say this,
and as if I ought to cancel it; but it's the simple truth; and as it's true, it shall stand.'"

At the midnight in the silence of the sleep-time,
When you set your fancies free,
Will they pass to where—by death, fools think,
imprisoned—

Low he lies who once so loved you, whom you loved so,
—Pity me?

Oh to love so, be so loved, yet so mistaken!
What had I on earth to do
With the slothful, with the mawkish, the unmanly?
Like the aimless, helpless, hopeless, did I drivel
—Being—who?

One who never turned his back but marched breast forward,
Never doubted clouds would break,
Never dreamed, though right were worsted,
wrong would triumph,
Held we fall to rise, are baffled to fight better,
Sleep to wake.

No, at noonday in the bustle of man's work-time
Greet the unseen with a cheer!
Bid him forward, breast and back as either
should be,
"Strive and thrive!" cry "Speed,—fight on,
fare ever
There as here!"
APPENDIX

I. AN ESSAY ON SHELLEY

Shelley's influence on Browning is so frequently referred to, that it seems best, inasmuch as this Essay is the only distinct piece of prose in Browning's writings, to print it here in the Appendix to his Complete Poetic and Dramatic Writings. The paper was written in 1833 at the request of Mr. Moxon, the publisher, under the circumstances named in the first paragraph of the Essay. Before the book was actually published, it was discovered to be a fabrication and was immediately suppressed. A very few copies only escaped the publisher's hands; apparently, those only which went to the depositories of copyright matter. The present copy is taken from the one issued in 1888 by the Shelley Society, London, under the editorship of W. Tyas Harden.

An opportunity having presented itself for the acquisition of a series of unedited letters by Shelley, all more or less directly supplementary to and illustrative of the collection already published by Mr. Moxon, that gentleman has decided on securing them. They will prove an acceptable addition to a body of correspondence, the value of which, towards a right understanding of its author's purpose and work, may be said to exceed that of any similar contribution exhibiting the worldly relations of a poet whose genius has operated by a different law.

Doubtless, we accept gladly the biography of an objective poet, as the phrase now goes; one whose endeavor has been to reproduce things external (whether the phenomena of the scenic universe, or the manifested action of the human heart and brain), with an immediate reference, in every case, to the common eye and apprehension of his fellow-men, assumed capable of receiving and profiting by this reproduction. It has been obtained through the poet's double faculty of seeing external objects more clearly, widely, and deeply than is possible to the average mind, at the same time that he is so acquainted and in sympathy with its narrower comprehension as to be careful to supply it with no other materials than it can combine into an intelligible whole. The auditors of such a poet will include, not only the intelligences which, save for such assistance, would have missed the deeper meaning and enjoyment of the original objects, but also the spirits of a like endowment with his own, who, by means of his abstract can forthwith pass to the reality it was made from, and either corroborate their impressions of things known already, or supply themselves with new from whatever shows in the inexhaustible variety of existence may have hitherto escaped their knowledge. Such a poet is properly the writer, the fashioner; and the thing fashioned, his poetry, will of necessity be substantive, projected from himself and distinct. We are ignorant what the inventor of Othello conceived of that fact as he beheld it in completeness, how he accounted for it, under what known law he registered its nature, or to what unknown law he traced its existence. We learn only what he intended we should learn by that particular exercise of his power,—the fact itself,—which, with its infinite significances, each of us receives for the first time as a creation, and is henceafter left to deal with, as, in proportion to his own intelligence, he best may. We are ignorant, and would fain be otherwise.

Doubtless, with respect to such a poet, we covet his biography. We desire to look back upon the process of gathering together in a lifetime the materials of the work we behold entire; of elaborating, perhaps under difficulty and with hindrance, all that is familiar to our admiration in the apparent facility of success. And the inner impulse of this effort and operation, what induced it? Did a soul's delight in its own extended sphere of vision set it, for the gratification of an insuppressible power, on labor, as other men are set on rest? Or did a sense of duty or of love lead it to communicate its own sensations to mankind? Did an irresistible sympathy with men compel it to bring down and suit its own provision of knowledge and beauty to their narrow scope? Did the personality of such an one stand like an open watch-tower in the midst of the territory it is erected to gaze on, and were the storms and calms, the stars and meteors, its watchman was wont to report of, the habitual variegation of his everyday life, as they glanced across its open door or lay reflected on its four-square parapet? Or did some sunken and darkened chamber of imagery witness, in the artificial illuminations of every storied compartment we are permitted to contemplate, how rare and precious were the outlooks through here and there an embersyn upon a world beyond, and how blankly would have pressed on the artificer the boundary of his daily life, except for the amorous diligence with which he had rendered permanent by all whatever came to diversify the gloom? Such fraught with instruction and interest as such out most abundantly and uninteruptedly his inner light and power, selects the essence of the earth and sea in which he can best hear the beating of his individual heart, and leaves the noisy, complex, yet imperfect exhibitions of nature in the manifold experience of man around him, which serve only to distract and suppress the working of the brain. These opposite tendencies of genius will be more readily described in their artistic effect than in their moral spring and cause. Pushed to an extreme and manifested as a deformity, they will be seen plainest of all in the fault of either artist when, subsidiarily to the human interest of his work, his occasional illustrations from scenic nature are introduced as in the earlier works of the originaive painters,—men and women filling the foreground with consummate mastery, while mountain, grove, and rivulet show like an anticipatory revenge on that succeeding race of landscape-painters, whose "figures" disturb the perfection of their earth and sky. It would be idle to inquire, of these two kinds of poetic faculty in operation, which is the higher or the lower; and of the subjective might seem to be the ultimate requirement of every age, the objective, in the strictest state, must still retain its original value. For it is with this world, as starting point and basis alike, that we shall always have to concern ourselves; the world is not to be learned and thrown aside, but reverted to and relerned. The spiritual comprehension may be infinitely subtilized, but the raw material it operates upon must remain. There may be no end of the poets who communicate to us what they see in an object with reference to their own individuality: what it was before they saw it, in reference to the aggregate human mind, will be as desirable to know as ever. Nor is there any reason why these two modes of poetic faculty may not issue hertofrfrom the same poet in successive perfect works, examples of which, according to what are now considered the exigencies of art, we have hitherto possessed in distinct individuals only. A mere running in of the one faculty upon the other is, of course, the ordinary circumstance. Far more rarely it happens that either is found so decidedly prominent and superior as to be pronounced comparatively pure; while of the perfect shield, with the gold and the silver side set up for all comers to challenge, there has yet been no instance. Either faculty in its eminent state is doubtless conceded by Providence as a best gift to men, according to their especial want. There is a time when the general eye has, so to speak, absorbed its fill of the phenomena around it; whether spiritual or material, and desires rather to learn the exact signification of what it possesses than to receive any augmentation of what is possessed. Then is the opportunity for the poet of loitering vision to lift his fellows, with their half-comprehensions, up to his own sphere, by intensifying the import of details and rounding the universal meaning. The influence of such an achievement will not soon die out. A tribe of successors (Homerides), working more or less in the same spirit, dwell on his discoveries and reinforce his doctrine; till, at unawares, the world is found to be subsisting wholly on the shadow of a reality, on sentiments diluted from passions, on the tradition of a fact, the convention of a moral, the straw of last year's harvest. Then is the imperative call for the appearance of another as I of poesy who shall that biographer of this intellectual rumination of food swallowed long ago, by a supply of the fresh and living swaths; getting at new substance by breaking up the assumed wholes into parts of independent and unclad value, careless of the unknown laws for recombining them (it will be the business of yet another poet to suggest those hereafter), prodigal of objects for men's outer and not inner sight; shaping for their uses a new and different creation from the last, which it displaces by the right of life over death, to endure until, in the inevitable process, its very sufficiency to itself shall require at length an exposition of its affinity to something higher, when the positive yet conflicting facts shall again precipitate themselves under a harmonizing law, and so the poet for a poet to climb in that mighty ladder, of which, however cloud-involved and undefined may glimmer the topmost step, the world dares no longer doubt that its gradations ascend.

Such being the two kinds of artists, it is natural, in the fact of any conspicuous achievement of genius, philosophy no less than sympathetic instinct warrants our belief in a great moral purpose having mainly inspired even where it does not visibly look out of the same. Greatness in a work suggests an adequate instrumentality; and none of the lower incitements, however they may avail to initiate or even effect many considerable displays of power, simulating the noble inspirtation to which they are mistakenly referred, have been found able, under the ordinary conditions of humanity, to task themselves to the end of so exacting a performance as a poet's complete work. As soon will the galvanism, that provokes to violent action the muscles of a corpse, induce it to cross the chamber steadily: sooner. The love of displaying power for the display's sake; the love of riches, of distinction, of notoriety; the desire of a triumph over rivals, and the vanity in the applause of friends,—each and all of such whetted appetites grow intense by exercise, and increasingly sagacious as to the best and readiest means of self-appeasement: while for any of their ends, whether the money or the pointed finger of the crowd, or the flattery and hate to heart's content, there are cheaper prices to pay, they will all be found soon enough, than the bestowment of a life upon a labor hard, slow, and not sure. Also, assuming the proper moral aim to have produced a work, there are many and various states of an aim: it may be more intense the clear-sighted, or too easily satisfied with a less field of activity than a steadier aspiration will reach. All the bad poetry in the world accounted poetry, that is, by its affinities will be found to result from some one of the inner degrees of discrepancy between the tastes of the poet's soul, accomplishing a want of correspondence between his work and the various nature,—issuing in poetry, false under whatever form, which shows a thing, not as it is mankind generally, nor as it is to the peculiar describer, but as it is supposed to be some unreal neutral in mood, midway between both and of value to neither, and living in least minute simply through the indolence of whose accepts it or his incapacity to pronounce a censure. Although of such depths of failure there can be no question here, we must in every ease take to ourselves the review of a poet's life as we determine some of the nicer questions concerning his poetry,—more especially if in the performance we seek to estimate aright has been obstructed and cut short of completion by circumstances, and whether it will be apparent for a poet to climb in that mighty ladder, of which, however cloud-involved and undefined may glimmer the topmost step, the world dares no longer doubt that its gradations ascend.

The love of displaying power for the display's sake; the love of riches, of distinction, of notoriety; the desire of a triumph over rivals, and the vanity in the applause of friends,—each and all of such whetted appetites grow intense by exercise, and increasingly sagacious as to the best and readiest means of self-appeasement: while for any of their ends, whether the money or the pointed finger of the crowd, or the flattery and hate to heart's content, there are cheaper prices to pay, they will all be found soon enough, than the bestowment of a life upon a labor hard, slow, and not sure. Also, assuming the proper moral aim to have produced a work, there are many and various states of an aim: it may be more intense the clear-sighted, or too easily satisfied with a less field of activity than a steadier aspiration will reach. All the bad poetry in the world accounted poetry, that is, by its affinities will be found to result from some one of the inner degrees of discrepancy between the tastes of the poet's soul, accomplishing a want of correspondence between his work and the various nature,—issuing in poetry, false under whatever form, which shows a thing, not as it is mankind generally, nor as it is to the peculiar describer, but as it is supposed to be some unreal neutral in mood, midway between both and of value to neither, and living in least minute simply through the indolence of whose accepts it or his incapacity to pronounce a censure. Although of such depths of failure there can be no question here, we must in every ease take to ourselves the review of a poet's life as we determine some of the nicer questions concerning his poetry,—more especially if in the performance we seek to estimate aright has been obstructed and cut short of completion by circumstances, and whether it will be apparent for a poet to climb in that mighty ladder, of which, however cloud-involved and undefined may glimmer the topmost step, the world dares no longer doubt that its gradations ascend.

Such being the two kinds of artists, it is natural, in the fact of any conspicuous achievement of genius, philosophy no less than sympathetic instinct warrants our belief in a great moral purpose having mainly inspired even where it does not visibly look out of the same. Greatness in a work suggests an adequate instrumentality; and none of the lower incitements, however they may avail to initiate or even effect many considerable displays of power, simulating the noble inspirtation to which they are mistakenly referred, have been found able, under the ordinary conditions of humanity, to task themselves to the end of so exacting a performance as a poet's complete work. As soon will the galvanism, that provokes to violent action the muscles of a corpse, induce it to cross the chamber steadily: sooner. in order to suggest from the utmost realization of the one a corresponding capability in the other, and out of the calm, purity, and energy of nature to reconstitute and store up, for the forthcoming stage of the soul's being, a fresh repayment of that former gift in which man's own thought and passion had been lavished by the poet on the else-incompleted magnificence of the sunrise, the else-uninterpreted mystery of the lake,—so drawing out, lifting up, and assimilating this ideal of a future manliness described as possible, to the present reality of the poet's soul already arrived at the higher state of development, and still aspirant to elevate and extend itself in conformity with its still-improving perceptions of, no longer the eventual Human, but the actual Divine. In conjunction with which noble and rare powers came the subordinate power of delivering these attained results to the world in an embodiment of verse more closely answering to and indicative of the process of the inward mind (falling, as it occasionally does, in art, only to succeed in highest art),—with a diction more adequate to the task in its natural and acquired richness, its material color and spiritual transparency,—the whole being moved by and suffused with a music at once of the soul and the sense, expressive both of an external might of sincere passion and an internal fitness and consonance,—than can be attributed to any other writer whose record is among us. Such was the spheric poetical faculty of Shelley, as its owlish subtlety of tone and light, equally through immaturity and accomplishment, through many fragments and occasional completion, reveals it to a competent judgment.

But the acceptance of this truth by the public has been retarded by certain objections which cast us back on the evidence of biography, even with Shelley's poetry in our hands. Except for the particular character of these objections, indeed, the non-appreciation of his contemporaries would simply class now that it is over, with a series of experiences which have necessarily happened, and needlessly been wondered at, ever since the world began, and concerning which any present anger may well be moderated, no less in justice to our forerunners than in policy to ourselves. For the misapprehensiveness of his age is exactly what a poet is sent to remedy; and the interval between his operation and the generally perceptible effect of it is no greater, less indeed, than in many other departments of great human effort. The "E pur si muove" of the astronomer was as bitter a word as any uttered before or since by a poet over his rejected living work, in that depth of conviction which is so like despair.

But in this respect was the experience of Shelley peculiarly unfortunate,—that the disbelief in him as a man even preceded the disbelief in him as a writer; the misconstruction of his moral nature preparing the way for the misappreciation of his intellectual labors. There existed from the beginning—simultaneous with, indeed anterior to, his earliest noticeable works, and not brought forward to counteract any impression they had succeeded in making—certain charges against his private character and life, which, if substantiated to their whole breadth, would materially disturb, I do not attempt to deny, our reception and enjoyment of his works, however wonderful the artistic qualities of these. For we are not sufficiently supplied with instances of genius of his order to abhor and pronounce certain gifts of whose constituent parts have been tasked and strained to the production of a given lie, and how high and pure a mood of the creative mind may be dramatically simulated as the poet's habitual and exclusive one. The doubts, therefore, arising from such a question, required to be set at rest, as they were effectually, by those early authentic notices of Shelley's career and the corroborative accompaniment of his letters, in which not only the main tenor and principal result of his life, but the purity and beauty of many of the processes which had conceived to them, were made apparent enough for the general reader's purpose,—whoever lightly condemned Shelley first, on the evidence of reviews and gossip, as lightly acquiring him now, on that of memory and correspondence. Still it is advisable to lose no opportunity of strengthening and completing the chain of biographical testimony; much more, of course, for the sake of the poet's original lovers, whose volunteered sacrifice of particular principle in favor of absorbing sympathy, or its absence, is in accord with, than for the sake of his foolish haters, who have long since diverted upon other objects their obtuseness or malignancy. A full life of Shelley should be written at once, while the materials for it continue in reach; not to minister to the curiosity of the public, but to obliterate the last stain of that false life which was forced on the public's attention before it had any curiosity on the matter,—a biography composed in harmony with the present general disposition to have faith in him, yet not shrink ing from a candid statement of all ambiguous passages, through a reasonable confidence that the most doubtful of them will be found consistent with a belief in the eventual perfection of his character, according to the poor limits of our humanity. Nor will men persist in confounding, any more than God confounds, with genuine infidelity and in atheism of the heart those passionate, impatient struggles of a boy towards distant truth and love, made in the dark, and ended by one sweep of the natural sens before the full moral sunrise could shine out on him. Crude convictions of boyhood, conveyed in imperfect and inapt forms of speech,—for such things all boys have been pardoned. There are growing-pains, accompanied by temporary distortion of the soul also. And it would be hard indeed upon this young Titan of genius, murmuring in divine music his human ignorances through his very thirst for knowledge, and his rebellion in mere aspiration to law, if the melody itself substantiated the error, and the tragic cutting short of life perpetuated into sins such faults as, under happier circumstances, would have been left behind by the consent of the most arrogant moralist, forgotten on the lowest steps of youth.

The scale of responsibility of presenting to the public a biography of Shelley does not, however, lie with me: I have only to make it a little easier by arranging these few supplementary letters, with a recognition of the value of the whole collection. This value I take to consist in the real and truthful conformity of the Correspondence, in its limited degree, with the moral and intellectual character of the writer as displayed in the highest manifestations of his genius. Letters and poems are obviously an act of the same mind, produced by the same law only differing in the application to the individual or collective understanding. Letters and poems may be used indifferently as the basement of our opinion upon the writer's character; the finished expression of a sentiment in the poems giving light and significance to the rudiments of the same in the letters, and these again, in their incipiency and unripeness, authenticating the exalted mood and reattaching it to the personality of the writer. The musician speaks on the note he sings with; and the same law diminishes the volume into familiar intercourse. There is nothing of that jarring between the man and the author, which has been found so amusing or so melancholy; no dropping of the tragic mask as the crowd melts away; no mean die of the real motives of a life's achievement, often in other lives laid bare as pitifully as when, at the close of a holiday, we catch sight of the internal lead-pipes and wood-valves to which, and not to the ostensible coach and dominant Triton of the fountain, we have owed our admiring water-work. No breaking out, in household privacy, of hatred, anger, and scorn, incongruous with the higher mood, and suppressed artistically in the book; no brutal return to self-delighting, where the audience of philanthropic schemes is out of hearing, nor their success off the grander feeling and rule of life as too costly and cumbrous for every-day wear. Whatever Shelley was, he was with an admirable sincerity. It was not always truth that he thought and spoke; but in the purity of truth he spoke and thought always. Everywhere is apparent his belief in the existence of Good, to which Evil is an accident; his faithful holding by what he assumed to be the former going everywhere in company with the tenderest pity for those acting or suffering on the opposite hypothesis. For he was tender, though tenderness is not always the characteristic of very sincere natures; he was eminently both tender and sincere. And not only do the same affection and yearning after the well-being of his kind appear in the letters as in the poems, but they express themselves by the same theories and plans, however crude and unsound. There is no reservation of a subtler, less costly, more serviceable remedy for his own ill than he has proposed for the general one; nor does he ever contaminate an object on his own account from a less elevation than he uses in exhibiting it to the world. How shall we help believing Shelley to have been, in his ultimate attainment, the splendid spirit of his own best poetry, when we find even his candid speech to agree faithfully, at faintest strength, with the tone and rhythm of his most oracular utterances?

For the rest, these new letters are not offered as presenting any new feature of the poet's character. Regarded in themselves, and as the substantive productions of a man, their importance would be slight. But they possess interest beyond their limits, in confirming the evidence just dwelt on, of the poetical mood of Shelley being only the intensification of his habitual mood; the same tongue only speaking, for want of the special excitement to sing. The very first letter, as one instance for all, strikes the key-note of the predominating sentiency of Shelley throughout his whole life — his sympathy with the oppressed. And when we see him at so early an age, casting out, under the influence of such a sympathy, letters and pamphlets on every side, we accept it as the simple exemplification of the sincerity, with which, at the close of his life, he spoke of himself, as —

"One whose heart a stranger's tears might weep
As water-drops the sandy fountain stone;
Who loved and pitied all things, and could see
For woes which others bear not, and could see
The absent with the glass of phantasy,
And weep for things unknown, and wail and weep;
Following the captive to his dungeon deep —
One who was as a nerve o'er which do creep
The else-unfelt oppressions of this earth."

Such sympathy with his kind was evidently developed in him to an extraordinary and even morbid degree; at a period when the general intellectual powers it was impatient to put in motion were immature or deficient.

I conjecture, from a review of the various publications of Shelley's youth, that one of the causes of his failure at two other times, the early and the latter, was the premature quickening and working of his critical spirit unchecked by considerations of remedy, keeps up before his young eyes so many instances of the same error and wrong, that he finds himself unaware of the startling conclusion, that all must be changed, or nothing: in the face of which plainly impossible achievement, he is apt (looking perhaps a little more serious by the time he touches at the decisive issue) to feel, either carelessly or considerately, that his own attempting a single piece of service would be worse than useless, and even, and to refer the whole task to another age and person — safe in proportion to his incapacity. Wanting words to speak, he has never made a fool of himself by speaking. But, in Shelley's case, the early fervor and power were accompanied by so pronounced a facility to contrive: he endeavored to realize as he went on idealizing; every wrong had simultaneously all its remedy, and, out of the strength of his hatred for the former, he took the strength of his confidence in the latter— till suddenly he stood pledged to the defence of a set of miserable little expedients, just as if they represented great principles, and to an attack upon various great principles, really so, without knowing cause they were antagonistical to the remedy he had suggested, they must therefore be identical or even essentially connected with the wrong he sought to cure, — playing with blind passion into the hands of his enemies, and dashed at whatever red cloak was held forth to him, as the cause of the firebell he had last been stung with — mistaking Churchdom for Christianity, and for marriage, "the sale of love" and the law of sexual oppression.

Gradually, however, he was learning behind him this low practical dexterity, unable to keep up with his widening intellectual perception; and, in exact proportion as he did so, his true power strengthened and proved itself. Gradually he was raised above the contemplation of specific and then the attempt at affecting them, to the great Abstract Light, and through the discrepancy of the creation, to the sufficiency of the First Cause. Gradually he was learning that the best way of removing abuses is to stand fast by truth. Truth is one, as they are manifold; and visible negative effects as produce by the upholding of one positive principle. I shall say what I think,— had Shelley lived he would have finally ranged himself with the Christians; his very instinct for helping the weaker side (if numbers make strength), his very "hatred of evil," which at first translated itself into delirious Queen Mab notes and the like, would have got clear-sighted by exercise. The preliminary step to following Christ, is the leaving the dead to bury their dead; not "man does a man," as an especial solution of difficulties which are referable to the general problem of the universe. "Already he had attained to a profession of "a worship to the Spirit of good within, which requires (before it sends that inspiration forth, which impresses its likeness upon all it creates) devoted and disinterested homage," as Coleridge says,— and Paul likewise. And we find in one of his last exquisite fragments, avowedly a record of one of his own mornings and its experience, as it dawned on him, at his soul and body's best in his boat on the Serchio— that as surely as "The stars burnt out in the pale blue air,

And the thin white moon lay withering there—
Day had kindled the dewy woods,
And the rocks above, and the stream below,
And the vapor in their multitudes,
And the Aspenline's shroud of summer snaw—
Day had awakened all things that be;"

just so surely, he tells us (stepping forward from this delicious dance-music, chorus-like, into the grander measure befitting the final enunciation),

"All rose to do the task He set to each,
Who shaped us to His ends and not our own;
The million rose to learn, and One to teach
What none yet ever knew or can be known."

No more difference than this, from David's pregnant conclusion so long ago!

Meantime, as I call Shelley a moral man, because he was true, simple-hearted, and brave, and because "a whole against the Spirit of God" (implying a general deliberate preference of perceived evil to perceive good) "shall not be forgiven to a man."

There is even such a thing, we come to learn wonderingly in these very letters, as a profound sensibility and adaptability for art, while the science of the peripite is so little advanced as to admit of his stronger admiration for Guido (and Carlo Dolce) than for Michael Angelo. A Divine Being has Himself said, that "a word against the Son of man shall be forgiven to a man," while "a whole against the Spirit of God" (implying a general deliberate preference of perceived evil to perceive good) "shall not be forgiven to a man."

Also, in religion, one earnest and unexerted assertion of belief should outweigh, as a matter of testimony, many assertions of unbelief. The fact that there is a gold-region is established by finding one lump, though you miss the vein never so often.

He died before his youth ended. In taking the measure of his art, his genius, his grandeur, as he has been considered on the whole and at his ultimate spiritual stature, and not to be judged of at the immanence and by the mistakes of ten years before: that, indeed, would be to judge of the author of "Julian and Maddalo by Zastrozzi." Let the whole truth be told of his worst mistake. I believe, for my own part, that if anything could now shame or grieve Shelley, it would be an attempt to vindicate him at the expense of another.

In forming a judgment, I would, however,

1 Or, to take our illustrations from the writings of Shelley himself, there is such a thing as admirably appreciating a work by Andrea Verocchio, — and fancifully characterizing the Pisan Torre Guelfa by the Ponte a Mare, black against the sunsets, — and consecrately painting the islet of San Clemente with its penitentary for rebellious priests, to the west between Venice and the Lido — while you believe the first to be a fragment of an antique sarcophagus, — the second, Ugolino's Tower of Famine (the vestiges of which should be sought for in the Piazza de' Cavalieri) — and the third (as I convinced myself last summer at Venice), San Servolo with its mad-house — which, far from being "windowless," is as full of windows as a barrack.
press on the reader the simple justice of considering tenderly his constitution of body as well; no probably his was to be the steady symmetries of conventional life; the body, in the torture of incurable disease, refusing to give repose to the bewildered soul tosing in its hot fever of the fancy,—and the laudanum-bottle making but a perilous and pitiful truce between these two. He was constantly subject to "that state of mind" (I quote his own note to Hellas) "in which ideas may be supposed to assume the force of sensation, through the confusion of thought with the objects of thought, and excess of passion animating the creations of the imagination;" in other words, he was liable to remarkable delusions and hallucinations. The nocturnal attack in Wales, for instance, was assuredly a delusion; and I venture to express my own opinion, derived from a close attention to the circumstances of either story, that the idea of the enamored lady following him to Naples, and of the "man in the cloak" who struck him at the Pisan post-office, were equally illusory,—the more so, in fact, from himself, of the image of his own love and hate.

"To thirst and find no fill—to wall and wander
With short unsteady step—to pause and ponder
To feel the blood run through the veins and tingle
When busy thought and blind sensation mingle,
To nurse the image of unfelt careesses
Till dim imagination just possesses
The half-created shadow"— of unfelt careeses,—and of unfelt blows as well: to such conditions was his genius subject. It was not at Rome only (where he heard a mystic voice exclaiming, "Cenci, Cenci," in reference to the tragic theme which occupied him at the time),—it was not at Rome only that he mistook the cry of "old rags." The habit of sornambulism is said to have extended to the very last days of his life.

Let me conclude with a thought of Shelley as a poet. In the hierarchy of creative minds, it is the presence of the highest faculty that gives first rank, in virtue of its kind, not degree; not possession of a low nature, whatever the completeness of development of, variety of effect, impeding the precedence of the rarer endowment though only in the germ. The contrary is sometimes maintained; it is attempted to take away of the gifts (which are potentially included in the higher faculty) of independent value, and equal to some exercise of the special function. For instance, should not a poet possess common sense? Then the possession of abundant common sense implies a step towards becoming of a low nature, whatever the strong in the composition of the diamond, he heaps up a sack of charcoal in order to compete with the Koh-i-noor. I pass at once, therefore, from Shelley's minor excellences to his name and character. It is characteristic.

This I call his simultaneous perception of Power and Love in the absolute, and of Beauty and Good in the concrete, while he throws, from his poet's station between both, swifter, subtler, and more numerous films for the connection of each with each, than have been thrown by any modern artificer of whom I have knowledge; proving how, as he says, "The spirit of the worm within the sod
In love and worship blends itself with God."

I would rather consider Shelley's poetry as a sublime fragmentary essay towards a presentment of the correspondence of the universe Deity, of the natural to the spiritual, and of the actual to the ideal, than I would isolate and separately appraise the worth of many detached portions which might be acknowledged as utterly perfect in a lower moral point of view, under the mere conditions of art. It would be easy to take my stand on successful instances of objectivity in Shelley; there is the unrivalled Cenci; there is the Julian and Medusa too; there is the magnificent Odysseus of Naples; but, it seems to me, the less organized matter as the radiant elements foam and solution, out of which would have been evolved, eventually, creations as perfect even as those? But I prefer to look for the highest attainment, not simply the high,—and seeing it, I hold by it. There is surely enough of the work "Shelley" to be known enduringly among men, and, I believe, to be accepted of the future, God, as human work; and around the imperfect proportions of such, the most elevated productions of creative genius must arrange themselves as inferior illustrations.

It is because I have long held these opinions in assurance and gratitude, that I catch at the opportunity offered to me of expressing them here; knowing that the acerbity to fail as humble a course to me more valuable than the acceptance of the honor of a higher one, and that better, therefore, than the signal service it was the dream of my boyhood to render to his fame and memory, may be the saying of a few inadequate words upon these scarcely more important supplementary letters of Shelley.

Browning appends the following note, a translation of which may be found in Cooke, p. 33.

"Je crains bien que mon pauvre ami ne se soit toujours parfaitement compris dans ce qui reste à lire de cet étrange fragment, mais il est laissé comme propre que tout autre à éclaircir ce qui de sa nature ne peut jamais être que songe et confusion."
to George Bombast de Hohenheim, who became afterward Grand Prior of the Order of Malta: consequently Paracelsus could not spring from the drugs of the people, as Thomas Erasistrus, his sworn enemy, pretends. It appears that his elementary education was much neglected, and that he spent part of his youth in pursuing the life common to the travelling literati of the age; that is to say, in wandering from country to country, predicting the future by astrology and cheiromancy, evoking apparitions, and practicing the different operations of magic and alchemy, in which he had been initiated by his father or by various ecclesiastics, among the number of whom he particularizes the Abbé Trytheim, and many German bishops.

As Paracelsus displays everywhere an ignorance of the rudiments of the most ordinary knowledge, it is not probable that he ever studied seriously in the schools: he contented himself with visiting the universities of Germany, France, and Italy; and in spite of his boasting himself to have been the ornament of those institutions, there is no proof of his having legally acquired the title of Doctor, which he assumes. It is only known that he applied himself long, under the direction of the wealthy Sigismund Fugger of Schwatz, to the discovery of the Magnum Opus.

Paracelsus travelled among the mountains of Bohemia, in the east, and in Sweden, in order to inspect the labors of the miners, to be initiated in the mysteries of the oriental adepts, and to observe the secrets of nature and the famous mountain of leadstone. He professes also to have visited Spain, Portugal, Prussia, Poland, and Transylvania; everywhere communicating freely, not merely with the physicians, but the old women, charlatans, and conjurers of those several lands. It is even believed that he extended his journeys as far as Egypt and Tartary, and that he accompanied the son of the Khan of the Tartars to Constantinople, for the purpose of obtaining the secret of the tincture of Trimengistrus from a Greek who inhabited that capital.

The period of his return to Germany is unknown: it is only certain that, at about the age of thirty-three, many astonishing cures which he wrought on eminent personages procured him such a celebrity, that he was called in 1526, on the recommendation of Gissolampadius, to fill a chair of physic and surgery at the University of Basel. There Paracelsus began by burning publicly in the amphitheatre the works of Avicenna and Galen, assuring his auditors that the latches of his shoes were more instructed than those two physicians: that all universities, all writers put together, were less gifted than the hairs of his beard and of the crown of his head; and that, in a word, he was to be re-trait by Tintoretto, painted a year before his death, Paracelsus is barbatulus, at all events. But Erastus was never without a good reason for his faith — e. g., Helvetium falsus (Paracelsus) vix credo, vix enim in regio tale monstrum ediderit. (De Medicina Nova.) Paracelsus would seem to be a fantastic version of Von Hohenheim; Einsiendl is the Lat.

Erasius, who relates this, here oddly remarks, "mirum quod non et Garamontis, Indos et Anglos adjunxit." Not so wonderful neither, if we believe what another adversary had heard somewhere, "that all Paracelsus' system came of his pillaging "Antigum quendam, Rogerum Bacchonem.""

See his works, passim. There are, however, passages in which he styles himself, 'Paracelsus' - he was, no doubt, a man of an adventurous spirit, and it is not impossible that he may have been influenced by Paracelsus' teachings.

The passage you cite is from the "Commentaries of St. Jerome on the Gospels," printed volume on Medecine, and seven manuscripts.

Paracelsus is sometimes called, in the correspondence of Erasmus, Eremita. Bombast, his proper name, probably acquired, from the characteristic phraseology of his lectures, that unlucky signification which it ever since retained.

Then Bishop of Spanheim, and residing at Wurzburg in Franconia; a town situated in a grassy fertile country, whence its name, Herbolis. He was much visited there by learned men, as may be seen by his Epistolarum. Hag. 1533; among others, by his friend Cornelius Agrrippa, to whom he dates these, in 1510, a letter in answer to the dedicatory epistle prefixed to the treatise De Occult. Philosoph. which last contains the following ominous allusion to grippa's sojourn: "Quam amumper se cum. B. F. in cospobia tua apud Herbolipulzis situ quoquidam conversatum, multis de chymicos, multis de magicis, multa de cabbalistisque, cesterisque que adhue in occulto dolciscens, arcana scien- tiae atque artibus una contulissemus," etc.

written in the year of our Lord 1531, at about the time he had governed the See of Rochester

Now, there is no doubt of the Protestantism of Paracelsus, Erasmus, Agrippa, etc., but the nonconformity of Paracelsus was always scandalous among those "particulares" parieti herediticos" (lib. I. cap. 3). "Omnia tamen multa theologiae in ejusdem scriptis plane atheismum olent, ac duriuscula sonant in auribus vere Christianis." (D. GABRIELUS CLAUDERI SCHEDIALI, de Scot. Univ. Norimb. 1736.) I shall only add one more authority: "- Paracelsus dicit se (Paraecluso) aliquando Lutherum et Papam, non minus quam nume Galenum et Hippocratem recturaturum in ordinem minabatur, neque enim eorum quicquam in scripturam sacram scrip-sisset, sive veteres, sive recentiores, qu Swim scriptura nucleus recte eruisse, sed circa corticem et quasi membranam tantam herere." (Th.
ERASTUS, Disputant. de Med. Nova.) These and similar notations had their due effect on Paracelsus, who, says Zuinkiis, in his Theatrum,
"longum vale dixit ei (Paracelsi), ne ob pro-

* The premature death of Paracelsus casts no maner of doubt on the fact of his having possessed the elixir vitae: the alchemists have abundant reasons to adduce, from which I select the following, as explanatory of a property of the Tincture not calculated on by its votaries: " - Objectionem iliam, quod Paracelsus ceptroris, aliquoi amici simus, horrendas blasphemorias, ipse quoque aliquando ponens Deo Opt.
Max. lueret."

6 His defenders allow the drunkennes. Take a sample of their excuses: "Gentius hoc, non viri vitioleum est, a Tactici seculo ad nostrum tum non interrupto filio devolutum, sinceri-tati forte Germanus coevum, et nescio an aliquo consecuantissima vinculo junctus." (BRITTISCIUS.)
The other charges were chiefly trumped up by Paracelsus: "Domi, quod Orpiscus asmanus mquinus sura narravit, nunquam nisi potus ad ex-plicanda sua assiduit, atque in medico concelavi ad columna veritatem addistis, aprehendens manibus capulo emis, ejus colit, hospitium prehbuit, ut ait, spiritum familiaris, imaginata-tionibus aut concepta sua protulit: - ali iiiull quod in capulo habuit, a ipso Azoth apellatum, medicinae fruisse praeconestium aut lapidem Philosopheris putant." (MACH.
ADAM.) This famous sword was so laughingly mattered in those days, and it is now a material feature in the popular idea of Paracelsus. I recellct a couple of allusions to it in our own literature, at the moment.

Ne had been known the Danish Gouwarte,
Of Paracelsus with his long sword.
Volpone, Act ii. Sc. 2.
Bumbastus kept a devil's bird
Shut in the pummel of his sword,
That taught him all the cunning pranks
Of past and future Lord."
Hudibras, Part ii. Cant. 3.

This Azoth was simply "laudanum suum.
But in to time he was commonly believed to possess the double tincture - the power of curing diseases and transmitting metals. Orpiscus often witnessed, as he declares, both these effects, as did also Franciscus, the servant of Paracelsus, who describes, in a letter to Neander, a successful projection at which he was present, and the results of which, good golden ingots, were confided to his keeping. For the other quality, let the following notice vouch among many others: "- Degebat Theophrastus Norimbergae proculis a medicius illius urbis, et vaniloquos deceptorum proclamatus, qui, ut labores magni subvenit, virum quosdam authoritatis summe in Republica illa adit, specimen ejus polluitur edicturum, nullo stipendio vel accepto pretio, horum faciles prebentium aures jussi elephantiaco aliquot, a communione hominum esterorum segregatos, et in valendinariae detruxus, alieno arbitrio eligenttur, quo virtute singulari remediorum suorum Theophrastus a foeda Graecorum lepra mundat, pristinave sanitate restituit; conservavit illustre harum curationum urbe in archivis suis testimum." (BRITTISCIUS.) It is to be remarked that Orpiscus afterwards repeated of his treachnon fuerit longevus, non nullum quoque solvantur ra-tiones physicae: vitis mihiarum ab narratione fortasse talibus accidere possit, a Tincturam frequentior aliquo decimae solutum, dum a summe efficac et penetrahab sunt virtute color insanus quasi succubos." (GA-BRIELUS CLAUDERI SCHEDIALI.)

ory: "Sed resipuit tandum, et quem vivum convitis insectatus fuerat de-\nmans laetare, in re\nnimis tarda, vulnera clausere examini quae spiranti infirmitatem." For these "bites" of Oporinus, see Disputat. Erasius, and Andrea Jocisci. Oralio de Vit. op. dor; for the "remorse," Mic. Toxica in pref. Testamenti, and Conringius (otherwise an enemy of Paracelsus), who says it was contained in a letter from Opolinus to Do-tor Vegerus.

When the moderns may think of these marvellous attributes, the title of Paracelsus to be considered the father of modern chemistry is indisputable. Gerardus Vossius, De Philos et Philos sectis, thus prefaces the ninth section of cap. 9, De Chymia—"Nobilem hane medicam partem, din sepultam avarum esse, quasi ab orco recovavit Th. Paracelsus." I suppose many hints lie scattered in his neglected books, which clever appropriators have since developed with applause. Thus, it appears from his treatise De l'hebdomotie, and elsewhere, that he had discovered the transubstantiation of the blood and the sanguification of the heart; as did after him Realdo Colombo, and still more perfectly Andrea Cesalpino of Arezzo, as Bayle and Bartoli observe. Even Lavater quotes a passage from his work De Naturarum Rerum, on practical Physiognomy, in which the definitions and axioms are precise enough: he adds, "though an astrologi-

"The Eyes." While on the subject of the writings of Paracelsus, I may explain a passage in the third part of the Poem. He was, as I have said, unwilling to publish his works, but in effect did publish a vast number. Valen-tius (in Prefat in Paramy.) declares: "quod ad librorum Paracelsi copiam attinet, audio, a Germanum propegnum est remota;" "O fecunditas ingenii!" adds he, appositely. Many of these were, however, spurious; and Fred. Bitiskius gives his good edition (3 vols. fol. Gen. 1658) a rejectus suppositio solo ipsius nomine superficientibus quorum ingenius circumfertur numerus. The rest were "charismatim et pra-tiosissimorum authoris pignus, extorsum potius ab illo quam obtinent." "Jam minime et vorente atque jubente haec ipsius scripta in lucem prodisse videntur; quippe quae muro inclusa ipso absente, servit cujusdam indicio, furto surrepta atque sublata sunt," says Valentinus. These have been the study of a host of commentators, amongst whose labors are most notable, Petri Severini, Idea Medicine Philosophicae, Bas. 1771; Mic. Toxetia, Onomastica, Arg. 1774; Dorni. Dic. Parac. Franc. 1824; and Ps. Philo-see” Compendium cum scholis auctore Leon Stavio. Paris. (This last, a good book.)

A disgraceful affair. One Liechtenfels, a canon, having been rescued in extremit by the "laudanum" of Paracelsus, refused the stipulation fee, and was supported in his measures by the authorities, whose interference Paracelsus would not brook. His own liberality was allowed by his bitterest foes, who found a ready solution of his indifference to profit in the aforsaid sword-handle and its guest. His freedos from the besetting sin of a profession he abhorr'd—(as he curiously says somewhere, "Quo qusuo deioces he nomores decent profassio etsi ta a tam facinorosis nebulonibus obtur et administratu?")—is recorded in his epitaph, which affirms—"Bona sua in pampseres distribubenda collocandaque sanguo; honoravt, et dominavt—for accounts differ.

To the low ground once more the ignoble Term,
And raise the Genius on his orb again.

The term was a statue representing the Roman term, the god who presides over boundaries.
The genius was the image that represented the guardian spirit. Mr. Browning commenting on this passage has said: "Suppose the enemies of man to have thrown down the image and replaced it by a mere Term, and you have what I put into Strafford's head." "Putting the Genius on the pedestal usurped by the Term means—or tries to mean—substituting eventually the true notion of Strafford's endeavor and performance in the world for what he conceives to be the ignoble and distorted conception of these by his contemporary judges."

It is interesting to note the choice of scene for Browning's latest volume Asolando. In a speaks of "delicious Asolo."

Caterina Cornaro, the daughter of a wealthy and noble citizen of Venice, was born in 1453.
In self in such matters, I mention simply that Paracelsus introduced the use of Mercury and Leadnam.
In 1471 she married the king of Cyprus. He died the next year and for seven years Caterina was nominal queen, but Venice compelled her at the end of that time to resign, and gave her for residence the Castle Aqalo.

The curious Biblical scholia on this character is Browning's own. It is said that the name was simply another way of spelling Blue Fox, a slang-phrase for the Edinburgh Review.

The Cristina of this poem is fashioned after Cristina Maria, daughter of Francis I., King of the Two Sicilies. She was born in 1806; was married in 1829 to Ferdinand VII. King of Spain; became Regent in 1833, on the death of the king; and in 1843 her daughter ascended the throne as Isabel II. Her life was given to intrigue, and to the use of tyrannical power. She was hated by those she ruled, and despised by them because of her personal character.

Page 176. You're worth—can you slay your snake like Apollo?

In a volume of selections from his poem, revised by Browning himself, occurs the following note on this line, by the poet:

"A word on the line about Apollo the snake-slayer, which my friend Professor Colvin condemns, believing that the god of the Belvedere group is Apollo, but the eclog as described in the 15th Idyll. Surely the text represents that potent object (θηρίων, δηρίων, ἄκρεισκαν, ἀκρευτά — καρπαριόν) as 'shaken violently' or 'held immovably' by both hands, not a single one, and that the left hand:

αλλά σε γά' ἐν χειρονοὶ λάβα αἰγίδο πυθακέας τὴν μαλ' ἀκρευτάς φασίνας ἤμποι Άχαιοι.

and so on, the δε' γά' ἐν χειρονοὶ ἐξως — χειρός ἐξ' ἄειρα, etc. Moreover, while he shook it he shouted enormously,' σταυρ', etc. I am aware these words mean, which the statue does not. Presently when Teukros, on the other side, plies the bow, it is τότεν ἐξων ἐν χειρὶ καλνάνειον. Besides, by the act of discharging an arrow, the right arm and hand are thrown back as we see, — a quite gratuitous and theatrical display in the case supposed. The conjecture of Flaxman that the statue was suggested by the bronze Apollo Alexiskakos of Kalamis, mentioned by Pausanias, remains probable; though the 'hardness' which Cicero considers to distinguish the artist's workmanship from that of Muron is not by any means apparent in our marble copy, if it be one. — Feb. 16, 1880."

The last four lines of the ninth section of Saul which ended the first part in Bells and Pomegranates, were as follows, 1845: —

"On one head the joy and the pride, even rage like the thros
That open the rock, helps its glad labor, and lets the gold go —
And ambition that sees a man lead it — oh, all of these
All combine to unite in one creature — Saul!"

"These two uneventful Bohemian lovers," says Professor Conson, "strolling together at night, at their own sweet will, see down the court along which they are strolling, three lamplight glare, which indicate some big place or other where the respectable do congregate; and the woman says to the companion, with a humorous sarcasm. Put forward your best foot! that is, we must be very correct passing along here in this brilliant light. By the lovers are evidently meant George Sand (the speaker) and Jules Sandea, with whom she lived in Paris, after she left her husband, M. Dudevant. They took just such unconventional night-strolls together, in the streets of Paris."

Page 194. THE GUARDIAN ANGEL.
The picture which Browning describes, called L'Angelo Custode, is in the church of St. Augustino at Fano; and it represents an angel standing with outstretched wings by a little child. The child is half-kneeling on a kind of pedestal, while the angel joins its hands in prayer; its gaze is directed upwards towards the sky, from which cherubs are looking down." It is not regarded as one of his chief pictures, but it interested Browning because of the subject, and its simple pathos.

Page 194. Alfred, dear friend.

Alfred Domett, the hero of Waring, an early friend of Browning, and at the time living in New Zealand, Mrs. Orr writes: "When he read the apostrophe to 'Alfred, dear friend,' he had reached the last line before it occurred to him that the person invoked could be he."

Page 264. WARING.

Alfred Domett, son of Nathaniel Domett, was born at Cambrewell Grove, Surrey, May 20, 1811. His father was a seaman under Nelson, and a gallant sailor. Alfred entered St. John's College, Cambridge, in 1839; but after a residence of three years he left without graduation. His attention was early turned to literature, and in 1832 he published a volume of poems. He also contributed to Blackwood's Magazine various lyrics which attracted attention to him as a rising poet. One of these was A Christmas Hymn, which is the best known of all his poems, and has been highly praised. It may be found in several poetical collections, and among them Festival Poems. In 1839, in the same magazine, he published a poem on Venice.

Domett was called to the bar in 1841, and lived in the Middle Temple with Joseph Arnold, who became Chief Justice of Bombay.
He was handsome and attractive, well received in society, and a favorite with his literary friends. Before this, however, he had spent two years in travelling in America, including a winter in the backwoods of Canada; and then two years more in Switzerland, Italy, and other Continental countries. In 1842 he was persuaded to go to New Zealand by his cousin, William Young, whose father was a large land owner there, in connection with the New Zealand Company. In May, 1842, he went out to that colony among the earliest settlers. It was immediately after his departure that Browning wrote his _Waring_, which describes his friend very accurately, and the circumstances of his sudden absence from London. On arriving in New Zealand, Domett found that his cousin had just been drowned. He settled in the county of Wairoa, on the North Island. In _The Guardian Angel_ Browning addressed him:—

"Where are you, dear old friend? How rolls the Wairoa at your world's far end?"

Soon after his arrival Domett was made a magistrate with a salary of £700 a year. Before leaving England and Domett was permanently lamied by an accident to one of his legs, which saved his life soon after he reached the colony, for it prevented his accepting the invitation of some treacherous native chiefs to a banquet at which all the English guests were killed. In his _Narrative of the Wairoa Massacre_, 1843, he described this event.

In 1848 he was made the Colonial Secretary for the southern part of the North Island; and in 1851 he was also appointed the Civil Secretary for the whole of New Zealand, holding both offices until the introduction of the new constitution, in 1853. Having resigned these offices, he accepted one of more work and less remuneration, as Commissioner of Crown Lands, and Resident Magistrate at Hawke's Bay; and of this district he had virtually the sole official management. In 1859 he represented the town of Nelson in the House of Representatives, and he was re-elected the following year.

In 1862, at a critical moment in the affairs of New Zealand, Domett was called upon to form a new government, which he successfully accomplished, becoming the Prime Minister.

In 1871, Domett returned to London, and took up his residence at Phillimore Terrace, Kensington; and afterwards at St. Charles's Square, North Kensington. He had married a handsome English lady while yet a resident in New Zealand. He saw much of Browning; he became an interested member of the Browning Society, and one of its vice-presidents. "His grand white head," says Mr. F. J. Furnivall, "was to be seen at all the Society's performances and at several of its meetings. He naturally preferred Mr. Browning's early works to the later ones. He could not be persuaded to write any account of his early London days. Mr. Domett produced with pride his sea-stained copy of Browning's _Bells and Pomegranate_ A sterling, manly, independent nature was Alfred Domett's. He impressed every one with whom he came in contact, and is deeply regretted by his remaining friends."

In 1872 Domett published in London his _Bunsel and Amohi, a South-Sea Day Dress_, a poem descriptive of New Zealand, its scenery, and the legends and habits of the Maori inhabitants. This poem was afterwards revised, enlarged, and published in two volumes. In 1877 he published, in connexion with those published before he went to New Zealand, under the title of _Flotsam and Jetsam, Rhymes Old and New_. [G. W. COOKER.], Page 280.

_He settled Hotti's business — let it be! Properly based Oum — Gave us the doctrine of the enclitic De._

_Hotti is the Greek particle ὅτι, that, etc. — Oum is the Greek particle ὅμως, then, now that, etc. — The enclitic De is the Greek ὅ, what Browning refers to in a letter to the London Daily News of Nov. 21, 1874: "To the Editor, Sir — In a clever article this morning you speak of 'the doctrine of enclitic De' — which, with all deference to Mr. Browning, in point of fact does not exist. No, not to Mr. Browning; but pray defer to Herr Buttima, whose fifth list of 'enclitics' ends with 'the inseparable De' — or to Curtius, whose fifth list ends with 'De (meaning 'towards' and as a demonstrative appendage). That this is not to be confounded with the so-called 'De, meaning but' was the doctrine which the Grammarian bequeathed to those capable of receiving it. — I am, sir, yours obediently, R. B."

In an article describing a visit to the poet, Rev. John W. Chadwick speaks of this tapestry and Mr. Browning's comments on the poems:—

"Upon the lengthwise wall of the room, above the Italian furniture, sombre and richly carved, was a long, wide band of tapestry, on which I thought I recognized the memorable horseriding of Childroland's pilgrimage:—

"One swift blind horse, his every bone a-star, Stood stiff and roused, however he came there:—

'Trust out past service from the devil's end!'"

I asked Mr. Browning if the beast of the tapestry was the beast of the poem; and he said yes and discarded somewhat on his lean monstrosity. But only a Browning could have evolved the stanzas of the poem from the woven image. I further asked him if he had said that he only wrote _Childroland_ for its realistic imagery, without any moral purpose, — a notion to which Mrs. Sutherland Orr has given currency; and he protested that he never had. When I asked him if constancy was an ideal — 'He that endures to the end shall be saved, — was not a sufficient understanding of the central purpose of the poem, he said, 'Yes, just about that.'"

Mrs. Orr prints in her _Handbook_ a note from Browning with reference to the attacks upon him for the form he adopted in the printing of Greek names. It is in reply to an article in the
NOTES AND ILLUSTRATIONS

* Nineteenth Century, for January, 1886, written by Mr. Frederick Harrison. * I have just noticed, wrote Browning, * 'in this month's * Nineteenth Century * that it is inquired by a humorous objector to the practice of spelling (under exceptional conditions) Greek proper names as they are spelled in Greek literature, why the same principle should not be adopted by Egyptologists, Hebrewists, Sanscritists, Acanadians, Moabites, Hittites, and Cuneiformists? * Adopt it by all means whenever the particular language enjoyed by any fortunate possessor of these shall, like Greek, have been for about three hundred years insisted upon in England, as an acquisition of paramount importance at school and college, for every aspirant to distinction in learning, even at the cost of six or seven years' study — a sacrifice considered well worth making for even an imperfect acquaintance with the most perfect language in the world. Further, it will be adopted whenever the letters substituted for those in ordinary English use shall do no more than represent to the unscholarly what the scholar accepts without scruple, when, for the hundredth time, he reads the word * which, for once, he has occasion to write in English, and which he concludes must be as euphonic as the rest of a language renowned for euphony. And finally, the practice will be adopted whenever the substituted letters effect no sort of organic change, so as to justify the word from its pride of place in English verse or prose. * 'Thomistokes' fits in quietly everywhere, with or without the * k; * but in a certain poetical translation I remember by a young friend, of the * Analecta, beginning thus felicitously: * 'Greek you were, d'Artagnan' (Where temper bloodier than a Turk's is) * Were children both of the mild, pious, And happy monarch * King Darius; * who fails to see that, although a correct * Kurash' may pass, yet * Daravash * disturbs the metre as well as the rhyme? * It seems to me, however, that 'Thomistokes' may be winked at; not so the * harsh and subversive * Kirke.' * * But let the objector ask somebody with no knowledge to subvert, how he supposes * 'Cirec' is spelled in Greek, and the answer will be, 'With a soft c.' Inform him that no such letter exists, and he guesses, * 'Then with * s, if there be anything like it.' Tell him that to eye and ear equally, his own * k answers the purpose, and you have at all events taught him that much, if little enough — and why does he live unless to learn a little!' * This note is signed * 'R. B.' * Its date is January 4, 1886.

* 'Antinomians, so denominated for rejecting the Law as a thing of no use under the Gospel dispensation: they say, that good works do not further, nor evil works hinder salvation; that the child of God cannot sin, that God never chastiseth him, that murder, drunkenness, etc., are sins in the wicked but not in him, that the child of grace is invulnerable, afterwards never doubteth, that God doth not love any man for his holiness, that sanctification is no evidence of justification, etc. * Pontanus, in his * Catalogue of Heresies, says * John Agricola was the author of this sect. * A. * 'I know no other piece of modern English prose or poetry, in which there is so much told, as in these lines, of the Renaissance spirit — its worldliness, inconsistency, pride, hypocrisy, ignorance of itself, love of art, of luxury, and of good Latin. * It is nearly all that I said of the central Renaissance in thirty pages of the * Stones of Venice, put into as many lines, Browning's being also the antecedent work. * The worst of it is that this kind of concentrated writing needs so much solution before the reader can fairly get the good of it, that people's patience fails them, and they give the thing up as insoluble; though, truly, it ought to be to the current of common thought like Saladin's talisman, dipped in clear water, not soluble altogether, but making the element medicinal.' * [JOHN RUSKIN.]

A verst is about .66 of a mile (3500 feet).—
I take it the highway broad and straight from the Nева's mouth to Moscow's gates of gold must refer to the legend that when the first railroad was built from the city to the other, the Emperor Nicholas ordered that it should run absolutely straight, himself marking it with a ruler on the map. I do not think the old highway ran straight. —IVÁN IVÁNOVITCH is equivalent to John Johnson, or more correctly Jack Jackson, Ivan being the familiar of Iván, John. The ending vitch, however, is not exactly an equivalent to son; it really means father. — Dress correctly spell drunk (pronounced drank); means friend. — Brevonna's mother is correspondent to the Russian мать, and is as dear and diminutive of mat, mother; it is always applied to any old peasant woman; it is a familiar form of address, often applied to my woman or even girl. — Василий (acted by special license the forename the Russian style) should be spelt Васили: it is our Basil. — Лакерия is a colloquial form of Glicteria, Glycera; the proper diminutive is Лушка and also Лушка. — Browning makes one odd mistake in the poem; it would be impossible for the breath to go up straight when the people were riding fast in a Russian sledge. — He speaks of твін pigeons; the best familiar term of endearment in Russian is петушик, which is the diminutive of the word for pigeon. — Стёпка is the proper diminutive of Степан, Stephen; the is merely represents the sound of the c (as in yolk) with which it is written in Russian. — Pope should not be with capital; it simply means priest. — Марфа should be spelt Marfa; it is our Martha, but the Russians cannot pronounce th; they represent it by f. — Помесчик should be pronounced; it means merely a landed proprietor. — Струмс is correctly accented; it is the bailiff of a village, also overseer, inspector; it merely means old man (from strom, old age, star. old. — Bremlin is better bremli; it is any fortress, but especially the one at Vrban, which is the diminutive of Yekaterina, Catherine. — Kolokol is pronounced as though it were two syllables, accent on the first. — I am not certain about the correctness of Teriiska. It should have no e: nor should Stescha."

"Studiando le mio cifre col compasso, / Rilevo che sarò presto sotterra, / Perché del mio saper si gran chiauso, / E gia' ignorami m' hanno mosso guerra."

Said to have been found in a wall at Abano is the last century. They were extemporaneously Englished thus: not as Father Prout chose to prefer it:—

Studying my ciphers with the compass, / I reckon—soon shall be below ground; / Because, of my lore folk make great rumpus, / And war on myself makes each dull rogue rage.

Egli vi ha foscato desere tanti miracoloni, che diviene una noia impossibile a chiunque voglia leggere quelle storie: e anche a me, non mi bastò l'animò e proseguire molto avanti." — ANGELO CERRITI.
